The International Conference

– CKS 2018 –

Challenges of the Knowledge Society

Bucharest, 11th - 12th May 2018, 12th Edition

”Nicolae Titulescu” University Publishing House
Calea Văcărești, nr. 185, sector 4, Bucharest
Phone/Fax: +400213309032/+400213308606
Email: editura@univnt.ro

ISSN 2359-9227
ISSN-L 2068-7796

Indexed by EBSCO, ProQuest, DOAJ,
Index Copernicus, Ulrich`s Databases

INTERNATIONAL SCIENTIFIC COMMITTEE

ORGANIZING COMMITTEE

ANTI – CORRUPTION INITIATIVES, GOOD GOVERNANCE AND HUMAN RIGHTS: THE REPUBLIC OF MACEDONIA

Elena ANDREEVSKA[*]
Lidija RAICHEVIC[]

Abstract

In fighting corruption, good governance efforts rely on principles such as accountability, transparency and participation to shape anti-corruption measures. Initiatives may include establishing institutions such as anti-corruption commissions, creating mechanisms of information sharing, and monitoring governments' use of public funds and implementation of policies. Good governance and human rights are mutually reinforcing. Human rights principles provide a set of values to guide the work of governments and other political and social actors. They also provide a set of performance standards against which these actors can be held accountable. Moreover, human rights principles inform the content of good governance efforts: they may inform the development of legislative frameworks, policies, programmers, budgetary allocations and other measures. Corruption is recognized as a serious crime in the EU, which is reflected in its many anti-corruption instruments covering existing member states. Countries wishing to join still face considerable systemic corruption issues in their public institutions. In Macedonia as one of these countries the most significant human rights problems stemmed from pervasive corruption and from the government's failure to respect fully the rule of law.

This article introduces anti-corruption work, good governance, and attempts to identify the various levels of relationship between that work and human rights with particular reference to Macedonia as an EU candidate country.

Keywords: corruption, anti-corruption instruments, good governance, impact of corruption on human rights, Macedonia.

1. Introduction

Fighting corruption is a global concern because corruption is found in both rich and poor countries, and evidence shows that it hurts poor people disproportionately. It contributes to instability, poverty and is a dominant factor driving fragile countries towards state failure[1].

Every year $1 trillion is paid in bribes while an estimated $2.6 trillion are stolen annually through corruption – a sum equivalent to more than 5 per cent of the global GDP. In developing countries, according to the United Nations Development Programme, funds lost to corruption are estimated at 10 times the amount of official development assistance[2].

The 2017 joint international campaign focuses on corruption as one of the biggest impediments to achieving the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs). To mark the 2017 International Anti-Corruption Day (IACD), UNODC has developed a wide-ranging campaign focused on different SDGs and on how tackling corruption is vital to achieving them[3].

Corporate corruption scandals unearthed in recent years have provided further impetus to the anti-corruption movement[4].

What exactly is corruption? How are "offering", "promising" and "giving" a bribe treated under the law? Different countries have different answers to these [*] Professor, PhD, The Faculty of Public Administration and Political Scientific "South East University", Tetovo (e-mail: e.andreevska@seeu.edu.mk).

[] PhD, Public Prosecutor "Basic Public Prosecutor's Office for Preservation of Organized Crime and Corruption", Skopje (e-mail: lidijaraicevic@gmail.com).

[1] Governments, the private sector, non-governmental organizations, the media and citizens around the world are joining forces to fight this crime. The United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) and the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime(UNODC) are at the forefront of these efforts. See International Anti-Corruption Day 9 December: http://www.un.org/en/events/anticorruptionday.

[2] Corruption is a serious crime that can undermine social and economic development in all societies. No country, region or community is immune. This year UNODC and UNDP have developed a joint global campaign, focusing on how corruption affects education, health, justice, democracy, prosperity and development. See United Nations Campaign: http://www.anticorruptionday.org/actagainstcorruption/en/about-the-campaign/index.html.

[3] Ibid. On 9 December each year, the world celebrates International Anti-Corruption Day. The fact that such a symbolic day exists (and immediately precedes Human Rights Day on 10 December) reflects the international community's increased recognition of the importance of anti-corruption measures. Various factors have contributed to this, including the heightened awareness of the concrete impact of corruption. Attention has turned, for example, to: the financing of terrorist acts; the covering up of narcotics trafficking; and the impediments to the effective use of aid for economic growth and development caused by corrupt practices. See, eg, UNCAC Preamble para 2: 'Concerned also about the links between corruption and other forms of crime, in particular organized crime and economic crime, including money-laundering'.

[4] Well-known examples include the corruption allegations against BAE Systems and Siemens: R (Corner House Research) v Director of the Serious Fraud Office [2009] 1 AC 756 ('BAE Case'); United States v Siemens Aktiengesellschaft (Plea Agreement) (DC, No 1:08-CR-00367-RJL, 6 January 2009) ('Siemens Plea Agreement').

questions, by definition as well as interpretation[5]. Corruption here will be understood to mean abuse of public office for private gain, which involves, for instance, public officials accepting bribes, unwarranted commissions or 'kickbacks' around processes of public procurement and service[6].

The fight against corruption is central to the struggle for human rights. Corruption has always greased the wheels of the exploitation and injustice which characterize our world. From violent ethnic cleansing to institutionalized racism, political actors have abused their entrusted powers to focus on gains for the few at great cost for the many[7]. Human rights strengthen good governance frameworks. They require: going beyond the ratification of human rights treaties, integrating human rights effectively in legislation and State policy and practice; establishing the promotion of justice as the aim of the rule of law; understanding that the credibility of democracy depends on the effectiveness of its response to people's political, social and economic demands; promoting checks and balances between formal and informal institutions of governance; effecting necessary social changes, particularly regarding gender equality and cultural diversity; generating political will and public participation and awareness; and responding to key challenges for human rights and good governance, such as corruption and violent conflict[8].

Moreover, Human rights require a conducive and enabling environment, in particular appropriate regulations, institutions and procedures framing the actions of the State. Human rights provide a set of performance standards against which Governments and other actors can be held accountable. At the same time, good governance policies should empower individuals to live with dignity and freedom. Although human rights empower people, they cannot be respected and protected in a sustainable manner without good governance. In addition to relevant laws, political, managerial and administrative processes and institutions are needed to respond to the rights and needs of populations. There is no single model for good governance. Institutions and processes evolve over time[9].

The success of the democratization and the establishment of a functioning State will depend on the existence of functioning institutions of pluralistic democracy and market economy in the Republic of Macedonia as well as other West Balkans States concerned. The effectiveness of local reform efforts and international technical and financial assistance requires the quality of public service and must be based on the best practices of good governance. As corruption is the negation of the Rule of Law and an impediment to efficient law enforcement and effective functioning of public institutions, non-governmental institutions need to find a common platform with the institutions of the state to work to prevent it. Reducing corruption requires not only the relevant institution-building measures but also creating the social preconditions for establishing the Rule of Law. In this context it is of decisive importance to foster a democratic political culture based on trust and respect of government institutions, transparency and openness of the activities of the administration, and an orientation towards stability and predictability. This task has become all the more pressing in the Republic of Macedonia.

2. The International Legal Framework Against Corruption

Corruption is the abuse of public or private office for personal gain[10]. The costs of corruption for economic, political and social development are becoming increasingly evident. But many of the most convincing arguments in support of the fight against corruption are little known to the public and remain unused in political debates. This brief provides evidence that reveals the true cost and to explain why governments and business must prioritise the fight against corruption[11].

International anti-corruption conventions play a key role in the global fight for integrity by: bringing the fight against corruption to the political forefront, setting

[5] Corruption is the abuse of power for private gain. Corruption takes many forms, such as bribery, trading in influence, abuse of functions, but can also hide behind nepotism, conflicts of interest, or revolving doors between the public and the private sectors. Its effects are serious and widespread. Corruption constitutes a threat to security, as an enabler for crime and terrorism. It acts as a drag on economic growth, by creating business uncertainty, slowing processes, and imposing additional costs. The abuse of entrusted power for private gain. corruption can be classified as grand, petty and political, depending on the amounts of money lost and the sector where it occurs. See Transparency International at: https://wwwtransparency.org/glossary/term/cprruption.

[6] See Observe:r http://oecdobserver.org/news/archivestory.php/aid/2163/Defining_corruption.html.

[7] See, The Global corruption Barometer (20070) : https://www.transparency.org/research/gcb/gcb_2007.

[8] Ibid.

[9] Governance refers to mechanisms, institutions and processes through which authority is exercised in the conduct of public affairs. The concept of good governance emerged in the late 1980s to address failures in development policies due to governance concerns, including failure to respect human rights. The concepts of good governance and human rights are mutually reinforcing, both being based on core principles of participation, accountability, transparency and State responsibility. See HRBA Portal: http://hrbaportal.org/faq/what-is-the-relationship-between-human-rights-and-good-governance.

[10] It could be the multinational company that pays a bribe to win the public contract to build the local highway, despite proposing a sub-standard offer. It could be the politician redirecting public investments to his hometown rather than to the region most in need. It could be the public official embezzling funds for school renovations to build his private villa. It could be the manager recruiting an ill-suited friend for a high-level position. Or, it could be the local official demanding bribes from ordinary citizens to get access to a new water pipe. At the end of the day, those hurt most by corruption are the world's weakest and most vulnerable. See, The rationale for fighting corruption at: https://www.oecd.org/cleangovbiz/49693613.pdf.

[11] Ibid.

legally binding standards and principles by which signatory states can be held to account, fostering both the domestic action and international co-operation needed to tackle the many facets of corruption.

Although they may be similar in substance, conventions can vary considerably depending on their signatories and specific obligations. Regarding their geographic scope, some aspire to a global coverage, while others have a regional focus. They may provide for different types of obligations, whether it is concrete recommendations for action along with sophisticated review processes, or more general political commitments as a basis for specific steps to be taken[12].

From the preceding brief summary of the international anti-corruption movement's evolution, it is clear that the Organization of Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) Convention was a catalyst for further action[13]. The Convention have a global impact. It reduce the supply side of corruption as the OECD countries are the home states of most international companies. It is important on the demand-side, strengthening domestic anti-corruption efforts in developing countries and in those countries in transition in Central and Eastern Europe[14].

This Convention deals with what, in the law of some countries, is called "active corruption" or "active bribery", meaning the offence committed by the person who promises or gives the bribe, as contrasted with "passive bribery", the offence committed by the official who receives the bribe[15]. This Convention seeks to assure a functional equivalence among the measures taken by the Parties to sanction bribery of foreign public officials, without requiring uniformity or changes in fundamental principles of a Party's legal system[16].

It should be noted that Bribery in international business subverts world trade and investment. Bribery often leads to a misallocation of scarce public resources. Sometimes public officials are bribed to support non-essential projects thereby[17]. The rot may result from foreign contractors doing dirty deals with local administrators[18] that enrich them both.

The OECD has been a global leader in the fight against corruption for many years. Along with other intergovernmental organizations, OECD has helped to create a panoply of international instruments that seek to limit corruption. And yet corruption continues. This is, in part, the inspiration for launching CleanGovBiz. This initiative supports governments, business and civil society to build integrity and fight corruption. It draws together existing anti-corruption tools, reinforces their implementation, improves co-ordination among relevant players and monitors progress towards integrity[19].

The first global agreement comprehensively addressing corruption is the United Nations Convention against Corruption (UNCAC)[20]. The high number of signatories and ratifications reflects the broad international consensus on the UNCAC. This consensus was not only shared among states, but also [12] See, https://www.oecd.org/cleangovbiz/internationalconventions.htm#global.

[13] Convention on Combating Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in International Business Transactions, opened for signature 17 December 1997, [1999] ATS 21 (entered into force 15 February 1999) ('OECD Convention').

[14] Public knowledge of the critical issues under discussion within the OECD needs to be increased. In defining and describing those issues, the public can note that finally governments are moving to curb corruption. An inadequate Convention forces the question to OECD governments: how much global business bribery is the international community willing to tolerate ? See, OECD Anti-Corruption Convention Leaves Critical Question Still Open, at: https://www.transparency.org /news/pressrelease /oecd_anti_corruption_convention_leaves_critical_ questions_still_open.

[15] The Convention does not utilize the term "active bribery" simply to avoid it being misread by the non-technical reader as implying that the briber has taken the initiative and the recipient is a passive victim. In fact, in a number of situations, the recipient will have induced or pressured the briber and will have been, in that sense, the more active.

[16] See also the Recommendation of the Council for Further Combating Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in International Business Transactions Adopted by the Council on 26 November 2009; Recommendation of the Council on Tax Measures for Further Combating Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in International Business Transactions, Adopted by the Council on 25 May 2009; Recommendation of the Council on Bribery and Officially Supported Export Credits Adopted by the Council on 14 December 2006; Recommendation of the Council for Development Co-operation Actors on Managing the Risk of Corruption 16 November 2016; and OECD Guidelines for Multinational Enterprises – Section VII.

[17] For example in many developing countries. further postponing construction of vital rural clinics and sanitation systems. Sometimes important infrastructure, such as roads and railways, is constructed but then collapses. Bribery can enable corrupt authoritarian regimes to stay in office. And there is frequently a link between high levels of official corruption and widespread human rights abuse. Or, corporate bribery of officials can contribute to the collapse of fragile institutions of democracy. And, at worst, the collapse of such institutions can spark the forceful overthrow of governments, so unleashing a fresh cycle of military rule, repression and corruption. See Ibid. Supra 17.

[18] For example, purchasing poor quality equipment at inflated prices.

[19] The CleanGovBiz Toolkit is being developed on the basis of the important standards embodied in international conventions to help put these standards into practice. In order to "walk the talk" o these conventions, the Toolkit proposes concrete priority measures, guidance on their implementation and examples of good practices in the multiple policy areas concerned. These conventions have been signed and ratified by states which in turn provides the necessary political legitimacy for applying the CleanGovBiz guidance. Political momentum is building to intensify the fight against corruption. Citizens are no longer willing to bear the burden of corrupt political and economic elites, as shown by the uprising in the Arab world. The tight budget constraints deriving from the crisis and the emerging corruption cases in a number of countries are increasing pressure on decision makers to act. CleanGovBiz provides governments, businesses and civil society with guidance and access to practical tools to face this challenge. See at: https://www.oecd.org/cleangovbiz/about/.

[20] UN General Assembly Resolution UNGA, on 31 October 2016 and was opened for signature in Merida, Mexico, on 9-11 December 2003. The Convention entered into force two years later, on 14 December 2005.

among the international private sector and civil society[21].

Substantive Highlights of the Convention include:

- Prevention[22] which means that the corruption can be prosecuted after the fact, but first and foremost, it requires prevention. An entire chapter of the Convention is dedicated to prevention, with measures directed at both the public and private sectors[23];
- The Convention requires countries to establish criminal and other offences to cover a wide range of acts of corruption, if these are not already crimes under domestic law[24];
- Countries agreed to cooperate with one another in every aspect of the fight against corruption, including prevention, investigation, and the prosecution of offenders[25]; and
- In a major breakthrough, countries agreed on asset-recovery, which is stated explicitly as "a fundamental principle of the Convention[26]…".

The UNCAC does not specify what conditions need to be met in order for anti-corruption bodies to be considered independent. Clarification can be found in an OECD study, which states that structural and operational autonomy, along with a clear legal basis and mandate for anti-corruption body, are all important elements in achieving independence[27].

The EU started off with modest anti-corruption instruments that mainly tackled the misdirection of EU funds in 1995. However, the EU broadened its focus over the course of time, with the final step being a comprehensive two-year review process of member states' general anti-corruption achievements. The results of a 2012 EU Corruption Barometer underlined that even in the EU, the fight against corruption is far from won.1[28] The Treaty on the Functioning of the EU recognizes corruption as a "euro-crime", listing it among the particularly serious crimes with a cross-border dimension for which minimum rules on the definition of criminal offences and sanctions may be established[29]. With the adoption of the Stockholm Program,[30] the Commission has been given a political mandate to measure efforts in the fight against corruption and to develop a comprehensive EU anti-corruption policy, in close cooperation with the Council of Europe Group of States against Corruption (GRECO)[31] .

The EU Anti-Corruption Report, published in 2014[32], demonstrated that the nature and scope of corruption vary from one EU country to another and that the effectiveness of anti-corruption policies is quite different. The Report also showed that corruption deserves greater attention in all EU countries.

Since then, the EU Anti-Corruption Report has served as the basis for dialogue with national authorities while also informing broader debates across Europe. All EU countries have designated a national contact point to facilitate information exchange on anti-corruption policy. Together with the anti-corruption experience-sharing programme launched by the Commission in 2015[33], these efforts have encouraged [21] By ratifying treaties, states make an explicit and legally binding commitment to abide by and give effect to the normative principles espoused in them. However, there is no guarantee that states will institute the legal protections necessary to secure their international obligations, especially because the institutional characteristics, monitoring mechanisms and substantive content of these treaties vary greatly.

[22] Article 6 of the Convention.

[23] These include model preventive policies, such as the establishment of anticorruption bodies and enhanced transparency in the financing of election campaigns and political parties. States must endeavour to ensure that their public services are subject to safeguards that promote efficiency, transparency and recruitment based on merit. Once recruited, public servants should be subject to codes of conduct, requirements for financial and other disclosures, and appropriate disciplinary measures.

[24] In some cases, States are legally obliged to establish offences; in other cases, in order to take into account differences in domestic law, they are required to consider doing so. The Convention goes beyond previous instruments of this kind, criminalizing not only basic forms of corruption such as bribery and the embezzlement of public funds, but also trading in influence and the concealment and "laundering" of the proceeds of corruption. Offences committed in support of corruption, including money laundering and obstructing justice, are also dealt with. Convention offences also deal with the problematic areas of private-sector corruption. See Article 43 of the Convention.

[25] Countries are bound by the Convention to render specific forms of mutual legal assistance in gathering and transferring evidence for use in court, to extradite offenders. Countries are also required to undertake measures which will support the tracing, freezing, seizure and confiscation of the proceeds of corruption. Ibid.

[26] Article 51 of the Convention.

[27] Anti-Corruption Network for Eastern Europe and Central Asia, 'Specialized Anti-Corruption Institutions: Review of Models' (Report, Organizations for Economic Co-Operation and Development, 2008), 10, pp. 24-7. See also, UN Doc. CAC/COSP/IRG/2012/CRP.8 (22 June 2012); UN Doc CAC/COSP/2009/15 (1 December 2009) 3.; UN Doc CAC/COSP/IRG/1/1/1 Add. 3 (9 January 2012); UN Doc CAC/COSP/IRG/1/1/1/Add..4 (16 January 2012); UN Doc CAC/COSP/IRG/1/1/1 Add.5 (31 January 2012); UN Doc CAC/COSP/IRG/1/1/1 Add. 6 (23 March 2012) and UN Doc CAC/COSP/IRG/2012/CRP. 4 (18 Lune 2012).

[28] See European Commission, 'Commission Fights Corruption: A Stronger Commitment for Greater Results' (Press Release, IP/11/678, 6 June 2011) ; European Commission, 'Commission Steps Up Efforts to Forge a Comprehensive Anti-Corruption Policy at EU Level' (Press Release, MEMO 11/376, 6 June 2011) ; European Commission, 'Frequently Asked Questions: How Corruption is Tackled at the EU Level' (Press Release, MEMO 12/105, 15 February 2012) .

[29] See the Treaty on the Functioning the EU (TFEU) Article 83.1.

[30] See THE STOCKHOLM PROGRAMME — AN OPEN AND SECURE EUROPE SERVING AND PROTECTING CITIZENS (2010/C 115/01).

[31] It is in the common interest to ensure that all Member States have effective anti-corruption policies and the EU supports the Member States in pursuing this work. See REPORT FROM THE COMMISSION TO THE COUNCIL on the modalities of European Union participation in the Council of Europe Group of States against Corruption (GRECO), COM/2011/0307.

[32] See, European Commission, Brussels, 3.2.2014, COM(2014) 38.

[33] European Commission Anti-Corruption Report at: https://ec.europa.eu/home-affairs/what-we-do/policies/organized-crime-and-human-trafficking/corruption/anti-corruption-report_en.

national authorities to better implement laws and policies against corruption.

The Commission's anti-corruption efforts are centred around the following main pillars: mainstreaming anti-corruption provisions in EU horizontal and sectorial legislation and policy; monitoring performances in the fight against corruption by Member States; supporting the implementation of anti-corruption measures at national level via funding, technical assistance and experience-sharing; improving the quantitative evidence base for anti-corruption policy[34]. One tool to help anti-corruption efforts is ensuring a common high standard of legislation, either specifically on corruption, or incorporating anti-corruption elements in other sectoral legislation.

Specific anti-corruption acquis includes the 1997 Convention on fighting corruption involving officials of the EU or officials of Member States[35] and the 2003 Framework Decision on combating corruption in the private sector[36] aims to criminalise both active and passive bribery.

The Council of Europe (CoE) , which aims to defend and promote pluralistic democracy, human rights and the rule of law, has played a pioneering role in the fight against corruption as it represents a danger for the core values cited. The Criminal Law Convention on Corruption states that corruption endangers the rule of law, democracy and human rights; it poses a threat to good governance, a fair and social justice system, distorts the competitive map, puts a brake on economic development and endangers the stability of democratic institutions and the moral foundations of society.

On 6 November 1997, the Committee of Ministers of the CoE adopted the Twenty Guiding Principles for the Fight against Corruption[37]. These guidelines set out a broad spectrum of anti-corruption measures, such as limiting immunity for corruption charges, denying tax deductibility for bribes, ensuring free media and preventing the shielding of legal persons from liability.

The Criminal Law Convention was adopted by CoE in early 1999[38] and an Additional Protocol to the Criminal Law Convention on Corruption was adopted in May 2003[39]. The Criminal Law Convention aims to harmonise the definition of a certain type of corruption, namely that of public officials. Such harmonisation, as stated by the Explanatory Report that accompanied the Criminal Law Convention,[40] would more easily allow for the requirement of dual criminality to be met by the states parties.

The Civil Law Convention on Corruption ('Civil Law Convention') was adopted on 4 November 1999 and entered into force four years later[41]. It focuses on effective civil remedies for any damage caused by corrupt acts. Both the Criminal Law Convention and the Civil Law Convention are open for signature by non-European countries[42].

The CoE's anti-corruption efforts have received substantial attention mainly because of the anti-corruption implementation mechanism. The CoE established GRECO on 1 May 1999[43]. Its function is to monitor compliance with the Council's anti-corruption standards[44], serving as a platform for both the exchange of best practices and peer pressure[45]. States that are not members of the CoE can become members of GRECO[46] and states that become parties to the Criminal Law Convention or the Civil Law Convention automatically become members[47].

3. Anti-Corruption Measures, Good Governance and Human Rights

There is no single and exhaustive definition of "good governance," nor is there a delimitation of its [34] Ibid.

[35] Council Act of 26 May 1997 drawing up the Convention made on the basis of Article K.3 (2)(c) of the Treaty on European Union, on the fight against corruption involving officials of the European Communities or officials of Member States of the European Union [Official Journal C 195 of 25 June 1997].

[36] Council Framework Decision 2003/568/JHA of 22 July 2003 on combating corruption in the private sector. See also: 1st Protocol to the PIF Convention of 27 September 1996 (in force since 17 October 2002); Protocol of 19 June 1997 to the PIF Convention (in force since May 2009); Convention on Fighting Corruption involving Officials of the EU or Officials of the Member States, 1997 (entered into force on 28 September 2005); EACN, Council Decision 2008/852/JHA, of 24 October 2008 on a contact point network against corruption; EU Anti-Corruption Package (follow- up the Stockholm Programme, adopted on 16 June 2011; and Directive 2004/18 on the coordination of procedures for award of public work contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts.

[37] Committee of Ministers, Council of Europe, Resolution (97)24 on the Twenty Guiding Principles for the Fight against Corruption (6 November 1997).

[38] See, Criminal Law Convention on Corruption, Strasbourg, 27.I.1999, European Treaty Series - No. 173.

[39] Additional Protocol to the Criminal Law Convention, opened for signature 15 May 2003, ETS No 191 (entered into force on 1 February 2005) ('Additional Protocol').

[40] Council of Europe, Criminal Law Convention on Corruption: Explanatory Report, [21]–[22] .

[41] Civil Law Convention on Corruption, opened for signature 4 November 1999, ETS No 174 (entered into force 1 November 2003).

[42] In addition to these treaties, the CoE has issued several soft law instruments. One of them is the recommendation on codes of conduct for public officials, adopted on 11 May 2000 (See Committee of Ministers, Council of Europe, Recommendation No R 2000(10) of the Committee of Ministers to Member States on Codes of Conduct for Public Officials (11 May 2000). On 8 April 2003, the Committee of Ministers adopted a recommendation on common rules against corruption in the funding of political parties and electoral campaigns (See, Recommendation Rec(2003)4); Council of Ministers Recommendation Rec(2003)4; and Council of Ministers Recommendation No R (2000) 10.

[43] Committee of Ministers, Council of Europe, Resolution 99(5) Establishing the Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) (1 May 1999).

[44] Ibid art. 2.

[45] Ibid art. 1.

[46] Ibid art 4(2).

[47] Criminal Law Convention art 24; Civil Law Convention art 14.

scope, that commands universal acceptance[48]. Depending on the context and the overriding objective sought, good governance has been said at various times to encompass: full respect of human rights, the rule of law, effective participation, multi-actor partnerships, political pluralism, transparent and accountable processes and institutions, an efficient and effective public sector, legitimacy, access to knowledge, information and education, political empowerment of people, equity, sustainability, and attitudes and values that foster responsibility, solidarity and tolerance.

However, there is a significant degree of consensus that good governance relates to political and institutional processes and outcomes that are deemed necessary to achieve the goals of development[49]. The key question is: are the institutions of governance effectively guaranteeing the right to health, adequate housing, sufficient food, quality education, fair justice and personal security?

The concept of good governance has been clarified by the work of the former Commission on Human Rights,[50] identified the key attributes of good governance: transparency, responsibility, accountability, participation, responsiveness (to the needs of the people)[51].

In fighting corruption, good governance efforts rely on principles such as accountability, transparency and participation to shape anti-corruption measures. Initiatives may include establishing institutions such as anti-corruption commissions, creating mechanisms of information sharing, and monitoring governments' use of public funds and implementation of policies[52].

At the Warsaw Summit in June 2016[53] Heads of State and Government agreed that corruption and poor governance are security challenges that undermine democracy, the rule of law and economic development, erode public trust and have a negative impact on operational effectiveness.

Improved governance requires an integrated, long-term strategy built upon cooperation between government and citizens. It involves both participation and institutions. The Rule of Law, Accountability, and Transparency are technical and legal issues at some levels, but also interactive to produce government that is legitimate, effective, and widely supported by citizens, as well as a civil society that is strong, open, and capable of playing a positive role in politics and government[54]. Good governance involves far more than the power of the state or the strength of political will. The rule of law, transparency, and accountability are not merely technical questions of administrative procedure or institutional design[55]. They are outcomes of democratizing processes driven not only by committed leadershiut also by the participation of, and contention among, groups and interests in society—processes that are most effective when sustained and restrained by legitimate, effective institutions[56].

There is no doubt that the goals for good governance are: Legitimate, effective, responsive institutions and policies; understandable processes and outcomes[57]; transparency[58]; incentives to sustain good governance for leaders[59]; vertical accountability[60]; and horizontal accountability and leaders, and among segments of government[61] .

The human rights issues primarily concern the relationship between the state and its citizens. The economic development mainly depends on good governance and equitable. Now, these days, is what good governance is to ensure the political and economic development. There are two aspects of good governance, about the legitimacy of a political aspect and a technical aspect that is related to the capacity. Democratic governance and state capacity inextricably linked together. Good governance as an ideal principle refers to the effective user friendly laws that benefit those who live in the territory. Good governance and basic human rights standards should be defined by economic criteria and management. Relationship between human rights and good governance is the way

[48] The term is used with great flexibility; this is an advantage, but also a source of some difficulty at the operational level.

[49] It has been said that good governance is the process whereby public institutions conduct public affairs, manage public resources and guarantee the realization of human rights in a manner essentially free of abuse and corruption, and with due regard for the rule of law. The true test of "good" governance is the degree to which it delivers on the promise of human rights: civil, cultural, economic, political and social rights.

[50] UN Commission on Human Rights, resolution No. 2000/64. By linking good governance to sustainable human development, emphasizing principles such as accountability, participation and the enjoyment of human rights, and rejecting prescriptive approaches to development assistance, the resolution stands as an implicit endorsement of the rights-based approach to development.

[51] Resolution 2000/64 expressly linked good governance to an enabling environment conducive to the enjoyment of human rights and "prompting growth and sustainable human development." In underscoring the importance of development cooperation for securing good governance in countries in need of external support, the resolution recognized the value of partnership approaches to development cooperation and the inappropriateness of prescriptive approaches.

[52] See, SELDI.net: http://seldi.net/history/summary/anti-corruptiongood-governance.

[53] See, Warsaw Summit Communique, Issued by the Heads of State and Government participating in the meeting of the North Atlantic Council in Warsaw 8-9 July 2016, at: https://www.nato.int/cps/en/natohq/official_texts_133169.htm.

[54] Good Governance: Rule of Law, Transparency, and Accountability by Michael Johnston Department of Political Science, Colgate University, at: http://unpan1.un.org/intradoc/groups/public/documents/un/unpan010193.pdf.

[55] See, UN Millennium Development Goals (MDG): http://www.un.org/millenniumgoals/

[56] Ibid. Supra 56.

[57] With visible results in citizens' lives --with clear standards for success or failure --with clear lines of responsibility and accountability.

[58] Openness from above --participation and scrutiny from below --honesty from all.

[59] The opportunity to take credit --for citizens: a credible chance for justice and a better life --for neighboring societies: sharing insights, experiences, expertise, values.

[60] Government that answers to citizens --citizens who accept and abide by laws and policies.

[61] Access to information --the right to be consulted --the power to check excesses and abuses.

in which human rights can be seen as good corporate governance reform policies[62].

Finally, corruption compromises States' ability to fulfil their obligation to promote, respect and protect the human rights of individuals within their jurisdictions. Human rights are indivisible and interdependent, and the consequences of corrupt governance are multiple and touch on all human rights — civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights, as well as the right to development[63].

4. EU Enlargement: The Republic of Macedonia

Corruption is recognized as a serious crime in the EU, which is reflected in its many anti-corruption instruments covering existing member states. Countries wishing to join still face considerable systemic corruption issues in their public institutions[64].

Corruption affects citizens in very basic aspects of their everyday life in various ways. It has a negative impact: on citizens' everyday life[65]; on a political level[66]; and on economic development[67].

Macedonia is the 90 least corrupt nation out of 175 countries, according to the 2016 Corruption Perceptions Index reported by Transparency International. Corruption Rank in Macedonia averaged 79.20 from 1999 until 2016, reaching an all time high of 106 in 2003 and a record low of 62 in 2010[68].

Corruption and inefficient bureaucracy are challenges companies may face when doing business in Macedonia. There is a high risk of corruption in most of the country's sectors. Private businesses frequently complain about burdensome administrative processes that create operational delays and opportunities for corruption. Public procurement, the customs administration, and the building and construction sectors are some of the areas where corruption and bribery are most prevalent. The primary legal framework regulating corruption and bribery in Macedonia is contained in the Law on prevention of Corruption[69] and the Crime Code,[70] which make individuals and companies criminally liable for corrupt practices[71].

As a final point, concerning the fight against corruption, the country has some level of preparation. Corruption remains prevalent in many areas and continues to be a serious problem. The legislative and institutional framework has been developed. However, the structural shortcomings of the State Commission for Prevention of Corruption and political interference in its work have minimized the impact of past efforts. There is still a need to establish a convincing track record, especially on high level corruption cases. In the fight against organised crime, the country has reached some level of preparation. The legislative framework is broadly in line with European standards and strategies have been elaborated. However, the law enforcement capacity to investigate financial crimes and confiscate assets needs to be developed further[72].

Conclusion

The case for combating corruption is that "it is a force which drives poverty, inequality, dysfunctional democracy and global insecurity". These words, from one of the world's foremost experts on countering corruption over the past thirty years, speak to all of us,

---

[62] See Relationship between good governance and Human rights Masoomeh Mostafavi Azad University, 2012, at: file:///C:/Users/e.andreevska.SEEU/Downloads/SSRN-id2136129.pdf.

[63] In recent years, a number of relevant UN bodies and mechanisms have acknowledged the negative effects of corruption on the protection of human rights and on development. UN human rights bodies and mechanisms (i.e., Human Rights Council, its Special Rapporteurs, and the Universal Periodic Review mechanism, as well as human rights Treaty Bodies) are increasingly mindful of the negative impact of corruption on the enjoyment of human rights, and have addressed issues of corruption and human rights on numerous occasions.

[64] Between September 2012 and February 2013, more than 6,000 people were interviewed in the Western Balkans on their views of corruption levels in their country/territory and their governments' efforts to fight corruption. The survey shows that: 44% of people surveyed in the enlargement region believe that corruption has increased in their country over the past 2 years. Perceptions of increase in corruption levels are particularly high in Bosnia and Herzegovina and Albania with 65% and 66% respectively of people surveyed. Political parties, the judiciary and medical sectors are perceived as the most corrupt institutions across the region. See, EU ENLARGEMENT FACTSHEET, at: https://ec.europa.eu/neighbourhood-enlargement/.

[65] It affects their trust in the legal system and public administration; it deprives them from the health services they are entitled to get when bribing doctors is a common way to be helped faster it affects the quality of education and professional standards if a diploma can be bought instead of honestly obtained.

[66] It fosters a system where not the public interest, but the interests of individuals or groups are better served. Gaps in legislation allow corruption to spread it causes, distortions in elections, and it undermines democratic values which are indispensible for EU enlargement.

[67] It scares off foreign investors, it prevents the free market to grass root; it causes skilled people to leave the country to seek for better opportunities abroad.

[68] See, Macedonia Corruption Rank 1999-2018, at: https://tradingeconomics.com/macedonia/corruption-rank. It should be noted that every government that has been in power in Macedonia since independence has declared the fight against corruption a priority. However, according to observers, the actions of the government have been rather superficial. Although progress has been made in establishing the legal and institutional framework for fighting corruption, implementation of anti-corruption laws and independent handling of corruption cases by the relevant supervisory bodies and courts remains a major challenge. See, Transparency International, at: https://knowledgehub.transparency.org/helpdesk/former-yugoslav-republic-of-macedonia-overview-of-political-corruption.

[69] See at: http://rai-see.org/wp-content/uploads/2015/06/LAW_ON_PREVENTION_OF_CORRUPTION.pdf.

[70] See at: http://unpan1.un.org/intradoc/groups/public/documents/untc/unpan016120.pdf.

[71] Facilitation are prohibited, and gifts may be considered illegal depending on their value or intent. Insufficient implementation of legislation and ineffective law enforcement impede the fight against corruption and public officials continue to act with impunity in nations rich and poor, who wish to see a more prosperous and secure global future. National anti-corruption strategies and plans are a component of realizing this desire.

[72] See, European Commission Doc. SWD(2016) 362 final, Brussels, 9.11.2016.

There is no silver bullet for fighting corruption,[73]but effective law enforcement is essential to ensure the corrupt are punished and break the cycle of impunity, or freedom from punishment or loss[74]. Moreover, reforms focussing on improving financial management and strengthening the role of auditing agencies have in many countries achieved greater impact than public sector reforms on curbing corruption[75]. Countries successful at curbing corruption have a long tradition of government openness, freedom of the press, transparency and access to information.[76] Also, strengthening citizens demand for anti-corruption and empowering them to hold government accountable is a sustainable approach that helps to build mutual trust between citizens and government[77]. Finally, without access to the international financial system, corrupt public officials throughout the world would not be able to launder and hide the proceeds of looted state assets[78].

The concept of corruption and ideas on the proper functioning of political systems are exceedingly specific socially and culturally. Therefore, the existing anti-corruption consensus is problematic. It is necessary to learn more about the ambiguities of the term in its local translations. The anti-corruption campaign has to understand much more precisely which types of corruption emerge in different contexts and, even more basically, what corruption actually means in a given context. It appears to be crucial that activities aimed at overcoming corruption consider the extreme cultural variations in the concept of corruption and its related implications[79].

References

- 1st Protocol to the PIF Convention of 27 September 1996
- Additional Protocol to the Criminal Law Convention, opened for signature 15 May 2003, ETS No 191
- Anti-Corruption Network for Eastern Europe and Central Asia, 'Specialized Anti-Corruption Institutions: Review of Models
- Civil Law Convention on Corruption, opened for signature 4 November 1999, ETS No 174 (entered into force 1 November 2003)
- Committee of Ministers, Council of Europe, Recommendation No R 2000(10) of the Committee of Ministers to Member States on Codes of Conduct for Public Officials (11 May 2000)
- Committee of Ministers, Council of Europe, Resolution (97)24 on the Twenty Guiding Principles for the Fight against Corruption (6 November 1997)
- Committee of Ministers, Council of Europe, Resolution 99(5) Establishing the Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) (1 May 1999)
- Convention on Combating Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in International Business Transactions, opened for signature 17 December 1997, [1999] ATS 21
- Convention on Fighting Corruption involving Officials of the EU or Officials of the Member States, 1997
- Council Act of 26 May 1997, Official Journal C 195 of 25 June 1997
- Council Framework Decision 2003/568/JHA
- Council of Europe, Criminal Law Convention on Corruption: Explanatory Report, [21]–[22]
- Criminal Law Convention on Corruption, Strasbourg, 27.I.1999, European Treaty Series - No. 173
- Directive 2004/18 on the coordination of procedures for award of public work contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts
- EACN, Council Decision 2008/852/JHA
- EU ENLARGEMENT FACTSHEET, https://ec.europa.eu/neighbourhood-enlargement/
- EU Enlargement Fasheet: at: https://ec.europa.eu/neighbourhood-enlargement/
- European Commission Anti-Corruption Report, https://ec.europa.eu/home-affairs/what-we-do/policies/organized-crime-and-human-trafficking/corruption/anti-corruption-report_en [73] Many countries have made significant progress in curbing corruption, however practitioners are always on the lookout for solutions and evidence of impact.

[74] Successful enforcement approaches are supported by a strong legal framework, law enforcement branches and an independent and effective court system. Civil society can support the process with initiatives such as Transparency International's Unmask the Corrupt campaign. See, Unmask the Corrupt, at: https://unmaskthecorrupt.org/

[75] One such reform is the disclosure of budget information, which prevents waste and misappropriation of resources.

[76] Access to information increases the responsiveness of government bodies, while simultaneously having a positive effect on the levels of public participation in a country.

[77] For example, community monitoring initiatives have in some cases contributed to the detection of corruption, reduced leakages of funds, and improved the quantity and quality of public services.

[78] The European Union recently approved the 4th Anti-Money Laundering Directive, which requires EU member-states to create registers of the beneficial owners of companies established within their borders. See, Transparency International, How to stop Corruption: 5 Key Ingredients, at: https://www.transparency.org/news/feature/how_to_stop_corruption_5_key_ingredients.

[79] See, GIGA Research Programme: Power, Norms and Governance in International Relations, f work in progress prior to publicaton to encourage the exchange of ideas and academic debate. Inclusion of a paper in the Working Papers series does not constitute publication and should not limit publication in any other venue. Copyright remains with the authors.
GIGA Research Programme: Power, Norms and Governance in International Relations, Contextualizing Conceptions of Corruption: Challenges for the International Anti-corruption Campaign, at: http://repec.giga-hamburg.de/pdf/giga_09_wp115_gephart.pdf.

- European Commission Doc. SWD(2016) 362 final, Brussels, 9.11.2016
- European Commission, 'Commission Fights Corruption: A Stronger Commitment for Greater Results' (Press Release, IP/11/678, 6 June 2011)
- European Commission, 'Commission Steps Up Efforts to Forge a Comprehensive Anti-Corruption Policy at EU Level' (Press Release, MEMO 11/376, 6 June 2011)
- European Commission, 'Frequently Asked Questions: How Corruption is Tackled at the EU Level' (Press Release, MEMO 12/105, 15 February 2012)
- European Commission, Doc. COM(2014) 38, Brussels, 3.2.2014
- GIGA Research Programme: Power, Norms and Governance in International Relations, Contextualizing Conceptions of Corruption: Challenges for the International Anti-corruption Campaign, http://repec.giga-hamburg.de/pdf/giga_09_wp115_gephart.pdf
- Good Governance: Rule of Law, Transparency, and Accountability by Michael Johnston Department of Political Science, Colgate University, http://unpan1.un.org/intradoc/groups/ public/documents/un/ unpan010193.pdf
- Good Governance: Rule of Law, Transparency, and Accountability by Michael Johnston Department of Political Science, Colgate University, http://unpan1.un.org/intradoc/groups/public/documents/un/unpan 010193.pdf
- HRBA Portal: http://hrbaportal.org/faq/what-is-the-relationship-between-human-rights-and-good-governance
- International Anti-Corruption Day 9 December:http://www.un.org/en/events/anticorruptionday
- Macedonia Corruption Rank 1999-2018, https://tradingeconomics.com/macedonia/corruption-rank
- N Doc. CAC/COSP/IRG/2012/CRP.8 (22 June 2012)
- OECD Anti-Corruption Convention Leaves Critical Question Still Open, https://www.transparency.org /news /pressrelease/ oecd_anti_corruption_convention_leaves_critical_questions_still_open
- OECD Guidelines for Multinational Enterprises – Section VII
- Protocol of 19 June 1997 to the PIF Convention
- R (Corner House Research) v Director of the Serious Fraud Office [2009] 1 AC 756 ('BAE Case')
- Recommendation of the Council for Development Co-operation Actors on Managing the Risk of Corruption 16 November 2016
- Recommendation of the Council for Further Combating Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in International Business Transactions Adopted by the Council on 26 November 2009
- Recommendation of the Council on Bribery and Officially Supported Export Credits Adopted by the Council on 14 December 2006
- Recommendation of the Council on Tax Measures for Further Combating Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in International Business Transactions, Adopted by the Council on 25 May 2009
- Recommendation Rec(2003)4); Council of Ministers Recommendation Rec(2003)4; and Council of Ministers Recommendation No R (2000) 10
- Relationship between good governance and Human rights MasoomehMostafavi Azad University, 2012, at: file:///C:/Users/e.andreevska.SEEU/Downloads/SSRN-id2136129.pdf
- Relationship between good governance and Human rights MasoomehMostafavi Azad University, 2012,file:///C:/Users/e.andreevska.SEEU/Downloads/SSRN-id2136129.pdf
- Report from the Commission to the Council on the modalities of European Union participation in the Council of Europe Group of States against Corruption (GRECO), COM/2011/0307
- SELDI.net: http://seldi.net/history/summary/anti-corruptiongood-governance
- The Global corruption Barometer (20070): https://www.transparency.org/research/gcb/gcb_2007
- The rationale for fighting corruption at: https://www.oecd.org/cleangovbiz/49693613.pdf
- The Stockholm Programme — an open and Secure Europe Serving and Protecting Citizens (2010/C 115/01)
- The Treaty on the Functioning the EU
- Transparency International, How to stop Corruption: 5 Key Ingredients, https://www.transparency.org/news/feature/how_to_stop_corruption_5_key_ingredients
- Transparency International, https://knowledgehub.transparency.org/helpdesk/former-yugoslav-republic-of-macedonia-overview-of-political-corruption
- Transparency International: https://www.transparency.org/glossary/term/corruption
- UN Commission on Human Rights, resolution No. 2000/64
- UN Doc CAC/COSP/2009/15 (1 December 2009) 3.
- UN Doc CAC/COSP/IRG/1/1/1 Add. 3 (9 January 2012)
- UN Doc CAC/COSP/IRG/1/1/1 Add. 6 (23 March 2012)
- UN Doc CAC/COSP/IRG/1/1/1 Add.5 (31 January 2012)
- UN Doc CAC/COSP/IRG/1/1/1/Add..4 (16 January 2012)
- UN Doc CAC/COSP/IRG/2012/CRP. 4 (18 Lune 2012)
- UN General Assembly Resolution UNGA, on 31 October 2016
- UN Millennium Development Goals (MDG): http://www.un.org/millenniumgoals
- UN Millennium Development Goals (MDG): http://www.un.org/millenniumgoals/.
- UNCAC Preamble para 2: 'Concerned also about the links between corruption and other forms of crime, in particular organized crime and economic crime, including money-laundering'

- United Nations Campaign: http://www.anticorruptionday.org/actagainstcorruption/en/about-the-campaign/index.html
- United States v Siemens Aktiengesellschaft (Plea Agreement) (DC, No 1:08-CR-00367-RJL, 6 January 2009) ('Siemens Plea Agreement')
- Unmask the Corrupt, https://unmaskthecorrupt.org
- Warsaw Summit Communique, Issued by the Heads of State and Government participating in the meeting of the North Atlantic Council in Warsaw 8-9 July 2016, https://www.nato.int/cps/en /natohq/ official_texts_133169.htm
- Warsaw Summit Communique, Issued by the Heads of State and Government participating in the meeting of the North Atlantic Council in Warsaw 8-9 July 2016, https://www.nato.int/cps/en/natohq/ official_texts_133169.htm
- http://rai-see.org/wp content/uploads/2015/06/LAW_ON_PREVENTION_OF_CORRUPTION.pdf.
- http://unpan1.un.org/intradoc/groups/public/documents/untc/unpan016120.pdf
- https://www.oecd.org/cleangovbiz/about/
- https://www.oecd.org/cleangovbiz/internationalconventions.htm/global

A SHORT PRESENTATION OF THE PRELIMINARY CHAMBER AS THE PHASE IN THE CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS

Denisa BARBU[*]

Abstract

The current Code of Criminal Procedure brings important changes to some of the institutions of the old code of criminal procedure, but it also establishes a number of new institutions that did not exist in our criminal law. Based on these considerations, we have appreciated that at this time, in view of the consolidation of the legislation in the field, it is useful to design a work that examines the competence of the preliminary chamber judge. The paper follows the new configuration of the institutions, especially the one concerning the preliminary chamber judge. The criminal trial knows the preliminary chamber phase, usually, located after the criminal investigation phase and before the trial phase.

The Preliminary Chamber judge is not a training judge as provided for in the Romanian inter-war criminal law or in the French criminal proceedings, and has no competence in collecting evidence, discovering the offender or its participants, or analysing the merits of the accusation or in bringing the defendants to justice. Even if the Preliminary Chamber judge does not verify the merits of the evidence or the trial, its role is as important as the role of the court, since its rulings on the lawfulness of the prosecution can have a significant reflex on the settlement criminal proceedings, given that the basis of any criminal proceedings is the probation.

Keywords: jurisdiction, Preliminary chamber, Criminal investigation, competence, comparative analysis.

1. Introduction

The criminal proceedings are not confused with the judicial activity in criminal matters, as the parties, the lawyer, the trial subjects (the suspect and the injured person), as well as other procedural subjects (finding bodies, witnesses, experts, etc.) [1] participate with the criminal justice bodies. The Preliminary Chamber seeks to resolve issues relating to the jurisdiction and lawfulness of the court's referral, as well as the lawfulness of taking the evidence and the execution of acts by the criminal investigation bodies, ensuring that the case is resolved in a speedy manner[2].

2. Content

From this definition it follows that the Preliminary Chamber judge has the following powers: it checks the lawfulness of the referral ordered by the prosecutor, verifies the lawfulness of the administration of the evidence and the execution of the procedural acts by the criminal prosecution bodies, solves the complaints against the non-court solutions (classification)[3] or non-pursuing[4]; resolves other express requests provided by law[5].

The Preliminary Chamber judge may also order the measure of provisional prescription for medical treatment[6], precautionary measures[7], and other intrinsic attributions to the conduct of criminal proceedings[8].

The analysis of the lawfulness of the concluding sentences of the computer search, we consider that it falls within the competence of the preliminary chamber judge[9].

Beyond the substantive changes, the preliminary camera procedure is placed historically in the succession of the institution of the indictment chamber provided by art. 279 C.C.P. 1936, which had the power to order the referral of the defendant to the Court of Jurists, when there is evidence and solid evidence against the defendant[10].

At the moment, the Preliminary Chamber procedure has a different philosophy than the institution of the preparatory meeting provided in Art. 269-279 C.C.P. which was in force between 1953-1957 and abrogated by the Decree no. 473 of 20th September 1957, in which an analysis was made of both the merits of the referral and of the lawfulness of the criminal investigation or its completeness. This procedure was non-public, but the prosecutor and, exceptionally, the

[*] PhD, Valahia University, Târgoviște, Romania (e-mail: denisa.barbu77@yahoo.com)

[1] Denisa Barbu, Drept procesual penal. Partea generală, Ed. Lumen, Iași, 2016, p.13.

[2] M. Udroiu, s.a., Codul de procedură penală. Comentariu pe articole, Ed. C.H.Beck, București, 2015, p.196.

[3] Art. 318 C.C.P. was declared non-constitutional by Decision CCR no.23 din 20.01.2016 (O.M. No. 240 of 31 .01.2016).

[4] See art. 340-341 C.C.P.

[5] Maintaining the preventive measures, M. Udroiu, s.a., op. cit., p.197.

[6] Art. 245 para 1 C.C.P.

[7] Art. 249 C.C.P.

[8] See the atribution of the judge of rights and freedoms, N. Volonciu, s.a., Noul Cod de procedura penala comentat, Hamangiu, Bucuresti, 2014, p. 131.

[9] M. Udroiu ș.a., op. cit., p. 490.

[10] M. Udroiu, Sinteze și grile, Procedura penală. Partea specială, C.H.Beck, București, 2016, p.147.

accused could participate if the court deems it necessary. As a result, the prosecution of the accused falls within the jurisdiction of the judge who participates in the proceedings of the preparatory hearing and, at the preparatory hearing, the court could order the return of the case for completion or restoration of the criminal prosecution, if the provisions of procedural steps were not complete which guarantee the establishment of the truth or the classification of the case and the termination of the criminal proceedings, if it was aware of the existence of one of the reasons for preventing the commencement or prosecution of the case. [11]

The comparative law analysis reveals that although the source of inspiration for the Chamber of the Preliminary Chamber is found in the German[12] and Italian Penal Procedure Code, the national procedure of the preliminary chamber resulting from the modification of the NCPP through LPANCPP shows little similarities with the institution of the Preliminary Chamber provided by art. 199-204 of the Code of German Penal Procedure, respectively with the institution of the preliminary hearing (udienza preliminare) provided by art. 418-425 of the Italian Code of Criminal Procedure.

In the German criminal proceedings, the proceedings before the judge, after the indictment is made and before the commencement of the trial is non-public but contradictory with the prosecutor's participation and the defendant's summoning; this preliminary procedure leads either to a solution to commence a trial or a solution to close the case; (if there are sufficient grounds to believe that the person who has been convicted has committed an offense of which he is accused) has no right to verify the lawfulness of the criminal proceedings or evidence administered during the criminal prosecution, may administer evidence, can hear the defendant.

In the Italian criminal procedural law the preliminary hearing procedure before the judge is non-public, but contradictory with the prosecutor's participation and the summoning of the defendant and injured person; the preliminary hearing shall not be limited to verifying the legality of criminal acts or evidence administered during the criminal prosecution, the judge may also check whether the accusation is well founded, administer evidence, hear the defendant or analyse the complete character of the prosecution and order completion of the criminal prosecution.

The procedure of the preliminary chamber is a new phase of the criminal trial[13] (and not a stage of the trial phase) in which the preliminary chamber judge carries out a precisely determined objective, namely analyses the lawfulness of the administration of evidence, the referral of the court by indictment and the acts performed by to the criminal prosecution bodies, thus preparing the next stage of the criminal trial for the purpose of achieving the purpose of the criminal trial; the beginning of the judgment phase is the consequence of the judge's preliminary ruling; in the same regard, the Constitutional Court stated in Decision no. 641/2014 the following: "Thus, in the light of the procedural attributions entrusted to the Preliminary Chamber Judge, in the context of the separation of judicial functions according to the abovementioned Law, the Court concludes that it has the function of verifying the legality of the referral or non-adjudication, and in the legislator's view, this new procedural institution does not belong to either criminal prosecution or judgment, being equivalent to a new phase of the criminal process.

The procedure of the preliminary chamber was entrusted, according to art. 54 NCCP, to a judge - the preliminary chamber judge - which activity is circumscribed to the same material, personal and territorial jurisdiction of the court of which he is a party, conferring on this new procedural procedure a jurisdictional character. However, according to the jurisprudence of the Court of Justice, the Court notes that „this action does not concern the merits of the case, and the procedural act exercised by him not quoting or postponing, in a positive or negative sense, the essential elements of the conflict report: deed, person and guilt."

Within the time limit set by the Preliminary Chamber Judge, the defendant / injured party / civil party / civil responsible party can file requests and exceptions to invoke the lack of competence of the prosecution bodies, the unlawfulness of the referral / notice (for example, the failure to state the deed in the indictment), the unlawful administration of the evidence of the evidence (the unlawful conduct and computer search in the absence of the defendant, with witnesses without the defendant's acknowledgment of the date of the hearing, etc.), the illegality of the investigation, the making of procedural / procedural acts by criminal prosecution bodies (for example, the unlawful prosecution of a criminal offense for an act for which criminal prosecution has not been initiated or extended); thus, the incidence of absolute or relative nullity, ie the exclusion of unlawfully or unfairly administered evidence, can be invoked[14].

[11] M. Udroiu, op. cit., p.147.

[12] The Commission for the elaboration of the new code set up within the Ministry of Justice has been advised by German experts and professors within IRZ (The German Foundation for International Legal Cooperation).

[13] It is well established in the doctrine that the procedural stage comprises a set of processing and procedural acts and measures, carried out in the order and in the forms prescribed by law, by the judicial authorities and the parties to the trial, fulfilling a limited objective in achieving the purpose of the criminal proceeding. The objective of a procedural phase is the preparation of the next procedural phase, until the final phase of the criminal process is reached". (Gr. Theodoru, Tratat de procedură penală, ed. 2, Hamangiu, București, 2012, p.544). For the purposes of the procedural stage of the preliminary chamber procedure is also the Decision no. 18/2014 of the Board of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, whereby the Supreme Court of Appeals was notified in the interest of the law (file no. 6/2014), stating the following: „In such a procedural circumstance, the suspension of the commencement of the trial, the appeal of the contestation results in the prolongation of the procedural stage of the preliminary chamber until the time of the settlement of the contestation stipulated in art. 347 of the NCCP and of the final remaining of the conviction on the appeal. Given that the case is in the preliminary stage of the preliminary hearing until the appeal is settled, the procedural provisions applicable in the matter of preventive measures up to the moment of resolving this appeal are the provisions of art. 348 of the same Code on Preventive Measures in the Preliminary Chamber Procedure, the provisions of Art. 207 on the verification of preventive measures in the preliminary procedure and the provisions of Art. 205 concerning the appeal against the decision ordering preventive measures in the preliminary-chamber procedure".

In the motivation of the Constitutional Court Decision no. 641/2014 resulted that the defendant or his lawyer may request the preliminary chamber judge to administer evidence[15] in order to prove the unlawfulness of the criminal prosecution or the evidence administered; by amending the provisions of art. 345 par. (1) NCCP by Law no. 75/2016 stated that within the set timeframe the preliminary chamber judge shall settle the applications and exceptions made or the exceptions raised ex officio on the basis of the works and the material in the criminal investigation file and any new documents submitted. Taking into account the considerations of the Constitutional Court Decision no. 641/2014, that limitation on the principle of the freedom of evidence in relation to the subject-matter of the preliminary-ruling chamber appears to be unconstitutional; thus, by Law no. 75/2016 is attested, in other words, that the evidence of the provocation or pressure of the prosecuting authorities on witnesses / suspects or indicters to obtain statements in the desired sense of the accuser can be proved only by new documents[16].

Mainly, the Preliminary Chamber Judge can invoke ex officio the absolute nullity cases provided by art. 281 par. (1), e) and f) NCCP; there may be situations in which the Preliminary Chamber judge also invokes the absolute nullity provided in Art. 281 par. (1), a), b) or d) of the NCPP [for example, when the absolute nullity of the conclusion of the judge of rights and freedoms, whereby the issuance of the technical supervision mandate was ordered when the conclusion was issued by an incompatible judge, from a material or personal incompetent court (inferior to the appropriate one) in a procedure conducted without the prosecutor's participation].

The Preliminary Chamber judge cannot invoke ex officio the cases of relative nullity, which, according to Art. 282 para. (2) NCCPs may be invoked only in the course of criminal proceedings by the suspect, defendant, prosecutor, other parties or injured party.

The provisions of art. 344 para. (4) NCCP as amended by Law no. 75/2016 no longer refer to the need to communicate to the prosecutor the applications and exceptions made by the parties or the injured person or the communication between those participants of the requests and exceptions made; in the case of complex cases in which requests or exceptions are filed even at the time set for the controversial debate, the prosecutor, parties or procedural subjects may, however, request a time limit to specify their procedural position in relation to the claims and exceptions invoked[17].

The contradictory nature of the preliminary-stage phase is not primary, but a consequence of declaring unconstitutional procedural provisions governing the written and non-contradictory nature of the preliminary proceedings chamber.

The phase of the criminal proceedings in the preliminary-ruling procedure results, first, from the explicit regulation of this phase in a distinct title from that of the decision in the special part of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Even if the Preliminary Chamber judge does not verify the merits of the evidence or the trial, its role is as important as the role of the court, since its rulings on the lawfulness of the prosecution can have a significant reflex on the settlement of the criminal proceedings, given that the basis of any criminal proceedings is the probation.

It should be noted that, in addition to proceedings in the preliminary chamber stage, the Criminal Procedure Code confers on the judge of preliminary chamber proceedings and derived competences[18] in the matter of special confiscation, total or partial dissolution of a document after the prosecutor has ordered a non-adjudication confirmation / refusal to reopen the criminal prosecution or to settle the complaint against the classification solutions, respectively to verify the legality and the validity of the decision to renounce the prosecution. For these derived competences, the legislator established its own procedural rules, the provisions of art. 342-347 C.C.P. not establishing the common law on them.

It must be pointed out that the Preliminary Chamber Judge has the same material, personal and territorial jurisdiction as that of the court of which it is a member, its functional competence being different.

The analysis carried out by the preliminary chamber judge has the effect, either of returning the case to the criminal prosecution phase by ordering the return of the case to the prosecutor's office with or without the resumption of the criminal prosecution or the passage of the case into the trial stage by the order of commencement of the trial.

It should be noted that the criminal proceedings do not go through the preliminary chamber phase if the court's request was made with an agreement on the recognition of guilt or if the judge of the preliminary [14] Conform art. 342 C.C.P. and the following.

[15] Regarding the Constitutional Court Decision no. 641/2014 states that „the impossibility of a preliminary chamber judge to administer new evidence or to request the filing of certain documents (...) puts him in a position not to be able to clarify the factual situation, a matter which can be implicitly affected on the legal analysis" (s.n., M.U.).

[16] M. Udroiu, op. cit. p.165.

[17] Ibidem.

[18] M. Udroiu, op. cit., Sinteze…, p.149.

chamber ordered the commencement of the trial following the admission of the complaint against the order by which the prosecutor ordered the closing towards the defendant.

3. Conclusions

The provisions of art. 425 paragraph 7 point 2, b of C.C.P. are criticized in the formulation, as it limits the hypothesis of the abrogation of the judgment and the referral back only if it is found that there is a breach of the preliminary ruling procedure. We consider that the preliminary chamber judge invested with the trial of the contestation will not be able to overcome and will not be able to ignore other cases of illegality invoked and found, having the obligation to declare the nullity of the contested conviction in the cases provided by art. 281 C.C.P. and, as a consequence, to declare the admission of the appeal, the annulment of the contested judgment and the referral of the case to the Preliminary Chamber Judge, for the retrial.

We appreciate that by regulating the double degree of jurisdiction in this matter, the Romanian legislature provided a superior standard to that stipulated by art. 2 of the Additional Protocol no. 7 to the European Convention and, therefore, the procedural parties and subjects must be effectively granted the right to two degrees of jurisdiction. However, the above-mentioned deficiencies lead, in the absence of a referral case, to resolving requests and exceptions regarding the legality and loyalty of the first and last criminal investigation by the judicial control court, whose hierarchical control function is devoid of substance in the absence of an effective judgment at first instance.

References

- Barbu Denisa , Drept procesual penal. Partea generală, Ed. Lumen, Iaşi, 2016
- Udroiu M., s.a., Codul de procedură penală. Comentariu pe articole, Ed. C.H.Beck, Bucureşti, 2015
- Volonciu N., s.a., Noul Cod de procedura penala comentat, Hamangiu, Bucuresti, 2014
- Udroiu M., Sinteze şi grile, Procedura penală. Partea specială, C.H.Beck, Bucureşti, 2016

THE PRINCIPLES OF THE NATIONAL SYSTEM OF PROBATION

Andrei-Dorin BĂNCILĂ*

Abstract

The principles of the national system of probation represent a series of rules with a wide applicability, which guide the overall functioning of the system and its components. Knowing these principles is particularly important for a more in-depth understanding of the national system of probation, because they are also meant to guide the process of interpretation and application of the rules with a narrower applicability and to constitute a basis for the functioning of the system in situations where there isn't a special provision.

The principles based on which is organized and functions the national system of probation are laid down in the Law no. 252/2013, and a part represents a transposition into our national law of the International Recommendations, among which those raised through the Recommendation CM/Rec(2010)1 of the Committee of Ministers to Member States with regard to the Council of Europe's Rules of Probation.

In our vision, the national system of probation is guided by the following principles: the principle of legality, the principle of observing judgments, the principle of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms (with the three concrete components regarding respect for human dignity, respect for private and family life and non-discrimination), the principle of confidentiality and protection of personal data, the principle of case management, the principle of individualization of penalties, the principle of co-interest of the supervised person, the principle of multidisciplinary, the principle of observing the right to information and the principle of professionalism and integrity in the activity of the probation.

Keywords: national system of probation, principles, International recommendations with regard to probation, legality and jurisdiction, respect for human rights, respect for dignity, non-discrimination in probation, privacy, multidisciplinary, case management, individualization, co-interest, the right to information, professionalism and integrity in probation.

Introductory remarks

The principles of the national system of probation are a series of rules with a wide applicability, which guides the organization and overall functioning of the system and its components, rules which are also meant to guide the process of interpretation and application of the rules with a narrower applicability and to constitute a basis for the functioning of the system in situations where there isn't a special provision.

The principles after which is organized and operates the national system of probation are laid down in the Law no. 252/2013, which comprises a special chapter dedicated to these general rules[1]. The name of the chapter which we refer to might induce the idea that the principles it comprises only refers to the activity of the national system of probation, meaning on its functioning, but, in reality, they govern both the functioning, as well as the organization of the national system of probation, these two sides being, under this aspect, impossible to dissociate.

A series of the principles of the national system of probation represents a transposition into national law of the International recommendations, amongst which those raised through the Recommendation CM/Rec(2010)1 of the Committee of Ministers to Member States with regard to the Council of Europe's Rules of Probation.

1. Principle of legality

The principle in question is regulated by the article 6 of the Law no. 252/2013, according to which the activity of the probation system is carried out observing the Law and the judicial decisions.

As can be seen, in the same provision are indicated two principles: principle of legality and principle of observing judgments. Their conjunctive mention is normal, if the close connection between them is taken into account, a relationship of interdependence, being unable to imagine observing judgments, which are meant to interpret and apply the law, outside the principle of legality.

As in the case of the other systems which contribute to delivering of justice, the judicial system and the penitentiary system, for example, the national system of probation is crossed by the principle of legality, according to which the organization and functioning of all its elements must be carried out only in strict observance of the laws.

As a matter of fact, in agreement with some of the well-known professors in criminal execution law[2], we notice that the principle of legality crosses, as is natural, the entire discipline of execution of penalties and non-custodial measures, and so of those which make up the content of the probation.

* Assistant Professor, PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: andreibancilasng@gmail.com).

[1] See Chapter II of the Law no. 253/2013, with the marginal name The principles of the probation system' activity.

[2] I. Chiș, A.B. Chiș, The execution of the criminal sanctions, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucharest 2015, p. 195.

Although the provision from Article 6 of Law no. 252/2013 expressly mentions only the activity of the national system of probation, and sets it within the limits of legality, is self-evident that the principle of legality crosses not only the functioning, but also the organization of the national system of probation. We come to this conclusion from the title of the Law no. 252/2013 itself, which outlines the subject matter of the regulation as being not only the functioning, but also the organization of the national system of probation, and also an entire section of the Law[3], which comprises provisions relating strictly to the organization of the national system of probation.

The principle of legality in the organization and functioning of the national system of probation is a transposition of the principle of legality regulated through the provisions of Article 1(5) of the Constitution of Romania, according to which in Romania, the observance of the Constitution, of its supremacy and of the laws is mandatory.

The concept of law comprised in the name of the principle here in question must be interpreted in the widest sense and cannot be limited only to the homonyms normative acts, which emanates from the Parliament[4]. In the activity of the probation and in the organization of the probation system must be, of course, observed the normative acts of lower level than law or secondary, adopted in implementation and application of the laws. The law itself justifies this statement which, by references to some concrete components of the organization and functioning of the national system of probation, makes express references to the normative acts of lower level than the law, whose observance imposes it.

Thus, a category of secondary normative acts, important for the organization and functioning of the national system of probation, is represented by the Governmental Decisions by which are approved a series of regulations which establish, at the level of detail, the functioning of the components of the system. We recall, at this point of our exposure, the Government Decision No. 1079/2013 through which it was approved the Regulation implementing the provisions of Law no. 252/2013 regarding the organization and functioning of the probation system, a Regulation particularly important for the functioning of the national system of probation. References to compliance with the Regulation in question are frequent in the content of the Law no. 252/2013, including among them, by way of example, those of Article 34(4), which require compliance with the regulation as regards the structure and standard format of the evaluation report of the juvenile offender, and those of Article 115(7), requiring compliance with the Regulation as regards the conditions under which and the reasons for which National Probation Directorate may ask the judge delegated for execution of penalties to withdraw the empowerment of the community institutions.

Law no. 252/2013 requires that even in the organization and functioning of the national system of probation some of the normative acts placed, in the hierarchy, below Government Decisions, namely Ministerial Orders, to be observed. Thus, from the provisions of Article 120(3) of the law it results that the organization and functioning at the level of detail of the probation system, conditions and the procedure for the organization of competitions for employment leading positions in the National Probation Directorate, the activity of the Consultative Council attached to the National Probation Directorate, the conditions and the procedure for the organization of competitions to fill the positions of head of service and head office within the services and the probation offices are established by Orders of the Minister of Justice.

Obligation to comply with Government Decisions and Ministerial Orders in the organization and functioning of the national system of probation does not dilutes, does not empty the content the legality principle, because the source of the obligation in question is found in the law itself. In other words, compliance with the provisions comprised in Government Decisions and Ministerial Orders to which the law itself refers, only means respect for the law itself.

The principle of legality represents also a guarantee of quality in the organization and functioning of the national system of probation, through the imperative of observing the legal provisions, creating the necessary conditions for imposing particularly high standards.

These standards are not jeopardized by certain aspects of the organization and functioning of the national system of probation regulated by normative acts of lower level than the law, since these provisions contained in those normative acts cannot transgress legal norms.

With regard to this latter aspect we consider useful to invoke a situation in which it can be discussed of a transgression of the law by means of rules included in an act of a lower level than the law, a situation which is eloquent also in terms of practical functional aptitude, the operationalization of the principles of the national system of probation.

The situation we have is as follows: the Court renders a decision and postpones the application of the penalty or the suspension of the execution of penalty under supervision, imposing to the supervised person unpaid community work for the benefit of the community, and without complying with the provisions of Article 404 par. 2 and 3 of the Criminal Procedural Code omits to indicate the entities in the community within which unpaid community work for the benefit of the community is to be carried out. This omission constitutes an obstacle to the enforcement of the judgment, which, according to the provisions of Article 598(1)(c) of the Criminal Procedural Code, is a case of opposition to the enforcement of the judgment which is given in jurisdiction of the enforcement Court[5]. However, with regard to the omission of the Court to indicate the two institutions from the Community, the probation counselor has, in accordance with Article 14^{61} par. (8) of the Regulation for implementing the Law no. 252/2013, the possibility (and the obligation) to ask the judge delegated with the enforcement of the judgment, to designate an institution from the Community in which the work is to be carried out. This procedural means of removing the impediment to enforcement in question, easier, has been introduced by the Government Decision No. 603/2016, which amended and supplemented the Regulation for implementing the Law no. 252/2013.

[3] See Title II of the Law no. 253/2013, with the marginal name - The organization of the probation system.
[4] According to article 76 par. (1) from the Romanian Constitution, the Parliament adopts constitutional laws, organic laws and ordinary laws.

Trying to draw a conclusion with regard to the case in question, we express our opinion that the transfer of the functional competences from the enforcement Court to the judge delegated with the enforcement, through a Government Decision, without denying the practical utility of this transfer, puts serious problems of legality in the activity of the national system of probation.

As we were saying, without having doubts regarding the usefulness of a procedure more flexible in cases such as those in question, we only suggest for future enactment of laws, in order to comply with the principle of legality, such procedures, involving a transfer of competences from the enforcement Court to the judge delegated with the enforcement, to be regulated by law, as planned, as a matter of fact, in a situation of the same category, consisting in the impossibility to work for the benefit of the Community in the two entities from the Community indicated in the judgment[6].

2. The principle of observing judgements

Taking into consideration that the most significant part of the probation activity is carried out after the judgement is rendered in the criminal trial, observing judgements is raised at the level of principle of the national system of probation. In the view of other authors, which, however, refer to a wider scope of research, concentrated to the execution of all sanctions and non-custodial measures, this principle is called the basis of enforcement[7].

Of course, the principle of observing judgements is closely linked to that of legality, from which it arises, judicial decisions being only a materialization of the law enforcement.

The close link between the principle of legality and that of observing judgements is emphasized by the legislator also through their explicit consecration in the same article of the law, Article 6 of Law no. 252/2013.

The fact that the observing of law and judgments is put on the same level of importance in the probation activity is an approach which is perfectly justified from the legislator, starting from the idea that through judicial decisions it is been expressed the legality with reference to a specific case.

However, raising the observing of judgments at the level of a principle may lead to some difficult situations for the probation counselors in the hypotheses in which judgments become enforceable in a non-legal form.

To illustrate what we want to show at this point of our exposure, we exemplify with a judicial decision in which legal provisions have been breached in relation to the length of the supervision period in case of suspension of the execution of penalty under supervision[8].

So, in the criminal judgement in question, not appealed, the resulting penalties of 2 years and 8 months imprisonment has been suspended under supervision and a period of supervision of only 2 years has being imposed, by breaching the provisions of Article 92 (1) from the Criminal Code, according to which the duration of the suspension of the penalty under supervision constitutes period of supervision for the convicted person and it ranges between 2 and 4 years, without the possibility to be less than the duration of the penalty imposed.

Although the judge delegated with the enforcement has made opposition to the execution of the judgement, invoking the case provided for in Article 598(1)(c) of the Criminal Procedural Code, the Court rejected the opposition as groundless, with the reasoning that the establishment of a period of supervision such as the one in question, does not constitute either a doubt with regard to the judgment which is to be executed or an obstacle to the enforcement the judgement[9].

In such a case, after exhausting the procedural means the probation counselor and the judge delegated with the execution have at hand, if the illegality is not removed, the probation counselor which contributes to the enforcement in these conditions of the provisions of

[5] In this way we exemplify with the Criminal decision no. 7/2016 of the Filiași Court of First Instance, accessible on the free jurisprudence portal www.rolli.ro.

[6] According to art. 51 par. (2) of the Law no. 253/2013 on the execution of penalties, educational measures and other non-custodial measures imposed by the judicial bodies in the course of the criminal trial, if the execution of the work is no longer possible in any of the two community institutions mentioned in the judgment, the probation counselor refers the judge delegated with the execution, who will designate another institution in the community for the execution of the work the judgment is defended by the principle of observing judgments.

[7] I. Chiș, A.B. Chiș, The execution of the criminal sanctions, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucharest 2015, p. 195.

[8] Criminal decision no. 205/2016 of the Bihor Tribunal, non-appealed, unpublished.

[9] The opposition to the execution was rejected by the criminal decision no. 6/P/2017 of the Bihor Tribunal, non-appealed, accessible in the electronical database Lege5.

3. The principle of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms

The principle of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms is expressly provided in the Article 3 of Law no. 252/2013, according to which the activity of the probation system is carried out under conditions which ensure observance for human rights and fundamental freedoms, any restrain of them being possible only within the limits inherent in nature and content of the penalties and measures imposed by the judgment and under the conditions arising from the specific intervention, depending on the seriousness of the crime and the risk of committing any crimes.

This principle is found, even if differently formulated, and in the Recommendation CM/Rec(2010)1 of the Committee of Ministers[10]. Also, this principle, as it is written in the Law no. 252/2013, includes another principle from the same international legal document, according to which in the implementation of any penalties or measures, the probation offices will not impose any burden or restriction of the rights of the offender greater than that provided by the judicial or administrative decision and imposed in each individual case by the seriousness of the offense or by the correctly assessed risks of re-offending[11].

Of course, the legislator has raised the obligation to respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms at the level of principle of the activity of the probation also due to the importance it has acquired, in the recent years, the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, especially for the institutions that have competences relating to the restriction of rights and freedoms in question.

The same importance of observing of human rights and fundamental freedoms is underlined by the fact that this obligation is raised to the rank of principle also through Article 6 of Law no. 253/2013 on the enforcement of penalties, educational measures and other non-custodial measures imposed by judicial bodies in the course of the criminal trial.

The general framework of human rights and fundamental freedoms is drawn by the provisions of the European Convention on fundamental human rights and freedoms and the additional Protocols to the Convention, but also by the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights[12].

Specifically, the principle in question requires the probation counselor that, in the activity carried out in connection with the person subject to the supervision measures or voluntary obligations, to report itself always to the need for strict observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

A specific task in the exercise of which a concrete problem of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms can be raised is that of granting permissions during the performance of the obligations referred to in Article 85(2)(e) and (f) or Article 101(2)(d) and (e) from the Criminal Code.

The task in question is governed by the provisions of Article 45 of Law no. 253/2013, text which provides, at the same time, also the cases in which the probation counselor may grant permissions such of those in question.

One of the cases which justifies granting of permissions during the performance of the obligations referred to in Article 85(2)(e) and (f), respectively in Article 101(2)(d) and (e) from the Criminal Code, is the one consisting in following a treatment or a medical intervention, which seeks to respect the most important of the fundamental rights, namely the right to life, as guaranteed by Article 2 of the same Convention.

This example of a mechanism to guarantee the observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms in the activity of the probation requires, of course, knowing the definitions and content of the rights in question, their nature, absolute or relative, the situations in which interferences of the authorities within the exercising these fundamental rights are justified[13].

As we will see in the following, given that some of the fundamental human rights are considered more important in the economy of the organization and functioning of the national system of probation, the legislator provides for special regulations with regard to them, right in the section dedicated to the principles of the activity of probation. Although they are structured in different articles, we are of the opinion that the rules in question are part of the regulations relating to the principle of the respect of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

From the point of view of legislative systematization this way of proceeding it is not the happiest, but approaching the obligations concerning compliance with some of the fundamental human rights in particular may be accepted in the light of the importance of the rights in question in the probation activity. We consider at this point of our exposure the right to dignity, the right to private and family life and the right not to be subject to any form of discrimination.

[10] According to the first thesis of the second basic principle set out in Recommendation CM / Rec (2010) 1 of the Committee of Ministers, the probation agencies will respect the human rights of offenders.

[11] See point no. 5 of the Recommendation CM / Rec (2010) 1 of the Committee of Ministers.

[12] The European Convention for the protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms was ratified by the Romanian Parliament by Law no. 30/1994, which expressly recognized the mandatory jurisdiction of the European Court of Human Rights.

[13] Without proposing to detail here these notions, we make our duty to point out a valuable source for the persons involved in the probation activity facing issues of human rights and fundamental freedoms: https://jurisprudentacedo.com, which provides free access to a significant number of European Court of Human Rights judgments, structured also according to the articles of the Convention.

3.1. Respect for human dignity

According to Article 4 first thesis of Law no. 252/2013, the activity of the probation system is carried out under conditions that respect the dignity of the person.

Dignity is one of the intrinsic values of the human being, the importance of which is emphasized and in that it is found among those inviolable values, absolute in the arsenal of values that form the basis of the acts of the international conventions on human rights.

Thus, human dignity is absolutely protected by the recognition of the right not to be subjected to torture, inhuman punishment or degrading treatment, by the provisions of Article 2 of the European Convention for the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

As other authors have noticed[14], human dignity, as an indivisible and universal value, is placed at the foundation of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union[15], which strengthens, once more, the significance of this value in the heritage of common values of modern civilization.

Also, human dignity has to a place of honor among the supreme values of the Romanian Constitution[16].

In the matter of probation, dignity as a value associated to each person, gets also important operational valences, in that the observance by the probation counselor of the dignity of the supervised person is a condition sine qua non, a prerequisite for a successful social reintegration process.

Dignity requires respect, and respect shown by others is one of the most important sources from which the individual draws his own social profile.

In the probation activity to respect human dignity of the supervised person means treating it with respect, listening it carefully, empathizing up to a point with it, removing the inappropriate arguments in a neutral, elegant and convincingly logical way, highlighting the strong points and illustrating the harmfulness of the undesirable skills, not abusing its position of authority. In this way, the person subject to probation gets confidence in the probation counselor and in its own strengths, feels valued and is thus able to put greater efforts towards re-socialization.

Another aspect of respecting human dignity in probation is the valence of the reductive agent of the criminal stigma, an undesirable effect of criminal sanction[17]. This valence is translated into that, if treated with respect, the offender subjected to probation will look at himself with other eyes, but, at the same time, he will be seen otherwise by the other members of society.

Also, the person who has committed a crime and which is treated with dignity by a representative of the state authority tends to no longer feel wronged and "lets the guard down", being so, much more receptive to positive influences.

3.2. Respect for private life and family

According to Article 4 second thesis of Law no. 252/2013 the activity of the probation system is carried out under conditions that do not interfere with the exercise of the right to private life of the person more than is inherent to the nature and content of the intervention.

Like human dignity, also private and family life is one of the fundamental rights recognized as such by both international conventions in the field and by the Romanian Constitution.

Thus, according to Article 8 of the European Convention of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, any person has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home or his correspondence, no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right being allowed except when it is in accordance with the law and is a measure necessary in a democratic society for national security, public security, the country's economic well-being, the defense of order and the prevention of criminal acts, the protection of the health, morals, rights and freedoms of others.

In a more simplified form, article 7 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union stipulates that any person has the right to respect for his private and family life, home and communications secrecy.

Finally, according to Article 26 of the Romanian Constitution, public authorities respect and protect intimate, family and private life, the natural person having the right to dispose of itself, unless it violates the rights and freedoms of others, public order or good morals.

A concrete manifestation in probation of the obligation to ensure compliance with the right to private and family life is represented by one of the cases in which may be granted to the permissions during the performance of the obligations referred to in Article 85(2)(e) and (f), respectively in Article 101(2)(d) and (e) Criminal Code and which, according to Article 45(1)(a) of Law no. 253/2013, consists in the attendance of the supervised person to the marriage, baptism or funeral of a family member, from among those referred to in Article 177 Criminal Code. In other words, establishing the case in question is just a mechanism that guarantees the observance of the right to private and family life.

---

[14] I. Chiș, A.B. Chiș, The execution of the criminal sanctions, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucharest 2015, p. 196.

[15] The Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, published in the Official Journal of the European Union no. C 83/403 has replaced, since the entry into force of the Treaty of Lisbon, the old Charter proclaimed on 7 December 2000.

[16] According to art. 1 par. (3) of the Constitution of 2003, Romania is a state of law, democratic and social, in which the human's dignity, citizens' rights and freedoms, the free development of human personality, justice and political pluralism are supreme values in the spirit of the democratic traditions of the Romanian people and of the ideals of the Revolution of December 1989 and are guaranteed.

[17] S. Poledna, in the Probation Manual, coordinated by V. Schiacu și R. Canton, Editura Euro Standard, Bucharest 2008, p. 28.

3.3. Non-discrimination

According to art. 5 of the Law no. 252/2013, within the probation system, any activity is carried out without any discrimination on grounds of race, nationality, ethnicity, language, religion, gender, sexual orientation, opinion or political affiliation, wealth, social origin, age, disability, non-contagious chronic disease or HIV / AIDS infection or on other circumstances of the same kind.

The principle according to which discrimination is forbidden within the probation represents an implementation into the Romanian legislation of the basic principle No. 6 of Recommendation R(2017)3 of the Committee of Ministers to the Member States relating to the European rules on sanctions and community measures.

The interdiction of discrimination is regulated in the European Convention of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, which, by means of the provisions of Article 14 provides that the exercise of the rights and freedoms recognized by the Convention should be ensured without any discrimination based, in particular, on sex, race, color, language, religion, political opinions or any other opinions, national or social origin, membership of a national minority, wealth, birth or any other situation.

Also, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union expressly prohibits in Article 21, the discrimination of any kind, based on grounds such as sex, race, color, ethnic or social origin, genetic features, language, religion or beliefs, political opinions or of any other nature, membership of a national minority, wealth, birth, disability, age or sexual orientation, and as regards the scope of EU treaties, with the exception of special provisions, on the grounds of nationality.

In the Romanian Constitution interdiction of discrimination is dealt with in relation to the right to equality before the law and the authorities, enshrined in Article 16.

By comparing the internal provision from Article 5 of Law no. 252/2013 with the international regulations we will notice that the Romanian legislator offers a very wide range of protection against discrimination, providing most of the hypotheses in which supervised persons can find and which cannot constitute grounds for discrimination, but leaving, at the same time, open the list of such hypotheses.

In concrete terms, what is important in the activity of the probation counselor in relation with the prohibition of discrimination, is the understanding of the fact that this principle is violated when, without any reasonable and objective justification, a state applies different treatments to persons that are in similar situations or, on the contrary, does not apply a different treatment to persons who are in different sensitive situations[18].

An internal provision whose implementation could raise problems from the perspective of the discrimination on the grounds of religion, for example, is that of Article 45(1)(a) of Law no. 253/2013, which we have mentioned above and which gives the probation counselor the prerogative of granting permissions to the supervised person during the execution of certain obligations inherent in the status of the person subject to probation. According to the text in question, some cases which might justify granting the permissions are represented by the attendance of the supervised person at certain moments of religious significance in the life of family members, including baptism. How baptism is a mystery specific to Christian religion, we believe that a strict interpretation of the provisions in question could lead to an unjustified discriminatory situation between persons under supervision of Christian religion and those of other religions who do not know the mystery of baptism but know the equivalent spiritual practices. Therefore, in respect to the matter in question, we are of the opinion that the concept of "baptism" in Article 45(1)(a) of the Law no. 253/2013 should be interpreted in the widest sense, leading to the conclusion of the applicability and in the case of an equivalent spiritual practices, encountered in the context of the other religions than Christianity.

One further explanation we consider is needed at this point of our material, namely that the interdiction of discrimination does not mean applying the same treatment to any person, regardless of the situation. If many different situations associated with some persons do not give rise to differentiated treatments (e.g. the differences of race, nationality, ethnicity, language, religion, gender, sexual orientation, opinion or political affiliation, wealth, social origin, age, disability, non-contagious chronic disease or HIV/AIDS infection), there are also different situations which justify differentiated treatments. To exemplify this last statement is enough to keep in mind the differentiated situation of studies, in general, professional training, in particular, which can justify the choice of the probation counselor, on the basis of the prerogative provided for by in Article 50(1) of the Law no. 253/2013, of education or training courses or of professional qualification courses different after this criterion, without creating a situation of discrimination. Thus, we can say that discrimination is not equal to justified differentiation based on objective criteria, but only to the unjustified differentiation of such criteria.

4. The principle of confidentiality and the protection of personal data

According to Article 7 of Law no. 252/2013, the activity of the probation system is carried out observing the confidentiality and in compliance with the rules for the protection of personal data, as provided for by the applicable legal provisions.

[18] See, for example, the judgement from ECHR – Grand Chamber - Case Thlimmenos against Greece.

The two aspects of this principle, confidentiality and protection of personal data are intimately linked, but not to be confused.

By confidentiality in probation we have to understand that characteristic of the probation activity that makes it not exclusively intended for revealing. We cannot say, however, that the probation activity is a secret one, but it cannot be the subject of unhindered access of the public.

With regard to the public access to what means the activity of the probation, we can say that it is restricted from a legitimate reason, revealed also by other authors in this field[19], that of being in the interest of the reintegration of the supervised person to have a statute that is as close as possible to that of an individual who is not in conflict with the criminal law. In other words, it is desirable that in the eyes of the other members of the society, the supervised person to appear as an ordinary individual, without the stigma of the offender imprinted in a visible place, which would make him vulnerable and, thus, make difficult the process of social reintegration.

Of course, the confidentiality we are talking about doesn't mean hiding the fact that supervised person has committed a crime, but only that committing the offense is not displayed in public. Confidentiality in probation cannot be the opposite in situations that require protecting superior interests, such as the good functioning of various state bodies with responsibilities in the field of public safety.

As the activity of probation involves the cooperation of several entities, confidentiality knows and a limitation inherent to this cooperation, by virtue of which the necessary data must be the subject of an exchange between probation services, on the one hand, and the entities in the Community, in charge with the implementation of the probation, on the other hand. With regard to this the limitation of confidentiality, by Article 9 of Law no. 253/2013 it is provided a protection mechanism, according to which the natural and legal persons involved in the execution of penalties, educational measures and other non-custodial measures are obliged to observe the confidentiality and the rules for the protection of personal data, provided for by the relevant regulations.

A mechanism aimed to preserve confidentiality within the activity of probation is also that governed by the provisions of Article 53(3), final thesis of the Law no. 252/2013, which subjects to the agreement of the supervised person the request of any person to consult the content of the probation file. To highlight once more that the principle of confidentiality does not affect the activity of the state bodies with competences in the field of delivering justice and protecting public order, we highlight that the agreement of the supervised person is not necessary in order to facilitate the access to the probation file by the judge delegated with the enforcement, by the prosecutor and by the police, as it results from the provisions of Article 53(3), first thesis and paragraph (6) of the Law no. 252/2013.

Last but not least, in accordance with the provisions of Article 24 of the same law on the organization and functioning of the probation system, confidentiality cannot hinder the research activities in the field of probation, although confidentiality must also be observed and on this occasion.

With regard to the protection of personal data, it should be recalled that the National Probation Directorate and the subordinate services are personal data operators within the meaning of the Law no. 677/2001 for the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data and free movement of such data, framing them, from the point of view of the functional competences they hold, in the category described in Article 2(5) of that law, that of operators carrying out activities involving the prevention, investigation and prosecution of criminal offenses and maintaining public order, as well as other activities carried out in the field of criminal law.

Framing National Probation Directorate and the subordinate services in the category of operators who carry out activities for the prevention, investigation and prosecution of criminal offenses and maintaining public order, as well as other activities carried out in the field of criminal law, although gives wider powers of processing, among which the right to the processing of certain data without the agreement of the person monitored, it does not mean that with regard to the processing of personal data, the Direction and the subordinate services are not kept to comply with the rules concerning the processing of personal data, drawn by the provisions of Articles 4, 5 and 6 of the Law no. 677/2001, according to which the processing should be carried out in good faith, in accordance with the conditions laid down by law, for determined purposes, explicit and legitimate, in adequate manners, relevant and not excessive in relation to the purpose of the processing, with accuracy and update, with storage in appropriate and safe forms.

5. Principle of case management

According to the provisions of Article 8 of Law no. 252/2013, the probation activity shall be conducted in compliance with the principles, values and methods of case management during the process of supervision. Of course, the principle concerns also the organization of national system of probation as regards the fulfillment of the main substantial competences to coordinate the supervision of the offenders.

Although the law requires that the institutions of the Community and other authorities and public institutions to also observe the principles, values and methods of case management, the probation counselors are the main actors to whom the institution of case management addresses to.

[19] I. Chiș, A.B. Chiș, The execution of the criminal sanctions, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucharest 2015, p. 199.

The meaning of case management is legally defined by means of the provisions of Article 14 let. (b) of Law no. 252/2013, according to which the case management means the process of coordinating all assessment activities of the supervised person, planning and conducting assistance and control interventions, monitoring the way of implementing the measures and obligations imposed by the judicial bodies, including by making use of internal potential of the person and integrating the contribution of the institutions within the Community.

Specific method of working in social assistance, by means of which it is intended to adapt the activity of providing social services to the complexity of the problems within this field, case management has also been implemented in correctional matters as a method by which to connect the activity of dealing with offenders with the activity of rendering justice and to provide a framework of rules to support the intervention rehabilitation[20].

In fact, case management in probation is a set of rules that guide the assessment activity of the supervised person, the activity of planning and carrying out the assistance and control interventions of the supervised person, monitoring of the implementation of the measures and the obligations imposed by the judicial bodies.

In addition to the regulatory function in concrete of the activities that compose the probation supervision process, case management has also the function of empowering the probation counselor to whom the task of supervision is assigned.

Case management begins with the appointment of the case manager, that is to say the probation counselor responsible for the process of supervising a person[21].

After this initial moment, all activities that comprise the process of supervision, convocation, initial and further evaluation of the person monitored, control of the person supervised and the way in which it fulfils the obligations arising from its statute of a person subject to probation, coordination and control of the activities carried out by the institutions within the Community with the person monitored, the relationship with the judicial bodies or of public order, with other entities designed to contribute in assisting the supervised person, shall be the responsibility of the counselor case manager and represents the manifestations of the case management.

In concrete terms, case management is manifested through the fulfillment by the probation counselor case manager of the tasks that are provided to it by the pertinent normative provisions such as: convocation of the person supervised (Article 51 of Law no. 253/2013); coordination of the process of supervision (Article 52 of the same law); direct control of compliance with the supervision measures (Article 56 of the same law); determination of the concrete content of the obligations of the probation (Article 58 of the same law); notification of the court responsible for the enforcement with the revocation of the alternative benefit to the execution of custodial penalties (Article 67 of the same law).

6. The principle of individualization

Article 9(1) of Law No 252/2013 regulates, as a matter of principle, the obligation of the probation counselor to adapt the intervention according to the individual characteristics, the needs of the person, the risk of committing crimes and the particular circumstances of each case.

The principle of individualization within the probation activity is a particular transposition of the more general principle of the individualization of criminal sanctions. From the point of view of the classification after the criterion of the body which has the responsibility to individualize, individualization in the activity of the probation is a form of the administrative individualization, which intervenes in the post-trial phase, in the execution phase of the criminal trial.

Because the probation measures are being carried out in the open community, from which the offender comes from, they differ fundamentally from the closed and harmful community of penitentiaries. We can say, by comparison with the penalties involving deprivation of liberty, the probation measures are being executed individually.

Although the execution of penalties involving deprivation of liberty also tends towards a more personalized individualization[22], the execution of the probation measures has a much deeper administrative personalization potential, which can go up to customization[23]. Even this customization up at the level of individual is considered in the doctrine to be able to greatly reduce the risk of re-offending[24].

In the normative acts governing the national system of probation we find numerous practical application of the principle of individualization.

[20] F. McNeill, P. Raynor și C. Trotter, Offender Supervision – New directions in theory, research and practice, Editura Willan Publishing, New York 2010, p. 344.

[21] According to art. 50 of Law no. 252/2013, upon receipt of the copy of the court decision ordering the supervision of a person by the probation office, the head of the service shall appoint a probation counseler case manager.

[22] In this respect, Art. 89 par. (4) of the Law no. 254/2013 on the execution of penalties and imprisonment measures, provides for the obligation, to draw up, after the period of quarantine and observation, established by the provisions of Art. 44, an Individualized assessment and educational and therapeutic intervention plan.

[23] In this respect, Art. 14^{46}-14^{50} of the Regulation for the application of the provisions of Law no. 252/2013 regarding the organization and functioning of the probation service, approved by the Government Decision no. 1.079 / 2013, modified and completed by the Government Decision no. 603/2016, provides for the obligation to draw up the Supervision plan.

[24] I. Chiș, Non custiodial penalties of the XXI century, Editura Wolters Kluwer, Bucharest 2009, p. 22.

Thus, an important application of the principle of individualization consists in the competence assigned to the probation counselor by Article 53(1) and Article 57(2) of the Law no. 253/2013 to establish, in concrete terms, on the basis of the initial assessment of the person supervised, the program or programs of social reintegration that must be followed, and also, where appropriate, the institution, respectively the institutions within the Community in which will take place, in the hypothesis the obligation to follow such programs was imposed by the judicial decision.

Another manifestation of the principle of individualization in the activity of the probation is the competence assigned to the probation counselor by Article 61(1) of the Law no. 252/2013 to establish, depending on the situation and needs of the person and according to the usefulness of the activities for the Community, in which of the two institutions in the Community referred to in the judgment of the Court is to be carried out the obligation to provide unpaid work for the benefit of the community.

7. The principle of co-interest of the supervised person

The principle of co-interest of the supervised person is regulated, firstly, by means of the provisions of Article 9(2) of the Law no. 252/2013, according to which, in the course of the activity, the probation counselor aims to develop a positive relationship with the supervised person, for the purpose of involvement in its own process of rehabilitation.

Secondly, the same principle is governed by the provisions of Article 11(1) of the same law, according to which the probation counselor shall inform the person with respect to the nature and content of the main acts carried out in the course of the probation and seeks to obtain its consent with regard to the execution of the respective acts.

The postponement of the application of the penalty, the suspension of the execution of penalty under supervision and the conditional release represent manifestations of the new vision of the Romanian legislator in what concerns the individualization of criminal sanctions, a part of the mechanism introduced by the Criminal Code in force in order to enable the court to choose the most appropriate form of criminal liability for the individual who has committed a crime provided by the criminal law.

Also, these new opportunities for judicial individualization of the sanction constitute, in principle, an alternative to imprisonment, as a consequence of the restorative current which crosses modern criminal laws and detaches them from the paradigm of criminal justice purely vindictive.

In the content of these new ways of individualization of the criminal sanction, instead of applying and executing the custodial sentence imposed, the offender is required to perform a series of obligations or to observe a range of interdictions which, together, are intended to ensure, primarily, achieving the desirability of re-educating and rendering the offender to the community.

The obligations and interdictions imposed are carried out within the community from which the offender comes from, which community is thus seen to be involved in the process of re-education and re-socialization of the offender.

Taking into consideration the component of co-interest of the Community in the process of reeducation and re-socialization of the offender, these modalities for the enforcement of obligations and interdictions alternative to imprisonment, in particular, are also called sanctions or community measures, in international normative acts, such as the Recommendation R(2017)3 of the Committee of Ministers to the Member States relating to the European rules on sanctions and Community measures, abovementioned, which replaces Recommendation R(92)16 to the Committee of Ministers of the Member States relating to the European rules on penalties applied in the Community.

A characteristic of community criminal sanctions is represented precisely by the co-interest of the offender in the process of re-education and re-socialization which, without this involvement of the main subject on which community levers should act, would remain an empty and without a chance process.

In order for the community sanctions to be successful, the offender must therefore be co-opted in the process of reeducation, he must express his adherence to the process of fulfilling the obligations and prohibitions that make up the content of community sanctions, adherence without which the re-socialization cannot take place

Thus, the Recommendation R(2017)3 of the Committee of Ministers to the Member States relating to the European rules on penalties and Community measures allocates a whole chapter to the consent and cooperation of the offender, Chapter V. In Article 56 of this chapter it is established that a sanction or a Community measure will be imposed only if it is known that the suspect or the offender is willing to cooperate and to observe the obligations and the specific conditions, and in Article 59 it is stated that the agreement of the suspect must be obtained even before imposing the penalties or Community measures.

Concluding, the agreement of the offender, followed by his cooperation in the process of enforcement of sanctions and Community measures is essential to ensure the favorable conditions in which reeducation and re-socialization will be accomplished, and represents, we can say, a substantive ground for the adoption of such alternatives to imprisonment.

The importance itself of this co-interest for the success of the process of reeducation and social reintegration has made the Romanian legislator to raise it to a principle of the national probation system.

Knowing the springs that have led to the raising of the level a principle of the co-interest of the supervised person in the process of executing the probation measures is not only of theoretical importance, a good example to support this statement being the non-unitary practice of the courts in the matter of knowing if the prior consent of the defendant to work unpaid for community (in case of postponement of punishment) is mandatory or not.

This issue was submitted for analysis to the High Court of Cassation and Justice through the mechanism of resolving prior legal issues, regulated by the provisions of art. 475-477[1] Criminal Procedural Code.

As the Supreme Court dismissed as inadmissible the matter in question[25], the non-unitary practice on the issue to know whether the prior agreement of the defendant to provide unpaid work for the benefit of the community (in case of postponement of punishment) still remains, but it could, in our opinion, be stopped just on the basis of the principle of the co-interest of the supervised person, co-interest without which, as we said, execution of the probation measures in a manner which would lead to the reeducation and re-socialization, would not be possible.

In the relevant normative laws, we find concrete manifestations of the principle of co-interest of the supervised person in the process of implementation of the probation measures.

Thus, Article 55(1) of Law No 252/2013 provides that the monitoring plan shall be drawn up by the probation counselor case manager and with the involvement of the supervised person.

Also, according to the provisions of Article 14[45] of Regulation for the implementation of the Law no. 252/2013, with the occasion of informing the supervised person, carried out at the first meeting, it shall be made aware of the possibility of participating in certain activities and programs of reintegration during the period of supervision, with its agreement, explaining to it the practical arrangements in which it may be assisted in view of its social rehabilitation.

8. The principle of multidisciplinary

According to Article 10 of Law no. 252/2013, the probation counselor seeks the interdisciplinary approach of each case and coordinates the activities carried out in collaboration with the institutions from the Community in order to cover the needs of the person and maintain the safety level of the community.

The activity of the probation counselor is particularly complex and implies having knowledge and skills in various fields.

Given the fact that it has to work with tools such as the assessment interview, that it has to perform complex analyzes of the person's behavior, that he is in constant communication throughout the supervision process, the probation counselor must possess sound knowledge of psychology, sociology, but also criminology, in addition to the absolutely necessary legal background.

As a matter of fact, the different knowledge and the various and multiple perspectives of the activity of the probation staff are an essential part of working with the offenders in the Community, imperatively needed to ensure social education and reintegration, but also to maintain a climate of public safety. The multidisciplinary knowledge of the probation counselor is therefore necessary in the context of the complexity of the offender's needs and of the imperative of the risk management.

Multidisciplinary in the activity of the probation is highlighted by the fact that the specializations required alternatively to be appointed as probation counselor are multiple. Thus, according to the provisions of Article 20 of the Law no. 123/2006 on the statute of the probation staff, to be appointed as probation counselor a person must comply, inter alia, with the condition to be licensed in social assistance, psychology, sociology, pedagogy or law.

9. The principle of respecting the right to information

Compliance with the right to information of the person subject to probation was raised at the level of principle by means of the provisions of Article 11 of Law no. 252/2013, according to which the probation counselor shall inform the person, in a language or communication method that it understands, with regard to the nature and content of the main acts carried out in the course of the probation and seeks to obtain the consent with regard to the progress of the acts in question.

Informing the supervised person about the nature and content of the main acts carried out in the course of the probation is a prerequisite for co-interesting the person in its own process of reeducation and resocialization.

Concrete manifestations of the principle of informing the person subject to probation are found quite frequently in the relevant normative acts.

Thus, according to Article 52(a) of Law no. 252/2013, informing the person with regard to the process of supervision is a part of the coordination of this process by the probation counselor.

In accordance with Article 54 of the same law, during the first meeting, the probation counselor, case manager, informs the sentenced person with regard to the supervision measures and the obligations it has to execute and about the consequences of compliance or non-compliance with them, and also, if appropriate, with respect to the obligations whose performance is verified by other competent authorities than the probation service.

[25] See Decision no. 27/2015 of the High Court of Cassation of Justice – the panel responsable for solving criminal issues of law, published in the Official Monitor, First Part no. 65 from 22/01/2018.

Provisions of greater detail relating to informing the supervised person are found, for example, in the provisions referred to in Article 14^{61} par.(2) of the Regulation implementing the Law no. 252/2013, according to which the probation counselor case manager informs the supervised person during the meeting with it about the concrete possibilities for carrying out the obligation to provide an unpaid work for the benefit of the Community in the institutions of the Community, as well as those of Article 14^{62} par. (3) of the same Regulation, according to which, within the first interview, the probation counselor case manager informs the supervised person with regard to the concrete possibilities for carrying out the obligation to attend a program of social reintegration at the level of the probation service, within the office reintegration programs or, if not possible, within a community institution listed in the database set up at national level.

10. The principle of professionalism and integrity in the probation activity

Although the principle in question is regulated in two articles of the law, which might mislead the idea of the existence of two principles, the indissoluble link between professionalism and integrity makes us affirm that we are in the presence of a single principle.

In accordance with Article 12 of Law no. 252/2013, staff carrying out their activity in the framework of the probation system must have a specialized background in accordance with the responsibilities assigned to it by the law and must seek, during the activity, the achieving of a high standards of professionalism and compliance with the standards of ethics and professional deontology, and according to Article 13 of the same law, in the framework of the probation system the activity shall be conducted in compliance with the principle of integrity by carrying out the actions in a responsible, transparent, impartial and through the judicious use of available resources.

The principle of professionalism and integrity in the probation is found, in another form, in the Recommendation CM/Rec(2010)1 of the Committee of Ministers to the Member States with regard to the Council of Europe's Rules of Probation, where, in point 13 it is stated, as a matter of principle, in the sense that all activities and interventions performed by the probation offices will observe the highest ethical and professional standards, national and international.

In any field of activity, the proper training and compliance with the ethical and deontological rules of the profession represent imperative conditions of integrity.

The importance of professional training for the probation activity, in accordance with the importance it has among the activities of delivering a criminal justice is highlighted also by the concern the Council of Europe has under this aspect through the Recommendation No R (97) 12 of the Committee of Ministers to the Member States with regard to the staff responsible for the implementation of the sanctions and measures (criminal)[26], allocating a large section for training of staff, detailing long enough for a normative act of such importance, the forms of training, both initial and continuous, purposes and methods of training and even the content that must represent the subject of the training.

As a manifestation of the implementation of the International Recommendations, training of probation staff is the subject to regulation of a the whole section of the Law no. 123/2006 on the statute of the probation staff, through which are laid down the objectives of the training (adaptation to the requirements of the job; updating the knowledge and skills specific to the position; improvement of the professional training; gaining advanced knowledge of modern methods and processes, necessary for carrying out the professional activities; promoting and improving the professional career), the forms of organization of the training after the time criterion (initial and continuing training) and after the criterion of organizing the activities (seminars organized by the Ministry of Justice or other professional training courses in the field, professional traineeships to adapt to the requirements of the job; internships and specializations; the process of supervision).

The importance of professional training is highlighted also by its systematization, by drawing up, by the Ministry of Justice, through the specialized direction, of the professional training programs, as resulting from the provisions of Article 39 of the Law no. 123/2006.

Even if it does not reflect exactly the latest developments of the probation national system, referring here, for example, to the name that the probation staff currently carries, being adopted by the Order of the Minister of Justice No. 3172/C/26.11.2004, the Ethical Code of the social reintegration and supervision staff contains standards of professional conduct of the probation staff, in order for it to be consistent with the honor and dignity of the profession, whose failure to observe can lead to disciplinary liability.

In concrete terms, in the Ethical Code are regulated obligations specific to the profession's deontology, such as: the obligation for the probation counselors to notice, as soon as possible and, in writing, the hierarchical superior, any situation in which they have, or there may be the appearance that they would have any interest of any kind in the case in question; the obligation to carry out with professionalism, loyalty, fairness and conscientiously the tasks and the obligation to refrain from any act which might prejudice the institution in which it carries out the activity; the obligation to fulfil their tasks rapidly, in compliance with the deadlines provided by the law and, in the case where the law does not provide a deadline, within a reasonable period of time; the obligation to impose order and decency during the performance of specific activities, by having a balanced attitude, reliable and civilized towards the persons in evidence of the service and other people with whom they come into contact in their capacity; the obligation of continuous training and the of disseminating the knowledge acquired.

[26] Recommendation no. R (97) 12 of the Committee of Ministers to Member States on the staff responsible for implementing sanctions and measures was adopted by the Committee of Ministers on 10 September 1997 at the 600th meeting of the Prime Ministers.

Also, the Code draws up interdictions that are intended to ensure the dignity and honor of the profession, but also the freedoms allowed both in the exercise of their professional tasks, as well as outside those, such as: the interdiction to use their professional quality for solving personal, family, or other persons' interests, other than within the limits of the legal framework regulated for all citizens; the interdiction to intervene in order to influence in any way the decisions concerning their career; the freedom of collaboration with the specialized publications; freedom of association with professional organizations.

Conclusion

The set of principles of the national system of probation is not, as it can be seen, a random join of rules of general applicability, with no connection between them. On the contrary, these principles are in a close connection with each other, depend on each other, influence each other in the process of guiding the organization and functioning of the national system of probation, forming themselves a system of general rules.

In order to better understand the way in which principles of the national system of probation are functioning we believe it is useful the parallel with the principles of the criminal trial, whose functioning as a whole was surprised by some of the most renowned Romanian criminal procedural professors in a particularly fine definition, according to which the principles of an institutional system should be understood as a set of rules that are interconnected dialectically[27].

Of particular importance is also the functional aptitude of the principles, which means that all the normative provisions after which is organized and operates the national system of probation will be interpreted and applied in the light of the principles governing the system, principles that will also facilitate solving situations where no special rules are provided for.

This last functional aptitude of the principles governing a particular institutional system, to represent a framework for the interpretation and application of the rules with a narrower enclosure area or to constitute legal basis to resolve situations not provided by law, has been recognized also by other authors who have studied institutional systems related to the national system of probation, such as the system of the criminal trial[28].

References

- I. Chiș, Non custiodial penalties of the XXI century, Editura Wolters Kluwer, Bucharest 2009
- I. Chiș, A.B. Chiș, The execution of the criminal sanctions, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucharest 2015
- N. Volonciu, Treaty of Criminal procedural law. General Provisions, Editura Paideia, Bucharest 1999
- I. Neagu and M. Damaschin, Treaty of Criminal procedural law. General Provisions, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucharest 2015
- V. Schiacu și R. Canton coord., Probation manual, Editura Euro Standard, Bucharest 2008
- F. McNeill, P. Raynor și C. Trotter, Offender Supervision – New directions in theory, research and practice, Editura Willan Publishing, New York 2010

[27] I. Neagu și M. Damascin, Treaty of Criminal procedural law. General Provisions, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucharest 2015, p. 60.
[28] N. Volonciu, Treaty of Criminal procedural law. General Provisions, Editura Paideia, Bucharest 1999, p. 54.

THE SUSPENSION OF CRIMINAL INVESTIGATION IN THE EVENT OF INCIDENCE OF A TEMPORARY LEGAL IMPEDIMENT

Nadia Claudia CANTEMIR – STOICA[*]

Abstract

The criminal investigation is the first stage of the criminal proceeding, necessary to be carried out under legality, so as to collect the necessary evidence to find the truth in order to prosecute or not to prosecute a person subject to the criminal investigation. Sometimes, depending on the quality at the time the criminal offense was committed or on the occasion of the investigations, it is not possible to order the criminal proceedings to be initiated, given that there is a temporary legal impediment. The present study aims to bring to the debate the theoretical and practical elements regarding the institution of temporary legal impediment.

Keywords: prosecutor, temporary legal impediment, President, Minister, suspension of the criminal investigation.

1. Introductory considerations

The evolution of the criminal trial is such a complex activity being controlled by the necessity to find out the judicial truth in a certain criminal case, but is also necessary to administer judiciously the evidence so that the parties and the procedural subjects ensure that the rights conferred by the legislator are respected.

As we know, according to the Romanian Criminal Procedural Law, this complex activity takes place in several stages meant to convince the purpose of the criminal trial, namely to establish a solution according to the guilt or innocence of the person subject to the criminal investigation. The stages of the criminal proceedings are the criminal investigation, the trail and enforcement of the court decision, and the preliminary chamber is the link between the first two phases, which is intended to check, inter alia, the lawfulness of the act referring a case to court and the censorship of the lawfulness and loyalty of the criminal investigation bodies.

In the present study, we intend to draw attention to the criminal investigation, which has as its object, as it appears from art. 285 of the Criminal Procedure Code, collecting the necessary evidence on the existence of a criminal offense, identifying the individual who committed a criminal offense and establishing their criminal liability, in order to decide whether they should be prosecuted.

The quality of a person at the time of committing the criminal offense or subsequently during the criminal proceedings may be a reason to attract the jurisdiction of a particular judicial body, for example, a quaestor who committed the offense of influence peddling, will be tried at first instance by the Bucharest Court of Appeal, but with regard to a person who was a Minister at the moment of committing a criminal offense of influence peddling, and at the beginning of the criminal investigation he carries out another activity there are certain procedural issues that may impede the initiation of the criminal action.

In the present study we will focus on the institution of suspension of criminal investigation, which does not involve a solution that may be ordered by the prosecutor, but only a temporary interruption of the course of the first phase of the criminal trial. This institution is incidental in several cases, but we will confine ourselves to reviewing all the circumstances in which it may be disposed, but the special attention will be focused on the temporary legal impediment for the commencement of the criminal action.

At the same time, we will try to identify in judicial practice the legal issues that arise over the institution under discussion and how they chose the judicial bodies to interpret the legal provisions when, for example, a person was a minister at the time when a crime was committed in relation to the duties of the service and at the moment when the criminal prosecution bodies appreciate the opportunity to initiate the criminal action, it fulfilled the senator's dignity. Because constitutional issues in the subject matter of the analysis have been shaped in judicial practice, it was necessary for the Constitutional Court to intervene, which has made several decisions.

2. Analysis of the cases in which the suspension may be ordered during the criminal investigation

After the addressee of the substantive criminal law has disregarded the legal compliance report, following the intimation of the judicial bodies, the mechanism of the criminal trial is initiated which seeks to find the judicial truth, so that any person who has committed a criminal offense to be prosecuted in relation to the guilt with which he committed the act and no innocent person to be punished.

[*] Assistant Professor, PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Lawyer,Bucharest Bar (e-mail: av.nadiacantemir@yahoo.com)

Therefore, the criminal trial begins with its first phase, one of the most important, since the whole mechanism has its structure in this first stage. In the specialized doctrine, the criminal investigation was shaped as representing the soul and the foundation of the criminal trial, because of the special importance it occupies in this complex activity.

According to the provisions of art. 285 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the object of the criminal investigation is to collect the necessary evidence to prove the existence of criminal offenses, to identify the individuals who committed a criminal offense and to establish their criminal liability, in order to decide whether they should be prosecuted.

Depending on the criminal offense committed and the way in which the participants contributed to the criminal field, the criminal investigation will be carried out by the fact of finding out the truth of the case in order to identify whether they should be prosecuted.

At the end of the first stage of the criminal proceedings, the solutions that may be ordered by the public prosecutor's representative are the classification, the waiver of the prosecution and the prosecution. Therefore, the institution underlying the present study finds its applicability in the course of the criminal investigation, not being a solution that breaks the guilt or innocence of the accused person but represents only a temporary interruption of the first phase of the criminal trial.

Suspension cases are regulated by the legislator in art. 312 of the Criminal Procedure Code of Chapter IV, 2nd Section, which lists the following circumstances that may constitute the basis for discontinuing the first phase of the criminal proceedings:

- In case a forensic medical report establishes that the suspect or defendant is suffering from a serious medical condition that precludes them from taking part in the criminal procedure, the criminal investigation body shall submit to the prosecutor its proposals and the case file so they can order the criminal investigation suspended (art. 312 par. 1 of the Criminal Procedure Code);
- Suspending the criminal investigation shall also be ordered in the situation where there exists a temporary legal impediment to the start of criminal action against a person (art. 312 par. 2 of the Criminal Procedure Code);

Suspending the criminal investigation shall also be ordered for the duration of the mediation procedure, as under the law (art. 312 par. 3 of the Criminal Procedure Code);

3. Judicial bodies who may order the suspension of the criminal investigation and their duties

Even if the criminal investigation is carried out by the prosecutor on a mandatory basis, or under his supervision, the public prosecutor's representative also has the obligation to analyze whether the criminal investigation should be suspended. Insofar, as the criminal investigation is carried out under the supervision of the prosecutor, the criminal investigation body is obliged to submit to the prosecutor the proposals regarding the suspension of the criminal investigation.

The order of suspension of the criminal investigation is communicated to the main procedural parties and subjects and while the phase of the criminal trial is interrupted, the criminal investigation bodies may continue to carry out those activities in which the suspect or defendant is not required. As a guarantee provided by the legislator, when the criminal investigation is resumed, the acts performed during the suspension may be restored wherever possible. We appreciate that criminal investigation bodies may continue to carry out specific activities only in the case of suspension of criminal investigation in case of serious illness of the suspect or defendant.

The communication of this order fulfills a double role – notification of the procedural incident and, on the other hand, gives these main procedural subjects the possibility that, when they are dissatisfied with the measure adopted, when it deems it underground or unlawful, can attack it according to the general procedure established by 339 of the Criminal Procedure Code[1].

During the suspension of the criminal investigation, irrespective of the circumstances which led to this solution, the criminal investigation bodies has the obligation to check periodically, but no later than three month from the date of the suspension, if the fact that caused the interruption of the criminal investigation persists. We appreciate that it is necessary to draw up a report by the criminal investigation bodies whenever they carry out these checks in order to inspect the identified issues. If the fact that leads to the suspension of the criminal investigation is found, the criminal investigation body must draw up the proposal to resume the criminal investigation and immediately inform the prosecutor supervising the criminal investigation of this fact.

When the mediation procedure is initiated, the legislator stipulates in art. 70 of the Law No. 192/2006 the possibility of suspending the criminal investigation, based on the presentation by the parties of the mediation agreement. Therefore, the suspension is an optional one, and the judicial body will appreciate the necessity of the order.

[1] N.Volonciu and others., The new Criminal Procedure Code commented, Hamangiu Publishing, 2014, p. 788;

4. The existence of a temporary legal impediment as a basis for suspending the prosecution

In order for this case to be one interrupting the criminal investigation, it is necessary to meet cumulatively the following conditions:

- The criminal investigation to be initiated about an act provided by the criminal law and to be ordered the continuation of the criminal investigation for the suspect;
- To be determined the incidence of a legal obstacle to the criminal proceedings ;
- The impediment to be temporary;
- The impediment to be provided by the law, in a certain normative act.

Such legal and temporary impediments may be those relating to the recognition of immunity from criminal jurisdiction of certain person during the performance of public functions, the performance of a mandate[2]. The President of Romania may be in this situation when he commits a crime provided by the criminal law. According to art. 84 par. 2 of the Constitution of Romania, the President enjoys immunity. We are thus faced with a temporary legal impediment, namely the duration of the mandate, which prevents the need to initiate the criminal proceedings in a particular case.

The case of suspension is not an incident where, for acts committed by a person (even if the function determining the incidence of this condition is limited in time), a prior condition or prior authorization is requires (even if the function which determines the incidence of this condition is limited in time) if the fulfillment of the condition is not possible or the granting of such authorization is refused. In this situation, we are in the hypothesis of the prevention provided by art. 16 par. 1 letter e from the Criminal Procedure Code, the finding of which required the issuance of an order for classifying the case. If, due to the eventual temporary nature of the function or mandate (which determined the necessity of the prior condition or authorization), it ceased, so that the condition is no longer necessary, the criminal investigation previously completed by the classification may be resumed, according to the provisions of art. 335 par. 2 of the Criminal Procedure Code[3].

This may be the case if, after the commencement of the criminal investigation of a particular criminal offense, it is found that the person who is supposed to have committed has the capacity of a Minister and the deed is related to his/her duties.

Ministerial liability is considered, since the last century, one of the foundations of our constitutional system. We first encounter it in the Organic Regulation (1831), in the March Proclamation of the National Party of Moldavia and Muntenia and in the United National Principal Constitution of 1859. The principle of ministerial liability is then proclaimed by the Constitution of 1866, as well as by the Constitution of 1923, which further states that the "Ministerial liability Law determines the cases of liability and the punishment of ministers", and it is clear that this text has agreed with the provisions of the Ministerial liability Law of 1879 which encompassed the special criminal offenses ordered in the "crimes" and "felonies", as well as the penalties applicable to their gravity[4].

Art. 109 par. 2 of the Constitution of Romania regulates that only the Chamber of Deputies, the Senate and the President of Romania have the right to request the prosecution of the members of the Government for the acts committed in the exercise of their mandate. If the prosecution has been requested, the President of Romania may order the suspension from the mandate. The suing of a member of the Government brings him out of his mandate.

Thus, after the criminal investigation of a personal begun, the Prosecutor General of the Prosecutor's General Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice must refer the Chamber of Deputies, the Senate or the President of Romania in order to request the commencement of the criminal proceedings.

In the judicial practice, the problem of issuing these opinions was raised in a criminal case filed by the National Anticorruption Directorate, as follows: Chief Prosecutor of NAD, L.C.K. sent to the Prosecutor General the report for the notification of the President of Romania, of Senate, of the Chamber of Deputies and of the European Parliament, in order to obtain criminal prosecutions for nine former Ministers. The nine were accused in the file known as Microsoft Licenses. According to the research carried out, the NAD provides in a statement sent to the public opinion: it follows that "out of the USD 54 million paid by the Romanian Government under the framework agreement and its extension, the USD 20 million represent the commissions claimed by the persons involved in the project the Government of Romania, the Ministers and the companies involved".

In relation to the quality at the time the notification was made, several institutions has been notified as follows:

1. Referral of the European Parliament to the request for criminal investigation against:

N.D., Minister of MCTI between 2000 – July 2004 and currently a member of the European Parliament, for offenses of abuse in office, taking a bribe, influence peddling and money laundering

2. Referral of the President of Romania to the request for criminal investigation against:

[2] N.Volonciu and others., The new Criminal Procedure Code commented, Hamangiu Publishing, 2014, p. 787;
[3] N.Volonciu and others., The new Criminal Procedure Code commented, Hamangiu Publishing, 2014, p. 787;
[4] http://www.amosnews.ro/raspunderea-penala-membrilor-guvernului-2013-02-27;

Ț.A., Minister of Communications and Information Technology during July-December 2004 for offenses of abuse in office, taking a bribe, influence peddling, money laundering

S.G., Minister of Communications and Information Society between December 2008 and September 2010 for committing offenses of abuse in office, taking a bribe, influence peddling and money laundering

F. P.D., Minister of Education and Research for between 2009-2012 for committing the offense of abuse of authority

A.A., Minister of Education and Research during 2003-2005 for committing offenses of abuse in office, taking a bribe, influence peddling and money laundering

T.M.N., Minister of Public Finance between 2000-2004 for offenses of abuse in office, taking a bribe, influence peddling and money laundering

3. Referral to the Romanian Senate for the request for criminal investigation against:

M.P.Ș., coordinator Minister of SGG between December 200 and October 2003 and presently Senator in the Romanian Parliament for committing offenses of instigation of abuse in office, influence peddling and money laundering

E.A., Minister of Education, Research and Innovation, from December 28, 2000 to June 19, 2009, the Minister of Education, Research and Innovation from December 22, 2008 to October 1, 2009 and currently Senator in the Romanian Parliament, for committing offenses of abuse in office, taking a bribe, influence peddling and money laundering

4. Referral to the Chamber of Deputies to the request for criminal investigation against:

V.V., Minister of Communications and Information Society, from September 2010 to February 2012 and present Deputy in the Romanian Parliament, for committing the offense of abuse in office.[5]

In another criminal case, the Directorate for the Investigation of Organized Crime and Terrorism has requested the commencement of criminal investigation against the Minister of Economy, V.V. and former Minister, A.V.

Thus, according to the press release published on the DIOCT website, the Chief Prosecutor of the DIOCT requested the Prosecutor General of the Prosecutor's General Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice:

1. to notify the Romanian Senate for the request to start the criminal investigation against V.V. (former Minister of Economy an member of the Government during December 2006 – December 2008, Senator in the Romanian Parliament in the current parliamentary legislation, also serving as Minister in the Ministry of Economy) in terms of the plot and the undermining of the national economy provided by art. 167 par. 1 of the Criminal Code and art. 165 par. 1 and par. 2 of the Criminal Code, with the application of art. 33 letter a from the Criminal Code, acts committed during the period when he was Minister of Economy.
2. to notify the President of Romania of the application for the commencement of the criminal investigation against V.A. (former Minister of Economy and member of the Government from December 2008 to September 2010) in terms of the plot and the undermining of the national economy provided by art. 167 par. 1 of the Criminal Code and art. 165 par. 1 and par. 2 of the Criminal Code, with the application of art. 33 letter c from the Criminal Code, acts committed during the period when he was the Minister of Economy[6].

In the latter case, the members of the Senate gave a negative opinion to the request of the DIOCT, considering that there is no evidence to indicate the involvement of V.V. in allegedly criminal activity.

Regarding the procedure for the criminal investigation of members and former members of the Government who at the time of the notification had the function of deputy or senator, there was a constitutional legal conflict between the public prosecutor's office – the Prosecutor's Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice, on the one hand, and the Parliament – the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate.

Thus, by decision No. 270/2008, the Constitutional Court was pronounced[7] and found the existence of a legal conflict of a constitutional nature between the public prosecutor's office – the Prosecutor's Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice, on the one hand, and the Parliament – the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, on the other hand, in the case of requests concerning the criminal investigation of members and former members of the Government for acts committed in the exercise of their mandate and who, at the time of the referral, also have the capacity of deputy or senator.

In applying the provisions of art. 109 par. 2 the first sentence of the Constitution, the public prosecutor's office - the Prosecutor's Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice shall notify the Chamber of Deputies or the Senate, as the case may be, to request the prosecution of members and former members of the Government for acts committed in the exercise of their office and who, at the time of the referral, also have the capacity of deputy or senator.

In applying the provisions of art. 109 par. (2) the first sentence of the Constitution, the public prosecutor's office - the Prosecutor's Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice will notify the President of Romania to request the prosecution of the members of the Government and former members of the Government who, at the time of the referral, deputy or senator.

[5] http://cursdeguvernare.ro/dna-cere-aviz-pentru-urmarirea-penala-a-noua-fosti-ministri.html;

[6] https://www.hotnews.ro/stiri-esential-15496191-procurorul-sef-diicot-solicita-incepeprea-urmaririi-penale-pentru-varujan-vosganian-adriean-videanu.htm

[7] https://www.ccr.ro;

We note in essence that in connection with the situation of the members of the Government who have committed criminal offenses in connection with the service duties, there is a temporary legal impediment to the commencement of criminal proceedings, namely, the commencement of the criminal investigation issued by the Chamber Deputies, the Senate or the President of Romania, depending on the quality at the time of the referral. This impediment is temporary because of the fact that it can be removed by the approval of the competent body after the procedure under Law No. 115/1999 on Ministerial liability has been completed.

To the extent that the Chamber of Deputies, the Senate or the President of Romania will reject the opinion, this circumstance will be converted into a legal impediment that determines the solution of the classification, art. 16 par. 1 letter. e of the Criminal Procedure Code, respectively the authorization or notification to the competent body. In my opinion, to the extent that the request was rejected because there was insufficient evidence and new facts, a new request can be made with respect to the same member of the Government.

Regarding the temporary legal impediment in the event that the President of Romania committed an act provided by the criminal law, we identified the following case in the practice of the judicial bodies:

On April 16, 2014, a Senator from the Romanian Parliament, named G.F. filed a criminal complaint in which she accused the head of state of that time, T.B., of threats and blackmail, of the statements he made about a show in which he said: 'It would be better to stay in her own corner, and to take care of what happens with her husband who is a mayor, because it is possible that she may not find him one day at home if ... she is not careful ... I understand that bad things happened to hom"[8].

The prosecutors within the Prosecutor's Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice have considered that the provisions of art. 206 of the Criminal Code, with the application of art. 35 par. 1 of the Criminal Code, respectively the perpetration of the threat of continuation (two material acts). Although the initial investigations were the object of the blackmail offense, the legal classification subsequently changed, the case being analyzed only from the point of view of committing the threat offense.

In relation to the quality held at that time by the named T.B., that of the President of Romania, the investigators considered that it is necessary to order the suspension of the criminal investigation due to the incidence of the legal impediment of the motion of the criminal action that we find regulated in art. 312 par. 2 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Against this order, the plaintiff, through the chosen defender, filed a complaint with the hierarchically superior prosecutor, a complaint that was rejected and then addressed the preliminary judge of the High Court of Cassation and Justice. Although this judicial body had to reject this complaint as inadmissible, since the legislator does not regulate such a remedy, however, the Preliminary Chamber judge allowed the request to refer the Constitutional Court to the unconstitutionality of art. 312 par. 2 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Thus, by Decision No. 678 from November 13, 2017[9] the judges from the Constitutional Court rejected the exception invoked by the plaintiff G.F., stating that the provisions of art. 312 par. 2 of the Criminal Procedure Code are constitutional.

The immunity enjoyed by the President of Romania has been defined as a means of protection, designed to protect him from any possible pressures, abuses and blatant lawsuits directed against him in the exercise of his mandate, with the aim of guaranteeing freedom of expression and protection against abusive judicial prosecution[10].

The Constitutional Court motivated its decision to reject, basically acknowledging that the President of Romania, in the exercise of his duties, enjoys immunity in two respects: the lack of liability for the political opinions expressed in the exercise of the mandate, and the inviolability (except of the case provided by article 96 of the Constitution, where the constituent legislator stipulated that the President may be prosecuted for the offense of high treason). By virtue of inviolability, we notice that the provisions of article 312 par. 2 of the Criminal Procedure Code in the case of criminal investigation against the President of Romania, the temporary legal impediment derives from the provisions of article 84 par. 2 of the Constitution regarding the immunity of the President of Romania.

We notice that it will be possible to order the criminal action to be launched against the President of Romania after the temporary legal impediment, namely his mandate, has ceased, and the criminal investigation may be resumed.

In early 2015, after President T.B. completed its second presidential mandate, prosecutors within the Prosecutor's Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice, on the basis of the provisions of art. 333 of the Criminal Procedure Code were ordered to resume the criminal investigation following the cessation of the cause of the suspension, namely the legal impediment - the exercise of the position of the President of Romania.

By the indictment of 15.07.2016, issued in file No. 238 / P / 2014, of the Prosecutor's Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice - the Criminal Investigation Section, verified by the Chief Prosecutor of the Section on 21.07. 2016 in terms of legality and solidity, the prosecutor ordered that the defendant T.B. be sued in terms of committing the offense of threat in a continuous form (two material acts), a deed stipulated and sanctioned by art. 206 of the Criminal Code with the application of art. 35 par. 1 of the Criminal Code. Subsequently, the indictment was dismissed by the Prosecutor General of the Prosecutor's Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice and resumed the criminal investigation and the civil party chose to withdraw the previous complaint, so the solution that was ordered was that of the classification[11].

[8] www.antena3.ro;
[9] To be seen https://www.ccr.ro/ccrSearch/MainSearch/SearchForm.aspx;
[10] https://www.ccr.ro/ccrSearch/MainSearch/SearchForm.aspx;

In the specialized doctrine[12], it is argued that this temporary legal impediment would be an incident where, after the commencement of criminal investigation of a criminal offense sanctioned ex officio, the legal classification of a criminal offense is punishable only upon a preliminary complaint, but this circumstance can not be immediately brought to the attention of the plaintiff who is away from the country and therefore can not manifest his will for a certain period of time.

Conclusion

We agree with the regulation of this institution under the Criminal Procedure Code which allows the suspension of criminal investigation as long as the incident is a temporary legal impediment.

As John Milton said[13], where there is a great thirst for learning, it is natural to have many contradictory discussions, many writings and opinions; because the opinion of the people of worth is knowledge, we hope that through this paper we have achieved the desideratum considered at the beginning of this work, and the opinions that are presented will be useful to those who want to deepen the subject of the research.

References

- The Criminal Procedure Code
- The Criminal Code
- Law No. 255/2013 for the implementation of Law No. 135/2010 on the Criminal Procedure Code
- Romanian Costitution
- Ion Neagu, Mircea Damaschin, Criminal Procedure Treaty – General Part, Universul Juridic Publishing, Bucharest, 2014
- N. Volonciu și alții, New Criminal Procedure Code commented, Hamangiu Publishing, 2014
- M. Udroiu – Criminal Procedure – Special Part, C.H. Beck Publishing, Bucharest, 2014
- A. Zarafiu, Criminal procedure, General Part. Special Part, C.H. Beck Publishing, Bucharest, 2014
- B. Micu, A.G.Păun. R. Slăvoiu, Criminal procedure. Admission course in magistracy and law. Multiple choice test, Hamangiu Publishing, Bucharest
- P. Buneci and others, New Criminal Procedure Code. Notes. Correlations. Explanations, C.H. Beck Publishing, Bucharest, 2014
- V. Dongoroz and others, Theoretical explanations of the Romanian Criminal Procedure Code. The general part, vol. V, 2nd edition, Academiei Publishing, All Beck Publishing, Bucharest, 2003
- Gh. Theodoru, Criminal procedure. The special part, Al. I Cuza University, Law School, Iași, 1974, Vol. II
- www.ccr.ro
- www.just.ro
- www.echr.coe.int

[11] The opinion was also expressed in the Ph. D. thesis of the undersigned nemed Infirmation, revocation and legal termination of procedural acts in the light of criminal procedural regulations;

[12] Micu B., and others. Criminal procedure. Admission course in magistracy and law, 3rd edition, Hamangiu Publishing, 2017, p. 323;

[13] English poet, https://ro.wikipedia.org/wiki/John_Milton

COMPENSATORY ACTION - A NEW LEGISLATIVE ACTION IMPOSED ON NATIONAL AUTHORITIES AS CONSEQUENCE OF RECENT CASE-LAW OF THE EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Cătălin Nicolae MAGDALENA*

Abstract

Subsequent to pronouncement by the European Court of Human Rights of the semi-pilot judgement in case Iacov Stanciu v. Romania and the pilot judgement in case Rezmiveş and Others v. Romania - where the Court found structural problems concerning overcrowding of detention facilities and improper conditions of detention - national authorities were imposed to adopt an appropriate legal instrument in order to eradicate injuries of fundamental rights guaranteed by the Convention.

The mechanism established by Law no. 169/2017 amending legislation on execution of punishments and detention measures aimed at achieving a double goal. On the one hand, it pursued to grant compensation to convicted persons executing punishments consisting in deprivation of liberty in improper conditions; on the other hand, it was destined to contribute to relieving places of detention.

The purpose of this study is to analyze the degree to which the recently adopted legislation is suitable to fully attain the assumed end.

The objectives of the study are to make an analysis of the relevant legal provisions and their impact on prison system and execution of punishment and at the same time of relevant case-law, in order to determine if the present form of the law leads to differentiations in treatment towards those to whom it addresses, incompatible to fundamental law.

Keywords: Compensatory action. Law no. 169/2017. Compensations granted to convicted persons. National solutions to overcrowding of detention facilities.

1. Introduction

Per Article 3 of European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms[1]: „No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment".

In Romanian national legislation, the importance of this right attributed to any person, regardless of his or her social position, age, education, religion, ethnicity or sex is underlined by its stipulation in the fundamental law[2].

Subsequently, constitutional provisions have been reiterated in legislation, where there has been stated as a principle that "any person who is under criminal investigation or trial must be treated with respect for human dignity"[3] and „it is forbidden to subject any person in execution of punishment or other measures depriving of liberty to torture, inhuman or degrading treatment or other ill-treatment[4]."

Despite the above-mentioned procedural gurantees, by judgemnent pronounced in case Bragadireanu vs. Romania on 06.12.2007[5], the European Court of Human Rights[6] stated for the first time that there has been a breach of Article 3 of the Convention caused by national conditions of detention.

The Court appreciated that penitenciary overcrowding, obligation to share beds with other persons, damaged mattresses and inappropriate sanitary facilities fall in the area of inhuman and degrading treatment of the convicted person during execution of punishment.

During the next 5 years, the Court pronounced other almost 100 judgements, stating that Romania was in breach of Article 3 of the Convention[7], situation caused by, e.g.[8]: overcrowding, insufficient or inadequate alimentation, limited number of bathrooms,

* Assistant Professor, PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: catamagdalena@yahoo.com)

[1] European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Rome, 04.11.1950, ratified by Romania through Law no. 30/18.05.1994, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 135/31.05.1994.

[2] According to Article 22 Para 2 of Romanian Constitution: „no one shall be subjected to torture or toany punishment or inhuman or degrading treatment".

[3] Article 11 Para 1 of Romanian Criminal Procedure Code.

[4] Article 5 Para 1 of Law no. 254/2013 on the execution of punishment and detention measures ordered by judicial authorities during the criminal trial, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 514/14.08.2013.

[5] ECtHR, Decision adopted on 06.12.2007, Application no. 22088/04, case Bragadireanu vs. Romania.

[6] Hereinafter „the Court".

[7] According to ECtHR, decision adopted on 25.04.2017, Applications no. 61467/12, 39516/13, 48231/13 and 68191/13, *case Rezmiveş and Others vs. Romani*a, Para 106, during 2007 – 2012 there have been 93 judgements stating breaches of Article 3 of the Convention by Romania.

[8] ECtHR, decision adopted on 1301.205, Application no. 41040/11, case Micu vs. Romania; ECtHR, decision adopted on 18.10.2011, Application no. 38746/03, case Păvălache vs. Romania; ECtHR, decision adopted on 6.09.2014, Application no. 51012/11, case Valerian Dragomir vs. Romania.

limited access to showers, lack of hygiene, lack of natural light, insufficient ventilation, passive smoking.

The large number of convictions against Romania and lack of adequate response from national authorities lead the Court to state that overcrowding and improper detention conditions represent in fact structural problems of penitentiary system.

This state of facts was acknowledged in the semi-pilot judgement pronounced in case Iacov Stanciu vs. Romania[9] on 24.07.2012. The Court noted that Romanian authorities have taken some general measures to remedy structural problems in prisons, but nevertheless asked domestic authorities to adopt additional new measures designed to ensure compliance with Article 3 of the Covention, without indicating though a deadline ultimatum. At the same time, asked Romania to adopt a national legal instrument in order to allow effective reparation of damages suffered by persons detained in unsuitable conditions.

Requests made were unsuccessful and therefore, after more than four years from the moment the Court had identified the problems, violations of the same kind were found in more than 150 judgments pronounced against Romania, based on overcrowding and inadequate material conditions in prisons[10].

To facilitate effective enforcement of its judgments, the Court adopted ruling pilot procedure which, among other things, clearly highlightend the existence of structural problems underlying the violations and, in addition, indicated to the respondent State measures necessary for remediation[11].

Considering assessments on general measures taken by Romanian authorities and reports of the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and inhuman punishment (CPT), in conjunction with recognition by the Ombudsman of penitentiary system problems, on April 25, 2017, ECtHR pronounced the pilot judgement in case Rezmiveş and Others vs. Romania. This time, the Court specifically asked Romania to provide within six months, in cooperation with the Committee of Ministers of Council of Europe, an action plan meant to find a solution to prison overcrowding and inadequate conditions of detention.

National authorities have complied and took a first step, so that on July 14, 2017 it was promulgated Law no. 169/2017 which amended and supplemented Law no. 254/2013 on the execution of sentences and detention measures[12].

The main provision of this law was introduction of compensatory measures for inadequate conditions of accommodation of convicted persons.

However, is the adopted domestic remedy able to resolve the structural deficiencies identified in the prison system and lead to the eradication of injuries to fundamental rights guaranteed by the Convention? Is it an effective legal instrument for compensation of persons accommodated in inadequate conditions and relieves places of detention? Does this compensatory action lead to different treatments and consequences for persons who are in the same legal situation, incompatible with Romanian Constitution?

To answer these questions, it is necessary to analyze provisions of Law no. 169/2017 and their impact on prison system and implicitly on punishment execution.

Also, analysis of national case-law is a useful tool to verify whether national legal instrument meet the assumed objectives.

The importance of analysis in the present article is given at the same time by the need to verify compliance of national authorities with requirements of the pilot judgment and also resides in the absolute novelty of problems discussed.

In our opinion, the study presents from a scientific perspective part of national authorities efforts to comply with obligations under the pilot judgment in case Rezmiveş and Others against Romania[13] and, equally, examines the impact on convicts of compensatory mechanism adopted by Law no. 169/2017.

2. Content

According to Explanatory memorandum of Law no. 169/2017[14], the legislator had a double goal: to grant compensation to convicted persons executing punishments in severe overcrowding conditions, and at the same time contribute to relieving places of detention.

The remedy legal instrument by which national authorities have considered compliance with the Court is represented by a compensatory mechanism designed to eliminate violations of Article 3 of the Convention and has been implemented by Law no. 169/2017.

The most important measures adopted by Law no. 169/2017 were:

I. modification of Article no. 40 Para 5 b of Law no. 254/2013 which aimed to a slight relaxation of conditions under which it is possible to change the regime of execution of punishments depriving

[9] ECtHR, decision adopted on 24.07202, Application no. 35972/05, case Iacov Stanciu vs. Romania.

[10] R.Paşoi, D.Mihai, Pilot Judgement in case Rezmiveş and Others vs. Romnia concerning detention conditions, available online at https://juridice.ro, last accession 06.03.2018, at 08,01.

[11] According to Resolution Res(2004)3 of the Council of Ministers of the Council of Europe, adoped on 12.05.2004.

[12] Published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 514/14.08.2013.

[13] Under this ECtHR decision, domestic authorities have assumed a whole complex of measures, among which compensatory action respresents only a part.

[14] Available online at http://www.cdep.ro.

of liberty to a regime immediately below as level of difficulty;

II. modification of the content of the right of convicted persons to phone calls by ensuring their freedom to make public mobile communications from prison, in confidentiality conditions, without visual surveillance;
III. granting to the convict the right to renounce to his/her due remuneration for work done in exchange for days additioned to punishment already executed, taking into account the work done;
IV. change of period of punishment considered executed based on work done, so that the convicted person may obtain a more consistent reduction of the period of detention.

In the context of Law no. 169/2017, the most important legislative measure was by far prescription in Article 551 of a compensatory measure for accomodation of convicts in improper condition.

According to the text of the law mentioned before, in calculating the punishment effectively executed, one must take into account execution in inadequate conditions as a compensatory measure (irrespective of regime of execution of punishment). In this case, for each period of 30 days executed under inadequate conditions (even non-consecutive days), other additional 6 days of punishment are considered executed. This benefit cannot be revoked, regardless of circumstances occurred during execution of punishment.

The legislator tried to define the notion of "improper conditions" as accommodation of one person in any detention center in Romania that presented flaws in fulfilling conditions imposed by European standards.

Of course, this definition is at least unfortunate and, at first glance, seems to restrict its scope only to persons in detention centers, defined by Article 115 of the Romanian Criminal Code[15] and Article 136 of Law no. 254/2013, as institutions specialized in social recovery, where only educational custodial measures applied to minors are to be executed.

By means of teleological interpretation, we appreciate however that this was not the scope of the national legislator.

We argue this opinion by reference mainly to the history presented in the introduction of this analysis, the general context of adoption of Law no. 169/2017, the correlation of changes enacted by this law, the objective pursued for adoption, and not least the Explanatory memorandum of the law.

We consider that the notion of „detention centers" should cover an area extended to any detention place in Romania.

The national legislator analyzed, synthesized and classified, according to standardization landmarks, the aspects considered by the European Court of Human Rights as "inappropriate conditions" in its conviction judgements. According to the actual form in force of Article 55^1 Para 3, accomodation in any of the following situations is considered execution of punishment in inadequate conditions:

a) accommodation in a space less than or equal to 4 m/convict, calculated by excluding surface of toilets and food storage facilities, by dividing the total area of detention rooms to the number of people accomodated, regardless of equipping the concerned space;
b) lack of access to outdoor activities;
c) lack of access to natural light or sufficient ventilation or ventilation availability;
d) lack of adequate temperature of the room;
e) lack of possibility to use the toilet in private and respect of basic rules of health and hygiene requirements;
f) existence of infiltration, dampness and mold in detention room walls.

These provisions are also to be applied correspondingly to calculate the punishment effectively executed as preventive measure/ punishment in detention centers and also pre-trial arrest in improper conditions[16].

To this respect, there is no reason leading to establishment of different legal situations for different categories of persons in state custody.

It is not considered execution of punishment under inadequate conditions the day or period when the person was:

a) admitted to infirmaries within places of detention, hospitals of the sanitary network of National Penitentiary Administration, Ministry of Internal Affairs or public health network;
b) in transit.

However, the person who was already compensated for improper detention conditions by final decisions of national courts or the European Court of Human Rights (for the same period for which compensation was granted and the person was subsequently transferred or moved to spaces with improper detention conditions), cannot benefit of compensatory action. Therefore, the person in this situation cannot obtain a reduction of punishment, according to Article 55^1 Para 6 of Law no. 254/2017.

Adoption of compensatory action automatically raised a controversy over the date to be considered as starting point to calculate the additional days under this mechanism.

According to Para 8, the date to be considered is July 24, 2012, when the judgment in the semi-pilot case Iacov Stanciu vs. Romania was rendered.

Nonetheless, is it possible that a law passed in 2017 should produce legal effects since 2012, considering the fact that, in general, the law applies only for the future?

[15] Romanian Criminal Code, adopted by Law no. 286/2009, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 510/24.072009.
[16] Per Article 55^1 Para 4 of Law no. 254/2013.

The answer is positive and based on Article 15 Para 2 of Constitution, under which the law applies only for the future, but for more favourable criminal law (and this is the juridical nature of compensatory action). Setting the date of July 24, 2012 as a starting point to calculate days additionally executed appears however randomly chosen and is susceptible to criticism, since neither the Explanatory memorandum to Law no. 169/2017, nor the latter clarifies the reasons for this choice.

In addition, Court decisions stating violations of Article 3 of the Convention have been delivered starting from December 6, 2007[17], and until July 24, 2012 Romania had already been convicted in 93 other similar judgments.

As a result, there is no reason why compensatory action should not also be applied before pronouncement of the judgment in the semi-pilot case Iacov Stanciu vs. Romania, with consequence of eliminating any difference in treatment of convicted persons who have executed punishments in the same inadequate conditions before and after date of July 24, 2012[18].

In order to implement the compensatory measure, in each penitentiary there was established a Commission for evaluation of prison conditions[19], whose role is to make an inventory of buildings destinated for accommodation existing at unity level, and an analysis so as to determine which of them fall under incidence of Article 55[1] Para 3 concerning improper detention conditions.

In terms of the criteria stated in Article 55[1] Para 3a) of Law no. 254/2013, the Commission will carry out the analysis taking into account the average monthly index of overcrowding associated with each analyzed building.

In terms of the criteria stated in art. 55[1] Para 3b) and f) of Law no. 254/2013, the Commission will analyze considering the existence of judgments pronounced by national or international courts, which have found defficiencies in the outdoor/indoor space of analyzed buildings.

In terms of the criteria stated in Article 55[1] Para 3c) of Law no. 254/2013, the Commission will carry out the analysis according to national standards.

In terms of the criteria stated in Article 55[1] Para 3d) of Law no. 254/2013 for the period July 24, 2012 to entry into force of the law, the Commission will analyze considering the heat delivery program for cold season. For the period after the entry into force of the law, ensurance of proper temperature will be determined by the daily measurements inside the building.

In terms of the criteria stated in Article 55[1] Para e) of Law no. 254/2013, the Commission will analyze in relation to existence of a sanitary space equipped with door and locking system, compliance to national health standards, as well as those requiring respect of rights attached to individual and collective hygiene for persons deprived of liberty.

The centralized situation of buildings inadequate in terms of conditions of detention was approved[20] by Order of Minister of Justice no. 2773/17.102017[21], and its simple reading demonstrates that no place of detention run by the National Prison Administration meets European standards of accommodation[22].

Under the principle of equal treatment of persons in the same legal situation, the legislator established by Article VI of Law no. 169/2017 that provisions of the mentioned law are to be applied to convicts temporarily placed in detention centers at request of judicial authorities and also to persons deprived of liberty who executed under Article 55[1] Para 2 of Law no. 254/2013 punishments and/or measures depriving of liberty, when these persons were subject to a measure depriving of liberty.

Following the same principle, compensatory action applies correspondingly to minors executing educational measures in detention centers, educational centers or prisons, and also to minors convicted under the former Romanian Criminal Code of 1968[23] and at the moment of entry into force of the present law are executing educational measures in detention centers.

The legislator opted for an administrative procedure of calculating the benefit of compensatory action, stating in Article V that the Office of registration and work organisation within each unit will open a registration file for each person deprived of liberty, where there are to be noted buildings of accommodation during execution of punishment and calculation of days to be deducted from executed punishment following to improper detention conditions.

Although at first glance compensatory action appears to meet the requirements of drafting legal acts[24], in reality the situation is far from achieving this goal.

In this contex, a number of questions regarding legal situations appeared, that the legislator most likely had ignored or not forseen. We will subsequently [17] ECtHR, Decision adopted on 06.12.2007, Application no. 22088/04, case Bragadireanu vs. Romania, already mentioned.

[18] M.A. Hotca, Un bun început pentru respectarea hotărârii-pilot în cauza Rezmiveș și alții împotriva României – adoptarea Legii nr. 169/2017 privind modificarea și completarea Legii nr. 254/2013, available online at https://juridice.ro, last accession on 06.03.2018, at 08,00.

[19] Per Article II of Law no. 169/2017, the Commission consists of: deputy economic administrative director or equivalent, as chairman; deputy director for safety and regime or equivalent; head of penitentiary regime service or equivalent; heads of department of the buildings evaluated; chief medical and responsible for safety of work, as secretary.

[20] Per Article IV Para 7 of Law no. 169/2017.

[21] Published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 822/18.10. 2017.

[22] Save for a few accomodation spaces.

[23] Law no. 15/1968 on Romanian Criminal Code, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 79-79bis/ 21.061968.

[24] Clarity, simplicity and predictability, according to Common Guidelines of the European Parliament, the Council and the Commission for those participating in drafting EU legislation.

identify, indicate and analyze some of them, in an attempt to find some answers according to the undertaken scope of the research:

1. Which is the legal nature (regime) of days considered additionally executed in compensation for accomodation in inadequate conditions?

Lack of answer lead to diverging views, which is the reason why in some cases it was found that days granted in compensation for accommodation in unsuitable conditions should be reduced, e.g., from total fraction of release on parole, while in other cases it was considered that days should be deducted from punishment itself, thus changing fractions of release on parole and date of expiry of punishment.

In our opinion, by adopting this remedy instrument prescribed by Law no. 169/2017, the legislator pursued compensation by reducing the period of execution of punishment in prison, and not the punishment covered by res judicata principle. As a result, days granted in compensation for accommodation in unsuitable conditions cannot lead to changes concerning the punishment established by the court, and the fractions prescribed for release on parole are to be calculated according to the punishment established by the final decision of conviction.

2. Changing the date when the punishment is considered entirely executed following to application of compensatory action represents a modification of punishment established by the final judgement which may be done only by the court by means of challenge to enforcement governed by Article 598 Para 1 of Romanian Criminal Procedure Code, or is it possible by mere administrative procedure performed by the administration of the detention?

We are of the opinion that changing the date when the punishment is considered entirely executed does not amount to change of punishment itself, and in the first case jurisdiction belongs to Office administration of persons deprived of liberty. According to Article 20 of Order of Minister of Justice no. 432/2010/05.02.2010[25] approving Instructions regarding the nominal and statistical number of persons deprived of liberty in custody of units subordinated to National Administration of Penitentiaries, after having received the convict in prison, the employee shall, inter alia, establish the date when the person concerned is to be released following entire execution of punishment and calculates, according to duration of punishment established by the court, the date when the fractions prescribed for release on parole expire.

One can therefore easily see that, by means of an administrative procedure, there are calculated the date when execution of punishment starts, the date when it expires and different fractions of punishment.

For the same reasons, the Office will also calculate (as required by Article V Para 3 of Law no. 169/2017), days additioned to punishment following inappropriate conditions of detention, and afterwards will accordingly modify the date of expiry for punishment execution and the fractions for release on parole.

It is only if the administration of prison refuses to calculate days additioned or they are wrongly quantified, that the convicted person may appeal to the court by way of challenge against enforcement.

This was also the opinion expressed in criminal sentence no. 54/12.01.2018[26] by Judecătoria Sectorului 5 Bucureşti, which dismissed as unfounded the challenge against enforcement filed by convict T.A.F., concerning miscalculation of days additioned in application of compensatory mechanism.

The court found that awarding compensation days ist o be done administratively by the prison unit where the convicted person is imprisoned. The challenge to enforcement was denied as unfounded, as long as the administration of the detention place had calculated for the convict a number of 156 compensatory days for accommodation in inadequate conditions during 27.10.2015-08.01.2018.

3. Release of convicts at the expiry of duration of punishment depriving of liberty is to be done administratively, or following referral by the administration of the detention to the court, in order to promote a challenge to enforcement under Article 598 of Romanian Criminal Procedure Code?

This question arose in the context of lack of specific regulation of release procedure before the end of punishment, the period of which had been changed following the application of compensatory measure under art. 55^1 Para 1 of Law no. 254/2017.

When the law entred into force, some courts appreciated that release of convicted persons benefiting of compensatory mechanism is not to be done administratively, but by court decision based on Article 598 of the Criminal Procedure Code regarding challenge to enforcement.

I.e., based on Article 598 para 1d of Romanian Criminal Code, Judecătoria Sectorului 5 Bucureşti decided to admit the challenge to enforcement filed by the judge delegate in charge of enforcement (criminal sentence no. 2616/19.09.2017[27]). By calculating the benefit of additional days consequant to accommodation in unsuitable conditions, the court found that the convict T. A. had executed the punishment and ordered release.

For identical reasoning, the courts accepted challenges to enforcenment filed by other convicted persons[28].

[25] Published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 157/11.03.2010.
[26] Final by criminal decision no. 206/23.02.2018 pronounced by Bucharest Tribunal – Ist Criminal Section, unpublished.
[27] Final by non-contestation, unpublished.
[28] Criminal sentences no. 2617/19.09.2017, no. 2618/19.09.2017, no. 2619/19.09.2017, pronounced by Judecătoria Sectorului 5 Bucureşti, final by non-contestation, unpublished.

We appreciate, however, that the answer to our question results from corroborating Article 53 of Law no. 254/2013 and Article 20 of Order of Minister of Justice no. 432/2010/05.02.2010 (previously referred to).

Per Article 53 Para 1 of Law no. 254/2013, director of the prison has jurisdiction to order release at "the expiry of imprisonment, the date of the final judgment ordering the release on parole, as well as any other date decided by competent judicial bodies in cases provided by law (...)". Thus, administration of detention place releases the convicted person at the expiry of period of imprisonment, by administrative procedure, without any need of referral to court.

At the same time, the expiry date of punishment is calculated by Registration Bureau organized in each place of detention, considering additional days as result of execution of punishment under inadequate conditions of detention. Benefit of additional days under compensatory mechanism leads to a new situation in national law, which requires regular updating of the date of expiry of punishment depending on conditions of detention.

Basically, when the convicted person is imprisoned, the responsible employee calculates the starting and respectively the expiry date of punishment according to the final judgment, but the latter will be modified over time through administrative proceedings, as for every 30 days of accommodation in unsuitable conditions 6 days will be considered as effectively executed.

Summarizing, release at expiry of period of punishments deprivating of liberty will be done administratively, under the procedure governed by Article 53 of Law no. 254/2013.

This conclusion is also supported by case-law. For example, criminal sentence no. 88/16.01.2018 issued by Judecătoria Sectorului 5 București[29] rejected as inadmissible the challenge to enforcement filed by the convict N.D., arguing that grant of compensation days according to Law no. 169/2017 is to be done administratively by the prison unit where the convicted person is imprisoned, and not by way of challenge to enforcement.

Only in case that these days should not be granted, the convicted person may submit an application to the court under the principle of access to justice. In case under discussion, the court found that Rahova Penitenciary calculated for the applicant N.D. a number of 132 compensation days for the period 17.09.2014-21.12.2017 during which the convict had been detained in improper conditions, and therefore the appication was inadmissible.

4. After entry into force of Law no. 169/2017, situation of all persons deprived of liberty benefiting of compensatory action must be analyzed by Commissions for release on parole organised in penitenciaries, according to Article VII of the law?

Response can only be negative.

Per Article 97 of Law. no. 254/2013, release on parole is granted at the request of the convicted person or at the proposal of the Commission for conditional release. The report for release on parole, along with supporting documents and, where appropriate, recommendations of probation officer made under Article 97 Para 7 are submitted to the court of first instance which has territorial jurisdiction over the prison[30].

There are situations where, by applying compensatory action, the convicted person gets vocation to release on parole by fulfilling fractions of punishment stipulated in Article 99 and Article 100 of Romanian Criminal Code. In this case, the Commission for release on parole shall analyze and notify to the court. Similarly, the Commission will also proceed in the same manner if the application for release on parole was rejected (before entry into force of compensatory action) for non-accomplishment of legal fractions of punishment.

The Commission will inform the court even though the deadline for request renewal is not fulfilled, as Law no. 169/2017 has the character of a more favorable criminal law.

On the other hand, if before entry into force of Law no. 169/2017 the court rejected the application for release on parole on the grounds that the convict did not reform and cannot reintegrate in society, and established a deadline for renewal of application for a date situated after entry into force of compensatory action, the Commission will not have to notify the court before accomplishment of the deadline established by a judgment entered into res judicata area. If it does however, we consider that the application should be rejected as inadmissible.

Recent case-law confirms this conclusion. Thus, criminal sentence no. 3032/17.11.2017 pronounced by Judecătoria Sectorului 5 București[31] admitted the proposal for release on parole for convict M.G.A. Although court of first instance held that release on parole was possible before the date established by a final decision (pronounced prior to entry into force of Law no. 169/2017) when the proposal could be renewed, the higher court decided on the contrary.

Considering on basis of circumstances presented that the legal situation of the convicted had not been modified by entry into force of compensatory mechanism and the period during which the application could be renewed (as established by previous court ruling) still produced legal effects by virtue of res judicata principle, the court of judicial review rejected the proposal for conditional release as inadmissible.

5. When application for release on parole was rejected, the period established by the court after which the application can be renewed modifies, as consequence of additional days considered executed as compensation under inadequate conditions of accommodation?

[29] Final by criminal decision no. 167/15.02.2018 pronounced by Bucharest Tribunal – Ist Criminal Section, unpublished.
[30] According to Article 205 of Regulation implementing Law no. 254/2013, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 271/11.04.2016.
[31] Final by criminal decision no. 205/23.02.2018 pronounced by Bucharest Tribunal – Ist Criminal Section, unpublished.

This hypothesis must be considered from two perspectives. The first one concerns the situation when release on parole was denied prior to entry into force of the law, by analogy with assessments made in paragraph 4 and specific distinctions as shown there. The second one concerns the case when release on parole was rejected after entry into force of compensatory action, situation where there is no reason to modify the period established by the court, covered by res judicata principle, along with the final decision.

In all cases, period of renewal established by the court when rejecting the application/proposal for release on parole cannot be longer than 1 year[32] and must be indicated separately in all cases when the solution is based on non-compliance of requirements prescribed by law, including the situation where the remainder to be executed until accomplishment of legal faction is less than or equal to 1 year. If the application/proposal for release on parole is denied for non-compliance of the fraction prescribed by law, and the remainder to be executed until reaching this fraction is longer than one year, the court will not establish a concrete date, but will generically set that the application/proposal shall be renewed after expiry of fraction[33] (which is to be calculated considering also the benefit of compensatory action).

6. In case of persons deprived of liberty sentenced to life imprisonment, days considered additionally executed following to improper conditions are/are not taken into account when calculating the required fraction for release on parole?

In accordance with Article 99 Para 1 of Romanian Criminal Code, release on parole for life imprisonment can be accepted if the convict has effectively served 20 years in prison.

We appreciate the days considered additionally executed as result of inadequate accommodation conditions represent days actually executed from the punishment, as unequivocally results by gramatical interpretation of Article 55^1 alin. 1^{34}.

Moreover, assessment to the contrary could lead to criticism aimed at the very constitutionality of the legal text, as long as it leads to differential treatment in respect of persons in the same legal situation, disregarding the principle of equality before law.

Constitutional Court frequently examines in its case-law respect of constitutional requirements enshrined in Article 16 Para 1 of the Constitution, which states that: „All citizens are equal before the law and public authorities, without any privilege or discrimination."

In older decisions, Constitutional Court held that the principle of equality requires establishment of equal treatment of situations which, depending on the purpose, are not different[35]. Also, according to recent jurisprudence of the same court, situations concerning certain categories of people should differ in essence so as to justify the difference of treatment, and this difference of treatment must be based on objective and reasonable criteria[36]. In essence, ignoring the principle of equal rights has the effect of unconstitutionality of the norm establishing a privilege or discrimination. To this respect, Constitutional Court stated that, according to its case-law, discrimination is based on the notion of exclusion from a right/benefit[37], and the specific constitutional remedy where unconstitutional discrimination appears is granting/offering access to the benefit of the right[38].

7. Compensatory action also influences the regime of punishment execution?

The response cannot be but positive, considering that per Article 40 Para 2 of Law no. 254/2013, change of regime of depriving of liberty punishment execution may be granted after serving legal fraction of inprisonment punishment (compensatory measure will be included in this fraction). Therefore, Commission for individualisation and change of regime of execution of punishments depriving of liberty will analyze accomplishment of conditions for regime change for all convicts who, by benefit of additional days, get vocation to a milder regime.

8. When the detained person is in custody under several enforcement warrants in execution/succesively executed, which is the starting point for calculation of days considered additionally executed, following accomodation in inadequate conditions?

In general terms and by applying a systematic interpretation, we can see from the entire economy of Law no. 169/2017 that compensatory measure concerning additional days granted for inadequate conditions of detention concerns only the punishment in execution, and not also punishments already executed based on previous convictions. This framework remains valid even if the current enforcement warrant is executed at the final point of execution of a previous enforcement warrant.

In our opinion, additional days considered executed following to improper detention conditions can be calculated as a compensatory measure only for punishments in execution at the moment of entry into force of Law no. 169/2017. In consequence, if the [32] According to Article 587 Para 2 of Romanian Criminal Procedure Code, the term begins on the date the judgment becomes final.

[33] To this respect, see decision no. 8/20.03.2006 pronounced by High Court of Cassation and Justice (by a specific procedure prescribed by Romanian law, called „review for uniform interpretation of law"), published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 475/01.06.2006.

[34] Which states that: „when calculating the punishment effectively executed it is to be considered (…) as compensatory measure (…)".

[35] Constitutional Court of Romania, decision no. 1/08.02.1994, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 69/16.03.1994, penultimate Para.

[36] Constitutional Court of Romania, decision no. 366/25.06.2014, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 644/02.09.2014, Para 55.

[37] Constitutional Court of Romania, decision no. 62/21.10.1993, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 49/25.02.1994.

[38] Constitutional Court of Romania, decision no. 681/13.11.2014, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 889/08.11.2014, Para 24.

convicted person has served sentence of imprisonment starting from July 24, 2012 and was released from prison at the end of punishment, before entry into force of Law no. 169/2017[39], this person cannot benefit of compensatory action.

Similarly, execution of successive enforcement warrants canot result in entitlement to benefit of compensation but for the period executed in unsuitable conditions under the active warrant, as the punishment established by previous warrant had already been executed.

In arguing this opinion, it is to be noted that the legislator prescribed a single method of compensation, namely deduction of days from the punishment in execution, and not from punishments already executed. In the latter situation, the convicted person who has served sentence in inadequate conditions may appeal to civil courts by means of tort actions brought against the state for compensation.

For example, civil sentence no. 6538/26.09.2016 pronounced by Judecătoria Sectorului 5 Bucureşti[40] partly accepted the application filed by applicant P.I. and ordered that the defendants Bucharest Rahova Penitentiary and the National Prison Administration should jointly pay to the applicant the amount of 10,000 lei as moral damages.

The court considered that the applicant was incarcerated for 211 days and did not benefit from a minimum of 4 square meters space, contrary to Article 1 Para 3a of the Minimum rules on accommodation of detainees, adopted by Order of Minister of Justice no. 433/2010, and this situation caused psychological distress to the detained person.

Although some courts have held that simple statement of improper accommodation conditions was in itself sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage inflicted on the convicted person, these solutions were modified by higher courts.

Thus, civil decision no. 3281/12.09.2016 issued by Bucharest Tribunal – Vth Civil Section admitted the appeal lodged by the applicant S.F. against civil sentence no. 521/01.21.2016 pronounced by Judecătoria Sector 4 Bucureşti and the defendants Jilava Penitentiary, National Administration of Penitentiaries and Romanian State (represented by Ministry of Finance) were obliged to pay to the applicant the amount of 1,500 euros moral damages.

We appreciate that for such cases a much better solution would have been prescription by Law no. 169/2017 of a compensatory pecuniary benefit (alternating the compensatory action consisting in additional days), and every convicted person who has already executed punishment should receive a sum calculated for each day served in the place of detention in inadequate conditions.

Analyse of case-law of the courts results in the idea that additional compensatory days following inappropriate detention conditions concern only punishment in execution.

For example, the challenge to enforcement filed by convict N.D., detained in Bucharest-Rahova Penitenciary, was denied as unfounded by criminal sentence no. 306/08.02.2018 pronounced by Judecătoria Sectorului 5 Bucureşti[41].

The court found that N.C. is in execution of a punishment of 5 years and 197 days, following merger of a 4 years punishment (applied as consequence of a post conviction criminal offence) with the rest to be executed from a previous punishment of 5 years and 197 days (which had a total amount of 18 years of imprisonment). As grounds for this solution, the court stated that the benefit of Law no. 169/2017 must be reported to the resulting punishment in execution at the present moment, without considering the period already executed from the first 18 years punishment. This period is situated between the date when execution of the 18 years punishment began and the date when a new criminal offence took place, and at the same time is not part of the resulting punishment.

9. When a convict is released following to benefit granted according to compensatory action and afterwards returnes to prison in execution of another punishment which was merged with the punishment previously executed, this person can benefit from a new compensation for the period already executed ?

We are of the opinion that, in this case, the convicted person cannot benefit of a new compensation covering the same period for which the benefit was already granted, although by merging concurrent punishments a single warrant is to be executed. The background of this solution is that no one can get double compensation for the same reason.

10. In case of persons deprived of liberty who committed a criminal offence in prison during execution of punishment, which date should be considered as starting point in calculating additional days following to accomodation in improper conditions?

According to the line of reasoning already presented, additional days are to be calculated from the date of commencement of the new punishment applied as result of the new criminal offence committed in prison, calculated on the basis of the new enforcement warrant.

11. In addition to issues above-mentioned, arising in the context of lack of regulation by Law no. 169/2017, legal practitioners pondered on the question whether, contrary to public statements of national officials, the benefit of compensatory action should also be applied to convicts who had been released from the prison prior to entry into force of law and were situated within the term through which the convict is supervised.

[39] July 21, 2017.
[40] Final by civil decision no. 2837/15.09.2017 pronounced by Bucharest Tribunal – IVth Civil Section, unpublished.
[41] Final by criminal decision no. 238/05.03.2018 pronounced by Bucharest Tribunal – Ist Criminal Section, unpublished.

It was considered that art. 55^1 of Law no. 254/2017 was also incident in this situation and the convict can obtain a reduced punishment (and hence reducement of the term through which the convict is supervised) by means of challenge to enforcement based on Article 598 Para 1d of Romanian Criminal Procedure Code.

E.g., Bucharest Tribunal – Ist Criminal Section[42] accepted the challenge to enforcement filed by convict P.A.

Under Article 598 Para 1d of Romanian Criminal Procedure Code related to Article 55^1 of Law no. 254/2013, the court found that a number of 205 days were additionally executed, as consequence of the period when P.A. was accommodated in inadequate conditions in detention centers or centers of detention and arrest. At the same time, the court found that the 5 years punishment applied to convict P.A. was entirely executed on 17.10.2017.

By teleological interpretation, the court appreciated that Law no. 169/2017 did not restrict its scope only to imprisoned persons in execution of punishments at entry into force of the law. Thus, the benefit of compensatory measure was also to benefit to convicts who had executed part of the punishment in inadequate conditions and had been released on parole prior to entry into force of the same law.

The court also held that, based on actual form of Law no. 169/2017, that there is no legal argument to establish a difference in treatment between the convict who is still in prison and the one who executed part of the punishment in inadequate spaces, but was released on parole and was still inside the term through which supervision was in course.

3. Conclusions

Precarious conditions of detention in Romanian prisons have resulted in several convictions at the European Court of Human Rights, starting with judgment pronounced in case Bragadireanu and ending with those in semi-pilot case Iacov Stanciu and pilot case Rezmiveș and Others, all cases vs. Romania.

Only in 2017 there were 378 conviction judgments, and the consequence was obligation of Romanian state to pay the amount of 2.296,451 euros. Forced to take concrete measures to address structural problems in prisons and ensure compliance with art. 3 of the Convention, national authorities adopted a compensatory legal instrument.

Law no. 169/2017 amended provisions of Law no. 254/2013 on execution of punishments and detention measures and at the same time introduced a new mechanism, in order to relieve places of detention and grant compensation to convicted persons executing punishments in conditions incompatible to Convention.

Juridical actions undertaken by national authorities cannot represent but a first step in fulfilling the conditionalities assumed, as lack of clarity of law and a comprehensive view on compensatory mechanism make this approach not to entirely meet the assumed purpose. Initially conceived as a rather simple procedure, compensatory action proved however in practice increasingly more difficult to apply in situations which do not match perfectly the standard pattern regulated by the legislator.

The study analyzed some of the problems arising after entry into force of the Law no. 169/2017 and tried to find practical answers based on systemic, teleological and literal interpretation of substantive and procedural provisions. Nevertheless, results achieved by means of interpretation cannot be validated as universal and courts will bring forward their own arguments, based on interpretation of the same provisions which in the present form appear to lack juridical consistency.

In this context, judgements pronounced by national courts will inherently generate non-unitary case-law and in consequence need of a new legislative intervention or pronouncement of interpretation judgments[43].

The current regulation of compensatory mechanism leads to different solutions for persons in similar legal situations and raises from this perspective problems of incompatibility with fundamental law, which will probably be considered by the Constitutional Court at the right time. In the same line of reasoning, application of benefits of the law only to persons executing punishments (and as a consequence exclusion of those who served full sentence or were released on probation) creates the appearance of a constitutional conflict, in absence of another compensatory mechanism available to these categories, such as, for example, pecuniary compensation[44].

From this perspective, we consider necessary the amendment of legislative provisions regulating compensatory action, aiming to cover also situations such as those analyzed in the present research.

Law gaps also make impossible the adoption (i.e., by provision of Director of National Administration of Penitentiaries), of specific regulations during execution of punishments in order to avoid application of different measures to persons in the same legal situation[45].

Despite the above-mentioned application difficulties, according to statistics made at national level, from entry into force of the law to January 29, 2018, units subordinated to the National Administration of Penitentiaries have ordered the release of 1,031 people due to compensatory benefits

[42] Final by non-contestation, unpublished.
[43] Procedure regulated by Article no. 475 of Romanian Criminal Procedure Code.
[44] Pecuniary compensatory mechanism is used by several states (e.g., Italy, Poland, Hungary) and appreciated by ECtHR as satistactory.
[45] Interpretation of law cannot be made by means of secondary legislation.

prescribed by Law no. 169/2017[46]. Likewise, courts have upheld other 3427 applications for release on probation, consequent to application of the same compensatory mechanism.

This means that, in less than four months, a total of 4458 people sentenced to imprisonment have left places of detention, situation which proves the efficacy of compensatory mechanism.

The present research has a very pronounced character of novelty, and its usefulness resides not only in a theoretical exposure of compensatory mechanism established by national authorities, but also in identifying, indicating and analyzing the main problems appeared in practical implementation of the adopted measures.

Results presented above may be a starting point both for future legislative changes in the field of execution of depriving of liberty punishments, and also for analysis and reflection of all those involved in enforcement of this compensatory legal instrument: administration personnel of detention places, theoreticians and practitioners (lawyers, prosecutors and judges).

Future research may concern verification of (unified) solution to the problems identified in this study, orientation of case-law and an analysis of non-unitary jurisprudence in the area of compensatory action, or identification of other compensatory mechanisms for persons who had already served full sentence at the moment Law no. 169/2017 entered into force.

Finally, we consider that, in a reasonable period of time, a new analysis on the impact of compensatory mechanism on the execution of depriving of liberty punishments should be useful.

References

- European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Rome, 04.11.1950, ratified by Romania through Law no. 30/18.05.1994, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 135/31.05.1994, http://www.echr.coe.int, last accession on 18.02.2018, at 15,25
- Romanian Constitution, http://www.cdep.ro, last accession la 18.02.2018, at 15,42
- ECtHR, Decision adopted on 06.12.2007, Appication no. 22088/04, case Bragadireanu vs. Romania, https://hudoc.echr.coe.int, last accession on 05.03.2018, at 22,37
- ECtHR, decision adopted on 1301.205, Application no. 41040/11, case Micu vs. Romania, https://jurisprudentacedo.com, last accession on 18.02.2018, at 16,46
- ECtHR, decision adopted on 18.10.2011, Application no. 38746/03, case Păvălache vs. Romania, http://www.hotararicedo.ro, last accession on 18.02.2018, at 16,53
- ECtHR, decision adopted on 6.09.2014, Application no. 51012/11, case Valerian Dragomir vs. Romania, www.csm1909.ro, last accession on 18.02.2018, at 17,03
- ECtHR, decision adopted on 24.07202, Application no. 35972/05, case Iacov Stanciu vs. Romania, http://hudoc.echr.coe.int., last accession on 18.02.2018, at 17,18
- ECtHR, decision adopted on 25.04.2017, Applications no. 61467/12, 39516/13, 48231/13 and 68191/13, case Rezmiveș and Others vs. Romania, https://hudoc.echr.coe.int, last accession on 03.03.2018, at 17,39
- Constitutional Court of Romania, decision no. 1/08.02.1994, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 69/16.03.1994;
- Constitutional Court of Romania, decision no. 62/21.10.1993, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 49/25.02.1994
- Constitutional Court of Romania, decision no. 366/25.06.2014, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 644/02.09.2014
- Constitutional Court of Romania, decision no. 681/13.11.2014, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no.889/08.11.2014
- High Court of Cassation and Justice, decision no. 8/20.03.2006, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 475/01.06.2006
- Explanatory memorandum of Law no. 169/2017, http://www.cdep.ro, last accession on 06.03.2018, at 07,47
- Common Guidelines of the European Parliament, the Council and the Commission for those participating iin drafting EU legislation, http://eur-lex.europa.eu, last accession on 06.03.2018, at 07,57
- Law no. 135/2010, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 486/15.07.2010
- Law no. 254/2013 on the execution of punishment and detention measures ordered by judicial authorities during the criminal trial, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 514/14.08.2013
- Law no. 15/1968 on Romanian Criminal Code, published in Buletinul Oficial no. 79-79bis/21.06.1968
- Law no. 286/2009, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no.510/24.07.2009
- Hotca Mihai Adrian, Un bun început pentru respectarea hotărârii-pilot în cauza Rezmiveș și alții împotriva României – adoptarea Legii nr. 169/2017 privind modificarea și completarea Legii nr. 254/2013, https://juridice.ro, last accession on 06.03.2018, at 08,00
- Order of Minister of Justice no. 2773/17.10.2017, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 822/18.10.2017

[46] Press release no. 23362/SC/29.01.2018, available on http://anp.gov.ro, last accessed on 03.03.2018, at 16,19.

- Order of Minister of Justice no. 432/2010/05.02.2010 approving Instructions regarding the nominal and statistical number of persons deprived of liberty in custody of units subordinated to National Administration of Penitentiaries, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 157/11.03.2010
- Paşoi Ruxandra, Mihai Daniela, Hotărârea pilot în cauza Rezmiveș și alții împotriva României în materia condițiilor de detenție, https://juridice.ro, last accession 06.03.2018, at 08,01
- Regulation implementing Law no. 254/2013, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 271/11.04.2016
- Resolution Res (2004)3 of the Council of Ministers of the Council of Europe, adoped on 12.05.2004, http://www.echr.coe.int, last accession on 06.03.2018, at 08,20
- Press release no. 23362/SC/29.01.2018, http://anp.gov.ro, last accessed on 03.03.2018, at 16,19
- Criminal sentence no. 54/12.01.2018 pronounced by Judecătoria Sectorului 5 Bucureşti, final by criminal decision no. 206/23.02.2018 pronounced by Bucharest Tribunal – Ist Criminal Section, unpublished
- Criminal sentence no. 2616/19.09.2017 pronounced by Judecătoria Sectorului 5 Bucureşti, final by non-contestation, unpublished
- Criminal sentence no. 2617/19.09.2017 pronounced by Judecătoria Sectorului 5 Bucureşti, final by non-contestation, unpublished
- Criminal sentence no. 2618/ 19.09.2017 pronounced by Judecătoria Sectorului 5 Bucureşti, final by non-contestation, unpublished
- Criminal sentence no. 2619/19.09.2017 pronounced by Judecătoria Sectorului 5 Bucureşti, final by non-contestation, unpublished
- Criminal sentence no. 88/16.01.2018 pronounced by Judecătoria Sectorului 5 Bucureşti, final by criminal decision no. 167/15.02.2018 pronounced by Bucharest Tribunal – Ist Criminal Section, unpublished
- Criminal sentence no. 3032/17.11.2017 pronounced by Judecătoria Sectorului 5 Bucureşti, final by criminal decision no. 205/23.02.2018 pronounced by Bucharest Tribunal– Ist Criminal Section, unpublished
- Civil sentence no. 6538/26.09.2016 pronounced by Judecătoria Sectorului 5 Bucureşti, final by civil decision no. 2837/15.09.2017 pronounced by Bucharest Tribunal – IVth Civil Section, unpublished
- Civil sentence no. 521/21.01.2016 pronounced by Judecătoria Sectorului 4 Bucureşti, final by civil decision no. 3281/12.09.2016 pronounced by Bucharest Tribunal – Vth Civil Section, unpublished
- Criminal sentence no. 306/08.02.2018 pronounced by Judecătoria Sectorului 5 Bucureşti, final by criminal decision no. 238/05.03.2018 pronounced by Bucharest Tribunal– Ist Criminal Section, unpublished
- Criminal sentence no. 2622/29.12.2017 pronounced by Bucharest Tribunal – Ist Criminal Section, final by non-contestation, unpublished

THE OBSERVANCE OF FUNDAMENTAL HUMAN RIGHTS. THE DEATH PENALTY AND CORPORAL PUNISHMENTS. THE PROHIBITION OF TORTURE AND INHUMAN OR DEGRADING PUNISHMENTS

Dorian CHIRIȚĂ*

Abstract

Corporal punishments by and large and death penalty specifically raise serious problems as to respecting human dignity and the fundamental human rights. The supreme courts of the UN member states quasi-unanimously consider that the death penalty infringes on the absolute ban of torturing, inhuman or degrading treatments due to the pain and psychological suffering they cause to the sentenced people who may wait for years in a row or even decades, more often than not in isolation and in an uncertain legal situation. Human rights represent a concept that develops rapidly, and most bodies for monitoring the international and regional treaties apply a dynamic interpretation of the law on treaties concerning the human rights. From the historical point of view, the protection standard granted by the absolute prohibition of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading punishments is the result of a progressive and dynamic interpretation, according to the evolution of the society

This publication aims at describing the constantly evolving standards, according to which the death penalty or the corporal punishments, largely accepted decades ago, have become the contemporary equivalent of torture or inhuman or degrading treatment. Thus, they anticipate the establishment of international norms that would absolutely forbid the use of such punishments.

Keywords: Fundamental rights of convicted persons, limitation on the right to life and bodily integrity, prohibition of torture, inhuman or degrading punishments, death penalty, corporal punishments, standards and evolution of the international and regional jurisdictional bodies' case law.

Introduction

Even nowadays death penalty and corporal punishments represent global phenomena, and few countries succeeded in completely eliminating them, while many others scored significant success against such practices. At the same time, we must notice that there are many states that consider that they should be maintained, by invoking various reasons (such as combating terrorism, extremely unstable political climate or exceptional situations such as war) so as not to eradicate or at least reduce them.

Thus, we must observe that the death penalty is still in force in some states, while corporal punishments are applied in many others, being justified by the enforcement of judicial sanctions, and most victims aren't political prisoners or terrorists, but regular persons, belonging to vulnerable groups, suspected of committing common law offences, such as women, children, disabled persons or persons with a sexual orientation that is forbidden by the dominant religious concepts.

This work aims at making a contribution through a comparative and punctual approach to the evolution of international standards regulating the death penalty and the corporal punishments, as well as the compatibility of such standards with the states' obligation to comply with the unconditional ban on torture and ill-treatment.

Furthermore, this presentation completes the existing specialized literature by means of a critical approach to the evolution of the international case law bodies in the matter of capital punishment, at the same time describing the mismatches and inconsistencies of the approaches related to capital punishment and corporal punishments.

Last but not least, the present study also contains a comparative law presentation but also a historical presentation of the regional and international standards and values in the field, explicitly outlining the qualitative leap of the protection provided in the European system, both within the European Union and the Council of Europe.

Paper content

Death penalty represents the only exemption from the fundamental right to life, inherent to any human being, set forth by art. 2 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights[1] and art. 6 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights[2], provisions that imposed to all signatory states to protect this right by law. Although they did not force the states to abolish death penalty, the two documents restrict the rights of the states to enforce death penalty, by establishing that a death sentence can only be ruled for the most severe crimes, according to the laws in force at the time the crime was committed and such laws should not be in conflict with the provisions of the Covenant or with the ones of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide.

* PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Judge (e-mail: dorian.chirita@yahoo.com)

[1] Adopted by the UN General Assembly on 10 September 1948

[2] Adopted and opened for signing by the UN General Assembly on 16 December 1966. Entered into force on 23 March 1976, according to art. 49, for all provisions except for the ones at art. 41, and on 28 March for the provisions of art. 41. Romania ratified the Covenant on 31 October 1974 by Decree no. 212, published in the "Official Journal of Romania", part I, no. 146 dated 20 November 1974.

Four of the six paragraphs of article 6 of the Covenant, referring to the right to life, regulate the conditions related to the imposition of the capital punishment, establishing that such punishment may be executed only based on a final order of a competent court, pronounced according to the minimum guarantees of a fair trial and in accordance with the other provisions of the Covenant; it may only be applied for the most serious crimes. In accordance with the principle of humanity, a death sentence may not be pronounced for crimes committed by persons under the age of 18 and may not be executed against pregnant women. Distinct from the right to life and correlative with such right, it is expressly regulated that the persons sentenced to death have the right to require the pardoning or the commutation of the sentence, and it is set forth that the amnesty, pardon or commutation of death sentence may be granted in all cases. In addition, article 6 - paragraphs (2) and (6) - clearly express the message that the Covenant promotes the abolition of death penalty and that the abolitionist party states undertake not to reinstate it.

Article 4 of the American Convention on Human Rights, a regional document inspired by and based on the Covenant, develops a higher protection system, expressly establishing a ban for the abolitionist states to reinstate the death penalty in their internal legislation, it forbids its enforcement for political offences or related common offences, but also the application of such sanction to the persons who, at the date when the offence was committed, were over 70 years of age.

The Convention on Children's Rights[3], in article 37 (a), requests the party states to make sure that no capital punishment will be imposed for the crimes committed by persons under 18 years of age.

Despite the global tendency to abolish death penalty, its application and execution do not represent an actual infringement of the right to life if carried out according to the severe restrictions and guarantees provided by the international regulations and by the internal regulations in compliance with the international ones. At the same time, the above-mentioned international documents forbid in absolute terms the torture and the cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, as set forth by article 7 of the Covenant and art. 1 and 16 of the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment[4], art. 3 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms[5], art. 2 of the American Convention on Human Rights and art. 4 of African Charter of Human and Peoples' Rights.

It had been constantly accepted in the doctrine and case law that the provisions of art. 6 of the Covenant and the ones of art. 1 of the din Convention against Torture should be interpreted in the sense that the death penalty may not be considered in itself a breach of the ban on torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment. However, as underlined by UN Special Rapporteur in its 2009 report on death penalty[6], in what concerns the judicial bodies, such interpretation may change in time, just as it happened to the corporal punishments. Human rights represent a concept that develops rapidly, and most bodies for monitoring the international and regional treaties apply a dynamic interpretation of the law on treaties concerning the human rights.

From the historical point of view, the protection standard granted by the absolute prohibition of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading punishments is the result of a progressive and dynamic interpretation, according to the evolution of the society. As for the corporal punishments, they can be compared to the death penalty in the sense that, beyond the physical pain and the suffering that they cause, they have come to be considered a direct attack upon the dignity of the individual and, consequently, they are forbidden by the international law.

Thus, in 1950, at the time of the ECHR adoption, the corporal punishments were widely accepted in European societies, mainly as a family punishment and as a disciplinary punishment in schools, prisons, military institutions, etc., and they were not considered cruel, inhuman or degrading punishments in most European countries. However, this attitude changed significantly in the 1960's and 1970's, reaching a peak when the European Court of Human Rights pronounced its judgment in the case Tyrer v. United Kingdom[7], which stated, in a dynamic interpretation of art. 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights, that giving three strokes of birch rod to a student, a traditional punishment on the Isle of Man, was no longer compatible with a modern in interpretation of the human rights in Europe.

Referring to the European Convention as to a "living instrument" that must be interpreted in the light

[3] Adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations on 20 November 1989. So far, the Convention has been adopted by 194 countries that are members of the United Nations (except USA and Somalia);

[4] Adopted and opened for signing by United Nations General Assembly, by Resolution 39/46 dated 10 December 1984. It entered into force on 26 June 1987 according to the provisions of art. 27(1).

Romania joined the Convention on 9 October 1990 by means of Law no. 19, published in the "Official Journal of Romania ", part I, no. 112 dated 10 October 1990.

[5] Fundamental document of the protection system set up at European Council level. It is effective as from 3 September 1953, and Romania became a party by its ratification on 20 June 1994.

[6] A/HRC/10/44

[7] Judgment dated 25 April 1978 in the case Tyrer v. Great Britain, Series A.26, par. 31

of the present conditions, the Court considered that the corporal punishment is degrading. After only four years, the Human Rights Committee, in its general comment on the prohibition of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of punishment, expressed a unanimous opinion that the prohibition from article 7 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights should also be extended to corporal punishments, including the excessive punishments as educational or disciplinary measures (paragraph 2). In 2000, the Human Rights Committee came to the same conclusion in the case Osbourne v. Jamaica, referring to the execution of a criminal punishment applied by a court, consisting in giving 10 strokes of tamarind switch across the buttocks in the presence of 25 prison warders. By unanimous decision[8], the Committee stated that, irrespective of the nature of the crime that must be punished, no matter how brutal such crime is, the corporal punishment represents a cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment, opposed to article 7 of the Covenant. This constant case law of the European Court of Human Rights and of the Human Rights Committee was also confirmed by the case law of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights[9], the one of the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights and of national courts, as well as by the practice of other monitoring bodies, including the Committee against Torture and by the Special Rapporteur on torture.

In March 2005, in the case Winston Caesar v. Trinidad and Tobago, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights condemned for the first time the application of corporal punishments as judicial sanction[10]. The Court unanimously stated that the punishment of the prisoner by whipping is, by its very nature, purpose and consequences, incompatible with the standards set forth by articles 5.1 and 5.2 of the American Convention on Human Rights ". The Court considered that the very nature of this punishment reflects an establishment of violence which, even though permitted by law, ordered by the state judges and applied by the penitentiary authorities, represents a sanction that is incompatible with the Convention. As such, the corporal punishment by whipping was considered a form of torture and, consequently, represents a breach of any individual's right to physical and mental integrity.

However, in several states, the corporal punishment is still permitted as judicial sanction in the criminal law or as disciplinary sanction of prisoners, in schools or in the army. In other countries, the corporal punishment is neither explicitly authorized, nor forbidden by law, which means that it is largely applied in practice. What is common for all forms of corporal punishments is that the physical force is intentionally used against the person in order to cause a significant level of pain. In addition, without any exception, the corporal punishment has a degrading and humiliating element, therefore all forms of corporal punishments should be considered to represent cruel, inhuman or degrading punishments that infringe the international law of human rights.

Although only a very limited number of states currently support the legality of such forms of judicial sanctions, they continue to be applied even nowadays, despite the incredible cruelty of some of the reported punishments, such as amputation of right hand, giving 5000 whip strokes, many of them being applied in order to repress sexuality-related acts, such as "non-Islamic sexual activities" "illicit relationships" or adultery[11]. Adultery is also the most common infringement in the cases when the individuals are sentenced to death by stoning.

The Criminal Code of Iran sets forth the following: a woman sentenced to death by stoning must be buried up to a line above her breasts (article 102 of the Criminal Code), before being hit with stones that shall not be so big as to kill the person by one or two strikes, neither shall it be so small that they cannot be called a stone (article 104 of the Criminal Code). Other corporal punishments provided for by Sharia law include public whipping and they are applicable in case of alcohol consumption, intimacy of unmarried couples or gambling. Such infringements are usually judged in public trials where the audience may shout at the defendant, making the reasonable doubt devoid of any content. In addition, the execution of the punishments is carried out in public, being often televised.

Moreover, the Criminal Code of Aceh (a province in Indonesia) enforces extremely discriminatory sanctions for women: apart from public whipping, the punishments include cutting woman's dress in public and forced cutting of the hair, which represent inhuman and degrading treatments. The fact that these punishments are carried out in public generates stigmatizations and social sanctions that are well beyond the punishment execution, the women condemned to such public punishments being labelled as immoral by their husbands, families and communities, this leading to social exclusion which also represents an inhuman and degrading treatment. In general, as shown in the report prepared by the UN Special Rapporteur, more often than not the women are the ones found guilty of adultery and of other related crimes and are subject to corporal punishments, including death penalty, which is incompatible with the prohibition of discrimination based on gender, established in all main instruments concerning human rights, including the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women[12].

[8] Decision dated 15 March 2000 in the case Osborne v. Jamaica, no. 759/1997, para. 3.3
[9] Decision dated 11 March 2005 in the case Winston Caesar v. Trinidad and Tobago, Series C no. 123
[10] Idem
[11] E/CN.4/2006/6/Add.1, para. 398
[12] A/HRC/7/3, para. 40

As for the corporal punishment as judicial sanction, the following specifications need to be brought to attention, in the light of the many similarities with the capital punishment. In the stage of preparatory works of UN Convention against Torture, article 1 of the UN Declaration against Torture, dated 9 December 1975[13] and article 1 of this convention draft presented by Sweden[14] represented the starting point of the debates on defining torture, which took place within the work groups. Both provisions included a clause concerning the so-called legal sanctions, which were exempted from the definition of torture, specifying that it "does not include the pain or the suffering inherently resulting from the imposition of the legal sanctions, in so far as they are in compliance with the standard established by the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners[15]" and mainly by art. 31 of these rules that sets forth that "the corporal punishment, the punishment by incarceration in a dark cell and all cruel, inhuman or degrading punishments shall be completely forbidden as sanctions for disciplinary offences".

In the end, the referral to the minimum rules was removed from article 1 of CAT due to the fact that certain governments did not want to include in a treaty of mandatory nature a referral to a legal instrument without mandatory nature. When such governments realized that the removal of the referral to the Minimum Rules will eliminate a series of severe forms of corporal punishments from the torture prohibition scope, they tried to replace it with another referral to the mandatory international standards. For example, the United States proposed that the legal sanctions "that fragrantly break the accepted international standards" should not be permitted.

Under such conditions, until the drafting of the final form of the CAT Convention, no agreement has been reached concerning the defining of these "accepted international standards", many governments trying, without success, to completely eliminate the clause of legal sanctions. On the contrary, others insisted in their comments in writing that the term "legal sanctions" must be interpreted as referring to both the domestic law and the international law.

In an extreme interpretation, supported by certain Islamic states, it is considered that any sanction imposed under the national legislation, the criminal law, including the corporal punishment, is covered by the clause concerning the legal sanctions. Such interpretation is opposed to the international law on human rights, as unanimously stated in the above-mentioned case law of the Human Rights Committee, in relation to article 7, that decided that any form of corporal punishment represents an infringement of the international law and it would lead to the absurd conclusion that, by adopting in 1984 the CAT Convention, whose well-determined aim and purpose was the one of consolidating the already existing obligations of the states to prevent and punish torture, led to an actual diminution of the international standard. Consequently, such interpretation is obviously incompatible with the object and purpose of the convention and, therefore, it may not be admitted in the light of article 31 of the Vienna Convention on the law of treaties. In addition, the clause from article 1 paragraph 2 of CAT Convention prevents such an interpretation.

The evolution of the regulations of international law in the matter of corporal punishments continued with the adoption of the Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women in 1993, when the prohibition of such forms of sanctioning was also extended in the private sphere of the family, the states being imposed an obligation to adopt legislative and other measures in order to protect women against domestic violence, including the corporal punishments. Moreover, the positive obligation of the states to efficiently forbid and prevent the corporal punishment of children was confirmed by various monitoring bodies, including the Human Rights Committee and the European Committee of Social Rights.

In conclusion, in the light of the international law on human rights, any form of corporal punishment applied either as judicial or disciplinary or domestic sanction by state authorities or by private persons, including schools and parents, shall be considered cruel, inhuman or degrading, and it shall not be justified, even in exceptional situations, since the absolute and non-derogating prohibition of subjecting the human being to torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatments or punishments opposes.

Starting from this conclusion, the international bodies monitoring the respect for the human rights have the unanimous opinion that the same legal reasoning should also be applied to the death penalty, since it only represents an aggravated form of corporal punishment. By admitting that the amputation of the limbs is a cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment, in his report referring to torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment[16], UN Special Rapporteur Manfred Nowak, was rhetorically asking himself how the beheading of a person could be differently judged, and he concluded that, according to the international law, the absolute prohibition of any form of corporal punishment cannot reconcile with hanging, electric chair, incineration or any other forms of execution of a death sentence, admitted under the same treaties.

The same author noticed that, surprisingly, the case law of the international bodies for monitoring the human rights is much less clear in terms of death penalty than in terms of corporal punishment.

---

[13] Resolution of UN General Assembly no. 3452 (XXX) dated 1975.

[14] E/CN.4/1285 par.

[15] "Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners", approved by UN Economic and Social Council by Resolutions no. 663C (XXIV) of 31 July 1957 and no. 2076 (LXII) of 13 May 1977

[16] A/HRC/10/44, par. 38

Even the European Court of Human Rights who had already stated in 1989 that the phenomenon of death corridors in Virginia was an inhuman or degrading punishment, never reached the conclusion that the death penalty infringes article 3 of the ECHR. The Human Rights Committee followed the systematic interpretation of the right to life and to individual integrity initially developed by the European Court, although it has become more and more obvious that there is an inconsistency between its approaches concerning the corporal and the capital punishments.

The execution methods vary very much among the states that continue to impose the death penalty. Within the last 50 years, several methods have been used in order to execute the condemned: beheading (Saudi Arabia), hanging (Bangladesh, Botswana, Egypt, Iran, Iraq, Japan, Malaysia, Pakistan, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Singapore and Sudan), lethal injection (China, United States of America), shooting (Afghanistan, Belarus, China, Indonesia, Iran, Mongolia and Vietnam), death by stoning (the Islamic Republic of Iran) and electrocution (the United States). There is a great dispute whether one or another method is unacceptably cruel, inhuman or degrading. For example, in an answer to the questionnaire sent to the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, the Arabian Libyan Jamahiriya reported that the execution by electrocution on electric chair, the lethal injection or the toxic gases are not acceptable under the domestic law.

Referring to the different execution methods that may be considered cruel, inhuman or degrading punishments, the case law discrepancies also stand out. Although it is unanimously admitted that certain methods, such as stoning, that intentionally extend the pain and the suffering of the convict, represent cruel, inhuman or degrading punishments, the opinions considerably differ in terms of "human" executions. In the controversial decision for Kindler v. Canada[17], the majority of the Human Rights Committee acknowledged in 1993 that the execution by lethal injection, as practiced in Pennsylvania, does not represent an inhuman punishment. United States Supreme Court reached a similar conclusion in 2008. On the other hand, in its opinion in the case Ng v. Canada from 1993[18], the majority of the Human Rights Committee found that the execution by asphyxiation with gas, as practiced so far in California, represented a cruel and inhuman treatment and, consequently, Canada broke article 7 of the Covenant by extradition of the plaintiff to the United States.

In Staselovich v. Belarus, The Committee considered that the execution by a burning team was in compliance with article 7 of the Covenant, but, at the same time, it considered that authorities' failure to notify the mother about the date established for the execution of her son and about the place of its grave represented an inhuman treatment of the mother.

In the cause ÖCALAN v. Turkey[19], the European Court of Human Rights analysed the conventional case law in terms of capital punishment.

Abdullah Öcalan is a Turkish citizen that executes a life sentence in a Turkish prison. He complained about the imposition and/or execution of the death penalty in his case. Before being arrested, the plaintiff was a leader of PKK (Workers' Party of Kurdistan, an illegal organization). After having been detained in Kenya under contested circumstances, in the evening of 15 February 1999, he was brought to Turkey where he was sentenced to death in June 1999 for acts meant to lead to the separation of the Turkish territory. Following the abolition of death penalty in August 2002, in time of peace in Turkey, the State Security Court from Ankara commuted the death sentence decided for the plaintiff into life prison in October 2002.

The Court determined that there were no infringements of art. 2 (right to life), art. 3 (prohibition of inhuman or degrading treatment) or art. 14 (prohibition of discrimination) of the Convention, since the death penalty was abolished and the plaintiff's sentence was commuted to life prison. The Court acknowledged that the death penalty in time of peace came to be considered in Europe an inacceptable punishment form which was no longer allowed under article 2 of the Convention. However, no firm conclusion was reached whether the states that are parties if the Convention established a practice for considering the execution of death penalty an inhuman or degrading treatment, opposite to article 3 of the Convention.

Within the last 10 years there have been important international evolutions in terms of death penalty, within inter-governmental organizations, within international courts and human rights monitoring bodies. The most significant evolution was probably the adoption of the resolutions of the UN General Assembly in 2007 and 2008, by which a moratorium concerning the death penalty was requested.

The Assembly debate concerning the issues related to death penalty at the end of the 1960's had led to the adoption in 1968 of an initial resolution (no. 2393 (XXIII)), that actually determined the preparation of the first five-year report on death penalty.

In paragraph 1 of Resolution 32/61 from 8 December 1977, the Assembly stated that the main target pursued in the field of death penalty was the one of the progressive restriction of the number of crimes for which death penalty could be imposed, in order to completely eliminate this punishment. However, many years passed until there were new attempts to approach the issues related to death penalty in the Assembly.

[17] Human Rights Committee, Decision dated 30 July 1993, no. 470/1991, para. 15.1.
[18] Decision dated 5 November 1993 in the case Ng v. Canada, no. 469/1991, par. 16.4.
[19] No. 46221/99 Decision of the Great Chamber dated 12 May 2005

In November 2007, an interregional group of member states presented in the General Assembly a resolution draft by which a moratorium on death penalty is requested. On 18 December 2007, the Assembly Resolution 62/149, entitled "Moratorium on the use of the death penalty" was adopted.

Following the adoption of the resolution, on the 11th of January 2008, the representatives of 58 permanent missions within United Nations Organizations addressed a Note Verbal to the Secretary-General in order to express their wish "to emphasize that they have persistent objections against any attempt to impose a moratorium on the use of the death penalty or on the abolition of such penalty by infringement of the existing provisions in compliance with the international law".

On 21 April 2004, the eighth annual resolution on death penalty was adopted by the Human Rights Commission.

By Resolution no. 2004/67, the Commission requested the states that had still maintained the death penalty to completely eliminate it and, meanwhile, to establish a moratorium on the executions and urged these states not to enforce the death sentence for the crimes committed by persons under the age of 18 or by the ones suffering of mental illnesses.

In Resolution 2005/59, entitled "Death Penalty Issue", The Human Rights Commission reiterated the content of the previous resolutions, but it asserted at the same time the right of each person to life and declared that the abolition of the death penalty is essential in order to protect this right. In the same resolution, the Commission reproved the use of death penalty based on the legislation, discriminatory policies or practices, as well as the disproportionate use of such penalty against the persons belonging to national or ethnical, religious or linguistic minorities, and requested that the states should not impose mandatory death sentences under the internal criminal legislation.

Human Rights Commission was replaced in 2006 by the Human Rights Council. The Council took the responsibility for the reports and studies on the mechanisms and mandates taken over from the Commission.

At European level, the death penalty was eliminated from all 27 Member States of the European Union. The Charter of Fundamental Rights prohibits the death penalty, as well as the extradition to a state where such penalty may be imposed.

The Charter is included in the Lisbon Treaty that entered into force on 1 December 2009. The activity of the European Union concerning the death penalty is carried out according to the "Guidelines on EU Policy towards Third Countries on Death Penalty" adopted on 29 June 1998 according to an EU declaration in the Amsterdam Treaty, dated 2 October 1997. They were revised and updated by the Council of European Union in 2008, and in the future they will be revised every three years. The Guidelines include a list of "minimum standards" that are to be used for the auditing of the third countries that still maintain the death penalty. At a certain extent, these minimum standards exceed the ones contained in the Safeguards of the United Nations.

For example, the Guidelines of the European Union declare that "death penalty should not be imposed for non-violent financial crimes or non-violent religious practices or expressions of conscience". In 2008, the following words were added: "and for sexual relations between consenting adults, as well as no mandatory sentence".

Within the latest years, the European Union has issued over 80 initiatives to third countries or territories, at the same time offering substantial financing to the non-governmental organizations in their efforts to promote the abolition of death penalty in the entire world. As part of the budget of 100 million euro of the European Initiative for Democracy and Human Rights, the European Commission supported projects meant to reduce the use of death penalty, e.g. by publishing the inefficiency of the death penalty as a mechanism for reducing criminality.

In the last years, there have been four new ratifications or accessions to Protocol no. 6 to the European Convention on Human Rights, which repeal the death penalty, except for time of war or of imminent threat of war: the ones in Monaco, Montenegro, Romania and Serbia. At the end of 2008, all 47 members of the European Council, except for the Russian Federation, were parties of the protocol. The Russian Federation signed the Protocol in 1997.

Protocol no. 13 to the European Convention on Human Rights that totally repeals the death penalty, including in times of war, was adopted on 3 May 2002.

Based on article 6 of the Treaty on European Union, the respect for human rights and fundamental liberties represents one of the common principles of the member states. Therefore, the Community decided in 1995 to consider that the respect for human rights and fundamental liberties is an essential element of its relationships with third countries. In this respect, it was decided that a clause should be included in any new commercial agreement of general nature for cooperation and association that the Community concludes with the third countries.

Article 2 paragraph (2) of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union[20] stipulates that no person may be sentenced to death or executed. On 29 June 1998, the Council approved "the Guidelines to European Union Policy towards Third Countries on Death Penalty" and decided that European Union shall make efforts in order to globally abolish the capital punishment.

Article 4 of the Charter provides that no person may be subjected to torture or inhuman or degrading treatment and punishment. On 9 April 2001, the Council approved "the Guidelines to the European Union Policy towards Third Countries on Torture and Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment". These guidelines refer to the adoption in 1998 of the European Union Code of Conduct on arms export and other current activities, having the purpose of introducing a control of the exports of paramilitary equipment at the European Union level, as examples of measures aiming at efficiently contributing to the prevention of torture and of other cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment or treatment within the common foreign and common security policy. These guidelines also stipulate that third parties must be obliged to prevent the use and production, as well as the trade of equipment designed for torture and for other cruel, inhuman or degrading punishments or treatments and to prevent the abusive use of any other equipment for this purpose. Besides, they indicate that the prohibition of the cruel, inhuman and degrading punishments requires clear limits for resorting to the death penalty. That is why, according to these texts, the death penalty is under no circumstances considered a legitimate sanction.

[20] OJ C 364, 18.12.2000, p. 1.

In its resolution on torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, adopted on 25 April 2001 and supported by the European Union member states, the Human Rights Commission of the United Nations invited UN members to take proper measures, especially legislative measures, in order to prevent and prohibit, among others, the expert of materials especially designed for torture of other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. This point was confirmed by the resolutions adopted on 16 April 2002, on 23 April 2003, on 19 April 2004 and on 19 April 2005.

On 3 October 2001, the European Parliament adopted the Resolution[21] concerning the second annual report of the Council, prepared by applying point 8 of the European Union Code of Conduct for arms export, requesting the Commission to act rapidly in order to propose an adequate community mechanism that forbids the promotion, trade and export of police and security equipment, the use of which is inherently cruel, inhuman or degrading, and to make sure that this community mechanism enables the suspension of the transfer of equipment with little known medical effect and of equipment with a practical use that proved to have a significant risk of abuse or unjustified wounding.

It was considered that it is necessary to establish community regulations concerning the trade with third country on goods likely to be used for imposing the death penalty, and on goods likely to be used in order to apply torture and other cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment or treatment. Taking into consideration that these regulations shall contribute to the furtherance of the respect for the life and the fundamental rights of the human beings and that they shall serve to protection of the ethical principle of the society, the European Parliament concluded that it is required to establish a system of guarantee that the community economical operations should not gain any profit from the trade that either encourages or otherwise facilitates the enforcement of policies on death penalty or torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, that are not compatible with the relevant guidelines of the European Union, with the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and with the international conventions and treaties.

In the light of these principles, EEC Regulation 1236/2005[22]of 27 June 2005 was adopted, which prohibits the export and import of equipment with no other practical use than for the purpose of capital punishment, or for the purpose of torture and other cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment. The guidelines of EU policy concerning torture and other cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment provides, among others, that the heads of missions in third countries should include in their periodical reports an analysis of the cases of torture and other cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment in the country for which they are accredited, as well as of the measures taken in order to combat them. The Regulation obliges the competent authorities in the member states to consider these reports and any similar reports prepared by the competent international organizations and by the civil society whenever taking decisions about the applications for authorizing exports, the measures thus provided being meant to prevent the use of the capital punishment, but also the torture and other cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment in third countries. Its rules contain restrictions on the trade with such countries, in relation to goods that may be used for the purpose of capital punishment, torture or other cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment. The European Parliament deemed it was not necessary to submit the operations inside the Community to similar controls, given that the capital punishment does not exist in the member states and that such states adopted adequate measures for preventing torture and the other cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment, their responsibility remaining the one of imposing and applying the required restrictions concerning the use and production of this equipment for the purpose of export to third countries, but also in order to provide technical assistance in relation to such equipment.

Conclusions

The purpose of applying a punishment is to re-educate, reintegrate the individual in the society, and not to physically liquidate that individual, as a final solution for removing him/her from the society, nor to affect the physical or mental integrity of the condemned person, by applying corporal punishments that cause the humiliation and eventually the dehumanization of such individual.

[21] OJ C 87 E, 11.4.2002, p. 136.
[22] OJ L 200/1, 2005

We must certainly maintain a just balance between the public interest of protecting the society members against various crimes, especially the most severe ones, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the private interest of the condemned person, forced to endure a capital punishment or corporal punishments.

The reasons invoked in order to legitimise the application of the death penalty and of the corporal punishments are varied, being different not only at regional level, but also from one state to another, or even inside the same state. Therefore, from the perspective of the civilisation level, many states still consider that death penalty or corporal punishments are not inadequate, and they believe that no eradicating measures should be adopted; in their opinion, such sanctions have a well-established role in maintaining the order of the society. On the contrary, other states, with a high level of economic development and with a high level of civilisation, consider that the capital punishment is necessary in certain cases, but the procedure applied for its execution must be efficient, and especially it should not violate the dignity of the respective person. The same states consider, based on a similar reasoning, but with completely opposite conclusions, that the corporal punishments violate the integrity and the dignity of the person, thus being incompatible with the respect for the fundamental rights of individual.

The present work extensively presents the interpretation manner of the absolute prohibition to subject a person to torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, from the perspective of the legality of violating the right to life, according to art. 2 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, but also to the evolution of the protection standard provided for by the Convention against Torture (CAT). The present work underlines that, despite the general obligation to respect the individual's right to physical and mental integrity, the imposition and execution of the death penalty is not considered in itself a treatment contrary to art. 1 of the Convention, while the case law of the international bodies for monitoring and controlling the respect for the human rights avoids raising this issue by applying the reasoning unanimously adopted in the matter of corporal punishments.

We consider that, distinctly from the legal and exceptional nature of the death penalty, such sanction cannot be seen but as an extreme form of corporal punishment that leads to the annihilation of the individual, and that, independently from the manner in which it is carried out, it inherently represents an inhuman or degrading treatment as it leads to the very annihilation of the human being. Therefore, the demarches of the international and regional bodies concerning the respect for the human rights must focus on the necessity to abolish this punishment, not on the necessity to define the "human" forms of execution, aiming not only at the elimination of the provisions contained in the national legislation, that provide for this form of punishment, but also at taking the required measures in order to prohibit the trade and technical assistance related to the equipment exclusively designed for the imposition of the capital punishment.

References

- Promotion and protection of all human rights, civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights, including the right to development - Report of the Special Rapporteur on torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, Manfred Nowak, UN Documents, A/HRC/10/44
- Report of the Special Rapporteur on torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment,Manfred Nowak - Study on the phenomena of torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in the world, including an assessment of conditions of detention, UN Documents, A/HRC/13/39/Add.5
- Civil and political rights, including the questions of torture and detention - Torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, Report of the Special Rapporteur, Manfred Nowak E/CN.4/2006/6/Add.1, 21 March 2006

THE WITNESS'S RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION. NATIONAL STANDARD

Ioan-Paul CHIȘ*

Abstract

This study is meant to reveal the legal solution in the Romanian system regarding the witness's right not to contribute to self-incrimination. Thus, as a translation of the principle nemo testis idoneus in re sua, the Romanian legislator stipulated the witness's right against self-incrimination under the privilege of not using his statements, in consideration of his locus standi, against him, regardless of the fact that he later on was given the status of a defendant for the same offence or whether he is a defendant in a different case, which is connected to the one where he is a witness. Likewise, the privilege of not using his statements against him, stipulated under these conditions in the criminal procedure law, seems to respond to the three difficult choices that the witness has, a premises for the necessity to formulate, on a jurisprudential bases, the witness's right to remain silent and the right against self-incrimination.

Keywords: right to remain silent, self-incrimination, nemo testis idoneus in re sua, national legal solution.

1. Legal framework.

According to the Reasoning of the project for the Law regarding the Criminal Procedure Code, it was explicitly regulated according to the European Court of Human Rights (the case Serves v. France), the privilege against self-incrimination, also in respect to the hearing of the witness.

In its initial form, the proposed legislation, the privilege against self-incrimination was marginally defined, under Article 118 Criminal Procedure Code, The right of the witnesses to avoid self-incrimination that is the witness's statement may not be used in a trial against him. Later on, Article 102 point 75, Law no. 255/2013 for the implementation of the criminal procedure law, the content of Article 118 suffered a series of changes, practically lacking utility, the text thus became the witness's statement given by a person who had the capacity as suspect or defendant before such testimony or subsequently acquired the capacity of suspect or defendant in the same case, may not be used against him. The legal authorities have the obligation to stipulate, when the declaration is written, the previous capacity of that person.

For a better understanding of the law-maker and of the elements that accounted for its legal acknowledgement, for the patrimony of the witness's rights, of the privilege against self-incrimination, we consider it necessary to highlight the relevant circumstances that the European Court took into consideration in the above-mentioned reasoning, respectively Serves v. France[1].

As to the facts, it was maintained that the applicant Paul Serves, a regular officer in the French army, that held the rank of captain, was in command of the first company of the 2nd Foreign Parachute Regiment ("2nd Para") and was based in the Central African Republic. On 11 April the applicant, holding information on poaching activities, he ordered an "unofficial" investigation mission in order to find and catch the poachers. For this purpose, he ordered that any poachers encountered during the missions should be intercepted, and, if they fled, should if necessary be fired on after a warning had been given. During one mission, one poacher was wounded in the leg and later killed by one of the subordinates of the applicant.

Regarding this incident, several investigations were carried on under the supervision of a prosecutor at the Paris Military Court who, on 20 May 1988, had been notified and presented the names of the soldiers involved, and the applicant was amongst them.

Thus, following this notification, the prosecutor charged the applicant with manslaughter, later a murder charge was substituted, and the applicant was detained.

Notes that the investigation was commenced without the opinion of the Minister of Defense or of the authority referred to the Code of Military Criminal Procedure, the Paris Court of Appeal upheld the orders in issue, the only documents held were the messages with the names of the persons involved in the incident that had been sent to the prosecutor.

Restarting the investigation, and after receiving the opinion of the Minister of Defense, showing that the facts seemed to be severe crimes and that a criminal investigation had to be carried on, the prosecutor charged two of the applicant's subordinates, and the applicant was summoned to appear as a witness. The hearing of the witness failed as he refused to oath and give evidence on the facts. Each time he was ordered to pay fines.

The applicant appealed against those orders and his argument in his pleadings was that the preliminary inquiry and the messages of 18 and 20 May 1988 on which his 1988 charge had been based remained effective, there was incriminating evidence against him such as enabled him to be charged, so that he could not be examined as a witness without his defense rights being infringed and a breach of Article 6 of the Convention and Article 105 of the Code of Criminal Procedure being committed.

* Assistant Professor, PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: chis.ioan@drept.unibuc.ro)

[1] CEDO, Serves v. France, 20225/92, 20 Oct. 1997, [www.hudoc.echr.coe.int].

The applicant was later charged for aiding and abetting murder and convicted to four years' imprisonment at first court.

For the reason that the applicant was summoned by the military authorities as a witness, regardless of the fact that there were evidence that he had been involved in the case, that he could have been considered as a defendant according to the autonomous sense of the convention, the European Court held that Article 6 paragraph 1 was applicable.

For these reasons, the European Court held that, the way he acted, the investigation judge placed the applicant in the position to choose either to refuse to take the oath and give evidence, thereby making himself liable to repeated fines, or should he convince the judge of the overwhelming nature of the case against him and thus, ultimately, admit guilt.

The Court reiterated that the right of any "person charged" to remain silent and the right against self-incrimination are generally recognized international standards which lie at the heart of the notion of a fair procedure under Article 6 of the Convention. Their rationale lies, inter alia, in protecting the "person charged" against improper compulsion by the authorities and thereby contributing to the avoidance of miscarriages of justice and to the fulfillment of the aims of Article 6. The right against self-incrimination, in particular, presupposes that the prosecution in a criminal case seeks to prove their case without resort to evidence obtained through methods of coercion or oppression in defiance of the will of the "person charged".

Resuming to national provisions, we also note the fact that according to Article 47 paragraph (5) of Law no. 24/2000 regarding the legislative technique norms for laws – wide-ranging laws, as it is the case of codes, the articles should have marginal definitions that express the synthetic object, but with no self-significance within the body of the provision.

Under these circumstances, we understand the witness's right against self-incrimination as the privilege stipulated by the law that no charge or unfavorable solution of the court should be based on the statements given as a witness before or after becoming an offender or defendant in the case.

2. The conventional standard.

Unlike other systems of fundamental rights protection[2], the European Convention does not explicitly provide the right to remain silent or the right not to contribute to self-incrimination. Nevertheless, jurisprudence, as a form of protection of the defendant against improper compulsion by the authorities, in order to avoid judicial errors and to the fulfillment of the objectives of Article 6[3], the European Court formulated the right of any "person charged" to remain silent and the right against self-incrimination[4]. The jurisprudential formulations were elaborated under the umbrella of the notion of the right to a fair trial under the Article 6 § 1, pointing, especially, the connection with the presumption of innocence stipulated by Article 6 § 2[5]. Though, the doctrine observed that recent jurisprudence seems to place the discussion towards the lack of equity of the procedure[6].

The concept of "criminal charge" or "the charge under the criminal law" has an autonomous meaning, according to the specific meaning of the European Convention, a solution which is imposed to ensure the object and the purpose of the convention[7], given the multitude of interpretations of these concepts under domestic law systems which might endanger the actual protection of the right in lack of a common standard, of consistency, imposed by Strasbourg Court.

Thus, a "charge" is "the official notification of an individual by the competent authority that he is suspected of committing a criminal offence", the definition corresponds to the test whether "the situation of the [suspect] has been substantially affected"[8].

The exam whether the charge was "criminal" is by taking the Engel test[9], which has as a starting point the classification of the offence under the domestic law, the second point is the nature of the offence, and the third refers to the severity of the penalty.

The first criterion is absolute or relative, depending on the way the offence is stipulated under the domestic law, whether it is a crime or, on the contrary, it is not stipulated at all, and it falls under other areas (e.g. the civil law, the administrative law, etc.). Therefore, the test ends when according to the domestic law, the offence is stipulated under the criminal law, the criteria from point two and three are no longer analyzed, but they are used when under the appropriate domestic system either the offence was no

---

[2] Art. 14 pct. 3/g of International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.
[3] CEDO, John Murray v. UK, 18731/91, 08 Feb. 1996, para. 45.
[4] CEDO, Funke v. France, 10828/84, 25 Feb. 1993, para. 44.
[5] CEDO, Saunders v. UK, 19187/91, 17 Feb. 1996, para. 68.
[6] J.F. Renucci, Tratat de drept european al drepturilor omului, Editura Hamangiu, Bucureşti, 2009, p. 517.
[7] CEDO, König v. Germany, 6232/73, 28 June 1978, para. 88.
[8] CEDO, Deweer v. Belgium, 6903/75, 27 Feb. 1980, para. 46.
[9] CEDO, Engel and others v. The Netherlands, 5100/71, 5101/71, 5102/71, 5370/72, 8 June 1976, para. 82.

longer considered a crime[10], or it has never been part of the criminal law and was stipulated under other areas. This approach, more substantial than formal, is nothing but the mirror of the guaranty of the rights in a real and effective manner, not in a theoretical and illusory one.

As according to the hypothesis of this study the offence is a crime according to the domestic law, which legitimates the criminal procedure where the parties of the trial are heard, we assess that it is no need to dwell upon this aspect.

Returning to the first element, respectively the hypothesis of a person who committed or took part in the commitment of a crime, we refer only to the situation when the party had not been granted the status of a charged person, with all the consequences deriving from, and he was invited by judicial authorities to testify as a witness.

This particular case, as the court itself noticed, places the person in the position of choosing one of three possibilities, all of them reaching the point of getting the person sanctioned or charged: either he does not make any statement and he would probably be fined, or he agrees to make statements, but he does not tell everything he knows about the case or he decides to distort the truth, and then he would probably be charged with false testimony, or he tells the whole truth and he places himself amongst the participants to the offence, as he confesses all the facts and circumstances[11].

To avoid such a judicial trap, the European Court emphasized that the subject of a crime has to acquire the quality of a defendant as soon as the judicial authorities have reasonable doubts that the person was involved in the commitment of the crime. His hearing as a witness is purely formal when the judicial authorities have consistent evidence proving he took part in the commitment of the crime[12].

As a first conclusion, we identify that the authorities have the negative obligation not to hear as a witness the person who is under the suspicion of participating or committing the crime, as the moment of turning him into a defendant does not lie in the hands of the judicial authorities. If such evidence does not appear in the case, the judicial authority has no reason to presume the person committed the crime, the criminal party is heard as a witness during the criminal trial, and the negative obligation of the judicial authority stays latent up to the moment when that person incriminates himself by the data and information he provides. As soon as the witness provides the incriminating elements, the judicial authority has to bring to his attention the right to remain silent and the right to an attorney, otherwise, it does not mean that the witness gave up his rights as he continues to make statements[13].

This is one of the two cases identified by the European Court as breaches of the right to remain silent and the privilege against self-incrimination, respectively the use of constraint in order to obtain information against the person who is invited to provide that information, the person who holds the status of a charged person according to the autonomous concept under Article 6 § 1. If the case has no elements leading to the conclusion that the witness had any implication, the European Court verifies whether the incriminating information was used in a subsequent criminal case[14].

3. The witness in the Romanian criminal trial.

During a criminal trail, the following persons can be heard: the suspect, the defendant, the injured party, the party who pays money to victim of a crime, the witnesses and the experts (art. 104). Any person can be heard as a witness, except for the parties [art. 115 paragraph. (1)]. A witness is also a person who suffered an injury from a criminal offence in case of an internally generated investigation, if the person states he does not wish to take part in the criminal trial [art. 81 paragraph (2)].

Hence, the witness is the natural person who is aware of any offence or circumstance that helps in finding the truth and who is invited by the judicial authorities to be heard about the knowledge he poses.

The doctrine underlined the social duty the witness has to help the judicial authorities to find the truth, and also the legal obligation that calls for the witness to come to the judicial authorities when invited and to tell the truth about the facts and the circumstances he knows, and not fulfilling this can bring along judicial constraints[15]. The law asks for the witness to be objective and to efficiently contribute to the finding of the truth because his status, outside the interests of the legal relationship, fully permits him to do so[16].

3.1. Domestic standard regarding the witness's rights and obligations.

During the criminal trial, the witness has the obligation to come in front of the judicial authorities when he is summoned, at the place, day and hour mentioned in the citation, the obligation to sworn testimony or to solemnly make statements, the obligation to tell the truth about the case [art. 114, paragraph (2)] and the obligation to write, in a five days

[10] CEDO, Öztürk v. Turkey, 8544/79, 21 Feb. 1984, para. 49.
[11] CEDO, Serves v. France, 20225/92, 20 Oct. 1997, para. 45.
[12] CEDO, Brusco v. France, 1466/07, 17 Oct. 2010, para. 47.
[13] CEDO, Stojkovic v. France and Belgium, 25303/08, 27 Oct. 2011, para. 54.
[14] CEDO, Weh v. Austria, 38544/97, 08 Apr. 2004, para. 41-43.
[15] Gr. Theodoru, Tratat de drept procesual penal, ed. a 2-a, Editura Hamangiu, București, 2008, p. 387.
[16] Trib. Suprem, secția penală, dec.nr. 1957/1979, in CD 1979, p. 441.

term, any change in the address to be cited [art. 120 paragraph (2) letter c)].

The witness has the right to protective measures and to get back the money paid during the trial [Article 120 paragraph (2) letter a)].

3.3. The right not to contribute to self-incrimination.

As a novelty, the new criminal procedure law introduced the right of the defendant against self-incrimination (Article 118), which is defined as the interdiction to use against himself the statement he made as a witness if, in the same case, before or after the statement he became a suspect or a defendant.

The meaning of the criminal procedure provision seems to be a real a criminal procedure aporia, thus the doctrine developed several possible opinions.

Thus, according to one opinion, the criminal procedure law does not regulate under the provisions of Article 118, or under any other provision, in terminis, a virtual right of the witness to remain silent or against self-incrimination. The new provision regulates in fact a right associated with the exclusion of evidence[17].

According to another opinion, the witness cannot raise the right to remain silent, as, in principle, the quality he has when heard, does not reveal the formulation of a criminal charge against him[18]. At the same time, it was noticed that the witness's right against self-incrimination is defined by the domestic law-maker as a negative procedural obligation of the judicial authority which cannot use the statement made by the witness against the same person who obtained the status a suspect or a defendant[19]. According to both opinions, obtaining the status of a charged person in the criminal trial does not lead, per se, to the exclusion of evidence as being unfaithfully or illegally taken.

We consider this last opinion to be just, the conclusion derives proprio motu by simply reading the incident texts, the statement made as a witness by a party on whom, at that time the judicial authority had no suspicion that he had been involved in the commitment of the crime as it was legally taken, but, due to the law, the authorities will not be able to use it against him.

In other words, the judicial authority will not be able to ground the solution on this evidence when the former witness is charged, as the use of this information is forbidden including as a test to confirm the other evidence taken in the case.

A contrario, the statement will have probative force for the benefit of the person who was a witness and then turned into a defendant and in the detriment of the other persons involved in the commitment of the crime.

Thus, the mere successive assignment of several status in the same case, especially at the beginning of the criminal investigation, cannot be considered as being, per se, an unfaithful procedural behaviour of the judicial authority, because the necessary elements for the preservation of all the aspects appear, due to the nature of things, during and at the end of the criminal investigation.

Coming back to the witness's right against self-incrimination, as it is stipulated under Article 118 Criminal Procedure Law, we notice a difference of content from the right to remain silent that the defendant has during the criminal case[20]. This is because the subject against whom there is no evidence showing he was involved in the commitment of the crime, has the obligation to respond when the judicial authorities invite him to testify as a witness, and the right to decline the invitation by claiming the right to remain silent is not accepted.

The same meaning was given also by the legal constitutional court; the judicial authorities have the liability to take all the available evidence in order to find the truth regarding the offence and the person who committed it, the witness's self-incriminating statements are, at the same time, the statements necessary to resolve the case, regarding another charged person[21].

The legislative solution of neutralizing the statement made against the charged witness shows that the defendant's right against self-incrimination is rescued, the subject who is heard as a witness shall not be asked to choose from one of the three above mentioned options that injure him, as the statement he made is never going to be unfavourable to him.

As a procedural remedy for the hypothesis of the judicial authority had sufficient incriminating data against the subject, the hearing of the person as a witness will be illegal, having as consequence the exclusion of the evidence from the criminal case and those deriving from it. Likewise, when the witness's statement brings self-incriminated evidence and the judicial authority does not immediately stop the hearing and does not warn the subject that he has the right to remain silent and the right to be assisted by an attorney, his statement shall be excluded as illegally taken.

4. Elements of comparative law.

In other legal systems, the problem is treated the same way and there is no breach in the procedural law

[17] T-V. Gheorghe, Audierea martorilor in N. Volonciu, A.S. Uzlău, Codul de procedură penală. Comentat, ed. a 3-a, revizuită și adăugită, Editura Hamangiu, 2017, p. 334; G.-D. Pop, Dreptul martorului de a nu se acuza, [www.juridice.ro] accessed on 15 Mar. 2018.

[18] M. Udroiu, Procedură penală. Partea generală, ed. 3, Editura C.H. Beck, București, 2016, p. 333.

[19] V. Constantinescu, Capitolul II. Audierea persoanelor in M. Udroiu, coord., Codul de procedură penală. Comentariu pe articole, ed. 2, Editura C.H. Beck, București, 2017, p. 575.

[20] A. Zarafiu, Drept procesual penal. Partea generală. Partea specială, ed. a 2-a, Editura CH Beck, București, 2015, p. 195.

[21] DCC nr. 519/2017, p. 16, [www.ccr.ro].

if the person who is supposed to have committed the crime is heard as a witness if the circumstances of the case did not bring sufficient solid clues of culpability[22]. In case there are clues of culpability that are not sufficient to state a criminal charge, the judicial authorities will hear the subject as an assisted witness (témoin assisté)[23].

Likewise, according to Article 63 Criminal Procedure Law of Italy, if a person is heard during the criminal case and, in case he is not under investigation, he makes statements that provide circumstances against him, the judicial authority shall stop the hearing and worn the person that his statements can trigger investigations against him, and invites him to bring a lawyer. The witness's statements are unusable if he makes them as a witness, when narcotic substances were found at his dwelling place, because this circumstance reveals sufficient elements of culpability to state a charge against him from the very beginning of the investigation[24].

Conclusions

As a conclusion, we consider that the solution of the Romanian law-maker caters to the conventional test, the privilege against self-incrimination outlined by the extreme solution of neutralization of the statement in the detriment of the charged-witness by safeguarding his rights, for the benefit of which the European Court developed and acknowledged the right to remain silent and the right to not contribute to self-incrimination.

References

- Beltrani, Sergio, coord., Codice di Procedura Penale, Giuffré Editore, Milano, 2016
- Code de procédure pénale, 54e édition, Editions Dalloz, 2013
- Culegere de Decizii ale Tribunalului Suprem pe anul 1979, Editura Științifică, 1980
- Pop, George-Dominic, Dreptul martorului de a nu se acuza, [www.juridice.ro]
- Renucci, Jean-François, Tratat de drept european al drepturilor omului, Editura Hamangiu, București, 2009
- Theodoru, Grigore, Tratat de drept procesual penal, ed. a 2-a, Editura Hamangiu, București, 2008
- Udroiu, Mihail, Procedură penală. Partea generală, ed. 3, Editura C.H. Beck, București, 2016
- Udroiu, Mihail, coord., Codul de procedură penală. Comentariu pe articole, ed. 2, Editura C.H. Beck, București, 2017
- Volonciu, Nicolae, Uzlău, Andreea-Simona, Codul de procedură penală. Comentat, ed. a 3-a, revizuită și adăugită, Editura Hamangiu, 2017
- Zarafiu, Andrei, Drept procesual penal. Partea generală. Partea specială, ed. a 2-a, Editura CH Beck, București, 2015

[22] Art. 105 French Criminal Procedure Code, Crim. 18 dec. 1963 în Code de procédure pénale, 54e édition, Editions Dalloz, 2013, p. 354.
[23] J. Pradel, Procédure pénale, 17e édition, Editions Cujas, Paris, 2013, p. 694.
[24] Cass. III, 24944/2015 in Sergio Beltrani coord., Codice di Procedura Penale, Giuffré Editore, Milano, 2016, p. 199.

THE VICTIM IN THE ROMANIAN CRIMINAL TRIAL

Mircea DAMASCHIN*

Abstract

When drafting the new Criminal Procedure Code (nRCPC), the Romanian legislator chose to reassign the procedural roles, that is to reduce the number of parties from four (the accused, the injured party, the civil party and the party with civil liability) to three (the defendant, the civil party and the party with civil liability). Thus, the person who has suffered physical, material or moral injury while the offense was being committed can no longer attend the criminal proceedings as a party, as he has the capacity of victim – a main procedural subject. Apparently, this change does not entail the reduction of the procedural rights. Thus, according to art 33. para.(2) nRCPC, the main procedural subjects have the same rights and obligations as do parties, except for those rights that the law grants to them exclusively. Nevertheless, as we will see, we will identify numerous procedural hypotheses in which the victim, stricto sensu, does not have the legal possibility to exercise certain procedural rights, accessible to other parties.

Keywords: victim, parties in criminal proceedings, main procedural subjects, equality of arms, new Romanian Criminal Procedure Code.

1. Introduction

When the new Romanian Criminal Procedure Code (nRCPC) entered into force on February 1, 2014, new roles were officially assigned to both the parties and the main subjects. Thus, for the very first time, the legislator defined the parties as the litigants who file judicial action or against whom judicial action is filed [art. 32 para. (1) RCPC]. Furthermore, the defendant, the civil party and the party with civil liability are included in the same category, whereas the victim ceased to be considered a party belonging to the criminal proceedings. This modification was completed by regulating a new category, namely 'main subjects', consisting of two participants, the suspect (the accused in the former Romanian Criminal Procedure Code) and the victim (the injured party in the former Romanian Criminal Procedure Code). In other words, we could see that in case the person injured while an offense was being committed intends to participate in criminal proceedings so that the perpetrator could be prosecuted, he will become 'a victim', no longer being a party.

Considering the provisions of art. 32 para. (1) (as the procedural subject are not statutorily defined), we could draw the conclusion, per a contrario, that the victim is not considered a party in the criminal proceedings as he neither files a judicial action (criminal or civil), nor is he a passive subject of a judicial action being filed. In our opinion, this reasoning is partially incorrect, as we will explain in this paper.

2. The relation between the victim and the judicial actions in criminal proceedings

As pointed out earlier, the reason why the legislator chose to confer the status of main subject on the person injured while the offense was being committed, at the expense the procedural status of party, is because it is impossible to establish a connection between this participant and the exercise of civil and criminal actions.

Regarding the civil action, the explanations are simple because the injured party cannot be an active or a passive subject of this action. Thus, it cannot be denied that the active subject of the civil action is the civil party and, in compliance with art. 19 para. (3) nRCPC, the prosecutor, while the procedural subject against which the civil action can be exercised is the defendant and, possibly, the party with civil liability. The person injured while the offense was being committed has the right to exercise a civil action, but, in this case, he becomes a civil party in criminal proceedings.

Regarding the relationship between the victim and the criminal action, it is obvious that he cannot be the passive subject when exercising the criminal action, as the only procedural party in this situation is the defendant.

It remains to be discussed whether the victim may participate in the exercise of criminal action. Undoubtedly, from the perspective of the legislator, the answer is negative, as criminal proceedings can be filed only by the state, through its servants. However, in our opinion, the solution to this problem is nuanced because the victim has a procedural regime (as provided in nRCPC, as well) which allows us to consider that this procedural subject can participate in the exercise of criminal action.

* Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: mirceadamaschin@univnt.ro).

But what does it mean to exercise criminal action?

There is no definition for 'the exercise of criminal action' in the criminal procedure law. If we closely examine the criminal procedure rules, the provisions included in art. 14 para. (3) nRCPC easily stand out: 'Criminal action can be exercised during the criminal proceedings, under the law.' [1] Therefore, the legislator prescribes a timeframe for the exercise of criminal action, without specifically indicating who may participate in exercising it.

In specialized literature[2], the exercise of criminal action was defined as 'bringing a criminal action in order to be able to hold the defendant criminally responsible,' which can be achieved by presenting the evidence in a criminal case, taking procedural measures, filing application forms, introducing exceptions etc. In a different form, but expressing essentially the same approach, criminal action may be exercised by performing activities and procedural acts in order to boost the criminal proceedings and thus lead to the effective realization of the objective of criminal action, i.e. holding the guilty ones criminally responsible.' [3].

It is easy to see that the exercise of criminal action is primarily an attribute of criminal investigation bodies, with particular reference to the prosecution. Thus, the prosecutor is the only party who could start the criminal action, participating, in this capacity, in exercising criminal action, which arises directly from art. 55 para. (3) c) nRCPC. Similarly, the provisions of art. 99 para. (1) nRCPC, according to which the burden of proof in criminal proceedings lies mainly with the prosecutor, further emphasizes this aspect.

Although there is no express regulation in this regard, criminal investigation authorities are clearly involved in the exercise of criminal action by means of the acts of disposition that they can issue (beginning in rem prosecution, expanding criminal investigation, change the legal classification etc.), by submitting evidence and by having the legal possibility to order detention of the suspect or the defendant. In our opinion, in a subsidiary way, the court may also exercise powers subsumed to the exercise of criminal action during the proceedings, referring to the possibility of submitting new evidence during the court proceedings or when resubmitting unchallenged evidence ex officio, according to art. 374 para. (8) nRCPC.

In this context, the next issue that needs to be clarified is whether the victim may participate in the exercise of criminal action. Having in mind the conceptualization of 'the exercise of criminal action', as discussed above, we consider that, indeed, the victim may exercise criminal action, together with the judicial bodies, in particular by activating the rights recognized by law in matters of evidence, and through a series of procedural acts that may result during the criminal proceedings.

In this sense, the victim has the right to propose submitting evidence by the prosecution, to raise claims, to draw conclusions and also the right to make any other claims related to the settlement of the criminal component of the case under article 81 para. (1) b) and c) nRCPC. More importantly, the victim can make a contribution to accomplishing the objective of criminal proceedings by certain procedural acts, such as the complaint against the order of ranking, followed by the judge's decision to start the trial in compliance with art. 341 para. (7) line 2) c) nRCPC, by lodging an appeal call or using extraordinary legal remedies under the law etc. The exercise of criminal action by the victim is even more obvious in cases where criminal proceedings are initiated and carried out, triggered by the prior complaint. In these cases, the victim must express his wish as this is essential when holding someone criminally responsible, not only for the start of the criminal proceedings (the initiation of criminal proceedings, respectively), but also for conditioning the exercise of criminal action by the absence of the order for the prior complaint withdrawal.

On the other hand, it is important to note that, in specialized literature, the victim is considered an active subject of the criminal action, together with the Public Ministry and the criminal investigation bodies, as they have the recognized right to perform procedural acts by means of which the defendant is held criminally responsible[4].

Based on these brief arguments, we consider that the victim may participate in the exercise of criminal action in criminal proceedings together with the prosecutor and the criminal investigation bodies, which invalidates the legislator's option to remove him from the category of parties.

Nevertheless, it is important to determine whether this change in assigning the roles to the parties in the criminal proceedings is likely to jeopardize the

[1] Obviously, it is necessary to consider a restrictive interpretation of the rule invoked because no matter the hypothesis one might have in mind, no criminal action can be exercised during the third phase of the criminal trial, the enforcement of criminal judgments, for the simple reason that once a final decision is taken, the criminal action is extinguished.

[2]. I. Neagu, M. Damaschin, Tratat de procedură penală. Partea generală (Criminal Procedure Treatise), Ed. Universul Juridic, București, 2014, p. 265; see also A. Crișu, Drept procesual penal. Partea generală (Criminal Procedure Law. The General Part), Ed. Hamagiu, București, 2016, p. 178.

[3]. N. Volonciu, Tratat de procedură penală. Partea generală (Criminal Procedure Treatise. The General Part), Ed. Paideia, București, s.a, p. 234.

[4]. Gr. Gr. Theodoru, Tratat de drept procesual penal (Criminal Procedure Law Treatise), ediția a 3-a, Ed. Hamangiu, București, 2013, p. 97; see also N. Volonciu, op. cit., pp. 235-236; I. Neagu, Tratat de procedură penală (Criminal Procedure Treatise), Ed. Pro, București, 1997, p. 168 (the author particularizes this possibility for the cases in which the victim's prior complaint is necessary); Gh. Mateuț, Tratat de procedură penală. Partea generală (Criminal Procedure Treatise. The General Part), vol. I, Ed. C.H. Beck, București, 2007, p. 539.

procedural interests of the person injured while the offense was being committed. Apparently, considering the provisions of art. 33 para. (2) nRCPC, according to which the procedural subjects have the same rights and obligations as the parties, except for those granted by law exclusively to them, including the victim in the category of the main procedural subjects does not change the procedural rules for this party. The provisions of art. 81 nRCPC, which provide for the victim's rights, basically regulated in the same way as the rights of the parties, lead us to the same conclusion.

However, as we shall see below, the new Romanian Criminal Procedure Code comprises many hypotheses in which the victim was omitted by the legislator from the category designating the parties that hold certain procedural rights. As follows, we present these situations (without claiming that we have identified all the cases), trying to determine whether the respective omission could cause infringement of the victim's procedural rights and interests. We would like to mention that had the victim been qualified as a party in the criminal proceedings, these cases would not have existed.

3. Cases in which the victim was wrongly excluded from exercising certain procedural rights

Disjoinder of a civil action. During the trial stage, due to reasons related to ensuring a reasonable timeframe for settling the criminal action, the court has the opportunity to order the disjoinder of the civil action. According to art. 26 para. (2) nRCPC, a disjoinder shall be ordered by the court ex officio or upon request by the prosecutor or the parties. In this first example, we consider that this could be explained as an omission done by the legislator[5], as there is no valid reason for which the victim could not seek separation of the two actions, especially if it is thought that settling them together would lead to delays in settling the criminal action.

Disjoinder of cases after joinder. The joinder of cases, procedural hypothesis leading to the prorogation of jurisdiction in criminal matters can be granted according to art. 45 para. (1) nRCPC, at the request of the prosecutor, the parties, the victim and ex officio. Although, in this case, the victim is granted the right to seek joinder, as far as the disjoinder of the cases after joinder is concerned, the situation is different. In this regard, according to art. 46 para. (2) nRCPC, disjoinder of a case shall be ordered by the court through a court resolution, ex officio or upon request by the prosecutor or the parties.

The conflict of jurisdiction occurs in the event that two or more courts mutually proceed to waiving their jurisdiction (negative conflict of jurisdiction) or admit their jurisdiction to hear the same case (positive conflict of jurisdiction). According to the procedure leading to the settlement of the positive conflict of jurisdiction, provided in art. 51 para. (3), the shared hierarchically superior court may also be seized by the court having acknowledged its jurisdiction last, by the prosecutor or by the parties. It also becomes apparent that the legislator omitted to regulate the right of the victim to seek the ascertaining of the existence of the jurisdiction conflict and its settlement.

The transfer procedure, a remedy for those cases which raised the question of the lack of impartiality of the court as a whole (a threat of a public order disturbance, respectively) occurs, considering the issues analyzed in this paper, when the victim is repeatedly ignored[6]. First, transferring the examination of a case could be sought, among other things, when the impartiality of judges of that court is impaired due to 'the capacity of parties'. The declarative interpretation of this statute should lead us to the conclusion that transferring the examination of a case may not be requested, if, for example, the court president is a close relative of the victim, his capacity not being described in the statute. Obviously, such an interpretation cannot be accepted, as otherwise the principle of equality of arms would be infringed.

The omissive regulation in respect of the victim also existed as far as the parties of the transfer application were concerned. Thus, in the initial form of art. 72 para. (1) nRCPC, transfer could be exclusively requested by the parties or by the prosecutor. Following the amendments made by the Romanian Government Emergency Ordinance no. 18/2016, the victim was included in the category designating the parties, having the right to file for case transfer.

The procedure regulating the settlement of the transfer application comprises other examples where the victim was not taken into consideration by the legislator. Thus, in order to prepare the examination of the application, the president of the hierarchically superior court shall take steps 'to inform the parties on the filing of a case transfer application'; 'parties may transmit memoranda and may come to court on the set hearing term for the application settlement'; if participating in the hearing, the High Court of Cassation and Justice or the Court of Appeals of competent jurisdiction 'shall give the floor to the party who filed the case transfer application, as well as to the other attending parties (...)'. We would like to point out to the fact that, when considering these hypothetical cases, 'parties' refer to subjects procedurally interested in settling the transfer application, therefore the victim is included as well. However, whatever the content of the regulation, it is obvious that the victim will fully participate in the transfer procedure, under the same conditions as the parties.

[5] Moreover, anticipating, for most cases that have been analysed, the common element which justifies the lack of regulation is represented by this 'omission' of the legislator.

[6] Nevertheless, we would like to mention that the victim can seek the transfer of the examination of the cause, as art. 72 para. (1) nRCPC was supplemented by the Romanian Government Emmergency Ordinance no. 18/2016.

Special rules regarding the hearing of persons. In accordance with art. 106 para. (2) nRCPC, a detained person may be heard at the detention facility through videoconference, in exceptional situations and if the judicial bodies decide that this does not harm the proper conducting of the trial or the rights and interests of the parties. Per a contrario, this type of hearing derogating from the rules of ordinary law could not be accessed in the event that one found out that the victim's interests were prejudiced (or, equally, the suspect's), as this is an interpretation which cannot be accepted.

The procedure for the approval of electronic surveillance. Home search and computer search. According to art. 140 para. (3) nRCPC, the application requesting approval of electronic surveillance shall be ruled on in chambers, on the same day, without 'summoning the parties'. Although it might follow that the suspect and the victim will be summoned, the interpretation of this statute is that this activity is performed confidentially, without the main procedural subjects and the parties taking part in the proceedings. In this case, the omission of the legislator may lead to granting additional rights to the victim, as compared to the parties in the trial, as this purpose was targeted when drafting the criminal procedure law, given the peculiarities of electronic surveillance.

Likewise, according to art. 158 para. (5) and art. 168 para. (4) nRCPC, applications requesting approval for conducting a home search or a computer search are ruled on in chambers, without 'summoning the parties'. To comply with identical reasoning, the findings made in reference to the procedure approving electronic surveillance apply in these hypotheses as well.

Appointment of the expert. In the procedure of appointing the legal expert, it is legally possible for the unofficial procedural subjects to get involved in conducting this evidentiary process. Thus, according to art. 173 para. (4) nRCPC, the parties and main procedural subjects have the right to require that an expert recommended by them, other than the one appointed by the judicial body, would participate in concluding an expert report. In this case, we notice that the victim has the opportunity to propose a so-called expert-party. Further on, however, the legislator regulates the expert's incompatibility hypotheses, laying down that one cannot appoint, as an expert 'recommended by the parties' in the given case, a person working in the same forensic medical institution, specialist institute or laboratory as the expert appointed by the management of the relevant institution upon request by judicial bodies. It is clearly an omission of the legislator, omission which is not found as a counter example, in the case referred to in art. 175 para. (4), according to which the expert may request clarifications from 'the parties and main procedural subjects' based on an approval from and under the terms established by the judicial bodies. In the same sense, we can mention the provisions of art. 177 para. (1) nRCPC, according to which, when ordering the conducting of an expert report, the criminal investigation bodies or the court set a term on which 'the parties, main trial subjects (…) are summoned'.

The non-unitary nature of the criminal procedural rules, in terms of omitting the mentioning of the victim, is also present in art. 178 para. (4) nRCPC, which states that the expert report includes in the introduction, among other pieces of evidence, 'the proof of having informed the parties', if they participated in the examination and gave explanations during this activity.

Letters rogatory. According to art. 200 nRCPC, in case a letter rogatory has been ordered by the court, 'the parties may ask questions before such court' and the questions will be submitted to the court performing the letter rogatory procedure. Similarly to the other hypotheses presented, it may result, per a contrario, that the victim would not have the right to ask questions that were to be submitted to court which enforces the procedural act by letter rogatory, a situation that of course cannot be accepted. Likewise, 'either party' (including the victim, as well) may request to be summoned in the enforcement of the letter rogatory.

Summoning procedure during court proceedings. While carrying out the summoning procedure, some irregularities may occur, which may end up in failing to accomplish the purpose of the procedure, namely ensuring the presence before the judicial body. These procedural incidents were provided for in art. 263 nRCPC. In this regard, according to para. (1), during the trial, irregularities in the summons procedure shall only be considered if the person who is missing at the date of summons raises such irregularity at the next hearing where they are present or legally summoned. This situation also belongs to the matter of evidence, as the provision could be enforced on the victim, as well. Similarly, the same extensive interpretation should be used with reference to art. 263 para. (2) according to which an irregularity in the summons procedure of 'a party' can be raised by the prosecutor, by 'the other parties' or ex officio only at the date where it occurred.

The procedure for correcting obvious material errors. According to art. 278 para. (2) in order to correct the obvious material errors of a procedural act, parties may be summoned to provide clarifications. In this case we are again in the situation of an obvious legislative omission, the victim being able to contribute to the correction of a material error, as far as that is covered by the respective procedural act.

The regime of absolute nullity. In this case, the omission of the legislator leads to some situations which are clearly discriminatory against the victim. According to art. 281 para. (1) f) nRCPC, always causing nullification is the infringement of rules concerning legal assistance by a counsel for the suspect or defendant, as well as of the other parties, when assistance is mandatory. In other words, the hypothetical cases in which the provisions relating to the mandatory legal assistance to the victim were infringed, the consequent penalty will be relative nullity, only if it is proved that the procedural error caused an infringement of the rights of the victim, which cannot otherwise be removed, but by nullifying the act.

We would like to point to the fact that there are legal hypotheses during the criminal proceedings in which legal assistance to the injured victim is mandatory. According to art. 93 para. (4) and (5) nRCPC, we have in our view those cases in which the victim lacks mental competence or has a limited mental competence or when the judicial body considers that he cannot prepare the defense on his own. For these cases, if legal assistance is not provided, the penalty would be relative nullity.

In this case as well, we hold the view that the provisions included in art. 281 para. (1) f) nRCPC should be extensively interpreted. Otherwise, not only the victim's right to defense would be violated, but also the equality of arms to the procedural rules of the suspect or defendant and, more importantly, to the procedural rules granted to the civil party and the party with civil liability.

4. Conclusions

The examples mentioned in this paper are not unique [the same approach should be taken in respect to the provisions of art. 369 para. (2) nRCPC, art. 381 para. (5) nRCPC, art. 377 para. (4) nRCPC, art. 412 para. (3) and (4) nRCPC etc.]. In our opinion, two main causes could explain the current situation, namely the inclusion of the victim in the category of main procedural subjects, though, as we have seen, being a party in criminal proceedings is perfectly justifiable in terms of the possibility of exercising criminal action, and the legislative shortcomings demonstrated during the drafting of the criminal procedure law.

Thus, referring to the first cause, if the legislator had chosen that the victim would attend the trial as a party, these regulatory differences included in this paper would not have existed, as the exercise of certain procedural rights would have been made available to 'the parties'.

Given that the victim will continue to be considered a main procedural subject, the criminal procedural regulation should be improved by adding references to this procedural subject, as well. In this case, the law takes a cumbersome form, comprising difficult wordings (e.g., in order to meet the requirements of the principle of equality of arms, art. 200 nRCPC should be rephrased as follows: 'when a letter rogatory is ordered by the court, the parties and the victim may ask questions before such court'). Therefore, the modification of the procedural framework with regard to the victim (in many cases, issues relevant to the suspect, as well) should be mandatory because the objective is to ensure a procedural regime characterized by the possibility to exercise the same procedural rights during criminal proceedings.

References

- Crișu, Anastasiu, Drept procesual penal. Partea general (Criminal Procedure Law. The General Part), Ed. Hamagiu, București, 2016
- Mateuț, Gheorghiță, Tratat de procedură penală. Partea generală (Criminal Procedure Treatise. The General Part), vol. I, Ed. C.H. Beck, București, 2007
- Neagu, Ion, Tratat de procedură penală (Criminal Procedure Treatise), Ed. Pro, București, 1997
- Neagu, Ion; Damaschin, Mircea, Tratat de procedură penală. Partea generală (Criminal Procedure Treatise. The General Part), Ed. Universul Juridic, București, 2014
- Th. Theodoru Gr. Grigore, Tratat de drept procesual penal (Criminal Procedure Law Treatise), ediția a 3-a, Ed. Hamangiu, București, 2013
- Volonciu, Nicolae, Tratat de procedură penală. Partea generală (Criminal Procedure Treatise. The General Part), Ed. Paideia, București, s.a

THE EUROPEAN INVESTIGATION ORDER IN CRIMINAL MATTERS - GROUNDS FOR NON-RECOGNITION OR NON-EXECUTION

Daniela DEDIU[*]

Abstract

The European Investigation Order (EIO) is the newest mechanism for judicial cooperation in criminal matters. This instrument was laid out in the Directive 2014/41/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 3 April 2014 and was transposed into the Romanian legislation through the most recent changes of the Law nr. 302/2004 concerning international judicial cooperation in criminal matters The main goal was the introduction of a single instrument for the gathering of evidence between EU Member States in cases with a cross-border dimension. Also, the European Investigation Order is the most recent application of the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions, which is, since the Tampere European Council the cornerstone of judicial cooperation in criminal matters within the Union. Starting with an analysis of the principle of mutual recognition, this paper presents the grounds for non-recognition or non-execution provided both by the Directive regarding the European Investigation Order and Romanian national legislation. Non-recognition and non-execution grounds of a European Investigation Order are either the classic reasons for the cooperation instruments (ne bis in idem principle), but are also noticed through elements of novelty as the ones based on respecting the fundamental rights, aspect that represents an important step in the cooperation matter and shows the ECJ jurisprudence tendency.

Keywords: European investigation order, principle of mutual recognition, judicial cooperation in criminal matters, mutual legal assistance.

1. Introduction

The European Investigation Order (EIO) is the newest cooperation mechanism in criminal matters between the EU Member States. Laid out in the Directive 2014/41/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 3 April 2014[1], (following – "EIO Directive"), the order was transposed into the Romanian legislation through the most recent changes of the Law nr. 302/2004 concerning international judicial cooperation in criminal matters[2] (following- "The Law"), its purpose being that of facilitating and speeding up the obtaining and transfer of evidences between member states, but also offering harmonized procedures for obtaining these. The order replaces both the classic procedures of cooperation set up by the Convention concerning judicial assistance in criminal matters between the EU Member States[3], but also the European Evidences Warrant[4]. The paper aims to analyse the non-recognition and non-execution grounds foreseen by the Romanian legislation, to identify the differences concerning their regulation into the EIO Directive, and also stating the reason for these, but also emphasizing the difficulties that can appear in a concrete applying when executing such an order.

2. Principle of mutual recognition - the cornerstone of judicial cooperation in criminal matters

By European Investigation Order we understand a judicial decision issued or validated by a judicial authority of a member state, in order to accomplish one or more investigation measures specific in another member state, in order to obtain evidences or transmitting the evidences that are already in the possession of the competent authority of the executing state[5]. The European Investigation Order can be issued for any investigation measure, with the exception of the setting up of a joint investigation team and of gathering evidence within such a team.

The fundament of the European Investigation Order is represented by the principle of mutual recognition and trust[6] that starting with the works of the Tampere Council in 1999, was confirmed as being the 'cornerstone of judicial cooperation in criminal matters'[7], having as purpose the removal of the cooperation difficulties linked to the differences of the [*] PhD Candidate, Legal Research Institute "Acad. Andrei Rădulescu" of the Romanian Academy (e-mail: dannyelle_dediu@yahoo.com).

[1] O.J. L130/1 of 1.5.2014.

[2] Republished in the Official Romanian Journal, Part I, nr. 377 from 31 May 2011, completed through Law nr. 236 from 5 December 2017, published in the Official Romanian Jurnal nr. 993 from 14 December 2017.

[3] Convention of 29 May 2000 on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters between the Member States of the EU, OJ, C 197/1 of 12.07.2000.

[4] Council Framework Decision2008/978/JHA of 18 December 2008 on the European evidence warrant for the purpose of obtaining objects, documents and data for use in proceedings in criminal matters, OJ, C 115/13 of 09.05.2008.

[5] Art. 268[1] alin. 2) let. a) from the Law.

[6] Art. 1 pct. 2) from EIO Directive.

[7] See Tampere Council Conclusions, Finland, 15-16 October 1999. The measure programme adopted with this occasion was published in the Official Journal of the European Communities nr. C 12 E from 15 January 2010.

legal systems between the member states[8]. According to this principle, a judicial sentence issued by a judicial authority of an EU Member State is acknowledged and/or executed by another member state, having the same value as a sentence emitted by the previous. In the same time, the mutual recognition implies the fact that a judicial sentence of a member state produces effects in all the member states without having to be subordinated to some extra conditions in accordance to the judicial order of the executing member state[9].

In the light of this principle, a European Investigation Order issued in one of the EU Member States has to be acknowledged and executed by the judicial authorities from the other member states in concordance with the foresights of the Directive, so that the result is obtaining the evidence in order to use them in criminal trials.

3. Grounds for non-recognition or non-execution

However, the mutual recognition is not absolute, the Directive stipulating refusal grounds for executing the European Investigation Orders specific to all the cooperation instruments. In this case, the non-recognition and non-execution grounds can be included into three categories: explicit and general reasons, regulated by the 11th article from the Directive, taken in the article 268^8 from the national law; recurring to alternative investigation measures (art. 10 from the Directive and art. 268^7 from the law); reasons that make the execution impossible, for example the case of a videoconference hearing without the consent of the suspect(art. 24 pt. 2 from the Directive and 268^{18} from the law).

By the present paper, we will analyse only the general non-recognition and non-execution reasons (applicable to all measure categories requested through the European Investigation Orders) and explicitly regulated in the art. 268^8 from the Law and art. 11 from the Directive.

3.1. Immunities and privileges, the principle of speciality and the freedom of the press

The article 2688 let. a) from the Law: „there exists immunity or a privilege, as diplomatic immunity, or the principle of speciality or any other circumstances stipulated by the Romanian law or there are norms concerning the determination or limitation to criminal charges connected to the freedom of the press and of freedom of expression in other media information methods that make the execution of the European Investigation Order impossible".

Grounds of refusal based on the existence of „immunity" or a „privilege" are stipulated by the majority of mutual recognition instruments, the only exception being the European Arrest Warrant. Nevertheless, none of these tools doesn't define the two notions. The German doctrine, for example, also includes in the category of "privilege" the witness right of not declaring in the cases that concern relatives or the privilege of the client-advocate relationship[10]. In order to avoid this kind of interpretations, the Romanian legislative hasn't proceeded in defining these, but has exemplified their nature: „for example diplomatic immunity".

However this refusal ground is not absolute, align. 5 of art. 2688 from the Law stipulating that in this case and if the competence of revoking the privilege or the immunity reverts to an authority of the Romanian state , the Romanian execution authority files a petition in this matter with no delay. If the competence to revoke the privilege or immunity reverts to an authority of another state or an international organization, the Issuing Foreign Authority files a petition in this matter to the acting authority.

Moreover, concerning the foresights of the Directive, in the Romanian law there has also been inserted as a non-executing reason the "principle of speciality". In our opinion this regulation can only be linked to other judicial cooperation instruments, as extradition or surrender on the basis of an European Arrest Warrant, ulterior, for other deeds than the ones these have operated for, not being able to initiate a criminal investigation, including by issuing an European Investigation Order, than with respecting the principle of speciality. In the light of these considerations, we appreciate that the option of the Romanian legislative is redundant as the two shown mechanism already contain specific protection instruments through the speciality rule.

The Romanian law has also taken the ground referring to the determining or limiting the criminal responsibility connected to the freedom of the press or other mass media information methods, aspect that marks the expansion of the notion of immunity or privilege.

---

[8] According to pct. 36 in Conclusions, „the principle of mutual recognition should also apply to pre-trial orders, in particular to those which would enable competent authorities quickly to secure evidence and to seize assets which are easily movable; evidence lawfully gathered by one Member State's authorities should be admissible before the courts of other Member States, taking into account the standards that apply there".

[9] Giséle Vernimmen, A propos de la reconnaissance mutuelle des décisions sentencielles en général, in Gilles de Herchove, Anne Weyembergh (coord.), La reconnaissance mutuelle des décisions judiciaires pénales dans l'Union européenne, Bruxelles, Université de Bruxelles, 2001, p. 148.

[10] Lorena Bachmaier Winter, The proposal for a Directive on the European Investigation Order and the Grounds for Refusal: A Critical Assessement, in Stefano Ruggeri (Ed.), Transnational Evidence and Multicultural Inquiries in Europe, Springer International Publishing Switzerland, 2014, p.78.

3.2. National security, jeopardising the information source, classified information

The article 2688 let. b) from the Law: „executing the European Investigation Order, in a specific case, would bring damage to the fundamental interests concerning the national security, would jeopardise the information source or would involve using classified information regarding specific activities of the secret services.'

The refusal ground identically implemented in the Romanian legislation is not recent, being found since the Judicial European Convention in 1959 that was also enumerating in addition grounds that concern suzerainty, public order, or other essential interests of the executing authority. Meanwhile, the Directive lets go the suzerainty and public order[11] clauses, aspect that doesn't come to restrain, but, on the contrary to considerably expand the refusal ground, covering this way the hypothesis where the execution risked to jeopardize the information source, aspect that could have an important impact in the organised crime domain where there are often necessary investigation measures whose source has to be protected[12].

3.3. The existence of a non-criminal procedure in the issuing state's legislation

The article 2688 let. c) from the Law: „the European Investigation Order was issued within the procedures stipulated in art. 2682 let. b) or c) and the investigation measure wouldn't have been authorised, according to the Romanian law, in a similar cause".

The procedures that this refusal ground is referring to concern the issued orders within the procedures initiated by the administrative authorities concerning deeds that represent the violation of the rightful law and that are punished in the national legislation of the issuing state, and where the decision can create an action in front of a competent court, especially criminal matters; or in case of the initiated procedures by the judicial authorities concerning deeds that represent braking the rightful laws and that are punished in the national legislation of the issuing state, if the decision of the mentioned authorities can create an action in front of a competent court, especially criminal matters[13].

Some judicial systems of the member states have regulated the so called „ administrative offences". For example the German law knows such a category of offences called „Ordnungswidrigkeiten" that are not punished by the criminal courts, but by an administrative group, but after the decision taken by the administrative court there can be released a procedure for the criminal courts[14]. This is the reason why the Directive has created the possibility of issuing a European Investigation Order referring to this category of offences. However in the case when for the offence for which the European Investigation Order was issued the requested measure cannot be authorised in the legislation of the executing authority, it is incident the analysed refused ground.

3.4. Ne bis in idem principle

The article 2688 let. d) from the Law: „executing the European Investigation Order would be contrary to the ne bis in idem principle".

Ne bis in idem principle is recognised at a supranational level inside EU, being regulated by art. 50 from the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union. At the same time, ever since the Directive Preamble, it is emphasised that the ne bis in idem principle represents a fundamental principle in the Union's right, as it was recognised by the Charter and expanded by the jurisprudence of the European Justice Court[15]. This way the executant authority should have the right to refuse executing a European Investigation Order if its execution would be contrary to this principle. However, the Directive recognises the preliminary character of the procedures that stand at the ground of a European Investigation Order, so that the execution of this shouldn't have the role of a refusal when it wants to establish the existence of a possible conflict with ne bis in idem principle or when the issuing authority has provided insurances that the transferred evidences after the execution of the European Investigation Order won't be used with the purpose of prosecution or applying a sanction to a person for whose cause was pronounced a definitive sentence in another member state for the same offences.

In practice, we appreciate that for the execution authority it is difficult to identify the incidence of the ne bis in idem rule reported to the short description of the offences in the form where the European Investigation Order is manifested and at the low probability that an eventual procedure carried for the person in cause by the investigative measure to be known by the execution judicial authority, especially when this took place in another member state.

3.5. The place where the offence have been committed

The article 2688 let. e) from the Law: „the European Investigation Order refers to a offence that is presumed to have been committed outside the issuing state's territory and partially or totally on Romanian territory, and the deed for which the European [11] See Lorena Bachmaier, Transnational Evidence. Towards the Transposition of Directice 2014/41 Regarding the European Investigation Order in Criminal Matters, in Eucrim, nr. 2/2015, p.47-60.

[12] Daniel Flore, Droit pénal europ*é*en. Les enjeux d'une justice pénale europ*é*enne, 2e edition, Larcier, Bruxelles, p. 607.

[13] Art 4 lit.b si c din Directiva.

[14] Lorena Bachmaier Winter, The proposal for a Directive on the European Investigation Order and the Grounds for Refusal: A Critical Assessement, in Stefano Ruggeri (Ed.), Transnational Evidence and Multicultural Inquiries in Europe, Springer International Publishing Switzerland, 2014, p.80

[15] Considerent 17 from Preamble.

International Order was issued in not incriminated in the Romanian law".

The ground identically adopted by the local legislation can be synthetized in completing three conditions: the offence was not committed on the territory of the issuing state; the offence has been committed partially or integrally on Romanian territory; the offence is not an offence in the Romanian legislation. This way it is noticed that the refusal ground has a double valence that derives from the principle of the territory, and also of double incrimination.

The main justifying of this ground concerns the avoidance of abusive using of the extraterritorial jurisdiction and avoiding the jurisdiction conflicts. However the refusal ground is not protected from critics because it is considered that the solution of the jurisdiction conflicts can be found through other methods, not being mandatory to stop obtaining the evidences[16].

3.6. Respecting the fundamental rights

The article 2688 let. f) from the Law: „there are strong grounds to consider that executing an investigation measure would be incompatible with the obligations assumed by the Romanian state according to art. 6 TEU and the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union".

The directive represents the first instrument of cooperation based on the principle of mutual recognition that introduces a refusal ground based on protecting the fundamental rights[17]. The reason of non-existing of such a refusal ground can be taken from the jurisprudence of the CJUE according to whom the mutual recognition principle that represents the base of the European Investigation Order has as a fundament mutual trust between the member states regarding the fact that their national juridical orders are capable to provide an effective and equivalent protection of the fundamental rights accepted by the Union, especially in the Charter[18].

However in the recent jurisprudence of the Luxembourg Court there has been admitted that not respecting the fundamental rights in the issuing state can lead to the postponing of executing an European warrant until information are obtained regarding the detention conditions in the issuing state and in the end to the refusal of executing the warrant in case the non-respecting of the fundamental rights issued in art. 4 from the Charter[19] is established.

The regulation of the refusal ground in the Directive is quite large, evidences concerning the violation of the fundamental rights not being necessary, but 'strong reasons' that the execution of a European Investigation Order would be qualified to produce such a violation[20].

There has to be emphasized that the referring point in the appreciation of the incidence of this refusal ground is art. 6 from TEU and the stipulations of the Charter, aspect that is meant to stop the member states from imposing their own fundamental right standards[21].

3.7. Lack of double incrimination

The article 2688 let. g) from the Law: „the deed for whom the European Investigation Order was issued is not incriminated in the Romanian law, with the exception of the case where there are references to the crimes from annex nr. 14[22], this being indicated by the issuing authority, if the deed is punishable in the issuing state with an arrest sentence or with a freedom privative measure for a period of maximum three years".

In matters of international cooperation, the double incrimination means that the deed that is in cause to be an offence both in the requiring state and the solicited one. Starting with the mechanism of the European Arrest Warrant, the cooperation instruments that have at their grounds the mutual recognition principle have marked an easing of the double incrimination rule that represents a useless distrust

---

[16] Lorena Bachmaier Winter, The proposal for a Directive on the European Investigation Order and the Grounds for Refusal: A Critical Assessement, in Stefano Ruggeri (Ed.), Transnational Evidence and Multicultural Inquiries in Europe, Springer International Publishing Switzerland, 2014, p.84.

[17] The refusal ground has represented a particular request of the European Parliament within the negotiations of the Directive. What is noticeable is that the Directive is the first instrument that is situated in the repressive sphere where the European Parliament is co-legislator. See D. Flore, Droit pénal européen. Les enjeux d'une justice pénale européenne, 2e edition, Larcier, Bruxelles, p. 607.

[18] See ECJ, C-168/13, Jeremy F., Judgment of 3 May 1013, ECLI:EU:C:2013:358, pct. 50.

[19] ECJ, C-404/15 and C-659/15 PPU, Pál Aranyosi and Robert Căldăraru, Judgment from 5 April 2016, ECLI:EU:C:2016:198.

[20] Lorena Bachmaier, Transnational Evidence. Towards the Transposition of Directice 2014/41 Regarding the European Investigation Order in Criminal Matters, in Eucrim, nr. 2/2015, p.54.

[21] Regina Garcimartin Montero, The European Investigation Order and the Respect for Fundamental Rights in Criminal Investigations, in Eucrim, nr. 1/2017, p.47. See, also ECJ, C-399/11, Stefano Melloni, Judgment from 26 february 2013, ECLI:EU:C:2013:107.

[22]. Participation in a criminal organization, terrorism, trafficking in human beings sexual exploitation of children and child pornography, illicit trafficking in narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances, illicit trafficking in weapons, munitions and explosives corruption, fraud, including that affecting the financial interests of the European Union within the meaning of the Convention of 26 July 1995 on the protection of the European Communities' financial interests laundering of the proceeds of crime counterfeiting currency, including of the euro, computer-related crime, environmental crime, including illicit trafficking in endangered animal species and in endangered plant species and varieties, facilitation of unauthorised entry and residence, murder, grievous bodily injury, illicit trade in human organs and tissue, kidnapping, illegal restraint and hostage-taking, racism and xenophobia, organised or armed robbery, illicit trafficking in cultural goods, including antiques and works of art, swindling, racketeering and extortion, counterfeiting and piracy of products, forgery of administrative documents and trafficking therein, forgery of means of payment, illicit trafficking in hormonal substances and other growth promoters, illicit trafficking in nuclear or radioactive materials, trafficking in stolen vehicles, rape, arson, crimes within the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court, unlawful seizure of aircraft/ships, sabotage.

signal not compatible with the postulate of mutual recognition[23].

From the economy of the dispositions that regulate the refusal ground, it is concluded that for executing a European Investigation Order the rule is the existence of the double incrimination for the offence.

As an exception, the execution cannot be refused if the offence is included in the list of the 32 crimes mentioned in the directive and adopted by the Romanian law, if these are punished by the issuing state legislation with a maximum of three years of incarceration. Concerning the regulation of the positive list of crimes, doctrinarian discussions about the European Arrest Warrant are maintained, this way being emphasized that these rather represent criminological categories than independent offences, aspect that is meant to offer a big manoeuvring range to the issuing state. But we also appreciate that it maintains the actuality the orientation given by ECJ in the Advocaten voor de Wereld cause. In this cause, concerning the legality of the incrimination principle , ECJ has ruled that, in the process of applying a frame-decision even though the member states textually take over the counting of the categories of infractions from the list of 32, the real definition of these crimes and the applicable sentences are the ones stipulated by the issuing member state's right, and this because the frame-Decision is not following the harmonising of the crimes regarding their constitutive elements or the sentences stipulated for these[24]. At the same time referring to the mutual recognition principle and considering the high level of solidarity and trust between the member states, that, through their nature, or the maximum sentence of minimum three years, the categories of that crime are part of the ones where the gravity of the damage brought to public order and security justifies the elimination of checking the double incrimination[25].

A second exception from the double incrimination is aimed at, by the non-intrusive and non-coercive measures, obtaining information or evidences already in possession of the Romanian execution authority and information that could be obtained in accordance to the Romanian Law within some crime procedures or for the purposes of the evidences that could be European Investigation Order; obtaining information contained in data bases owned by the police or judicial authorities that are direct accessible to the execution authority within some crime procedures; hearing a witness, an expert, a victim, suspect or accused or a third part on Romanian territory; any measure of investigation without a coercive character as it is defined in the Romanian law; identifying abandoned people by a phone number or IP address within the conditions of the Romanian Law.

Expressly, art. 268^8 align 3 takes from the Directive the fact that in case of the European Investigation Order is referring to a offence of custom matters, of taxes of the exchange rate, the executing authority cannot reuse the acknowledgment or execution using the reason that the Romanian legislation doesn't claim the same type of taxes or the same regulations concerning customs, of duties, taxes or currency as the right of the issuing state.

3.8. The impossibility of applying the measure according to the Romanian legislation for the offence referred in the European Investigation Order

The article 2688 let. h) from the Law: „the indicated measure in the European Investigation Order is not stipulated in the Romanian law only for some offences or sentence limits, that don't include the offence that the European Investigation Order refers to".

For example, in case of the soliciting of communications and calls interceptions, the offence where the measure can be displayed has to be found among the ones stipulated in the from the Criminal Procedure Code.

As in the referring situation to the double incrimination, the refusal ground is not incident but for the following measures: obtaining information or evidence already in the possession of the executing Romanian authority and information or evidences that could be acquired, in conformity to the Romanian law, within some crime procedures or in European Investigation Order purposes; obtaining information from data bases owned by the police or judicial authorities that are direct accessible to the execution authority among some crime procedures; hearing a witness, an expert, a victim, a suspect or accused or a third part on the Romanian territory; any investigation measure without coercive character, as the Romanian law is defined; identifying people subscribed to a phone number or an IP address, within the conditions of the Romanian law.

4. Conclusions

Non-recognition and non-execution grounds of a European Investigation Order are either the classic reasons for the cooperation instruments (ne bis in idem principle), but are also noticed through elements of novelty as the ones based on respecting the fundamental rights, aspect that represents an important step in the cooperation matter and shows the ECJ jurisprudence tendency. However all these grounds are optional, the executing authority having only the possibility to refuse the recognition and execution the European Investigation Order and not an obligation.

But, in most of the cases, before deciding the non-recognition or non-executing of a European

[23] D. Flore, p. 584
[24] ECJ, C-303/05, Advocaten voor de Wereld, Judgment from 2 May 2007, ECLI:EU:C:2007:261, parag. 52.
[25] Ibidem, parag. 57.

International Order for the execution judicial authority it is established the obligation of consulting with the eminent authority through any means that permit a written recording, and require the eminent authority to provide with no delay any necessary information by case.

References

- Lorena Bachmaier Winter, The proposal for a Directive on the European Investigation Order and the Grounds for Refusal: A Critical Assessement, in Stefano Ruggeri (Ed.), Transnational Evidence and Multicultural Inquiries in Europe, Springer International Publishing Switzerland, 2014
- Lorena Bachmaier, Transnational Evidence. Towards the Transposition of Directice 2014/41 Regarding the European Investigation Order in Criminal Matters, in Eucrim, nr. 2/2015, p.47-60
- Daniel Flore, Droit pénal européen. Les enjeux d'une justice pénale européenne, 2e edition, Larcier, Bruxelles
- Regina Garcimartin Montero, The European Investigation Order and the Respect for Fundamental Rights in Criminal Investigations, in Eucrim, nr. 1/2017, p.47
- Giséle Vernimmen, A propos de la reconnaissance mutuelle des décisions sentencielles en général, in Gilles de Herchove, Anne Weyembergh (coord.), La reconnaissance mutuelle des décisions judiciaires pénales dans l'Union européenne, Bruxelles, Universite de Bruxelles
- Directive 2014/41/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 3 April 2014 regarding the European Investigation Order in criminal matters, published in O.J. L130/1 of 1.5.2014
- Law nr. 302/2004 concerning international judicial cooperation in criminal matters Republished in the Official Romanian Journal, Part I, nr. 377 from 31 May 2011, completed through Law nr. 236 from 5 December 2017, published in the Official Romanian Jurnal nr. 993 from 14 December 2017
- Convention of 29 May 2000 on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters between the Member States of the EU, OJ, C 197/1 of 12.07.2000
- Council Framework Decision2008/978/JHA of 18 December 2008 on the European evidence warrant for the purpose of obtaining objects, documents and data for use in proceedings in criminal matters, OJ, C 115/13 of 09.05.2008
- Tampere European Council Conclusions, Finland, 15-16 October 1999
- ECJ, C-399/11, Stefano Melloni, Judgment from 26 February 2013, ECLI:EU:C:2013:107
- ECJ, C-168/13, Jeremy F., Judgment of 3 May 1013, ECLI:EU:C:2013:358
- ECJ, C-404/15 and C-659/15 PPU, Pál Aranyosi and Robert Căldăraru, Judgment from 5 April 2016, ECLI:EU:C:2016:198
- ECJ, C-303/05, Advocaten voor de Wereld, Judgment from 2 May 2007, ECLI:EU:C:2007:261

THE ROLE OF THE ATTORNEY WITHIN THE LEGAL DEBATE DURING A CRIMINAL TRIAL

Bogdan Sebastian GAVRILĂ[*]

Abstract

The attorney, during the criminal trial, endeavours to help his client in any way possible, by utilising a most complex legal arsenal so as to win the debate between the accusation and the defence. The criminal trial often involves very high stakes for the parties involved, which may incur some difficulties in maintaining a normal dialogue until its completion. Thus, the lawyer must step in to facilitate this dialogue, in helping the judge to determine the relevant issues which require a most thorough analysis, so as to ensure that the client receives a fair trial. In fulfilling this objective, he must concentrate his speech on only the key issues and present only relevant conclusions. Failure to do so may result in a dismissal of all his arguments, instead of merely the non pertinent ones. The risk is evident and proper measures need to be taken, in order to minimise it, so that ultimately the judge may grasp the situation accordingly. The aim of the article is to shed some light on the issue at hand, by establishing some good practices which may significantly aid in expressing the viewpoint of the accused to the court in the manner which best fits the needs of the client.

Keywords: Attorney's Role Criminal Trial Duty Power of Attorney.

1. Introduction

1.1. What matter does the paper cover?

The paper deals with the many problems which may arise in practice due to the fact that the legal debate during a criminal trial presents more challenges for all parties involved.

It shall focus on outlining several usefuls courses of action for the attorney, in circumventing the most common impediments which may prevent him from exercising his duties to the best of his abilities.

1.2. Why is the studied matter important?

The studied matter is very important given the fact that judicial errors can sometimes be made in the context of an improper legal debate. It thus falls on the attorney to utilise the best means available in order to facilitate the exchange of opinions between himself and the judge in order to prevent any potential problems. The paper shall offer an analysis of the main legal texts applicable and try to establish some useful guidelines to properly employ them.

1.3. How does the author intend to answer to this matter?

Upon a thorough analysis of the legal applicable texts and the views of well renowed legal authors, it is hoped that certain good practices may be identified.

Thus. the recipients of the message may receive potential solutions to the problems which may arise from contradictions between the laws which regulate the procedure.

1.4. What is the relation between the paper and the already existent specialized literature?

The paper shall endeavour to add to the perspectives on the matter at hand expressed in the specialised literature. The authors whose opinions will be integrated in the paper are well known and have managed to offer interesting views regarding the issue. Thus the task of improving on their perspective is that much more daunting. Nonetheless, the article is to establish some useful observations regarding the challenges of ensuring that the rights of the client are respected without infringing upon any legal texts, including the Statute of the lawyer.

2. The legal applicable texts and opinions of some proeminent legal authors

2.1. The Criminal Procedural Code

Firstly, our national Criminal Procedural Code[1] outlines the legal framework regarding the role of the lawer during the debate int the criminal case in: Article no. 88 -" The lawyer assists or represents, in the criminal proceedings, the parties or the main procedural subjects, according to the law. "-; Article no. 92 - "…During the preliminary and trial proceedings, the lawyer has the right to consult the case files, assist the defendant, exercise his procedural rights, make complaints, requests, memos, exceptions and objections… The attorney of the suspect or defendant has the right to benefit from the time and facilities necessary to prepare and carry out an effective defense.*"-; Article no. 109 -" *… The suspect or defendant has the right to consult with the lawyer

[*] PhD Candidate, Bucharest University of Economic Studies, Romania, Judge (e-mail: gavrila.bogdan.sebastian@gmail.com).

[1] Law no. 135/2010 regarding the Criminal Procedure Code, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 486 of July 16, 2010.

both before and during the hearing, and the judiciary may, when he considers it necessary, allow him to use his own notes and personal writings…* "; Article no. 129 -"… The principal procedural subjects, their parties and their lawyers may address questions to the witness interviewed under para. (1)… "-; Article no. 378 -" …The defendant is allowed to express everything he knows about the act for which he was sent to trial, then the prosecutor, the injured party, the civil party, the civilly responsible party, the other defendants, as well as their lawyers and the defendant's lawyer who is being heard…"; Article no. 388 - " The debates and the order in which the word is given (1) At the end of the judicial inquiry the debates shall be debated with the following order: the prosecutor, the injured party, the civil party, the civil responsible party and the defendant(2) The President may also grant the word in reply. (3) The duration of the conclusions of the prosecutor, the parties, the injured person and their attorneys may be limited.... "-

2.2. Law no. 51/1995 Published the Official Gazette of Romania no. 98 of 7 February 2011

The analisys shall also focus on the the lawyer's rights and obligation, as stated in the provisions of his statute, as established by Parlament.

Key aspects fall under article Article no. 2 -" … In the exercise of his profession, the lawyer is independent and is subject only to the law, the statute of the profession and the code of ethics… In the exercise of the right of defense, the lawyer has the right and the duty to enforce the free access to justice for a fair trial which is to last a reasonable amount of time. "-; Article no. 39 -" … The lawyer shall not be liable for the oral or written claims, in the appropriate form and in compliance with the provisions of paragraph (2) before the courts, …if they are done in compliance with professional deontology rules… It is not a disciplinary misdemeanor nor can any other legal form of legal liability be attributed to the lawyer's legal opinions, the exercise of rights, the fulfillment of the obligations provided by law, and the use of legal means to prepare and effectively defend the legitimate freedoms, rights and interests of his clients. "-; Article no. 86 -" The lawyer shall be liable to disciplinary action for failure to comply with the provisions of the present law or statutes, for failure to comply with binding decisions adopted by the governing bodies of the Bar or the Union and for any acts committed in connection with the profession or outside the profession which are detrimental to the honor and the prestige of the profession, the body of lawyers or the institution.... "-.

2.3. High Court of Cassation and Justice case law

Finnaly, the High Court of Cassation and Justice[2] has expressed in its Appeal in the interest of the law no. 15 of 21 September 2015 formulated by the Prosecutor General of the Prosecutor's Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice regarding the unitary interpretation and application of the provisions of art. 348 of the Criminal Code, in the case of exercising activities specific to the profession of lawyer by persons who are not part of the forms of professional organization recognized by Law no. 51/1995 that " *in interpreting and applying the provisions of art. 348 of the Criminal Code states: "The act of a person exercising activities specific to the profession of lawyer within entities not belonging to the forms of professional organization recognized by Law no. 51/1995 on the organization and pursuit of the profession of lawyer, republished, as subsequently amended and supplemented, constitutes the offense of exercising a profession without right or activities provided by art. 348 Criminal Code."

2.4. The opinion of the legal authors

Adrian Tony Neacșu[3] has expressed his reservations concerning the emphasis on the style of speech instead of on the need for the lawyer to focus on merely conveying the relevant facts of the case and his view on the applicability of the legal texts. His role is not to win a speech contest, but to use the allotted time as efficiently as possible and express as much useful insight as he can.

Some other authors[4] have expressed the idea that " The right to defense is a judicial function exclusively for the lawyer, of crucial importance in achieving impartial justice and a fair trial, even though this judicial function is not currently expressly regulated in the Code of Criminal Procedure. ".

Indeed, as it has been pointed out, there are some aspects which may not have been properly and expressly emphasized in the Code of Criminal Procedure, but this is an opportunity to lay the steps for proper relations between the accused and the state with the aid of the attorney.

In the treaty written under the coordination of the late Vintilă Dongoroz[5], the main guideline which is to be followed by the lawyer, consists in doing all that he can in order to aid the party he represents, within the limits of the law and the powers that have been granted to him. In order to achieve this, he may exercise the right to come into contact with the accused, and should

[2] Decision no. 15 of 21 September 2015 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice

[3] Neacșu, Adrian Toni, (2014), „Convinge judecătorul.Tehnica și arta convingerii instanței"[Convince the judge. The technique and art of persuading the court], București: Wolters Kluwer, pp. 255-256

[4] RADU, Casandra (2016), „ Consilieri juridici vs. avocați. Avocați pentru avocați și avocați în apărarea consilierilor juridici "[Legal advisers vs. Lawyers. Lawyers for lawyers and lawyers for legal advisers], juridice.ro. https://www.juridice.ro/417931/consilieri-juridici-vs-avocati-avocati-pentru-avocati-si-avocati-in-apararea-consilierilor-juridici.html

[5] Dongoroz, Vintilă, coordonator, "Explicatiile teoretice ale Codului de procedura penala roman. Editia 2. Volumul V, "[Theoretical explanations of the Romanian Criminal Procedural Code], București: Ch Beck, pp. 94

the accused request it, the right becomes an obligation for the lawyer[6].

Some rights of the accused may be exercised only personnaly, such as the refusal to make any statements, or to have the last statement in the trial[7].

However, it is important to note that in the last example, exercising his duties may mean interrupting his own client when he may incriminate himself.

Mihail Udroiu[8] has also analysed the difficult role of attorney. He considers that the presence of the lawyer during the proocedings is a guarantee of the right to a fair trial, protected by article 6 of the Europeean Convention on Human Rights and also article 3. In cases in which the court appointed attorney is incapable of mounting a proper defence, the defendant may solicit his replacement or that he be jointed by yet another counsellor[9].

3. The interpretations of the author

Firstly, in regards to article 88 of the Criminal Procedural Code, it is crucial to note that the most important obligation of the attorney is to obey the law. No matter how useful for the client would be to invoke certain articles, make unfounded requests to the court, solicit certain witnesses to be heard, despite the evident impossibility in this respect, the primary obligation for the lawyer is to act in full accordance with our legislation.

Indeed, there have been cases in which the lawyer has requested the court to solicit the point of view of the Constitutional Court of Romania in regards to certain legal provisions which may be relevant to the final solution.

Given the fact that once our laws made it mandatory for the court to suspend the entire proceedings until a point of view was presented by the Constitutional Court of Romania on the specific matter at hand, some defendants have greatly benefited from the statute of limitations in their cases, with the court ending the case with an acquittal.

This course of action of postponing the case as often as possible may provide the party with significant advantages - memory loss for witnesses for the prosecution- but it should be noted that it is also in complete defiance of Article 88 and also article 2 of Law no. 51/1995: " In the exercise of the right of defense, the lawyer has the right and the duty to enforce the free access to justice for a fair trial which is to last a reasonable amount of time.". Thus, there are certain conflicting issues which stem from the provisions previously indicated, given the necessity for the lawyer to walk a very fine line in terms of avoidind potential infringements.

As to article 92 of the Criminal Procedural Code, it is paramount to note the fact that the attorney should always struggle to receive the needed time in order to mount a most proper defence. There will be cases with an enormous amount of paperwork. He should strive to use the technology available in his favour. High quality fotographs should be taken of the key aspects of these cases, combined with Optical Character Recognition technology aimed at turning the photos into editable text. Thus, sifting through the mountains of information in high complexity cases should prove more feasible.

In regards to Article no. 109, he should conduct a careful analysis of the aspects which may be revealed during the hearing of the defendant. He has to always be ready to interrupt his client's testimony, should it become damaging for the defence. When the evidence is clearly leading to a guilty verdict, he should seize the opportunity to solicit the applicability of Article no. 375 of the Criminal Procedural Code. He ought to address the proper questions to his client and lead the client into focusing on the key issues during the actual testimony, without any potential deviations. The client, during the stage of the testimony when he freely expresses his point of view, should be guided by the lawyer in order to prove the positive and determined facts, the positive undetermined facts and the negative determined facts. The outcome of the efforts should result in conveying to the court that he is innocent or that he never was near the crime scene.

Article no. 129 of the Civil Procedural Code is equally important in this respect. Here, the role of the lawyer is to address as many control questions as possible to the witnesses in order to establish whether or not they were actually at the time of the crime and have also properly perceived the events. This can be done in a very simple manner, like asking what sort of garment was the defendant wearing at the key moment and presenting survellaince pictures from the local bank which may depict a very different picture. His duty is to challenge the credibility of the witness when his testimony is damaging for the defence but also to enforce the testimony of the defence witnesses in order to convince the court. Of great importance is to constantly corroborate in his mind all the evidence presented before the court in order to gain a proper insight on the needed course of action.

Article no. 378 of Criminal Procedural Code should be interpreted in the sense that the main objective of the defence counsel is to focus on the alibi of the defendant. He should always strive to provide a most compelling alibi, no matter how circumstantial the

[6] Dongoroz, Vintilă, coordonator, "Explicatiile teoretice ale Codului de procedura penala roman. Editia 2. Volumul V, "[Theoretical explanations of the Romanian Criminal Procedural Code], București: Ch Beck, pp. 352

[7] Dongoroz, Vintilă, coordonator, "Explicatiile teoretice ale Codului de procedura penala roman. Editia 2. Volumul V, "[Theoretical explanations of the Romanian Criminal Procedural Code], București: Ch Beck, pp. 353

[8] Udroiu, Mihail, „ Procedură penală. Partea generală. Ediția 3" "[Criminal Procedure. General Aspects. Third Edition], București, 2016, Ch Beck, pp. 48

[9] Udroiu, Mihail, „ Procedură penală. Partea generală. Ediția 3" "[Criminal Procedure. General Aspects. Third Edition], București, 2016, Ch Beck, pp. 790

accusatory evidence is or how poorly the case is being handled by the prosecutor. It is not a question of an infringement to the right to be considered innocent until proven guilty, but coming forward before the court is also useful. A proper collaboration during the trial may lead to a more mild sentence, should the unexpected occur and a conviction be passed.

In regards to Article no. 388 of the Criminal Procedural Code there should be noted that in this stage of the trial lies the pinnacle of the defence efforts. The defence speech should be as pertinent as possible. Little time should be allotted for emotional arguments. It is highly likely that the judge is usually impervious to such attempts. Instead, ample efforts should be directed into the facts of the case and why the prosecutor has failed to unequivocally prove the guilt of the accused. Should the facts be clear, the focus should be on the interpretation of the legal texts, in addressing the necessity for the court to apply only those relevant to the case. After these stages, the punishment and other legal measures that are to be taken shall mandatory complete the list of obligations for the lawyer. No other aspects should be addressed, such as offering irrelevant examples. The speech can be completed by the supportive case law, in order to aid the judge in maintaining a unitary judicial practice.

Relevant to this article is the strategy employed by some attorneys to bombard the court with conclusions, exceptions, requests, recusations, many of which failing to address relevant matters. This option is very dangerous for the client, since the judge, after trying to select the most pertinent aspects, may fail to notice some of them, due to the overwhelming amount of inapplicable information to the case in particular. This practice is very damaging to the cause of the defendant and the reputation that usually accompanies the lawyer can in no way usefully serve future clients.

As to Article no. 2 of Law no. 51 of June 7, 1995 it is imperative to readdress the issue of artificialy prolonging the length of the trial by means of procedural or substancial law based strategies. Indeed, the fact that the client can benefit from the statute of limitations for his crime is a clear indication of fulfilling the duty of providing a most useful defence. However, so is falsifying evidence to serve one's needs and witness tampering. These means can never justify the end. The counsellor is obligated to abide by the legal provisions and his legal statute. Clients shall always come and go, but committing a crime to serve their interests or damagind one's reputation can never be a valid course of action.

Article no. 39 can be viewed as a safeguard for the lawyer, free to emit his opinion on the matter at hand. However, evident difficulties may arise from its interpretation. This freedom can lead to dissservices for the client. As previously indicated, there are cases in which the lawyer expresses his opinion over the course of multiple pages and during very long debates. Indeed, the court is able to limit such interventions, but these practises should be discouraged. In the instances when the opinion of the lawyer is severely irrelevant and also the length of the arguments is unreasoanable, certain measures should be undertaken in order to limit this type of practice. Over the long run, its effects are severely damaging for a large number of clients who receive defences which span over dozens of pages but out of which extremely little actually aids their cause.

Another aspect of interest is that of the obligation to ensure all that he can do to allow for a trial which lasts a reasonable amount of time. In the examples previously mentioned, the length of the proceedings is unorganically altered, in violation of article 2 of Law no. 51 of June 7, 1995.

Article no. 86 of Law no. 51 of June 7, 1995 thus becomes applicable in this particular case, since the attorney, in attempting to provide a most complex defence, fails to respect article no. 2. Indeed, the solution of disciplinary action should be employed with the utmost consideration, but in some cases in which the mannor of the proceedings has reached a very alarming level, in ensuring the right to fair tiral for future clients, the practice should receive due attention and proper sanctions. A proper fulfilment of his role can never allow for any deviation of the main goal of offering a most pertinent opinion for the judge and not bombarding him with useless information.

4. Conclusions

4.1. Summary of the main outcomes

It is evident that the more rules and regulations exist, the easier it is for the counsellor to be in situations where they contradict. The main focus of the article was to identify the ones which may seem more problematic.

As for the aspects which derive from the interpretation of the Criminal Procedural Code, it is important to point out that any requests made during the trial should be as pertinent as possible. The legislation has been modified, soliciting the opinion of the Constitutional Court of Romania no longer attracts a mandatory suspension of all proceedings. But that does not mean that there could be some judges who could interpret the law in such that a way that they see no impediment in suspending. So, requesting the suspension could mean an act of defence, in accordance with Article no. 39, but in violation of Article no. 2 of Law no. 51/1995.

Mounting a proper defence may sometimes mean advising the client not to offer testimony. The importance of knowing when to proceed in this manner and when to employ Article no. 375 of the Criminal Procedural Code cannot be stressed enough. The flair of the lawyer is revealed most often in the way in which he choose which legal battles to engage in. Refusal to capitulate may seem very heroic, but his role in the debate can sometimes mean that embracing defeat is the most useful option for the client.

In regards to witness testimony, the lawyer should always prepare several control questions which may help the court decide on the credibility of the person who is being questioned. He should always ask the witness whether or not he is sure of what he has expressed. Any waverings are always beneficial for the accused.

He should always focus on the alibi and how the facts of the case relate to the facts presented by the defendant since any uncorroborated pieces of evidence cannot justify the conviction.

Every single time a reasonable amount of doubt can be prooven, every single time some key aspects do not relate to one another, it is mandatory for the court to interpret the evidence in the favour of the defendant. It is here the role of the attorney is of the utmost importance, since most cases are not clear. The court cannot proceed to imprison a person if it is not certain of the evidence presented before itself. Indeed the lawyer should sometimes avoid creating too much doubt since the judge may overwhelmed by too much stimuli and overview some key aspects regarding the defence.

Thus it is of great importance that the ending speech for the accused be as shortest possible and it should also integrate all that is useful in viewing the case from the perspective of the defendant. Failure to refrain oneself from providing the judge with too much unnecessary information may be extremely detrimental to the client. In the long term a significant number of individuals could pay a far too high cost for this error in strategy. It is better to be clear in making one's point, especially in cases where the stakes are so high.

Finally, artificially prolonging the duration of the trial can never be a winning strategy. It can also be very stressful for the client to wait years and years to receive a solution from the court. In preventing this, the lawyer should always endeavour to respect the provisions of Article 2 of law number 51/1995 in regards to a reasonable duration the the trial.

4.2. The expected impact of the research outcomes

The article shall hopefully facilitate an improved communication between the lawyer and the court, in ensuring a proper defence of the fundamental rights of the accused. It is hoped that it shall inspire new research regarding the matter at hand in establishing even more correct courses of action in the interpretation and application of the articles previously analysed.

4.3. Suggestions for further research work.

New research could offer a multidisciplinary approach on the subject, by utilising aspects of Psychology and Philosophy in order to present a more complex perspective.

It could also establish de lege ferenda proposals in modifying the content of some of the articles analysed above in order to avoid potential contradictions between the legal texts so that the role of the attorney be simplified.

References

- Law no. 135/2010 regarding the Criminal Procedure Code, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 486 of July 16, 2010
- Law no. 51/1995 Published the Official Gazette of Romania no. 98 of 7 February 2011
- Decision no. 15 of 21 September 2015 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice
- Dongoroz, Vintilă, coordonator, "Explicatiile teoretice ale Codului de procedura penala roman. Editia 2. Volumul V, "[Theoretical explanations of the Romanian Criminal Procedural Code], București, 2003, Ch Beck
- Neacșu, Adrian Toni, (2014), ,,Convinge judecătorul.Tehnica și arta convingerii instanței"[Convince the judge. The technique and art of persuading the court], București: Wolters Kluwer
- RADU, Casandra (2016), ,, Consilieri juridici vs. avocați. Avocați pentru avocați și avocați în apărarea consilierilor juridici "[Legal advisers vs. Lawyers. Lawyers for lawyers and lawyers for legal advisers], juridice.ro. https://www.juridice.ro/417931/consilieri-juridici-vs-avocati-avocati-pentru-avocati-si-avocati-in-apararea-consilierilor-juridici.html
- Udroiu, Mihail, ,, Procedură penală. Partea generală. Ediția 3" "[Criminal Procedure. General Aspects. Third Edition], Bucureşti, 2016, Ch Beck

THE CONFIDENTIALITY OF THE MEDICAL ACT IN THE DEPRIVATION OF LIBERTY ENVIRONMENT

Laurenţia Florentina GĂIŞTEANU (ŞTEFAN)*

Abstract

Respecting the medical secrecy is one of the essential conditions underlying the protection of private life. Medical information obtained from patients in the context of a physician - patient relationship should be protected by confidentiality. Disclosure of personal health care data without the agreement of the person is a touch brought to private life. One particular feature of the health care system is the healthcare provided to patients in detention. Even though the doctor-patient relationship in the penitentiary environment has a number of peculiarities, it is coordinated according to the same ethical principles as in the public one. The penitentiary physician's duty is not limited to consultation and treatment, he often becomes the prisoner's personal physician, and the means of relationship must respect the fundamental rights of the patient, regardless of his or her status.

In the penitentiary system, there are also many dilemmas arising from the duties of the medical staff, the first of the detainee's personal physician and the second of the penitentiary administration's counselor.

The medical specialist in a penitentiary must take into account that communicating with the patient is essential in the doctor-patient relationship and she must be sincere. In determining the attitude of the patient towards the doctor and the medical act, the context of the first contact with the doctor, the way in which the first medical consultation takes place, is of great importance. Trust is gradually gaining, and medical staff must strive to demonstrate that they can ensure the protection of prisoners' medical records.

Keywords*: medical secret, penitentiary, health condition, detainee, secret.*

Introduction

Exercising certain professions involves, in many cases, getting the relevant professional from another person to have information about it and which, if disclosed to someone else, could cause injury. All this information obtained by a person in the exercise of his profession or practicing his profession falls within the broader concept of professional secrecy. Professional secrecy, though it seems a simple notion, involves many nuances, involves many facets, determined not only by the multitude of professions / professions in which the obligation of professional secrecy is imposed. But the issue of determining the extent of the obligation of professional secrecy is as old as the secret itself. It was born in the context in which it was obvious that the strict application of the principle of professional secrecy can have disastrous consequences[1].

Human health is the ultimate goal of the medical act. The duty of the physician is to protect the physical and mental health of the human being, to alleviate suffering, and to ensure the respect for the life and dignity of the human person, without any discrimination[2].

In order to establish the attitude towards the patient and the medical act, the physician, in the exercise of his profession, prioritizes the patient's interests, whatever the status of the patient. Confidentiality is one of the most important values of the medical act that underlie the doctor-patient relationship, representing, and an obligation, stipulated in olden times, the Hippocratic oath being the basic principle[3]. Hippocrates, the father of medicine, wanted to bring attention to the importance of medical consultation and the status of doctor-patient relationship. This oath that all graduates of a faculty of medicine complete when completing their studies and receiving the right of medical practice and who has become a moral code of any practitioner in the exercise of his / her lifetime profession, gives the moral and ethical view of a physician: Whatever I see and hear while doing my job, or even beyond it, I will not talk about what is no need to be revealed, considering that under such circumstances keeping the mystery is a duty[4]. "

The protection of personal data is a fundamental right enshrined in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, in art. 8. These data may be used only for specified purposes and on the basis of the consent of the person concerned or another legitimate reason provided by law.

* PhD candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: laurentiastefan@yahoo.com)

[1] Legal Considerations on Medical Professional Confidentiality, Between the Obligation to Preserve and the Disclosure of DrD. Ilie Dumitru lawyer, Bucharest Bar, Universul Juridic Magazine, no.9, September 2016, pp. 85-99

[2] Extract from the Medical Deontology Code of the College of Physicians in Romania 2005

[3] The limits of medical secrecy, DR. MIHAELA-CATALINA VICOL

[4] Legal Considerations on Medical Professional Confidentiality, Between the Obligation to Preserve and the Disclosure of DrD. Ilie Dumitru lawyer, Bucharest Bar, Universul Juridic Magazine, no.9, September 2016, pp. 85-99

Paper content

In Romania, according to the provisions of art. 21 of Law no. 46/2003 on patient's rights, all information about the patient's condition, the results of the investigations, the diagnosis, the prognosis, the treatment, are confidential even after his death. The exceptions to the confidentiality principle set out in the legislation are: situations where the law expressly requires it, if the information is needed by other healthcare providers involved in the patient's care, if the patient is a danger to himself or if the patient is a danger for public health[5].

Any breach of confidentiality (except as permitted by national or international law) is considered to be a violation of professional secrecy, with legal and criminal legal consequences for the physician[6]. Thus, according to Romanian criminal law "the disclosure, without right, of data or information concerning the private life of a person, capable of causing injury to a person, by the one who has become aware of them by virtue of his profession or function and who has the obligation of confidentiality with respect to these data shall be punished by imprisonment from 3 months to 3 years or by fine[7]."

The legal norms speak with the ethical principles of patient rights before talking about the citizen's right to information, which in any civilized society does not rely on the right to self-determination, privacy and medical secrecy (except where the same rights of other individuals are in danger). Deontological and Legal There is no transparency in medical confidentiality (unless expressly required by the law). The medical domain of information covered by the professional secrecy is not a public domain, the data being accumulated being classified[8].

A special approach to the protection of personal data is highlighted in the deprivation of liberty when there may be suspicion of the application of insufficient measures to respect the individual interests of the persons detained.

For any human being, deprivation of liberty is a special situation with a broad resonance in the living environment, both during and after detention, in freedom[9]. The communication "works" differently in the reference public space compared to the penitentiary. Behind the pillars, the written regulation - as opposed to the initial verbal connotation and subsequently codified social relations - regulates the relations between the surveillance staff, the administration and the detainees, as well as the relationships between the "reeducations[10]".

Penitentiary, in the first phase, requires adaptation and integration to a particular pattern of life, driven by entirely different laws. The establishment of inter-human relations is made after other considerations and under other conditions, the value hierarchy acquires another face, passing through successive deformations to the normal social model, unanimously accepted. Inherent adaptive tensions are accumulated, and often the condemned person will not be aware of the culpability of the act done in the existential sense. The notion of freedom is emptied of content, completely disappearing the feeling of belonging to the social, the desire for active integration. The society that blames is also blamed for denial[11]. The peculiarities of the penitentiary environment and the psychology of the custodial persons impose that in the beginning any contact between the personnel and the detainees should have a specific connotation, the mutual mistrust and only after long periods of probation a complete communication can be established.

Once in prison, detainees have to assign specific identities, from their excluded position they have moral values that are apparently opposed to those of ordinary citizens, which would allow them to regain an honorable identity - "we are simply different from you "- they say[12].

The shock of entering the penitentiary is directly proportional to the pre-existing emotional disorder: the more sensitive, the weak, the affective and the socially immature, the sick, in general, suffer the most. Sometime later - a month or two - the victim becomes victimized when the prisoner realizes the magnitude of touch - loss from conviction and begins to imagine the handicap of the legal situation, the failure to satisfy the need for moral, emotional helplessness and dispossession accentuated by the presence the other detainees with whom they can't find affinities at first[13].

During custody, detainees must have access to a doctor at any time, regardless of the detention regime they are subject to. This is especially important when the person has been placed in a solitary confinement regime. The medical service must ensure that the doctor's consultation is promptly performed without justification[14].

Except for emergencies, every medical examination / consultation is done in a medical consulting room to create privacy, privacy and dignity.

[5] Art.22, Art.23 and Art.25 paragraph (2) of the Law no. 46/2003 on patient's rights

[6] Consensus and confidentiality in the medical assistance of women victims of domestic violence Sorin Hostiuc, Cristian George Curca, Dan Dermengiu - Romanian Journal of Bioethics, Vol. 9, Nr. 1, January - March 2011 Page 41

[7] https://legeaz.net/noul-cod-penal/art-227

[8] Course INML - Bioethics Legal responsibility in the medical act. Bioethics as medical science. Confidentiality and consensus in medical practice. Aspects of legislation

[9] http: // www.scritube.com./sociology / environment-penitentiary, accessed on 26.02.2018

[10] Communication in the Romanian concentration area - Dragoş Cârciga

[11] Influence of the penitentiary environment on criminal criminology -Barbu Ana-Maria page 3

[12] LE CAISINE (L.), ,Prison – Une ethnologue en centrale, Editions Odile Jacob, Paris, 2000, p. 78-79.

[13] http: // www.scritub.com - Specialized Penitentiary Intervention - Accessed on 29.02.2018

[14] Health care and medical ethics in penitentiaries - Manual for medical staff and other prison staff, responsible for the welfare of detainees, p.12

Medical confidentiality must be guaranteed and respected with the same rigor as the general population. Detainees should be examined individually, not in groups. No third person without medical specialization (other inmates or non-medical staff) should not be present in the examination room[15]. If medical staff who come in contact with prison-guards communicate openly, with a sincere mood to listen to the needs of detainees before asking them, then they will get a positive feed-back, even if not always from the first consultation.

Communicating with the patient is essential in the doctor-patient relationship and she has to be honest. Often, a "good" doctor is considered to be the one who "speaks", "listens" and "counsels", aspects that become visible in front of numerous titles or diplomas of excellence.[16] In the case of a recalcitrant prisoner, the primary objective is that health professionals involved in direct activities with detainees communicate more with those who have problems because it stimulates their confidence, and the prison doctor tries to restore the patient's calm by approaching the patient's demands, juggling with administrative solutions to pacify the patient. Most of the time, it is NOT necessary or appropriate to ask the inmate who is at risk, about his intentions of self-harm, in conversations that medical staff has with him.[17] The consulting cabinet is the place where the patient expands his or her suffering, and this applies to detainees, and for the physician, this is the most important opportunity to establish the diagnosis and treatment, as well as the physician-patient confidentiality relationship.

In the penitentiary, as in another small community, the doctor occupies a special position, recognized both by the status imposed by his profession and by his personality, through which he gains his social prestige.

The physician's activity is, in this environment, governed by the deontology of his profession, embodied in the set of the behavioral norms of reference.[18] The International Code of Medical Ethics states that "a doctor will keep absolute secrecy about everything he knows about the patient, regardless of his or her status, because of the patient's trust[19]."

The detainee seeks medical assistance by virtue of an acquired social role, such as sick, a role that may be temporary or permanent.

There are four features of the patient in the detention environment:

- Disease can offer the patient the possibility of diminishing tasks and responsibilities; he may gain certain rights, the healing occurring in such cases at the end of the detention;
- the patient does not want healing, he / she asks to confirm the affection he suffers, there is a tendency to exaggerate or to refuse the relationship with the physician who denies the alleged affection;
- Not all patients want to heal because the role of the patient and, implicitly, the rights they gain benefit from them[20];

In the detention environment, the situation where the patient asks the doctor to confirm a certain diagnosis, as well as the prescription of a certain treatment. In this way, the character of the disease is deviant, the disease state of the patient is illegitimate, and the doctor-patient relationship can become conflictual.

In such situations, the physician must maintain a balance between helping and refusing, advising the authorities or continuing the confidential relationship. However, and in this context, the patient must be protected and his / her personal information passed to the physician must remain confidential in accordance with the legal provisions. In this regard, the physician helps the patient for his pathological condition, refusing him for the side that gives him rewards resulting from the disease state, proving to him that the disease state can't be exploited. Thus, the legislator wanted these issues to be foreseen in the executive - criminal law. By art. 72 of the Law no.254 / 2013 on the execution of sentences and deprivation of liberty ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal trial, it is stipulated that "the medical examination is carried out in confidentiality conditions, with the provision of safety measures, respectively, the presence of the surveillance staff is performed only at the request of the medical personnel (in the case of dangerous detainees, violent, with a history of attack on personnel). But also in this context, detainees should not be handcuffed during the consultation, and surveillance staff should be outside the field of vision and sound when conducting medical examination.

In order to ensure confidentiality, in these cases medical shields are used in front of the consultation bed for the protected medical examination. However, the Council of Europe's Committee on the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment (CPT), in its visits to Romania, has brought to light cases of privacy violations due to the presence of surveillance staff in the consulting cabinet. Another aspect of privacy is the protection of medical records.

According to the provisions of art. 60 of the Law no.254 / 2013 on the execution of sentences and deprivation of liberty ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal trial "the personal data of convicted

[15] Health care and medical ethics in penitentiaries - Manual for medical staff and other prison staff, responsible for the welfare of detainees, p.12
[16] The Limits of Medical Secrets - Dr. Mihaela-Catalina Vicol
[17] Autoaggressive Behavior - editorial The Medical Directorate and Social Reintegration Division - The National Administration of Penitentiaries in Romania
[18] Doctor-patient relationship in the detention environment - dr.Constantin Ouatu, dr.Beatrice Ioan, dr.Diana Bulgaru Iliescu
[19] The Limits of Medical Secrets - Dr. Mihaela-Catalina Vicol
[20] Doctor-patient relationship in the detention environment - dr.Constantin Ouatu, dr.Beatrice Ioan, dr.Diana Bulgaru Iliescu

persons are confidential, according to the law"[21] even the lawyer or relatives can obtain, data or photocopies related to the medical history, only with the written consent of the convicted person[22]. Thus, medical staff in penitentiaries has all the necessary measures for all medical records to be kept in places that ensure confidentiality, and when presenting to medical investigations outside the penitentiary system or when transfers between prison units are made, the medical file is presented confidentially, in a sealed envelope.

However, in the penitentiary system, there are many dilemmas arising from the duties of the medical staff, the prisoner's personal physician and, respectively, the penitentiary administration's counselor. For example, the request from the penitentiary management to provide surveillance staff, knowledge of inmates diagnosed with HIV / AIDS may be a conflict with the interest of the patient who has the status of detained. In this case, the doctor is faced with a dilemma if he can consider the detainee in his / her book as HIV / AIDS as a danger to public health, given the aggressiveness of such detainees through acts of violence against the staff , blood splashes, bites, etc.), or need to protect the patient by refusing to supply a diagnosis.

We mention that, in the Romanian legislation through the provisions of Law no. 584/2002 on measures to prevent the spread of AIDS in Romania and to protect persons infected with HIV or AIDS patients, stipulates in Article 8 the obligation of confidentiality of data for these patients:

"Keeping the confidentiality of data on HIV-infected or AIDS-sick people is mandatory for: health care staff; employers of these people; civil servants who have access to these data.

Also, in connection with the transfer of detainees with infectious-contagious diseases through the means of transport of the penitentiary system, there were invoked situations of affecting the safety of the transfer missions on the grounds of contagious diseases.

We reiterate that the Patient Rights Act no. 46/2003 (Articles 21 and 22) and the Order of the Minister of Health no. 1410/2016 on the approval of the Rules for the application of the Patient's Rights Law no. 46/2003 (Article 11 (2) and Annex 5 to the Rules) clearly state that medical data may only be communicated with the consent of the patient and only to persons expressly designated by him (to this end, it is not permitted to disclose the diagnosis on documents to which several non-specifically identified people have access). The fact that most infectious-contagious diseases have a high stigmatization and discrimination potential once again supports the need to respect medical confidentiality in the penitentiary environment.

In this condition, even in art. 166 par. (1) GD no. 157/2016 for the approval of the Regulation on the application of Law no. 254/2013 on the execution of sentences and detention measures ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal proceedings regarding the "Confidentiality of the data regarding the state of health of detainees" stipulates:

"Except the cases expressly provided for by law, health information may be provided to other persons only if the detainees or their legal representatives give their consent free, informed, in writing and in advance." In order to effectively protect the health of staff and prisoners and respect for the confidentiality of medical data, diagnostic codes were used for a short period of time, according to the International Classification of Diseases, WHO revision 10, but from practice that the use of disease codes is by no means a way of secrecy but, on the contrary, coding is done in order to find a faster (and, implicitly, more superficial) diagnosis of a patient.

Early knowledge of a prisoner's infectious status is not a means of protecting the health of the staff, as there are no legal provisions whereby operational incidents are managed differently from infected individuals to healthy ones and the separation criteria can not be decided by the members of the escort, who do not have medical training (even if they know the real diagnosis) [23].

Thus, this configuration was rethought and regulated in the Romanian penitentiary system, by cataloging the detainees as "medical-surgical vulnerable cases", so that the surveillance staff must ensure protection measures in all cases of contact directly with any detainee.

Another issue underlying the confidentiality of professional secrecy is found in the obligation of medical staff to advertise when prison services are abusive, immoral or inmates are subjected to ill-treatment, which poses a potential danger to their lives and health[24].

In such cases, even if the detainee refuses to recognize the abuse for fear of possible repercussions, the medical staff has an ethical obligation to take prompt action, since failure to take an immediate position makes it more difficult to object at a later stage[25]. International codes and ethical principles require reporting of torture or ill-treatment information to responsible bodies[26]. In the Romanian penitentiary system, this aspect is a legal requirement, so if he / she

[21] Art.60 par. (8) of the Law no. 254/2013 on the execution of custodial sentences and measures involving deprivation of liberty by the judiciary in the course of criminal proceedings

[22] Art.60 par. (5) of the Law no. 254/2013 on the execution of custodial sentences and measures involving deprivation of liberty by the judiciary in the course of criminal proceedings

[23] View point Dr. Laurentia Ștefan and Dr. Cosmin Decun at ANP-DSDRP-SPEDT no. 51084 / 11.09.2017 regarding the deficiencies found in carrying out the transfer missions of detainees

[24] The Istanbul Protocol

[25] The Istanbul Protocol

[26] The Istanbul Protocol

finds evidence of violence or the convicted person is accused of violence, the doctor conducting the medical examination has the obligation to record in the medical record the findings and the declarations of the convict in connection with or any other aggression, and to immediately notify the public prosecutor[27].

Another view on the confidentiality of medical data is that of disclosure after the patient's death. This approach is different in the Romanian penitentiary system compared to the national system. If in the matter of the death of a person at large, the national legislation states that "all information on the patient's condition, the results of the investigations, the diagnosis, the prognosis, the treatment, the personal data are confidential even after his death[28], the implementing law - 52 par. (3) of the Law no. 254/2013 on the execution of sentences and detention measures ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal proceedings that "the spouse or a relative up to the fourth degree or any other person designated by them has access to the individual file, the medical certificate of death and any other act related to the death of the convicted person and can obtain, upon request, photocopies thereof, on request.

In this case, the principle of knowing the truth about the right to health is a matter of professional secrecy. The primary task of a prison doctor and other healthcare workers to ensure the health and welfare of detainees must be highlighted.

Conclusion

The physician-patient relationship materializes, in most cases, through a special relationship, a certain type of affective relationship.

One of the most important issues in the doctor-patient relationship - especially at the beginning but not only - is communication, which is influenced by many factors. One of the special circumstances that influence this relationship is the situation of the patient whose status is offender who executes his custodial sentence. The penitentiary environment is a special environment with specific requirements, and communication in this environment is essential.

In the patient-patient relationship, the personality of the patient is very important, but equally important is the personality and attitude of the doctor towards the patient, by the way of being the doctor, the patient being converted into believing in the value scale of the first and adopt them.

The meeting between the doctor and the patient is a meeting between two different personalities who are in different positions and who take place in different stages, which is why - during the course of the relationship - the tendency must be balancing by adapting the ideas, expectations, parties to those of the other party in order to gain confidence and then medical confession. The doctor-patient relationship detained leaves free personal trends, unconscious feelings, beliefs and prejudices. The patient must be given protection and models to develop his / her potentials so that he / she can cope with changes in his / her existence. It is important that he does not consider himself an object, as there is a risk when he enters the penitentiary system. Respect for confidentiality is essential in order to provide the atmosphere of trust that is required for the doctor-patient relationship; it is the duty of the physician to ensure such a relationship and to decide on how to observe confidentiality rules in a particular case. A doctor in the penitentiary performs his duties as a personal physician of a patient. Health professionals need to look for solutions that promote justice without violating the person's right to privacy[29].

References

- Manual for medical staff and other penitentiary employees responsible for the welfare of detainees - Health care and medical ethics in penitentiaries - Romanian version published with financial support The Romanian version is published with the financial support of the Council of Europe Project "Supporting the Criminal Justice Reform of the Council Project Europe "Supporting Criminal Justice Reform in the Republic of Moldova" funded by the Government of Denmark
- Law no.254 / 2013 on the execution of sentences and detention measures ordered by judicial bodies during criminal proceedings
- Law No. 46/2003 on patient's rights
- Order of the Minister of Health no. 1410/2016 on the approval of the Rules for the application of the Patient Rights Law no. 46/2003
- Istanbul Protocol - Manual for Effective Investigation and Documentation on Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment Proposed to the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights 9 August 1999

[27] Art. 72 paragraph (3) of the Law no.254 / 2013 on the execution of sentences and detention measures ordered by judicial bodies during criminal proceedings

[28] Article 21 of Law No. 46/2003 on Patient Rights

[29] Health care and medical ethics in penitentiaries - Manual for medical staff and other penitentiary employees responsible for the welfare of detainees; The Romanian version published with financial support The Romanian version is published with the financial support of the Council of Europe Project "Supporting the Criminal Justice Reform of the Council of Europe Project" Supporting the Reform of Criminal Justice in the Republic of Moldova ", financed by the Government of Denmark, p.12

- Documents at the level of the Medical Directorate of the National Administration of Penitentiaries in Romania (Dr. Laurenţia Ştefan and Dr. Cosmin Decun at ANP-DSDRP-SPEDT No. 51084 / 11.09.2017, regarding the deficiencies found during the deployment missions for the transfer of detainees; Autoaggressive Behavior - Editorial Medical Directorate and Social Reintegration Division)
- Doctor-Patient Relationship in Detention Area - Dr. Constantin Ouatu - Iaşi Penitentiary, Dr. Beatrice Ioan - IML Iaşi, Dr. Diana Bulgaru Iliescu - IML Iaşi www.bioetica.ro/index.php/arhiva-bioetica/article /download/.../529
- The Limits of Medical Secrecy, essay author DR. MIHAELA-CATALINA VICOL https://www.ziaruldeiasi.ro/opinii/limitele-secretului-medical~ni4mg2
- LE CAISINE (L.),, Prison - One ethnologue en central, Editions Odile Jacob, Paris, 2000, p. 78-79.
- http: // www.scritub.com - Specialized Penitentiary Intervention - Accessed on 29.02.2018
- Law no. 46/2003 on patient's rights
- Consent and Confidentiality in the Healthcare of Women Victims of Domestic Violence Sorin Hostiuc, Cristian George Curca, Dan Dermengiu - Romanian Journal of Bioethics, Vol. 9,Nr. 1, January - March 2011 Page 41
- https://legeaz.net/noul-cod-penal/art-227
- INML course - Bioethics Legal responsibility in the medical act. Bioethics as medical science. Confidentiality and consensus in medical practice. Aspects of legislation
- http: // www.scritube.com./sociology / environment-penitentiary, accessed on 26.02.2018
- Communication in the Romanian concentration camp - Dragoş Cârciga https://foaienationala.ro/comunicarea-spaiul-concentraionar-romnesc.html
- The Influence of the Penitentiary Environment on Criminological Crime Barbu Ana-Maria pag.3 http://www.drept.unibuc.ro/Influence-of-the-Penitentiary-of-criminal-of-pricing-of-criminal-critical - Barbu-Ana-Maria-s289-A527-ro.htm
- The Code of Medical Deontology of the Romanian College of Physicians in 2005
- https://www.universuljuridic.ro/despre-confidentialitatea-informatiilor-si-viata-privata-a-pacientilor/GeorgeCOCA
- Legal Considerations on Medical Professional Confidentiality, Between the Obligation to Preserve and the Disclosure of DrD. Ilie Dumitru lawyer, Bucharest Bar Association, Jurnal Universul Magazine, no. 9, September 2016

LEGISLATIVE MEASURES ON THE ISSUE OF PRISON OVERCROWDING AND IMPROPER MATERIAL CONDITIONS OF DETENTION, FOLLOWING THE ECtHR PILOT-JUDGMENT REZMIVEȘ AND OTHERS AGAINST ROMANIA

Radu Florin GEAMĂNU*

Abstract

This paper deals with the issue of prison overcrowding and improper material conditions of detention.

The first part of the study is developed based on the national standards, followed by a presentation of the international standards (United Nations, Council of Europe, European Union), dwelling especially on the provisions of the European Convention of Human Rights and of the European Prison Rules.

An analysis is made based on the ECtHR judgements regarding prison overcrowding and the infringement of the art. 3 of the European Convention of Human Rights regarding the prohibition of torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Further, the paper focuses on the main ECtHR pilot judgements on overcrowding and material conditions of detention, especially those against Romania. Iacov Stanciu case and Rezvimeș and others case.

We will also evaluate the current and possible solutions to solve the issue of prison overcrowding and improper material conditions of detention, namely solutions that will, in the future, avoid convictions in front of the ECtHR: different compensatory remedies for prisoners executing the penalty in overcrowding prisons.

Concluding, the study will attempt to express some recommendations in drafting future legislative measures in order to limit the problem of prison overcrowding.

Keywords: prison overcrowding; material conditions of detention; ECHR; ECtHR; Romanian legislation.

1. Introduction

According to art. 3 (prohibition of torture) from the European Convention of Human Rights, ”No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.”

The unconditional terms of article 3 also mean that there can never, under the Convention or under international law, be a justification for acts which breach the article. In other words, there can be no factors which are treated by a domestic legal system as justification for resort to prohibited behaviour – not the behaviour of the victim, the pressure on the perpetrator to further an investigation or prevent a crime, any external circumstances or any other factor[1].

While measures depriving a person of his liberty may often involve an inevitable element of suffering or humiliation, nevertheless, the suffering and humiliation involved must not go beyond the inevitable element of suffering or humiliation connected with a given form of legitimate treatment or punishment[2].

The ECtHR has emphasized that a detained person does not, by the mere fact of his incarceration, lose the protection of his rights guaranteed by the Convention. On the contrary, persons in custody are in a vulnerable position and the authorities are under a duty to protect them. Under art. 3 the State must ensure that a person is detained in conditions which are compatible with respect for his human dignity, that the manner and method of the execution of the measure do not subject him to distress or hardship of an intensity exceeding the unavoidable level of suffering inherent in detention and that, given the practical demands of imprisonment, his health and well-being are adequately secured[3].

If the problem of prison overcrowding amounts to a structural problem, in many cases already acknowledged by the domestic authorities or by regional commitees, such as the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (C.P.T.), then the ECtHR will give a so-called ”pilot judgment” by which the Court concludes that the overcrowding in prisons from a certain Member State revealed a structural problem consisting of “a practice that is incompatible with the Convention”[4].

It should be stressd out that in such cases, the respondent State has a legal obligation under Article 46 of the Convention not just to pay those concerned the sums awarded by way of just satisfaction under Article

* PhD., Faculty of Law, ”Nicolae Titulescu” University, Bucharest, Legal Adviser, Romanian Ministry of Justice (e-mail: radurfg@yahoo.com).

[1] A. Reidy, The prohibition of torture. A guide to the implementation of Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights (Human rights handbooks, No. 6, Directorate General of Human Rights, Council of Europe, 2002), 19, available at: https://www.echr.coe.int/LibraryDocs/HR%20handbooks/handbook06_en.pdf, accessed 12.03.2018.

[2] ECtHR, judgment from 20.10.2011, in the case of Mandić and Jović v. Slovenia, nos. 5774/10 and 5985/10, para. 73.

[3] ECtHR, Valašinas v. Lithuania, no. 44558/98, § 102, ECHR 2001-VIII; Kudła v. Poland [GC], no. 30210/96, § 94, ECHR 2000-XI.

[4] ECtHR, judgment from 22.10.2009, in the case of Orchowski v. Poland, no. 17885/04, para. 147.

41, but also to select, subject to supervision by the Committee of Ministers, the general and/or, if appropriate, individual measures to be adopted in their domestic legal order to put an end to the violation found by the Court and to redress so far as possible the effects. The respondent State remains free, subject to monitoring by the Committee of Ministers, to choose the means by which it will discharge its legal obligation under Article 46 of the Convention, provided that such means are compatible with the conclusions set out in the Court's judgment[5].

2. Prison overcrowding

2.1. Relevant internal legislation

By depriving a person of his or her liberty the authorities assume responsibility for providing for that person's vital needs. The deprivation of liberty in itself bears a punitive character. The state has no authority to aggravate this by poor conditions of detention that do not meet the standards the state has committed itself to upholding[6].

The right to life, as well as the right to physical and mental integrity of persons is guaranteed by article 22 of the Romanian Constitution, which also provides that no one may be subject to torture or to any kind of inhuman or degrading punishment or treatment. Death penalty is prohibited.

The execution of criminal custodial penalties is subordinated to two principles; according to the provisions of Law no. 254/2013 on enforcement of custodial penalties and of measures ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal proceedings[7] (Law no. 254/2013), art. 4 and 5, the custodial sentences shall be enforced under conditions that ensure the respect for human dignity and it shall be forbidden to subject any prisoner to torture, inhuman or degrading treatment or other ill-treatment. The violation of such provisions shall be punishable under the Criminal Code[8].

According to the provisions of Law no. 254/2013, the execution of the imprisonment or life imprisonment sentences are executed in designated places, called prisons. The execution of sentences in prisons is made by classifying the person into one of the execution regimes provided by Law no. 254/2013: maximum safety, closed, semi-open or open.

The legal provisions regarding the accomodation of the prisoners are set out in art. 34-38:

- the convicted persons serving the sentence in a maximum security regime shall be accommodated, as a general rule, individually;
- the convicted persons that serve the sentence in a closed regime shall be accommodated, as a general rule, together with other prisoners (from the same regime);
- the convicted persons that serve the sentence in a semi-open regime shall be accommodated together and may go unattended to pre-determined areas inside the premises of the penitentiary;
- the convicted persons that serve the sentence in a open regime are accommodated together and may go unattended to pre-determined areas inside the premises of the penitentiary.

The minimum standards regarding the accommodation of the prisoners are regulated in art. 48 para. (3), (4), (7) of Law no. 254/2013. In this sense, the law stipulates that the prisoners are accommodated individually or toghether with other convicted persons. The rooms for accommodation and other rooms intended for prisoners shall have natural lighting and

---

[5] ECtHR, Scozzari and Giunta v. Italy [GC], nos. 39221/98 and 41963/98, § 249, ECHR 2000-VIII.

[6] Association for the Prevention of Torture (APT), Monitoring places of detention. A practical guide, (Geneva, April 2004), 139, available at: http://www.apt.ch/content/files_res/monitoring-guide-en.pdf, accessed 12.03.2018.

[7] Law no. 254/2013 on enforcement of penalties and of measures ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal proceedings, published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 514 of August 14, 2013.

[8] Art. 281. Submission to ill treatment

(1) Submission of an individual to serve a sentence, security or education measures otherwise than as provided by the legal provisions shall be punishable by no less than 6 months and no more than 3 years of imprisonment and the deprivation of the right to hold a public office.

(2) Submission of an individual who is being withheld, detained or serving a custodial sentence, or security or education measures to degrading or inhuman treatments serve a sentence, security or education measures otherwise than as provided by the legal provisions shall be punishable by no less than 1 and no more than 3 years of imprisonment and the deprivation of the right to hold a public office.

Art. 282. Torture

(1) The act of a public servant holding a public office that involves the exercise of state authority or of other person acting upon the instigation of or with the express or tacit consent thereof to cause an individual pain or intense suffering, either physically or mentally:

a) to obtain from that person or from a third party information or statements,

b) to punish him/her for an act perpetrated by him/her or by a third party or that he/she or a third party is suspected to have perpetrated,

c) to intimidate or pressure him/her or a third party,

d) for a reason based on any form of discrimination, shall be punishable by no less than 2 and no more than 7 years of imprisonment and a ban on the exercise of certain rights.

(2) If the act set out in par. (1) resulted in bodily injury, the penalty shall consist of no less than 3 and no more than 10 years of imprisonment and a ban on the exercise of certain rights.

(3) Torture that resulted in the victim's death shall be punishable by no less than 15 and no more than 25 years of imprisonment and a ban on the exercise of certain rights.

(4) An attempt to perpetrate the offenses set out in par. (1) shall be punished.

(5) No exceptional circumstance, regardless of its nature or of whether it involves a state of war or war threats, internal political instability or any other exceptional state, can be called upon to justify torture. The order of a superior or of a public authority cannot be called upon to justify torture either.

(6) The pain or suffering that result exclusively from legal sanctions and which are inherent thereto or caused by them do not constitute torture.

the facilities necessary to ensure appropriate artificial lighting. Every prisoner shall be provided with a bed and the bedding set.

Furthermore, according to the Order of the Minister of Justice no. 2772/C/2017 for the approval of the Minimum Rules for the accommodation of persons deprived of their liberty[9], the areas intended to accommodate persons deprived of their liberty must respect human dignity and meet minimum sanitary and hygienic standards, taking into account the living area, air volume, lighting, heating and ventilation sources, observing, also, the climate conditions. The setting out of the accommodation rooms in the existing buildings in the places of detention shall be achieved by maximizing the holding spaces, depending on the structural configuration of the buildings, in order to allocate more than 4 square meters (sq.m.) space for each prisoner. In the case of collective accommodation, the ensurance of a personal space of more than 4 square meters shall be carried out with priority for the maximum safety regime and the closed regime.

The accommodation rooms in the prisons to be built, as well as those to be subject to major repairs, upgrades, transformations shall provide a larger area of 4 sq.m. for each prisoner in the case of joint accommodation and 6 sq.m., respectively, where the accommodation is made individually.

In addition, regarding the conditions of accommodation in the Romanian prisons, the Ombudsman, in its special report, pointed out the existence of the following: inadequate accommodation conditions caused by the age of the buildings; infiltrations, moisture, mold in the walls of the rooms; poor ventilation; high-wear of the bedding sets; damaged sanitary facilities; insufficient quantity and inadequate quality of personal hygiene products distributed to prisoners; reduced number of showers and toilets in opposition with the number of prisoners housed in the rooms, and, in some cases, lack of privacy to meet physiological needs; insects and pests; the reduction of the electricity and water supply program in some prisons due to budget constraints; dimensions, arrangements, and sometimes the inappropriate location of walking courts; washing and drying personal belongings in the rooms; the lack of furniture for the preservation of personal belongings[10].

2.2. International standards

a) We note[11] that the issue of prison overcrowding is well covered at the level of universal and regional instruments, the message of international bodies being directed to the effort that Member States need to develop in order to reduce the phenomenon, including by developing alternative sanctions for imprisonment:

- by the Economic and Social Council Resolution from 1997[12] it is requested to the Secretary-General to assist countries, at their request, and within existing resources or, where possible, funded by extrabudgetary resources if available, in the improvement of their prison conditions in the form of advisory services, needs assessment, capacity-building and training and it urges Member States, if they have not yet done so, to introduce appropriate alternatives to imprisonment in their criminal justice systems;
- the Recommendation No. R (99) 22 of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe concerning prison overcrowding and prison population inflation[13] highlights the problem of prison overcrowding as a generalized problem, which requires the need for action plans from the point of view of the prison administrations, as well as from the point of view of the criminal system as a whole, the basic principle being that deprivation of liberty must be applied only as a last resort when the seriousness of the act is so great that any other measure would be ineffective, requiring that national non-custodial sanctions to be put in place. The text contains a number of pertinent advices and suggestions for practical steps to be taken at all levels - legislative, judicial and executive.

Also, the White Paper on Prison Overcrowding[14] highlights points that could be of interest for a dialogue that should be initiated and maintained by the national authorities in order to agree on and implement efficiently long-term strategies and specific actions to deal with prison overcrowding as part of a general reform of their penal policies in line with contemporary academic research and realistic expectations of the role criminal law and crime policy should play in society. Also, the national authorities should keep under review to what extent imprisonment is playing an appropriate role in tackling crime and to what extent those who are released are prepared for reintegrating society and for leading crime-free life.

- at European Union level, the direct impact that detention conditions can entail on the proper functioning of the principle of mutual

[9] Order of the Minister of Justice no. 2772/C/2017 for the approval of the Minimum Rules for the accommodation of persons deprived of their liberty, published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 822 of October 18, 2017.

[10] Romanian Ombudsman, Annual activity report 2015 (Bucharest, 2016), 416, available at: http://www.avp.ro/rapoarte-anuale/raport_2015_avp.pdf, accessed 12.03.2018.

[11] R. F. Geamănu, Mijloace de protecție a persoanelor condamnate la pedepse privative de libertate (Ph. D. Thesis, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, 2017, available at the Library of the University), 96-97.

[12] The Economic and Social Council Resolution no. 1997/36 from 21.07.1997 on International cooperation for the improvement of prison conditions, available at: http://www.un.org/documents/ecosoc/res/1997/eres1997-36.htm, accessed 12.03.2018.

[13] Recommendation No. R (99) 22 of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe concerning prison overcrowding and prison population inflation, available at: https://search.coe.int/cm/Pages/result_details.aspx?ObjectID=09000016804d8171, accessed 12.03.2018.

[14] European Committee on Crime Problems (CDPC), White Paper on Prison Overcrowding (PC-CP\docs 2016\PC-CP(2015)6_e rev7, Strasbourg, 30 June 2016), 5, para. 8, available at: https://rm.coe.int/16806f9a8a, accessed 12.03.2018.

recognition of judicial decisions is understandable. Prison overcrowding and allegations of ill-treatment to prisoners can undermine the mutual confidence needed to strengthen judicial cooperation within the European Union.

b) Acknowledging the fact that the persons deprived of their liberty are in a fragile position, it is the duty of the states to ensure the full respect of their fundamental rights, in accordance with their own national legislation and, also, respecting the international standards.

Human rights protection is of paramount importance in the present days. In this respect, special attention needs to be given to the protection of the persons deprived of their liberty as they are in a fragile position and it is the duty of the state to ensure the full respect of their fundamental rights. The European system established by the Council of Europe constitutes a bulwark in protecting the fundamental rights and freedoms of the persons deprived of their liberty[15].

According to the well-established case-law of the Court, ill-treatment must attain a minimum level of severity if it is to fall within the scope of Article 3. The assessment of this minimum level of severity is relative; it depends on all the circumstances of the case, such as the duration of the treatment, its physical and mental effects and, in some cases, the sex, age and state of health of the victim (see, inter alia, Price v. the United Kingdom, no. 33394/96, § 24, ECtHR 2001-VII). In order for a punishment or treatment associated with it to be "inhuman" or "degrading", the suffering or humiliation involved must in any event go beyond that inevitable element of suffering or humiliation connected with a given form of legitimate treatment or punishment (see Labita v. Italy [GC], no. 26772/95, § 120, ECtHR 2000-IV) [16].

While there may have been certain past shortcomings in the Court`s jurisprudence on what can be termed "passive" ill-treatment (rather than the actual infliction of physical or psychological ill-treatment), the traditional reluctance of the Court (and of the former Commission) to accept that art. 3 applied to poor material conditions of detention has been shed in favour of a more critical approach to prison regimes[17].

In order to infringe the provisions of art. 3 of the Convention, the material conditions of detention[18] must attain a superior level of humiliation or degradation to what is normally implied by the deprivation of liberty.[19] The European Court of Human Rights has not established abstract criteria or standards to qualify a particular act as contrary to art. 3, but rather the assessment of compliance with the provisions of the Convention shall be made according to the circumstances of each case: the duration of the treatment, the physical or psychological effects, the sex, the age, the state of health of the person concerned[20]. The assessment of these conditions is present, for example, in the Trepashkin case[21], in which the ECtHR deals with the existing relationship between the recommendations of some international bodies on the minimum space and the analysis made by the Court in its cases. Thus, the Court recognized that violations of art. 3 are to be found in its case-law because of the lack of personal space for persons deprived of their liberty, but it emphasized that it can not establish, as a rule, how much personal space is needed for a prisoner in order to be in accordance with the Convention. Moreover, although the Court takes into account general standards developed by other international institutions (such as the C.P.T.), this can not be a decisive argument in finding a violation of art. 3 of the Convention. Concerning the conditions of detention, ECtHR applies the protection standard offered by art. 3 for all Member States to the Convention, irrespective of the economic or other conditions existing in a State; the lack of resources can not justify detention conditions that are so poor that they can be considered as contrary to art. 3[22]. In other words, the lack of financing of the penitentiary system, even based on real circumstances, is not a cause of non-punishment or irresponsibility for the Member States.

In the Marian Stoicescu case[23], the applicant was imprisoned in a penitentiary cell in which he had about 1,35-1,60 sq.m. (perhaps even less, observing the furniture found in the room), personal space inferior to that recommended by the C.P.T. to the Romanian authorities. The lack of adequate personal space, correlated with the applicant's obligation to share the bed with other inmates, the non-drinking water, the fact

[15] R. F. Geamănu, Use of force and instruments of restraint – an outline of the Romanian legislation in the European context (The International Conference CKS-CERDOCT Doctoral Schools, Challenges of the Knowledge Society, Bucharest, April 15-16, 2011, CKS-CERDOCT eBook 2011, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, 2011), 112, available at: http://cerdoct.univnt.ro/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=54&Itemid=63&dir=JSROOT%2FCKS%2F2011_15_16_aprilie&download_file=JSROOT%2FCKS%2F2011_15_16_aprilie%2FCKS_CERDOCT_2011_eBook.pdf, accessed 12.03.2018.

[16] ECtHR, judgment from 20.11.2012, in the case of Ghiurău v. Romania, para. 52-53.

[17] J. Murdoch, The treatment of prisoners. European standards, (Council of Europe Publishing, Strasbourg, 2006, reprinted 2008), 200.

[18] See R. F. Geamănu, Condițiile materiale de detenție ale persoanelor private de libertate în lumina art. 3 din Convenția Europeană a Drepturilor Omului și Libertăților Fundamentale (Dreptul Magazine, no. 12/2009, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2009), 178-190.

[19] Fr. Sudre, Article 3 in L.-E. Pettiti, E. Decaux, P.-H. Imbert, La Convention Europeenne des droits de l'homme: Commentaire article par article (2e edition, Economica Publishing House, Paris, 1999), 171.

[20] See ECtHR, judgment from 16.06.2000, in the case of Labzov v. Russia, para. 41; ECtHR, judgment from 24.07.2001, in the case of Valasinas v. Lithuania, para. 101; ECtHR, judgment from 09.06.2005, in the case of II v. Bulgaria, para. 66.

[21] ECtHR, judgment from 19.07.2007, in the case of Trepashkin v. Russia, para. 92.

[22] See ECtHR, judgment from 29.04.2003, in the case of Aliev v. Ukraine, para. 151; ECtHR, judgment from 29.04.2003, in the case of Poltoratski v. Ukraine, para. 148; ECtHR, judgment from 06.12.2007, in the case of Bragadireanu v. Romania, para. 84.

[23] ECtHR, judgment from 16.07.2009, in the case of Marin Stoicescu v. Romania, para. 24-25.

that he was entitled to less than an hour's walk per day constitutes, in the opinion of ECtHR, a violation of art. 3 of the Convention.

Regarding the phenomenon of overcrowding and the possible violation of the provisions of art. 3 of the European Convention, it is necessary to highlight the relatively recent approach in the matter - in a decision rendered by the Grand Chamber of ECtHR (the Muršić case[24]) it confirmed the standard predominant in its case-law of 3 sq.m. of floor surface per detainee in multi-occupancy accommodation as the relevant minimum standard under art. 3 of the Convention. When the personal space available to a detainee falls below 3 sq.m. of floor surface in multi-occupancy accommodation in prisons, the lack of personal space is considered so severe that a strong presumption of a violation of art. 3 arises. The burden of proof is on the respondent Government which could, however, rebut that presumption by demonstrating that there were factors capable of adequately compensating for the scarce allocation of personal space. The strong presumption of a violation of art. 3 will normally be capable of being rebutted only if the following factors are cumulatively met: the reductions in the required minimum personal space of 3 sq. m are short, occasional and minor; such reductions are accompanied by sufficient freedom of movement outside the cell and adequate out-of-cell activities; the applicant is confined in what is, when viewed generally, an appropriate detention facility, and there are no other aggravating aspects of the conditions of his or her detention.

Also, the Court ruled that in cases where a prison cell – measuring in the range of 3 to 4 sq.m. of personal space per inmate – is at issue the space factor remains a weighty factor in the Court's assessment of the adequacy of conditions of detention. In such instances a violation of art. 3 will be found if the space factor is coupled with other aspects of inappropriate physical conditions of detention related to, in particular, access to outdoor exercise, natural light or air, availability of ventilation, adequacy of room temperature, the possibility of using the toilet in private, and compliance with basic sanitary and hygienic requirements. The Court also stressed that in cases where a detainee disposed of more than 4 sq.m. of personal space in multi-occupancy accommodation in prison and where therefore no issue with regard to the question of personal space arises, other aspects of physical conditions of detention referred to above remain relevant for the Court's assessment of adequacy of an applicant's conditions of detention under art. 3 of the Convention.

c) From the procedural point of view, where an individual raises an arguable claim that he has been seriously ill-treated in breach of article 3 of the Convention, the member state has an obligation to initiate a thorough, prompt, independent and effective investigation, which should be capable of leading to the establishment of the facts of the case and, if the allegations prove to be true, to the identification and punishment of those responsible. This means that the authorities must always make a serious attempt to find out what happened and should not rely on hasty or ill-founded conclusions to close their investigation or as the basis of their decisions. They must take all reasonable steps available to them to secure the evidence concerning the incident, including, inter alia, eyewitness testimony, forensic evidence etc. Any deficiency in the investigation which undermines its ability to establish the cause of injuries or to identity the persons responsible will risk falling foul of this standard. For an effective investigation into alleged ill-treatment by state agents, such investigation should be independent[25]. In considering all these aspects, the Court found a violation of article 3 of the Convention under its procedural head in several cases against Romania, as the national authorities failed to fulfilll their obligation to conduct a proper official investigation into the applicant's allegations of ill-treatment, capable of leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible[26].

Concluding, it can be noted that the jurisprudential rules set out by ECtHR with regard to the treatment of detained persons, although simple, are harsh for the authorities. Positive obligations find here a fertile ground for development: not only the procedural obligation to conduct an effective investigation but also the obligations to prevent violations of art. 3 against persons in custody due to their high vulnerability to such treatments[27].

d) Recommendation Rec(2006)2 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the European Prison Rules[28] contains provisions on the accommodation of the prisoners (rule 18): the accommodation provided for prisoners, and in particular all sleeping accommodation, shall respect human dignity and, as far as possible, privacy, and meet the requirements of health and hygiene, due regard being paid to climatic conditions and especially to floor space, cubic content of air, lighting, heating and ventilation.

[24] ECtHR, judgment from 20.10.2016, in the case of Muršić v. Croatia, para. 91-177, esp. 136-141.

[25] ECtHR judgement from 26.01.2006, in the case of Mikhenyev v. Russia, para. 107-108 and 110.

[26] ECtHR judgement from 12.10.2004, in the case of Bursuc v. Romania, para. 110; ECtHR judgement from 26.04.2007, in the case of Dumitru Popescu (no.1) v. Romania, para. 78-79; ECtHR judgement from 26.07.2007, in the case of Cobzaru v. Romania, para. 75; ECtHR judgement from 05.10.2004, in the case of Barbu Anghelescu v. Romania, para. 70; ECtHR judgement from 21.07.2009, in the case of Alexandru Marius Radu v. Romania, para. 47, 52; ECtHR judgement from 22.06.2010, in the case of Boroancă v. Romania, para. 50-51.

[27] B. Selejan-Guțan, Spațiul European al drepturilor omului. Reforme, practici, provocări (C. H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008), 121.

[28] Recommendation Rec(2006)2 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the European Prison Rules, adopted by the Committee of Ministers on 11 January 2006 at the 952nd meeting of the Ministers'Deputies.

In all buildings where prisoners are required to live, work or congregate: the windows shall be large enough to enable the prisoners to read or work by natural light in normal conditions and shall allow the entrance of fresh air except where there is an adequate air conditioning system; artificial light shall satisfy recognised technical standards.

Prisoners shall normally be accommodated during the night in individual cells except where it is preferable for them to share sleeping accommodation. Accommodation shall only be shared if it is suitable for this purpose and shall be occupied by prisoners suitable to associate with each other.

e) The Standards of the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (C.P.T.), as they have been mentioned in the General Reports, contain a number of principles with regard to accommodation conditions of the persons deprived of their liberty. According to C.P.T., the issue of what is a reasonable size for a police cell (or any other type of detainee/prisoner accommodation) is a difficult question. Many factors have to be taken into account when making such an assessment. However, C.P.T. delegations felt the need for a rough guideline in this area. The following criterion (seen as a desirable level rather than a minimum standard) is currently being used when assessing police cells intended for single occupancy for stays in excess of a few hours: in the order of 7 sq.m., 2 metres or more between walls, 2.5 metres between floor and ceiling[29].

It should be stressed out that the C.P.T. standards are frequently mentioned by ECtHR in its case law, when referring to the relevant international instruments in the analized cases[30].

2.3. ECtHR pilot-judgement

In view of the significant influx of requests against Romania over overcrowding and material conditions of detention, the European Court of Human Rights considered it necessary in 2012 to address the Romanian authorities under art. 46 of the Convention[31], but without using the pilot-judgment procedure[32].

In July 2012 the ECtHR renderred a ”semi-pilot” judgment in the case of Iacov Stanciu33 in which it pointed out that, despite efforts of the Romanian authorities to improve the situation of the conditions of detention, there is a structural problem in this field. The Court did not imposed a time limit to remedy the deficiencies found[34].

Following the Iacov Stanciu case, on 25 April 2017 the ECtHR gave a pilot-judgment in Rezvimeș and others v. Romania case[35] in which it stated that, within six months from the date on which the judgment became final, the Romanian State had to provide, in cooperation with the Committee of Ministers, a precise timetable for the implementation of the appropriate general measures to solve the problem of prison overcrowding and of poor detention conditions, in line with the Convention principles as stated in the pilot-judgement. The Court also decided to adjourn the examination of similar applications that had not yet been communicated to the Romanian Government pending the implementation of the necessary measures at domestic level.

The source of the case is represented by four applications against Romania, by which four Romanian nationals, namely Daniel Arpad Rezmiveș, Laviniu Moșmonea, Marius Mavroian, Iosif Gazsi, seized the Court on 14 September 2012, 6 June 2013, 24 July 2013 and 15 October 2013, relying on Article 34 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. The case concerned the violation of art. 3 of the Convention concerning the conditions of detention in various prisons and in detention facilities attached to police stations – Police detention facility Baia Mare and the prisons Gherla, Aiud, Oradea, Craiova, Târgu-Jiu, Pelendava, Rahova, Tulcea, Iași, Vaslui (the applicants complained, among other things, of overcrowding in their cells, inadequate sanitary facilities, lack of hygiene, poor-quality food, dilapidated equipment and the presence of rats and insects in the cells). On 15th September 2015 a Chamber with the Third Section of the Court informed the parties that, given the fact that it was a structural deficiency, the Court intended to apply art. 61 of the Regulation and invited them to provide observations in this respect. In accordance with art. 41 and art. 61 § 2 lit. c) of the Regulation, the Court also decided to examine the above mentioned applications with celerity. Both the

[29] European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CPT), 2nd General Report on the CPT's activities, covering the period 1 January to 31 December 1991 [CPT/Inf (92) 3], Strasbourg, 13 April 1992, para. 43, available at: https://rm.coe.int/1680696a3f, accessed 12.03.2018.

[30] See, for example, ECtHR judgement from 08.11.2005, in the case of Khudoyorov v. Russia, para. 98; ECtHR judgement from 01.06.2006, in the case of Mamedova v. Russia, para. 52-53; ECtHR judgement from 02.06.2005, in the case of Novoselov v. Russia, para. 32.

[31] Art. 46. Binding force and execution of judgments

1. The High Contracting Parties undertake to abide by the final judgment of the Court in any case to which they are parties.

2. The final judgment of the Court shall be transmitted to the Committee of Ministers, which shall supervise its execution. (…)

[32] R. Pașoi, D. Mihai, Hotărârea pilot în cauza Rezmiveș și alții împotriva României în materia condițiilor de detenție, 28.04.2017, available at: https://www.juridice.ro/507966/hotararea-pilot-cauza-rezmives-si-altii-impotriva-romaniei-materia-conditiilor-de-detentie.html, accessed 12.03.2018.

[33] ECtHR, judgment from 24.07.2012, in the case of Iacov Stanciu v. Romania, no. 35972/05.

[34] Timetable for the implementation of measures 2018-2024 to resolve the issue of prison overcrowding and conditions of detention with a view to executing the pilot-judgment Rezmiveș and others against Romania, delivered by the ECtHR on 25 aprilie 2017, adopted by the Romanian Government on 17th February 2018, p. 6, available at: http://www.just.ro/wp-content/uploads/2018/01/calendar-masuri.pdf, accessed 12.03.2018.

[35] ECtHR, judgment from 25.04.2017, in the case of Rezvimeș and others v. Romania, nos. 61467/12, 39516/13, 48231/13 and 68191/13.

Government and the applicants provided observations concerning the application of the pilot-judgment procedure[36].

The Court found that, despite the fact that the measures taken by the authorities up to that date could contribute to the improvement of the living and sanitation conditions in Romanian prisons, coherent and long term measures, such as the implementation of additional measures, had to be put in place in order to ensure the full compliance with art. 3 and 46 of the Convention. The Court also held that, in order to comply with the obligations emerging from its previous judgments in similar cases, an appropriate and efficient system of internal means of redress had to be created. When the judgement was delivered the Court found that the applicants' situation was part of a general problem originating in a structural dysfunction specific to the Romanian prison system which affected and can affect in the future numerous persons. Despite the legislative, administrative and budgetary measures taken at domestic level, the systemic character of the problem identified in 2012 persisted, so the situation found represents a practice which is not compatible with the Convention[37].

Prison overcrowding is a recurring problem for many prison administrations in Europe. Many of the 47 Council of Europe member states have overcrowded prisons and in many states where the total number of prisoners is lower than the available accommodation places still specific prisons may often suffer from overcrowding. According to SPACE I statistics, in 2012 there was overcrowding in 22 out of the 47 countries of the Council of Europe. In 2013, the number of countries with overcrowding went down to 21, and in 2014 to 13. In 2013, 19 of the prison administrations having overcrowded prisons were the same as in 2012. According to the C.P.T. published reports on visits the number of countries suffering from prison overcrowding is estimated to be higher. This difference is explained by the fact that each country used its own standards to calculate overcrowding when filling in the questionnaire on which SPACE is based. On the contrary, the C.P.T. uses its own standards to calculate overcrowding[38].

Romania's situation regarding prison overcrowding and material conditions of detention is not singular. Thus, with regard to the other member states of the Council of Europe, it should be noted that until now, ECtHR has issued several judgments, finding a structural and systemic problem with regard to material conditions of detention and, thus, an infringment of the provisions set out in art. 3 of the Convention:

- Poland, following Orchowski case[39]. In 2016, the Committee of Ministers, under the terms of art. 46, paragraph 2, of the ECHR, which provides that the Committee supervises the execution of final judgments of the ECtHR, having examined the action report provided by the government indicating the measures adopted in order to give effect to the judgments including the information provided regarding the payment of the just satisfaction awarded by the Court decided to close the examination thereof[40].
- Slovenia, following Mandić and Jović case[41] (envisaging only Ljubljana prison), in which the Court encourages the State to develop an effective instrument which would provide a speedy reaction to complaints concerning inadequate conditions of detention and ensure that, when necessary, a transfer of a detainee is ordered to Convention compatible conditions. The case is under the supervision of the Committee of Ministers.
- Russia, following Ananyev and others case[42], in which the Court encourages the State to produce, in co-operation with the Council of Europe Committee of Ministers, within six months from the date on which the judgment became final, a binding time frame for implementing preventive and compensatory measures in respect of the allegations of violations of Article 3 of the Convention. The case is under the supervision of the Committee of Ministers.
- Italy, following Torreggiani and others case[43], in which the Court requested Italy to put in place, within one year from the date on which the judgment became final, an effective domestic remedy or a combination of such remedies capable of affording, in accordance with Convention principles, adequate and sufficient redress in cases of overcrowding in prison. In 2016, the Committee of Ministers, under the terms of art. 46, paragraph 2, of the ECHR, which provides that the Committee supervises the execution of final judgments of the ECtHR, having noted with satisfaction the establishment of a system of computerised monitoring of the

[36] Timetable for the implementation of measures 2018-2024 to resolve the issue of prison overcrowding and conditions of detention with a view to executing the pilot-judgment Rezmiveș and others against Romania, delivered by the ECtHR on 25 aprilie 2017, 3.

[37] Timetable for the implementation of measures 2018-2024 to resolve the issue of prison overcrowding and conditions of detention with a view to executing the pilot-judgment Rezmiveș and others against Romania, delivered by the ECtHR on 25 aprilie 2017, 3.

[38] See European Committee on Crime Problems (CDPC), White Paper on Prison Overcrowding, 4, 6, 7, para. 1, 17, 19.

[39] ECtHR, judgment from 22.10.2009, in the case of Orchowski v. Poland, no. 17885/04.

[40] Resolution CM/ResDH(2016)254 Execution of the judgments of the European Court of Human Rights. Seven cases against Poland, adopted by the Committee of Ministers on 21 September 2016 at the 1265th meeting of the Ministers' Deputies, available at: https://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng#{"itemid":["001-167361"]}, accessed 12.03.2018.

[41] ECtHR, judgment from 20.10.2011, in the case of Mandić and Jović v. Slovenia, nos. 5774/10 and 5985/10.

[42] ECtHR, judgment from 10.01.2012, in the case of Ananyev and others v. Russia, nos. 42525/07 and 60800/08.

[43] ECtHR, judgment from 08.01.2013, in the case of Torreggiani and others v. Italy, nos. 43517/09, 46882/09, 55400/09, 57875/09, 61535/09, 35315/10 and 37818/10.

living space and conditions of detention of each detainee and an independent internal mechanism of supervision of detention facilities which will allow the competent authorities promptly to take the necessary corrective measures and welcoming the establishment of a combination of domestic remedies, preventive and compensatory, and noted the information provided on their functioning in practice confirming that these remedies appear to offer appropriate redress in respect of complaints concerning poor conditions of detention, decided to close the examination thereof[44].

- Belgium, following Vasilescu case[45], in which the Court recommended that the respondent State consider adopting general measures. On the one hand, measures should be taken to guarantee detainees conditions of detention in accordance with art. 3 of the Convention. On the other hand, an appeal should be available to detainees to prevent the continuation of an alleged violation or to allow the person concerned to obtain an improvement in his conditions of detention. The case is under the supervision of the Committee of Ministers.
- Bulgaria, following Neshkov and others case[46], in which the Court held that the respondent State must, within eighteen months from the date on which this judgment becomes final in accordance with art. 44 paragraph 2 of the Convention, make available a combination of effective domestic remedies in respect of conditions of detention that have both preventive and compensatory effects, to comply fully with the requirements set out in this judgment. The case is under the supervision of the Committee of Ministers.
- Hungary, following Varga and others case[47], in which the Court held that the respondent State should produce, under the supervision of the Committee of Ministers, within six months from the date on which this judgment becomes final, a time frame in which to make appropriate arrangements and to put in practice preventive and compensatory remedies in respect of alleged violations of art. 3 of the Convention on account of inhuman and degrading conditions of detention. The case is under the supervision of the Committee of Ministers.

2.4. Current and possible solutions to tackle the issue of prison overcrowding and improper material conditions of detention

2.4.1. General comments[48]

Based on the current legal framework, there is no possibility of granting compensatory damages by the judge in charge of the supervision of deprivation of liberty where prisoners complain about overcrowding and material conditions of detention. Such complaints will not be admissible because, on the one hand, the judge cannot grant compensations in the special procedure provided in art. 56 of Law 254/2013, and, on the other hand, the supervising judge can only control the measures of the prisons and not of the National Administration of Penitentiaries (N.A.P.). Thus, in this respect, if the judge's analysis reveals that overcrowding is not determined by any measure of the prison administration, but is a structural problem of the system, which is the sole responsibility of N.A.P., the prisoner's request will be rejected.

According to the legal provisions in force [art. 48 para.(8) Law no. 254/2013], in case the legal capacity of accommodation of the prison is exceeded, its director shall be required to inform the Director General of the N.A.P. with a view to transfer sentenced persons to other prisons. The Director General of the N.A.P. shall determine whether the transfer is required, by specifying the prisons to which the transfer of sentenced persons shall be carried out. It follows that the only measure that the prison administration can take in case of overcrowding is the notification of the director of the N.A.P., the only one able to decide the transfer of prisoners in order to avoid overcrowding and return to legal capacity of the prison.

In such cases, as those mentioned above, for the purpose of compensatory damages, prisoners have the option of appealing to the civil court on the basis of civil liability for damages caused by unlawful acts or, if the offending deeds have the form of criminal actions, the civil action may be joined to the criminal one. For example, a court[49] ruled in favour of a prisoner and decided that the Romanian State (through the Ministry of Public Finance) should pay the applicant the amount of 4,500 lei as civil damages. Specifically, in the present case, the court held that the applicant was subjected to detention conditions (in a police detention

[44] *Resolution CM/ResDH(2016)28 Execution of the judgments of the European Court of Human Rights, a*dopted by the Committee of Ministers* on 8 March 2016 at the 1250th meeting of the Ministers' Deputies, available at: https://search.coe.int/cm/Pages/result_details.aspx ?ObjectID=09000016805c1a5b, accessed 12.03.2018.

[45] ECtHR, judgment from 25.11.2014, in the case of Vasilescu v. Belgium, no. 64682/12.

[46] ECtHR, judgment from 27.01.2015, in the case of Neshkov and others v. Bulgaria, nos. 36925/10, 21487/12, 72893/12, 73196/12, 77718/12 and 9717/13.

[47] ECtHR, judgment from 10.05.2016, in the case of Varga and others v. Hungary, nos. 14097/12, 45135/12, 73712/12, 34001/13, 44055/13, and 64586/13.

[48] R. F. Geamănu, Mijloace de protecție a persoanelor condamnate la pedepse privative de libertate, 252-255.

[49] Vrancea District Court, 1st Civil section, judgment no. 96/2012.

center, but the findings of the court are valid, mutatis mutandis, in the case of prisons) contrary to art. 3 of the European Convention (only 2.5 sq.m. of personal space in the detention room, the lack of separation of the non-smokers from the smokers, the toilet did not meet the minimum requirements regarding privacy, the lack of access to the toilet during the night). These conditions were judged by the court as having a strong impact on the state of health and dignity of the person, so it was necessary to award compensating damages.

Regarding the compensatory damages that need to be awarded to prisoners for overcrowding and on the account of the material conditions of detention, the ECtHR ruled[50] that as to the domestic law on compensation, it must reflect the existence of the presumption that substandard conditions of detention have occasioned non-pecuniary damage to the aggrieved individual. Substandard material conditions are not necessarily due to problems within the prison system as such, but may also be linked to broader issues of penal policy. Moreover, even in a situation where individual aspects of the conditions of detention comply with the domestic regulations, their cumulative effect may be such as to constitute inhuman treatment. As the Court has repeatedly stressed, it is incumbent on the Government to organise its prison system in such a way that it ensures respect for the dignity of detainees. The level of compensation awarded for non-pecuniary damage by domestic courts when finding a violation of art. 3 must not be unreasonable taking into account the awards made by the Court in similar cases. The right not to be subjected to inhuman or degrading treatment is so fundamental and central to the system of the protection of human rights that the domestic authority or court dealing with the matter will have to provide compelling and serious reasons to justify their decision to award significantly lower compensation or no compensation at all in respect of non-pecuniary damage.

2.4.2. Measures put in place after the date on which the pilot-judgment was delivered

Regarding the measures put in place by the Romanian state, following the judgment in the Iacov Stanciu case, the Romanian Government adopted in 2012 a Memorandum by which the main lines of action were approved with a view to remedy the issues acknowledged. Also, at the beginning of 2016, the Romanian Goverment approved the Memorandum with the topic ECHR's intention to apply the pilot-judgment procedure in cases dealing with detention conditions, followed by the elaboration of the Plan of Measures attached to Recommendation no. 2 of the Memorandum which aims at improving the conditions of detention and reducing the overcrowding. Against this background, the National Prison Administration initiated measures for increasing and modernization of the accomodation capacity, according with the timetable approved, and the National Probation Department took measures for strengthening the probation system in order to allow for the implementation of community measures and sanctions[51].

By Law no. 169/2017 on the amendment and supplementation of Law no. 254/2013 a compensatory remedy was created for granting a benefit[52], meaning 6 days to be considered served for a number of 30 days of confinement in improper spaces of detention. Out of the total number of accommodation spaces, namely 187, the Justice Minister's Order established 156 as being improper, that is 83%. Between 19 October and 30 December 2017 a number of 912 persons deprived of their liberty were released on term from the prisons managed by the National Prison Administration, following the application of the provisions of Law no. 169/2017. A number of 2,718 persons deprived of their liberty benefitted of conditional release according with court decisions, following the application of the provisions of Law no. 169/2017[53].

The current regulation of compensatory mechanism leads to different solutions for persons in similar legal situations and raises from this perspective problems of incompatibility with fundamental law, which will probably be considered by the Constitutional Court at the right time. In the same line of reasoning, application of benefits of the law only to persons executing punishments (and as a consequence exclusion of those who served full sentence or were released on probation) creates the appearance of a constitutional conflict, in absence of another compensatory mechanism available to these categories, such as, for example, pecuniary compensation[54].

Of course, the problems tackled in Iacov Stanciu were stredded out in the following pilot-judgment, as the Court gave indications to the national authorities in order to put an end to the overcrowding in prisons problem. The Court, in Rezvimeș and others case, [50] ECtHR, judgment from 24.07.2012, in the case of Iacov Stanciu v. Romania, no. 35972/05, para. 196-199.

[51] Timetable for the implementation of measures 2018-2024 to resolve the issue of prison overcrowding and conditions of detention with a view to executing the pilot-judgment Rezmiveș and others against Romania, delivered by the ECtHR on 25 aprilie 2017, 6, 7.

[52] For an analysis of the new legal provisions see M. A. Hotca, Un bun început pentru respectarea hotărârii-pilot în cauza Rezmiveș și alții împotriva României – adoptarea Legii nr. 169/2017 privind modificarea și completarea Legii nr. 254/2013, 16.07.2017, available at: https://juridice.ro/essentials/1328/un-bun-inceput-pentru-respectarea-hotararii-pilot-in-cauza-rezmives-si-altii-impotriva-romaniei-adoptarea-legii-nr-1692017-privind-modificarea-si-completarea-legii-nr-2542013, accessed 12.03.2018.

[53] Timetable for the implementation of measures 2018-2024 to resolve the issue of prison overcrowding and conditions of detention with a view to executing the pilot-judgment Rezmiveș and others against Romania, delivered by the ECtHR on 25 aprilie 2017, 9.

[54] See, in the volume of this conference, C. N. Magdalena, Compensatory action - a new legislative action imposed on national authorities as consequence of recent case-law of the European Court of Human Rights (The International Conference CKS 2018 Challanges of the Knowledge Society, Bucharest, May 11-12, 2018, 12th Edition, CKS eBook 2018, "Nicolae Titulescu" University Publishing House).
In the study the author analyses some of the problems arising after entry into force of the Law no. 169/2017 and tries to find practical answers based on systemic, teleological and literal interpretation of substantive and procedural provisions.

requested the following measures from the Romanian authorities: to introduce measures to reduce overcrowding and improve the material conditions of detention.; to introduce remedies (a preventive remedy – which had to ensure that post-sentencing judges and the courts could put an end to situations breaching art. 3 of the Convention and award compensation – and a specific compensatory remedy – which had to ensure that appropriate compensation could be awarded for any violation of the Convention concerning inadequate living space and/or precarious material conditions).

2.4.2. Possible legislative measures to ensure an efficient remedy for the damage caused such as a compensatory remedy

I. As provided in the Timetable mentioned above, Romania will asess the prison overcrowding issue by exploring the possibility of adopting some legislative amendments with a view to awarding a financial compensation to persons who have applications pending with the ECtHR or who have the grounds to lodge an application with the ECHR.

II. The study of the legislations of other E.U. member states on prison overcrowding reveals different solutions in terms of awarding financial compensation for the prisoners executing the penalty in conditions that infringe art. 3 ECHR:

- In Slovenia, a measure provided by the law for obtaining compensatory remedy for inadequate conditions of detention is available under general civil law provision of art. 179 of the Obligations Code[55] in respect of damage sustained by prisoners. The procedure in which damage can be awarded to prisoners is a judicial (civil) procedure.

As regards prisoners who are still serving their terms, these prisoners can avail themselves of the avenue also provided in art. 84 of the Enforcement of Penal Sanctions Act to claim compensation directly from the person who inflicted the damage, as well as the general civil law avenue provided in art. 179 (in relation to art. 147) of the Obligations Code. Article 84 of the Enforcement of Penal Sanctions Act governs the possibility of obtaining compensation for violation, related to torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, as defined in Article 83 (see Paragraph 52) also directly from the person, who caused the damage. The purpose of the provision of Article 84 is to expose direct liability for damages from an individual, who is responsible for violation (torture or other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment) against the prisoner, in this respect the provision acts as a deterrent. Article 84 is a subsidiary remedy, as in accordance with the general rules of compensation (art. 147 of the Obligations Code on legal persons' liability – meaning the civil law liability of the Republic of Slovenia) – therefore the employee of the prison that caused the damage, as well as his employer - the state - are liable for damages[56].

- In Bulgaria, Section 3 of the 2009 Execution of Punishments and Pre-Trial Detention Act prohibits torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, provides that detention in poor conditions also amounts to such treatment, and gives a nonexhaustive list of circumstances which represent such treatment. The aim of this definition is to serve as clear guidance to the prison administration, the prosecutors and the relevant courts as to when conditions of detention go beyond the normal degree of suffering inherent in detention. The newly introduced procedures, which serve as remedies, clearly refer to that definition. As to the existence of a compensatory remedy, a new procedure has been introduced for awarding compensation. It contains explicit rules for shifting the burden of proof to the prison administration once a prima facie case is submitted to the court, a presumption that non-pecuniary damage have occurred due to the poor conditions of detention, and examination of the cumulative effect of the conditions on the detainee. The new provisions respond to the criticism of the Court and are in line with the requirements identified in its case-law[57].
- In Hungary, a new compensation procedure has been introduced in the Act No. CCXL of 2013 for the compensation for the grievances caused [55] (1) Just monetary compensation independent of the reimbursement of material damage shall pertain to the injured party for physical distress suffered, for mental distress suffered owing to a reduction in life activities, disfigurement, the defamation of good name or reputation, the curtailment of freedom or a personal right, or the death of a close associate, and for fear, if the circumstances of the case, particularly the level and duration of distress and fear, so justify, even if there was no material damage.

(2) The amount of compensation for non-material damage shall depend on the importance of the good affected and the purpose of the compensation, and may not support tendencies that are not compatible with the nature and purpose thereof.

[56] Action report. Communication from Slovenia concerning the Mandić and Jović group of cases v. Slovenia (Application No. 5774/10), DH-DD(2017)686, 1294th meeting (September 2017) (DH), para. 56, 63, available at: https://rm.coe.int/1680727da8, accessed 12.03.2018.

[57] Action report. Communication from Bulgaria concerning the cases of Kehayov and Neshkov and others v. Bulgaria (Applications No. 41035/98, 36925/10), DH-DD(2018)13, 1310th meeting (March 2018) (DH), 6-7, available at: https://rm.coe.int/1680727da8, accessed 12.03.2018. The penitentiary judge shall oblige the state to pay the awarded compensation amount; the organisational unit of the Ministry of Justice shall make arrangements for the payment within 60 days upon the service of the decision.

The right to submit a compensation claim was necessary, for reasons of equity, to be extended for inmates having suffered injury earlier, provided that less than one year has elapsed from the termination of the injurious placement condition to the entry into force of the right to file a compensation claim. Moreover, the right to file a compensation claim shall also be ensured to inmates whose applications complaining about placement conditions allegedly violating the Convention are already registered by the Court, except where the inmate filed his application at a date later than 10 June 2015 and by the date of the submission of the application more than one year has elapsed from the termination of the injury. In respect of such applications the six-month absolute time limit started to run from the day of the entry into force of the amendment, which is 1 January 2017.

by the placement conditions violating fundamental rights, amending the procedures of the penitentiary judge. In elaborating the rules pertaining to this remedy, special attention has been paid to the effectiveness and efficiency requirements specified by the Court: decision shall be taken within a short time, on an objective basis; the decision shall be duly reasoned; the decision shall be enforced without delay; the compensation award shall not be "unreasonable", that is, shall not be too low – but may be lower than the compensation amount likely to be awarded by the Court. Post-conviction inmates and inmates detained on other grounds are entitled to compensation for not having been provided with the inmate living space specified in the law and for any other placement conditions violating the prohibition of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, in particular for violations caused by unseparated toilets, lack of proper ventilation or lighting or heating and disinsectisation (henceforth together: placement conditions violating fundamental rights). Compensation shall be granted for the number of days spent in placement conditions violating fundamental rights. The daily compensation tariff shall be minimum HUF 1,200 but maximum HUF 1,600. The proceedings shall be conducted by the penitentiary judge having jurisdiction at the place of the detention or, in case the inmate has already been released, at the place where the penal institution having released the inmate is seated.[58]

- In France, although there is no specific legislation regulating on various compensation mechanisms due to prison overcrowding, still art. 22 of the Penitentiary Law of 24 November 2009 states that "the prison administration guarantees to every detained person the respect of his dignity and his rights".

To obtain compensation in the case of conditions of detention contrary to human dignity, it is necessary to proceed in two stages: administrative and then judicial. The detainee must first make a written request to the director of the prison. Then in case of refusal, appeal to the administrative court. The conditions for the State's responsibility for the conditions of detention have recently been clarified by case law[59] - the detainee has to demonstrate that his conditions of detention are so bad that they disregard the principle of human dignity. In that case, the judge will automatically conclude that there is "moral damage" that the State has to compensate.

III. The drafting of the future legislation should bare in mind the following topics that have to be regulated:
   - the categories of prisoners that may benefit of the compensatory remedy for poor conditions of detention;
   - the institution that can award the compensation;
   - the procedure to be followed (an admistrative one or rather a judicial procedure) and means of appeal;
   - the institution competent to implement the measure;
   - if the case of retroactivity, the past time frame in which compensations may be awarded;
   - the amount of money (or other advantages) that may be awarded as a compensatory remedy.

Also, the future law on compensatory remedy can be developed following the principles and approach set out in Law no. 169/2017: the amount of money to be awarded to a person who served the penalty under improper conditions (and in relation to which the person did not earn any extra days according with art. 55^1 of Law no. 254/2013) shall be determined by multiplying these extra days earned with an amount of money established for each extra day earned.

Another option, just as valid, and, perhaps, more simple to be put in practice is the determination of the total number of days in wich a person served the penalty under improper conditions and then multiply the number with a fixed amount of money.

In any case, the procedure should allow the free access to a court in order for the prisoner to obtain a financial compensation for the execution of the custodial penalty in conditions that infringe art. 3 ECHR. Such a procedure will respect the requirements set out in art. 13 (right to an effective remedy) ECHR: "Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in this Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity."

3. Conclusions

Regarding the activity of executing the custodial criminal penalties, in the doctrine[60] it was considered

[58] Action report. Communication from Hungary concerning the cases of Varga and Istvan Gabor Kovacs v. Hungary (Applications No. 14097/12, 15707/10), DH-DD(2017)1012, 1294th meeting (September 2017) (DH), available at: https://rm.coe.int/16806b942c, accessed 12.03.2018.

[59] See The Rouen Administrative Court (TA Rouen, March 27, 2008), available at: https://actu.dalloz-etudiant.fr/fileadmin/actualites/pdfs/AJDA2008-668.pdf, accessed 12.03.2018.

See, also, Administrative Court of Appeal (CAA) of Douai (1st ch.) 12th November 2009, no. 09DA00782; ord. pdt. [order by the presiding judge] CAA Douai, 26th April 2012, no. 11DA01130, in Opinion of 22nd May 2012 of the French Contrôleur général des lieux de privation de liberté concerning the number of prisoners, available at: http://www.cglpl.fr/wp-content/uploads/2012/12/AVIS_surpopulation_20120522_EN.pdf, accessed 12.03.2018.

[60] M. Udroiu, O. Predescu, Protecția europeană a drepturilor omului și procesul penal român (C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008), 380-381.

that the regulation proposed by the Romanian legislator regarding the general conditions for the execution of the custodial measures satisfies the European requirements in the matter. The assessment of a violation of the rights guaranteed by art. 3 ECHR is, however, made in relation to the effective rights and facilities enjoyed, in particular, by the persons deprived of their liberty and not by the abstract rights provided for in domestic law. In fact, there are many places of detention in Romania where overcrowding makes it impossible to secure a bed for every person deprived of liberty or the minimum space for cells where there are more prisoners; providing adequate food, products for body hygiene, access to natural light, ventilation is still a problem.

It should be stressed out that the Romanian legislator makes efforts to comply with the standards imposed at European level, especially in the case where we make a comparative analysis with the provisions of the previous law on the execution of punishments - Law no. 23/1969, which generically stipulated the right of prisoners to rest and walk, without any provisions regarding the accommodation of convicted persons, the dimensions of a room, access to air, ventilation, heat, etc[61].

However, as shown in the paper, efforts need to be pursued in the legislative field in order to raise the standard at the minimum CoE requrements in terms of minimum space required for a person deprived of liberty and prison overcrowding.

Also, observing the ECtHR judgements on overcrowding and material conditions of detention against Romania (Iacov Stanciu case and Rezvimeș and others case), it is clear that the Romanian legislator needs to intervene in order to set up a financial compensatory mechanism, which will function along with the already in place mechanism granting a benefit for prisoners, meaning 6 days to be considered served for a number of 30 days of confinement in improper spaces of detention.

In this sense, the study proposes some minimum requirements that have to be observed when adressing the problem of a financial compensatory mechanism for prisoners executing the custodial penalty in overcrowding conditions that infringe art. 3 ECHR.

References

- Criminal Code of Romania
- Law no. 254/2013 on enforcement of penalties and of measures ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal proceedings
- Order of the Minister of Justice no. 2772/C/2017 for the approval of the Minimum Rules for the accommodation of persons deprived of their liberty
- CoE, Recommendation No. R (99) 22 of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe concerning prison overcrowding and prison population inflation
- CoE, Recommendation Rec(2006)2 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the European Prison Rules, adopted by the Committee of Ministers on 11 January 2006 at the 952nd meeting of the Ministers'Deputies
- A. Reidy, The prohibition of torture. A guide to the implementation of Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights. Human rights handbooks, No. 6, Directorate General of Human Rights, Council of Europe, 2002
- B. Selejan-Guțan, Spațiul European al drepturilor omului. Reforme, practici, provocări, C. H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008
- C. N. Magdalena, Compensatory action - a new legislative action imposed on national authorities as consequence of recent case-law of the European Court of Human Rights, The International Conference CKS 2018 Challanges of the Knowledge Society, Bucharest, May 11-12, 2018, 12th Edition, CKS eBook 2018, "Nicolae Titulescu" University Publishing House
- Fr. Sudre, Article 3 in L.-E. Pettiti, E. Decaux, P.-H. Imbert, La Convention Europeenne des droits de l'homme: Commentaire article par article, 2e edition, Economica Publishing House, Paris, 1999
- J. Murdoch, The treatment of prisoners. European standards, Council of Europe Publishing, Strasbourg, 2006, reprinted 2008
- M. A. Hotca, Un bun început pentru respectarea hotărârii-pilot în cauza Rezmiveș și alții împotriva României – adoptarea Legii nr. 169/2017 privind modificarea și completarea Legii nr. 254/2013, 16.07.2017
- M. Udroiu, O. Predescu, Protecția europeană a drepturilor omului și procesul penal român, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008
- R. F. Geamănu, Mijloace de protecție a persoanelor condamnate la pedepse privative de libertate, Ph. D. Thesis, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, 2017
- R. F. Geamănu, Use of force and instruments of restraint – an outline of the Romanian legislation in the European context, The International Conference CKS-CERDOCT Doctoral Schools, Challenges of the Knowledge Society, Bucharest, April 15-16, 2011, CKS-CERDOCT eBook 2011, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, 2011

[61] R. F. Geamănu, Mijloace de protecție a persoanelor condamnate la pedepse privative de libertate, 374.

- R. F. Geamănu, Condițiile materiale de detenție ale persoanelor private de libertate în lumina art. 3 din Convenția Europeană a Drepturilor Omului și Libertăților Fundamentale, Dreptul Magazine, no. 12/2009, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2009
- R. Pașoi, D. Mihai, Hotărârea pilot în cauza Rezmiveș și alții împotriva României în materia condițiilor de detenție, 28.04.2017
- Action report. Communication from Slovenia concerning the Mandić and Jović group of cases v. Slovenia (Application No. 5774/10), 1294th meeting (September 2017)
- Action report. Communication from Hungary concerning the cases of Varga and Istvan Gabor Kovacs v. Hungary (Applications No. 14097/12, 15707/10), 1294th meeting (September 2017)
- Action report. Communication from Bulgaria concerning the cases of Kehayov and Neshkov and others v. Bulgaria (Applications No. 41035/98, 36925/10), 1310th meeting (March 2018)
- Association for the Prevention of Torture (APT), Monitoring places of detention. A practical guide, Geneva, April 2004
- European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CPT), 2nd General Report on the CPT's activities, covering the period 1 January to 31 December 1991, Strasbourg, 13 April 1992
- European Committee on Crime Problems (CDPC), White Paper on Prison Overcrowding, Strasbourg, 30 June 2016
- Resolution CM/ResDH(2016)254 Execution of the judgments of the European Court of Human Rights. Seven cases against Poland, a*dopted by the Committee of Ministers on 21 September 2016 at the 1265th meeting of the Ministers' Deputies*
- Resolution CM/ResDH(2016)28 Execution of the judgments of the European Court of Human Rights, a*dopted by the Committee of Ministers* on 8 March 2016 at the 1250th meeting of the Ministers' Deputies
- Romanian Ombudsman, Annual activity report 2015, Bucharest, 2016
- The Economic and Social Council Resolution no. 1997/36 from 21.07.1997 on International cooperation for the improvement of prison conditions
- Timetable for the implementation of measures 2018-2024 to resolve the issue of prison overcrowding and conditions of detention with a view to executing the pilot-judgment Rezmiveș and others against Romania, delivered by the ECtHR on 25 aprilie 2017, adopted by the Romanian Government on 17th February 2018
- ECtHR 2001-VIII; Kudła v. Poland [GC], no. 30210/96, ECHR 2000-XI
- ECtHR, judgment from 16.06.2000, in the case of Labzov v. Russia
- ECtHR, judgment from 24.07.2001, in the case of Valasinas v. Lithuania
- ECtHR, judgment from 29.04.2003, in the case of Aliev v. Ukraine
- ECtHR, judgment from 29.04.2003, in the case of Poltoratski v. Ukraine
- ECtHR judgement from 12.10.2004, in the case of Bursuc v. Romania
- ECtHR judgement from 05.10.2004, in the case of Barbu Anghelescu v. Romania
- ECtHR judgement from 02.06.2005, in the case of Novoselov v. Russia
- ECtHR, judgment from 09.06.2005, in the case of II v. Bulgaria
- ECtHR judgement from 08.11.2005, in the case of Khudoyorov v. Russia
- ECtHR judgement from 26.01.2006, in the case of Mikhenyev v. Russia
- ECtHR judgement from 01.06.2006, in the case of Mamedova v. Russia
- ECtHR, judgment from 19.07.2007, in the case of Trepashkin v. Russia
- ECtHR, judgment from 06.12.2007, in the case of Bragadireanu v. Romania
- ECtHR judgement from 26.04.2007, in the case of Dumitru Popescu (no.1) v. Romania
- ECtHR judgement from 26.07.2007, in the case of Cobzaru v. Romania
- ECtHR, judgment from 22.10.2009, in the case of Orchowski v. Poland, no. 17885/04
- ECtHR judgement from 21.07.2009, in the case of Alexandru Marius Radu v. Romania
- ECtHR, judgment from 16.07.2009, in the case of Marin Stoicescu v. Romania
- ECtHR judgement from 22.06.2010, in the case of Boroancă v. Romania
- ECtHR, judgment from 20.10.2011, in the case of Mandić and Jović v. Slovenia, nos. 5774/10 and 5985/10
- ECtHR, judgment from 10.01.2012, in the case of Ananyev and others v. Russia, nos. 42525/07 and 60800/08
- ECtHR, judgment from July 24, 2012, in the case of Iacov Stanciu v. Romania, no. 35972/05.
- ECtHR, judgment from 20.11.2012, in the case of Ghiurău v. Romania
- ECtHR, judgment from 08.01.2013, in the case of Torreggiani and others v. Italy, nos. 43517/09, 46882/09, 55400/09, 57875/09, 61535/09, 35315/10 and 37818/10
- ECtHR, judgment from 25.11.2014, in the case of Vasilescu v. Belgium, no. 64682/12.
- ECtHR, judgment from 27.01.2015, in the case of Neshkov and others v. Bulgaria, nos. 36925/10, 21487/12, 72893/12, 73196/12, 77718/12 and 9717/13.
- ECtHR, judgment from 10.05.2016, in the case of Varga and others v. Hungary, nos. 14097/12, 45135/12, 73712/12, 34001/13, 44055/13, and 64586/13.
- ECtHR, judgment from 20.10.2016, in the case of Muršić v. Croatia
- ECtHR, judgment from 25.04.2017, in the case of Rezvimeș and others v. Romania, nos. 61467/12, 39516/13, 48231/13 and 68191/13
- Administrative Court of Appeal (CAA) of Douai (1st ch.) 12th November 2009, no. 09DA00782
- Rouen Administrative Court (TA Rouen, March 27, 2008)
- Vrancea District Court, 1st Civil section, judgment no. 96/2012

- https://actu.dalloz-etudiant.fr/
- http://www.apt.ch/
- http://www.avp.ro/
- http://www.cglpl.fr/
- https://www.echr.coe.int/
- https://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng#
- https://www.juridice.ro/
- http://www.just.ro/
- https://rm.coe.int/
- https://search.coe.int/
- http://www.un.org/

SPECIAL CONFISCATION IN THE CASE OF THE OFFENCE OF MONEY LAUNDERING OF PROCEEDS FROM TAX EVASION

Mihai Adrian HOTCA[*]

Abstract

The academic literature and the case-law are concerned with the relationship between the tax evasion offence and the money laundering offence, when the money laundered come from the first offence. More exactly, the question is whether the penalty of special confiscation of the proceeds from tax evasion may still be imposed on a person who committed both offences and is ordered to pay the tax liabilities.

In this article we would like to answer this legal issue, taking into account the relevant legal provisions and case-law.

Keywords: tax evasion, money laundering, offences, first offence, confiscation.

1. Introduction

Decision no. 23/2017, published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, No 878 of 8 November 2017 deals with the legal issue of whether : "When interpreting the provisions of Article 33 of the Law no. 656/2002 on preventing and sanctioning money laundering and of Article 9 of the Law no. 241/2005 on preventing and fighting tax evasion, in the case of concurrent offences consisting of the tax evasion offence and the money laundering offence, it is necessary to take the security measure of special confiscation of the amounts of money which were the subject of the money laundering offence and which derive from the commission of the tax evasion offence and to order the defendants to pay the amounts representing tax liabilities due to the state as a result of the commission of the tax evasion offence and, if so, the amount subject to confiscation is represented by the total amount of the expenses which are not based on real operations or by the value of the damage caused to the state budget as a result of the commission of the tax evasion offence provided for in Article 9(1)(c) of the Law No 241/2005?".

Prior to this Decision, the relevant case-law was not unitary, the following views being expressed, as far as we know:

- The special confiscation, pursuant to Article 33 of the Law no. 656/2002, is not required in conjunction with the obligation to pay the amounts representing the tax liabilities due to the state as a result of the commission of the tax evasion offence;
- The special confiscation, pursuant to Article 33 of the Law no. 656/2002, may be ordered, but only in respect of the assets derived from the commission of the pre-requisite offence (tax evasion);
- The special confiscation, pursuant to Article 33 of the Law no. 656/2002, shall be ordered in respect of the difference between the value of the recycled assets and the value of the assets which are the subject of the tax evasion offence;
- The special confiscation, pursuant to Article 33 of the Law no. 656/2002, shall be ordered in respect of the value of the recycled assets, regardless of whether the active subject was required to pay or not or has actually paid the amounts representing the consideration for the assets which were the subject of the tax evasion offence.

2. Applicable legal provisions

According to Art. 29 of the Law no. 656/2002 :"(1) The following shall constitute money laundering offence and shall be punishable by 3 to 10 years of imprisonment:

a) the change or transfer of assets, knowing that they derive from the commission of offences, for the purpose of hiding or concealing the unlawful origin of those assets or in order to help the person who committed the offence of which the assets derive to circumvent the investigation, the trial or the enforcement of the penalty;
b) The hiding or the concealment of the true origin, location, arrangement, movement or ownership of the assets or of the rights over them, knowing that the assets derive from the commission of offences;
c) The acquisition, the possession or the use of assets, knowing that they derive from the commission of offences".

According to Art. 33 of the Law no. 656/2002: "(1) In the case of money laundering and terrorist financing offences, the provisions of Article 118 of the Criminal Code[1] on confiscation of assets shall apply.

[*] Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: mihaihotca@gmail.com)

(2) If the assets subject to confiscation are not found, their cash equivalent or the assets acquired shall be confiscated instead...

(3) The revenue or other material benefits obtained from the assets referred to in paragraph (2) shall be confiscated.

(4) If the assets subject to confiscation cannot be individualised from the assets legally acquired, assets up to the value of the assets subject to confiscation shall be confiscated.

(5) The provisions of paragraph (4) shall apply accordingly to the revenue or other material benefits obtained from the assets subject to confiscation, which cannot be individualised from the assets legally acquired.

(6) In order to ensure the enforcement of the confiscation of assets, the adoption of the precautionary measures provided for in the Code of criminal procedure is mandatory".

According to Art. 9 para (1) of the Law no. 241/2005:"The following acts committed for the purpose of avoiding the discharge of tax liabilities shall constitute tax evasion offences and shall be punishable by 2 to 8 years of imprisonment and the prohibition of certain rights:

a) The concealment of the asset or of the taxable or chargeable source;

b) The omission, in whole or in part, of disclosing in the accounting records or other legal documents, the commercial operations carried out or the revenue obtained;

c) The disclosure in the accounting records or other legal documents, of the expenditures which are not based on real operations or the disclosure of other fictitious operations;

d) The alteration, the destruction or the concealment of accounting documents, memories of ticketing machines or electronic tax cash registers or of other means for data storage;

e) The preparation of double accounting records, using documents or other means of data storage;

f) the circumvention of financial, tax or custom checks by failing to declare, fictively declaring or inaccurately declaring the principal or secondary places of business of the persons checked;

g) The substitution, the degradation or the disposal by the debtor or by third parties of seized assets, in accordance with the provisions of the Code of tax procedure and the Code of criminal procedure".

According to Article 112 of the Criminal Code :"(1) The following shall be subject to special confiscation:

a) assets produced by perpetrating any offence stipulated by criminal law;

b) assets that were used in any way, or intended to be used to commit an offence set forth by criminal law, if they belong to the offender or to another person who knew the purpose of their use;

c) assets used immediately after the commission of the offence to ensure the perpetrator's escape or the retention of use or proceeds obtained, if they belong to the offender or to another person who knew the purpose of their use;

d) assets given to bring about the commission of an offence set forth by criminal law or to reward the perpetrator;

e) assets acquired by perpetrating any offence stipulated by criminal law, unless returned to the victim and to the extent they are not used to indemnify the victim;

f) assets the possession of which is prohibited by criminal law".

[1] Article 118 belongs to the former Criminal Code. Now, it is Article 112 of the Criminal Code. According to Article 112 of the Criminal Code: "(1)The following shall be subject to special confiscation:

a) assets produced by perpetrating any offence stipulated by criminal law;

b) assets that were used in any way, or intended to be used to commit an offence set forth by criminal law, if they belong to the offender or to another person who knew the purpose of their use;

c) assets used immediately after the commission of the offence to ensure the perpetrator's escape or the retention of use or proceeds obtained, if they belong to the offender or to another person who knew the purpose of their use;

d) assets given to bring about the commission of an offence set forth by criminal law or to reward the perpetrator;

e) assets acquired by perpetrating any offence stipulated by criminal law, unless returned to the victim and to the extent they are not used to indemnify the victim;

f) assets the possession of which is prohibited by criminal law.

(2) In the case referred to in par. (1) lett. b) and c), if the value of assets subject to confiscation is manifestly disproportionate to the nature and severity of the offence, confiscation will be ordered only in part, by monetary equivalent, by taking into account the result produced or that could have been produced and asset's contribution to it. If the assets were produced, modified or adapted in order to commit the offence set forth by criminal law, they shall be entirely confiscated.

(3) In cases referred to in par. (1) lett. b) and c), if the assets cannot be subject to confiscation, as they do not belong to the offender, and the person owning them was not aware of the purpose of their use, the cash equivalent thereof will be confiscated in compliance with the stipulations of par. (2).

(4) The stipulations of par. (1) lett. b) do not apply to offences committed by using the press.

(5) If the assets subject to confiscation pursuant to par. (1) lett. b) - e) are not to be found, money and other assets shall be confiscated instead, up to the value thereof.

(6) The assets and money obtained from exploiting the assets subject to confiscation as well as the assets produced by such, except for the assets provided for in par. (1) lett. b) and c), shall be also confiscated".

3. Solution of the legal issue and main considerations

By Decision No 23/2017, the High Court of Cassation and Justice - the formation for solving criminal law issues decided: "In interpreting the provisions of Article 33 of the Law no. 656/2002 on preventing and sanctioning money laundering and of Article 9 of the Law no. 241/2005 on preventing and fighting tax evasion, in the case of concurrent offences consisting of the tax evasion offence and the money laundering offence, the adoption of the security measure of special confiscation of the amounts of money which were the subject of the money laundering offence and which derive from the commission of the tax evasion offence in conjunction with the obligation of the defendants to pay the amounts representing tax liabilities due to the state as a result of the commission of the tax evasion offence is not required".

The supreme court has held in the reasoning of the decision: "Given that the amount of money acquired as a result of the commission of an offence is no longer in possession of the offender, but it has been used for compensating the injured person, the prerequisite of possessing the result of an offence no longer exists and, by default, there is no state of danger, and the security measure of special confiscation is not justified in any way (...).

In case of a damage resulted from the commission of the tax evasion offence, this must be compensated, the confiscation measure as a result of the money laundering offence being no longer operable, whereas we are in the presence of a single damage, and the simultaneous application of the two measures would result in a double punishment of the person charged and convicted for committing both offences".

4. The effects of the Decision No 23/2017 and other consequences of the concurrent offences of tax evasion and money laundering

4.1. The special confiscation, pursuant to Article 33 of the Law no. 656/2002, shall be excluded if the court ordered „the payment of the amounts representing tax liabilities due to the state as a result of the commission of the tax evasion offence"

It follows from the Decision No. 23/2017 that both the payment of the amounts representing tax liabilities due to the state, as a result of the commission of the tax evasion offence, and the special confiscation measure having the same object may not be ordered.

The assets which may be the subject of the money laundering offence are always assets derived from the commission of offences. It can be said about the object of the money laundering offence that it coincides, partially (when only a part of the assets of criminal origin are laundered) or totally (when all assets of criminal origin are laundered) with the object of the pre-requisite offence (predicate, main).

In other words, the value of the object of the money laundering offence may be lower or equal to that of the object of the offence from which it is derived. In principle, the value of the object of the money laundering offence may not exceed the value of the object of the main offence.

There is one exception to this rule. It is the case in which the dirty assets laundered had results [revenue or benefits, in accordance with Article 33(2) of the Law No 656/2002].

For illustration, we offer an example. Let's suppose that a person (the defendant X) is charged, as offender, together with an accomplice (the defendant Y), with the commission of the tax evasion offence [Article 9(1)(c) of the Law No 241/2005] and money laundering offence [Article 29(1)(b) of the Law No 656/2002], consisting in the circumvention of the payment of the VAT (amounting to Lei 38,000) by recording fictitious operations (amounting to Lei 200,000), in the accounting records of the company that he managed, and then used the amount evaded (Lei 38,000) for the purchase of land. In fact, the amount of Lei 200,000 (of lawful origin) was paid by bank transfer into the account of the company that issued invoices concerning the unreal operations, and was subsequently withdrawn from the ATM by the administrator (Y) of this company and then refunded to the perpetrator (X) of the tax evasion offence.

The amount of Lei 38,000 was subsequently used for the purchase of a plot of land, and the amount of Lei 162,000 (the lawful amount) was used for crediting the company. We specify that the company pays the turnover tax.

In such a case, if X did not pay voluntarily the tax liabilities, the court will order him to pay the tax liabilities due to the state as a result of the commission of the tax evasion offence, i.e. the amount of Lei 38,000.

In such a case, the possibility of ordering the confiscation of the amount of Lei 38,000 is excluded, because this amount has already been taken into account for establishing the liability for the damage caused as a result of the commission of the tax evasion offence.

4.2. May the special confiscation be ordered, pursuant to Article 33 of the Law no. 656/2002, in respect of the assets which do not derive from criminal activities?

The answer is definitely no. The special confiscation, pursuant to Article 33 of the Law no. 656/2002, may only be ordered in respect of the assets of criminal origin, i.e. the dirty assets derived from offences and certainly not in respect of assets of lawful origin.

Moreover, it follows very clearly from the operative part of the Decision no. 23/2017 that "the security measure of special confiscation of the amounts of money which were the subject of the money laundering offence and which derive from the perpetration of the tax evasion offence in conjunction with ordering the defendants to pay the amounts representing the tax liabilities due to the state as a result of the commission of the tax evasion offence is not necessary".

Where the dirty money derives from the commission of the tax evasion offence, if the active subject, common to both offences (tax evasion and money laundering), was ordered to pay the amount which represents the value of the tax liabilities, according to Decision No 23/2017, the security measure of special confiscation may no longer be taken against him.

Thus, in the example above, where the amount transferred within the framework of the fictitious operation amounted to Lei 200,000, the application of the provisions on special confiscation is excluded de plano because this entire amount had a lawful origin. The fact that, following the bank transfer into the account of the company managed by Y and the disclosure of the fictitious operations in the accounting records, a part (Lei 38,000) of this amount (Lei 200,000) acquired criminal origin does not entail the contamination and the dirtying of the entire amount transferred[2].

4.2. May the special confiscation, pursuant to Article 33 of the Law no. 656/2002, have as their object clean money?

The special confiscation, pursuant to Article 33 of the Law no. 656/2002, may not have as object clean money of lawful origin. In the example above, the amount of Lei 162,000, which consists in the difference between the amount transferred and the amount evaded, may not be confiscated, whereas it has a lawful origin.

The only amount that could be subject to special confiscation was the amount of Lei 38,000, which was excluded from the payment to the general consolidated budget, but in this case only provided that the civil party (the state) does not join proceedings as civil party or if the value of its claims are lower than the evaded amount. In our example, taking into account that the defendant X was ordered to pay for the damaged caused by the tax evasion offence, i.e. the amount of Lei 38,000 (amount equal to that of dirty money), the special confiscation measure may not be ordered against him.

4.3. May the special confiscation, pursuant to Article 33 of the Law no. 656/2002, be ordered when the damage consisting in the evaded amount was voluntarily paid during the criminal investigation or trial?

The answer is negative. We have seen above that, according to Decision no. 23/2017, the security measure of special confiscation, pursuant to Article 33 of the Law no. 656/2002, may not be taken if the court ordered the "payment of the amounts representing tax liabilities due to the state as a result of the commission of the tax evasion offence".

That being the case, a fortiori, the same solution is also valid when the damage consisting in the evaded amount was voluntarily compensated during the criminal investigation or trial.

5. Conclusions

On the basis of the above, it may be concluded that, when the dirty money comes from commission of the tax evasion offence, if the active subject, common to both offences (tax evasion and money laundering), was ordered to pay some amounts which represent the value of tax liabilities, the security measure of special confiscation may no longer be ordered against him, according to Decision No. 23/2017.

The main conclusion of this article is that the security measure of special confiscation, pursuant to Article 33 of the Law no. 656/2002, may not have as object clean money, of lawful origin, but only dirty money. In this case, the security measure may only concern the dirty money and only if the active subject of the offence was not ordered to pay these amounts by way of tax liabilities and only if he did not perform those obligations voluntarily.

After the publication in the Official Journal of the Decision No. 23/2017 on solving the legal issue examined in this article, the case-law began to change according to this Decision.

References

- M.A. Hotca, Criminal law handbook. General part, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017
- M. Gorunescu, C. Toader, Extended confiscation - from constitutional litigation in administrative and tax litigation to criminal litigation, in Dreptul No 9/2012
- F. Streteanu, Considerations on extended confiscation, in Caiete de drept penal No 2/2012
- F. Streteanu, Considerations on extended confiscation, in Caiete de drept penal No 2/2012
- D. Nitu, Amendments brought in the field of confiscation by the provisions of the Law no. 278/ 2006 in Caiete de drept penal No 3/2006

[2] Furthermore, the amount of Lei 38,000 may be considered dirty only when the entire content of the tax evasion offence is achieved, namely on the date of disclosure of the fictitious operation in the accounting records, which is committed on the date of the VAT return. The damage to the consolidated state budget is not yet caused up to submission of the VAT return, meaning that there is no black money (dirty, of criminal origin).

CONSIDERATIONS REGARDING THE PREVENTIVE MEASURE OF JUDICIAL CONTROL ON BAIL.

Andrei-Viorel IUGAN[*]

Abstract

The judicial control on bail is one of the five preventive measures provided by the New Criminal Procedure Code. The faulty way of regulating the preventive measure of judicial control on bail has determined an extremely low applicability of this preventive measure in the judicial practice of our country.

Both in doctrine and jurisprudence there is controversy over the procedure to be followed in order to take the measure of judicial control on bail. In a doctrinal opinion it was shown that there is a preliminary stage of admissibility in principle and that the provisions of art. 242 C.P.P. shall be applied by analogy. This is one of the problems we intend to analyze in our study.

In the Western countries legislation, such a measure is widespread, being considered a viable alternative to the deprivation of liberty. The threat of losing a very large amount of money will obviously cause the defendant to weigh heavily the way he respects the obligations imposed by the judicial bodies.

The jurisprudential controversies previously described with regards taking this measure, controversies born from the very wording used by the legislator, prompted many prosecutors to be reluctant to order / take such a measure.

We hope that in the future, the regulation of judicial control will be given greater attention and this preventive measure will truly become a genuine alternative to custodial preventive measures.

Keywords: preventive measures, bail, judicial control, prosecutor, court.

1. Introductory notions

Judicial control on bail is one of the 5 preventive measures regulated by the Romanian criminal procedural law. This measure may be ordered during the prosecution, as a rule, by the prosecutor.

The judge of rights and freedoms may also impose judicial control during the criminal proceedings but only if he / she rejects the proposal for preventive arrest / home arrest and takes the measure of judicial control on bail or disposes the replacement of the preventive arrest / home arrest with judicial control on bail (either on the occasion of the rejection of the proposal to extend the preventive arrest / home arrest or on the occasion of solving a separate request for replacement).

The judge of rights and freedoms will never be notified by the prosecutor with a proposal to take the measure of judicial control on bail. In the preliminary chamber procedure, the competence to rule on judicial control on bail lies with the judge hearing the preliminary hearing and at the trial stage with the court.

With regards the conditions to be fulfilled in order for this measure to be taken, we find that while judicial control is a restrictive measure, the conditions are identical to those required for measures of imprisonment or house arrest / preventive arrest.

Thus, for taking this preventive measure, there must be at least one of the following cases:

- The defendant fled or was hiding in order to evade the criminal investigation or trial, or to make preparations of any kind for such acts;
- The defendant tried to influence another participant to the incriminated act, an expert or witness or tried to destroy, alter or conceal evidence or lead another person to have such a behavior;
- The defendant puts pressure on the injured party or tries to make a fraudulent deal with him;
- There is reasonable suspicion that, after the criminal proceedings have been initiated against him, the defendant intentionally committed a new offense or he/she is preparing to comit a new offense;
- If it stemms out of the evidence collected the reasonable suspicion that he /she has committed any of the offenses provided by art. 223(2) Code of Criminal Procedure (C.P.P.) and on the basis of the assessment with regards: the seriousness of the offense, the manner and circumstances of committing the offense, the entourage and the environment from which the defendant originates, the criminal history and other circumstances concerning the person, it is concluded that taking the preventive measure of restricting one's freedom is necessary to remove a state of danger for the public order.

We consider that the legislator's option is open for criticism and we see no justification for the existence of any differences between the conditions for imposing judicial control and the conditions for judicial control on bail. De lege ferenda, we believe that only the general conditions provided for in art. 202 Criminal Code (C.C) should apply: that there is sufficient evidence or sound clues from which it would result a reasonable suspicion that the defendant has committed an offense; that criminal proceedings have been initiated; the judicial control on bail is necessary to ensure the proper conduct of the trial, preventing the defendant absconding from prosecution or trial or to prevent commission of another offense; the judicial control on bail must be proportionate to the seriousness of the accusation brought to the person against whom it is taken and necessary to achieve the aim pursued by its disposition; there must be no cause that would prevent the initiation or prosecution of the criminal action; the defendant has been previously heard in the presence of an attorney elected or appointed ex officio.

[*] Assistant Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: andyiugan@yahoo.com).

2. The procedure for judicial control on bail in the course of the criminal prosecution stage

Both in doctrine and jurisprudence there is controversy over the procedure to be followed in order to take the measure of judicial control on bail. In a doctrinal opinion it was shown that there is a preliminary stage of admissibility in principle and that the provisions of art. 242 C.P.P. shall be applied by analogy. At this stage the prosecutor determines the value of the bail and sets the payment term for this amount. Subsequently, after the bail has been paid, the prosecutor would have ordered this preventive measure, setting out the obligations and measures that the defendant must respect[1].

However, jurisprudence is almost unanimous in considering that all steps in ordering the measure of judicial control on bail take place in a single stage. Thus, in a case filed by ICCJ, it was shown that in the case of the replacement of the preventive arrest with the measure of judicial control on bail, the legislator provided for a special procedure distinct from just taking the measure of judicial control on bail. Thus, if in the first situation it is necessary to go through the admissibility phase in principle and to lodge the bail before the replacement (Article 242(10) C.P.P), in the second situation the measure is taken without going through distinctive steps such as the admissibility in principle (art. 216 rap. to art. 212-216 C.P.P.) [2].

Likewise, it has been shown that the measure judicial control on bail is ordered uno ictu by the prosecutor through a reasoned order which shall contain the duration of the measure, the obligations imposed on the defendant, the amount of bail and the conditions of deposit. The legal provisions in force do not provide for a stage of admissibility in principle nor the need to obtain the defendant's consent[3].

The jurisprudence identified at the level of the Supreme Court, since the entry into force of the new Code of Criminal Procedure to this date, shows that, in all cases, the prosecutor has issued ordinances to take the measure of judicial control uno ictu, without passing through the stage of admissibility in principle. The same case-law shows that the court, by examining the lawfulness of the measure, on request of the defense or on its own initiative, did not rely on the absence of the admissibility stage in principle as a vice in the proceedings and the deposit of the bail was not considered a sine qua non condition for the ascertainment of the measure. (...) This procedure of taking the measure of judicial control on bail uno ictu is not inconsistent with the hypothesis of replacing the measure of preventive arrest, separately regulated in the Criminal Procedure Code Article 242, paragraph 10. The abovementioned text is of a special nature - special generalibus derogation. The fact that the text is not applicable in the procedure for the taking of the measure of judicial control on bail also results from a simple systematic interpretation, seeing the place of the norms in the sections of Title V, chapter I. Thus, at the time of replacing the preventive arrest measure with the measure of judicial control on bail, the same legislator introduces an additional condition, the early payment of the bail, at a distinct stage of admissibility in principle. The distinct situation in which the legislator foresees for the stage of admissibility in principle, namely the replacement of the preventive arrest measure, supports the usefulness or opportunity of the early deposit of the bail. The different prerequisites (replacing the preventive custody / taking the measure of judicial control on bail) justify the different optics of the legislator. As a consequence, the measure of judicial control on bail is ordered by the prosecutor by reasoned ordinance, which will contain the duration of the measure, the obligations imposed on the defendant, the amount of the bail and the conditions of the deposit[4].

What distinguishes the judicial control from the judicial control on bail is the obligation to deposit the bail. The most controversial issue with regard to the judicial control on bail is to determine when the bail must be paid, namely whether the measure can be ordered only after the defendant has paid the bail or whether the prosecutor can order the measure and the defendant will subsequently deposit the set amount.

In the doctrine, the first opinion is almost unanimous. It has been shown that the depositing of the set sum is one of the conditions stipulated by the law in order to proceed with the preventive measure; it was found erroneous the practice of some judicial bodies of taking the measure for a certain period by setting of a term for the deposit that begins to run after the beginning of the measure.

This latter interpretation is contradicted by the express provisions of Art. 216 (1) C.P.P. that lists the conditions under which the prosecutor may order

[1] V. Pușcașu, C.Ghigheci, Proceduri penale, vol. I, Ed. Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2017, p. 753-754; also, C. Voicu în N. Volonciu, A.S.Uzlău, *Codul de Procedură Penală comentat,*Ed. Hamangiu, Bucharest, p. 551.

[2] I.C.C.J, court decision from 4.03.2014, unpublished.

[3] I.C.C.J., court decision no. 210 from 14.03.2016, unpublished.

[4] I.C.C.J., court decision no. 286 from 6.04.2016, unpublished.

judicial control on bail. If the defendant does not deposit the sum set as bail, there is no impediment in making a proposal for taking a custodial preventive measure, since the preventive measure of judicial control has already been considered insufficient to achieve the purpose of preventive measures. Moreover, it would be contrary to the principle of "nemo auditur propriam turpitudinem allegans" that the guilty pasivity of the defendant in the depositing of the bail would lead to the creation of a more favorable situation for him/her by taking a less restrictive measure of rights[5].

As regards the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court, a single solution was given in this respect. As such, the judge of rights and freedoms found that from the provisions of art. 216 (1) C.P.P. it follows that the deposit of the bail by the defendant is a precondition for the legality, which must be fulfilled in order for the measure of judicial control on bail to be ordered. Even though the abovementioned legal provisions do not stipulate that this measure could be taken by the prosecutor only at the initiative of the defendant, however, since the defendant can not be compelled to deposit the bail, the judge of rights and freedoms finds that this measure cannot be taken during the criminal prosecution stage legally by the prosecutor alone, but only with the consent or at the request of the defendant.

However, without being subjected to a custodial perventive measure, it is logical that the defendant will not be interested in requesting to take the measure of judicial control on bail against him and thus to deposit a bail. He /she would be interested in requesting the application of this preventive measure only if he/ she would had been subject to a measure depriving him/her of his/her freedom; in such a case the replacement of the measure of preventive arrest or of home arrest with the measure of the judicial control on bail would be ordered under the conditions provided by art. 242 (10) and (11) of the C.P.P., either by the judge of rights and freedoms, by the judge of the preliminary chamber or by the Court, and not by the prosecutor. It follows that, during the criminal prosecution, in theory, the measure of judicial control on bail ordered by the prosecutor may be taken, as provided by the provisions of Art. 216 (1) C.P.P. However, in practice, in the absence of the defendant's agreement or request, the consequence is the failure to comply with the condition for prior deposit, and therefore the illegality of the measure, the possibility for the prosecutor to dispose of this measure becomes an illusory one, as it is the case here[6].

The practice of the Supreme Court is in the sense of ordering judicial control on bail also prior to the payment of bail, as such until the defendant makes the deposit, the precautionary measure is manifested as a simple judicial control. It has been shown that the current legislator, following the analysis of previous regulations and its reflections in judicial practice, found the usefulness of reforming the institution. Thus, the current legislator has explicitly and willingly abandoned the admission phase in principle, and the grammatical interpretation of the final sentence of art. 216 (1) C.P.P. can not lead anymore to the conclusion of the need for the early deposit of the bail. Such an interpretation would be tantamount to adding to the law or to enactment, the current legislator's will being to take the measure of judicial control uno ictu and simplify the procedure. Such an interpretation would be tantamount to the enactment of the admissibility procedure in principle according to the structure and conditions of the repealed legal provision, in the context in which the legislator waived this provision and the case-law created in the light of the repealed text. (...) The deposit of the bail, which requires personal actions of the defendant, as successive actions to the obligation imposed by the judicial body, is made after its establishment through the only ordinance that the procedure provides. Asking the prosecutor to issue two ordinances, a first as to establish the bail (no other obligations) and a second for the actual taking of the measure and the determination of the rest of the obligations to be imposed to the defendant, has no coverage in the current legislation and comes in flagrant contradiction with the text requiring the establishment of all obligations, including amount of the bail, through a single act[7].

In another case, the judge of rights and freedoms stated that considering that the measure of judicial control on bail would come into force only after the bail had been deposited would lead to the illogical situation in which a defendant who is subject to regular judicial control complies with all the obligations imposed from the moment the ordinance was issued, while a defendant who is subject to judicial control on bail, hence a heavier preventive measure, would only comply with all the obligations imposed at a later time, after the deposit of the bail. Until the time the defendant deposits the bail, the measure of judicial control on bail has same efects, namely obligations imposed, as the regular judicial control[8].

In our opinion, this latter opinion is also the correct one. Thus, the urgency of preventive measures is taken into account. For example, if the prosecutor considers that it is necessary for the proper conduct of the criminal proceedings that the defendant should not contact certain persons and not leave the territory of the country, it is only natural that such restrictions occur immediately. Allowing the defendant to delay the execution of these obligations until the payment of the [5] C. Jderu, în M. Udroiu (coordonator), Codul de Procedură Penală. Comentariu pe articole, Ed. C.H.Beck, Bucharest, 2017, p. 1046-1047; also, M. Udroiu, Procedură Penală. Partea Generală, Ed. C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2016, p. 681, B. Micu, R. Slăvoiu, A.G. Păun. Procedură Penală. Curs pentru admiterea în magistratură şi avocatură, Ed. Hamangiu, Bucharest, p. 196; C. Voicu în N. Volonciu, A.S.Uzlău, quouted work., p. 551.

[6] I.C.C.J., court decision no. 145 from 24.02.2016, unpublished.

[7] I.C.C.J, court decision no. 286 from 6.04.2016, unpublished.

[8] T. Prahova, court decision no. 475 from 6.10.2016, unpublished.

bail would be practically a way of undermining the purpose of the criminal proceedings. Practically, the interpretation given by this last opinion, which we have embraced, is the only one that allows the practical application of the institution of judicial control on bail.

3. Appealing the ordinance to the judge of rights and freedoms

The prosecutor's ordinance throught which the preventive measure was ordered may be appealed through a complaint lodged with the judge of rights and freedoms belonging to the Court that would have jurisdiction to hear the case at first instance.

The period within which the prosecutor's ordinance may be appealed is 48 hours from the communication of the ordinance by which the preventive measure was taken.

The judge of rights and freedoms sets a deadline and orders the defendant's summoning. The complaint will be settled in the council chamber. The complaint must be resolved within 5 days of registration. The citation of the defendant is mandatory, but its absence will not prevent the complaint from being judged. The participation of the prosecutor is mandatory. The judge of rights and freedoms listens to the defendant when he / she is present. The legal assistance of the defendant is mandatory.

The main issue that triggered controversy in practice regarding this procedure is the ability of the judge of rights and freedoms to analyze the amount of bail imposed by the prosecutor. In the doctrine, it has been shown that the defendant can not challenge the amount of the bail fixed by the prosecutor, because the measure can be taken only after the bail has been deposited. If the measure is taken, it means that the defendant has deposited the bail, hence implicitly accepting its value; the dissatisfaction with the amount fixed by the prosecutor can be expressed by the refusal to deposit the bail, which means that the measure will not be taken[9].

As we have seen before, depositing of the bail is not a prerequisite for taking the preventive measure of judicial control on bail, so it can not be argued that the defendant has accepted the amount of the bail. From the examination of the jurisprudence of the High Court it is observed that a unitary practice has been formed regarding the possibility of the judge of rights and freedoms to reduce the amount of the bail in the procedure provided by art. 216 rap. to art. 213 C.P.P.

In another opinion, it was found that, during the appeal procedure, the judge of rights and freedoms has the power to examine only the questions regarding the legality of this preventive measure when dealing with the complaint against the prosecutor's ordinance ordering the measure of judicial control. Therefore, the judge of rights and freedoms can not censor the prosecutor's assessment of the amount of bail imposed but can only check whether the measure has been taken in compliance with the legal provisions[10].

To the contrary, it was found that the judge of rights and freedoms, when examining the complaint, may censure the unlawfulness of the bail, for example if the sum is outside the legal ceilings or groundless related issues relating to an excessive amount in relation to the personal or financial situation of the defendant[11].

In another case, the Supreme Court held that the amount of bail of 500,000 lei (approximately 111,000 EUR), set by the prosecutor, reported to the seriousness of the accusations made to the defendant, to its material situation (which has approximately 53,400 EUR annual total income - 13,400 EUR annual salary income plus 40,000 EUR annual income from other self-employment activities, as evidenced by its latest wealth declaration filed on file), but also to its legal obligations (which are not to be neglected since the defendant has 5 children), is an excessively high value, which is impossible to pay for the defendant. By making a simple calculation, it was found that the defendant could raise this sum if it would save all the income earned over two years, and this entailing no expenditure with daily maintenance and current expenses. A second option for setting the amount of the bail, as provided by the provisions of art. 217 (2) C.P.P., namely the creation of a real, movable or immovable collateral, within the limit of this amount of money, can not be taken into account, since the defendant does not own any immovable or movable property of such a value (other than family jewels, which, in addition to not being in its personal property, have a total value of 40,000 EUR, less than half of the value of the set bail) [12].

On the same issue, another Court has stated that the amount of the bail imposed by the prosecutor, namely 300,000 lei, can be censored in the appeal procedure, and from the analysis of the situation of all the defendants it is established that the bail was set differently for each defendant, without motivating the criteria that were taken into account in establishing the amounts. In the absence of criteria for differentiation between defendants, the judge of rights and freedoms considers that it is necessary to amend the amount set as bail in relation to the seriousness of the accusations made against them and the amount of the prejudice held for each defendant. Therefore he proceeded with the establishment of a set amount of 10% calculated from the amount of the prejudice, for all defendants in accordance with the principle of equal treatment, considering that these amounts are not excessive and impossible to be paid by the defendants. Thus, in

[9] B. Micu, R. Slăvoiu, A. G. Păun, quouted work., p. 197.
[10] I.C.C.J., court decision no. 855 from 4.11.2015, unpublished; also, I.C.C.J., court decision no. 568 from 12.06.2014, unpublished.
[11] I.C.C.J., court decision no. 286 from 6.04.2016, unpublished.
[12] I.C.C.J., court decision no. 145 from 24.02.2016, unpublished.

relation to the situation of the defendant for which an estimated loss of 1.615.680 lei, consisting of profit tax 646.272 lei and VAT 969.408 lei, the judge of rights and freedoms considers that the amount of the bail must be reduced from 300.000 lei to 160,000 lei, taking into account the damage caused to the state budget, as estimated in the preliminary investigation report drawn up by anti-fraud inspectors[13].

In our view, this latter opinion is the correct one, the defendant's ability to challenge the fact that he/she has been forced to pay a sum of money is a clear representation of an appeal against the violation of his /her civil rights and obligations (including property rights); such appeal would enable the defendant to address the situation to a judge, according to art. 6 C.E.D.O. Moreover, the purpose of establishing the procedure regulated by art. 213 C.P.P. is to allow the judge of rights and freedoms to fully analyze the issues covered by the prosecutor's ordinance. Also, given the fact that the judge of rights and freedoms, according to the law, rules on obligations that are often insignificant (for example, that the defendant does not use arms), a fortiori it's obvious that he should be able to analyze if the amount of the bail imposed by the prosecutor, which in some cases also amounts to several millions of lei[14], is not disproportionate.

4. The bail. Notion. Restitution and forfeiture.

Depositing the bail shall be made on the defendant's behalf through a deposit of a sum of money at the disposal of the judicial body or by the creation of a real, movable or immovable collateral, with the same value as the set amount, in favor of the same judicial body. The amount of the bail is of at least 1,000 lei and is determined in relation to the gravity of the accusation, the material situation and the legal obligations of the defendant. The bail guarantees the defendant's participation in the criminal proceedings and compliance with the obligations established by the judicial body that ordered the measure.

The bail is returned when the prosecutor concludes that the case shall not be trialed. In this case, the bail will be refunded even in cases where the judicial control on bail was replaced with the measures of preventive arrest or home arrest, namely if the defendant violated in bad faith his/her obligations or because there was a reasonable suspicion that he/ she intentionally committed a new offense for which criminal proceedings were initiated. There will be no deductions (for example for the judicial costs set in charge of the defendant) from the sum set as bail. However, nothing prevents the prosecutor from taking precautionary measures upon the sum set as bail.

The bail shall also be returned when the Court reaches a final decision, if the measure of judicial control on bail has not been replaced with the measure of home arrest or preventive arrest. The bail shall be returned in full, provided there are no provisions in the Court's decision that out of this sum there wil be deducted, in the following order, compensation for damages caused by the offense, judicial costs or fines.

The bail is seized when the measure of judicial on bail is replaced by the measure of home arrest or preventive arrest, and the defendant / case has been sent for trial. The bail is seized in full insofar as it has not been ordered by the Court to deduct from the amount set as bail, in the following order, compensation granted for the repair of the damages caused by the offense, the judicial costs or fines.

5. Conclusions.

The faulty way of regulating the preventive measure of judicial control on bail has determined an extremely low applicability of this preventive measure in the judicial practice of our country. In the Western countries legislation, such a measure is widespread, being considered a viable alternative to the deprivation of liberty. The threat of losing a very large amount of money will obviously cause the defendant to weigh heavily the way he respects the obligations imposed by the judicial bodies. The jurisprudential controversies previously described with regards taking this measure, controversies born from the very wording used by the legislator, prompted many prosecutors to be reluctant to order / take such a measure. While it is not the subject of the present study, we can not abstain from emphasizing the fact that, although it is theoretically possible to apply judicial control on bail when requesting / extending the preventive measure of preventive arrest or home arrest, practically this is impossible. We hope that in the future, the regulation of judicial control will be given greater attention and this preventive measure will truly become a genuine alternative to custodial preventive measures.

References

- I. Neagu, m. Damaschin, Tratat de Procedură Penală. În lumina Noului Cod de Procedură Penală, Bucharest, Ed. Universul Juridic, 2015
- V. Pușcașu, C.Ghigheci, Proceduri penale, vol. I, Ed. Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2017
- C. Voicu în N. Volonciu, A.S.Uzlău, Codul de Procedură Penală comentat,Ed. Hamangiu, Bucharest

[13] T. Prahova, court decision no. 475 from 6.10.2016, unpublished.

[14] I.C.C.J., s.pen., încheierea nr. 286 din 6.04.2016, unpublished, the bail established by the prosecutor was 59 000 000 lei (aproximately 13 millions euro);

- M. Udroiu (coordonator), Codul de Procedură Penală. Comentariu pe articole, Ed. C.H.Beck, Bucharest, 2017, p. 1046-1047
- M. Udroiu, Procedură Penală. Partea Generală, Ed. C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2016
- B. Micu, R. Slăvoiu, A.G. Păun. Procedură Penală. Curs pentru admiterea în magistratură și avocatură, Ed. Hamangiu, Bucharest

LEGAL GUARANTEES FOR ENSURING THE RIGHT OF DEFENCE WITHIN CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS IN ROMANIA AND THE REPUBLIC OF MOLDOVA

Dan LUPAȘCU[*]
Mihai MAREȘ[]

Abstract

This paper aims at providing a comparative study of the legal framework applicable in the legal systems of Romania and the Republic of Moldova ensuring the exercise of the right of defence in criminal proceedings. A special focus shall be placed on the fair-trial standards developed by the European Court of Human Rights in interpreting the European Convention on Human Rights, as both Romania and the Republic of Moldova are Council of Europe members. The European system of safeguarding the fundamental rights is made whole by the EU standards, which are briefly presented here (while binding for the Member States, the EU model can also serve as a source of inspiration for third countries with which the EU would hold periodic dialogues on various human rights topic). Subsequently, the applicable national provisions of both States, both constitutional and pertaining to criminal procedure law, will be analysed by also making reference to relevant case-law in order to convey the dynamics of the defence rights in practice. The comparative approach is appropriate in the case in point to emphasise the common elements and values shared by the two legislations under examination, stemming from the consistency with the ECHR model of protecting the right to a fair trial, in general, and the defence rights, in particular, while, at the same time, revealing the national legal specificities.

Keywords: right of defence, criminal proceedings, fair trial, effective defence, ECHR standards

1. Introduction

1.1. Protecting the Right of Defence at the Supranational Level

The right of defence, as all fundamental human rights, benefits from both a national and a supranational coverage within the applicable legal instruments.

At the supranational level, the concept of "globalisation of human rights" indicates a common set of values and standards promoted notably under the United Nations, of which Romania and the Republic of Moldova are members[1].

Pursuant to Article 11 para. (1) of the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights – a key UN legal instrument – "everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defence" (emphasis added).

The right of defence is also enshrined under Article 14 para. 3 of the 1966 UN International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights.

The European model of safeguarding fundamental rights is prominently represented by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (adopted in 1950), the additional Protocols thereto and the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights.

The European system for protecting human rights is characterized by a jurisdictional duality manifested by the European Court of Human Rights and the Court of Justice of the European Union, functionally complementing one another and being interdependent from the regulatory point of view[2]. The regulatory interdependence is made evident by the primary EU law, such as Article 6 of the Treaty on the European Union, which, under para. 3, provides that fundamental rights, as guaranteed by the European Convention on Human Rights and as resulting from the constitutional traditions of the Member States, shall constitute general principles of EU law. Also, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, proclaimed in 2000 and presently having the same legally binding force as the EU treaties, expressly acknowledges and greatly relies on the European Convention of Human Rights.

The right of defence is a prominent right under European jurisdiction, as shall be shown herein.

1.2. Protecting the Right of Defence at the National Level

When analysing the level of protection ensured at the national level, there is a clear interrelation with the applicable international legal instruments, which is to be construed according to the following guidelines:

Firstly, the subsidiarity principle and the margin of appreciation doctrine are concepts of paramount importance in the Convention system.

[*] Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: prof.danlupascu@gmail.com).
[] PhD Candidate, Legal Research Institute, The Romanian Academy (e-mail: mihai.mares@mares.ro).

[1] Sabino Cassese, "Ruling Indirectly – Judicial Subsidiarity in the ECtHR", Seminar on Subsidiarity: A Double-Sided Coin? 1. The role of the Convention mechanism; 2. The role of national authorities, 30 January 2015, http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/Speech_20150130_Seminar_Cassese_ENG.pdf, 12-13;

[2] Jean-François Renucci, Tratat de drept european al drepturilor omului (Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2009), 26.

These are explicitly acknowledged under Article 1 of Protocol no. 15 to the Convention – ratified by Romania in 2015 and by the Republic of Moldova in 2014, pending entry into force – by an additional recital at the end of the Preamble thereof: "Affirming that the High Contracting Parties, in accordance with the principle of subsidiarity, have the primary responsibility to secure the rights and freedoms defined in this Convention and the Protocols thereto, and that in doing so they enjoy a margin of appreciation, subject to the supervisory jurisdiction of the European Court of Human Rights established by this Convention".

Secondly, as per Article 11 para. (2) of the Romanian Constitution[3], the treaties that are ratified by Parliament, according to the law, are an integral part of the national law. For example, the European Convention on Human Rights, ratified by Romania by Law no. 30/1994[4], has a "constitutional and super-legislative force" in the domestic legal order[5]. The same binding force applies to the ECHR case-law[6].

Pursuant to Article 8 para. (1) of the Moldovan Constitution, the Republic of Moldova undertakes to abide by the Charter of the United Nations and the treaties to which it is a party and to base its relationship with other states on the unanimously acknowledged international law principles and provisions. The European Convention on Human Rights was ratified by the Republic of Moldova in 1997.

Thirdly, in case of conflict between the international pacts and treaties relating to the fundamental rights to which Romania is a party to and the domestic legislation, the former shall prevail. This rule regarding the prevalence of international legal instruments over the national provisions is set out under Article 20 para. (2) of the Romanian Constitution and the corresponding provisions within the Moldovan Constitution[7] are to be found under Article 4 para. (2). The Romanian Constitution adds an exception to this rule, namely when the Constitution or domestic laws contain more favourable provisions.

Also, as stated under Article 148 of the Romanian Constitution, following Romania's accession to the EU, the provisions of the EU Treaties as well as the other EU mandatory legislation shall prevail over conflicting domestic provisions.

As shall be further shown, the right of defence is safeguarded by the fundamental laws of Romania and the Republic of Moldova as well as the criminal procedure laws of both these states.

2. The European Standards for Safeguarding the Right of Defence

2.1. The ECHR Standards

The right of defence is enshrined under Article 6 para. 3 ECHR, which provides in favour of any person charged with a criminal offence the following minimum requirements to be complied with (as such, the list is not exhaustive[8]):

a) to be informed promptly, in a language which he understands and in detail, of the nature and cause of the accusation against him;
b) to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his defence;
c) to defend himself in person or through legal assistance of his own choosing or, if he has not sufficient means to pay for legal assistance, to be given it free when the interests of justice so require;
d) to examine or have examined witnesses against him and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him;
e) to have the free assistance of an interpreter if he cannot understand or speak the language used in court

As pointed out in the ECHR case-law[9], the guarantees listed above "exemplify the notion of fair trial in respect of typical procedural situations which arise in criminal cases, but their intrinsic aim is always to ensure, or to contribute to ensuring, the fairness of the criminal proceedings as a whole"; they "are therefore not an end in themselves, and they must accordingly be interpreted in the light of the function which they have in the overall context of the proceedings".

Upon analysing the specifics provided under Article 6 para. (3), on the one hand, the national judicial bodies shall take into consideration the subject-matter and purpose of the right to a fair trial as a whole – such as the equality of arms principle and the adversarial nature of proceedings – and, on the other hand, there must be positive measures adopted by the states for ensuring the effective compliance with these guarantees[10].

The legal requirements outlined herein are often construed in an integrated manner. For instance, the right to the notification of the charge overlaps to some extent with the right to adversarial proceedings implied

[3] Republished in the Official Journal of Romania no. 767 of October 31, 2003.
[4] Published in the Official Journal of Romania no. 135 of May 31, 1994.
[5] Corneliu Bîrsan, Convenția europeană a drepturilor omului. Comentariu pe articole – Vol. I. Drepturi și libertăți (București: All Beck, 2005): 100.
[6] Corneliu Bîrsan, Convenția europeană a drepturilor omului. Comentariu pe articole – Vol. I. Drepturi și libertăți, 103.
[7] Published in the Official Journal of the Republic of Moldova no. 1 of August 12, 1994, available at: http://lex.justice.md.
[8] Nuala Mole and Catharina Harby, The Right to a Fair Trial – A Guide for the Implementation of Article 6 of the European Conventionon Human Rights (Strasbourg: Council of Europe, 2006): 58, https://rm.coe.int/168007ff49.
[9] ECHR, Case of Mayzit v. Russia, Judgment of January 20, 2005, para. 77 and Can v. Austria, Commission report, para. 48, in Council of Europe, The European Court of Human Rights, "Guide on Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights – Right to a Fair Trial (Criminal Limb)" (2014): 40, https://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/Guide_Art_6_criminal_ENG.pdf.
[10] Frédéric Sudre, Drept european și internațional al drepturilor omului (Iași: Polirom, 2006): 296.

under Article 6 para. 1, the right provided under Article 6 para. 3.b (the right to adequate time and facilities for preparing the defence) as well as with Article 5 para. 2 (regulating the right to be informed of the reasons of arrest and of the charge imposed) of the Convention[11].

Each element set forth under Article 6 para. 3 of the Convention is covered by a rich case-law developed by the Strasbourg Court.

To exemplify with recent ECHR case-law, we note that, in the case of Simeonovi v. Bulgaria[12], the right to a lawyer and the right to be informed of such right was assessed by the Court. The Grand Chamber decided that the right to legal assistance became applicable from the moment of the applicant's arrest, regardless of whether he has been interrogated or subject to any investigative act during the relevant period (i.e. three-day detention after arrest during which no investigative measure took place). In order to reach this decision, the Court made reference to its established case-law, such as reflected in the judgment of September 13, 2016, rendered in the case of Ibrahim and Others v. The United Kingdom, stating "that a criminal charge existed from the moment an individual was officially notified by the competent authority of an allegation that he had committed a criminal offence, or from the point at which his situation had been substantially affected by actions taken by the authorities as a result of a suspicion against him".

With respect to the right provided under Article 6 para. 3.d of the Convention, in the case of Kuchta v. Poland, the applicant and other persons had been convicted and their guilt had been established especially based on the statements of the main co-accused. In this specific case, the absent witness (the Court noted that the principles developed with regard to the use of the statements made by an absent witness also apply by analogy to the depositions of an absent co-accused) was solely heard by the investigators and never by a prosecutor or a judge. The absent witness was permitted, upon request, not to appear within the proceedings and his statements were merely read to those present, which did not allow the other accused to interrogate him. The Court noted that the statements in question were instrumental for the conviction of the applicant. As far as the existence of compensatory procedural guarantees is concerned, it was shown that neither the judges nor the applicant could perceive the credibility of the co-accused during his interrogation. In light of the circumstances of the case, the Court found, by the judgment of January 23, 2018, that Article 6 para. 3.d was violated as the applicant had not sufficient and adequate possibility to challenge the statements that were instrumental for his conviction[13].

2.2. The EU Standards

Article 48 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union[14] states the following: "Respect for the rights of the defence of anyone who has been charged shall be guaranteed".

This right corresponds to Article 6 para. 3 ECHR, having the same meaning as scope as the conventional text, based on Article 52 para. (3) of the Charter[15].

As far as the field of application of the Charter's provisions is concerned, Article 51 para. 1 thereof indicates that these are addressed to the Member States only when implementing Union law.

The secondary EU legislation has been enriched in recent years by a set of directives addressing the fundamental guarantees concerning the right of defence:

- Directive 2010/64/EU on the right to interpretation and translation in criminal proceedings[16];
- Directive 2012/13/EU on the right to information in criminal proceedings[17];
- Directive 2013/48/EU on the right of access to a lawyer in criminal proceedings and in European arrest warrant proceedings, and on the right to have a third party informed upon deprivation of liberty and to communicate with third persons and with consular authorities while deprived of liberty[18];
- Directive (EU) 2016/343 on the strengthening of certain aspects of the presumption of innocence and of the right to be present at the trial in criminal proceedings[19];
- Directive (EU) 2016/1919 on legal aid for suspects and accused persons in criminal proceedings and for requested persons in European arrest warrant proceedings[20].

It must be mentioned that on June, 20 2017, the European Union and the Republic of Moldova held the eighth round of the Human Rights Dialogue in Chișinău, the discussions also covering human rights protection in the justice system. The next EU –

[11] Dovydas Vitkauskas and Grigoriy Dikov, Protecting the Right to a Fair Trial under the European Convention on Human Rights (Strasbourg: Council of Europe, 2012): 83, https://rm.coe.int/168007ff57.

[12] ECHR, Simeonovici v. Bulgaria, judgment of May 12, 2017, in Council of Europe, European Court of Human Rights, Overview of the Court's Case-Law 2017, 2018: 34, https://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/Short_Survey_2017_ENG.PDF.

[13] Council of Europe, The European Court of Human Rights, "Examination of witnesses. Conviction based on co-accused's statements with no possibility of cross-examination. Violation – Kuchta - Poland", Information Note on the Court's Case Law 214 (2018): 17:18.

[14] As published in the Official Journal of the European Union no. C 202 of June 7, 2016.

[15] Explanations relating to the Charter of Fundamental Rights, published in the Official Journal of the European Union no. C 303 of December 14, 2007, p. 30.

[16] Published in the Official Journal of the European Union no. L 280 of October 26, 2010.

[17] Published in the Official Journal of the European Union no. L 142 of June 1, 2012.

[18] Published in the Official Journal of the European Union no. L 294 of November 6, 2013.

[19] Published in the Official Journal of the European Union no. L 65 of March 11, 2016.

[20] Published in the Official Journal of the European Union no. L 297 of November 4, 2016.

Moldova Human Rights Dialogue shall take place in Brussels in 2018[21].

3. Constitutional Protection of the Right of Defence

According to Article 20 para. (1) of the Romanian Constitution, "the constitutional provisions pertaining to the citizens' rights and liberties shall be construed and applied in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, with the pacts, and with the other treaties that Romania is a party to".

As the constitutional provisions benefit from direct application, it follows that these international instruments are integrated into the domestic constitutional block[22].

Correspondingly, Article 4 para. (1) of the Moldovan Constitution stipulates that "the constitutional provisions pertaining to the human rights and liberties shall be construed and applied in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, with the pacts, and with the other treaties to which the Republic of Moldova is party to".

The right of defence is enshrined within the fundamental laws of Romania and the Republic of Moldova as follows:

The first paragraph under Article 24 of the Romanian Constitution and Article 26 of the Moldovan Constitution, respectively guarantee the right of defence.

The Moldovan Constitutional Court noted that the supreme law guarantees the right and not the obligation of each person to defend themselves[23].

Throughout the proceedings, the parties are entitled to a lawyer, either retained or publicly appointed, as provided under Article 24 para. (2) of the Romanian Constitution and Article 26 para. (3) of the Moldovan Constitution[24].

The Constitutional Court of Romania has pointed out in one of its decisions[25] that, by the Constitution's referring to the parties' access to a lawyer, this means that the lawyer status has been acquired in accordance with the law and this constitutes a strong guarantee preventing the clandestine exercise of this profession, outside the legally constituted bar associations.

The Constitution of the Republic of Moldova comprises, under the same article, two additional provisions regarding the right of defence, namely providing that each individual is entitled to react independently, by legitimate means, to the violation of their rights and liberties [para. (2)]; the interference in the activity of the persons that exercise the defence within the established limits is punishable by law [para. (4)].

4. Protection of the Right of Defence as per the Law of Criminal Procedure

4.1. The Romanian Criminal Procedure Relevant Provisions

The right of defence is established within the Romanian law of criminal procedure as a fundamental principle thereof, as per Article 10 of the Romanian Criminal Procedure Code[26], structured into six paragraphs consisting of various procedural guarantees.

The Romanian Constitutional Court noted that art. 10 of the Criminal Procedure Code is in accordance with the constitutional and conventional provisions regulating the right of defence. Also, it added that the procedural sanction provided under the Criminal Procedure Code for violating the right of defence is, as a rule, the relative nullity, which is applicable only when an effective breach of the rights of the parties and the main subjects in the proceedings was caused that cannot be removed otherwise than by the overturning the act; there are two exceptions, triggering the application of absolute nullity, namely in the case of breaching the provisions pertaining to (i) the presence of the suspect or the defendant, when their participation is mandatory according to the law, as well as (ii) the legal assistance of the suspect and defendant as well as the other parties, provided by a lawyer, when such legal assistance is mandatory[27]. The rules and effects of nullity as a procedural sanction are provided under Articles 280-282 of the Romanian Criminal Procedure Code.

---

[21] EU – Republic of Moldova Human Rights Dialogue, press release, June 20, 2017, Chișinău, available at: https://eeas.europa.eu/headquarters/headquarters-homepage/28514/eu-republic-moldova-human-rights-dialogue_en.

[22] Corneliu Bîrsan, Convenția europeană a drepturilor omului. Comentariu pe articole – Vol. I. Drepturi și libertăți, 101.

[23] The Constitutional Court of the Republic of Moldova, Decision no. 22 of June 30, 1997, published in the Official Journal no. 146/1997, in Klaus Sollfrank, Constituția Republicii Moldova – Comentariu (Chișinău: Arc, 2012): 121, available at: http://www.constcourt.md/public/files/file/informatie_utila/Comentariu_Constitutie.pdf.

[24] The Ombudsman of the Republic of Moldova, in the 2016 Report on the observance of human rights, with respect to the right to a fair trial, noted a series of deficiencies pertaining to providing legal aid, such as the lack of response to the legal aid requests, the unsatisfactory quality of defence, the failure to inform the beneficiary of legal aid on the actions carried out or the refusal of the territorial offices of the National Counsel for Legal Assistance to grant legal aid (Raportul privind respectarea drepturilor omului în Republica Moldova în anul 2016: Dreptul la un proces echitabil, http://ombudsman.md/ro/content/raportul-privind-respectarea-drepturilor-omului-republica-moldova-anul-2016-dreptul-la-un).

[25] Decision no. 1354 of October 22, 2009, published in the Official Journal no. 844 of December 7, 2009, Tudorel Toader, Constituția României reflectată în jurisprudența constituțională (Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2011): 91.

[26] Law no. 135/2010, published in the Official Journal of Romania no. 486 of July 15, 2010, in force as of February 1, 2014, with subsequent amendments and supplements.

[27] The Romanian Constitutional Court, Decision no. 336/2015, published in the Official Journal no. 342 of May 19, 2015, para. 39, in Aurel Ciobanu, Petruț Ciobanu, Teodor Manea, Noul Cod de procedură penală adnotat (Bucharest: Rosetti International, 2015): 25.

The content of the right of defence is compound.

The first paragraph of this legal text provides that the parties and the main subjects within the proceedings are entitled to defend themselves or through legal assistance by a lawyer.

Under Romanian criminal procedure law, there are several situations where legal assistance is mandatory. As the Constitutional Court of Romania showed, the right of defence should not be mistaken with the right to mandatory legal assistance as the former is guaranteed by the fundamental law, whereas the latter lies within the remit of the lawmaker[28].

The right of defence is not absolute as it must be exercised within certain limits[29], namely in good faith, according to the purpose for which it was acknowledged by law, as per the final paragraph of Article 10.

The judicial bodies have the corresponding obligation to ensure, throughout the criminal proceedings, the full and effective exercise of the right of defence by the parties and the main subjects within the proceedings, according to para. (5) of Article 10.

As such, the defence rights must be duly made available from the very start of the proceedings. There are various violations that have been generally invoked in the relevant case-law as breaching the right of defence by defendants during the preliminary chamber phase, as points of criticism regarding the conducting of the prosecution, such as: assisting defendants with conflicting interests by the same lawyer; preventing certain lawyers from assisting the defendant; debating whether a defendant arrested in absentia required mandatory legal assistance while still at large; failing to hear the defendant throughout in the prosecution phase or hearing him for several hours on end; limiting the defence's access to the criminal prosecution file; a duration of the criminal prosecution phase or between the different stages of the prosecution deemed too short, etc.[30]

Pursuant to para. (2)-(4) of Article 10, the right to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of the defence, the right to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, and the right to silence are ensured.

The parties, the main subjects in the proceedings as well as the lawyer benefit from the right to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of the defence.

The European Court of Human Rights ruled, in the case of Beraru v. Romania, on the violation of article 6 ECHR, among others, on the grounds that, even though the lawyers submitted numerous requests to consult the case file, only in a later stage had they had access to it, they were not provided with a copy of the indictment nor with a copy of the wiretaps or a transcription thereof[31]. In another case against the Romanian State, Adrian Constantin v. Romania, the same Court ruled that the right to benefit from the time to prepare the defence has been breached by the court's changing the legal classification directly through the judgment, without previously calling it into question within an adversarial procedure[32].

The right to be informed of the accusation is adapted for the suspect and the defendant as follows: the suspect has the right to be informed immediately and before being heard of the act that is the subject-matter of the prosecution and its legal classification; the defendant has the right to be informed immediately of the act for which the criminal action has been set into motion against him and its legal classification.

Before being heard, the suspect and defendants are warned of their right not to make any statement.

For the judicial bodies, hearing the suspect and the defendant represent an obligation, for the accused this constitutes a right whereby their defence is organised but which they can equally choose not to exercise: hence, the content of the right to silence is established[33].

The privilege against self-incrimination is closely linked to the presumption of innocence contained in Article 6 para. 2 of the Convention[34].

4.2. The Moldovan Criminal Procedure Relevant Provisions

The legally defined term "defence" means, according to Article 6 item 3) of the Criminal Procedure Code of the Republic of Moldova[35], the activity carried out by the defending party within the proceedings aiming at combating the charge, in whole or in part, or mitigating the punishment, defending the rights and interests of the suspected persons ("bănuite") for or persons charged ("învinuite") with committing offences as well as redeeming the persons unlawfully subject to prosecution. The "defending party" ("partea apărării") stands for the persons empowered by law to carry out the defence activity, namely the suspect, the charged person, the defendant, the civilly liable party, [28] Constitutional Court Decision no. 494 of April 19, 2011, published in the Official Journal no. 494 of July 11, 2011, in Tudorel Toader, Constituția României reflectată în jurisprudența constituțională, 91.

[29] Nicolae Volonciu and Andreea Simona Uzlău (coords), Codul de procedură penală comentat, 3rd Ed. (Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2017): 35.

[30] Cristinel Ghigheci, Cereri și excepții de cameră preliminară – Vol. 1. Procedura, regularitatea actului de sesizare, legalitatea actelor de urmărire penală – Comentarii și jurisprudență (Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2017): 312-347.

[31] ECHR, Beraru v. Romania, judgment of March 18, 2014, in la Strasbourg asupra procesului penal român (Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2017): 138.

[32] ECHR, Adrian Constantin v. Romania, judgment of April 12, 2011, in Ramona Mihaela Coman, Efectele jurisprudenței Curții de la Strasbourg asupra procesului penal român, 139.

[33] Grigore Gr. Theodoru, Tratat de Drept procesual penal, 2nd Ed. (Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2008): 379-380.

[34] ECHR, Saunders c. Regatului Unit, judgment of December 17, 1996, para. 68, http://www.echr.coe.int.

[35] Published in the Official Journal of the Republic of Moldova no. 104-110 of June 7, 2003, in force as of June 12, 2003, with subsequent amendments and supplements, available at: http://lex.justice.md.

and the representatives thereof [Article 6 item 30) of the Moldovan Criminal Procedure Code].

Article 17 of the Moldovan Code of Criminal Procedure specifically regulates the right of defence. This legal text ensures basic guarantees of exercising this right, namely:

I. the right of the parties that throughout the criminal proceedings they be assisted or represented, as the case may be, by a retained or state-appointed lawyer;
II. the obligation of the criminal prosecution body and of the court to ensure the full exercise of the process rights from which the participants to the criminal proceedings benefit, under the conditions provided by the Code of Criminal Procedure, as well as the right of the suspect, charged person or defendant to qualified legal assistance performed either by a freely-chosen defender or by a state-appointed lawyer who is independent from these bodies;
III. should the suspect, charged person or defendant lack the resources to pay for their defender, they shall be assisted by a state-appointed lawyer without any charge.

As per Article 167 para. (1^1) of the Moldovan Criminal Procedure Code, the criminal prosecution body, within one hour as of the taking into custody of an individual, shall request that the territorial office of the National Counsel for State-Ensured Legal Assistance or other persons empowered thereby assign a lawyer on duty in order to grant legal assistance in case of urgency.

5. Conclusions

Ensuring the effectiveness of the right of defence is unarguably indispensable within present-day criminal proceedings. The right of defence is justified not only for protecting the private interests of the accused, but also the public interest of achieving the objective of justice[36].

Any decision of the judicial bodies that is rendered without giving due consideration to the guarantees of the right of defence in the process is severely flawed and must be sanctioned as such.

Both the Romanian and the Moldovan legislators have made consistent endeavours to comply with the well-established international and regional standards applicable in this field.

However, it is clear that in order for this fundamental right to evolve in regulatory terms, this ongoing compliance effort should continue to be closely monitored so as to prevent and eliminate any practical shortcomings.

Acknowledgement

This paper is written during the sustainability stage of the project entitled "Horizon 2020 - Doctoral and Postdoctoral Studies: Promoting the National Interest through Excellence, Competitiveness and Responsibility in the Field of Romanian Fundamental and Applied Scientific Research", contract number POSDRU/159/1.5/S/140106. This project is co-financed by European Social Fund through Sectoral Operational Programme for Human Resources Development 2007-2013. Investing in people!

References

- Bîrsan, Corneliu. Convenția europeană a drepturilor omului. Comentariu pe articole – Vol. I. Drepturi și libertăți. București: All Beck, 2005
- Cassese, Sabino. "Ruling Indirectly – Judicial Subsidiarity in the ECtHR", Seminar on Subsidiarity: A Double-Sided Coin? 1. The role of the Convention mechanism; 2. The role of national authorities, 30 January 2015, http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/Speech_20150130_Seminar_Cassese_ENG.pdf
- Ciobanu, Aurel and Ciobanu, Petruț and Manea, Teodor. Noul Cod de procedură penală adnotat Bucharest: Rosetti International, 2015
- Coman, Ramona Mihaela. Efectele jurisprudenței Curții de la Strasbourg asupra procesului penal român. Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2017
- Council of Europe, The European Court of Human Rights, "Examination of witnesses. Conviction based on co-accused's statements with no possibility of cross-examination. Violation – Kuchta - Poland", Information Note on the Court's Case Law 214, 2018. https://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/CLIN_2018_01_214_ENG.pdf
- Council of Europe, The European Court of Human Rights, "Guide on Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights – Right to a Fair Trial (Criminal Limb)", 2014. https://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/Guide_Art_6_criminal_ENG.pdf
- Council of Europe, European Court of Human Rights, Overview of the Court's Case-Law 2017, 2018. https://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/Short_Survey_2017_ENG.PDF
- Explanations relating to the Charter of Fundamental Rights, published in the Official Journal of the European Union no. C 303 of December 14, 2007
- EU – Republic of Moldova Human Rights Dialogue, press release, June 20, 2017, Chișinău. https://eeas.europa.eu/headquarters/headquarters-homepage/28514/eu-republic-moldova-human-rights-dialogue_en
- Ghigheci, Cristinel. Cereri și excepții de cameră preliminară – Vol. 1. Procedura, regularitatea actului de sesizare, legalitatea actelor de urmărire penală – Comentarii și jurisprudență. Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2017

[36] Cristinel Ghigheci, Principiile procesului penal în noul Cod de procedură penală (Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2014): 174.

- Ghigheci, Cristinel. Principiile procesului penal în noul Cod de procedură penală. Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2014
- Mole, Nuala and Harby, Catharina. The Right to a Fair Trial – A Guide for the Implementation of Article 6 of the European Conventionon Human Rights, Strasbourg: Council of Europe, 2006. https://rm.coe.int/168007ff49
- Raportul privind respectarea drepturilor omului în Republica Moldova în anul 2016: Dreptul la un proces echitabil, http://ombudsman.md/ro/content/raportul-privind-respectarea-drepturilor-omului-republica-moldova-anul-2016-dreptul-la-un
- Renucci, Jean-François. Tratat de drept european al drepturilor omului. Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2009.
- Sollfrank, Klaus. Constituția Republicii Moldova – Comentariu. Chișinău: Arc, 2012. http://www.constcourt.md/public/files/file/informatie_utila/Comentariu_Constitutie.pdf
- Sudre, Frédéric. Drept european și internațional al drepturilor omului. Iași: Polirom, 2006
- Toader, Tudorel. Constituția României reflectată în jurisprudența constituțională. Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2011
- Theodoru, Grigore Gr. Tratat de Drept procesual penal, 2nd Ed. Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2008
- Vitkauskas, Dovydas and Dikov, Grigoriy. Protecting the Right to a Fair Trial under the European Convention on Human Rights. Strasbourg: Council of Europe, 2012. https://rm.coe.int/168007ff57
- Volonciu, Nicolae and Uzlău, Andreea Simona (coords), Codul de procedură penală comentat, 3rd Ed. Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2017

THE SAFETY MEASURE OF PROHIBITING TO EXERCISE A PROFESSION, IMPOSED BY THE COURT IN CASE OF MAL PRAXIS, MAY ENVISAGE THE PROFESSION OF DOCTOR IN THE WIDER SENSE (AS A WHOLE) OR ONLY THE SPECIALTY THAT OCCASIONED THE COMMITTING OF THE OFFENCE PROVIDED IN THE CRIMINAL LAW

Traian DIMA[*]
Adrian HĂRĂTĂU[]

Abstract

The present paper examines the possibility for the courts of law to order, in case of medical malpractice, the safety measure of prohibiting to exercise the profession of doctor in the wider sense, or only the specialty that occasioned the committing of the offence provided in the criminal law, analyzing the judicial practice regarding this issue. In accordance with Article 450 paragraph (2) of Law no. 95/2006, "disciplinary liability of doctors does not exclude criminal, tort or civil liability".

Between the regulation contained in Article 450 paragraph (2) of Law no. 95/2006 and the safety measure of prohibiting to exercise the profession of doctor, as criminal penalty, there is a close connection, within the meaning that the special law, in particular Law no. 95/2006 derogates from the general criminal law, in particular Article 111 of the Criminal Code in connection with the prohibition of exercising the medical profession.

The disciplinary penalties that may be imposed against doctors for mal praxis are listed in Article 455 of Law no. 95/2006. Article 455 letter (e) sets out, as disciplinary penalty which may be imposed against doctors "the prohibition to exercise the profession or certain medical activities" for a period ranging between one month and one year.

Comparing the provisions of Article 455 letter (e) of Law no. 95/2006 with the provisions of Article 111 of the Criminal Code, it may be noticed that the scope of disciplinary accountability of the doctor having committed the civil mal praxis is more comprehensive than the scope of the safety measure imposed by the criminal court.

Keywords: medical malpractice, safety measures, criminal law, doctor's criminal liability.

1. Introduction

In the criminal law literature, it was emphasized that, in committing an offence provided in the criminal law, certain circumstances of the social reality are targeted, which form part of a requisite nexus and which, if left not counteracted, the jeopardy arises that new offences provided in the criminal law would be perpetrated, for instance, a status of poor professional training by the offender who committed criminal offences without intention, because of such poor training, which could be the source of new offences provided in the criminal law[1]. Such a case can also be encountered when dealing with the professional fault of doctors (criminal mal praxis), which forms the object of our review. Counteracting such state of jeopardy may be achieved not solely by imposing penalties, but also through specific prevention measures, referred to in the criminal law as safety measures.

In the judicial practice, it was decided that what underlies „the adoption of safety measures provided for in Article 111 of the Criminal Law is the state of jeopardy resulting from the unsuitable and hazardous conditions under which the offender fulfils his profession or job or in which he conducts his activity, during the course of which he committed the offence provided in the criminal law[2]".

Safety measures have been defined as preventive criminal law penalties, stipulated by law, to be adopted by the court of law against individuals who have committed offences provided in the criminal law, with the view to removing a state of jeopardy that could generate new offences provided in the criminal law.[3] In other words, safety measures are coercion means of a preventive nature, aimed at precluding states of jeopardy that could potentially generate offences provided in the criminal law.

Situations that could potentially generate states of jeopardy also include, inter alia, the state of inability to perform a profession, such as the medical profession. Such states of jeopardy may not be counteracted by penalties, given that the states themselves result from realities that do not amount to violations of the criminal law, but through specific preventive measures – safety measures.

[*] Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: traian.dima@univnt.ro)
[] PhD Candidate, Attorney at Law (e-mail: adrian@haratau.ro)

[1] Constantin Mitrache, Cristian Mitrache, Drept penal român. Partea generală, Universul juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, p. 259;

[2] Bucharest Court of Appeals, First Criminal Division, criminal judgment no. 767/2000 in Compendium of judicial practice in criminal matters for 2000 of Bucharest Court of Appeals, pp. 78-79;

[3] Matei Basarab, Drept penal. Partea generală, volume I, 4th edition, revised and supplemented, Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, p. 312;

Article 108 letter (c) of the New Criminal Code sets forth the safety measure of „prohibiting to hold or perform a profession". The content of this measure is provided in Article 111 paragraph (1) of the Criminal Code, as follows:

"When the offender has committed the offence because of his inability, poor training or for other reasons rendering him unsuitable for holding a certain position, performing a certain profession or job or for conducting another activity, the measure of prohibiting the exercise of the right to hold that position or performing that profession, job, or activity may be adopted".

In the judicial practice, it was decided that what underlies "the adoption of safety measures provided for in Article 111 of the Criminal Law is the state of jeopardy resulting from the unsuitable and hazardous conditions under which the offender fulfils his profession or job or in which he conducts his activity, during the course of which he committed the offence provided in the criminal law[4]".

It follows that, in the case of this safety measure, the state of jeopardy emanating from the offender's inability may be the consequence of poor training (ignorance, lack of experience, superficiality, etc.), lack of skill or dexterity (confusions, errors, uncertainty, etc.) or any other situations that place the individual in the position of being deemed unsuitable (lack of knowledge and necessary skills) for performing the activity during the course of which the offence was committed[5]. If we strictly refer to doctors, examples may be the indifference to the rules of conduct laid down in the Medical Ethics Code, negligence in performing surgery, actions which require the keenest sense of attention, the doctor's fear, not justified by any severe need or his disregard of the risks which the patients face.

The state of jeopardy in cases of criminal professional negligence, in respect of doctors, in ascertaining whether they may continue to perform this profession, after having committed an offence provided in the criminal law, needs to be determined on a case-by-case basis, in consideration of the circumstances in which the offence was committed and in reliance upon the opinion of specialists in relation to the offender's ability to further perform the activity during the course of which he committed the offence.

2. Judicial practice

The matter under review is brought up by certain rulings issued by case-law in relation to the enforcement of the safety measure of prohibiting to exercise the profession against a doctor who has committed a criminal mal praxis offence.

In a certain case, the urological surgeon N.C. was arraigned in 2014 by the prosecutor's office for mal praxis, because by the inappropriate performance of the surgical act, he maimed the patient I.J., and was accused of having committed the criminal offence of unintentional bodily harm, as set forth in Article 196 of the Criminal Code.

The court sentenced the defendant N.C. to one year imprisonment to be served on probation, to pay EUR 125,000 as moral damages and the safety measure of prohibiting to exercise the profession set forth in Article 111 of the Criminal Code. The court ordered the safety measure of prohibiting to exercise the doctor profession, but not in the wider sense, but only that of urological surgeon because, according to the reasons given by the court, the criminal offence was committed in exercising such profession. The court being asked is to know whether the court could have prohibited the defendant from exercising the profession as doctor in the wider sense (as a whole) as a safety measure.

In another case, Pitești Court sentenced, by means of criminal judgment no. 2254 of 18 November 2010[6], the defendant P.L.S., a doctor having the specialty of obstetrics gynecology because, as a consequence of the superficiality shown in approaching this case, he caused bodily injury and infirmity both to the harmed party and to the baby born by her. The court found that, in this case, the provisions of Article 115 of the Criminal Code (previous – note added) applied, concerning the safety measure of prohibiting to exercise the right to hold a position or to exercise a profession or another job.

The court ordered the safety measure as follows: "because by the conduct adopted in relation to the injured party and implicitly in relation to the baby born by her, the defendant acted with severe superficiality in assessing his patient, as a result of inability or lack of skill, rendering him unsuitable for exercising the profession of senior doctor in the specialty of obstetrics gynecology".

This measure is, in the opinion of the court, precisely aimed at preventing a new case of this kind from occurring in the future, to preclude an obvious state of jeopardy generated by the defendant by his superficiality and incompetence in exercising the profession of senior doctor in the specialty of obstetrics gynecology.

---

[4] Bucharest Court of Appeals, First Criminal Division, criminal judgment no. 767/2000 in Compendium of judicial practice in criminal matters for 2000 of Bucharest Court of Appeals, pp. 78-79;

[5] Vintilă Dongoroz, comment in the paper Explicații teoretice ale Codului penal român, Romanian Academy Publishing House, Bucharest, 1969, volume II, p. 296;

[6] It was published in the paper of Roxana Maria Călin, Mal praxis. Liability of the doctor and of the suppliers of medical services. Case-law, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest 2014, p. 271.

3. Do the courts of law have the possibility to order the safety measure of prohibiting to exercise the profession of doctor within the wider sense?

Mention is to be made that in the above-mentioned cases, during the trial, the defendants' counsels have requested the courts of law that the safety measure they would order should be rather nuanced, within the meaning that such measure would not impact their entire medical career, and consequently that the safety measure should not cover the profession of doctor in the wider sense.

The question we should answer is whether the courts of law could order the safety measure of prohibiting to exercise the profession of doctor within the wider sense. In our opinion, this would not be possible, because the criminal law, in particular Article 111 of the Criminal Code, imperatively lays down only the "prohibition of exercising the profession" and not also other activities relating to the medical profession.

In upholding our opinion, we rely on Law no. 95/2006[7] governing the exercise of the medical profession, as special framework law, in the medical field. This law sets forth, in Chapter 3, Section VI, the doctors' liability for disciplinary misconduct, criminal mal praxis amounting to disciplinary misconduct.

In accordance with Article 450 paragraph (2) of Law no. 95/2006, "disciplinary liability of doctors does not exclude criminal, tort or civil liability". The provision quoted above reveals that disciplinary liability also occurs in the case where the doctor is guilty of a mal praxis offence which amounts to criminal offence, under the criminal law. Therefore, in such a case, disciplinary penalties should also be imposed against doctors, in addition to the criminal penalties. Therefore, between the regulation contained in Article 450 paragraph (2) of Law no. 95/2006 and the safety measure of prohibiting to exercise the profession of doctor, as criminal penalty, there is a close connection, within the meaning that the special law, in particular Law no. 95/2006 derogates from the general criminal law, in particular Article 111 of the Criminal Code in connection with the prohibition of exercising the medical profession.

Disciplinary liability of doctors under Law no. 95/2006 shall be determined by the "Disciplinary Panel" operating in the Territorial College of Doctors. The disciplinary penalties that may be imposed against doctors for mal praxis are listed in Article 455 of Law no. 95/2006. Article 455 letter (e) sets out, as disciplinary penalty which may be imposed against doctors "the prohibition to exercise the profession or certain medical activities" for a period ranging between one month and one year.

This regulation reveals that, in the opinion of the author of Law no. 95/2006, there is a clear distinction between the medical profession as such, in substance the specialty in which the doctor trained, as attested to by the degree, and other medical activities specific to medicine in general, which may be conducted by any doctor, such as: diagnosis, treatment and medical care.

In this concept, if, for instance, an urological surgeon commits mal praxis and causes only a civil prejudice to be incurred by the patient, the Discipline Panel may penalize such doctor by prohibiting to exercise the profession as urological surgeon for a period ranging between one month and one year, but the penalized doctor could continue to work, for instance, as doctor in a clinic, an urology office where he may examine patients, prescribe treatments and provide medical care in the field of urology. What the doctor at issue cannot conduct is the profession of urological surgeon during the period of prohibition.

In comparing the provisions of Article 455 letter (e) of Law no. 95/2006 with the provisions of Article 111 of the Criminal Code, it may be noticed that the scope of disciplinary accountability of the doctor having committed the civil mal praxis is more comprehensive than the scope of the safety measure imposed by the criminal court. Thus, whereas, in disciplinary terms, the Discipline Panel may order either the prohibition to exercise the medical profession for a definite period of time, or the prohibition to exercise certain activities which they may conduct, in case of the safety measure set forth in Article 111 of the Criminal Code, the court may only order the prohibition to exercise the medical profession, but not also other activities, and this means prohibition to exercise only the medical specialty of the doctor at issue in the future. In light of this conclusion, it follows that, in the cases referred to as models of case law, the courts have correctly and absolutely legally ordered as a safety measure the prohibition to exercise the medical profession in particular, the specialty in which he committed the offence provided by the criminal law and not the prohibition to exercise the medical profession in the wider sense, that is also the prohibition to exercise other medical activities.

Although the court of law may prohibit, by imposing the provisions of Article 111 of the Criminal Code, only to exercise the medical profession, but not also other medical activities which they could perform after the sentencing ruling becomes final, in fact, having regard to law no. 95/2006, the safety measure of prohibiting to exercise the medical profession, and in particular the specialty in which they committed the offence provided in the criminal law ordered by the court, entails total effects within the meaning that the doctor may no longer exercise the profession, but may no longer exercise other medical activities, either, such as diagnosis, treatment or medical care. In that respect, we believe that Law no. 95/2006 should be amended within the meaning that it may no longer entail such effects in the case of criminal mal praxis.

[7] Law no. 95/2006, on reform in the healthcare field, as subsequently amended and supplemented, was republished in Official Gazette of Romania no. 652 of 28 May 2015, when articles were renumbered.

Please find herein below a brief analysis into certain provisions of Law no. 95/2006, in light of which the doctor against whom the court of law ordered the safety measure of prohibiting to exercise the profession may no longer perform other medical activities, too, and this, in our opinion, is equivalent to a violation of the constitutional principle that all citizens shall be equal before the law.

In accordance with Law no. 95/2006 on the reform in the healthcare field, the medical profession is exercised in Romania in reliance upon the professional title corresponding to the professional qualification, as follows:

a) general medicine doctor;
b) specialist in one of the clinical or para-clinical specialties contained in the list of medical, medico-dentistry and pharmacy specialties in the healthcare network. The exercise of the medical profession is exercised by the College of Romanian College, in reliance upon the issuance of a "certificate as member of the College", based on the official title of medical qualification.

In accordance with Law no. 95/2006, in view of exercising the medical profession, the obligation is laid down in charge of doctors to enroll in the College of Romanian Doctors. When becoming a member of the above-mentioned professional body, the doctor shall automatically observe, in exercising this profession, the "By-Laws of Doctors' College" and the "Code of Medical Deontology", because these documents give rise to several obligations incumbent upon the doctors, the violation of which would result in administrative or disciplinary penalties.

In observance of Article 382 of Law no. 95/2006, doctors who are subject to cases of dishonor or incompatibility may not be authorized to exercise the medical profession. In this regard, Article 382 letter (b) stipulates that a doctor against whom the prohibition to exercise the profession was imposed as a safety measure, for the period indicated in the judgment issued by the court, shall become unworthy of exercising the profession. It derives that the article only refers to the exercise of the profession, and not of other activities, too, as stipulated in Article 455 letter (e). Having regard to the regulation contained in Article 382 of Law no. 95/2006, it may be noticed that the wording is faulty, because the court of law does not order the safety measure stipulated in Article 111 of the Criminal Code to be imposed for a specific period of time, but it is ordered for an indefinite period.

Upon committing the offence provided by the criminal law (mal praxis), in the vision of Law no. 95/2006, the doctor proves a dishonest behavior, and causes prejudices for the good name of the medical body of which they are a member, which, under the law, amounts to disciplinary misconduct. In reviewing such severe disciplinary misconduct, the Disciplinary Panel shall order, as a penalty against the doctor at issue, the withdrawal of the capacity as member of the College of Romanian Doctors for the period of time in which they fall under the scope of the safety measure of prohibiting to exercise the profession.

The decision of the Disciplinary Panel penalizing the doctor by withdrawing their capacity as member in the College of Romanian Doctors for having become unworthy of such capacity shall be delivered to the penalized doctor, to the Executive Office of the College of Romanian Doctors, to the Ministry of Health and to the employer.

When the decision is issued to withdraw the capacity as member in the College of Romanian Doctors, the penalized doctor shall automatically (rightfully) forfeit the authorization to perform the medical profession, in all its regard.

Coming back to the matter at issue, it follows from the considerations detailed herein above that, even if the courts of law order to prohibit the exercise of the profession, consisting in the prohibition to exercise the medical specialty in which the offence provided in the criminal law was committed, in light of the laws governing the exercise of the medical profession, they may no longer exercise the profession or other medical activities, for the period in which they are subject to such safety measure.

In order to return to the medical system, the doctor against whom the safety measure of prohibiting to exercise the profession was imposed may submit a motion to the court of law, to have such measure revoked. The settlement of the motion to revoke such measure shall take place by subpoena delivered to the person against whom the measure was imposed, after having heard their conclusions and the conclusions of the prosecutor.

4. Conclusion

To conclude, doctors do not need to request the court to impose the safety measure of prohibiting to exercise the profession against doctors having committed criminal mal praxis acts, in a more nuanced manner, because the court already does so, in light of its active role, in reliance upon the legal provisions.

References

- Constantin Mitrache, Cristian Mitrache, Drept penal român. Partea generală, Universul juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, p. 259
- Bucharest Court of Appeals, First Criminal Division, criminal judgment no. 767/2000 in Compendium of judicial practice in criminal matters for 2000 of Bucharest Court of Appeals, pp. 78-79
- Matei Basarab, Drept penal. Partea generală, volume I, 4th edition, revised and supplemented, Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, p. 312

- Vintilă Dongoroz, comment in the paper Explicații teoretice ale Codului penal român, Romanian Academy Publishing House, Bucharest, 1969, volume II, p. 296
- Roxana Maria Călin, Mal praxis. Liability of the doctor and of the suppliers of medical services. Case-law, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest 2014, p. 271
- Law no. 95/2006, on reform in the healthcare field, as subsequently amended and supplemented, was republished in Official Gazette of Romania no. 652 of 28 May 2015, when articles were renumbered

INCRIMINATING THE CONFLICT OF INTERESTS IN ROMANIA: RECENT LEGAL DEVELOPMENTS

Mihai MAREȘ[*]

Abstract

The present paper aims at outlining the evolution of the Romanian criminal law provisions incriminating the conflict of interests, starting from its insertion, as of 2006, into the Criminal Code of 1968, until the up-to-date version of the offence as per the Criminal Code in force, renamed as use of the position for favouring persons, as amended by Law no. 193/2017. In this context, the approaches of the legal text in the well-established case-law of the judicial bodies as well as of the Constitutional Court and legal literature are highly relevant in order to explain the rationale behind the shaping of the legal content of the offence. The diachronic delineation shall be supplemented by elements of comparative law. Where appropriate, reference shall also be made to the administrative type of liability that may be incurred in a conflict of interest case and the relationship thereof with the proceedings in criminal matters or to distinctions between the analysed offence and other offences falling into the category of malfeasance in office or corruption offences. The conclusions of this examination emphasise the need for predictability and proper understanding of the criminological layer in tackling the conflict of interest phenomenon.

Keywords: malfeasance in office, conflict of interests, favouring, public servant, economic benefit.

1. Introduction

1.1. Introduction

The conflict of interests offence is placed by the lawmaker in the category of malfeasances in office although part of the jurisprudence considers it appropriate to have placed it in the category of corruption offences as both categories of offences violate the public interests[1].

One of the affirmed values of the 2016-2020 National Anti-Corruption Strategy, approved by Government Decision no. 583/2016, is integrity (under item 2.1 of Chapter 2), which means that the representatives of public institutions and authorities have the obligation to declare any personal interests tha may conflict with the objective performance of their work duties as well as to make all necessary endeavours to avoid conflicts of interests and incompatibilities.

As rightly pointe out in the literature[2], the present-day incrimination of the conflict of interests under Romanian criminal law takes into consideration the provisions set out under Article 8 of the 2003 UN Convention against Corruption, referring to codes of conduct for public officials, specifically the ones stating that "each State Party shall endeavour to apply, within its own institutional and legal systems, codes or standards of conduct for the correct, honourable and proper performance of public functions" and that "Each State Party shall consider taking, in accordance with the fundamental principles of its domestic law, disciplinary or other measures against public officials who violate the codes or standards established in accordance with this article".

2. Incriminating the Conflict of Interests under the Romanian Criminal Code of 1968

The incrimination of the conflict of interests in the Romanian criminal law was brought about pursuant to Article I item 61 of Law no. 278/2006 for amending and supplementing the Criminal Code as well as for amending and supplementing other laws[3] under Article 253[1] of the Criminal Code of 1968.

The Explanatory Memoranda to the draft law that became Law no. 278/2006 explicitly stated the necessity to incriminate such act, that is, to improve the actions of preventing and countering corruption acts, by sanctioning, through criminal law means, the public official who, knowingly and deliberately, achieves personal interests by carryin out public duties. It was noted that, at the time, the provisions incriminating corruption acts under the Criminal Code of 1968 did not cover such a situation, criminal liability being triggered only in cases of bribe-taking, receiving undue benefits or trafficking in influence[4].

The legal content of the offence under this legal text referred to the act committed by a public servant that, in the exercise of his duties, fulfills an act or participates in taking a decision whereby a material benefit was achieved, directly or indirectly, for himself, his spouse, a relative or kin up to the second degree

[*] PhD Candidate, Legal Research Institute, The Romanian Academy (e-mail: mihai.mares@mares.ro).

[1] Sergiu Bogdan (coord.), Doris Alina Șerban and George Zlati, Noul Cod penal – Partea specială – Analize, explicații, comentarii (Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2014): 461.

[2] Georgina Bodoroncea et. al., Codul penal – Comentariu pe articole (Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2014): 671-672.

[3] Published in the Official Journal of Romania no. 601 of July 21, 2006.

[4] Explanatory Memoranda – Law no. 278/2006 for amending and supplementing the Criminal Code as well as for amending and supplementing other laws, available at: http://www.cdep.ro/proiecte/2006/000/20/4/em24.pdf.

included or for other persons with whom he has had commercial or working relations up to 5 years before or from whom he has benefitted or benefits in terms of services or advantages of any nature.

The punishment provided by law was imprisonment of between 6 months and 5 years and the interdiction of the right to hold public office for the maximum duration.

It was also provided that the incrimination provisions did not apply in cases of issuing, approving or adopting legislation.

3. Incriminating the Conflict of Interests under the Criminal Code in Force

There is continuity in incriminating the conflict of interests offence, under Article 301 of the new Criminal Code[5].

It has been noted[6], at the onset of the application of the new law, that the legal content of the conflict of interests offence was almost identical to the one under the previous law, the differences mainly aiming at improving the wording of the incrimination text.

However, since the entering into force of the current legislation, the offence has been substantially reconfigured, as shall be further shown.

As noted in the literature[7], the current legal text incriminating the conflict of interests has been inspired by the French Criminal Code (Articles 432-12 and 432-13), providing the offence of illegally acquiring benefits, but which is significantly more elaborate than the Romanian legal transplant (see Section 3 below).

3.1. The Initial Forms of the Texts of Incrimination

The initial legal content of the offence, as per the first paragraph of Article 301 was the following: the act committed by a public servant who, in the exercise of his work duties, has fulfilled an act or participated in taking a decision whereby an economic benefit has been obtained for himself, his spouse, a relative or kin up to the second degree included or for another person with whom he has had commercial or working relations up to 5 years before or from whom he has benefitted or benefits in terms of advantages of any nature, punishable by law by imprisonment of between 1 year and 5 years and the interdiction of exercising the right to hold public office.

In a similar manner to the previous text of incrimination under the old Criminal Code, the initial form of Article 301 para. (2) of the current Code provided that the first paragraph shall not apply in cases of issuing, approving or adopting legislation.

Pursuant to Article 308 of the Criminal Code, a mitigated version of the conflict of interests offence has been inserted into the legislation. This implied the application of the incrimination text to so-called "private officials", in which case the legal limits of the punishment would be reduced by a third.

Thus, as per this mitigated version, the provisions under Article 301 of the Criminal Code regarding public officials applied accordingly to the acts committed by or relating to the persons exercising, permanently or temporarily, with or without compensation, a task of any kind (i) in the service of a natural person among those mentioned under Article 175 para. (2) of the same code (i.e. persons assimilated to a public official, namely those exercising a service of public interest invested as such by the public authorities or subject to the control or supervision thereof with respect to the performance of the said public service) or (ii) within any legal person.

The emerging legal jurisprudence criticized this legislative intervention as an "error" as no justification, either from the point of view of criminology or comparative law, could be identified for the Romanian lawmaker's option to significantly widen the scope of the conflict of interests offence[8].

It was not until the Constitutional Court of Romania intervened, settling an exception of unconstitutionality of paramount importance in this matter and causing the amendment of the article providing the offence in question so as to comply with the fundamental law provisions.

Thus, by Decision no. 603/2015[9], the Constitutional Court of Romania upheld an exception of unconstitutionality, ruling that the phrase "commercial relations" within Article 301 para. (1) of the Criminal Code was unconstitutional. By the same decision, the Court found that the phrase "or within any legal person" within Article 308 para. (1) of the Criminal Code with reference to art. 301 of the same Code was also unconstitutional.

This ruling was based on the reasoning that the phrase "commercial relations" lack clarity, precision, and predictability, which is not permitted when restricting individual liberty. Furthermore, the recipients of the rule cannot properly direct their conduct. Consequently, the constitutional provisions relating to the quality of the law and individual liberty, set forth under Article 1 para. 5 and Article 23, were disregarded[10].

At the same time, according to the Constitutional Court, providing that the perpetrator of conflict of interests can also be a private person as per the mitigated version of the offence is excessive as the constraining force of the State by criminal means is [5] Law no. 286/2009, published in the Official Journal of Romania no. 510 of July 24, 2009, in force as of February 1, 2014.

[6] Tudorel Toader et al., Noul Cod penal. Comentarii pe articole (Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2014): 485.
[7] Gavril Paraschiv in George Antoniu and Tudorel Toader (coord.), Explicațiile Noului Cod penal (Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2016): 350.
[8] Sergiu Bogdan (coord.), Doris Alina Șerban and George Zlati, Noul Cod penal – Partea specială – Analize, explicații, comentarii, 459.
[9] Published in the Official Journal of Romania no. 845 of November 13, 2015.
[10] See para. 23-25 of Constitutional Court Decision no. 603/2015.

extended in a disproportionate manner over the right to engage in work and economic freedom, without there being any criminological justification in this respect. Consequently, purely private interests are qualified by the lawmaker as public[11].

3.2. The Current Configuration of the Conflict of Interests Offence

Law no. 193/2017 amending the Law no. 286/2009 on the Criminal Code has brought significant changes to the conflict of interests offence[12]:

1. The well-established name of the offence ("the conflict of interests") has been replaced by "using the position for favouring certain persons".
2. The conditions of incrimination have been narrowed down by eliminating the following legal elements from the content of the offence: the public official's participation in taking a decision; the obtaining of the benefit for another person with whom the public official has been in commercial or work relations up to five years before or from whom he benefitted or benefits in terms of advantages of any nature; the manner of obtaining the advantage (directly or indirectly).
3. The interdiction to occupy a public office has been limited to a three-year period.
4. A new hypothesis excluding the application of the first paragraph of Article 301 has been inserted, namely exercising a right acknowledged by law or fulfilling an obligation imposed by law, by observing the conditions and limits provided thereby.

Consequently, the current legal content of the offence, as per the first paragraph of Article 301 is the following: the act committed by a public servant who, in the exercise of his work duties, has fulfilled an act whereby an economic benefit has been obtained for himself, his spouse, a relative or kin up to the second degree included.

As shown in the relevant case-law, although the legal modality consisting in the public official's participation in taking a decision has been eliminated, among the prima facie elements, the fulfillment by the public official of an act in the exercise of his work duties has been maintained. Consequently, the latest legislative amendments did not amount to the decriminalisation of the act held against the defendant[13].

The current form of Article 301 para. (2) of the Criminal Code provides that the first paragraph shall not apply when the act or decision refers to (i) issuing, approving or adopting legislation or (ii) exercising a right acknowledged by law or fulfilling an obligation imposed by law, by observing the conditions and limits provided thereby. This is an essential element to be considered when analysing the objective limb of the offence.

Moreover, the law requires two additional elements to meet the constitutive elements of the conflict of interests offence, namely that the act fulfilled by the public official should fall within the remit of his work duties and that this act should actually determine the obtaining of an economic benefit for himself, his spouse, a relative or kin up to the second degree included[14].

The case-law of the Romanian supreme court shows, by making reference to the Constitutional Court Decision no. 2 of January 15, 2014, that the conflict of interests offence does not imply solely the obtaining of undue advantages, but any type of advantage, as what the lawmaker had in view by incriminating this act was to protect the social values whenever the impartial exercise of the public official's work duties could be affected[15].

The offence is punishable by imprisonment of between 1 year to 5 years and the interdiction of exercising the right to hold public office for a three-year period.

By the same amending law, the mitigated version of the conflict of interests offences under Article 308, referring to the commission of the offence by or with respect to "private" officials, has been eliminated.

Before its being adopted, the conformity of the law that eventually became Law no. 193/2017 with the provisions of the Romanian Constitution was verified and the objection of unconstitutionality was dismissed as unfounded. It follows that, in the Court's view, the provisions amending the Criminal Code are in line with the fundamental law provisions, including the ones relating to the relation between international and domestic provisions.

Be that as it may, there are still legal challenged ahead in properly interpreting the text of incrimination relating to the offence of using the position for favouring certain persons.

For instance, the breach of the ne bis in idem principle may occur when other, non-criminal, forms of liability are activated for the same act, such as finding a conflict of interests when concluding an agreement, as it has been invoked in a case tried by the High Court of Cassation and Justice[16]. In this particular case, the National Integrity Agency found a conflict of interests concerning an MP and a disciplinary action and sanction followed, namely the reduction of the salary

[11] See para. 32 and 34 of Constitutional Court Decision no. 603/2015.

[12] Mihai Mareș, "Conflictul de interese. Modificarea conținutului legal al infracțiunii. Consecințe", Pandectele Române 5 (2017): 169.

[13] The Cluj Court of Appeal, the Criminal Division, decision no. 1101/A/2017 of September 6, 2017, www.rolii.ro apud sintact.ro, in Mihai Mareș, "Conflictul de interese. Modificarea conținutului legal al infracțiunii. Consecințe", 165.

[14] Ilie Pascu in Vasile Dobrinoiu (coord), Noul Cod penal comentat. Partea specială, 3rd Ed. (Bucharest, Universul Juridic, 2016): 586-587.

[15] The High Court of Cassation and Justice, The Criminal Division, decision no. 77/RC/2017 of February 22, 2017, www.scj.ro, in Mihai Mareș, "Conflictul de interese. Elemente de tipicitate a infracțiunii. Cerințe esențiale" Pandectele Române 5 (2017): 170.

[16] The High Court of Cassation and Justice, sentence no. 88/2015, final by criminal judgment no. 42/2016, Panel of 5 Judges, in Augustin Lazăr, Conflictul de interese – Teorie și jurisprudență. Studii de drept comparat (Bucharest, Universul Juridic: 2016): 78.

for a three-month period. The judicial control court considered that this disciplinary ruling did not represent a final ruling so as to hold the res judicata principle applicable.

However, when dealing with parallel procedures, it is mandatory to take into consideration the standards developed by the ECHR conventional system when construing the ne bis in idem principle[17], which are more nuanced than the Romanian res judicata principle. And so, based on the wider European standard, the ne bis in idem principle could, in my opinion, be successfully argued in a criminal case when there is a prior final administrative ruling punishing the said conflict of interests. The analysis is to be made in concreto.

4. Elements of Comparative Law

As already mentioned, Articles 432-12 and 432-13 of the French Criminal Code (De la prise illégale d'intérêts) serve as the source of inspiration for the Romanian text of incrimination[18].

According to the first paragraph of Article 432-12 of the French Criminal Code, the act committed by a person holding public authority or performing a public service mission or by a person holding a public office, to take, receive or keep, directly or indirectly, any interest in a company or in an operation of which, at the time of the act, he has, in whole or in part, the duty of supervising, administering, liquidating or paying, shall be punishable by five years' imprisonment and a fine of € 500,000, the amount of which may be doubled to the amount of the proceeds of the offence.

As per Article 432-13 of the French Criminal Code:

It is punishable by three years' imprisonment and a fine of € 200,000, the amount of which may be doubled to the amount of the proceeds of the offence, the act committed by a person who has been charged, as a member of the Government member, of an independent administrative authority or of an independent public authority holding a local executive function, a civil servant, a military official or a public official within the framework of the duties actually performed by him or supervise or control a private enterprise, either to conclude contracts of any kind with a private enterprise or to formulate an opinion on such contracts, or to propose directly to the competent authority decisions relating to operations carried out by a private enterprise or to formulate an opinion on such decisions, to take or receive a participation by work, advice or capital in one of these companies before expiring a period of three years following the cessation of these functions. The same penalties apply to any participation by work, advice or capital in a private company which owns at least 30% of common capital or has entered into an exclusive or de jure agreement with one of the companies previously referred to.

For the purposes of these legal texts, a public enterprise operating in a competitive sector and in accordance with the rules of private law is considered to be a private enterprise.

These provisions are applicable to employees of public institutions, public enterprises, mixed companies in which the State or public authorities directly or indirectly hold more than 50% of the capital and public operators provided for by Law No. 90-568 of July 2, 1990 on the organization of the public service of the post office and France Telecom.

The offence is not constituted by the sole participation in the capital of companies listed on the stock exchange or when the capital is received by devolution succession.

Article 323 of the Italian Criminal Code incriminates the conflict of interests under a different name, namely abuse of office (which is a distinct offence under Romanian criminal law), whereas in other jurisdictions, such as Germany, the act is not incriminated at all[19].

As far as the common law legal systems ar concerned, the American legislation is a noteworthy example as it comprises an extensive set of provisions under Chapter 11, Part I, Title 18 of the US Code, which is entitled "Bribery, Graft, and Conflicts of Interest"[20].

5. Conclusions

From a cultural perspective, in accordance with a scholarly opinion[21], I am also of the view that the incrimination of the conflict of interests in Romania also possesses a symbolic dimension, by encouraging a change in the Romanian cultural paradigm to shift from a traditional clan-like view on human relationships to duly observing the primacy of pursuing integrity in achieving the public interest over such purely personal connections.

Nevertheless, when it comes to overly restricting the private dimension through law, as the Romanian Constitutional Court has already shown, the lawmaker must adopt a balanced view so as to comply with the standards ensuring the exercise of fundamental rights.

[17] Mihai Mareș and Mihaela Mazilu-Babel, "CEDO. Cauza A. și B. împotriva Norvegiei. Sancțiuni fiscale și penale. Ne bis in idem. Proceduri paralele. Implicații în procesul penal român" Pandectele Române 1 (2017): 123 and the following.

[18] The text of the French Criminal Code, updated as of December 16, 2017, is available at: www.legifrance.gouv.fr.

[19] Sergiu Bogdan (coord.), Doris Alina Șerban and George Zlati, Noul Cod penal – Partea specială – Analize, explicații, comentarii, 460-461.

[20] The US Code is available at: https://www.law.cornell.edu/. Section 208 on acts affecting a personal financial interest, under Chapter 11, had been invoked in the context of discussing President Donald Trump's handling his financial and business entities following taking office (see Lauren Carroll, "Giuliani: President Trump will be exempt from conflict-of-interest laws", November 16, 2016, http://www.politifact.com/truth-o-meter/statements/2016/nov/16/rudy-giuliani/giuliani-president-trump-will-be-exempt-conflict-i/).

[21] Sergiu Bogdan (coord.), Doris Alina Șerban and George Zlati, Noul Cod penal – Partea specială – Analize, explicații, comentarii, 461.

Following the recent legislative developments, the solutions proposed by the participants to the proceedings and ordered upon by the judicial bodies shall be a barometre as to the degree of clarity of the current text of incrimination.

Acknowledgement

This paper is written during the sustainability stage of the project entitled "Horizon 2020 - Doctoral and Postdoctoral Studies: Promoting the National Interest through Excellence, Competitiveness and Responsibility in the Field of Romanian Fundamental and Applied Scientific Research", contract number POSDRU/159/1.5/S/140106. This project is co-financed by European Social Fund through Sectoral Operational Programme for Human Resources Development 2007-2013. Investing in people!

References

- Antoniu, George and Toader, Tudorel (coord.). Explicațiile Noului Cod penal. Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2016
- Bodoroncea, Georgina et. al., Codul penal – Comentariu pe articole. Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2014
- Bogdan, Sergiu (coord.), Șerban, Doris Alina and Zlati, George. Noul Cod penal – Partea specială – Analize, explicații, comentarii. Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2014
- Dobrinoiu, Vasile (coord). Noul Cod penal comentat. Partea specială, 3rd Ed. Bucharest, Universul Juridic, 2016
- Lazăr, Augustin. Conflictul de interese – Teorie și jurisprudență. Studii de drept comparat. Bucharest, Universul Juridic: 2016
- Mihai Mareș, "Conflictul de interese. Elemente de tipicitate a infracțiunii. Cerințe esențiale" Pandectele Române 5 (2017): 170-177
- Mareș, Mihai. "Conflictul de interese. Modificarea conținutului legal al infracțiunii. Consecințe", Pandectele Române 5 (2017): 165-169
- Mihai Mareș and Mihaela Mazilu-Babel, "CEDO. Cauza A. și B. împotriva Norvegiei. Sancțiuni fiscale și penale. Ne bis in idem. Proceduri paralele. Implicații în procesul penal român", Pandectele Române 1 (2017): 115-136
- Toader, Tudorel et al., Noul Cod penal. Comentarii pe articole. Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2014

ASPECTS OF FORENSIC TACTICS AT THE CRIME SCENE INVESTIGATION OF MURDER CASES

Nicolae MĂRGĂRIT*

Abstract

Crime scene investigation is a procedural and criminalistics tactics activity aimed at a direct perception of the place where the crime was committed, at discovering, revealing, holding down, picking up and examining the clues, the evidence, indicating their position and their condition, in order to determine the nature and the circumstances in which the act was committed, as well as the data that are necessary in order to identify the perpetrator.

Specialist authors say that crime scene investigation is that initial action of criminal prosecution which is relevant in the whole of pursuits dedicated to solving an antisocial cause and it involves the immediate, direct and comprehensive knowledge of the place where the criminal act was committed.

According to the provisions of Article 192 of the Code of Criminal Proceedings, crime scene investigation may be reasonably required by the judicial body at any time this is deemed necessary in order to establish the facts about the situation of the place where the crime was committed, to discover and to hold down the clues related to the crime, to determine the position and the condition of the evidence and the circumstances in which the act was committed.

Crime scene investigation, as a procedure or an evidentiary activity, involves the direct perception by the criminal prosecution body or the trial court of the place where the act was committed so as to be able to draw conclusions about its nature, how it was committed, the number of perpetrators, and so on.

Keywords: Criminal Law, Forensic Tactics, Judicial Body, Probative Activity, Criminal Field.

1. Introduction

"Human being is the ultimate creation of the world who, with his restless spirit, is always striving for refinement[1]."

Life is the most precious asset of a person and at the same time the indispensable condition for the existence and perpetuation of an individual[2].

Defending one of the greatest values, which creates value itself, has a very special meaning. Endangering a human life is an action that jeopardizes not only the existence of an individual, but the aggregate of social relationships, man being the essence of these relations. Killing means suppressing the history maker, the beneficiary of the goods created together with his fellowmen. To defend this priceless value means that not only the human being is protected, but also the huge mass of social relationships[3].

The acts which affect the life of a person create a danger not only to the existence of the isolated individual, but for all the people taken collectively, therefore the normal course of social relationships could not be possible without protecting this elementary and absolute value – life.

The first document concerned with the protection of human life was the "Declaration of Independence" of July 4, 1776, which solemnly proclaimed the right to life for all people. The same ideas were also asserted by the "Universal Declaration of Human Rights", adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations on December 10, 1948. Article 3 of the Declaration says that: "Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person". This right appears in other documents too, like the European Convention on the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Article 2) and the Document of the Copenhagen Meeting of the Conference on the Human Dimension of the CSCE[4].

In our country, this right is obviously a guarantee.

Article 22, paragraph (a) of the Constitution of Romania, adopted on December 8, 1991, provides that: "the right to life, as well as the right to a person's physical and psychological integrity are guarantees". With reference to the importance of protecting the social value represented by life, we need to underline that the criminal law materials obviously and certainly show that nothing is more important and more valuable than human life with all the attributes and implications resulting from its protection. We consider human life as a priceless, incalculable value, which cannot be compared to other goods or values defended by criminal law.

*Assistant Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law – University "Bioterra" of Bucharest; Lawyer in the Bucharest Bar (e-mail: margarit.nicolae56@gmail.com).

[1] A.Boroi, "Infracțiuni contra vieții" (Crimes Against Life), Național Publishing House, Bucharest, 1996, p.5.

[2] T.Vasiliu, D.Pavel, G.Antoniu, and others, "Codul Penal comentat şi adnotat – partea specială" (The Criminal Code Commented and Annotated – The Special Part), vol.I, Științifică și Enciclopedică Publishing House, Bucharest, 1975, p.68.

[3] V.Dongoroz, "Explicații teoretice ale Codului Penal român" (Theoretical Explanations of the Romanian Criminal Code), vol.III, Academia Română Publishing House, Bucharest, 1971, p.7.

[4] A. Boroi, cited work p.12–13.

2. The meaning of crime scene

Crime scene investigation is an important activity, which together with other prosecution actions contributes to the criminal aim, which is finding the truth.

Specialist authors[5] say that crime scene investigation is that initial action of criminal prosecution which is relevant in the whole of pursuits dedicated to solving an antisocial cause and it involves the immediate, direct and comprehensive knowledge of the place where the criminal act was committed.

Crime scene investigation is a procedural and criminalistics tactics activity which is aimed at a direct perception of the place where the crime was committed, at discovering, revealing, holding down, picking up and examining the clues, the evidence, indicating their position and their condition, for the purpose of determining the nature and the circumstances in which the act was committed, as well as the data that are necessary in order to identify the perpetrator[6].

According to the provisions of Article 192 of the Code of Criminal Proceedings, crime scene investigation may be reasonably required by the judicial body at any time this is deemed necessary in order to establish the facts about the situation of the place where the crime was committed, to discover and to hold down the clues related to the crime, to determine the position and the condition of the evidence and the circumstances in which the act was committed.

Crime scene investigation, as a procedure or evidentiary activity, involves the direct perception by the criminal prosecution body or the trial court of the place where the act was committed so as to be able to draw conclusions about its nature, how it was committed, the number of perpetrators, etc.

The term "crime scene" or the "scene of the crime" (criminal prosecution bodies also called it crime area in their practice) is understood not only as the actual place where a crime was committed, but also other close areas or other places from which data could be obtained about the preparations, the act that was committed and its consequences, including the perpetrator's way in and out of the crime area. According to the provisions of Article 41, paragraph 2 of the Code of Criminal Proceedings, the "crime scene" is the place where the criminal activity took place, in whole or a part of it, or where its result occurred.

In a broad sense, in case of murder, the notion of crime scene is understood appropriately as follows:

- the lot of land, the road section or the room where parts of a human body, or human skeleton, were discovered, as well as their surroundings;
- the place where the primary episode of the act happened, meaning the place where the victim's life was suppressed;
- the place where the victim was abandoned or where the body was dismembered, including its surroundings;
- the place where the victim died, in case that it is not the same as the place of the assault;
- the route followed by the victim after the assault by the place where the victim's body was discovered;
- the ways in used by the offender to get into the crime area, as well as the place he or she used to leave the area;
- the route followed by the offender after leaving the crime area in the direction he or she moved to[7].

In case of dismembered bodies, crime scene investigation involves as many activities like the ones above (different from one another) as the number of body parts discovered, so as, eventually, the crime scene in all its meaning takes shape. In other words, the meaning of crime scene is a sum of the places that make it, where the main sequence is the place where the primary episode happened – the suppression of a life – and the body was cut out.

According to the provisions of Article 195 of the Code of Criminal Proceedings, all the conclusions of the investigation of the crime scene are recorded in a report, to which photographs, drawings, sketches etc. are added.

3. The importance of crime scene investigation

The importance of crime scene investigation comes from the possibility of the criminal prosecution body or of the trial court to perceive directly the circumstances in which the offender acted, the objects he or she used or touched, how they worked, the outcomes, etc. All this helps to get an overall picture of the act, which is available to the judicial body for the purpose of investigating criminal causes.

The specific literature says that crime scene investigation is an evidential procedure with a deep significance in finding the truth, and for some cases (murder, robbery, destruction, serious work accidents, road, railway, ship and air accidents, etc.) a solution is basically inconceivable without this activity. This is because the crime scene is the place with the most clues or data referring to the crime and the perpetrator[8].

This activity of an utmost importance to the forensic investigation of a murder has some specific features such as:

- Crime scene investigation is an initial activity in

[5] C.Suciu, "Criminalistica" (Criminalistics), Didactică şi Pedagogică Publishing House, Bucharest, 1972, p.503; I.Mircea, "Criminalistica" (Criminalistics), Didactică şi Pedagogică Publishing House, Bucharest, 1978, p.148.

[6] V.Berchesan, C, Pletea, I.E.Sandu, "Tratat de tactică criminalistică" (Treaty of Criminalistics Tactics), Police Academy Publishing House, Carpați, Craiova, 1992, p.26.

[7] Collective work, "Tratat de metodică criminalistică" (Treaty of Criminalistics Methods), p. 32.

[8] Collective work, "Tratat practic de criminalistică" (A Practical Treaty of Criminalistics), Volume I, M.A.I. – I.G.P.– Institute of Criminalistics, Bucharest, The Publishing Service, 1976, p. 25.

the investigation of a murder, which requires the existence of findings related to the situation of the crime scene, in order to discover and hold down the clues related to the crime, to determine the position and the condition of the evidence or the circumstances in which the crime was committed (Article 192 / Code of Criminal Proceedings).

- Crime scene investigation is not only a simple initial act of criminal prosecution and criminalistics tactics, but also an activity of an immediate nature[9].

If the place where a murder was committed holds the most clues or data referring to the crime and the offender, the urgency of the crime scene investigation is required because any delay can lead to a change in its ambience, to a loss or destruction of clues and evidence with negative consequences for the forensic investigation.

- Crime scene investigation is an obligatory activity. This activity is obligatory because the direct perception of the situation at the murder scene cannot be replaced by any other criminal prosecution activity. Its obligatory nature results also from the provisions of the criminal proceedings law, from some internal norms – orders or instructions developed by the Ministry of the Administration and the Interior or by the Prosecution Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice – and from the practice of judicial bodies.
- Crime scene investigation is an activity which, normally, cannot be repeated. The inappropriate crime scene investigation and the deficiencies in materialising the results of this activity cannot be fixed. Once the investigation of the scene where the murder was committed is completed, the scene suffers changes: the members of the team enter the crime area, objects are moved from their initial place, after the team has left those who remain clear up the place in order to return it to its current use.

We should not mistake the unrepeatable nature of crime scene investigation with its interruption, the latter being possible in certain circumstances, such as: the nightfall; the vastness of the scene or some peculiarities which need much investigation time; the sudden appearance of atmosphere events (heavy rain, heavy snowfalls etc); the incomplete knowledge of the land lots or the routes that are covered by the notion of crime scene; the discovery of some source of danger (explosion, fire, etc).

Tactically, the investigation should be resumed by the same team that initiated it, ensuring the continuity of the previous activities and a unitary image of these activities. However, during the interruption, measures will be taken to protect and preserve the clues that have been examined, including the security of the crime scene.

With regard to the tasks or the objectives of crime scene investigation, presented in the specific literature[10], they are as follows:

1. A direct examination of the place where the crime was committed
2. Searching, discovering, holding down, picking up, examining the clues and other evidence
3. Marking the route followed by the criminal (iter criminis), the objects on which the criminal acted, as well as the instruments he or she used
4. Determining the places from where some sequences of the crime could have been noticed
5. Identifying the people who have a connection with the investigated crime (perpetrators, people who were threatened, assaulted, other than the murder victim, etc.);
6. Elaborating and checking the versions referring to the crime that was committed, the perpetrators, as well as other circumstances (place, time, motive, purpose, etc.);
7. Determining the causes, the conditions and the circumstances which brought about or were favourable to the crimes, and the necessary preventive measures
8. Taking some measures to limit the damage and to prevent other harmful consequences

An evaluation of the information gathered during crime scene investigation provides data regarding the object and the subject of the crime, the content of the crime (the objective and the subjective aspects), as well as the identification of the wrongdoers. The object of the crime – the judicial one and the material one – takes shape against the background of the social relationships which were violated and the values targeted by the perpetrator.

The clues and the evidence may indicate the genetic profile, the blood type, the height, the weight, the gender of the perpetrator or possibly their identity. The manner in which the murder was committed may indicate some information regarding the transportation, the scatter of body fragments, changes of the ground ascertaining their dragging etc. – an aspect pertaining to the objective side of the crime, the number of perpetrators and so on. The findings allow the judicial bodies to determine the action or the inaction of the perpetrator, the consequence which is socially dangerous, the causality relation etc. With reference to the subjective side, the form of guilt with which the offender acted results from the materiality of the act, as the psychological position of the offender cannot be isolated from the activity by means of which it is accomplished[11].

[9] C.Suciu, cited work, p. 503.
[10] E.Stancu, cited work, p 9–10.
[11] C.Pletea, cited work, p 281.

4. Measures to be taken by the judicial bodies that arrived first at the scene

Pursuant to Article 324, paragraph 1 of the Code of Criminal Proceedings, the criminal prosecution in case of murders as well as other acts with a high degree of social danger provided by law is obligatorily carried out by the competent prosecutor.

According to the provisions of Article 288 of the Code of Criminal Proceedings, the prosecution bodies may take note of a murder that was committed through a complaint, a denunciation, or at the their own initiative when they become aware by any means of a homicide or a suspicion of murder.

Practice has shown that in many cases the police bodies are the first approached in connection with: people who are missing from home, the discovery of a body showing signs of violent death, when body fragments or remains are found, including parts of a skeleton, the death of seriously injured people who were in a hospital etc[12].

Among the urgent measures intended to ensure the preservation of the crime scene there are:

a) Saving the victims and giving first aid. No matter the situation found at the crime scene – even if it is no longer necessary, before picking up the body parts, the officer or the under-officer present at the scene must write down and mark the place and the position of the victim at the time of their arrival. Marking is necessary because the discovery of one part of a body in a specific place requires the search for the other parts within the same perimeter, the forensic practice showing cases where all the parts of a dismembered body were thrown away at relatively small distances one from another[13].

b) Preserving the crime scene. The one arriving first at the scene must undertake some actions so as to exclude the possibility to change, by accident or intentionally, the initial aspect of the crime area. Therefore, he or she must ensure the security of the place where the act was committed and protect the clues and the objects existing in that place. It is possible that the perpetrators or their accomplices are among the strangers who enter the crime area, their purpose being to destroy any possible clues that remained after the act unfolded.

The officer or the under-officer must act tactfully and keep away from the body and the surrounding area all those who have no reason to be there (the "curious" ones and the "thrill seeking").

It is absolutely necessary to observe the rules in force forbidding the police officers or under-officers and any other people, irrespective of their degree, position or capacity, to enter the crime scene if they have no tasks in connection with the crime scene investigation or with saving the victims.

In order to avoid the destruction, the deterioration, the disappearance or the change of the crime objects or clues, the parts of the body and the objects which may carry clues shall be covered with a cloth, with plastic foils, boxes, etc. Moreover, a safety belt shall be placed in order to keep strangers away, using the band with a specific indication, or, if there is no such band, ropes, wire and so on. The measures will be similar in case that the crime scene allows the use of a tracking dog for processing the clue of human scent.

c) Identifying eye witnesses, suspicious people, identifying and arresting the perpetrators or taking measures to chase and catch them. The police officer who arrives first at the crime scene comes into contact with many people. Among those people, except for the curious ones, there may be some who perceived wholly or partially the circumstances of the murder, or who know some details about the perpetrator or the victim. These details which are provided by such people are very important to the cause, beginning with the identification of the victim or the information which can lead to the identification of the victim and the perpetrator, and continuing with their actions before and during the assault, the instrument which the offender used etc. and ending with the actions of the criminal after the killing, the direction to which he or she moved and possibly the means of transportation used to transport the body parts and which helped him or her escape the crime area. Other details may be concerned with the nature of the relations between the perpetrator and the victim, the reason of the conflict, the goods or valuables which were taken from the de victim, other people who were present when the act took place and so on.

If the isolation of witnesses is meant to protect them from any foreign influence which might alter their testimony, isolating the perpetrators from the rest of people is intended to protect those concerned from any possible aggression by those who are present and who are revolted by the act, or by relatives of the victim.

If the perpetrator did not stay or was not identified at the crime scene, depending on the information provided by witnesses and the concrete possibilities existing at the crime scene, the officer or under-officer who first came there can take action to chase and catch the offender or to alert the police in the area where the offender headed to[14].

Announcing the criminal prosecution body of the territory where the murder happened, who has the competence to carry out the crime scene investigation. The police officer who first arrived at the crime scene shall approach the criminal prosecution body that has the territorial competence in the area where the act was committed. The announcement must briefly indicate the nature of the crime, its main aspects, the localisation and the extent of the area where the murder was committed or where parts of the body were discovered, the measures taken and their outcomes, as well as other information that can be useful to the team carrying out the investigation.

[12] E.Stancu, cited work, p. 230.
[13] V.Berchesan, cited work, p. 375.
[14] Collective work, "Tratat de metodică criminalistică" (Treaty of Criminalistics Methods), p. 32.

The one who took the first measures has the obligation to stay at the scene until the investigation team arrive and inform the head of the team on the measures taken by that time and the measures which are under way, the initial aspect of the crime scene, the changes that intervened, who made them and for what purpose, the witnesses and the other people who were identified and the information obtained from them.

The specific literature underlines the special role played by the person who arrives first at the scene, as the subsequent unfolding of the forensic investigation depends to a large extent on their professionalism and how they accomplish their specific duties[15].

5. Preparation for the crime scene investigation. The importance of having the murder crimes investigated

The preparations for carrying out the investigation cover two phases: at the office of the judicial body and at the crime scene.

Among the measures taken before going to the crime scene there are:

5.1. Receiving, recording and checking the announcement.

No matter if there is a complaint or a denunciation, the prosecution body must take down the date and the specific time when the announcement was received, who made the announcement and from where, including the means used to make the announcement. The person receiving the announcement has the obligation to verify the competence and if he or she finds that another body is competent, then he or she immediately has to inform that competent body to carry out the investigation of the crime scene. That body has to proceed to: identify the person who made the complaint or the denunciation; check the announcement to see if the things announced are real and also with regard to the place where the crime was committed, its amplitude and its consequences and so on.

5.2. The technical and material provision.

This activity involves the following: preparing the universal criminalistics tool kit; preparing the DNA testing kit; preparing the set for taking photographs (cameras, films, filters, lamps with blitz etc.); checking the forensic auto laboratory; providing the team with the necessary equipment for filming, video filming, audio recording; providing the members of the team with the materials which are necessary for communication and keeping in touch; preparing other materials (body detectors, or metal or radiation detectors, equipment for filming or taking photographs under water etc.).

5.3. Ensuring the presence of experts, the presence of the lawyer and the assisting witnesses.

The multiple aspects covered by murders and the variety of the issues in various fields of activity require that other experts are also included in the investigation team. For instance, in the presence of the head of the team, they can carry out checks and research using some appropriate devices which are not available to the investigation team[16].

In case of homicides, the investigation team at the scene is made of the prosecutor, the coroner, the criminalists, other police officers usually from the forensic forces and the officer with the tracking dog and specialists in other fields.

The established team shall perform the tasks assigned by the prosecutor, the prosecutor being the one who leads the activities for searching, discovering, holding down and picking up the clues and the evidence.

According to Article 89 of the Code of Criminal Proceedings, when the perpetrator stayed at the crime scene, was chased and caught by the police bodies that first arrived at the scene, or by witnesses, a lawyer must be present for this activity.

With regard to the assisting witnesses, the criminalistics tactic recommends that they are provided before getting to the crime scene.

5.4. Ensuring the operative movement of the team to the crime scene.

The movement to the crime scene must take place with the maximum of urgency, as any delay can create difficulties for the investigation, as well as for the result of subsequent activities[17].

After the arrival at the crime scene and before starting the actual examination, the team must take some urgent measures. Depending on the peculiarities of each case and the consequences of the activities of the offender, the nature and the configuration of the ground that will be investigated, these measures consist in:

- the operative information about the event which took place;
- checking how the one who arrived first at the scene had acted by the time the team arrived, and the outcomes of his or her action, deciding either to continue the measures taken or to complement them by other activities of a maximum urgency, or to start them again;
- determining the modifications that intervened in the initial aspect of the crime scene;

[15] E.Stancu, cited work, p. 231.
[16] Collective work, "Tratat de metodică criminalistică" (Treaty of Criminalistics Methods), p. 37.
[17] Collective work, "Tratat de metodică criminalistică" (Treaty of Criminalistics Methods), p. 36.

- appropriately marking the area to be investigated;
- identifying the eye witnesses and the people who have no reason to be present in that area or who cannot offer a plausible explanation about the actions taken after the murder was committed (moving parts of the body to another place, cleaning up the place where the crime was committed, being late in announcing the judicial bodies, etc.);
- organising or extending the security measures at the crime scene, including the measures meant to remove any imminent danger (fires, explosions, etc.);
- determining the concrete examination methods;
- all the participants putting on the sterile equipment for carrying out the investigation of the scene.

Marking the place to be investigated is the "key" of the entire activity, and it has the purpose of delimitating the area – the room or the open space where the episodes of the crime took place, as well as its surroundings. Only by acting like that a premise can be created for discovering all the clues and all the evidence that are connected to the cause[18].

Irrespective of the situation at the crime scene, it is recommended that the limits set are broader, having therefore the certainty that no areas which hold clues are omitted.

So, if the homicide took place in a building in an urban area, the investigation must include all the rooms and the annexes (kitchens, hallways, bathrooms, stairs, balconies, lodges, garages, etc.), as well as the common premises. The investigators must not rule out the possibility that, depending on the clues that were discovered and the interpretation of the mechanism involved in their formation or the discovery of the so-called "negative circumstances", as well as on the anticipation of the motive and the purpose of the crime, the investigation is extended to the neighbouring apartments and buildings. A tracking dog can be really useful for processing the scent clue.

In case of rural houses, besides the examination of all rooms, it is necessary to investigate the annexes of the household (the stable, the shed, the barn, the storehouse, the cellar, storehouses for construction materials, the garden, the orchard, slaking pits, etc.), as well as the buildings neighbouring the place where the body parts were discovered, the lands used for agriculture, forestry or fishery, belonging either to the victim, or to other people who are in a conflict with the victim.

If the investigated area is in a field, in the woods or in water, the surface to be examined must be extended so as to cover a distance as long as possible, including roads, paths, passing points (bridges, viaducts), by the bordering localities or highly circulated national or county roadways.

If there are parts of the body that were discovered in water, the investigators must not overlook the banks of lakes, rivers, the roadways leading to them and away from them to the outskirts, the buildings or the establishments in the immediate neighbourhood (houses, motels, campsites etc.).

To conclude, the area may be extended or restrained as appropriate, the final aim being not to overlook any section of land which could contain clues or evidence.

Besides the activities that have been presented, the head of the investigation team must take other measures too, such as:

- organising the data gathering activity which must take place at the same time with the crime scene investigation;
- ensuring that activities continue in the areas which are not affected by the crime;
- ensuring the places, the documents which are important to the cause (registers, records etc);
- removing the sources of danger and ensuring that the investigation takes place in a safe climate;
- informing the members of the team about the results obtained during the first measures and guiding the investigation depending on the information obtained;
- determining how the members of the team keep in touch and how they exchange information;
- ensuring the judicious use of human resources and the cooperation with other bodies;
- ensuring the presence of assisting witnesses, the presence of the lawyer or other people (specialists, interpreter, etc.).

The specific literature and judicial practice often refer to the "investigation of the murder by a team". This is because the particular social danger associated with the crimes against life requires a concentration of all knowledge, expertise and skills of specialists from various fields of activity involved in fighting crime and serving justice.

In order to find out the truth in a particular cause, it is necessary to make a full and operative use of data and information about the murder that was committed. This cannot however be done by a single person, being necessary to corroborate the efforts of several specialists, each of them acting according to his or her speciality in order to achieve the final aim.

The factors called upon to clarify the specific issues of a homicide cannot act separately, inconsistently, as a mode of action like that leads invariably to an unjustified delay of the investigation and the occurrence of miscarriages of justice[19].

Therefore, we can say that the investigation of a murder by a team is established as a methodological rule of forensic investigation, being imposed both by legal provisions and by practical necessities.

[18] Collective work, "Tratat de metodică criminalistică" (Treaty of Criminalistics Methods), p. 35.
[19] E.Stancu, cited work, p. 229.

6. The actual investigation of the crime scene

Crime scene investigation, being a laborious, lasting activity, which needs accuracy, calm, cautiousness, physical and intellectual efforts and even sacrifices, requires a lot of attention from those who carry it out. Without excluding the factors which disrupt attention (tiredness, the surroundings, a decreased interest in discovering other clues too etc.), it needs to be equally distributed throughout the duration of the activity. Irrespective of the condition in which it takes place, one must never have prejudices when going to investigate a crime scene. We should not neglect that all possible versions are worthless to the cause as long as they have not been checked and confirmed by the result of the activities carried out and especially by the crime scene investigation[20].

Carrying out the crime scene investigation involves, obligatorily, two phases, namely the static phase and the dynamic phase.

Investigating a homicide in the static phase starts with observing the place where the murder was committed, where the parts of the body were discovered or where a human skeleton was found. The static phase will also start with the preparation measures taken by the prosecutor who leads the investigation team, which are aimed at complementing or checking the measures taken initially by the judicial body that arrived first at the scene.

6.1. The investigation of the crime scene shall start with the following activities:

The coroner determines whether the parts that were discovered belong to a human body. It is obvious that this problem can be definitively solved only after the forensic tests have been completed in case that the external aspect of the parts is much degraded. At least, at a first sight, the following shall be determined: the species, the anthropologic type, the race, whether the body fragments belong to just one person, the existing clues (signs of trauma, prints or other kind of clues). These operations are carried out in the presence of the prosecutor.

Irrespective of the configuration or the nature of the crime scene, the first who enters the crime scene is the criminalist, followed by the head of the investigation team and the coroner. The coroner can formulate conclusions regarding the instruments used to take the human life, the wounds created by those instruments, the objects used by the perpetrator to hack the body, how the body was fragmented (either through cutting, or through breaking or tearing apart).

The clues or the evidence, encountered throughout the route taken by the criminalist and his or her companions, shall be marked with indication numbers and protected so as they are not destroyed by other members of the investigation team.

For the prosecutor to get an overall picture of the crime area, the investigators shall proceed to a general examination of the crime scene, being interested in the forensic and topographic orientation of the investigated perimeter.

By marking the clues and the evidence, the criminalist can have some direct contact, a real perception of the crime scene, which makes it possible to develop some versions regarding the number of perpetrators, the instruments that were used, the existence of micro clues and the places where they need to be looked for, etc[21].

Getting some details about the victim, the act and the people who have knowledge of the murder and the perpetrator, eye witnesses being of a particular interest.

In case of the examination of dismembered bodies, the investigation methods are essentially the general ones, with some peculiarities determined however by the specificity of these cases.

Provided that all the parts making a body were found in the same place or in the surrounding areas, the coroner can estimate the size, the gender, the age, different morphologic particularities, the time of death, the means used to section the body.

If only a part of the body was discovered in the investigation process, the people who can provide information about how that part of the body was found will be interviewed, and the coroner is asked to determine, as much as possible, the age, the size, the cause and the approximate day of the death, the instruments that were used in fragmenting the victim. Another action consists in gathering information from the police units in other districts of Bucharest or other localities with regard to the missing persons and whether they found any body parts in their territory.

In case that the head of a victim was discovered and it is not disfigured, or if the upper limbs or parts of the body that have scars, prostheses, tattoos, warts, professional callosities, some malformations were discovered, all these will be considered when drawing up the report of the external particulars. The investigation task that follows immediately is to discover the other parts of the body, so as, based on them, to identify the victim.

The ascertainment of any possible changes that intervened at the scene, after the murder has been committed, is concerned with the position of the parts of the body and the condition of the objects in the context of the crime area, as well as the changes in the content of some clues.

In order to determine the changes in the surroundings of the crime scene, the investigation team shall call on the people who were present in that place and who knew its initial appearance. If there are no such people, the investigation team shall take a closer look at the crime scene throughout its activity.

[20] Collective work, "Tratat de metodică criminalistică" (Treaty of Criminalistics Methods), p. 43.
[21] C.Pletea, cited work, p. 283.

Determining the point where the investigation starts off; usually, it is recommended that the investigation takes place in a spiral, going from the parts of the body towards the periphery of the crime scene, if there are no other circumstances which require the method of centripetal investigation[22].

On this occasion, all the changes that intervened because of the crime shall be examined, taking care not to destroy any clue. Considerable attention shall be paid to the ways in and out the perimeter of the crime scene, because this offers the most numerous possibilities to discover the clues left behind by the offender. Therefore, only the prosecutor and the coroner shall enter the crime area, avoiding the possible destruction of any clues and the change of the position of the objects found with the body.

This rule must be strictly observed because the so-called positional clues (cardboard boxes, strings, plastic bags, buried, dumped in rivers, woods, a turned up car, a drain clogged up with organs, etc.) are especially relevant in clarifying how the crime was committed. As the number of officers entering the crime area increases, so does the risk of degrading the clues and drawing erroneous conclusions with regard to the circumstances in which the act was committed.

Selecting the witnesses who assist in the crime scene investigation. If there are many people holding information, it is possible to select the witnesses based on the quality of the data they have, their personality, their objectivity and position in relation to the investigated cause, thus avoiding useless, collateral data, which have no significance or can slow down the investigation.

Another activity which is specific to the static phase is the processing of human scent with the tracking dog. This operation starts with the clothing on the parts of the body (if any) and the clothes of the offender. We think however that this activity has the value of a rough guide for the subsequent investigation.

Additionally, the use of olfactory clues can also encounter some difficulties due to the entry of numerous people in the examined area.

For a correct evaluation of the existing situation, the investigators shall write down the time they enter the scene to be investigated, the condition of the doors, windows, lighting devices, appliances, the visibility, the atmospheric conditions, the persisting smells, the condition of the ways in, the location of different objects, the position of the body, etc[23].

The investigation in the static phase ends with holding down the positions in which the body fragments were found, their location in relation to different objects in the crime scene, as well as of the other instruments in the crime area. These are held down by taking photos, filming or video recording.

For a full and operative retention of the picture of the entire crime scene it is useful to hold it down using the video devices with which the judicial bodies are provided. In practice, there are cases when video recording serves directly to carefully examine the crime scene and the elaboration of a realistic version with regard to the perpetrator.

Holding down the positions of the body fragments, and of the most relevant picture or objects of the crime scene, corroborated with the data obtained from tactical - forensic investigations carried out by the investigation team, lead to some conclusions with regard to the nature of the act, the time and the circumstances in which the murder was committed, the place where the criminal hacking happened, and possibly, the motive or the purpose of the crime.

The photographs taken in this phase have a guiding role, a sketch, and when there is a danger of disappearance or degradation, photographs of the main objects or of the clues are taken.

In conclusion, in the static phase of the investigation of the body parts, the following are ascertained: their place and position, which parts of the body they come from, the gender, the age and the approximate size, whether the remains belong to the same human body, the kind and the colour of clothes, the objects and the clues in their immediate surroundings.

6.2. The dynamic phase of the investigation is a continuation of the static phase, with specific methods however (a thorough and multilateral examination of each clue, as at this stage the objects carrying any clues are moved and construed (scientifically), this being the most complex stage in which all the members of the team participate.

Determining the scene of a crime is an important step of the dynamic phase, because in the practice of the prosecution bodies there are situations when the crime scene is not always the place where the victim was found. Therefore, a lack of clues or very few clues left behind determine the appearance of negative circumstances. The ascertainment of the crime scene leads to conclusions referring to: the nature of the relationships between the perpetrator and the victim, whether the victim was taken by surprise, whether the victim resisted, finding the circle of suspects, etc.

In case of dismembered bodies, the crime scene is the lot of land on which every segment of the body is discovered, the place where the main episode unfolded being the basis of the crime scene[24].

The investigation starts with the parts of the body (their clothing, other clues, etc.) and the area beneath them, and then the area around them will be examined.

The examination of the body parts involves analysing the clothes, the packing, the components, how the packing is made, the bonds, the footwear and their body[25].

[22] I.Mircea, cited work, p. 177.
[23] C.Pletea, cited work, p. 283.
[24] C.Pletea, cited work,p. 285.

If the fragments of the found body show traces of clothing, these will be examined in a predetermined order, usually starting with the articles at the exterior of the upper part of the body and continuing with the underwear, the pants and the shoes.

During this operation, the following will be described:

- the existence of every single item of clothing, their size and measure, whether they are typical of the victim's gender and appropriate for the season;
- their position and how they are placed on the body remains;
- the individual characteristics of every item of clothing (for example, is it an item of mass production or tailor-made, the type of cut, the kind of fabric, the lining, the colour, the logo, the brand, any possible monograms, etc.);
- signs of dragging, any recent dirt (dust, mud, etc.) or other signs of violence present on clothing; these clues shall be described in point of: number, location, form, dimensions, the aspect of their edges, lack of substance, the aspect of violence signs imprinted in the fabric they are made of (cutting, tearing, unpicking, perforation, attack with corrosive, caustic substances, burning, pulling apart, etc.);
- the presence, the condition and the position of buttons and other fixing accessories (zippers, bands, strings, straps, belts);
- the socks (the type, the fabric they are made of, the form, the size, the colour, the presence of adhering foreign bodies or substances, whether they were mended or patched up);
- articles of footwear; they will be examined in point of: their kind, their type, the model, the size, the colour, the materials they are made of, the brand, the degree of wearing, the configuration of the sole (the geometry of insertions), characteristic deformations, deposits of foreign substances or bodies, painting, re-painting, the kind of laces, repairs, signs of violence (breaking, friction, scratching, punching, pulling apart).

In other situations, these items of clothing may somehow be missing, because in order to hide and take out the parts of the body without being noticed, the perpetrator packs up these fragments. Therefore, the packing material which was found (bags, boxes, mats, bed sheets, blankets, tote bags, accompanied by strings, belts, ropes, etc.) needs to be examined very carefully, described in the report, photographed and kept as corpora delicti which are valuable and often help identify the killer or killers[26].

The articles of clothing and the accessories belonging to the wrongdoer or the suspect are examined in the same way as in the case of the body. There is also an additional activity aimed at discovering specific clues, such as picking up any kind of biological clues: epithelial cells, secretions, blood, fragments of tissue, biological clues which may come from the victim or from the perpetrator, signs of violence due to the victim's defending himself or herself, papillary clues (digital – palmar and plantar), traces of saliva, cigarette ends, measures taken to remove any marks caused by the crime, etc.

The examination of each body segment shall be performed very carefully by the coroner, in the presence of the prosecutor, describing:

- any signs of violence (number, the location in relation to some anatomical points of reference, their kind, the exterior aspect of the wounds, the shape of edges, any adhering foreign substances or bodies, the inclination of wounds, etc.)
- any particular signs (their kind and type, their location, the form and the aspect, the dimensions, the tint, their congenital or acquired nature, etc.)
- other signs of the crime (deposits of substances, of normal or pathological biologic products, such as: blood, saliva, sperm, hairs, pus, nail fragments, etc., toxic or caustic products and so on).

For bodies of an unknown identity as well as for segments of such bodies, the examination and the description refer additionally to the following aspects: the gender, the apparent age, the size, the most important diameters, the type of body-build, the colour of hair and eyes, the condition of the teeth and the dental formula, the under nail deposit, any signs of putrefaction and its status, the smell (objects can be found inside the mouth cavity, which were used to suffocate the victim or to prevent crying), the position of the body (the inclination of the head, the position of the extremities in relation to the trunk, whether in water, in mud, in the ground, under debris, suspended in a halter etc), the colour of the skin and the mucous membranes, any leak of biological products, marks left by knots and bonds on the parts of the body, whether there are any eviscerations of different organs, etc.

Basically, the dynamic phase of the crime scene investigation is reduced to the following activities:

a) taking detailed photos and filming the clues found on parts of the body and on the clothing, after they were first held down in topographic and forensic terms (describing their nature, form, colour, smell, formation mechanism, etc.), by measuring in relation to other clues, body fragments or other fragments found at the scene;

There are various ways to pick up the clues and the micro clues, as regards the marking of the clue or the carrying object. They can be picked up by wadding, scraping, photographing, with a standard sample in natural size, others with the help of sticky films like folio, and those which need processing in a laboratory are picked up together with their support, if their dimensions allow them to be moved.[27]

[25] Collective work, "Tratat practic de criminalistică" (A Practical Treaty of Criminalistics) Volume I, p. 434.
[26] S.P. Mitricev and P.I. Tarasov–Rodionov, "Criminalistica" (Criminalistics), Part 2, translated into Romanian, Bucharest, 1954, p. 170.
[27] C. Pletea, cited work, p. 284.

b) taking down the particulars of the body segments;
c) examining the clothing and the footwear of the body;
d) requesting the necropsy in order to determine the cause of death and take samples of blood, saliva, stomach content, secretions and excretions;
e) examining the parts of the body in order to discover lesions, scars, malformations, putrefaction stages, any possible diseases, characteristics of the teeth, etc; taking prints, the toilet and the restoration of the body are performed by the criminalist and the coroner at the office of the forensic body;
f) taking samples of hair and the under nail deposit.

If all the segments were found, the coroner shall proceed to assemble them, reconstructing the whole body, and afterwards the body will be shown to relatives or other people who used to know the victim.[28]

We need to specify that each segment is photographed in the place where it was found (alone, then with its surroundings), then the entire reconstructed body is photographed. Previously, each item of clothing or the parts of clothing are photographed too, as well as the assembled clothing, in which the body will be dressed before taking a photograph.

In case that parts of the body are found buried, the photographs may indicate in succession the stages of exhumation, their aspect and position at each stage of the search, and also after being taken out.

The findings shall be recorded also in a report (with a thorough description of the place where each segment was found, the clothing and that segment, lesions, etc.) and a sketch (for each area where the body segments were found).

The investigation helps obtain the data that are necessary to determine the perpetrator's modus operandi[29], such as: ascertaining the manner in which the murder was committed (with cutting – splitting objects, mechanical asphyxia, physical factors, toxic substances, firearms or explosives, biological or psychological factors); determining the manner in which the clues were destroyed; determining the goods or valuables which belonged to the victim, those taken by the offender and how they were turned to profit.

An essential issue in finding out the truth in a criminal cause is to clarify the negative circumstances, which are characterised by an inconsistency between the condition of the victim at that time, the victim's lesions and the actual situation in the crime area (discovery of a body with deep cut wounds, when there is not much blood around it)[30].

Crime scene investigation is an activity concerned with the scientific investigation of the clues and the objects existing at the crime scene in order to determine the route followed by the offender (the "iter criminis"), the traces left behind by the offender, for the purpose of determining his or her personality. It is known that when the perpetrator attains the purpose of his or her action, a relaxation occurs, called partial or total abolition of censure, an aspect which could be used by the investigation team who identify the clues created due to the invocated condition[31].

Among the problems solved by the crime scene investigation there are: the nature of the act that was committed, the place and the time when it was committed, the perpetrators and their capacity, the identity and the age of the person that was harmed; the motive of the act; the conditions and the circumstances which were favourable to the crime and the prevention measures which are necessary.

The determination of the nature of the act requires the identification of lesions, establishing which ones led to the victim's death and which was their succession. The presence of lesions and their morphology help determine the characteristics of the instrument used to commit the murder, which sometimes is abandoned near the victim or in other places far away from the crime area.

The day of the crime is considered a critical time which is determined approximately, depending on several factors, such as: the forensic findings, the aspects resulting from the examination of the crime scene and ascertained after having conducted several prosecution activities.

The factors that may be taken into account in order to determine the day of death could be: the occurrence of rigor mortis, the temperature of the body, the body changes, the examination of the stomach content, the status of decomposition etc.

Determining the identity of the victim is a central issue for the investigation team, an activity which starts at the time of the external examination and continues with the articles of clothing. The operations concerned with the identification of the body are: toilet making, the reconstruction, taking prints, taking biological samples, picking samples of the under nail deposit, making the dental chart, taking photos of the particulars, lining up for recognition etc.

The modus operandi is a faithful representation of the perpetrator's personality.[32] The description of the modus operandi covers the following stages:

- the contact with the crime scene by gathering data about future victims, their routine, the goods they possess, the places where they store them, their family situation, etc.;
- drawing up, theoretically, an action plan and checking its viability, requiring the recognition of the

[28] M. Terbancea, I. Enescu, A. Simionescu, and others, "Ghidul procurorului criminalist" (Guide for the Criminalist Prosecutor), Volume I, Helicon Publishing House, Timişoara, 1995, p. 75.
[29] Collective work, "Tratat practic criminalistic" (A Practical Criminalistics Treaty), p. 436.
[30] E.Stancu, cited work, p. 235.
[31] C.Pletea, cited work, p. 284.
[32] C.Pletea, cited work, p. 287.

crime scene with a check of the data previously obtained from various sources;

- the manner in which the perpetrator acted to get in, the annihilation of the victim (hitting, immobilisation, use of white arms, firearms, drugs, etc.), taking goods, leaving the crime scene;
- turning the product of the crime to profit.

The motive of the crime is the internal impetus, as an exclusive psychological element, which influences the criminal to commit the act, while the purpose is the result pursued by killing[33].

It is obligatory to record all the findings, no matter whether it is possible to confirm a connection between the clues, the evidence or the various circumstances and versions regarding the manner in which the crime was committed. The results of the crime scene investigation are checked by requesting technical – scientific ascertainment or expertise, or through other specific activities.

6. Conclusions

The crimes against life, although different in point of their legal content, have many common features in forensic terms. Irrespective of the legal description, the body must be discovered and identified, the cause of death must be determined, as well as the place and the time of death, the circumstances which were favourable to the crime, the motive and the purpose of the crime, the identity of the perpetrator and of the people who have useful knowledge for finding out the truth.

Criminalistics provides the judicial bodies with the methods and the technical – scientific means which are necessary for discovering, holding down, picking up and examining the clues of the homicide, and determining the identity of the perpetrator and that of the victim.

Murders are clearly different from other categories of crimes first through the social danger involved which is a special one and the circumstances in which they are committed.

Investigating a murder therefore involves carrying out some complex forensic and scientific investigation activities, under the coordination of a prosecutor.

The prosecutor, in cooperation with the police officers from the forensic service - the "homicide" work line and the criminalistics service, carry out the prosecution acts in order to determine the elements making the crime, the identity of the perpetrator and that of the victim, with the help of the methods of criminalistics.

An important role is also that of the coroner, who investigates the medical aspects and solves the problem referring to the cause and nature of the death, the causality link between the action and its consequences, identifies the victim reconstructing the body based on the discovered fragments, etc.

References

- A.Boroi, "Infracțiuni contra vieții" (Crimes Against Life), Național Publishing House, Bucharest, 1996
- T.Vasiliu, D.Pavel, G.Antoniu, and others, "Codul Penal comentat și adnotat – partea specială" (The Criminal Code Commented and Annotated – The Special Part), vol.I, Științifică și Enciclopedică Publishing House, Bucharest, 1975
- V.Dongoroz, "Explicații teoretice ale Codului Penal român" (Theoretical Explanations of the Romanian Criminal Code), vol.III, Academia Română Publishing House, Bucharest, 1971
- C.Suciu, "Criminalistica" (Criminalistics), Didactică și Pedagogică Publishing House, Bucharest, 1972
- I.Mircea, "Criminalistica" (Criminalistics), Didactică și Pedagogică Publishing House, Bucharest, 1978
- V.Berchesan, C, Pletea, I.E.Sandu, "Tratat de tactică criminalistică" (Treaty of Criminalistics Tactics), Police Academy Publishing House, Carpați, Craiova, 1992
- Collective work, "Tratat practic de criminalistică" (A Practical Treaty of Criminalistics), Volume I, M.A.I. – I.G.P.– Institute of Criminalistics, Bucharest, The Publishing Service, 1976
- S.P. Mitricev and P.I. Tarasov–Rodionov, "Criminalistica" (Criminalistics), Part 2, translated into Romanian, Bucharest, 1954
- M. Terbancea, I. Enescu, A. Simionescu, and others, "Ghidul procurorului criminalist" (Guide for the Criminalist Prosecutor), Volume I, Helicon Publishing House, Timișoara, 1995

[33] Idem.

METHODOLOGICAL PARTICULARITIES REGARDING CRIMINAL INVESTIGATION OF CRIMES RELATED TO MARKET ABUSE, FACTS CRIMINALIZED IN THE CAPITAL MARKET LEGISLATION

Constantin NEDELCU[*]

Abstract

The interest in investigating the issue of techniques for investigating capital market crimes is based on several considerations:

Research is timely and responds to the imperative of the moment, to combat these crimes. It is to be noticed the novelty and the diversity of the issues addressed in the context in which this criminal field is little researched and known both as a modus operandi and as an investigative technique, although it is constantly expanding and amplifying.

Investigating capital market offenses is emerging as one of the major challenges addressed to the judicial authorities.

Keywords: capital market crimes; criminal investigation; market abuse; methodological particularities.

The capital market field is a highly controversial one because of its relative novelty in our country, the special technique it presents, and the seriousness of some crimes that can be committed through it.

The capital market plays a particularly important role in any free trade economy, i.e. to engage available capital reserves[1], other than those provided by loan institutions, in the economic circuit.

The capital market is the part of the financial market in which financial instruments are issued and traded in accordance with the legal regulations[2]. Currently, the functioning of the financial instruments markets, as well as the formation and functioning of the bodies operating on these markets are regulated by Law no. 31/1990 regarding companies, Law no. 297/2004 regarding the capital market and Law no. 24/2017 regarding issuers of financial instruments and market operations, these two normative acts representing the general framework and, obviously, the secondary legislation represented by regulations and instructions issued by the Financial Supervisory Authority (hereinafter referred to as ASF) or its predecessor, the National Securities Commission (NSC)

All offenses defined by Law no. 297/2004 imply that the anti-social behaviors described by the criminalization rules have been manifested within or in connection with some operations on the capital market.

We note from the beginning that the body with special attributions in this area is the Financial Supervisory Authority.

ASF is the national authority with powers of supervision, investigation and control in the field of market abuse, the criminal sanction of this behavior being obviously the exclusive competence of the judicial bodies.

ASF supervises the market in order to prevent, detect and sanction market abuse.

But what is market abuse? To answer this question, we will have to focus on art. 108 of Law no. 24/2017, from which it results that this notion refers to the abusive use of inside information, the unauthorized disclosure of inside information or market manipulation.

It should be noted that prior to the entry into force of Law no. 24/2017 (01.04.2017), the market abuse provisions applied only to the regulated financial instrument markets but following the transposition into national law of the provisions of Directive 2014/57/EU on criminal sanctions for market abuse, they are now also applicable to multilateral trading systems.

The elaboration of a methodology for investigating capital market crimes implies the systematic identification and analysis of the operating methods used by authors (perpetrators), the in-depth knowledge of the market mechanisms, malpractice and economic and financial "engineering" found in the practice of judicial bodies[3].

The new and sophisticated operating methods implemented by capital market authors, based on teamwork of the teams comprising of specialists with rigorously established tasks, have led to appropriate mutations in the design and conduct of an investigation in this area, transforming teamwork from a professional option to a criminal prosecution imperative: how to act by using specialized teams or investigative units[4].

In the European doctrine and practice, there is a particular interest in the development of pro-active or special investigative techniques designed to perform ante-delictum investigations or special investigations,

[*] Lecturer, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail:constantin nedelcu@univnt.ro.)

[1] M.Hotca, N.Neagu, M.Gorunescu, A.Sitaru, A.L.Galetschi –Ghidul penal al omului de afaceri –Ed.Hamangiu -2015, pg.275

[2] Art 1 din Legea nr.297/2004 stabilește cadrul legal al pieței de capital

[3] Manual de Anchetă în Mediul Economico-Financiar, București, 2009, pg.22

[4] The Public Prosecutor for Series Economic Crime, Denmark, Parchetul Național Anticorupție, România, A.Lazăr, S.Alămoreanu, Jurgen Dehn, Helmit Brandau

including before a particular offense has been committed or discovered[5].

In order to proceed with the investigation of the criminal offenses that are incidental to market abuse, we must first of all know who the capital market players are. From the general legal framework applicable to this field, we find that the participating entities are the following:

I. ISSUERS – "open" joint-stock companies whose stocks/bonds are traded on a stock exchange;
II. INVESTORS - natural or legal persons holding capital surplus;
III. INTERMEDIARIES - financial investment service companies or banks, the ones that connect issuers with investors or investors among themselves;
IV. COLLECTIVE INVESTMENT UNDERTAKINGS - investment management companies, depository of financial assets, open-end investment funds, investment companies, closed-end investment funds, closed-end investment companies;
V. INVESTMENT CONSULTANTS - authorized natural or legal persons;
VI. FINANCIAL AUDITORS - authorized natural or legal persons;
VII. MARKET OPERATORS;
VIII. REGULATED MARKETS AND MULTILATERAL TRADING SYSTEMS;
IX. STOCKHOLDER REGISTERS;
X. DEPOSITORY;
XI. CUSTODIANS;
XII. COMPENSATION FUND;
XIII. SUPERVISORY/REGULATORY AUTHORITY.

We note that each of these remains a "trace" which must be identified, researched, interpreted and administered, of course, in the criminal trial.

In the following we will briefly refer to a possible method of investigating the market manipulation offense, if the financial instrument refers to the stocks issued by a company, as defined by art. 120 of the Law no. 24/2017, namely:

1.

a) making a transaction, placing a trading order or any other behavior that gives or is likely to give false or misleading indications regarding the offer, demand or price of a financial instrument, a spot commodity contract or an auctioned product that is based on emission allowances or that sets or is likely to set the price of one or more financial instruments, a spot commodity contract, or an auctioned product based on an abnormal or artificially emission allowance unless the reasons why the person who participated in the transactions or placed the trading orders acted as such in accordance with the applicable legal provisions and those transactions or trading orders are in accordance with market practices accepted at the trading venue in question, as they have been approved pursuant to the provisions of art. 13 of Regulation (EU) No. 596/2014;
b) carrying out a transaction, placing an order or any other activity or conduct that influences or is likely to influence the price of one or more financial instruments, a spot commodity contract or an auctioned product based on emission allowances, by resorting to a fictitious process or any other form of deception or artifice;
c) the dissemination of information by the media, including the internet or by any other means, which gives or is likely to give false or misleading signals concerning the offer, demand or price of a financial instrument, of a spot commodity contract or auctioned product based on emission allowances or setting the price of one or more financial instruments, a spot commodity contract, or a auctioned product based on emission allowances at an abnormally or artificially level, including the dissemination of rumors, when the persons who carried out the dissemination obtain, for themselves or for others, benefits as a result of the dissemination of the information in question and provided that these persons knew or ought to have known that they are false or misleading; or
d) the transmission of false or misleading information or the provision of false or misleading entry data or any other behavior manipulating the calculation of a reference index, provided that the person who carried out the transmission or supply of that information or data knew or ought to have known that they are false or misleading.

2. For the purposes of the provisions of para. (1), the following are considered to be market manipulation operations:

a) the conduct of a person or persons acting jointly to secure a dominant position over the demand or offer of a particular financial instrument, spot commodity contract or auctioned product based on emission allowances that has or is likely to has the effect of directly or indirectly setting the sale or purchase price or the creation of other unfair trading conditions;
b) the purchase or sale of financial instruments at the time of the opening or closing of the market which has or is likely to have the effect of misleading investors acting on the basis of the prices displayed, including opening and closing prices;
c) the placement of orders at a trading venue, including their cancellation or modification, by any available means of trading, including electronic means such as algorithmic and high frequency trading strategies, and which has one of the effects referred to in letter a) or b) by:

[5] Manual de Anchetă în Mediul Economico-Financiar A.Lazăr, S.Alămoreanu, Jurgen Dehn, Helmut Brandau, București, 2009,pg.45

I. interrupting or postponing the operation of the trading system in that trading venue or creating the conditions for such effects to occur;
II. causing difficulties for others to identify the actual orders in the trading system in that trading venue or likely to generate such effects, including by introducing orders that result in overloading or destabilizing the order book; or
III. creation or likelihood of creating a false or misleading signal about the offer, demand or price of a financial instrument, in particular by introducing orders to initiate or accentuate a particular trend;

d) benefiting from the regular or occasional access to media, electronic or traditional media by expressing an opinion on a financial instrument, a spot commodity contract or an auctioned product based on emission allowances or indirectly in relation to its issuer provided that the financial instrument, the spot commodity contract or the auctioned product based on emission allowances was already owned and subsequently profited from the impact of the opinions expressed concerning that financial instrument, spot commodity contract or auctioned product based on emission allowances, without at the same time making that conflict of interest public in a fair and efficient manner;

e) the purchase or sale of emission allowances or related derivative instruments on the secondary market prior to the auction conducted in accordance with the provisions of Regulation (EU) No. 1031/2010, which has the effect of setting the auction price for the auctioned products at an abnormal or artificial level or misleading the bidders.

The market manipulation offense is, in essence, a kind of offense of deceit, and that is why, as a rule, the manipulator seeks to obtain a material benefit from other market participants. However, there are cases where the manipulator does not necessarily pursue a material benefit, but, as it is pointed out in art. 121 para. (1) let. b, he/she may pursue the transfer of stocks held on behalf of other persons for the purpose of circumventing the articles of association of the issuer which, for example, limits holdings to a certain percentage of the share capital. This is precisely why, by the rule of criminalization, the legislator has determined that the market manipulation offense is a crime of danger and not a damage, although in some cases the damage can be located.

We believe that at this point it is appropriate to make it clear that the market manipulation offense may be even a means of crime, for example for offenses of embezzlement, offenses provided and punished by art. 279 para. 1 let. a and let. b of Law no. 31/1990 regarding companies, money laundering or even tax evasion.

A first problem that arises in investigating this crime, obviously after knowing the issuer whose stocks have been the object of manipulative actions (in practice the issuer's stock exchange symbol) is to establish what the clues that make us believe that a crime of a criminal nature has been committed. This problem finds the answer in the law itself, namely false or misleading indications regarding the offer, demand or stock price, etc.

Next, it is necessary to establish how the manipulative action was carried out, namely whether through transactions or order placements that could have resulted in a significant increase/decrease of the price/volume of the traded stocks, the dissemination of information by means of mass media, including the internet, that give or are likely to give false or misleading indications as to the demand, offer or stock price, the dissemination of false information, etc.

The next step in the criminal investigation is to establish with certainty who is the subject/are the subjects of the crime of manipulation.

At this point, to identify transactions or orders, the market operator, for example the Bucharest Stock Exchange, should be required to report the trading report for the issuer whose stocks were subject to the manipulative process. It is mandatory to indicate the period for which this report is requested because, as a rule, the manipulative process may involve several material acts. From the trading report we can extract more information, namely:

I. The date and time of the transaction;
II. The volume of stocks involved in the manipulative process;
III. Price variation;
IV. The type of market on which the manipulative transaction was made;
V. If the transaction is bilateral or not;
VI. The transaction intermediary/intermediaries.

If, from the transaction report cannot be identified the transaction having a manipulative effect, we can conclude that the manipulative operation had the premise of trading orders entered into the electronic system managed by the market operator, orders which were subsequently either deleted or withdrawn, but were likely to give false or misleading indications as to the offer, demand or stock price.

After identifying the intermediary/intermediaries, since they are currently operating global accounts, the financial investment services company will be required to file the records of all those customers that, during the research period, traded the issuer's stocks under the manipulation operation.

It is relevant to obtain, in addition to the brokerage agreement and its annexes, the trading orders, the bank statements relating to the settlement of the transactions, and the account statements issued by the stockholders' register regarding the stockholdings. A particular peculiarity is encountered when the manipulator resorts to the services of a custodian agent, the latter being the one to whom one must resort in order to obtain the account statement for the stockholdings.

It should also be noted that in the criminal investigation that is carried out in a case of manipulation, relevant information may be obtained from the current reports that the issuers or intermediaries are obliged to transmit to the market where the stocks are traded for certain events set by the legislator. At the same time relevant information can be obtained from the stockholders register or depositary.

Of course, special investigative methods may be used in the investigation (art. 138 and the following of the Code of Criminal Procedure), which may be used only in a strictly determined legal framework with the authorization of the judge of rights and freedoms, in order to collect the evidence.

ASF analyzes the financial flows underlying the financing of transactions, natural or legal persons involved in transactions.

During the investigation, ASF may request and analyze the following:

- The trading orders underlying the transactions as well as the information on the internal client accounts stored at the ASF level and received from the broker;
- Cash flows evidenced by account statements period investigated and for the clients involved;
- Details of the bank account, including the account holder, the real beneficiaries recorded in the documents related to the opening of the accounts of the persons with the right of signature to the persons holding the power of attorneys and the account managers;
- Account history for the targeted persons and the justificatory documents for the operations underlying the stock records;

References

- M.Hotca, N.Neagu, M.Gorunescu, A.Sitaru, A.L.Galetschi –Ghidul penal al omului de afaceri, București, Ed.Hamangiu -2015
- Manual de Anchetă în Mediul Economico-Financiar, București, 2009
- The Public Prosecutor for Series Economic Crime, Denmark, Parchetul Național Anticorupție, România
- A.Lazăr, S.Alămoreanu, Jurgen Dehn, Helmut Brandau, Manual de Anchetă în Mediul Economico-Financiar, București, 2009

SPECIFIC ASPECTS OF THE OFFENSE OF LEAVING THE PLACE OF THE ACCIDENT

Alin-Sorin NICOLESCU[*]
Luminița CRISTIU-NINU[]

Abstract

The legislator has adopted the respective texts of law to the new social realities once with the repeal of the criminal segment of GEO no. 195/2002 relating to the circulation on public roads, republished and the introduction of this one in the content of the New Criminal Code.

The offence of leaving the place of the accident, actually found in the content of the provisions of art. 338 of Criminal Code is one of the eight offences against the safety on public roads.

Knowing important modifications, the legal text may appear relatively ambiguous if we refer to the old indictment, meaning that certain factual situations remained outside the criminal law. We will analyse in this regard the obligations that arise to the driver in case of a traffic accident, bringing into question even the decriminalization of the prohibition of the consumption of alcohol after the road event.

Furthermore, we will treat even aspects related to the causes of special no imputation that, on a closer analysis, can create problems of interpretation. Through the phrase "it does not constitute the offence of leaving the place of the accident when only material damages occurred after the accident", the legislator has chosen to indict this offence even if the victim has evaluable lesions within 1-2 days of medical care, on condition that for the same fact, in the old regulation, 10 days were required or it was an oversight of the legislator that it is to be resolved at some point?

Keywords: accident, driving, circulation, Criminal Code, offence, road.

1. Introduction

The new regulation stipulates the offense of leaving the place of the accident or its modification or deletion of its traces is regulated as follows:

1. Leaving the place of the accident, without the authorization of the police or the prosecutor who carries out the investigation of the place of the deed, by the driver of his vehicle, by the driving instructor undergoing the process of training or either by the examiner of the competent authority found during the practical tests of the examiner in order to obtain the driving licence involved in a road traffic accident, is punished with imprisonment from 2 to 7 years.
2. The same penalty is penalized even the deed of any person to change the status of the place or to delete the traces the road traffic accident that has resulted in killing or the injury of bodily integrity or health of one or more people, without the consent of the research team on the spot.
3. It does not constitute an offense the leaving of the place of the accident when:

a) only material damage has occurred after the accident;
b) the driver of the vehicle, in the absence of other means of transport, carries himself the injured people to the nearest healthy unit able to provide medical assistance and to which he declared his personal identification and the number of registration plate or the registration of the driven vehicle, recorded in a special register, in case he returned immediately to the place of accident;
c) the driver with priority of circulation regime notifies the police as soon as possible and after the end of the mission he will be present at the headquarters of the police whose jurisdiction the accident occurred in order to draw up the documents of infringement;
d) the injured leaves the place of the deed and the driver of the vehicle notifies immediately the nearest police station.

In relation to the old regulation, we mention the fact that this one conditioned the existence of the offense of gravity and the consequences of the occurred accident, while the new infringement does not make any difference in this regard. They are excluded from the existence of the crime the situations of leaving the place of the accident that caused only material damage, this circumstance representing a special supporting cause.

The leaving of the place of the accident must be also done without the authorisation of the competent authority.

If the author had to disobey the consent of the police that carried out the research at the place of the deed in the old regulation, the new Criminal Code provides expressly that the consent of the leaving the place of the accident may be given by the police or the prosecutor who carried out the research on the place of the accident[1].

[*] Judge at Bucharest Court of Appeal (e-mail: nicolescualinsorin@gmail.com)
[] Vice-President at Bucharest Court of Appeal (e-mail: luminita.cristiu@just.ro)

Analysing further, we notice that due to the lack of the phrase "if the accident occurred as a result of a crime" (in the new regulation) the material element does not find one of the previous normative variants, and consequently, the driver involved in an accident will not be punished when leaving the place of the accident occurred due to the commitment of an offense (accident in which resulted only material damage).

In a simple form, the offense takes over some of the provisions of the old regulation, with a series of differences. The qualified active subject of the law must be involved in a traffic road accident; the new regulation no longer brings provisions relating to the seriousness or the extent of the traffic accidents which mean that the leaving of the place of any sort of accident may lead to the existence of the infringement. Of course, we refer to those that had as a consequence a minimal bodily injury or of health of a person except that sometimes, even a single day of medical treatment, aspect established by a forensic certificate, will be able to lead to the meeting of typical elements.

Related to this thing, it is important to remember the decision of the HCCJ no. 66 of 15th October 2007 relating to the understanding of the phrase the injury of bodily integrity or the health of one or more people, contained in the provisions of article 89 para. (1) of GEO no. 195/2002.

The practice of the law courts experienced a variety of solutions in relation to the meaning of the phrase "the bodily injury or health of one or more people", contained in article 89. Para. (1) of EO no. 195/2002, republished, which criminalise the offense of leaving the place of the accident.

Thus, some of the courts have ruled in the sense that the deed of the driver of a vehicle of leaving the place of the accident in which he was involved, without the consent of the police who carried out the investigations, meets the constitutive elements of the offense provided in art. 89 para. (1) of GEO no. 195/2002, republished, without having relevant the number of days of medical treatment necessary for the cure of wounds.

Other courts, on the contrary, considered the phrase "the injury of bodily integrity or health of one or more people" refers only to the injuries that required for healing more than 10 days of medical care and the other consequences provided in the old regulation in the provisions of art. 182 para. (2) of the old Criminal Code. Thus, these courts have acted that whenever did not happened one of these consequences the typical elements of the analysed offense are not met because it lacks the condition that the injury of bodily integrity or health have had consequences required by law.

Under these circumstances, we can notice that the problem of law subject to the interpretation of the magistrates of the Supreme Court of Justice dealt with the meaning of the above mentioned phrase, thus, by the recalled decision, the High Court of Cassation and Justice stated that the offense of leaving the place of the accident, within the text of law, cannot be considered as committed if they are not met even the objective conditions imposed by the definition given to the injury of bodily integrity of manslaughter by art. 184 of the old Criminal Code, respectively, over 10 days of medical care.

Regarding the current situation, we consider that relative to the provisions of art. 338 of Criminal Code the meaning of the term "injury" in the content of the provisions of art. 75 of GEO no. 195/2002 and the philosophy which has been the basis for the decision no. 66 of 15th October 2007 of HCCJ (above mentioned) are incomplete.

In this respect, the High Court of Cassation and Justice has been delegated by the Bacau Court of Appeal in order to solve this problem of law.

They have put into question, in this way, whether to be met the constitutive elements of the offense of leaving the place of the accident provided by art. 338 para. (1) of Criminal Code with reference to the provisions of art. 75 (b) of GEO no. 195/2002 concerning the public roads, republished, it is necessary that the victim of the accident show lesions recorded in a medical act, measurable outcomes (injury) in a number of days of medical treatment or not, in any case, if there is necessary the existence of a forensic certificate; and what is meant by the term of injury provided by art. 75 (b) of GEO no. 195/2002, from a legal point of view, taking into account that the explicative Dictionary of Romanian language defines the wound as being "an internal or external breakage of the tissue of a living bring, under the action of a destructive agent; injury, wound."

The analysis drawn by the rapporteur judge of HCCJ for the meeting of January 25, 2018 outlines the idea that the interpretation and application of the provisions of art. 338 para. (1) of the Criminal Code regarding the offense of leaving the place of the accident, the term of "injury" provided by art. 75 (b) sentence II of GEO no. 195/2002 should be interpreted in the sense of "traumatic lesions or affecting the health of a person whose seriousness is assessed by days of medical treatment (at least one day)."

We do not share this point of view of the rapporteur judge, as the old regulation clarified by the decision no. 66 of 15th October 2007 (Appeal in the interest of the law) we appreciate it much closer to the juridical-objective reality, but HCCJ, in the panel to solve a problem of law will decide, but we as practitioners of the law, of course, will own those laid down.

[1] Tudorel Toader, Maria-Ioana Michinici, Anda Crisu-Ciocinta, Mihai Dunea, Ruxandra Raducanu, Sebastian Radulet, Noul Cod penal, Comentarii pe articole, Ed. Hamangiu, 2014.

2. Pre-existing conditions

The constituent elements of this offense must be linked with other legal provisions such as those from the content of the art.6 of GEO no. 195/2002, republished, regarding the traffic on public roads or the performance of those from the content of art. 79 of GEO no. 195/2002, republished, relating to the traffic on public roads.

According to the article 75 of GEO no. 195/2002, the traffic accident is defined as being the road event which occurred on a road open to the public traffic or had the origin in such a place, which had a result the death, injury of one or more people or the damage of at least one vehicle or other material damages and in which it was involved at least one moving vehicle.

The special literature has shown that the concept of traffic accident exclude the intentional acts (which might constitute separate offenses), referring only to car incidents occurred by manslaughter, with random character[2].

At a first glance overview on the incriminating text, we find that there are two types of crime, one type of criminal [para. (1)] and the other assimilated [paragraph. (2)]. The type variant involves the leaving of the place of the accident, without the authorisation of the police or the prosecutor who carries out the investigation of the place of the deed, by the driver of his vehicle by the driving instructor, found in the process of training, or by the assessor of the competent authority, found during the practical examination in order to obtain the driving licence, involved in a traffic accident.

The assimilated version consists in the deed to change the status of the place or to delete the traces of the traffic accident which has resulted in killing or the injury of bodily integrity or health of one or more people, without the approval of the research team on the place of the spot.

In the content of paragraph (3) there are four special supporting causes related to the commitment of the offense of leaving the place of accident which will be analysed in a future section.

The allowed situation in the case of committing this offense is constituted by the production of a car accident, of course, prior to the performance of the material element of the analysed offense. The accident must accomplish the conditions set by GEO no. 195/2002 republished to have impact in the case of this offense[3].

It is generally understood by car accident" an event occurred within the road traffic, due to the breaking of the road traffic during driving or by breaking the norms relating to technical verification of vehicles produced by swabbing, knocking, tipping over, falling of the load or any other way, and which has resulted in the death, the injury of bodily integrity or health of the people, the damage of goods or which interrupts the traffic. "[4]

We will not find in the presence of the offense of leaving the place of the accident or the changing or the deletion of the traces of this one in the case in which the accident (the premise situation) has been consumed, for example, in a courtyard (private property as well as other area that cannot enter under the term "public road"), even if the material element committed by the respective author folds exactly on the rule of incrimination.

The legal object of the offenses provided by article 338 of NCC is constituted by the social relations related to the traffic safety on public roads, "whose existence and normal conduct involve the criminalization of the facts of leaving the place of accident by the driver of his vehicle by the driving instructors, found in the process of training or by the assessor of the competent authority, found during the practical tests to obtain the driving licence, involved in a car crash, without the consent of the prosecutor or the police that carries out the research of the place of the crime. "[5]

The obligation of the drivers to remain at the place of the accident appears justified by the necessity to establish the causes that have caused the accident, to identify the guilty people responsible for producing it, and, consequently, to call these ones to account, according to the law[6].

We can say in subsidiarity that committing such crimes brings prejudice even to the social relationships concerning the administration of justice, because it is complicated the activity of finding the truth and the good conduct of the criminal investigations. They are also affected the relations arisen as a result of the obligation for the granting of first aid to the victims of the traffic accidents[7]. We could say under the latter aspect that the act provided in art. 338 of the new Criminal Code could be confused with the act provided by art. 203 of Criminal Code (leaving without help a person in difficulty), the difference consisting in that the offense provided by art. 203 may have as active subject only a person whose activity was not endangered the life, the health or the bodily injuries of the victim while the active subject of the offense provided by art. 338 is just the person involved in the traffic accident[8].

Regarding the material subject, on the hypothesis provided by article 338 para. (1) of NCC this one lacks,

---

[2] Mihai Adrian Hotca, Maxim Dobrinoiu, Infracțiuni prevăzute în legi speciale. Comentarii și explicații, Editura C.H. Beck, București 2010, p. 518;
[3] Alexandru Ionaș, Alexandru Florin Măgureanu, Cristina Dinu, Drept penal. Partea Specială, Ed. Universul Juridic, 2015, București, p. 508;
[4] Alexandru Boroi, Drept penal. Partea specială, Ed. C.H Beck, București, 2014, p.585;
[5] Vasile Dobrinoiu, Ilie Pascu, Mihai Adrian Hatca, Ioan Chis, Mirela Gorunescu, Norel Neagu, Maxim Dobrinoiu, Mircea Constantin Sinescu, Noul Cod Penal comentat. Partea Specială, Ediția a II-a, revăzută și adaugită, Ed. Universul Juridic, București, 2014, p.731;
[6] Idem;
[7] Idem;
[8] Idem, p.732;

but on the hypothesis provided by para. (2) it exists, consisting of any element (object) as modified, deleted or removed from the place of the accident.

The active subject of the typical version provided by the paragraph (1) is qualified, the offense subsisting only in the case of the driver of the vehicle, of the driving instructors, found in the process of training, or the examiner of the competent authority, found during the practical exam to obtain the driving licence, involved in a traffic accident.

Some authors state, however, that the active subject of this crime is directly, and can be represented by any person who satisfies the conditions of criminal liability[9].

The qualification of the active subject shall not be subject only to the quality of the driver of the vehicle, but also by his involvement in a road traffic accident, within the framework of the typical version.

If we analyse through the perspective of the assimilated version provided by the paragraph (2), the active subject loses his qualification, the offense can subsist having as active subject any person who commits one the ways of the material element.

The criminal participation is possible in all its forms stating that in the case of the variant provided in para. (1) the accomplice is not possible due to the nature of the offense. We say this because the conditions of the accomplice for this crime cannot be fulfilled. When there are more drivers of vehicles involved in a road traffic accident, these ones committing subsequently to the accident, the material element provided by the art. 338, we will not retain the institution of the accomplice but a separate offense for each of them.

Taking into account the nature of these offenses, we believe that the legal people may respond to criminal law as a participant (complicity, instigation or improper participation).

Thus, in the situation in which a driver, the manager of a building company, while driving his the car from the work causes a road traffic accident resulted with the death of a person, is helped by other employees of the company sent to the place of the accident by the governing bodies in order to delete the traces of the accident (helped with a bull-excavator, of a legal person, to move the victim's car) , we will retain in addition to other incident crimes in the present case and complicity to leaving the place of the accident for the legal entity or ,depending on the case, the improper participation to the commitment of this offense in the situation in which the employees are unaware of the fact that there had been a traffic accident with victims.

In another situation, if an employee of a transport company of values causes a road traffic accident resulting with the injury of bodily integrity of a person and leaves the place of the accident in order to continue the transport, at the determinative instigation of the collective governing entity, we will find ourselves in the situation of instigation to commit the offense of leaving the place of the accident by the legal entity.

The main passive subject of this criminal liability is the state. The secondary passive subject is constituted by the injured person by the road traffic accident.

3. The constitutive content

3.1. The objective side

The offense provided and punished by art. 338 para. (1) can be accomplished by leaving the place of the accident without the consent of the police or the prosecutor who carries out the investigation the place of the deed, by the people referred to in the text of incrimination, involved in a road traffic accident.

As far it concerns the offense contained in the provisions of para. (2), the material element of this one is achieved through the deed to modify the condition of the place or to delete the traces of the traffic accident that resulted with the killing or injury of bodily integrity or health of one or more people, without the consent of the investigation team on the spot.

The obligation imposed on the driver of any vehicle involved in a traffic accident, with the exceptions listed in para. (3) to remain at the place of the accident is justified by the necessity to establish the causes that have caused the accident, to identify the people responsible for producing the accident and to call them to account to penal liability.

The place of the accident means the area of land where the action or inaction took place and has caused the accident, where the injury has been produced (fatal or with harmful consequences for bodily injuries or health) and where different traces are printed that are relevant for the determination of the causes of the accident[10].

Leaving the place of the traffic accident means the removal and the departure of the person involved in the area (area of land) where the road event (accident) occurred in question.

In relation to cognitive processes which determine the driver to undertake such action, we can retain the attempt to evade from the penal liability (e.g. the r the driver is under the influence of beverages or other substances or as a result of the accident the injury of bodily integrity or the death of one or more people occurred).

The fear of the crowd may represent another reason promoter of committing the penal deed, but in such situation we believe that criminal liability will not be held.

The change of status of the place of the traffic accident consists in changing or transforming the elements of the surface of the land on which the traffic accident occurred and had as result the killing or the injury of bodily integrity or health of one or more people. For example, by introducing and creating some non-existent traces or by removing of some objects resulting from the accident[11].

[9] Viorel Pașca, Petre Dungan, Tiberiu Medeanu, Drept penal parte special. Prezentare commparativă a Noului Cod Penal și a Codului Penal din 1968, Ed. Universul Juridic, 2013, p.209;

[10] Idem;

Deleting the traces of the traffic accident involves an activity of elimination or removal of signs left by the road event which has resulted in killing or injury of bodily integrity or health of one or more people.

We notice that frequently the commitment of the offense of leaving the place of the accident knows, in fact, the achievement of the typicality by the action of continuing the way or by the action of stopping, the investigation of the situation by the guilty driver of producing it and continuing the road.

Thus, if the driver proceeds to leave the place of the accident with the vehicle involved in the accident, we consider that it is necessary to retain a contest of offenses between the offenses referred to para. (1) and (2), the status of the place being modified and the traces of the road accident being removed. On the other hand, the driver who abandons the vehicle after the traffic accident and leaves, on foot or by other means of transport, the place of the accident will be responsible for committing the offense provided and punished by art. 338 para (1).

In other words, whenever the commitment of the material element of the offense provided by paragraph (1) shall be carried out by using the vehicle involved in the accident, it will be as an incident the contest of offenses consequential connection.

The incriminator text provides an essential requirement attached to the material element, namely that the leaving of the place of the road traffic accident to be carried out without the consent of the police or of the prosecutor who carries out the investigation of the place of the deed[12].

Another essential requirement affects the driver's involvement in a road traffic accident, which means that he must have a certain role in the occurrence of the road event.

Analysing the hypothesis provided in paragraph (1), (2) and the special supporting causes from the content of paragraph (3), we could say that under the incidence of art. 338 of Criminal Code not all the traffic accidents are included, thus, "leaving the place of the accident in order to create a state of danger for the protected social values by the incrimination of this deed and, therefore, to justify the intervention of the criminal liability, it is necessary that the road traffic accident to present certain seriousness and also a certain significance. Moving away from the place of the accident, as well as the modification of the status of the place or deletion of the traces of the accident fall under the incidence of criminal law only if after the road traffic accident occurred the killing or the injury of bodily integrity or health of one or more people, and also without the consent of the investigation team on the spot[13]. "

The first instance court held essentially that on 26th .03.2015, around 08.50, the defendant got behind the wheels of the vehicle, wanting to head for the place of work. While he was performing the manoeuvre of reverse, the defendant injured a victim who was on the sideway of the boulevard. Following the accident, the defendant got out of the car and noticed that the person who was hit was sitting on the sidewalk having a bruise and a wound at the right cheekbone. The defendant has proposed the injured person to take him to hospital, but this one refused. Under these conditions, got behind the wheel of the vehicle and left the place of the accident without the consent of the police.

Following the reports of forensic discovery, it was established that the victim suffered injuries that required 3-4 days of health care.

The defendant has requested his acquittal on the grounds that the deed was not committed with guilt prescribed by law or intentionally, claiming that the form of guilt would have been the negligence, reported also to the attitude of this one with regard to his insistence for the transportation to the hospital of the injured person, remained at the place of the accident until the driver's departure, fact which has reinforced the belief that there is no form of norm violation broken from the point of view of the safety on public roads.

The same court of first instance considered that the existence of the fault without provision cannot be held, meaning that the defendant had not provided the result of his deed, given the fact that it was obvious that he committed a road traffic accident, within the acceptation of law circulation (art. 75 of GEO no. 195/202), and as an experienced driver (owner of the driving licence since 1995, as a result of the auto registration sheet), may not plead any excuse as regards the unfamiliarity with the legal provisions and the obligations which were his due.

The defendant noticed that the person who had hit was hurt, but however he did not notify immediately the police and left the lace of the accident, having the representation of the socially dangerous result of his deed.

On the other hand, by proceeding to a comparative analysis of the two successive text of law, the court concluded that for the meeting of the constitutive elements of the offence it is no longer necessary to satisfy the condition that the deed shall have the following result: „killing or the injury of bodily integrity or the health of one or more people", as provided by article 89 of GEO no. 195/2002, so that the decision was left without consequence, by the will of the legislature.

---

[11] Vasile Dobrinoiu, Ilie Pascu, Mihai Adrian Hotca, Ioan Chis, Mirela Gorunescu, Costica Paun, Norel Neagu, Maxim Dobrinoiu , Mircea Constantin Sinescu, op. cit, 2014, p.735;

[12] Vasile Dobrinoiu, Ilie Pascu, Mihai Adrian Hotca, Ioan Chis, Mirela Gorunescu, Costica Paun, Norel Neagu, Maxim Dobrinoiu , Mircea Constantin Sinescu, op. cit, p.734;

[13] Alexandru Boroi, op. cit., p.586;

Under these circumstances, it was appreciated by the trial court that in law, the deed of the defendant meets under the aspect of the objective and subjective nature, the constitutive elements of the offense of leaving the place of the accident, provided by the art. 338 paragraph 1 of the Criminal Code.

To those shown, the court noticed that, beyond any reasonable doubt that the deed really exists, it is an offence and it has been committed by the defendant, so that the court ordered his conviction.

The defendant has made an appeal in legal terms against this decision requiring the acquittal on the basis of article 396 paragraph 5 in relation to article 16 para. 1 (b) of the Criminal Procedure Code since he had no intention of leaving the place of the accident, he tried to help the injured person, had no time the representation that he violates a legal standard.

Examining the documents and the works of the file in the context of the invoked critics, Bucharest Court of Appeal, in complete disagreement with the majority held that the appeal in question was founded.

As it was constantly shown in the doctrine, both under the influence of previous rule and the new Penal Code, the offence provided by article 338 of the Criminal Code is committed only intentionally, which may be direct or indirect. The realization of the act of negligence does not constitute an offence.

There is an intention, for example, when the offender realizes that by leaving the place of the accident a state of danger for the safety of the road traffic is created and, at the same time, the activity of the judicial authorities related to that accident is prevented or hindered.

Even in everyday speech, as it is set in the Explanatory Dictionary of Romanian Language, (which the legislation cannot ignore), the terms "leaving the place of a deed" have certain connotations of hit-and-run offence to ensure his escape, in order not to be discovered or to make difficult or ruin the finding out the truth, and such attitude is always based on punishable intention.

Or, in this case, the whole attitude of the defendant to get off the car, to talk to the injured person, offering to take him to the hospital, to wait, to make sure that the person moves alone, and the caused injuries are very minor and to only after then, they are incompatible with the detention of the intention of committing the offence which is retained in charge.

The minimal injuries suffered by the hit person, his conscious refusal to be taken to the hospital, the fact that he was the first to leave the place of the accident in a good physical condition created the defendant the belief that he may leave a his turn without breaking the law.

This subjective representation constituted an offence of the defendant, regarding the criminal provisions, the lack of the intention as a form of guilt leading to the not meeting of the constitutive elements of the offence provided by the art. 338 paragraph 1 of Criminal Code. Therefore, The Court of Appeal from Bucharest criminal division II, in complete disagreement with majority, ordered the acquittal of the defendant for the commitment of the offence provided by the article 338 paragraph (1) of Criminal Code because the deed was not committed with the form of guilt required by law, mainly on the basis on art. 17 related to art. 396 paragraph (5) of Criminal Procedure Code combined with article 16 paragraph (1) letter (b) sentence II[14].

Of course, the analysed offences will be committed even in a real contest with conventional convexity, in the situation in which the material element provided by the paragraph (2) shall be carried out in order to hide the traces of the accident and implicitly of the offence of leaving the place of the accident in the normative version covered under paragraph (1). In such case, the commitment of the second offense will be familiar with the form of guilt of direct intention due to the fact that it has a special purpose, that of hiding the commitment of the first offense.

In the case of committing the offense provided by article 338 par. (1) from Criminal Code, the immediate consequence consists of the creation of a state of danger for the social relationships regarding: the safety of driving on public roads, the arising relations as a result of the obligation of granting the first aid and the social relations regarding the carrying out of the justice.

For the reunification of the objective side of the offenses regarding the safety of driving on public roads, especially of the offense provided and punished by article 338 par. (1) from Criminal Code, there must be a causal link between the action that which constitutes the material element and the specific result, report of causation which results ex re (from the nature of the deed). Related to the offense provided by par. (2), the casual link must be proved.

In the case of the infringement provided by paragraph (2), the immediate consequence will be constituted by the damage of the social relationships relating to the safety of driving on public roads and the social relationships relating to commitment of the justice.

3.2. Subjective side

The offense provided by the article 338 par. (1) from the Criminal Code will be able to be committed only intentionally, which can be direct or indirect. The situation is similar to and in the case of the situation provided by par. (2).

There is a direct intention when the offender realizes that by leaving the place of the accident it is created a state of danger for the safety of driving on public roads and also prevents or makes difficult the activity of judicial bodies linked to that accident, but not related to another deed that constitutes an offense.

[14] Curtea de Apel București – Secția a II-a penală, decizia Penală nr. 1257/A din data de 19.09.2016;

Consequently, for the existence of the offense, it is not necessary the intention of the avoidance of following, but of running some useful findings to find the truth[15].

There is an indirect intention if the driver passes over an obstacle that could be even a person, this one not being able to realize exactly (due to weathercast conditions, to speed, etc.), then continued on his way. Thus, the respective driver provides the result of his deed and, even he does not follow the commitment of the offense, he accepts the possibility of producing the result which is socially dangerous.

If the commitment of the offense under the form of the real contest of conventional connection, above described, the commitment of the second offense will always meet the form of guilt of the direct intention, thus there will be the special purpose, that of hiding the commitment of the first offense, but, generally, the mobile and the purpose of the commitment of offense are not relevant in order to retain or not the offenses provided and punished by the article 338 from the new Criminal Code, these ones may have relevance in the case of individualisation of the case.

Analysing further the defendant's psychological process of the defendant at the time of committing the offense provided and punished by the article 338 par. (1) from the Criminal Code, we cannot neglect the aspects related to the commitment of the offenses as a result of a fear. We will not discuss the fear of being taken to criminal liability or the fear of finding other offenses, but about the fear inspired by the specific objective of the factual situation.

Thus, from this perspective we recall the criminal decision no. 97/R/20210 pronounced by the Court of Appeal of Bacau, case in which the defendant argued in hid defence the commitment of the deed as a result of some fear created by the people found at the place of the accident that was not received by the court resulting the fact that at the moment or producing the accident, this one had an alcoholic saturation in blood of 1.90%, and under the aspect of the subjective side it was demonstrated his intention of leaving the place of the accident in order to hide the drunkenness.

The problem becomes even more interesting because there may really be situations in which the author of the criminal deed eave the place of the accident due to the fear created by people found on the spot, by eyewitnesses, relatives to the victim, etc.

By penal decision no. 176/1993 of the Court of Bucharest, criminal section I, it was argued that there will be no state of necessity if the defendant left the place of the accident which occurred in order to save himself and the people in the vehicle created by a group of gypsy people who, gathered at the place of the accident, started to throw stones on his car because the serious danger which requires with necessity an action of save is determined by a random and not an attack from the part of one or more people.

We criticise the decision of the court on the grounds that the danger may come from accidental causes but also from deed committed intentionally or negligence, the danger being able to create even from the conduct of the offender.

3.3. Forms, penalties

The preparatory acts are not punishable but possible, the legislator considering that these ones do not present a degree of enough social danger in order to have criminal relevance. The consumption of the offence takes place the moment when the material element is fully made. We also mention that the attempt is not criminalized although it is possible in the case of analysed crimes.

Regarding the incriminating system, the commitment of the offences provided by article 338 para. (1) and (2) are punished with imprisonment from 2 to 7 years.

3.4. Special supporting causes

According to the article 338 (3) of the new Criminal Code, the leaving of the place of the accident does not constitute on offence when:

a) only material damage occurred following the accident.

We must point out related to this hypothesis that if the accident resulted with at least one person who suffered an injury of bodily integrity or health or has undergone some simple physical sufferance (minor), the specific justified cause no longer finds incidence.

b) the driver, in the lack of other means of transport, carries himself the injured people to the nearest medical care able to provide the necessary medical assistance and where he declared his personal data of identification and the number of registration of the driven vehicle, recorded in a special register, if he returns immediately to the place of the accident.

This case of inexistence of the offence is not anything else than a particular application of the state of emergency as a supporting cause. We appreciate that the legislator did not define the meaning and the sense of the word "immediately", but we will appreciate it as a period of time when a person who committed a car crash and carries the victims to a medical care must return to the place of the accident so the term will receive a special connotation depending on the particular circumstances of the cause[16].

Exemplifying in this regard, in relation to the criminal law, by the penal sentence no. 178 of 5th December 2016 of the Court from Bolintin Vale village, which remained final by the rejection of the appeal, the Court held the deed of the person of carrying immediately the victim after the commitment of the car crash, but not to the nearest medical care, without returning to the place of the accident, meets the constitutive elements of the analysed offence, the defendant not being present under the incidence of some special supporting cause.

[15] Vasile Dobrinoiu, Ilie Pascu, Mihai Adrian Hotca, Ioan Chis, Mirela Gorunescu, Costica Paun, Norel Neagu, Maxim Dobrinoiu , Mircea Constantin Sinescu, op. cit, p.736;

[16] Vasile Dobrinoiu, Ilie Pascu, Mihai Adrian Hotca, Ioan Chis, Mirela Gorunescu, Costica Paun, Norel Neagu, Maxim Dobrinoiu , Mircea Constantin Sinescu, op. cit, p.737;

c) the driver of the vehicle with priority circulation regime notifies immediately the police, and he presents to the headquarters of the police whose jurisdiction occurred the accident after the mission, in order to draw up the documents on the findings.

In this case, the text of the law governs the situation of the drivers of vehicles with priority regime driving. E.g.: The vehicles of the Ministry of Internal Affairs, Ministry of Defence, the Romanian Intelligence Service, the Border Police, the Protection and Guard Custom Service, those intended for the extinguishing fires, ambulances, etc.

d) the victim leaves the place of the accident, and the driver of the vehicle announces immediately the event to the nearest police station.

4. Aspects of procedural penal law

In the case of committing this crime, the criminal proceedings will be initiated ex officio. The competence of carrying the criminal offence ids the responsibility of to the criminal research bodies of the judicial police. The competence of judgement in the first instance returns to the Court.

Of course, from those set out above, we find applicability only I the situation in which the quality of the person does not arise another level of competence. Thus, if the person who commits the crime has the quality of, or example, a lawyer, the competence in the first instance will return to the Court of Appeal.

5. Legislative no concordance, following, as a result of Decision no.3/2014 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice and of the decision 732/2014 of the Constitutional Court of Romania

All the offences provided I the previous normative act have equivalent in the content of the New Criminal Code, even if changes subsist sometimes, the deeds forbidden by law do not remain the same.

As we previously mentioned, once with the coming into force of the codes, the road offences provided by GEO no. 195/2002 met their correspondent in the content of the new Criminal Code, in title VII., Offences against the public safety.

We noticed that even though the offence provided by article 90 from GEO no. 195/2002, namely:

(1) The deed of the driver or of the instructor, found in the process of training, or of the assessor of the competent authority, found during the evolution of the practical tests of the exam in order to obtain the driving licence, alcohol consumption, products or narcotic substances or drugs with similar effects to these ones, after causing a car crash that has as a result the killing or the injury of bodily integrity or health of one or more people, up to biological samples or to the test with a technical means approved and verified by the metrological or up to the establishment with the approved technical means of their existence in the exhaled air , it is punished with imprisonment from 1 to 5 years, it has constituted an integrated part in the text of incrimination of the offence provided and punished by the article 336 from Criminal Code under the influence of driving a vehicle under the influence al alcohol or other substances:

(1) driving on public roads a vehicle for which the law provides the obligation of owning the driving licence by a person who, at the moment of collecting the biological samples, the driver has an alcoholic impregnation of over 0,80 g/l of pure alcohol in blood is punished with imprisonment from 1 to 5 years or by fine.

We can easily notice that by the phrase at the moment of collecting the biological samples, from the article 336, the legislator transposed the ideology of the incrimination of the art. 90 from GEO no. 195/2002.

It is prohibited by art. 90 the consumption of alcohol, products or narcotic substances or drugs with similar effects to these ones, after causing a car accident which had a result the death or the bodily injury or health of one or more people, up to the collecting of the biological samples or up to the testing in order to establish those values with an approved means, the article 336 from New Criminal Code proposed as for committing the offence of driving a vehicle under the influence of alcohol or other substances that the relevant value al the alcohol or the level of intoxication with forbidden substances to be the one from the first collection of biological samples in this matter.

Thus, in the old regulation, with the assumption that a driver (who was not under the influence of alcoholic beverages or other substances similar effects to these ones) has committed a car accident (with human victims), it is forbidden to this one to under the incidence of committing the criminal offence, the consumption of alcohol or other substances up to the moment of the collection of biological samples. Otherwise, this one would have answered criminally for the commitment of the offence provided and punished by art. 90 of GEO no. 195/2002 and the establishment of the factual situation in terms of the alcoholic impregnation of blood or the consumption of other substances at the time of the committing the accident or driving a vehicle, they were calculated backward, by the collection of two biological samples taken every one hour, thus, establishing the descendent or ascendant curve relevant to the forensic biologists.

1. The moment of driving the vehicle- with criminal relevance to the commitment of the offence of driving a vehicle under the influence of alcoholic beverages until the date of 1st .02.2014;

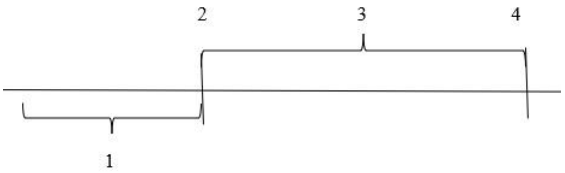
2. The moment of committing the accident;
3. The time interval until the arrival of the bodies of criminal investigation and the time interval prohibitive for the consumption of alcohol or other substances, with criminal incidence for the commitment of the offence provided and punished by article 90 from GEO no. 195/2002.
4. The moment of collecting the biological samples.

We notice that the article 90 from GEO met its implementation only for the time interval shown at point 3. Of course, this one has another particular application in the situation when the driver leaves the place of the accident, but this situation does not interest for what we will further present.

In the new legislative version, the driver is no longer prohibited, in law, by the consumption of alcohol after the accident, but from the interpretation of article 336 from New Criminal Code, the biological sample with criminal relevance would be the first, so, a similar difficult situation for the driver as the one from the old regulation. The driver would have responded criminally under the aspect of the committing the offence provided and punished by article 336 no matter the fact that at the moment of committing the car accident has already been under the influence of alcoholic beverages or forbidden substances or he has taken them after the commitment of the car accident, but until the moment of collecting the biological samples. Thus, we can notice the legislative analogy.



1. the moment of driving the vehicle – without criminal relevance for the commitment of the offence of driving a vehicle under the influence of alcoholic beverages or other substances, at the date of 1st .02.2014 and until the moment of the publication of the Decision of Constitutional Court of Romania no. 732/16th .12.2014;
2. The moment of committing the accident;
3. The period of time up to the arrival of the bodies of criminal investigation, period which is no longer prohibiting, in law, regarding the consumption of alcohol or other substances.
4. The moment of collecting the biological samples with criminal relevance for the commitment of the offence provided and punished by article 336 from New Criminal Code;

No matter the time that would have been when the driver of the vehicle under the influence of alcoholic beverages or would have consumed, the only moment with criminal relevance is constituted by the point 4, and the only incident offence may be constituted by article 336 from New Criminal Code.

We may say the old regulation was tougher in terms of committing of a contest of the offence of driving a vehicle under the influence of alcoholic beverages or other substances and the consumption of alcohol or other substances after the accident. As shown above, in the case of the new regulation, in this situation we could have retained only an offence.

On several occasions, the doctrine and practitioners denied the effectiveness of the incriminating text of the article 336 of New Criminal Code.

At the same time, the admission of the unconstitutional exception of the phrase "the time of the collection of biological samples" makes that the offence provided by article 90 from GEO no. 195/2002 which was introduced later in the content of the text of incriminating provided by article 336 from New Criminal code (as shown above), to be decriminalized.

6. Conclusions

The offence of leaving the place of the accident was one of those that has met changes once with the coming into force in the content of New Criminal Code.

Relating to the former regulation, we noticed the courts no unitary the law in the terms of the interpretation of the provisions relating to "injury of bodily integrity or health of one or more people", from the content of article 89 from GEO no. 105/2002. The High Court of Cassation and Justice ruled by the Decision LXVI (66) of 15th October 2007 in this direction, settling these aspects in terms of the understanding of the phrase in the spirit and the understanding of the terms from a legal point of view, not literary. Therefore, the offence in order to be incident, it was necessary that the victim has suffered assessable injuries in at least 10 days of medical care or other necessary consequences in order to be able to be brought the incidence of the offence of bodily injury by negligence.

We notice that due to the new form incrimination, the attorneys charged with the application according to the law have faced real difficulties in adopting solutions regarding the legal analysed provisions.

The Decision of the High Court of Cassation and Justice of 15th October 2007 remaining without echo in the new form of the regulation, we can't wait for the new legislative solution that the Supreme Court will pronounce.

Due to the fact that the criminal law appears as a subject according to the social relationships, being associated with the mirror and the values of the current community, the future decision of HCCJ will repeal or confirm us the fact if, at least under this aspect, the perception the road crime, related to the provisions of article 338 of Criminal Code suffered other approach, being evident, at least referring to the way of writing of the offence that the incriminating provisions are much more severe.

References

- Tudorel Toader, Maria-Ioana Michinici, Anda Crisu-Ciocinta, Mihai Dunea, Ruxandra Raducanu, Sebastian Radulet, Noul Cod penal, Comentarii pe articole, Ed. Hamangiu, 2014
- Mihai Adrian Hotca, Maxim Dobrinoiu, Infracţiuni prevăzute în legi speciale. Comentarii şi explicaţii, Editura C.H. Beck, Bucureşti 2010
- Alexandru Ionaș, Alexandru Florin Măgureanu, Cristina Dinu, Drept penal. Partea Specială, Ed. Universul Juridic, 2015, București
- Alexandru Boroi, Drept penal. Partea specială, Ed. C.H Beck, București, 2014
- Vasile Dobrinoiu, Ilie Pascu, Mihai Adrian Hatca, Ioan Chis, Mirela Gorunescu, Norel Neagu, Maxim Dobrinoiu, Mircea Constantin Sinescu, Noul Cod Penal comentat. Partea Specială, Ediția a II-a, revăzută și adaugită, Ed. Universul Juridic, București, 2014
- Viorel Pașca, Petre Dungan, Tiberiu Medeanu, Drept penal parte special. Prezentare commparativă a Noului Cod Penal și a Codului Penal din 1968, Ed. Universul Juridic, 2013
- Curtea de Apel București – Secția a II-a penală, decizia Penală nr. 1257/A din data de 19.09.2016

PHASES OF THE ROMANIAN CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS AS PER THE PROVISIONS OF THE NEW CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

Mihai OLARIU*

Abstract

According to the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1968, a typical structure of the criminal proceedings included three phases: criminal prosecution, judgment and enforcement of final criminal decision; each such phase was delimited by certain proceedings-related acts and, within each of these phases, certain categories of judicial bodies exercised their duties.

Upon the coming into force of the New Code of Criminal Procedure, the criminal proceedings, along with the criminal prosecution, judgment and enforcement of the criminal decision, include a new phase, namely the preliminary chamber. The purpose of the procedure in the preliminary chamber is to verify, after the indictment, the competence and legality of seizing the court, as well as to verify the legality of evidence gathered and the procedural acts undertaken by the criminal prosecution bodies.

Keywords: proceedings phases, criminal prosecution, preliminary chamber, judgment, enforcement of final criminal decisions.

1. Introduction

The phases of the criminal proceedings are divisions thereof, including a complex of activities, successively and progressively undertaken in a coordinated manner, having their own objects and ending by their own solutions[1].

The notion of proceedings phase shall not be mistaken for the notion of proceedings stage. In this respect, the proceedings stages are various steps of conducting the criminal proceedings, within the distinct phases it undertakes. Thus, the proceedings stages are subdivisions of the phases of conducting a criminal proceeding; they have their own function, forming, within the main activities, a unitary set of activities (for instance, within judgment of the means of challenge, which is a stage of the judgment phase, several means of challenge may be successively used – appeal, recourse in cassation, challenge for annulment, revision – and each of them is a proceedings stage)[2].

2. Content

The division of a criminal proceeding into several phases may be found in modern legislations, and the history of the criminal proceedings records, in this respect, process constructions which do not include such a structure[3].

In this respect, the adversarial legal system was characterized by the freedom of producing (meaning gathering) evidence, oral arguments and publicity of judgment. The initiative of the proceedings belonged to the accuser (the victim of the offence or any other person), who had the obligation to produce the evidence, and the accused person had the right to counter-evidence. The evidence and counter-evidence was discussed orally and publicly and the court's role was passive, limited to the settlement of the criminal case based on the evidence presented. This system operated, in several versions, in Antiquity and in the first period of the Middle Ages[4].

The inquisitorial system was characterized by features opposed to the adversarial system. Thus, the accusation, defence and judgment were no longer distinct activities, and the criminal proceedings were initiated ex officio by the body having the obligation to gather the evidence and judge the case. Also, the procedure was in writing and secret, the only party to the proceedings was the accused person, and the supply of evidence had a formal nature, the cases being usually settled without debates. This system, used in rudimentary forms as early as the Antiquity, appears in its typical form upon the consolidation of the central

* Associate Professor, PhD, Director of Legal Sciences Department of the Romanian - American University, Lawyer (e-mail: avmihaiolariu@yahoo.com)

[1] Volonciu N., Tratat de procedură penală, Partea general (Treaty of Criminal Procedure. General Part), volume I, Paideia Publishing House, Bucharest, 1993, p. 21.

[2] Antoniu G., Volonciu N., Zaharia N., Dicţionar de procedură penală (Dictionary of Criminal Procedure), Ed. ştiinţifică şi enciclopedica, Bucharest, 1988, p. 255.

[3] Mateuţ Gh., Tratat de procedură penală. Partea generală (Treaty of Criminal Procedure. General Part), volume I, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2007, p. 135-149.

[4] Neagu I., Tratat de procedură penală. Partea general (Treaty of Criminal Procedure. General Part), Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010, p. 26.

power in the Middle Ages and upon the organization of canonical inquisitorial justice[5].

Also, the mixed system (eclectic) used the aspects it considered useful from the other two systems, and it included a preliminary phase of the criminal proceedings, regulated according to the inquisitorial system (ex officio, secret and written procedure) and a phase of judgment applying the rules of the adversarial system (oral arguments, audi alteram parem rule). However, the mixed system does not strictly apply the rules of the other two systems, including various deviations therefrom, and each criminal proceedings legislation established regulations with their own particulars.

According to the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1968, the typical structure of a criminal proceedings included three phases: criminal prosecution, judgment and enforcement of final criminal decisions; each such phase was delimited by certain proceedings-related acts and, within each of these phases, certain categories of judicial bodies exercised their duties.

Upon the coming into force of the New Code of Criminal Procedure, the criminal proceedings, along with the criminal prosecution, judgment and enforcement of the criminal decision, include a new phase, namely the preliminary chamber. The purpose of the procedure in the preliminary chamber is to verify, after the indictment, the competence and legality of seizing the court, as well as to verify the legality of evidence gathered and the procedural acts undertaken by the criminal prosecution bodies.

These subdivisions of the criminal proceedings correspond to the particulars of the activities which have to be undertaken for a good settlement of the criminal case.

2.1. Criminal prosecution – distinct phase of the criminal proceedings

Each proceedings phase solves problems whose settlement is crucial for the progress of the criminal file to the next phase. Among the phases or subdivisions of the criminal proceedings, the criminal prosecution has a special place, because of its own finality and function.

The criminal prosecution is the first phase of the criminal proceedings and consists in the set of activities undertaken by the criminal prosecution bodies in order to gather the necessary evidence on the existence of the offences, the identification of the offenders and establishment of their criminal or civil liability, in order to establish whether the judgment should be initiated or not against them[6].

Incipient forms of criminal prosecution, as a distinct phase within the criminal proceedings, appeared in the inquisitorial system, in Western Europe, in the 13th century, when the so-called investigation appeared, conducted on the initiative of the royal power agents[7]. The presentation of the Public Ministry in the legal literature underlined that, initially, the prosecutor's duty was to take care of the material interests of the king and, later on, they started searching the guilty persons and bringing them to justice[8].

Numerous authors underlined the importance of the criminal prosecution phase within the criminal proceedings. In this respect, it was presented that the need to counteract the criminal activity led to the establishment of specialized bodies to undertake specific activities in a phase preceding the judgment[9].

Also, the existence of the criminal prosecution as a distinct phase of the criminal proceedings is also justified by the fact that, in the modern age, offences are committed by using new and increasingly better methods and techniques, and sometimes the criminal activity turns into organized crime[10]. All these aspects led to a focused concern of the state to fight against the criminal phenomenon.

For this purpose, it was necessary to establish some bodies specialized in discovering the offences, identifying and catching the offenders in order to bring them to justice. These bodies have a well-determined competence according to the law, and they conduct their activity within the criminal prosecution phase. According to the criminal proceedings-related provisions, the criminal prosecution is a phase whose contents and performance are strictly limited to what is necessary to achieve the purpose of this proceedings phase and of the criminal proceedings in general[11].

Besides the fundamental rules of the criminal proceedings, several basic rules may be identified for the criminal prosecution phase, which are specific to it[12]. In this respect, the criminal prosecution is not public; however, there are acts of criminal prosecution in which the public may participate to a certain extent (for instance, the participation of assistant witnesses in certain procedures related to the evidence).

The criminal prosecution is also characterized by the absence of the audi alteram partem rule (meaning the existence and exercise within this activity of two opposite sides or functions – accusation and defence);

---

[5] Lorincz A. L., Drept procesual penal (Criminal Trial-related Law), Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2009, p. 12.

[6] Theodoru Gr., Moldovan L., Drept procesual penal (Criminal Trial-related Law), Ed. Didactică şi Pedagogică, Bucharest, 1979, p. 194.

[7] Neagu I., Tratat de procedură penală. Partea general (Treaty of Criminal Procedure. General Part), Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010, p. 27.

[8] Tanoviceanu I., Curs de procedură penală română (Course of Romanian Criminal Procedure),"Atelierele grafice Socec, Societate Anonimă", Bucharest, 1913, p. 29.

[9] Volonciu N., Drept procesual penal (Criminal Trial-related Law), Ed. Didactică şi Pedagogică, Bucharest, 1972, p. 239.

[10] Dincu A., Criminologie (Criminology), Tipografia Universităţii Bucureşti, 1984, p. 125-128.

[11] Neagu I., Tratat de procedură penală, Partea specială (Treaty of Criminal Procedure. Special Part), Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010, p. 20.

[12] Mateuţ Gh., Procedură penală, Partea special (Criminal Procedure. Special Part), volume I, Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 1997, p. 107-108.

as an exception, there are also "islands" of application of the audi alteram partem rule throughout this proceedings phase (for instance, debate on the proposal of provisional arrest of the suspect or defendant).

The absence of the audi alteram partem rule confers efficiency and mobility to the criminal prosecution, which features are absent in the judgment phase, because the criminal prosecution bodies have the possibility to undertake the criminal prosecution acts at the most appropriate time, on the date and at the place corresponding to the concrete requirements of the file[13].

Also, the criminal prosecution is preponderantly written, since most of the acts within this proceedings phase are made in writing. In the criminal prosecution phase, the parties may raise exceptions, file requests or memoranda only in writing. Although the written form is not a requirement for validity, but only a requirement for evidence, it may be said that, as compared to the judgment phase (characterized by its oral nature), the criminal prosecution mainly has a written character.

2.2. Preliminary chamber – distinct phase of the criminal proceedings

The criminal cases follow the procedure in the preliminary chamber only if the court was seized by an indictment. If the court is seized by an agreement for admission of guilt, the criminal case shall go directly to the judgment phase, without following the preliminary chamber procedure.

The preliminary chamber procedure includes a written debate between the defendant (not the civil party, the party liable under the civil law or the injured party) and the prosecutor.

According to Art. 54 of the New Code of Criminal Procedure, the preliminary chamber judge is a judge who, within the court and according to the court's jurisdiction:

a) verifies the legality of the indictment ordered by the prosecutor;
b) verifies the legality of evidence gathered and the procedural acts undertaken by the criminal prosecution bodies;
c) settles the complaints against the rulings of non-prosecution or non-indictment;
d) settles other situations expressly provided by the law.

The preliminary chamber procedure is regulated by the provisions of Arts. 342-348 of the New Code of Criminal Procedure.

The purpose of the procedure in the preliminary chamber is to verify, after the indictment, the competence and legality of seizing the court, as well as to verify the legality of evidence gathered and the procedural acts undertaken by the criminal prosecution bodies.

The duration of the preliminary chamber procedure is of maximum 60 days from the date of registration of the case with the court (Art. 343 of the New Code of Criminal Procedure). We consider that this term is a recommendation and, if it is exceeded, no procedural sanctions may occur.

For the judgment of the file, certain communications have to be made. Thus, according to Art. 344 of the New Code of Criminal Procedure, the certified copy of the indictment and, as the case may be, its certified translation (in the case of a foreign defendant) shall be communicated to the defendant at the place of his arrest or, as the case may be, at the address where he lives or at the address where he requested the service of process.

As a novelty, the preliminary chamber procedure introduces the regulation of a written procedure regarding the submission of requests, exceptions and the employment of a defence lawyer. Thus, the institution of preliminary chamber emphasizes the written character for the settlement of the criminal case from the standpoint of the object presented in Art. 342 of the New Code of Criminal Procedure.

Along with the communication of the certified copy of the indictment and, as the case may be, of its certified translation, the defendant shall be presented with certain proceedings-related guarantees. In this respect, the defendant's attention is drawn on the object of the procedure in the preliminary chamber, on his right to hire a defence lawyer, the term within which he may file, in writing, requests and exceptions on the legality of evidence gathering and procedural acts undertaken by the criminal prosecution bodies. The term is established by the preliminary chamber judge, depending on the complexity and particulars of the case, but it may not be shorter than 20 days.

As regards the appointment of the ex officio defence lawyer, according to Art. 344 para. 3 of the New Code of Criminal Procedure, the preliminary chamber judge takes measures for his appointment, in the cases provided by Art. 90 of the New Code of Criminal Procedure. In the current form of the criminal proceedings-related provisions, the interpretation may be that only the provisions of Art. 90 letters a) and b) of the New Code of Criminal Procedure are applicable; the hypothesis under Art. 90 letter c) is not applicable because it refers to the judgment phase[14], and the preliminary chamber is a distinct phase of the criminal proceedings.

As regards the solutions that the preliminary chamber may order, they are expressly provided in Art. 346 of the New Code of Criminal Procedure.

Within the preliminary chamber procedure, the judge issues a court report supported by reasons, in the court chambers, with the participation of the defendant and the prosecutor.

According to Art. 346 para. 3 letter a) of the New Code of Criminal Procedure, the preliminary chamber judge shall return the case to the prosecutor's office if: the indictment is not prepared according to the rules and such irregularity was not remedied by the prosecutor within the term provided in Art. 345 para. 3, if the irregularity entails the impossibility to establish the object or limits of the judgment. The preliminary chamber court report establishes the irregularity of the notification act, according to the text of the law; the case is returned for the remedy of the act for notification of the court. Such a ruling was regulated by Art. 300 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1968.

[13] Theodoru Gr., Moldovan L., Drept procesual penal (Criminal Trial-related Law), Ed. Didactică și Pedagogică, Bucharest, 1979, p. 196.
[14] The New Code of Criminal Procedure, Ed. Hamangiu, Bucharest, 2014, p. 48.

Also, the preliminary chamber judge returns the case to the prosecutor if it excluded all the evidence gathered during the criminal prosecution (for instance, establishing a breach in respect of a proof which led to all the evidence deriving from that proof, may lead to the return of the file to the prosecutor, since the entire evidence gathered during the criminal prosecution is excluded), as well as if the prosecutor requests the case to be returned, according to Art. 345 para. 3, or fails to answer within the term provided by the same provisions [Art. 346 para. 3 letters b) and c) of the New Code of Criminal Procedure].

In all the other cases when irregularities of the notification act were found, when it excluded one or some of the gathered evidence (excluded evidence cannot be taken into consideration upon the judgment of the case on the merits) or sanctions, according to Arts. 280 – 282 of the New Code of Criminal Procedure the criminal prosecution acts undertaken in breach of the law, the preliminary chamber judge shall order the initiation of the judgment.

As regards the means of challenge, the criminal trial-related law expressly regulates the means of appeal by a challenge, which shall be filed within 3 days from communication of the court report supported by reasons issued by the preliminary chamber judge. The challenge may concern the settlement of the requests and exceptions, as well as the rulings provided in Art. 346 paras. 3-5 of the New Code of Criminal Procedure (but not the hypothesis regulated in Art. 346 para. 6 of the new regulation)[15].

2.3. Judgment – important phase of the criminal proceedings

The notion of judgment receives two meanings in the criminal trial-related terminology[16]. Thus, in a narrow sense, the concept of judgment refers to the logical operation whereby the panel of judges settles the criminal case with which it was seized, while, in a broad sense, the judgment means one of the phases of the criminal proceedings, consisting of a set of activities primarily undertaken by the court of law.

The notions of criminal "case", "cause" or "matter" mean the substantive fact for which the criminal proceedings takes place; this refers to the material criminal law dispute. The concept of "criminal case" should not be mistaken for the notion of "proceedings", the latter notion referring to the set of activities undertaken for the settlement of the criminal law dispute[17].

The judgment is considered, in its broad sense, as the central and most important phase of the criminal proceedings[18], because its object is the final settlement of the criminal case. The importance assigned to the judgment phase is also justified by the fact that, within such, the court of law verifies the entire activity related to the proceedings, undertaken by all the other participants, both before the judgment of the case and during its judgment.

Also, the importance assigned to this phase of the proceedings is also reflected in the regulations establishing the principle of separation of state powers, and, implicitly, the independence of the judiciary power. In this respect, the Constitution of Romania provides in Art. 124 that "Justice shall be rendered in the name of the law" and that "Judges shall be independent and subject only to the law". Also, according to Art. 1 para. 2 of Law no. 304/2004 on the judiciary organization, "The Superior Council of Magistracy shall be the guarantor of the independence of justice".

The purpose of the judgment phase is to find the truth in respect of the fact and the person which were notified to the court, in order to issue a lawful and grounded ruling.

Throughout the judgment phase, the court of law shall verify the legality and grounds for the criminal accusation pressed by the prosecutor, as well as of the civil claim filed by the civil party, making a decision which shall solve the criminal and civil sides of the criminal proceedings. The decision of the criminal court may be subject to judiciary control by exercising the means of challenge by the parties or the prosecutor.

The acts of judgment are jurisdictional acts whereby the activity of judgment is undertaken in order to achieve the purpose of the criminal proceeding and consist in decisions that the court of law orders during the proceedings in respect of the settlement of the criminal or civil action[19].

There is also a need to analyze the specific principles of the judgment phase.

Besides the fundamental principles of the criminal proceedings, which are also applicable in the judgment phase, there is a set of principles specific to this phase: publicity, direct nature, oral arguments and audi alteram partem rule.

---

[15] Idem, p. 206.

[16] Dongoroz V., Kahane S., Antoniu G., Bulai C., Iliescu N., Stănoiu R., Explicații teoretice ale Codului de procedură penală român. Partea special (Theoretical Explanations of the Romanian Code of Criminal Procedure), volume II, Ed. Academiei, Bucharest, 1976, p. 119; Neagu I., Tratat de procedură penală, Partea specială (Treaty of Criminal Procedure. Special Part), Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010, p. 175.

[17] Pop Tr., Drept procesual penal (Criminal Trial-related Law), volume IV, Tipografia Națională, Cluj, 1948, p. 182.

[18] Kahane S., Drept procesual penal (Criminal Trial-related Law), Ed. Didactică și Pedagogică, Bucharest, 1963, p. 242.

[19] Udroiu M., Procedură penală, Partea generală. Partea specială (Criminal Procedure. General Part. Special Part), C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013, p. 528.

Regulated in Art. 290 para. 1 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1968, the principle of publicity of the judgment phase is established in Art. 352 of the New Code of Criminal Procedure. The publicity of the court session is the basic rule of the criminal trial consisting in the performance of the judgment of a criminal case in public session. The court sessions have a public nature, any person being allowed to participate, including the press.

The presence of the public allows it to become aware of the modality in which the act of justice is rendered and ensures the guarantee of a control by such public or by the press on the modality of rendering justice[20].

It is not required that a public is effectively present in the courtroom upon the performance of the trial, but it is necessary that the public may have access to the court session. In other words, the proceedings in this phase of the criminal proceedings take place "with open doors"[21].

Being an important guarantee of the objectivity and impartiality of the judgment, the publicity of the court session is expressly provided in the Constitution of Romania (according to art. 127, the court sessions are public, except for the cases provided by the law), as well as in Law no. 304/2004 on the judiciary organization (according to Art. 12, the court sessions are public, except for the cases provided by the law; decisions shall be issued in public session, except for the cases provided by the law).

There are exceptions from the principle of publicity of the court session, which are situations expressly provided by the law in which the publicity is no longer mandatory.

Also, according to Art. 351 para. 1 of the New Code of Criminal Procedure, the judgment of the case is made before the court formed according to the law and takes place in a session, orally, directly and according to the audi alteram partem rule, this regulation being similar to the one provided in Art. 289 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1968.

The direct nature consists in the obligation of the court to directly perceive, without any intermediate, the means of evidence produced in the case, as well as the arguments of the prosecutor or of the parties in the criminal trial. By this direct nature, the court has direct contact with all the evidence.

The principles of audi alteram partem and of oral arguments blend with the principle of direct nature, according to which the judge "directly perceives, without any intermediate, the entire activity of the parties and of the secondary participants in the trial; directly hears the parties, the witnesses, without any intermediate (...). The entire debate takes places before the eyes and ears of the judge and of the parties. Consequently, the judge is in the position to perceive and assess the elements of the debate and the evidence, de visu et de auditu, in the session, in the presence and under the control of the concerned parties and even of the participating public. And the judge can ground his conviction only on what he saw and heard in the debate and on what was discussed there"[22].

In order to ensure such direct nature, the principle of continuity of the panel of judges was regulated, according to which the judgment of a criminal case is made throughout the entire criminal trial, by the same panel of judges to which the case was randomly assigned. In this respect, the principle of continuity of the panel of judges implies that "the entire debate takes place before the eyes of the same judges, in an uninterrupted, continuous manner, so that the judges have a detailed documentation of each moment of the debate and form a unitary opinion on the entire proceedings under debate"[23].

The audi alteram partem rule, as a principle specific to the judgment phase, refers to the fact that the evidence gathered during this phase is submitted foe discussions by the participants in the session, thus emphasizing the different trial-related positions of the parties[24].

The audi alteram partem rule is in close connection with the principle of equality of arms, as parts of the right to a fair trial and involve the right of each party to become aware of all the acts in the file or the observations, reports presented to the judge and to discuss them before such judge in order to influence the decision of the court of law, within a procedure based on the audi alteram partem rule which does not put any of the parties at a disadvantage[25].

Also, the principle of oral arguments consists in the fact that the entire activity of the proceedings conducted in the judgment phase takes place orally.

The oral arguments is not only a modality of holding the court session, but, it should be also understood taking into account the legal effects it produces in the judgment phase, being an imperative requirement for its validity, because, upon issuing a decision, the court shall take into consideration not only what was recorded, but also what was discussed orally in the debate stage.

2.4. Enforcement of the criminal court decisions – phase of the criminal proceedings

For the settlement of a criminal law dispute arising from the perpetration of an offence, it is required to initiate the criminal proceedings,

[20] Idem, p. 19.

[21] Neagu I., Tratat de procedură penală, Partea specială (Treaty of Criminal Procedure. Special Part), Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010, p. 177.

[22] Pop Tr., Drept procesual penal. Partea special (Criminal Trial-related Law. Special Part), volume IV, 1946, p. 214.

[23] Idem.

[24] Lorincz A. L., Drept procesual penal (Criminal Trial-related Law), Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2009, p. 353.

[25] Udroiu M., Procedură penală, Partea generală. Partea specială (Criminal Procedure. General Part. Special Part), C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013, p. 533.

consequently, a criminal law relationship is born in relation to such proceedings. However, the substantive criminal law dispute is considered settled only after the completion of the criminal proceedings, by reestablishment of the breached order of law, namely by holding the persons guilty of having committed the offence liable under the criminal law.

In order to ensure the completion of the criminal proceedings and to hold the guilty persons liable under the criminal law, it is not sufficient to issue a court decision, but its enacting terms have to be enforced.

The enforcement of the final criminal decisions is an activity included in the proceedings, conducted ex officio, whereby the enacting terms of a final criminal decisions are enforced. According to the internal organization regulation of the courts, the criminal enforcement bureaus include at least one delegated judge concretely in charge with the activity of criminal enforcement.

The last phase of the criminal proceedings has the purpose to transpose in life the final criminal decision and to achieve the purpose of the criminal law and of the criminal trial-related law[26]. The enforcement of the criminal decisions is characterized by its own principles such as: mandatory nature, enforceability, jurisdiction and continuity[27].

Within the criminal proceedings, the enacting terms of the final criminal decision have to be enforced, which provide the coercion of the sentenced persons, so that they effectively incur the applied criminal sanctions.

In the criminal trial-related literature, numerous authors claim the autonomy of this stage of the criminal proceedings[28], however, there are also opinions according to which the rules on the enforcement of the criminal decisions fully belong to the autonomous branch of the executive criminal law[29].

Also, it was shown that only a certain part of the enforcement activities is included in the phase of enforcement of the criminal decisions, namely the activities initiating the beginning of the enforcement, and thus, the service of the sentence is different from the enforcement of the sentence[30].

While the regulation of the enforcement of the criminal decisions falls under the exclusive application of the rules of the criminal trial-related law, the proper service of the criminal sanctions falls under the application of the rules of substantive law, which are included in the Criminal Code and in Law no. 275/2006 on the enforcement of the penalties and measures ordered by the judiciary bodies during the criminal proceedings.

The proceedings phase of enforcement is subsequent to the moment when the criminal court decision remains final and, according to Art. 554 of the New Code of Criminal Procedure, it starts with the first judicial activities undertaken at the enforcement court by the judge delegated with the enforcement.

The final limit of this proceedings phase ends with the effective service of the sentences or of the orders included in the court decision.

3. Conclusions

The article analyses the phases of the Romanian criminal proceedings, namely: the criminal prosecution, the preliminary chamber, the judgment and the enforcement of the criminal court decisions. Also, for each of the phases are underlined the specific rules applied and the principles.

The phases are presented according to the provisions of the New Code of Criminal Procedure and by the relevant jurisprudence in the field.

References

- Volonciu N., Tratat de procedură penală, Partea general (Treaty of Criminal Procedure. General Part), volume I, Paideia Publishing House, Bucharest, 1993
- Antoniu G., Volonciu N., Zaharia N., Dicționar de procedură penală (Dictionary of Criminal Procedure), Ed. științifică și enciclopedica, Bucharest, 1988
- Mateuț Gh., Tratat de procedură penală. Partea generală (Treaty of Criminal Procedure. General Part), volume I, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2007
- Neagu I., Tratat de procedură penală. Partea general (Treaty of Criminal Procedure. General Part), Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010
- Lorincz A. L., Drept procesual penal (Criminal Trial-related Law), Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2009
- Theodoru Gr., Moldovan L., Drept procesual penal (Criminal Trial-related Law), Ed. Didactică și Pedagogică, Bucharest, 1979
- Tanoviceanu I., Curs de procedură penală română (Course of Romanian Criminal Procedure),"Atelierele grafice Socec, Societate Anonimă", Bucharest, 1913

[26] Neagu I., Tratat de procedură penală. Partea general (Treaty of Criminal Procedure. General Part), Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010, p. 27.

[27] Dongoroz V., Kahane S., Antoniu G., Bulai C., Iliescu N., Stănoiu R., Explicații teoretice ale Codului de procedură penală român. Partea special (Theoretical Explanations of the Romanian Code of Criminal Procedure), volume II, Ed. Academiei, Bucharest, 1976, p. 294-302.

[28] Kahane S., Drept procesual penal (Criminal Trial-related Law), Ed. Didactică și Pedagogică, Bucharest, 1963, p. 314.

[29] Pop Tr., Drept procesual penal (Criminal Trial-related Law), volume IV, Tipografia Națională, Cluj, 1948, p. 3.

[30] Neagu I., Tratat de procedură penală, Partea specială (Treaty of Criminal Procedure. Special Part), Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010, p. 473.

- Volonciu N., Drept procesual penal (Criminal Trial-related Law), Ed. Didactică şi Pedagogică, Bucharest, 1972
- Dincu A., Criminologie (Criminology), Tipografia Universității Bucureşti, 1984
- Neagu I., Tratat de procedură penală, Partea specială (Treaty of Criminal Procedure. Special Part), Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010
- Mateuț Gh., Procedură penală, Partea special (Criminal Procedure. Special Part), volume I, Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 1997
- The New Code of Criminal Procedure, Ed. Hamangiu, Bucharest, 2014
- Dongoroz V., Kahane S., Antoniu G., Bulai C., Iliescu N., Stănoiu R., Explicații teoretice ale Codului de procedură penală român. Partea special (Theoretical Explanations of the Romanian Code of Criminal Procedure), volume II, Ed. Academiei, Bucharest, 1976
- Neagu I., Tratat de procedură penală, Partea specială (Treaty of Criminal Procedure. Special Part), Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010
- Pop Tr., Drept procesual penal (Criminal Trial-related Law), volume IV, Tipografia Națională, Cluj, 1948.
- Kahane S., Drept procesual penal (Criminal Trial-related Law), Ed. Didactică şi Pedagogică, Bucharest, 1963
- Udroiu M., Procedură penală, Partea generală. Partea specială (Criminal Procedure. General Part. Special Part), C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013
- Pop Tr., Drept procesual penal. Partea special (Criminal Trial-related Law. Special Part), volume IV, 1946
- Pop Tr., Drept procesual penal (Criminal Trial-related Law), volume IV, Tipografia Națională, Cluj, 1948

THE INSTITUTION OF COMPLAINTS WITH AN ADMINISTRATIVE-JUDICIAL CHARACTER MADE BY THE PERSONS DEPRIVED OF THEIR LIBERTY TO PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS AND INTERESTS

Simona Cireșica OPRIȘAN*

Abstract

This study is an analysis of how direct judicial control is exercised over the problems arising during the execution of sentences and custodial measures through a new institution, that of the the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty , and an analysis of the limits of his powers.The study also analyzes the legal dimension of administrative-judicial complaints by the persons deprived of their liberty to defend their rights and interests.

Deprivation of liberty is an event with major implications for both persons subject to such a measure and for their families or relatives. Whether it is a pre-arrested person, a person serving a custodial sentence or a juvenile in custody, the restriction of constitutional rights and the imposition of specific prohibitions can cause psychological suffering to people in this situation. The purpose of the punishment, of the custodial measure is not to cause physical or moral suffering or to humiliate the persons deprived of their liberty, but they are instituted for the purpose of recovery and re-socialization of these persons, as well as for the granting of constitutional rights within the limits of the temporary restrictions established in the court decision.

In order to ensure the unitary application of these fundamental principles, the Romanian legislator, through Law no.254 / 2013, paid due attention to this category of persons, the new law being in line with the legislative changes that were made, as well as the European recommendations on the treatment of detainees, of Human Rights or the laws of other states regarding of the execution of sentences ordered by the court. These European regulations, among other things, have made substantial improvements to the regulations on ensuring the normal functioning of the Romanian penitentiary regime, especially as regards the right of persons deprived of their liberty to information, to fill complaints.

The study is based on the conclusions drawn from the author's work as a clerk at the judge's office of deprivation of liberty.

Keywords: Law no.254 / 2013, judge for the deprivation of liberty, administrative-judicial complaint, person.

Introduction

Modern execution of custodial sentences means ensuring a balance between rights, rewards and disciplinary sanctions imposed on persons deprived of their liberty[1] as well as giving the opportunity to complain against the incidents that occur during the execution of the punishment.

If in the legislation on the execution of custodial sentences prior the change of the political regime of 1989, constituted by Law no.23/1969, the persons deprived of liberty only had the possibility of appealing to the court for settling complaints against the incidents during the execution of sentences, the rapid evolution of the Romanian society in the post-1990 period, the application and consolidation of the democratic principles, the prefigured accession to the European Union, the many international and European regulations in the domain and, last but not least, the case law of the European Court of Human Rights[2] has shown the Romanian legislative anachronism in matters of execution of of custodial sentences and its incompatibility with the degree of European development and civilization, so that the reformulation of the rules for their adaptation to the evolution of fundamental human rights become a continuous process[3].

The new pre-accession legislation adopted in the European Union in 2006[4] on the execution of sentences and custodial measures has introduced a direct judicial control over the problems arising during the execution, through a new institution, the institution of the delegated judge with the execution of the custodial sentences, as an independent, impartial authority and guarantor of respect the legality at the place of detention. In the light of the new provisions, the

* PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: nsimona51@yahoo.com)

[1] According to art.2 letter d of the Government Decision No. 157 / March, 10th 2016 for the approval of the Regulation implementing Law no.254 / 2013 on the execution of sentences and deprivation of liberty ordered by the court during the criminal trial , published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 271 of April 11th, 2016, persons deprived of their liberty are, as the case may be, detained persons, arrested at home, preventive arrest, interned, convicted.

[2] Explanatory memorandum to the bill on the execution of sentences, p.5, available on http://old.just.ro/LinkClick.aspx?fileticket=1xkO3Xk6Bm4%3D&tabid=93, consulted on 11.24.2017

[3] I. Chiș, A.B. Chiș, The execution of penal sentences , Universul Juridic Publishing House , Bucharest, 2015, p.361.

[4] The Law no. 275/2006 concerning the execution of penalties and measures disposed by the judicial entities during the penal procedures, published in The Official Gazette no. 627 of 20th of July 2006;

delegated judge with the execution of custodial sentences was granted broad prerogatives for the fair resolution of the petitions and complaints made by the convicted persons, being able to make spot checks in places of detention, hear any person, to make checks in the penitentiary records, etc.

The extensive reform of the criminal law and the criminal proceedings have generated a change of optics in criminal law enforcement as a result of the constant practice of the European Court of Human Rights in relation to the lawfulness of the execution of custodial sentences while respecting human dignity and prohibiting discrimination in the execution of sentences[5].

Law no.254 of July 19, 2013, on the execution of sentences and detention measures ordered by the court during the criminal trial, which entered into force on February 1st, 2014, with the Law no.286/2009 on the Criminal Code, as subsequently amended and supplemented, and Law no. 135/2010 on the Criminal Procedure Code, expressed firmly the option of the Romanian legislator to continue exercising the same direct control of how people minor or major, are deprived, according to the law, of their freedom, regardless of the place of detention: prisons, centers of detention and pre- trial arrest, pre-trial detention centers, educational centers, detention centers for minors.

In the exercise of its judicial powers, the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty, as the institution of the delegate judge has been renamed[6], handles complaints of detained persons, persons under pre-trial arrest or interned people[7].

The main judicial administrative duties of the judge of surveillance of imprisonment provided for in art. 9, paragraph. (2) of Law 254/2013, as follows[8]:

a) handles complaints of prisoners against any breach of the their rights provided by this law;
b) handles complaints regarding the establishment and changing of regimes for enforcement and educational measures involving deprivation of liberty;
c) resolve complaints from prisoners regarding disciplinary sanctions.

In order to strengthen the role and establish the legal nature of the activity of the judge of deprivation of liberty, the Superior Council of Magistracy has issued a regulation for the approval of the organization of the activity of the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty (Decision No. 89/2014) entered into force on February, 1st,2014, which includes the same duties provided by the Law No.254/2013, art.9 paragraph 2.

The judicial administrative duties are terminated by an administrative-jurisdictional act called closing. Against the conclusion, the convicted person and/or the prison administration can make an appeal to the court in whose jurisdiction is located the prison.

The law on the execution of sentences and custodial measures does not provide a meaning for the term of "complaint" but by analogy with the provisions art.289 paragraph 1 of Criminal Procedure Code, which defines the complaint as being a notification made by the individual (...) relating to an injury caused to him, taking into account the wording and the content of the complaint, we can conclude that the complaint made by the detainees is an administrative-judicial legal instrument by means of which a detained person unhappy with the taking of measures by the administration of the place of detention against him regarding the establishment or modification of the regime for enforcement, the disciplinary sanctions and exercise of their rights provided by this law, reports these aspects or circumstances to the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty requesting, as appropriate, to cancel the Commission decision on the establishment and change of enforcement and educational measures involving deprivation of liberty and the Commission decision on the application of disciplinary sanctions through which such measures were ordered or restoring the exercise of violated or suspended rights.

1. The legal nature.

The complaint of prisoners against incidents occurred during the execution of sentences and custodial measures is an specific institution of penal executional law, with administrative-jurisdictional nature, as it was conferred by Superior Council of Magistracy No.89/01/23/2014 for the approval of the organization of the activity of the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty (art.9 and 13 paragraph 3).

The complaint, the referral is in the same time a request addressed to the judge to analyze the factual situation that the petitioner puts forward in the complaint, requesting him to cancel all actions undertaken against him by the administration of of prison or to restore the violated right.

In agreeming with art.9, paragraph 3 of Law no.254/2013 on the execution of sentences and custodial measures ordered by the court during the

[5] Explanatory memorandum to the bill on the execution of sentences p.1, available on: http://old.just.ro/LinkClick.aspx?fileticket=1xkO3Xk6Bm4%3D&tabid=93

[6] Law 254/2013 chose to change the name of the institution of the delegated judge in the instituition of judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty because he considered that as a better expression of the legal nature of the activity of the judge performing his activity in the penitentiary and at the same time removes the confusions generated by the name by "delegated judge", which would mean a delegation within the meaning of article 57 of Law no.303 / 2004, as amended, on the status of magistrates criminal trial, the main administrative-judicial duties of the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty (solving the complaints regarding the establishment and changing of regimes for enforcement and educational measures involving deprivation of liberty; solving the complaints from prisoners regarding disciplinary sanctions, solving the complaints of prisoners on exercise of the rights provided by this law) is exercised within the special procedures prescribed by law and are terminated by an administrative-jurisdictional act called closing. The closing, as an administrative act with jurisdictional nature[9], is a unilateral, binding and enforceable legal act issued by an administrative body under the state power through wich the provisions of the law or a normative act subordinated to the law are implemented.

[7] Explanatory memorandum to the bill on the execution of sentences, p.3, available on: http://old.just.ro/LinkClick.aspx?fileticket=1xkO3Xk6Bm4%3D&tabid=93

[8] The Government Decision No.157/2016

As a referral, the complaint made by the prisoners against incidents occurred during the execution of sentences and the prior complaint shall not be confused, the last one being a specific institution of the criminal procedural law, meaning a condition of punishment and procedure[10]. Also, we shall not confused the complaint of prisoners with the denunciation which, accordind of Criminal Procedure Code, art.290, represent reporting a person or group of persons to public authorities about the commission of a criminal offence.

The denunciation, just like the complain, is a voluntary referral, which can be done by any aggrieved person without any legal obligation to do so[11].

2. The meaning of the complaint term.

From the analysis of the definition of the complaint we can distinguish several meanings but also characters:

1. The complaint is an act, meaning:

a) a document, a material support, drawn up from unhappy person which informs the judge of surveillance about certain incidents or the actions undertaken against him by the administration of the detention place, requesting to reconsider the factual situation and to handing down a decision ordering the cancellation of those measures (eg. sanctions) or replacing the applied measure with a easier one, to order the change of the enforcement regime in a less severe one, or to order the restoration of the violated or suspended rights.

b) a legal instrument, a procedural means by which the person deprived of fredom unhappy of applied measure requires the judge of surveillance ofdeprivation of liberty to exercise judicial control of how the prison administration applies the measures and legal provisions.

c) a notification act to the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty on the issues complained about, leading to the initiation of an administrative-judicial procedure- registering the complaints in the records with an administrative-judicial character of the Bureau of the judge, forming the file, hearing of the petitioner, of the other convicted person or working in prison system, requesting information, documents or points of view from the administration of the detention, making the spot checks, requesting a rogatory hearing committee for detainees in other places of detention, as appropriate. If the issues shown at the hearing can be the subject of a complaint with administrativ- judicial nature, the request for a audience represent a notification act[12].

2. The characters of the complaint

From the analysis of the meanings of the term, as well as from the content of art.9 and art. 47 of the Decision No.89/2014 of the Superior Council of Magistracy for the approval of the organization of the activity of the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty, it follows that the complaint has a dual character, namely

a) administrative character, because it refers to a unilateral, binding and executory act issued by an administrative body under the state power is a unilateral, binding and enforceable legal act issued by an administrative body under the state power through wich the provisions of the law or a normative act subordinated to the law are implemented[13], in this case issues concerning the execution punishments phase, distinct of the criminal trial, the law regarding the execution of penalties being the framework law of this phase.

b) judicial character, because the referral is addressed to an authorized body, which carries out a judicial activity (judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty) who has the obligation, in the exercise of the duties provided by law, to resolve the dispute, in this case the the petitioner's complaint.

After the managing of evidence[14], the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty shall prepare a reasoned conclusion that resolves the complaint. The closing represents the rendered outcome, the defense of the parties, according to the procedure provided by the law, with the aim of ensuring equal treatment of the parties before the body with administrative-judicial powers.

In the event of unlawfulness or groundlessness, the conclusion may be canceled or reformed only by the

[9] http://legeaz.net/dictionar-juridic/act-administrativ

[10] I. Neagu, M. Damaschin, Criminal Procedure Treaty. The special part, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, p.55

[11] idem, p.57

[12] Decision No.89/2014 of the Superior Council of Magistracy for the approval of the organization of the activity of the judge of surveillance of the deprivation of liberty, art.47

[13] http://legeaz.net/dictionar-juridic/act-administrativ

[14] ibidem, art.26

competent court, otherwise it becomes executory by the mere fact of giving up to appeal[15]. The executory effect of closing oblige the parties, both detainees or the administration of the place of detention to obey the legal provision.

3. The conditions of the complaint.

3.1. Form condition.

3.1.1. Written form.

The persons deprived of their liberty must fill a written complaint to the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty to be able to be registered by the clerk and solved by the judge, even if they have been made orally before the judge, at the audience held at the place of detention or in the refusal of nourishment procedure. If the reported matters have not been recorded in writing, the judge of surveillance will record the statement in writing, the request for the audience or the statement given in the refusal of nourishment procedure constitute referrals, followed by the procedure for the subject of the referral[16]. The complaints are forwarded to the Bureau of the judge of surveillance by the prison authorities through the secretariat, or handed by detainees personally to the judge, on the detention section, during the audiences program.

3.1.2. Person identification data.

In order for the complaint to be considered a legal means of referral[17] it must include: the identification data of the petitioner (first and last name, parents' names, personal numeric code[18], eventually).

3.1.3. The subject of the case.

Represent the description of the factual situation which caused the person's discontent, as well as its request (eg.of establishing and changing of regimes for enforcement, of restoration the exercise of violated or suspended rights, of canceling disciplinary sanctions).

In the complaint, the complainant may indicate the evidence he or she is supporting in support of, for example, the name of the witnesses that he requests to be heard by the judge in support of innocence or attach supporting documents.

3.2. The substantive conditions of the complaint.

3.2.1.The complaint is made personally or by the legal representative.

According to art.51, regarding the right to petition, citizens have the right to to address public authorities through petitions formulated only on behalf of the signatories. The exercise of the right of petition is exempt from the tax. Public authorities have the obligation to respond to petitions within the terms and conditions established by law.

The right of a person deprived of freedom to lodge a complaint against incidents duringduring the execution of punishment is an absolute, personal, indivisible and non-transferable right, and may be exercised in his own name only by such persons or by a lawyer who has to prove its quality by empowering the lawyer and the document attesting the quality of lawyer[19].

Although Law no.254/ 2013 or the Regulations for the approval of the organization of the activity of the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty, as well as the implementation of Law no.254/2013 (The Government Decision No.157/2016, art.128, assurance of the right to legal assistance, art.129, the right to petition) does not expressly mention the above alternative, it should be regarded as a possibility in connection with the provisions of Article 62 paragraph 2 of Law no. 254/2013 regarding the assurance of the exercise of the right to legal assistance stipulating that convicted persons may consult with lawyers elected by them in any matter of law deduced from administrative or judicial proceedings, which means that even in the case of incidents during the execution of punishment, the lawyer may file such a complaint on behalf of the client he represents.

And the minors interned in detention centres enjoy the same legal treatment, since both the law on the execution of custodial sentences and the implementing regulation does not distinguish between the right of the major person and the underage individual to lodge a complaint against the incidents occurred during the execution of the sentence and custodial measures or the manner in which the judge of surveillance has been notified.

Similarly, even if the unhappy person quit the case, the express manifestation of the will of the person can be ascertained directly by the judge of surveillance before whom he gives the renunciation declaration or by a document drawn up by the legal representative adressed by postal services, to the judge of surveillance in the conditions shown.

Although the waiving of the complaint is an express manifestation of will and, although the hearing of the person by the judge of surveillance seems to be useless, we consider that it is necessary because we have to consider the hypothesis in which another person, without the petitioner's knowledge or with his knowledge taking advantage of the fact that the latter is non-schooling person, formulates this request for renunciation which he submits to the judge of surveillance through the postal services or through the

[15] http://legea.net/dictionar-juridic/act jurisdictional

[16] ibidem, art.47

[17] I.Neagu, M. Damaschin, op.cit., p.55

[18] the simple indication of first name and name is not sufficient as it may cause confusion with another person with the same first name or name or with several first name

[19] The Government Decision nr.157/2016 for the approval of the Regulation implementing Law no.254 / 2013 on the execution of sentences and deprivation of liberty ordered by the court during the criminal trial, art.128 al.1, Ensuring the exercise of the right to legal aid

administration of the place of detention, the complaint becoming devoid of effects.

3.2.2. The complaint must be signed by the petitioner or by the legal representative. Another essential, substantive complaint is that of acquiring its content by the petitioner or by the legal representative by attributing the signature.

Lack of signature is a cause of nullity, but the latter may be covered by signing the complaint by the petitioner in front of judge of surveillanceas as result of the appropriation of its content, by the statement given for this purpose or taken through the rogatory commission.

Regarding the nullity of the complaint, the judge of surveillance will pronounce a closing which finds that the complaint is devoid effects.

3.2.3. The deadline until the complaint can be filed.

The term is the timeframe in which the person concerned has to do or produce something or, on the contrary, he is not allowed to do or to produce something. By its nature, the term until the complaint against the incidents occurred during the execution can be filed is a legal one, as established by the law no. 254/2013, but also a preremptory[20] one (imperiative, crucial, conclusive) in the course of which certain acts must be carried out. The non-fulfillment of the act before time expired leads to the cancellation of the exercise of the respective right resulting in the rejection of the complaint as delayed.

On this line, the deadline for filling by the inmates the complaint against of administrative decision, as the one of the committee for establishing or modifying the regime of enforcement (art.40 paragraph11 of Law no.254/2013) or enforcement of a disciplinary sanction (art.104 paragraph 1 of Law no.254/2013) is within three days of delivery thereof and ten days regarding the respecting of the rights of the convicted persons (art.56 paragraph 2 of Law no.254/2013).

The lack of a definite date in the complaint is not a cause of nullity. At the time to receiving of the complaint, the clerk shall assign a definite date, unless is no other definite date set by the judge of surveillance or if there is no mention made by theprison administration.

The clear date set out in this way will constitute the benchmark for the complaint being assessed as lawful or as late.

A situation often encountered in practice is the forwarding of these complaints to an incompetent body, than to the judge of surveillance who pronounced the conclusion, as the competent institution to deal with the complaints of persons deprived of their liberty (for example the court or to another oversight judge from a different penitenciary).

Thus, if an act that had to be done within a certain period was communicated, transmitted, by ignorance or by a manifest error of the sender, before the expiration of the term, to a judicial body that is not competent, it is considered to have been filed in term, even if the act reaches the competent judicial body after the expiry of the fixed term[21].

3.2.4. The complaint must be related to the incidents that occur during the execution of sentences and custodial measures.

The execution of sentences and custodial measures ordered by the court on modern principles places at the core of its principles and objectives the person deprived of liberty, as a holder of a separate legal status consisting of all subjective rights, legitimate interests and correlative obligations, as well as all legal means through to whom the position of these persons is defended in the execution of the punishment (the deprivation of liberty)[22], because the recognition and respect of human rights and freedoms is the very essence of a democratic society.

Ensuring the safe environment one at the place of detention, supervising and verifying the lawfulness in execution of punishment and the custodial measures are subject to the judicial control exercised by the institution of the judge of the surveillance of imprisonment. Although the latter does not exercise any powers other than those with which it has been legally and constitutionally invested, the judicial control is not an absolute one, the jurisdiction of the supervisor is limited to the certain situations provided by the law, such as rewards, selection, employment, educational programs, etc.

The main judicial administrative duties of the judge of surveillance of imprisonment provided by Law No.254/2013, as follows:

a) solve the inmates complaints regarding the establishment and changing of regimes for enforcement and educational measures involving deprivation of liberty,
b) solve the inmates complaints on exercise of the rights provided by this law;
c) solve the inmates complaints regarding disciplinary sanctions.

[20] I. Neagu, M. Damaschin, op.citată, p.709.
[21] M. Udroiu, Criminal procedure, The General part, The new criminal procedure code, p.646, Ed.CH Beck, București, 2014
[22] University of European Studies of Moldova, Vasile Ceban, Course Notes of Penal Executional Law (cycle I), p.12, Chișinău,2013,disponibil pe http://www.usem.md/uploads/files/Note_de_curs_drept_ciclul_1/060_-_Penal executional law.pdf

4. Exception of inadmissibility in the procedure for dealing with complaints and complaints made by persons deprived of their liberty against measures ordered by the administration of the place of detention. Situations of inadmissibility.

4.1. The powers of the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty .

Measures concerning the exercise of rights, the application of disciplinary sanctions as a result of disciplinary misconduct, with the consequence of changing the enforcement regime, are incidents arising during the execution of punishment, strictley defined by law, which fall within the functional competence of the judge for the supervision of the deprivation of freedom and which it can order by concluding. The judge of surveillance will be able to dispose one of the following solutions[23]:

a) allows the complaint;
b) rejects the complaint if it is unfounded, late or inadmissible and / or devoid of purpose;
c) notes the withdrawal of the complaint.

Consequently, in order to decide the solutions in points (a) and (b), the judge of surveillance will first examine the complaint as to the admissibility conditions because, if the issues raised goes beyond the framework of he's legal competence, the analyzing of the complaint's reasons becomes useless.

4.2. Situation of inadmissibility.

The imprisonment brings with it a restriction of the fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual. The penitentiary environment, institutionalized life does not mean prohibiting the exercise of all fundamental human rights but limits them, while imposing a series of rights and obligations specific to the place of detention. No one is allowed to restrict these rights. The restriction of rights can only be done by law or by the Constitution of Romania.

This leads the prisoners to amplify the instinct to protect the rights granted, using (even abusively) the legal means and institutionals provided by law. This is so, in the desire not to be directly controlled by rebellion over the rules and regulations considered to be excessively rigorous and which, in their opinion, violates their rights, most of the time by the desire to "overcome the system" and obtain substantive material compensation or at the instigation of other persons, the persons deprived of their liberty forward complaint to the judge of surveillance against any incidents considered by them as the cause of the injustice suffered or against the behavior of the prison staff who, many times, accuse them of "abusive behavior".According to functional competence, the judge of surveillance can't turn himself into a ”legal provision launcher” for any situation, such that some of the complaints will be rejected as inadmissible ones. Of the many situations that go beyond the jurisdiction of the judge of surveillance, most of the cases of inadmissibility encountered in practice concern:

a) the deduction from punishment of a period executed under preventive arrest - according to Law 254/2013, the competence of the judge of surveillance does not include the resolution of such a complaint, the deduction of a period executed in preventive custody constituting an incident in the execution of the punishment, the exclusive competence of the court in whose jurisdiction is located the prison.
b) the recognition of earned days during detention by inmates as a result of graduating from school courses, qualification courses, granting rewards, school credits - according to art. 56 para. 2 of the Law no. 254/2013 on the execution of sentences and custodial measures ordered by the court during the criminal trial, against any breach of rights, the convicted person may lodge a complaint to the judge of surveillance within 10 days of becoming aware of the breach.

The rights of persons deprived of their liberty are those provided by art. 58-80 of Law 254/2013, so the complaints concerning the granting of the rewards do not fall within the category of the rights provided by the law of execution for whose non observance the detainees can address the supervising judge. The way of granting the rewards of the persons deprived of their liberty is providing by the Decision no.443/ 24.05.2016 of the General Director of the National Administration of Penitentiaries approving the working procedure for granting the rewards[24].

c) the recognition of the earned days during detention by the inmates that demonstrated a good behaviour and from their work in penitentiaries of another states. In application of Article 17 of European Council Framework Decision 2008/909 / JHA of November, 27th, 2008 on the application of the principle of mutual recognition to judgments in criminal matters, imposing custodial sentences or measures involving deprivation of liberty for the purpose of their enforcement in the European Union and art.144 par.(1) of the Law no. 302/2004, republished, as subsequently amended and supplemented, establishes that after the transfer of the person convicted by the foreign judicial authorities, in order to continue the punishment execution in Romania, the period of punishment deemed to be executed by the sentencing state on the basis of performed work and good conduct, granted as a benefit in favor of the convicted person, by the foreign judicial authority, must not be deducted from the punishment executed in d) the inappropriate behavior of surveillance staff. The conduct of a criminal investigation is not within the competence of the judge of surveillance of imprisonment, so he can not order the commencement of a criminal prosecution. The unhappy person may directly notify the criminal investigation bodies.

[23] Law No.254/2013, art.39 paragraph.6, art.40 paragraph 13, art.56 paragraph 6, art.104 paragraph.7
[24] Published in Official Gazzette of Romania, Part I, No.427/June, 27th, 2016

Romania[25].

e) changing of regimes for enforcement and educational measures involving deprivation of liberty on petitioner demand. According to art.40 of the Law no.254 / 2013, the change of the execution regime is made only upon the fulfillment of the term of analysis of the legal situation established by the commission for individualization of the execution regimes. This legal provision amended the old provisions contained in the Law no. 275/2006 and the Law no. 83/2010 to amending Law no. 275/2006 which allowing the change, at the request of the detainee, of the regimes for enforcement and the educational measures involving deprivation of liberty, leaving the judge the assessment in the case of complaints regarding the establishment and change of those. The amendment was also necessary because the judge of surveillance of imprisonement were also assaulted by the requests made before the deadline set by the commission. On the other hand, it will not be possible to be accepted the requests to change the execution regime from a lower one to a higher one, regardless of the reason for this request, since the system of execution of custodial sentences in Romania is progressive and regressive, such a change of regime being possible only in the case of committing a disciplinary misconduct and the commission for the individualization of the regimes takes such a measure.

f) the transfer decisions in another penitentiary - the transfer of the persons deprived of their liberty to another penitentiary is made by the decision of the General Director of the National Administration of Penitentiaries, according to art.45 of Law no. 254/2013 and art.108 of the Government Decision no.157/March, 10th, 2016 to implementing the Law no. 254/2013, an institution with legal personality hierarchically located above all penitentiaries and whose measures can not be controlled by the prison judges in penitentiaries. The choice of the place of execution of the custodial sentences does not represent a right of the persons deprived of their liberty, as it is not foreseen among the rights granted by Law no. 254/2013. In this respect, in the reasoning of the Serce vs. Romania case (Application No. 35049/08), the European Court ofHuman Rights, at paragraph 51, states that the European Convention on Human Rights does not grant prisoners the right to choose the place of detention, that separation and the distance from their family are an inevitable consequence of their detention following the exercise by the Romanian state of its prerogatives in the field of criminal sanctions[26] .

g) the general provisions on work carried out in detention facilities or on educational and cultural activities, training courses or retraining. Although the marginal name of art.78 of the Law no.254 / 2013 is the Right to Work, it is clear from the wording of the law that the work carried out on detention places is only a vocation, not a right, since the work done by the persons deprived of liberty has a special legal nature, being not part of the category of rights provided by law in their favor at art.56-80 of Law 254. Selection criteria for work is regulated by Decision No. 500165 / September, 25th, 2017of the General Director of the National Administration of Penitentiaries[27].

As regards the inclusion of persons deprived of their liberty in the activities recommended by the Personal Educational and Therapy Evaluation and Intervention Plan, this is done taking into account the identified needs, the regime of enforcement of the custodial sentence and the moment of the sentence serving route.

h) deleting some information from the individual file of prisoners. Law no.254/2013 does not provide for the person deprived of liberty to lodge a complaint against other acts issued as a result of pre-existing situations of addmission to prison (such as re-offending, belonging to organized crime groups, general or international pursuit, etc.). These statements are contained in the individual file accompanying the criminal record of the person deprived of their liberty at the Detainees Record Service[28].

i) the distribution of detainees to detention rooms or the transfer to other detention rooms. Art.48 of the Law no.254 / 2013 and art.111 of the Government Decision no.167 / 2016 regarding the minimum binding rules on conditions for accommodation of sentenced persons, as well as Article 2 of the Order of the Minister of Justice no.2772/C/October, 17th, 2017 entitled The Minimum , binding rules regarding the conditions for accomodation persons deprived of their

[25] See widely the Decision No.15/2015 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice on the examination of the appeal filed by the Timişoara Court of Appeal in file no.6.638 /101/2014, requesting a preliminary ruling on the principle dismissal of a matter of law in criminal matters,published in Official Gazzette, First Part, no.455/June, 24th, 2015.

[26] See widely The Judgment of the European Court of Human Rights of June, 30th, 2015, Serce vs. Romania case, https://www.csm1909.ro/csm/linkuri/22_04_2016__80250_ro.doc

[27] Published in Official Gazzette, Part I, No.904 bis/November, 17th, 2017

[28] the Order of the Minister of Justice no.432/C/on february 2nd, 2010, art.9 letter g, published in Official Gazzette of Romania, Part I, nr.157 bis on March, 11th, 2010 liberty[29], stipulate that the National Administration of Penitentiaries takes all necessary measures for the progressive increase of the number of individual accommodation rooms.

The persons deprived of liberty are accommodated individually or in common. The accommodation of the persons deprived of their liberty in the detention rooms or the transfer to other rooms is done according to the criteria established by the Internal Order of Penitentiaries.

According to art.81 letter g of the Law no. 254/2013, the convicted persons have the obligation to respect the assignment on the detention chambers, noncompliance to this obligation constitutes a very serious disciplinary offense.

j) the remainder of the punishment to be executed as a result of the application of Law no. 169/2017. According to art.55 paragraph 1 of the Law no.169/2017 of the compensatory appeal[30], the calculation of the punishment actually executed is considered, irrespective of the punishment execution regime, as a compensatory measure, and the execution of the punishment under inappropriate conditions, for each period of 30 days executed in improper conditions, even if they are not consecutive, 6 days of the punishment shall be additionally executed.

It follows that, the Detainees Record Service, to the calculation of the remainder of custodial sentence, applies an algorithm based on the duration of the sentence, the period of execution in improper conditions, so that some persons deprived of liberty acquired the benefit, the vocation to request release before the deadline, and others will benefit earlier from the conditional release. Since the conditional release is not a right of the persons deprived of their liberty, the complaints lodged to the judge of surveillance to recalculate the period executed under inappropriate conditions have been rejected as inadmissible. They can only be the subject of a challenge to execution before court.

k) the complaints against the inappropriate conditions of the detention rooms in the courts or of the vehicles for the transport of detainees. Although the right to the execution of the punishment under proper conditions is an absolute right, the transport to and from the courts, as well as temporary accommodation in the rooms specially arranged in these institutions, has been often a good opportunity to complain against conditions considered by the persons deprived of their liberty being as inadequate (inadequate ventilation, overcrowding, lack of privacy, transport in a special type vehicles with no seat belts, etc.). Although the time spent in transport vehicles to the courts and actually in court is relatively short, for several hours, these people have never proved thatthey have suffered any health damage from that cause. On the other hand, both specially designated detention rooms in court and special transport vehicles are built according to certain standards, technical specifications, these destinations, they can not be modified in order to provide increased comfort to the passengers during transport or during stay in court, which is why these complaints were rejected as inadmissible.

Conclusions

The execution of the of sentences and the measures ordered by judicial bodies on modern, humanistic principles allows people in this situation to defend their rights and interests against any form of abuse. The right to petition is a constitutional right that can not be restricted by any law, so that individuals deprived of their liberty can submit complaints to the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty as an independent and impartial authority legally and constitutionally invested.

The complaint is the legal means by which these persons manifest their dissatisfaction, by virtue of their right to petition, and in order to be register in the records, they must meet the substantive and formal conditions outlined in this study. It also has to fulfill another (unwritten) condition, namely the exercise of the right in good faith, according to its purpose, that of the defense of rights and interests, and not in bad faith, for feelings of revolt against regulations or to the administration of the place of detention. Unfortunately, such situations are a reality, and individuals deprived of liberty making such complaints openly declare that, as long as the administration of the place of detention will take measures deemed unjustified, they will also make various complaints to the judge of the surveillance of deprivation of liberty against the administration

In order to prevent and limit such situations, we hope for a change of the criminal law enforcement which will include among of disciplinary offence and the abuse of rights consisting in exercising the right to petition in bad faith.

References

- Ceban, Vasile, University of European Studies of Moldova, , Course Notes of Penal Executional Law (cycle I), p.12,Kishinev,2013, available on http://www.usem.md/uploads/files/Note_de_curs_drept _ ciclul_1 /060_-_Penal executional law.pdf

[29] the Order of the Minister of Justice no.2772/C/October, 17th, 2017, published in Official Gazzette of Romania, Part I, no.822/October, 18th, 2017.

[30] Published in Official Gazzette, Part I, no.571of July, 18th, 2017.

- Chiş, Ioan, Chiş, Alexandru Bogdan, The execution of penal sentences , Universul Juridic Publishing House , Bucharest, 2015
- Decision no.443/ 24.05.2016 of the General Director of the National Administration of Penitentiaries approving the working procedure for granting the rewards
- Decision No.15/2015 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice
- Decision No.89/2014 of the Superior Council of Magistracy for the approval of the organization of the activity of the judge of surveillance of the deprivation of liberty, published in Official Gazzette, Part I,. no.77/31.01.2014
- The Government Decision nr.157/2016 for the approval of the Regulation implementing Law no.254 / 2013 on the execution of sentences and deprivation of liberty ordered by the court during the criminal trial
- The Judgment of the European Court of Human Rights of June, 30th, 2015, Serce vs. Romania case, https://www.csm1909.ro/csm/linkuri/22_04_2016__80250_ro.doc
- http://legeaz.net/dictionar-juridic/act-administrativ
- https://legeaz.net/dictionar-juridic/act-jurisdicitonal
- Law no.169/14.07.2017
- The Law no. 275/2006 concerning the execution of penalties and measures disposed by the judicial entities during the penal procedures, published in The Official Gazette no. 627 of 20th of July 2006
- Legea nr.303/2004, on the Status of Judges and Prosecutors, republished, with subsequent amendments and completions, including those brought by OUG nr.83/12.12.2014,
- Neagu, Ion, Damaschin, Mircea, Criminal Procedure Treaty. The special part, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015
- Draft Law 254/2013 , available on http://old.just.ro/LinkClick.aspx?fileticket=1xkO3Xk6Bm4%3D&tabid=93
- The Order of Minister of Justice no.432/C/5.02.2010
- The Order of Minister of Justice no.2772/C/18.10.2017
- Udroiu, Mihail, Criminal Procedure, General Part, New Criminal Procedute Code, Universul Juridic, Publishing House, 2014

ASPECTS CONCERNING THE PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE IN THE LIGHT OF THE CASE LAW OF THE EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Rodica Aida POPA*

Abstract

The presumption of innocence represents a constant principle of law, becoming in our modern era a basic principle of all law systems.

In Romania, the presumption of innocence is regulated by the Romanian Constitution, as revised, but at the same time by the Criminal Procedure Code that came into effect on 1st February 2014. The application of this principle is closely connected with other procedural guarantees of the suspect and/or defendant during the penal trial, this presumption being expressly given efficiency by judicial bodies under the scope of majority of court orders.

The European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms addresses effectively the presumption of innocence in the dispositions of Art. 6 § 2, and the jurisprudence of the European Court has also established some specific criteria in its application.

Our study aims to make a brief analysis of the jurisprudence of the European Human Rights Court on the presumption of innocence, with respect to a number of causes, regarding Romania but also other member states of the Council of Europe and towards national standards involved by its regulation.

The applicability of the standards established by the European Court of Human Rights concerning this presumption confers to national courts from Romania the possibility to insure effectiveness to the national norm, by completing it, which ensures full compliance of all the guarantees a defendant may benefit from during criminal trials.

We consider that the national norm on presumption of innocence stipulated by art 4 of Criminal Procedure code may be modified as well in the light of the agreement given by the European Court in the application of the provisions of art 6 § 2 from the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.

Keywords: presumption of innocence, European Court case law, enforcement criteria, meaning of words, national standard.

Introduction

The concept of human rights has a broad scope in national Romanian case law relative to each specialisation matter and institutions thereof. Within the meaning of criminal procedure law, the concept of human rights becomes effective, both from the viewpoint of substantive law, and the viewpoint of procedure law. For the purpose of this study, the notion of the presumption of innocence shall be tackled as a criminal proceedings principle, on the whole, both during criminal investigations, and first instance and appeal proceedings, as well as from the point of view of human rights, as regulated by the provisions of Article 6 § 2 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. The importance of a national and European two-dimensional approach of the presumption of innocence allows us to understand the common aspects of regulation and enforcement, along with the distinct aspects, as the two approaches do not overlap — the conventional regulation perspective is considerably broader than the national scope. In the matter of the presumption of innocence within our study, we intend to examine the regulatory framework, and its implications, in the scope of criminal procedure law, the factual criteria, and the manner in which the approach of this presumption under the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms completes the scope of national rule interpretation, with the hard instruments of the arguments of the European Court of Human Rights concerning this presumption, in relation to the national rules that regulate the said presumption. We believe that this study, including solid practical aspects, shall help clarify certain matters regarding the enforcement of the provisions of Article 6 § 2 of the Convention in case investigation and proceedings, as well as provide the opportunity to postulate within the doctrine the manner in which the presumption of innocence is interpreted and enforced as a principle of a criminal trial.

Paper Content

Within the current Criminal Procedure Code, which entered into force on 1 February 2014, the presumption of innocence is regulated in Article 4[1]. As can be observed from the perspective of the regulatory technique used, the legislator expressly stated the time point until an individual can enjoy presuming themselves and being presumed innocent, that is, their guilt is established by a final judgement. Whereas, in the Romanian law system, the appeal — the ordinary legal remedy — is the only court to sanction as final, in criminal matters, the resolution ordered in the court of first instance, i.e., concerning the existence or non-existence of the criminal facts that the persons allegedly committed, based on the evidence submitted during the criminal investigation, found as legal during the pre-trial chamber procedure, the evidence filed during the criminal investigation, in the court of first instance, as well as the evidence submitted during the appeal, upon a new judgement, pending a decision whether to hold the defendant on trial liable or not.

* Lecturer, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Judge, The High Court of Cassation and Justice, Criminal Chamber (e-mail: aidap@scj.ro).

[1] Article 4 The presumption of innocence. (1) Everyone shall be presumed innocent until being found guilty by a final criminal judgement. (2) Following the submission of all the evidence, any doubt in the formulation of the opinion of judicial bodies shall be interpreted to the favour of the suspect, or the defendant.

In the second paragraph of the aforementioned rule, as novelty, the principle of in dubio pro reo is stated, to the extent that any doubt in formulating the opinion of the judicial bodies shall be interpreted to the favour of the suspect or the defendant[2].

The presumption of innocence is a relative presumption that can be overturned by solid evidence by judicial bodies.

It has been stated in the doctrine[3] that the presumption of innocence is more than a tenet, rather regarded as a fundamental human right that, in one opinion, falls within the category of substantial rights, concerning anyone, as enforceable erga omnes, not only to judicial bodies[4], and, in another opinion, relates to a procedural right as, both under constitutional rule and criminal procedure rule, the notion of criminal judgement is utilised, leading to the conclusion that the presumption of innocence operates solely when a person is charged with committing a criminal offence[5].

The Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms enshrines within Article 6 § 2 that 'Everyone charged with a criminal offence shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law'. Based on the manner of regulation, the presumption of innocence refers to a defendant in relation to the domestic regulation concerning everyone, the scope being broader in domestic criminal procedure law, which enabled an extension over witnesses to not self-incriminate, as provided for in Article 118 of the Code of Criminal Procedure[6].

Within the meaning of the European Court of Human Rights, 'accusation on criminal matters' has an autonomous character, and the 'accused' is any person against whom the competent bodies have ordered an action expressing the attribution of the offence to the said person, and which entails important consequences concerning their status, relative to search, arrest, bank account freezing and ordering mandatory domicile on an island[7].

The literature has mentioned that there is a scope for the presumption of innocence where it is enforceable according to the case law of the European Court of Human Rights, but it is not a safeguard of national law, respectively the matter 'assimilated' by the Court to the 'accusation on criminal matters', namely the field of contravention, fiscal crimes and liability to disciplinary action in certain situations[8].

We shall hereinafter present several significant cases in the case law of the European Court of Human Rights wherein infringement or non-infringement of Article 6 § 2 of the Convention was found.

Thus, in the case of Peltereau-Villeneuve v. Switzerland (case No. 60101/09 of 28 October 2014, found final on 28 January 2015) infringement of Article 6 § 2 of the Convention (ss. 30-39 of the decision) was found, highlighting that 'The Court notes that the presumption of innocence enshrined by paragraph 2 of Article 6 is among the elements of a fair criminal trial expressly provided for under paragraph 1 (see Deweer v. Belgium, 27 February 1980, § 56, series A No. 35 and Minelli v. Switzerland, 25 March 1983, § 27, series A No. 62). It is found as not assessed for its fair value when an official statement concerning a suspect reflects the feeling that they are guilty while their guilt has not been previously legally established (see, in particular, Allenet de Ribemont, 10 February 1995, § m 35-36; Daktaras v. Lithuania, No. 42095/98, §§ 41-42; ECHR 2000-X; Moullet v. France (Dec.), No. 27521/04, 13 September 2007). The reasons provided by the judge alone are sufficient, even in the absence of a formal finding, even the judge's sole opinion that the interested party is guilty (see Daktaras v. Lithuania, pre-cited § 41). On the other hand, prejudice to the presumption of innocence can emerge not only from a judge or a court, but also from public authorities, or even prosecutors (see Allenet de Ribemont v. France (interpretation), 7 August 1996 § 36, Judgement and

[2] Ion Neagu, Mircea Damaschin, Treaty by procedure criminal, The general part, In the light the new Procedure Criminal Code, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2014, p. 67.

[3] Nicolae Volonciu & Andreea Simona Uzlău team coordinators, The New Procedure Criminal Code, comments, The Second Edition, revised and completed, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2015, p. 15.

[4] Ibidem, p.15, citing S.M. Teodoroiu, I. Teodoroiu, The presumption of innocence and unconstitutionality procedural rules, in Dreptul nr. 5/1995, p. 4, apud. V. Puşcaşu, The presumption of innocence, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010, p. 35.

[5] Ibidem, p. 15.

[6] Article 118. The right of the witness to not self-incriminate. The witness statement provided by a person who, in the same case, prior to the statement, or thereafter, became a suspect or defendant, cannot be used against them. The judicial bodies are under the obligation to mention, upon recording the statement, the previous capacity.

[7] Nicolae Volonciu and Andreea Simona Uzlău team coordinators, The New Procedure Criminal Code, comments, The Second Edition, revised and completed,, Hamangia Publishing House, 2015, p.16, citing cases Tejedor Garcia v. Spain; Abas v. The Netherlands; Padin Gestoso v. Spain; Slezevicius v. Lithuania.

[8] Ibidem, p.17.

decision Vol. 1996-III, and Daktaras v. Lithuania, previously cited § 42). What is equally at stake once criminal proceedings are initiated, is the reputation of the interested party, as well as the manner in which it is perceived by the audience (see Allen v. the United Kingdom (GC) No. 25424/09, § 94, ECHR 2013). In addition, the Court holds that a distinction should be made between the judgements reflecting the feeling that the person in question is guilty, and the ones limited to presenting a state of suspicion. The former type infringes the presumption of innocence, while the latter category has been deemed as in accordance with the spirit of Article 6 of the Convention several times (see Marziano v. Italy, No. 45313/99, § 31, 28 November 2002). Last but not least, there is a fundamental difference between saying that someone is merely suspected of having committed a criminal offence, and an unequivocal judicial statement putting forward, in the absence of a final conviction, that the interested party has committed the offence in question (see Matijasevic v. Serbia, case No. 23037/04, § 48, ECHR 2006-X). As such, the Court should determine whether, in this specific case, the resolution of the criminal proceeding questions the innocence of the applicant while the latter has not been found guilty (see Virabyan v. Armenia, No. 40094/05, § 187, 2 October 2012). In this specific case, the investigation against the applicant was dismissed by the general prosecutor in relation to the prescription of the criminal action. It is true, as the Government emphasises, that, the classification of the offences in question needs to be conducted prior to establishing if they are punishable and prior to the intervention of prescription. The Court also notes that enforcement of Article 116 of 1 CPP/GE neither presumes, nor claims with certainty that the offence was committed (see, a contrario, Virabyan v. Armenia, previously cited, § 191). Thus, the examination of the terms in the Ordinance dated 25 September 2008, as it was drawn up, leaves no doubt concerning the general prosecutor in the matter of the applicant's culpability. In particular, having found that the offences had been established and having examined the conditions of finding the offence, the general prosecutor concluded that 'the criminal proceeding (...) could not have been carried out in relation to the prescription, even if the facts lead to finding that an offence has indeed been committed against the victims'. On the other hand, the use of superfluous phrases aided these findings. Such as using 'impossible manner' when the applicant committed the offence 'at least' against the two alleged victims. There is, therefore, no doubt that the Ordinance dated 25 September 2008, conveys the sense that the general prosecutor, as concerns the guilt of the applicant, failed to merely describe a state of suspicion. Whereas, if classification of the offences in question was required, nothing within the enforceable provisions compelled the general prosecutor to establish the facts. It was only up to the general prosecutor to choose the terms that did not exceed describing a state of suspicion rather than that of guilt of the applicant. The Prosecution and the Federal Court dismissed the applicant's appeals, without disapproving of the body of the Ordinance. Even while reconfirming the statements of the general prosecutor, the Federal Court found that the Ordinance included 'nothing that is not necessary to substantiate the reason for dismissal'. On the other hand, the content of the Ordinance dated 25 September 2008, was carried over by the media and it counted as an important landmark within the canon of the law procedure. If it can be taken into account that the public has an interest in being informed, such interest does not require concluding upon the applicant's guilt status. Whereas, it only led to largely affecting the applicant's reputation, as the order for dismissal was made public (see Allen v. the United Kingdom (GC), previously cited, § 94). These elements were enough for the Court to conclude upon the Reasons of the Order for dismissal dated 25 September 2008, and, primarily, confirm that, both the Prosecution and the Federal Court, breached the principle of the presumption of innocence. Thus, we have found infringement of Article 6 § 2 of the Convention'.

In another case, Neagoe v. Romania (case No. 23319/08 dated 21 July 2015, confirmed as final on 21 October 2015), the European Court of Human Rights found infringement of Article 6 § 2 of the Convention, the presumption of innocence respectively, and, mainly, held that, reporting the settled case law on the matter and that 'what matters is the real meaning of the statements in the case, and not their literal form. Finally, the fact that the statements in question were uttered as an interrogation or doubt is not enough to elude the provisions of Article 6 § 2 of the Convention; otherwise, the presumption of innocence would be void of all effectiveness (Lavents, previously cited, § 126). By applying these principles to the case, the Court holds that, mainly, on 29 February 2008, when the spokesperson of the Galati Court of Appeal made the litigious statement to the media, the guilt of the applicant had not yet been legally established. Finally, the Court of Appeal only issued the final judgement three days later, on 3 March 2008 (paragraphs 14 and 15 above). The Court then holds that judge G.I. intervened, in their official capacity of spokesperson of the Galati Court of Appeal in order to inform the media of the proceedings of the case... The Court also finds that the spokesperson did not resort to a simple communication of information concerning the procedure stages of the case, as they conveyed opinions regarding the guilt of the applicant, suggesting that a conviction would probably be delivered (paragraph 14 above). Finally, the Court holds that the litigious statement prompted the public to believe in the guilt of the applicant, while the Court of Appeal had not yet delivered the judgement in the case. The Court held that the spokesperson used certain terms expressing doubt, such as 'it is likely' and 'I suppose' (paragraph 14 above); on the other hand, the Court believed that this behaviour did not alter the real meaning of the statement (Lavents, previously cited, § 126). The Court holds that, under their official duties, the spokesperson is under the obligation to observe the presumption of innocence, judicial independence, impartiality and objectivity of the justice administration (paragraphs 18 and 19 above). Moreover, the Court emphasises that the spokesperson publicly intervened for the purpose of informing the media as well, (see a contrario, A.L. V. Germany, case No. 72758/01, § 38, 28 April 2005), and that they did not hesitate to spontaneously express a personal opinion (see, a contrario, Gutsanovi, previously cited, §§ 195-196). The Court finds that, in accordance with the duties and particular circumstances of the case, the spokesperson should have shown more caution and reservation as regards the choice of words in order to avoid the overall confusion (Allenet de Ribemont, previously cited, § 41, Gutsanovi, previously cited, § 199, and Khoujine and others v Russia, case No. 13470/02, § 96, 23 October 2008). Finally, the Court emphasises that the offence for which the applicant was ultimately found guilty and sentenced to imprisonment could not erase their initial right to be presumed innocent until legally proven guilty. The Court holds, several times, that Article 6 § 2 of the Convention envisages the entire criminal proceedings 'independently of investigation initiation' (Minelli v. Switzerland, 25 March 1983, § 30, series A, No. 62, and Matijasevic v. Serbia, case No. 23037/04, § 49, ECHR 2006-X). These elements are sufficient for the Court to find that there was an infringement of Article 6 § 2 of the Convention'.

In another case, Bivolaru versus Romania (Application No. 28796/04, judgement of 28 February 2017, confirmed as final on 28 May 2017), the European Court did not find an infringement of Article 6 § 2 of the Convention, mainly noting that 'the Court holds that the applicant reported an interference with their right to be presumed innocent, in relation to the statements of the minister of Administration and Interior, I.R., who stated to the press that they 'found unusual the release of the applicant, on matters of procedure'. In the case, the Court notes that on 5 April 2004, when the minister of Administration and Interior made the litigious statement before the press, the guilt of the applicant was not yet legally established: a criminal investigation was still pending. The Court further holds that the statement in question was not a formal finding of guilt concerning the applicant, and that it referred to the initiation of the proceedings, rather expressing certain doubts concerning the procedure in terms of releasing the interested party from pre-trial arrest. The Court also notes that the applicant was acquitted in the court of first instance and appeal. It was only through the judgement of 14 June 2013, nine years after the statement of I.R., that the High Court of Cassation and Justice sentenced the applicant on matters of criminal law. Thus, it cannot be established that the litigious statement influenced the judge's ruling on the case (see mutatis mutandi, Pullicino v. Malta (dec.), case No. 45441/99, 15 June 2000). Finally, nothing on file leads to considering that the arguments professed by the applicant and the elements in question had influenced the judge's ruling on the first instance, following the statements of I.R. reprinted by the press (Mircea v. Romania, case No. 41250/02, § 75, 29 March 2007). In light of the foregoing, the Court finds that, in this specific case, there was no infringement of Article 6 § 2 of the Convention in relation to the statement made by the minister of Administration and Interior, I.R.'.

Conclusions

The presumption of innocence, as currently regulated by the Code of Criminal Procedure, enables its coherent enforcement within criminal procedures, which can also be complemented by the criteria highlighted in the case law of The European Court of Human Rights, making its effectiveness lead to holding judicial bodies accountable for its warranty throughout the proceedings.

Our study outlines the need to use cautious wording as concerns the content of the presumption of innocence, both in substantiating the orders, when a resolution of not going to trial is issued, within the evidence body, within the sentence delivered in the court of first instance, and upon making the public aware of the resolutions through conferences, statements, or press releases.

As noted, the use of words and phrases should be managed carefully as long as the judicial bodies are carrying out proceedings, not enabling the use of terms that would lead to the finding of an offence for which the defendant is being investigated, but merely a suspicion that can be estimated based on the criteria highlighted in European case law.

We believe that through our study both the main laws, the Code of Criminal Procedure and Article 4 in relation to the case law of The European Court of Human Rights, can be adjusted and improved, and secondary laws, namely, the Superior Council of Magistracy Guidelines on the relationship between the judicial system of Romania and the media, as well as the manner in which procedural actions are substantiated in criminal cases, ordinances, evidence reports, court resolutions delivered by Judges for Rights and Liberties concerning pre-trial measures, precautionary measures, court resolutions delivered by the Pre-Trial Chamber on the applications and exceptions lodged on the matter of the legality of the referral, of the evidence, of the criminal investigation actions and sentences delivered in the court of first instance.

References

- Ion Neagu, Mircea Damaschin, Treaty by procedure criminal, The general part, In the light the new Procedure Criminal Code , Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2014
- Nicolae Volonciu & Andreea Simona Uzlău team coordinators, The New Procedure Criminal Code, comments, The Second Edition, revised and completed, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2015
- Case Peltereau-Villeneuve v. Switzerland on the HUDOC database of the European Court of Human Rights
- Case Neagoe v. Romania on the HUDOC database of the European Court of Human Rights
- Case Bivolaru v. Romania on the HUDOC database of the European Court of Human Rights

THE RIGHTS OF A PERSON DEPRIVED OF LIBERTY OF MAINTAINING FAMILY TIES IN 5 EUROPEAN COUNTRY

Iulia POPESCU[*]

Abstract

A prisoner's life can often be a scary way of life for many people, which is why many individuals don't want to be close to people who have been imprisoned, for obvious reasons.

But the reality is that those who execute prison sentences, sooner or later, are liberated from prison and re-enter en society. Resocialization is a hard and difficult process to be fulfilled, but obviously not impossible.

In trying to redress the behaviours of those who have chosen the wrong way of life, family involvement is essential, especially in terms of maintaining mental health, and in the hope that at the end of the punishment, at the exit of the penitentiary there will be someone waiting there for them.

The present paper aims to analyze the rights of inmates to keep in touch with their families, stipulated in the legislation of 5 European countries, the similarities and possible differences of their approach in the desire to identify the best regulations in this field, with best results in re-socialization.

However, it is known that permanent contact with the family increases the confidence in the person self-esteem so that he / she overcomes the bad moments of life, as well as in the case of the prisoners the existence of more rights to maintain contact with the family is a desire

Keywords: rights, deprived of liberty, European country, family, re-socialization.

1. Introduction

The incarceration is an unusual situation that deprives the person convicted of both freedom and his familiar and family environment.

Sentencing a person to the execution of a custodial sentence is an exceptional measure that is applied by the court in the case of those offenses punishable by life imprisonment or imprisonment.

In most cases, when the situation permits, the law provides rules that have the effect of avoiding the deprivation of liberty, precisely because of the obvious negative effects that the isolation of society can provide on individuals.

However, there are many cases where the enforcement of a custodial sentence is mandatory, and the data on the number of persons imprisoned in Romanian prisons confirms it.

According to World Prison Brief, on January 27/ 2018, 22,988 people were imprisoned in Romania[1].

Following the Regulation on the organization and functioning of penitentiaries, their purpose is to ensure the execution of custodial sentences and the measure of preventive arrest and to ensure the recuperative intervention, facilitating the empowerment and reintegration into society of persons deprived of their liberty.

A success of re-socialization involves first and foremost the awareness of the consequences of the committed offenses and the violation of social norms.

Changing the mentality is a route that staff in charge of educational and re-socialization activities in penitentiaries go without results if this titanic work is not based on factors outside the penitentiary, factors that are represented by family and friends.

The existence of families waiting for them to leave the penitentiary is a motivation for convicted people not to let themselves to be fooled into negative feelings and violent starts, sometimes suicidal.

Romanian legislation provides rights for arrested and convicted persons to keep in touch with their families or close persons, being in this respect in harmony with European Union provisions.

An analysis of the rights of persons legal provisions deprived of their liberty in countries in Europe can be a good thing in identifying a complete and effective picture of these rights.

In doing so, the laws of 5 European countries, namely Spain, the Netherlands, Belgium, the Republic of Moldova and Romania, were analyzed.

Their choice was based on geographic aspects (taking the extremes of the Western part of Europe, in this case the Netherlands, Belgium and Spain) constitutional (some being republics, other monarchs) and EU membership (Moldavian Republic, neighbour to our country but at the same time it is not part of the European Union).

At the same time, the fact that those peoples origins, their habits and their lifestyle are different, but also with common elements has influenced their choice even more, for the radiography of how each state perceives the connection that a person should have with his family.

[*] PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest, Judge (e-mail: iuliapopescu35@gmail.com)

[1] http://www.prisonstudies.org/country/romania

2. Paper Content.

2.1. Spain.

The Spanish legislation provides for convicted person rights to keep in touch with his family, the elements common to the Romanian legislation, but also different aspects.

The normative framework governing the rights to stay in contact with the family, which have convicted persons in Spain, is the Organic Penitentiary Law no. 1 of 1979 and the Law on the Penitentiary Regime, Royal Decree no. 190/1996.

These rights are:

- the right to correspondence;
- the right to visit, which is divided into three categories, an intimate visit, a visit to relatives and friends as well as a family visit;
- the right to telephone conversations;
- the right to receive packets.

Art. 51 of the Organic Penitentiary Act explain that convicted persons have the right to communicate periodically, both verbally and in written form, in the language they understand, with their family or friends.

These communications are done in such a way as to respect as much as possible the privacy of individuals and the way these communications are conducted without violating the security rules. In some cases, written or verbal communications may be suspended or intercepted, reasoned, with the authorization of the director of the penitentiary unit.

Art. 52 of the Law no. 1/1979, provides that in the event of death, illness or serious injury of the convicted person, the director shall immediately inform his / her family or person designated by the sentenced person. Also, if a parent or a person close to the convicted person has died or is in serious condition, the convicted person will be immediately informed.

The detainee has the right to inform his or her family, about incarceration, as well as the transfer to another penitentiary.

In art. 53 of Law no. 1/1979, it is inserted that the penitentiary units will provide annexes, specially arranged for the family or intimate visits of those convicts who do not have a permit to leave the penitentiary.

Art. 41 of the Penitentiary Regime Act, Royal Decree no. 190/1996, provides that it is foreseen that visits and communications will be made in the manner necessary to meet the special needs of foreign detainees to which the rules applicable to Spanish citizens will apply in accordance with the present normative act.

According to art. 42 of the same Royal Decree no. 190/1996, the usual visits are carried out at least twice a week, for a period of at least 20 minutes, the detainee being allowed to be visited by up to 4 persons at the same time. If the location allows, the convicted person may accumulate the time for 2 visits in one.

In order to be able to visit the detainee, the family must provide evidence of family ties, and for those who are not family members, the penitentiary director's authorization is required.

Article 43 of the aforementioned normative act provides for the possibility of restricting this right in the case of violation of security rules, communicating this fact to the detainee.

Another right provided by Royal Decree no. 190/1996, in art. 45, is the possibility for inmates to have an intimate visit, a visit to relatives and friends, and a family visit.

These three types of visits are given by the categories of visitors that may come to the detainee.

Thus, the intimate visit is granted at the request of the detainee, at least once a month, which cannot be less than 1 hour but not more than 3 hours, unless the security rules prohibit it.

The visit of relatives and friends, as the name implies, is that category of visit that is granted for family, extended family and friends, on request, with a minimum of 1 hour and a maximum of 3 hours, at least once a month.

People presenting for an intimate visit or for relatives and friends do not have the right to bring packets or to be accompanied by minors (in case of intimate visits).

Family visits are made on demand and run between the detainee and his or her spouse or person with a relationship similar to that of spouses and children not older than 10 years of age. The duration of this type of visit is a maximum of 6 hours and is done at least 2 times a week.

According to art. 47 of the Penitentiary Regulations, detainees have the right to make phone calls if their families live in remote localities and cannot travel to visit it and if the detainee has to communicate some important issues to the family, the defender or another person.

In those situations permitted by the penitentiary rules the incarcerated person have the right to telephone communications that shall be made at a maximum of 5 calls per week in the presence of a supervisor and may not take more than 5 minutes.

The value of the conversations will be borne by the detainee, except those related to the communication of the penitentiary entry and the transfer to another penitentiary.

Telephone calls made between detainees from different penitentiaries can only be made on the basis of the director's authorization.

According to art. 50 of the Regulation for the organization of penitentiary units, the detainee can receive no more than two packages per month, except for the ones included in the closed regime which can receive only one package per month and the weight of each package cannot exceed 5 kg, containing books, publications, or clothes.

2.2. Netherlands.

As far as the legislation on the rights of persons deprived of their liberty is concerned, in Netherlands those rights are close to those in Spanish law, but of course with specific features.

The classification of rights covered by this analysis is:

- the right to correspondence;
- the right to visit;
- the right to telephone conversations;

The rights of convicted persons are laid down in the Penitentiary Principles Act, within the framework of Art. 38, which provides that the detainee is entitled to receive visits in accordance with the rules laid down in the Regulations for at least one hour per week.

It is foreseen that the Minister of Justice may lay down additional rules on the admission and refusal of a visit, and that the rules are set out in the Organizing Regulations on the request for a visit.

Also, it is stipulated that the director of the penitentiary unit may at the same time limit the number of persons admitted to the detainee, if necessary in order to maintain order or safety in the unit.

The director may refuse to allow the detainee to visit a particular person or persons if this is necessary for the maintenance of order and safety in the institution for the purpose of preventing or investigating offenses or for the protection of victims or other persons involved in committing the deed. This refusal may be maintained for a maximum period of 12 months.

Also for the safety reasons outlined above, the executive director of the penitentiary unit may establish that the prisoner's visit by persons outside the penitentiary is carried out under supervision. This surveillance may involve listening or recording the conversation between the visitor and the detainee, the detainee being informed of the nature and reason of the surveillance.

The Director may discontinue the visit within the specified time limit, with the intention of removing visitors from the institution if necessary to maintain order and safety in the institution for the purpose of preventing or investigating offenses or for the protection of victims or other persons, involved in the act.

At the same time, among the rights granted to the convicted persons are also those related to making phone calls with persons outside the penitentiary unit.

Art. 39 of the Penitentiary Principles Act indicate that convicted persons have the right to make one or more telephone calls, at least once a week, at the times and places established by the organizational regulations, from the telephone stations in the prisons.

The costs of calls made by persons deprived of their liberty will be borne by them, unless the director of the prison unit decides otherwise.

The telephone conversations made by or with the detainee may be supervised and recorded, with the consent of the director, if necessary to establish the identity of the person with whom the prisoner carries a conversation, if this is necessary to maintain order or safety in unity, protection of public order or national security, the prevention or detection of criminal offenses and the protection of victims or other persons involved in committing offenses.

The person concerned will be informed of the nature and the reason for the oversight, this supervision assuming either listening to a phone conversation, live or listening to a recorded telephone conversation.

By the Council's provision on recording telephone conversations and storing and providing recorded telephone conversations, other rules on telephone call surveillance may be established.

As with the right to visit, the Director may limit the right of the prisoner to hold a particular telephone conversation or certain telephone conversations or to conclude a telephone conversation while allowed if this is necessary for the same reasons as mentioned above up. The period for which this right may be limited is no more than 12 months.

Another right that is related to keeping in touch with the family is the right to send and receive letters and documents by post, provided in art. 36 of the Law on Penitentiary Principles.

As with the other rights mentioned above, the law provides, in addition to the right itself, the limitations of its exercise. Thus, the text of the law indicates that the director is authorized to inspect envelopes or other postcards from or intended for detainees to detect forbidden goods.

Where envelopes or postcards originate from or intended for the persons or bodies involving human rights protection, examination of the documents can only be carried out in the presence of the prisoner concerned.

Also under the control that the Director can make on documents sent or received by mail, the law stipulates that these correspondences can be supervised, which may include copying letters or other postcards or letters. The detainee is advised in advance of the surveillance.

The Director has the possibility to refuse to dispatch or deliver certain letters or books or postal orders, as well as the enclosed items, if necessary to:

- keeping order or safety in the unit,
- the protection of public order or national security,
- preventing or detecting crimes,
- the protection of victims or other persons involved in committing offenses.

2.3. Belgium.

The rights of detainees to keep in contact with the family in Belgium have the same rights as in the other mentioned states, namely:

- The right to visit;
- The right to correspondence;
- The right to telephone conversations.

The content of the detainees' rights is laid down in the Law on Principles on the Administration of Prison Facilities and the Legal Status of Detainees of 05.02.2005.

Thus, the right to visit in Belgian penitentiaries is a table visit, a visit with a separator, an intimacy visit and a children's visit.

The visit to the table is done in the special room assigned to this activity and represents the normal visit.

The visit with the separator is done in a space provided with a screen or window, the detainee cannot be reached.

The cases that lead to the application of this visit system, with separator, are:

- If there are reasonable suspicions that incidents that could endanger order and security may occur during the visit;
- At the request of the prisoner or visitor;
- If the former detainee or his / her visitors have violated the regulations governing the visit and there are reasons to believe that these deviations will be repeated;
- If the detainee was previously disciplined, where only a visit with a separator is allowed;
- If the detainee is included in an individual security regime, where only a visit with a separator is allowed.

From the presentation of this type of visit, it follows that visiting with a separator is the exception in the exercise of the right to visit.

The intimate visit consists of an unattended visit, which takes place in an intimate space, without being subjected to supervision by the penitentiary staff. This type of visit can be organized at least once a month for a minimum of 2 hours. An inmate may request this type of visit after at least one month of detention.

People who can benefit from this type of visit are husband, wife, legal partner or concubine, children, parents, grandparents, brothers and sisters, uncles and aunts.

The law is limited in terms of the persons who may be included in this visit.

In order to be able to benefit from this type of visit, the visitor, who have not family ties with the detained, must prove a sincere relationship with the person incarcerated by showing an interest in the detainee over the past 6 months.

As regards the children's visit, an activity for the children and their detained parents is organized at least once a month.

As mentioned above, another right that helps maintain the ties with the family and social environment of the detainee is that of correspondence.

Belgian law allows any detainee to send and receive an unlimited number of letters, according to art. 54 of the Law on Principles concerning the Administration of Penitentiary Establishments and the Legal Status of Detainees of 05.02.2005.

Correspondence that the detainee receives from his or her family and other people is controlled to contain no prohibited articles or substances. Only if there is a danger to the order and security in the penitentiary the correspondence will be read, the director of the penitentiary unit will decide in the immediate form that the objects or letters are not handed over to the detainee but kept in a depot, informing the detainee about these matters. The detainee will received those goods at the time of release.

Correspondence that detainees send, as a rule, is not verified, however, in case there are suspicions of a threat to order and security, correspondence will be verified and, if necessary, it will be retained.

The third right to keep in touch with the family is the right to telephone calls and other means.

Unlike the countries above, Spain and the Netherlands, the legislation in Belgium is more permissive in terms of making phone calls. Thus, phone calls can be made every day, at the expense of the prisoner, from fixed or GSM stations. Phone posts are located on the cell corridor, each prisoner receiving a personal code that he inserts into his phone, and the payment of calls will be made from his personal account.

The text of the law does not specify any time limit for the conversations made.

However, if there are indications that phone calls endanger the order and security of the penitentiary, the director of the unit will forbid totally or partially a detainee to exercise the right to make telephone calls.

Within the first 24 hours after entering the penitentiary, the detainee is entitled to a free national or international free phone call of 3 minutes.

The specificity of this right, with respect to the other legislation under consideration, is that these talks cannot be recorded nor heard. Penitentiary management can only check the person with whom the prisoner held the call and how long this conversation lasted.

2.4. Moldovian Republic.

The law governing the rights of convicted persons in the Republic of Moldova is the Decision no. 583 from 26.05.2006 regarding the approval of the Penalty Execution Statute of the convicted persons and Code no. 443 / 24.12.2004 on the Execution Code of the Republic of Moldova.

Detainees from Moldovan penitentiaries have the following rights closely related to maintaining family ties, according to art. 87 of the Decision no. 583/2006:

- have the right to communicate the name of the penitentiary to the family and close relatives;
- receive packets of supplies, parcels, bands and keep food, except those requiring heat treatment before being consumed and alcoholic beverages;
- to acquire and receive in the packages of necessities in the assortment provided in Annex no. 6, for storage and / or consumption;
- at meetings with relatives and other persons of a duration and number determined by the legislation;
- To phone calls from the public telephone, on its own, in the manner and under the conditions established by the Execution Code;
- Receive and dispatch, on their own, letters, telegrams and petitions, without limiting their number, in the manner and under the conditions established by the Execution Code;

- For own account, send to relatives or other persons parcels, packages and bands, under the conditions stipulated by art. 211 of the Code of Enforcement;
- In case of death or serious illness of one of the close relatives or in other exceptional personal circumstances, as well as in other cases, under the conditions provided by art. 217 of the Enforcement Code, detainees are given the right to move without escort outside the penitentiary for a short period of time.

The normative act stipulates that the detainee has the right to receive during the year at least one short-term visit of up to 5 days outside the penitentiary for visiting the family, relatives, guardian or curator, as the case may be, and convicts enrolled in higher education institutions or specialist backgrounds - for the duration specified in the Labour Code for examinations.

In order to benefit from this right, the sentenced person has to execute the joint punishment or re-socialization, and be included in the release preparation program if it is positively characterized.

Sentenced persons are entitled to short and long-term meetings. Long-term meetings can take place outside the penitentiary, with the right of the convict to reside with family members, according to art. 213 of the Code no. 443 / 24.12.2004 on the Execution Code of the Republic of Moldova, for a period of 12 hours to 3 days, the convict paying the expenses incurred by the long-term meeting.

Short-term meetings with the spouse, relatives up to the fourth degree inclusive, or with another person indicated by the convict, are given for duration of 1-4 hours. These meetings are held in specially arranged areas, under visual supervision or through video systems by the representatives of the penitentiary institution administration.

The detainee is allowed to meet up to two mature persons with whom his / her minor children may come, as well as close relatives who have not reached the age of the majority (brother, sister, nephew, niece).

The detainee is entitled to a short term meeting per month and a long-term meeting per quarter.

There is no right to long-term interviews with convicts who:

a) the right to long-term meetings has been suspended;
b) who were initially transferred as a disciplinary sanction;
c) sentenced to life imprisonment in the initial regime.

The number of meetings mentioned above may be exceeded in order to stimulate convicts.

Thus, more than 4 short-term meetings and 2 long-term meetings per year are provided as incentives, according to Decision no. 583 of 26.05.2006, art. 280.

When determining the visit period allowed, the behaviour of the detainee, the periodicity of visits, the total number of visits of the prisoner concerned, as well as the number of visits to the prison, etc., are analyzed.

Incentive appointments are only granted to the spouse and relatives and cannot be given to others.

Meetings between detainees placed in different penitentiary institutions are forbidden.

The director of the penitentiary unit approves meetings between the detainees, if the detainees are in the same penitentiary institution and if there is a marriage relationship between them, based on documents.

It is not allowed to divide the time for a visit in more short ones, but replacing the long-term meeting with the short term is only allowed at the written request of the sentenced person.

Sentenced prisoners of the Republic of Moldova have the right to make phone calls of up to 15 minutes, including the possibility of changing long and short-term meetings with telephone conversations.

For marriage, the long-term and short-term meetings on this occasion are not included in the set number of meetings.

The meeting takes place after a meeting permit issued by the prison director following the request of the detainee or the visitor.

The administration of the penitentiary may order a ban or discontinuation of a meeting if there is a suspicion that the order and safety in the penitentiary unit may be jeopardized.

In accordance to art. 305 of the Decision no. 583 of 26.05.2006 regarding the approval of the Penalty Execution Statute by condemned persons, the discussion at the short-term meetings is held in the language chosen by the persons arriving on the visit. If the representatives of the penitentiary administration do not know the spoken language, an interpreter or other person (except for the detainees who know the language) may be invited to oversee the discussion.

According to art. 313, from the Decision No. 583 of 2006, detainees can receive packets, bands or parcels from family or other persons.

In art. 314 it is stipulated that the opening and control of the contents of parcels, parcels with supplies and banderols shall be carried out by the representative of the administration of the penitentiary, in the presence of the person who brought them, and the ones sent by mail are subject to specific control in the presence of the detainee and transmitted to the last counter signature.

Persons convicted have the right to receive and dispatch letters, telegrams and petitions on their own, without limiting their number, in the manner and under the law.

Sending postal mandates to the family is done freely and to other non-family members only with the authorization of the penitentiary administration.

Correspondence between detainees of different penitentiaries who do not have family ties is allowed only with the authorization of the penitentiary administration, according to art. 330 of Decision No. 582/2006.

Correspondence of detainees can be subject to control if there is a suspicion of a danger to safety and order in the penitentiary.

In order to keep in touch with the family, the detainees also benefit from the right to telephone calls, the penitentiary administration assuring the installation of public telephones in the penitentiary in special places.

The detainee is entitled to telephone conversations with his spouse, a relative, or another person of his choice. The payment for telephone calls is made with prepaid cards, and in the case of a telephone connected to the public fixed telephone network, according to the established tariffs, on the detainee's account of the detainee.

Provision of phone calls to detainees is only allowed at the initiative and upon request. Conversations at the request of relatives or other persons are not admitted, they can only discuss with the representatives of the administration, communicating their exceptional information to be transmitted to the detainee.

The convict is entitled to a 20-minute weekly telephone conversation with the husband, relative or other person of his choice.

As with meetings, it is not allowed to divide the time allowed for one phone call in shorter ones. Also, phone calls between inmates of different prisons are forbidden.

2.5. Romania.

In Romania, Law 254/2013 regulates the execution of sentences and measures of deprivation of liberty ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal proceedings.

By Government Decision no. 157 of 2016 approved the Implementing Regulation of Law 254/2013, which sets out in detail the composition of the rights of the convicts to preserve the contact with the external environment and especially with the family.

A first right is the right to correspondence, which is regulated in art. 63 of Law 254/2013, together with the petition right. The text of the law mentions in par. (1) only that the right to correspondence and petition is guaranteed.

In the other four paragraphs of the above mentioned article are stipulated only the restrictions on these rights.

These restrictions consist in the fact that correspondence can be held and handed over to those entitled to conduct investigations if there are good indications of a crime. The convicted person being notified in writing of these measures.

However, according to the law, correspondence and responses to petitions are confidential and can only be retained within the limits and under the conditions laid down by law.

The frequency of the use of this right was not limited by the legislator, the detainee having the possibility to make petitions and to have correspondence without limitations. In other words, the detainee has the possibility to keep in touch with his family by mail whenever he wishes.

Another right provided by national law is the right to telephone calls, provided in art. 65 of Law 254/2013[2]. Among the possibilities of the persons deprived of their liberty to communicate with the outside, the right to make phone calls helps constantly and regardless of the distance where the punishment or educational measure is executed, maintaining the connection with the family or with other persons with whom he wants to relate.

Phone calls are made without being heard, are confidential and run during the hours of the program, both with people in the country and abroad. Under the right to telephone calls, the detainee can contact his lawyer and diplomatic representative (if the detainee is a foreign national)[3].

In art. 2 lit. m) of the Implementing Regulation of Law 254/2013, are explained that the family members, are spouse, wife, relatives up to the fourth degree, persons who have established similar relations with those spouses or between parents and children, legal representatives when appointed, as well as, in exceptional cases, persons to whom strong affective relations have been established and which maintain contact with the detainee through visits, telephone, correspondence and on-line communications.

Regarding the right to correspondence, which is not limited, as far as the right to telephone communications is concerned, it has limitations given by the regime in which the detainee is included.

The limitations imposed by the detention regime are aimed at preventing the commission of new criminal offenses by means of telephone conversations. The fact that those who are imprisoned in penitentiaries with maximum security have committed acts of certain gravity, or their situation (crime contest, recidivism) has led to a certain danger, they are considered to be more prone to use the right to hold telephone conversations to continue their criminal activity interrupted by the conviction.

Although the existence of this right may favour the continuation of criminal activity, it is advisable to maintain the link with the family, outside the penitentiary environment, helping to preserve the humanity of every person deprived of liberty and his hope to reintegrate into the world of which was temporarily excluded.

[2] Law no. 254/2013, art. 65: "(1) Persons convicted have the right to make phone calls from public phones installed in penitentiaries. Phone calls are confidential and conducted under visual supervision. (2) In order to ensure the exercise of the right to telephone calls, the director of the penitentiary has the obligation to take the necessary measures for the installation of public telephones within the penitentiary. (3) Expenses incurred for the making of telephone conversations shall be borne by the convicted persons. (4) The number and duration of telephone conversations shall be established by the regulation for the application of this law. "

[3] Chiș Ioan, Chiș Alexandru Bogdan, Execution of criminal sanctions, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, pag. 385

The right to receive visits and the right to be informed about the special family situations provided in art. 68, is perhaps the most important right in the lives of detainees and which, as stated above, motivates the detainee to wish to overcome the period of imprisonment.

The right to visit allows direct contact with the family, keeping in touch with the family environment, maintaining feelings of affection among family members.

This right is all the more important by providing parents with the opportunity to see their children, to be part of their lives, enabling communication and fulfilment of the role of parent through the necessary guidance for children.

Contact with family, though reduced in terms of the consequences of punishment, is so necessary for parties, family and detainees.

Visit to the place of detention is a family event, sometimes educative or full of positive influences, by comparing what can be done between the status of those who meet thru separation devices between those who come and those who are visited[4].

Visiting moments represent for true moments of celebration that have the gift of interrupting the monotony of the daily existence.

The organization of the granting of the right to visit and the manner of granting these visits are stipulated in art. 138-144 of the Regulation implementing Law 254/2013.

Thus, detainees can be visited by the family or the caregivers and with the consent of the detainees and the approval of the director of the place of detention by other persons as well. Children up to 14 years of age can only visit detainees accompanied by a major person.

A detainee may receive a single visit during one day, the administration of the place of detention being obliged to provide a daily 12-hour program for the exercise of the right to visit by detainees.

The duration of the visit is from 30 minutes to two hours, depending on the number of requests for visits and existing spaces.

Visitors can not simultaneously visit two or more detainees, with an exception being provided when two or more inmates, husband or wife or relatives up to the second degree can be simultaneously visited by their husband or wife or relatives up to at the second degree, with the approval of the penitentiary director.

The number of persons visiting a prisoner at the same time can be limited by the motivated decision of the penitentiary director.

In order to benefit from the right to visit, it is necessary to make a prior appointment, which is made before the presentation date for the visit.

The request for the appointment is made by telephone, by e-mail or directly to the penitentiary's office, during the working hours of the package granting and visiting section.

The way of the visit is granted differently depending on the regime of execution of the custodial sentence and the conduct adopted during the detention, as follows:

a) With cabin type separation devices;
b) Without separation devices.

The visit with separating devices is granted to detainees to whom maximum security or closed regime applies and convicted detainees to whom the execution regime has not been established.

The visit without separation devices is granted to detainees to whom the semi-open and open regime applies.

The Regulation also provides for the possibility of granting the right to visit between detainees, with the approval of the prison director, under the law.

The number and frequency of visits varies depending on the regime in which the person in question is included.

Inmates to whom the open regime applies benefit monthly from 6 visits, the incarcerated in the semi-open regime, close regime and those for whom the penalty regime has not yet been established receive 5 visits per month and those to whom the maximum safety regime applies benefit monthly 3 visits.

Pregnant women who have given birth during the period of taking care of the child in their place of detention receive 8 visits per month.

The law provides for the possibility of granting a further visit, in addition to those stipulated, for the birth of the child of the detainee or the death of a family member, with the approval of the penitentiary director, which may be carried out without a separation device.

Detainees also have the right to be informed about the special family circumstances, the serious illness or the death of a family member, person or other person, as soon as they are aware of the event, being psychologically counselled, when required.

An important right that helps maintain affective and matrimonial relationships is the right to the intimate visit that is provided in art. 69 of the Law no. 254/2013[5].

The exercise of this right is done by the convicted person or preventively arrested, married, only with his

[4] Chiș Ioan, Chiș Alexandru Bogdan, Execution of criminal sanctions, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, pag.390.

[5] Article 69 of Law 254/2013

a) They are finally convicted and assigned to a regime for the execution of custodial sentences;

b) the legal effects ceased;

c) There is a marriage relationship, proven by a legalized copy of the marriage certificate or, as the case may be, a partnership relationship similar to the relationships established between the spouses; spouse, being granted by the director of the penitentiary at the written request of the sentenced person.

Persons convicted or preventively arrested, who are not married, may benefit from the intimate visit only with partners with whom they have established a similar relationship to relationships established between spouses prior to the date of receipt in the penitentiary.

The partnership relationship between the convicted person and his / her partner is carried out by a declaration on his / her own responsibility given to the notary.

The director of the penitentiary may approve intimate visits and between convicted persons upon their request, subject to the above mentioned conditions.

The person convicted or preventively arrested, the spouse or his wife or partner, as the case may be, have the obligation, under the sanction of the provisions of art. 353 and 354 of the Penal Code to inform each other, through a declaration on their own responsibility, of the existence of a sexually transmitted disease or acquired immunodeficiency syndrome - AIDS. Statements are filed in the individual file.

According to art. 146 of the Implementing Regulation of Law 254/2013, the persons finally convicted, respectively preventively arrested during the trial, are entitled to a once a 3-month intimate visit, with a duration of three hours, in compliance with the legal conditions.

For marriage, the right to intimate visit, which lasts 48 hours, may be interrupted for a maximum period of 24 hours for reasons related to the administration of the place of detention, without that the 24h being reduced from the 48h, according to par. 2 and 3 of Art. 146 of the Regulation implementing Law 254/2013.

The Romanian legislation also provides for the right to receive packages and to buy goods, according to art. 70 of Law 254/2013.

According to art. 148 of the Implementing Regulation of Law 254/2013, detainees have the right to receive a packet of foodstuffs weighing no more than 10 kg per month, to which a maximum of 6 kg of fruit and vegetables can be added.

Detainees are forbidden:

a) the receipt of foodstuffs which, for consumption, require heating, baking, boiling or other thermal treatments;
b) the purchase of easily altered foodstuffs or which, for consumption, requires heating, baking, boiling or other heat treatment, except coffee, tea, milk and instant smoked sausages;
c) the receipt and purchase of lemons and their derivatives.

3. Conclusions.

Following the analysis of the five penitentiary systems it can be concluded that the systems presented have many common points but also differentiation elements.

The result is a normal one given the fact that for maintaining strong connections between the convict and his family or friends group, both physical contact and the possibility of communicating by telephone or on-line, aspects that are also made between people at large, are necessary.

All penitentiary systems have regulated the right to visit, perhaps the most important right of all, which helps most to maintain the interest of the detainee for the family and the family for the detainee, the right to telephone calls and the right to receive packets.

The differences between those systems are the way these rights are achieved, reflecting the importance that the state attaches to the role of the family in the prisoner's life.

The Romanian penitentiary system is approaching most of the Spanish penitentiary system, in regulating the rights of convicts, but it also has common elements with the other penitentiary systems.

It is noteworthy that the legislation in our country and in Spain is the most permissive in granting the right to the usual visit, in relation to its frequency. Spanish legislation being even more permissive and by stipulating different types of visits, depending on the people who visit with different periodicities.

Analyzing the importance of each individual right, one could conclude that the existence of the right to intimate visit represents a gain, if one can say so, for both the detainee and the family, but also for society, by re-socializing the former condemned, many times he manages to overcome the negative effects of executing a prison sentence due to his family.

What is worth to note after presenting these five laws is that there are notable differences between detailing the exercise of these rights.

Thus, the Netherlands, Belgium and Spain, precisely in that order, are concise in the content of the listed rights without too much exemplifying the way in which the rights are exercised.

However, this is not the case in Romanian law, and even less so in the Republic of Moldova.

d) have not benefited from the permission to leave the penitentiary in the last 3 months prior to requesting an intimate visit;
e) have not been disciplined for a period of 6 months prior to the request for an intimate visit, or the sanction has been lifted;
f) Participates actively in educational programs, psychological assistance and social assistance or work;
(2) A married convicted person may only receive an intimate visit with his or her spouse.
(3) In order to grant the intimate visit, the partners must have had a similar relationship to relationships established between spouses prior to the date of receipt in the penitentiary.
4) Proof of the existence of the partnership relationship is made by the declaration on own responsibility, authenticated by the notary.
(5) The director of the penitentiary may approve intimate visits between convicted persons under the terms of this article.
(6) The number, periodicity and procedure of the intimate visits shall be established by the regulation for the application of this law. "

Why is it necessary to provide, in the smallest detail, the means of exercising only in Romanian and Moldovan legislation, in order to be understood by convicts, and in other legal systems is it sufficient only their succinct presentation?

Maybe there are questions whose answer comes out of the legal sphere, rather related to psychology or human consciousness.

However, what should be emphasized and praised is that the states under consideration have understood that the attempt to socialize some convicted persons cannot be achieved without the intervention of the family and the circle of friends of those condemned.

Nevertheless, there is no clear evidence that any of the systems analyzed is the best, with outstanding results in re-socialization.

It could be a solution a long-term research, during the execution of the sentence, of a representative group of convicted persons under different detention regimes, who keep in touch with the family as well as those who are not visited by family members.

But a solution of this study may be that Romanian legislation takes over those elements of the legislation of the other analyzed states, which allow a greater proximity of the family prisoner.

In the same time, the existence of more rights for the convicted person to keep in touch with the family is not an obligation on the family to honor them.

Although supplementation rights for prisoners would seem too lax compared to the punitive nature of the punishment, this must not lose sight of the fact that the punishment by imprisonment aims to punish the individual by taking away his freedom and not to break the family ties.

References

- Spanish Organic Penitentiary Law no. 1 of 1979
- The Spanish Law on the Penitentiary Regime, Royal Decree no. 190/1996
- The Netherlands Penitentiary Principles Act
- The Belgian Law on Principles on the Administration of Prison Facilities and the Legal Status of Detainees of 05.02.2005
- The Moldavian Republic Decision no. 583 from 26.05.2006 regarding the approval of the Penalty Execution Statute of the convicted persons and Code no. 443 / 24.12.2004 on the Execution Code of the Republic of Moldova
- The Romanian Law 254/2013 regulates the execution of sentences and measures of deprivation of liberty ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal proceedings
- The Romanian Government Decision no. 157 of 2016 approved the Implementing Regulation of Law 254/2013
- Chiş Ioan, Chiş Alexandru Bogdan, Execution of criminal sanctions, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015
- http://www.prisonstudies.org/country/romania

CONTROVERSIAL ASPECTS REGARDING TAX EVASION

Mircea-Constantin SINESCU[*]
Adrian-Lucian CATRINOIU[]

Abstract

Throughout the paper, we have highlighted some controversial aspects regarding the crime of tax evasion, referring to some important decisions of the High Court of Cassation and Justice and also of the Bucharest Court of Appeal. Debating upon the impunity provision stated by art. 10 of Law no. 241/2005, the study also sheds light upon the issue of the perspective of the judicial organs regarding the juridical regime of the tax due for dividends. The main focus of the paper leads to the situations when there is legal ground for the tax due for dividends to be considered part of the damage caused by tax evasion crime. The study includes a short analysis of some relevant provisions of the Romanian Fiscal Code and also some aspects deriving from decisions issued by the Administrative and Tax Litigation Chamber of The High Court of Cassation and Justice concerning the legal regime of dividends. Consequently, the authors are presenting both perspectives of the interpretation of the issue regarding the tax due for dividends to be considered part of the damage caused by tax evasion crime, resulting from two decisions of the two Criminal Sections of The Bucharest Court of Appeal, also arguing in favour of the most solid interpretation among them.

Keywords: evasion, dividend, tax, damage, court decisions, impunity.

1. Introduction

The crime of tax evasion, provided for in Article 9 of Law no. 241/2005 on the prevention and combating of tax evasion, gave rise, both in doctrine and in judicial practice, to a multitude of opinions regarding the cause of impunity stipulated by art. 10 of the Law no. 241/2005 on the prevention and combating of tax evasion, as well as on the existence / non-existence of the crime unity regarding alternative variants for committing the offense, but also on the inclusion or the exclusion of the dividend tax as a component part of the damage brought to the consolidated state budget.

Starting from the analysis of the respective incrimination in the special law, the analysis continues with the most relevant decisions of the High Court of Cassation and Justice – the Panels for settlement of legal issues, as well as with the presentation of the relevant provisions of the Fiscal Code, as well as elements of judicial practice related to the Supreme Court Administrative and Fiscal Division. Last but not least, the study makes a comparative presentation of two solutions from the very recent judicial practice of the Bucharest Court of Appeal, belonging to both criminal departments, diametrically opposed solutions from the perspective of the judgment of the tax regime on dividends by relation to the damage caused to the state budget through the crime of tax evasion.

Given the existence of an obvious non-harmonized practice of the criminal justice authorities in this field, the authors propose to offer arguments, embraced by a part of the magistrates, in the sense of exclusion of the tax on dividends from the damage resulting from the crime of tax evasion, with direct consequences in terms of the individualization of criminal liability, in criminal cases having this object.

2. Paper Content

According to art. 9 of the Law no. 241/2005 on the prevention and combating of tax evasion, the following acts committed in order to avoid the fulfilment of fiscal obligations are considered tax evasion crimes which are punished by imprisonment from 2 years to 8 years and the prohibition of some rights:

a) the concealment of the taxable property or source;
b) the omission, in whole or in part, of recording, in the accounting documents or in other legal documents, of the commercial transactions or of the achieved revenues;
c) disclosure in the accounting or other legal documents of the expenses not based on actual operations or evidencing other fictitious operations;
d) alteration, destruction or concealment of accounting documents, memories of cash register tills or of other data storing devices;
e) the execution of double accounting records, using documents or other means of data storage;
f) avoidance from performing financial, tax or customs checks, by failure to declare, fictitious declaration or inaccurate declaration of the main or secondary premises of the persons checked;
g) substitution, degradation or alienation by the debtor or by third parties of the property seized in accordance with the provisions of the Code of Fiscal Procedure and the Code of Criminal

[*] Assistant Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: mircea.sinescu@sinescu-nazat.ro);
[] Lawyer, Bucharest Bar, Sinescu&Nazat Attorneys-at-law (e-mail: lucian.catrinoiu@sinescu-nazat.ro);

Procedure.

If by the facts provided in paragraph (1) there was more than 100,000 Euro damage, in the equivalent of the national currency, the minimum limit of the punishment stipulated by the law and its maximum limit is increased by 5 years.

If by the facts provided in paragraph (1) there was more than 500,000 Euro damage, in the equivalent of the national currency, the minimum limit of the punishment stipulated by the law and its maximum limit is increased by 7 years.

From the perspective of the legal content of the crime, it should be noted that the High Court of Cassation and Justice, by decision no. 25/2017, ruled in the matter of the settlement of certain legal matters, established that the actions and inactions stated in art. 9 paragraph 1 letters b and c of Law no. 241/2005 on the prevention and combating of tax evasion, which refers to the same trading company, are alternatives to the committing of the act, constituting a single crime of tax evasion provided by art. 9 letters b and c of Law no. 241/2005 for the prevention and combating of tax evasion[1].

The aforementioned conclusion stems from the fact that, given the theoretical distinctions set out above, to the question of law subject to settlement, it follows that we are in the presence of a single crime of tax evasion, and not in the presence of multiple crimes, as one cannot retain a crime with alternative contents, but a crime with alternative content, the alternatives to commit the crime being equivalent in terms of their criminal significance.

The same conclusion is reached by means of the literal interpretation of the text, which unequivocally reflects the intention of the legislator to establish several alternative ways of the material element of the single crime of tax evasion and not distinct crimes of tax evasion.

The omission, or the disclosure in accounting or other legal documents of unrealistic, fictitious transactions under the same circumstances in respect of one or more commercial companies, the existence of short intervals and a single criminal intent or the committing of deeds at large intervals of time and on the basis of distinct criminal intents, either confers continuing character to deeds, or determines the existence of real multiple crimes, this attribute being exclusive the responsibility of the judicial authority called upon to enforce the law.

Concluding, it is noted that the actions and inactions stated in art. 9 paragraph (1) letters b) and c) of the Law no. 241/2005 on the prevention and combating of tax evasion, as subsequently amended, referring to the same trading company, are alternative variants for committing the offense, constituting a single crime of tax evasion provided by art. 9 paragraph (1) letters b) and c) of the abovementioned law.

It also presents importance in the economics of the topic under analysis, the provisions of art. 10 of the Law no. 241/2005 on the prevention and combating of tax evasion, meaning that the limits of punishment are directly related to the alleged damage caused to the consolidated state budget.

On the date of the entry into force of Law no. 241/2005 on the prevention and combating of tax evasion the text of art. 10 paragraph 1 of this provision stipulated that "in the case of a crime of tax evasion provided by the present law, if during the criminal prosecution or the trial, until the first hearing of the trial, the defendant or the respondent fully covers the damage caused, the limits of the punishment stipulated by the law for the deed are halved. If the damage caused and recovered under the same conditions is up to 100,000 Euro in the equivalent of the national currency, the fine sanction may be imposed. If the damage caused and recovered under the same conditions is up to 50,000 Euro, in the equivalent of the national currency shall be subject to an administrative penalty, which shall be recorded in the criminal record."

Subsequently, art.10 paragraph 1 was amended by Law no. 255/2013 implementing Law no. 135/2010 on the Code of Criminal Procedure from February 1, 2014, the applicable text stating that "in the case of committing a crime of tax evasion provided in art. 8 and 9, if during the criminal prosecution or trial the defendant fully covers the claims of the civil party until the first hearing of the trial, the limits provided by the law for the crime committed are reduced by half."

Regarding the nature of the cause of non-punishment / reduction of punishment limits, by Decision no. 9/2017, HCCJ - the Panels for settlement of legal issues accepted the petition filed by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, Criminal Department, file no. 9.131 / 2/2011, on the issuing of a preliminary ruling and, accordingly, determined that the provisions of art. 10 paragraph (1) of the Law no. 241/2005, as in force until February 1, 2014, regulate a cause of non-punishment / reduction of personal punishment limits[2].

In the sense of the aforementioned opinion there are also the decisions of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, the Criminal Department, as a court of second appeal, appeal or appeal in cassation, with reference to the Criminal Decision no. 1.386 of April 30, 2012, ruled in File no. 15.820 / 62/2010, by which the interpretation given by the Brașov County Court in the recitals of Criminal Sentence no. 120 of March 24, 2011, maintained by the Court of Appeal was appreciated as correct.

Brașov through Criminal Decision no. 95 / A of September 15, 2011, in the sense that only the

[1] Decision of the HCCJ (Panel DCD / P) no. 25/2017 (OG no. 936 / 28.11.2017): Article 9 (1) letters b) and c) of the Law no. 241/2005 for the prevention and combating of tax evasion – single crime

[2] Decision of the HCCJ (Panel DCD / P) no. 9/2017 (OG no. 346 / 11.05.2017): Article 10 (1) of the Law no. 241/2005 for the prevention and combating of tax evasion defendants who have paid the entire damages, within the term stipulated by the legislator benefit from the provisions of art. 10 paragraph (1) the final sentence of Law no. 241/2005, the court stating in the reasoning of the solution the nature of personal circumstance of the conduct of the defendants to fully cover the damage caused by the crime of tax evasion; Criminal decision no. 1.425 / R of April 23, 2014, ruled in File no. 2.214 / 101/2013 by which it was correctly stated that through Criminal Sentence no. 142 of September 23, 2013, ruled by the Mehedinţi County Court (maintained in this respect by Criminal Decision No. 344 of November 7, 2013 of the Craiova Court of Appeal), the criminal proceedings against the defendant A were ordered to be terminated, since he fully paid the damage caused by committing the crime of tax evasion, provided by art. 9 paragraph (1) letter c) of Law no. 241/2005 with application of art. 41 paragraph 2 of the Criminal Code (1969), the value of which does not exceed 50,000 Euro in the equivalent of the national currency, considering that this circumstance cannot have consequences in the area of criminal liability and for the defendant legal entity B; Criminal decision no. 201 / A of June 27, 2014, ruled in File no. 263/35/2013, which stated that in order to be able to operate the provisions of art. 10 of the Law no. 241/2005, the damage must be recovered by the defendant and the civilly liable party; Criminal decision no. 368 / RC of December 11, 2014, ruled in File no. 3.447 / 1/2014, in which it was considered that, in order for the cause of non-punishment regulated by the provisions of art. 10 paragraph (1) the final sentence of Law no. 241/2005 to be incidental, it is necessary to ascertain the contribution of the defendant to cover all the criminal damage and not the attitude and the contribution of the civil party to recover their debts. In other words, not every way of recovering the damage leads to the incidence of the non-punishment cause, but only the active, strictly personal attitude of the defendant, to eliminate the consequences of the crime committed.

The relevance of the above resides in that the inclusion or exclusion of dividend tax as a component of the damage to the consolidated state budget may result in different punishment limits and implicitly the possibility of imposing a suspended sentence under supervision (the penalty imposed should not exceed 3 years).

In the judicial practice, there were conflicting views on the withholding of the tax on dividends alongside the corporate tax and VAT as part of the damage caused to the consolidated state budget, from the perspective of committing a crime of tax evasion.

In analyzing the topic under consideration, we must start from the legal regime of the dividend tax. According to art. 7 of the Fiscal Code a dividend is a distribution in cash or in kind, made by a legal person to a participant in the legal entity, as a consequence of the holding of shares in that legal person. It is also considered a dividend from a tax point of view and is subject to the same tax regime as dividend income:

- the amount paid by a legal person for the goods or services purchased from a participant to the legal person over the market price for such goods and / or services, if that amount has not been subject to taxation on income or profit;
- the amount paid by a legal person for the goods or services provided in favour of a participant to the legal person if the payment is made by the legal person for his personal benefit.

According to art.17 of the Fiscal Code, the net profit is obtained after the tax rate of 16% of the taxable profit is applied, which in turn is calculated according to art. 19 of the Fiscal Code as a difference between the revenues and expenditures registered according to the applicable accounting regulations, deducting the non-taxable incomes and tax deductions, plus non-deductible expenses.

It is apparent from the examination of these legal provisions that the situation in which a legal person pays money for goods or services which are not intended for the activity of the paying company but are carried out in the interest of the associate of this legal entity is assimilated to the factual hypothesis giving rise to the obligation to pay dividend tax.

In application of the legal rule mentioned, the High Court of Cassation and Justice (by Decision no. 3253 dated June 27, 2012) stated that: "Expenses which have not benefited the contributing company, but its sole shareholder, are non-deductible, which is why it is justified to treat them as dividends for which the related tax is due".

Moreover, it is clear that the chargeability of the dividend tax requires the finding that the taxpayer's expense was made for the benefit of the company's shareholder, an aspect which must be examined in each case by reference to the evidence of the case.

In this respect, in a case, the Prosecutor's Office systematically took note in the indictment that the defendant committed the crime of tax evasion in order to reduce the tax liabilities of the company, but the fictitious invoices thus recorded benefit to this purpose and are not expenses incurred for the benefit of the defendant.

According to that reasoning, it does not follow that fictitious purchases from companies with inappropriate fiscal behaviour would have been made for the benefit of the shareholder, much less that the payments associated with those purchases would have been made in his favour.

Judicial practice (Bucharest Court of Appeal, 1st Criminal Department) [3] has argued, in a way worthy of admiration, what contains the damage caused to the state's consolidated budget in the case of the tax evasion, as will be shown below.

[3] Bucharest Court of Appeal, 1st Criminal Department, Decision no. 1656/A of November 28, 2017

By recording fictitious expenses in the accounting of companies, it is obvious that the decrease in taxable profit is pursued.

Correspondingly, by lowering taxable profits, the net profit, as well as the value of gross dividends, decreases. Thus, by recording in the accounts of commercial companies of fictitious expenses, the persons investigated in criminal proceedings duly diminish the value of the gross dividends to which a tax of 5%, 10% or 16% was to be applied (the amount of the tax according to the tax legislation applicable at the calculation time) in order to obtain net dividends.

However, there is no logical consistency that, by committing a crime, both the non-payment of the profit tax and the non-payment of the dividend tax are pursued, while the decrease in the net profit determines the decrease of the dividends due to the defendants.

In addition, if these fictitious expenses were intended to remove amounts of money as dividends, then the damage can only be 5%, 10% or 16% of the value of the fictitious expenses (the amount of tax according to the tax legislation applicable at the time of calculation) without taking the profit and VAT tax into account as damage.

In other words, the withholding of the profit tax and VAT as damage and the withholding of the dividend tax as prejudice are two incompatible situations because they cannot be both held for the purpose of committing the crime. Instead, what can be withheld as a double purpose in the case of registration of fictitious expenses is the unlawful removal of money from the company, which may embody the typical crime of misappropriation or the use of the assets of the company without right and the circumvention of the profit tax and VAT payment.

It should also be added that these dividends are not required to be distributed to shareholders. It can be decided that only a part of the net profit is distributed or that all the net profit is reinvested and not distributed as dividends so that withdrawing money from the company before the distribution of dividends may embrace the typical nature of the crime of embezzlement.

Therefore, in such cases, the prosecution must prove the purpose of recording fictitious expenses in accounting, embezzlement and / or evasion of the payment of profit tax plus VAT, which is very important in the analysis of whether the amounts of money for fictitious expenses were paid or not. If the amounts of money relating to fictitious expenses were not paid to the so-called service or goods provider, then it was certainly the case that these expenses were entered into the accounts solely for the purpose of evading VAT and profit tax payment.

As regards the hypothesis that, for the purpose of withholding the dividend tax as damage, the provisions of art. 21 of the Fiscal Code are applicable, as interpreted by HCCJ in Decision no. 3253 / 27.06.2012, according to which the goods and services acquired by a company, which by their specific nature are not related to the activity of the company and do not participate in the realization of its revenues but have been used by the sole shareholder of that company, are not deductible, their qualification as dividends for which tax is due being justified, it is appropriate to make the following clarifications.

Furthermore, Decision no. 3253 dated 27.06.2012 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice of Romania - The administrative and fiscal department, besides being a decision in the administrative field, considers a case that is not applicable to the present criminal case. Thus, the HJCCJ's decision, cited above, deals with a case in which the authenticity of the expenses is not claimed, but the nature of the expenses, which have been determined by the court to be made in the interests of the shareholders and not of the company, which imposed the provisions of Art. 67, paragraph 1, point 1 ^ 1 of Law 571/2003 amended and republished to be applied, which is not the case here. Moreover, the indicated case is one resulting from a tax inspection and not a result of a criminal case.

First of all, the above-mentioned case refers to goods and services that were actually purchased on the basis of commercial transactions actually in place, but these expenses either were not related to the object of activity of the company or did not bring profit to it.

Secondly, in order to meet the elements of civil tort liability, there must be, inter alia, a causal link between the unlawful act and the damage caused, but also the guilt. However, the illicit act is not the evasion of goods from a commercial company, that is the embezzlement or use of property belonging to the company without having the right, but the recording of fictitious expenses for the purpose of evading the payment of tax and duties (VAT and profit tax), and the purpose cannot be to circumvent the payment of the tax on dividends.

The contrary opinion, which we do not share, was also exposed by the Bucharest Court of Appeal, but the Second Criminal Department, stating that the full recognition of the accusations brought to the defendant following the trial of the case in the simplified procedure, also presupposes an acknowledgment of the damage, the more so since he has paid the alleged damage[4].

It has been shown that, in relation to the fact that the defendant on his own initiative has appropriated the amount of the damage, in the realization of the principle of availability that governs the settlement of the civil side, his statement is first of all determining the amount of civil damages, against any other element of the cause that diminishes the obligation.

By analyzing the arguments of the court, we observe that they relate rather to procedural aspects regarding the possibility of invoking the non-withholding of dividend tax as a component of the damage in the procedure for the recognition of guilt and not aspects related to the legality and merits of including dividend tax as part of the damage.

[4] Bucharest Court of Appeal, 2nd Criminal Department, Decision no. 168/2018 of February 8, 2018

However, although it exceeds the scope of this article, we consider that the full recognition of the deeds the defendant is held responsible for and the payment by the defendant of the damage does not equate with an assumption of the amount which represents the damage to the state budget.

Thus, the defendant acknowledges the deeds, namely the omission, in whole or in part, of the disclosure in the accounting or in other legal documents of the commercial transactions performed or of the achieved revenues and / or the disclosure, in the accounting documents or other legal documents, of expenses that are not based on actual transactions or the disclosure of other fictitious transactions, and not the amount of the damage, and the payment of the alleged damage is a guarantee to the judicial bodies that if the defendant is convicted, the judicial bodies can satisfy their claim and not an implicit assumption of the amount of the damage.

Conclusions

In view of the above, it is noted first of all that we are in the presence of a single crime of tax evasion in the event that the actions and inactions provided by art. 9 paragraph (1), letters b) and c) of Law 241/2005 on the prevention and combating of tax evasion, as amended, refer to the same trading company.

At the same time, for the incidence of art. 10 paragraph (1) of the abovementioned law, the attitude of the defendant in the process of removing the consequences of the crime is taken into account.

Although in court practice there are non-conforming views on the withholding of dividend tax along with profit tax and VAT as part of the damage caused to the consolidated state budget, starting from the idea that the dividend category can also include expenses incurred by the taxpayer for the benefit of the shareholder of the trading company, we underline once again the need for a thorough analysis in each case in the light of the evidence in question.

Moreover, the incidence of legal provisions as well as their applicability (Article 7 of the Fiscal Code) must be a priori analyzed by the judicial bodies and, after this stage, to proceed to the analysis of the other aspects related to the merits of the accusation.

Concluding, we fully agree with the arguments of the Bucharest Court of Appeal, the 1st Criminal Department, and we consider that the dividend tax, in the context described above, cannot be a component part of the damage caused to the consolidated state budget because it cannot be simultaneously dealt with as a goal of the crime together with the damage represented by the profit tax and VAT.

References

- Economic Felonies - Iulia Ciolcă - Hamangiu publishing house 2008
- Tax evasion – Av. Rudolf Schmutzer, Av. Hobjilă Spătaru Isabela – Moroşan - Nicora publishing house 2010
- Tax evasion – Ştefania Tudor - Hamangiu publishing house 2014
- Barratry, Embezzlement, Tax Evasion – Iulia Nistorică - Hamangiu publishing house 2011

WATER INFESTATION AS A CRIME UNDER ROMANIAN LAW

Sorin-Alexandru VERNEA[*]

Abstract

The purpose of this paper is to highlight the main theoretical issues concerning the enforcement of art.356 of the Romanian Criminal Code, in regard to the protection granted by several special regulations that protect water resources.

In order to establish a frame for the content of this article, its structure shall be divided into four parts.

The first part will consist of an introduction, in order to establish the importance of this subject and its actual status in Criminal Law literature.

The second part will represent the first half of the paper content and will consist of a special criminal law approach to the provisions of art.356 of the Romanian Criminal Code, most importantly pointing out its constitutive content.

The third part, namely the second half of the paper content, will refer to specific provisions found in art.92 of Law no.107/25.09.1996, namely The Water Law or in art.98, paragraph 4, let.b of Government Emergency Ordinance no.195/22.12.2005, regarding the protection of the environment and finally in art.49 of Law no.17/07.08.1990, regarding the Regime of interior maritime waters, of the territorial sea, of the contiguous zone and of the exclusive economic zone of Romania, and their relations with the provisions of art.356 of the Romanian Criminal Code.

The fourth and final part will consist of brief conclusions as resulting from the content of this article, respectively the actual configuration of water protection, by Romanian Criminal Law provisions today, with a de lege ferenda proposal.

Keywords: water infestation, environmental protection, criminal liability, crimes against the environment, water protection.

1. Introduction

The importance of water sources is obvious today for everybody. Life itself and society as we know it depend on access to quality water, and therefore, it is expected for water purity to be protected even on a criminal scale.

Water is a renewable, vulnerable and limited natural source, indispensable for life and society, raw materials and productive activities, energy sources and transport and a key factor in maintaining ecological balance[1].

By law, the importance of water is recognized and the subsequent paragraph of the same article qualifies it as national patrimony, that needs to be protected as such, fact continuously supported by environmental literature[2].

Water protection against infestation by any means is incriminated in the Romanian Criminal Code[3], art.356. Alongside that provision, specific forms of water infection, prior to the enforcement of the Criminal Code, are found in art.92 of Law no.107/25.09.1996, The Water Law, or in art.98, paragraph 4, let.b of Government Emergency Ordinance no.195/22.12.2005, regarding the protection of the environment[4], and finally, in art.49 of Law no.17/07.08.1990, regarding the Legal regime of interior maritime waters, of the territorial sea, of the contiguous zone and of the exclusive economic zone of Romania[5].

This paper will establish the limits of the incrimination found in the Criminal Code, by reference to the provisions earlier mentioned, in order to specify the legal qualification of some actions that may represent the material element for both general and specific provisions subjected to analysis.

The expected outcome of this research is to highlight the effectiveness of the general regulations found in art.356 of the Criminal Code, nowadays, especially considering the fact that it is not a new type of incrimination, being almost identical to the provisions of the old art.311 of the 1969 Romanian Criminal Code, the only difference consisting in the penalty limits, and it is also similar to art.372 of the 1936 Romanian Criminal Code.

[*] PhD candidate, University of Bucharest, Environmental Law, Judge, Bucharest 2nd District Court of First Instance (e-mail: wersera2005@gmail.com)

[1] Article 1, paragraph 1 of Romanian Law no.107/25.09.1996, namely The Water Law, published in the Romanian Official Gazette, no.244/08.10.1996.

[2] D.Marinescu, M.C.Petre – Treaty of environmental law (original title: Tratat de Dreptul Mediului), Univesitara Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, pag 165.

[3] Law no. 286/2009, published in the Official Gazette no.510/24.07.2009 regarding the Criminal Code of Romania, enforced since the 1st of February 2014, actual on the 1st of March 2018.

[4] Published in the Romanian Official Gazette, no.1196/30.12.2005.

[5] Republished, in the Romanian Official Gazette, no.252/08.04.2014

2. Water infestation, according to art.356 Romanian Criminal Code

Title VII, Chapter V of the Special Part of the Romanian Criminal Code incriminates water infestation, as a crime against public health, in art.356. According to paragraph 1 of the text earlier mentioned, the infestation by any means of water sources or water networks, if the water becomes harmful to the health of humans, animals and plants, is punishable by prison between 6 months and 3 years or a fine. Paragraph 2 of the same article stipulates: The attempt is punishable.

In order for an analysis, some terminological specifications must be made.

A water source is a natural accumulation or manmade installation which contains water, regardless whether if it is drinkable or not.

Water networks consist of channels, pipes, aqueducts, gutters, that hold water[6], or in which water circulates from a source to a consumer. I subscribe to the opinion[7] that water networks include water purifying machines or other technological equipment used to transport water between the source and the end-user. Equally, networks can be of natural origin, like a network of rivers or underground waters.

The special legal object consists in social relations regarding public health, by special reference to the security of water sources and networks[8].

The material object of the crime is represented by the quantity of water found in sources or networks subjected to infection. On a water circuit between the source, the purification facilities and the end user, the material object will be represented only by the water upon which the infection is initiated. I appreciate that the infected water is only the product of the crime, not its material object.

The active subject of the offense can be represented by any person, either an individual or a moral person[9].

The primary passive subject is society itself, as beneficiary of the social relations regarding public health, namely the security of water sources and networks. The secondary passive subject is the owner of the water source or network, which is not adequate for normal use anymore. If an individual is affected by the consumption of infected water, or the animals or plants of an individual or legal person are affected, I consider that person to be a tertiary passive subject.

The premise for the constitutive content is the preexistence of a source of water or a water network, destined for the use of humans, plants and animals. I do not appreciate that the water should be destined for consumption, firstly because the provisions of art.356 Criminal Code do not stipulate the need of consumption, and secondly because water can become harmful for humans even if it is used only for hygiene purposes. Equally, I cannot subscribe to the opinion that the premise is not met if the water source or network is only of individual use[10], mainly because a private fountain, found in the private garden of a family, is subjected to multiple use, by all members of a family, or by animals and plants living in that household. More than that, as mentioned in recent literature[11], water originating from a particular source can end up being incorporated in different products destined for public use.

Contrary to specific literature[12], I do not consider that the preexistence of technical provisions that qualify water as drinkable or for industrial use represent a premise for the crime analyzed. In this regard, art.356 of the Criminal Code, does not refer to technical measures to establish is the water infected is harmful for the health of humans, animals and plants and the effect of the crime should be evaluated in concreto, after the verbum regens has been executed.

The material element, from my point of view, can be fulfilled either by an action of infestation or by omission, for example, in the case in which an operator of a water purification plant doesn't take all the measures necessary to limit the quantity of chlorine to be inserted in the purification process, before sending the water on the distribution networks to the end-user.

Equally, it is important to see that the legislator stipulated the infection of water, by any means, fact that will include any action or omission that will change the quality of water in order to make it harmful for human, animal or plant use, regardless of the substances or procedures used: poison, chemical substances, bacteria, radiations, microbes, waste, etc.

The immediate consequence is a result, and consists of an alteration of the quality of water, in such a manner that it becomes harmful to humans, animals or plants. Establishing the fulfilment of the immediate consequence is a matter of fact, and has to be done in a particular manner, mainly because plants and animals have different standards of harmfulness by water than humans. Secondly, there is no need for a person, animal or plant to be effectively harmed by the use of infested water. If such a result occurs, the perpetrator will also be held responsible for another crime against life, health or patrimony.

---

[6] I.Tănăsescu in G.Antoniu, T.Toader (coordinators) - Explanations of the New Criminal Code (original title: Explicaţiile Noului Cod Penal), vol.IV, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, pag.816.

[7] I.Tănăsescu, op.cit., pg.817

[8] I.Oancea in V.Dongoroz (coordinator) – Theoretical Explanations of the Romanian Criminal Code (original title: Explicaţii teoretice ale Codului Penal Român), vol.IV, ed.a II-a, CH Beck and Romanian Academy Publishing Houses, Bucharest, 2003, pag.542.

[9] Based on conditions of criminal liability of the legal entity imposed by art.135, 136 and 137 of Law no. 286/2009 regarding the Criminal Code of Romania.

[10] I.Oancea, op.cit., pag.541

[11] V.Cioclei, L.V.Lefterache in G.Bodoroncea, V.Cioclei, I.Kuglay, L.V.Lefterache, T.Manea, I.Nedelcu, F.M.Vasile – The Criminal Code. Comment by articles (original title: Codul penal. Comentariu pe articole), CH Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, pag.774.

[12] I.Tănăsescu, op.cit., pg.816

The causal relation must exist, and also must be proven for the incrimination to be effective.

In what concerns the subjective element, I consider that the crime can be committed both with direct and indirect intention, according to art.16, paragraph 6 of the Criminal Code. The mobile and purpose are of no interest to the legal qualification.

According to art.356, paragraph 2 of the Criminal Code, the attempt is punishable. It is important to notice that this is a difference from the old regulation of art.311 of the Criminal Code of 1969. Personally I consider this a progress, given the high importance of the incrimination and the great need of protection, both for public health and for the environment.

The punishment provisioned for the typical form is prison between 6 months and 3 years, or a fine. The limits are inferior to those stipulated by the ancient regulation, where the maximum was of 4 years.

Briefly I do not appreciate the new incrimination as being fundamentally different from the old regulation, with the reserves above mentioned.

3. Specific forms of water infestation, as provided by special regulations

In this part, I will point out the main differences between the general provision for water infestation and the particular incriminations found in special legislation.

Art.92 paragraph 1 of Law no.107/25.09.1996, The Water Law, stipulates: Discharging, dumping or injection into surface water and groundwater, in inland waterways or in territorial sea waters of waste water, waste, residues or products of any kind containing substances, bacteria or microbes, in an amount or concentration that may change the water characteristics, endangering the life, health, and physical integrity of persons, animal life, the environment, agricultural or industrial production, or the fishery fund, constitutes a crime and is punished by imprisonment from one to five years.

Firstly, this provision specifies the exact manner in which the infestation is incriminated[13]: Discharging, dumping or injection into surface water and groundwater, in inland waterways or in territorial sea waters.

I appreciate that surface water and ground water are generic terms that include water sources or water networks, as long as they are of natural origin. Man made installations, even if they contain water, cannot be included in this category.

Departing from the text, for the crime to be typical, it may seem that an essential request implies that the infestation must be done with waste water, waste, residues or products of any kind containing substances, bacteria or microbes. I appreciate that this is not limitative, given the fact that it can be done with products of any kind, containing substances. By using the generic term „substances", without any specific differences, the legislator virtually incriminated water infestation by discharging, dumping or injection, regardless of the products used for the infestation.

The immediate consequence is a result, namely a change of water characteristics which would endanger the life, health, and physical integrity of persons, animal life, the environment, agricultural or industrial production, or the fishery fund. Personally, I see this outcome as more comprehensive than that of art.356 of the Criminal Code. Equally, the causal relation must clearly be proven.

Paragraph 2, letter a) of the same article stipulates: With the punishment provided in paragraph 1 the following acts shall also be sanctioned: pollution in any way of water resources if it is systematic and produces damage to downstream water users.

I see this version as an assimilated form of the crime provisioned in art.92, paragraph 1 mainly because the distinction of the material element in alternative forms disappears. More than that, for the crime to be effective two essential requests are stipulated: 1) the pollution of water resources needs to be systematic, meaning that the acts would imply a repeated form based on the same general resolution, in an organized manner, most suitable for industrial activities that generate water pollution, and 2) effective damage must be produced to downstream water users. It is not important if the damage results from harming the health or life of humans, animals or plants. It can also derive from delay of an economic activity, resulting in material, namely financial, damage for the person who provides that activity.

Another important delimitation must be made from the provisions of art.98, paragraph 4, let.b of Government Emergency Ordinance no.195/22.12.2005, regarding the protection of the environment. According to the text, It is a crime, and it is punished with prison from 1 to 5 years, if it is likely to endanger human, animal or plant life or health: discharging waste water and waste from ships or floating platforms directly into natural waters or knowingly causing pollution by discharging or submerging dangerous substances or wastes into natural waters directly or from ships or floating platforms.

The main difference from the provisions of art.356 of the Criminal Code is that verbum regens is only possible by discharging waste water and waste, or discharging or submerging dangerous substances or waste. The most striking problem is the similitude with the provisions of art.92, paragraph 1 of Law no.107/25.09.1996, earlier analyzed. It is clear that both the objective and subjective elements of art.98, paragraph 4, let.b of G.E.O. no.195/22.12.2005 are included in the constitutive content of art.92, paragraph 1 of Law no.107/25.09.1996. More than that, the penalty limits are exactly the same.

[13] M.Gorunescu – Crimes against the environment (original title: Infracţiuni contra mediului înconjurător), CH Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011, pag.249

My appreciation is that we are facing a double incrimination of the same conduct, punishable in the same manner found in two different acts. This situation must be regulated as soon as possible, by abolishing the provision found in art.98, paragraph 4, let.b of G.E.O. no.195/22.12.2005. Equally, I consider that repealing the latter is a salutary step in simplifying the criminal legislation in regard to water protection, but also I find it normal to remove specific water regulations from the same paragraph as crimes regarding nuclear materials as they are both found in art.98, paragraph 4 of the act earlier mentioned.

The third essential delimitation that must be made in this study is between the provisions of art.356 of the Criminal Code and art.49 of Law no.17/07.08.1990, regarding the Legal regime of interior maritime waters, of the territorial sea, of the contiguous zone and of the exclusive economic zone of Romania. According to paragraph 1 of the latter, It constitutes a crime and it is punishable by prison from 3 months to 2 years, or by a fine, the discharge of polluting substances from a ship into: a) inland waterways or harbors to which Marpol 73/78 applies; b) territorial sea; c) the exclusive economic zone or an equivalent area established in accordance with international law; d) the high seas.

Judging by penalty limits and its constitutive content, respectively the immediate consequence does not imply a minimal damage done to the environment or to water quality, I appreciate this provision as an attenuated form of art.356 of the Criminal Code.

It is relevant to analyze an aggravated form of this crime, provided by paragraph 3 of art.49 of Law no.17/07.08.1990: The act provided for in paragraph 1, which has caused significant damage to marine life is punishable by prison from one to five years.

The immediate consequence is a significant damage to marine life, which has to be appreciated in concreto. This outcome is far wider than the provisions of art.356 of the Criminal Code[14], but I believe it cannot coexist with the provisions of art.92 paragraph 1 of Law no.107/25.09.1996, namely because the area of protection is the same, and if the conditions of the latter incrimination are not fulfilled, then the legal qualification according to paragraph 3 of art.49 of Law no.17/07.08.1990 is possible.

4. Conclusions

The expected result of this study is to establish the limits of water infestation, as a crime, regulated by art.356 of the Romanian Criminal Code, taking into account its relationship with special provisions discussed in the third part of this paper.

I consider that art.92 paragraph 1 of Law no.107/25.09.1996 represents an aggravated form by reference to art.356 of the Criminal Code.

If the action or omission that represents the material element of the crime is done against a water network or water source of anthropic origin, then, the only incrimination viable is the general provision of art.356, paragraph 1 Crim.Code. If the material object of the crime is water situated in natural water networks or sources, and the action is done by discharging, dumping or injection into surface water and groundwater, I appreciate that the legal qualification should be done according to art.92 paragraph 1 of Law no.107/25.09.1996, because, as shown above, the immediate consequence of the two crimes is covered by the latters provisions.

If the material element is done otherwise than by the three actions above mentioned, the only valid incrimination is that of art.356, paragraph 1 Crim.Code.

Considering the crime regulated by art.92 paragraph 2, letter a) of Law no.107/25.09.1996, I appreciate that if the action is done in a systematic manner, this regulation shall prevail, but if the systematic way of action has not been proven, the act can be legally qualified as the crime provisioned in art.356, paragraph 1 Crim.Code.

Regarding art.98, paragraph 4, let.b of G.E.O. no.195/22.12.2005, although it is a clear form of an aggravated crime by reference to art.356 Crim.Code, it is also a double incrimination of art.92 paragraph 1 of Law no.107/25.09.1996. It is obvious that the penalty limits are the same, the normative content is included in the latter provisions, and its place in G.E.O. no.195/22.12.2005 does not respect the natural organizing of criminal provisions by the object of protection, therefore, I consider, de lege ferenda, that art.98, paragraph 4, let.b of G.E.O. no.195/22.12.2005 must be abolished.

Last, I have observed that art.49 paragraph 3 of Law no.17/07.08.1990 is a special aggravated form of art.356 Crim.Code, which shall apply accordingly if the conditions of the incrimination are fulfilled.

References

- G.Antoniu, T.Toader (coord.) – Explanations of the New Criminal Code (original title: Explicațiile Noului Cod Penal), vol.IV, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015
- V.Dongoroz (coordinator) – Theoretical Explanations of the Romanian Criminal Code (original title: Explicații teoretice ale Codului Penal Român), vol.IV, ed.a II-a, CH Beck and Romanian Academy Publishing Houses, Bucharest, 2003
- M.Gorunescu – Crimes against the environment (original title: Infracţiuni contra mediului înconjurător), CH Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011
- D.Marinescu, M.C.Petre – Treaty of environmental law (original title: Tratat de Dreptul Mediului), Univesitara Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014

[14] And I consider the crime regulated by paragraph 3 of art.49 of Law no.17/07.08.1990 to be a specific aggravated incrimination for art.356, paragraph 1 of the Criminal Code, considering that the outcome is an effective damage to marine life.

COMPUTER SEARCH VERSUS TECHNICAL-SCIENTIFIC FINDING

Radu SLĂVOIU*

Abstract

The study intends to establish delimitation between computer search and technical-scientific finding, having as a starting point certain cases encountered in the judicial practice when the law enforcement authorities confused the scopes of these two evidentiary procedures. The author emphasises that such an error can injure the fundamental rights of the parties of the criminal case, including the right of defence that the suspect or the defendant has, and can lead to the exclusion of the gathered evidence.

Keywords: search, technical-scientific finding, computer system, the role of the specialists, the exclusionary rule.

1. Introduction

It is a more and more frequent practice that law enforcement bodies, especially during the criminal investigation stage, confuse the two technical evidentiary procedures: computer search and technical-scientific finding of the storage media.

The situation seems to be generated by the fact that both investigative methods involve the support of specialists in fields that exceed criminal procedure, which tends to generate the perception that it is one and the same procedure.

Such an evaluation is actually false, and the decision for a technical-scientific finding when the case asks for a computer search can lead to a breach in certain procedural rules that impact on the rights, which are guaranteed as a fundamental principle for the parties of the trial, including on the right of defence. The problem does not imply a simple displacement of evidentiary procedures and this is due to the fact that the Criminal Procedure Code stipulates considerably different norms in respect to the computer search compared with the technical-scientific finding. Therefore, the consequences can take severe forms, up to the point of a nullity of the procedure and to the exclusion of evidence.

This study intends to wise up the fundamental differences between the two evidentiary procedures and to identify the situations and circumstances in which the judicial authority can resort to one of them and to offer solutions in order to rectify an inconsistency in case of evidence collection during a criminal case. The analysis is structured based on a real case identified in the practice of the criminal investigation bodies, and the arguments shall capitalize the aspects that the doctrine has developed till now regarding the scientific evidentiary procedures.

Content

Jurisprudence recorded the following situation:

In the case no. 183/P/2013 run by a unit of the prosecutor's office, several documents were collected as evidence and, according to the prosecutor; they were obtained during a technical-scientific finding of a memory-stick. The technical-scientific finding is performed by specialists who work within an authority outside the General Prosecutor Office.

The examined memory-stick had been previously lifted from a person's house place in the course of a house search authorized by the judge for rights and liberties.

After the house search was completed, the prosecutor asked the judge for rights and liberties for the authorization of a computer search on the memory-stick, under the provisions of Article 168 Criminal Procedure Code, because the memory-stick is a computer data storage medium [art. 181 Criminal Code]. The judge for rights and liberties authorized the computer search, explicitly pointing out the legal provisions to be complied with during the evidentiary procedure.

After the computer search was authorized, the prosecutor actually ordered a technical-scientific finding over that computer data storage medium. In the order that authorized the search, the prosecutor referred to the resolution and the authorization of a computer search.

The designated specialists started to search the memory-stick and identified several scanned documents and printed them in a written form. A technical-scientific report was written, containing the technical methods used to access the computer data storage medium, and the written documents were attached to the file case as evidence.

From the above mentioned summarized presentation, we notice that the prosecutor used the authorization of a computer search to order a technical-scientific finding over a computer data storage medium. At least apparently, this latter procedure was the one to be performed.

* Assistant Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: raduslavoiu@yahoo.ro)

The juridical problem is actually generated by the considerable differences in regards to the procedural circumstances of each of the two evidentiary procedures.

Thus, according to Article 172 paragraph (9) Criminal Procedure Code, the technical-scientific finding may be ordered by the criminal investigation body when there is a peril for the evidence to be lost or for the facts to change or an urgent clarification of the facts and circumstances of the case is needed.

According to Article 181[1] paragraph (1) Criminal Procedure Code, the criminal investigation body identifies the object of the technical-scientific finding, the questions that the specialist has to answer to and the time limit for this action. The criminal law doctrine noticed that, unlike search, in the case of a technical-scientific finding, the law does not stipulate the obligation of the judicial authorities to present the objects to the parties and likewise nor the possibility for the parties to have a party-specialist[1].

On the other hand, the computer search is ordered when an investigation of a computer system or of a storage media is required. Due to the fact that such a procedure is a blatant intrusion into a persons' private life, the previous authorization from a judge for rights and liberties is compulsory. Moreover, according to Article 168 paragraph (11) Criminal Procedure Code, the computer or a computer data storage medium search is performed in the presence of the suspect or of the defendant, and he is allowed to be attended by a trustful person and by his attorney.

Likewise, we can notice a difference of content between the procedural documents written at the end of each procedure. Thus, the technical-scientific finding is followed by a report including the description of the operations performed by the specialist, the methods, the programs and equipments used, and of the technical-scientific finding conclusions [art. 181[1] paragraph (2) Criminal Procedure Code], while the computer system search ends with a written record that contains other type of data [for example, according to Article 168 paragraph (13) letter c) Criminal Procedure Code, the name of the persons who assist the search].

Due to these differences, the confusion between the two evidentiary procedures generates severe effects for the criminal trial, and leads even to the avoidance of certain norms, which have the purpose to guarantee the parties' defence right during a criminal trial.

Thus, the substitution of a computer search with a technical-scientific finding triggers the consequence that the person from whom the storage media was taken is not going to be present during the technical operation procedure because the law does not enforces the obligation that the criminal investigation body or the specialist invites or asks the person to be present during the procedure. Such an obligation is stipulated for the computer search, and not for the technical-scientific finding.

Subsequently, as the party is not present and has no knowledge of the performance of the evidentiary procedure (because, we recall it, there is no obligation of telling the parties about the performance of the technical-scientific finding), the party will not know what evidence was extracted from that specific storage media and therefore he will not be able to certify in any way (for example, with a signature) the fact that the evidence was obtained during that evidentiary procedure.

Under these circumstances, due to the fact that it is a violation in the criminal procedure norms, the problem of nullity of the evidentiary procedure raises, the natural consequence being the exclusion of the gathered evidence.

We add the fact that, under these circumstances, there is the risk that the evidence is irremediably lost for the case. Theoretically, we do not exclude a new performance of an evidentiary procedure under the law, but this option is rarely encountered in practice because the prosecutor usually orders that the computer data storage medium is given back to the suspect/defendant immediately after the specialist searched the content of the device; the case file shall only keep the copies ("clones") on which the procedures were performed. Under these circumstances, there is an obvious risk that the original is later destroyed by the suspect/defendant, as he has no interest to keep it especially if he knows that the data on the device are unfavourable to him during the trial. Consequently, the evidence that remains in the file ("the clones") automatically looses its function to support the circumstances of the case that it apparently shows.

Under these circumstances, a correct delimitation of the two evidentiary procedures is necessary.

We note that computer system search designates the procedure for the investigation, discovery, identification and collection of evidence stored in a computer system or in a computer data storage medium [Article 168 paragraph (1) Criminal Procedure Code]. Due to its technical characteristics the computer system search is performed either by specialized police personnel, or by specialists that work within the judicial authorities or somewhere else [Article 168 paragraph (12) Criminal Procedure Code].

Instead, the technical-scientific finding designates the procedure of using the knowledge possessed by a specialist to analyse and explain certain evidence in possession of the judicial body. This procedure asks for a specialist because the judicial authority cannot understand and assess, exclusively on its judicial background, the information contained in the evidence because this information belongs to another technical area and not to law area.

[1] M. Udroiu, A.M. Şinc în M. Udroiu (coord.), Codul de procedură penală. Comentariu pe articole, ediția a 2-a, Ed. C.H. Beck, Bucureşti, 2017, p. 899-900; B. Micu, R. Slăvoiu, A.G. Păun, Procedură penală. Curs pentru admiterea în magistratură și avocatură, ediția a 3-a, Ed. Hamangiu, 2017, p. 172

This difference is eloquently described by the criminal law doctrine, which notes that: "The criminal investigation bodies collect the traces and the material evidence during various tactical forensic activities: search on the scene, collection of objects and documents, search, establishment of the flagrant crime, etc. The traces and the material evidence are of no value to the case as long as they have not been analyzed, interpreted or capitalized in order to collect the maximum of data needed to contribute to the elucidation of various circumstances regarding the commission of the crime, the offenders, etc. for the purpose of finding the truth. For the capitalization of the traces and material evidence, for the above mentioned purpose, adequate specialized knowledge and technical means are needed, which the criminal investigation bodies, regardless of their equipment, do not possess." It is stressed out that ordering of technical-scientific findings is necessary "in order to ensure the scientific capitalization of the traces and of the material evidence" [2].

Consequently, although the two evidentiary procedures – computer system search and technical-scientific finding – are similar because, due to their technical characteristics, they ask for the presence of specialists, the essential difference consists on the completely different purpose that the specialists have.

Thus, for the computer system search, the specialist limits to discover, identify and collect the evidence found in the computer system, but he is not assigned to analyse them.

On the other hand, for the technical-scientific finding, the specialist's role is precisely to support the judicial authorities to analyse and understand the technical information that the evidence reveals.

We can say that the relation between the two evidentiary procedures represents an exchange, for the situation of computer data, of the classical relation between a house search and a technical-scientific finding. If, for example, "a work of art" is found in a suspect's house and the criminal investigation body suspects it was stolen, it is absolutely necessary to establish if that "work of art" is the original or a copy. In this case, the specialist's support does not consist in finding the evidence, because it is collected during the house search. In fact, thanks to his specific knowledge in the art field, the specialist analyzes the inherent characteristics of the evidence, which, obviously, the criminal investigation body cannot perform.

If the specialist limits to identify the existence of certain documents (for example, bills, agreements, notes, photos, etc.) in the computer data storage medium, and he later on prints them, we consider that he does nothing more than to identify a computer data storage medium and to extract various information that can turn into evidence. In this case, we cannot talk about the specialist's contribution to the interpretation of the data, as it is obvious that the data have no technical nature that recalls for the person who identified and printed them to be an IT specialist. Therefore, the support of the specialist is not necessary for the scientific capitalization of the evidence, because such evidence has no scientific nature, and his support is necessary only to identify the evidence, as it is stored on a computer system.

The evidentiary procedure for this case is actually a genuine computer system search.

Technical-scientific finding is yet performed when, for example, the IT specialist's role is to analyze the software characteristics (functions, capacity, the possibilities to encrypt, etc.) after that software was discovered during a computer system search on a hard drive. In this case, the specialist contributes, based on his skills, to the analysis of the criminal method or result, which the criminal investigation body could not make without his support.

Conclusions

A fair delimitation between the various technical evidentiary procedures stipulated by the criminal procedure legislation is essential for the proper conduct of the criminal investigation activities.

The right identification of the procedure that has to be performed in a certain criminal case, taking into consideration its characteristics, can ensure the premises for the compliance with the fundamental rights of the parties during the criminal trial and, at the same time, reduces also the risk to apply the exclusionary rule.

Taking into consideration the fact that collecting evidence in a criminal case is a difficult task, the consequences of errors when an evidentiary procedure is ordered and performed can hardly be repaired and, most of the times, they will affect the solution of the case.

References

- C. Aioniţoaie, I.E. Sandu (coord.), Tratat de tactică criminalistică, Ed. Carpaţi, 1992
- B. Micu, R. Slăvoiu, A.G. Păun, Procedură penală. Curs pentru admiterea în magistratură și avocatură, ediția a 3-a, Ed. Hamangiu, 2017
- I. Neagu, M. Damaschin, Tratat de procedură penală, ediția a 2-a, Ed. Universul Juridic, 2015
- M. Udroiu (coord.), Codul de procedură penală. Comentariu pe articole, ediția a 2-a, Ed. C.H. Beck, Bucureşti, 2017
- N. Volonciu, A.S. Uzlău (coord.), Codul de procedură penală comentat, ediția 3-a revizuită și adăugită, Ed. Hamangiu, 2017

[2] C. Aioniţoaie, I.E. Sandu (coord.), Tratat de tactică criminalistică, Ed. Carpaţi, 1992, p. 238-239

EMPLOYEE PARTICIPATION RIGHTS NEGOTIATION IN COMPANIES RESULTING FROM A CROSS-BORDER MERGER

Felicia BEJAN[*]

Abstract

The cross-border merger may have major consequences on the employee rights of the companies undergoing this process. The employees find themselves before two great uncertainties. The first one regards the continuity of the labor contract under the rights acquired before the merger, with respect to which the European legislator adopted Directive 2001/23/CE on the approximation of the laws of the Member States relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of undertakings or businesses. The second one refers to maintaining the employee participation right to the administration and supervision of companies, where they exist, in the company resulting from the cross-border fusion process, right protected at European level through article no. 16 of the Directive 2005/56/EC on cross-border mergers of limited liability companies, completed with Regulation(EC) 2157/2001 in the Statute for a European company and with Directive 2001/86/EC supplementing the Statute for a European company with regard to the involvement of employee. The employee participation rights in resulting companies from a cross-border merger and the way they are negotiated are aspects of great importance in influencing the make-decision process regarding to operate or not such reorganization. The paper aims to achieve to an analyses of the legal framework provided by the European norms on the negotiation of participation rights of employees in the event of a cross-border merger, emphasizes the aspects with regard to which the regulation in the domain requires to be modified and proposes the lege ferenda amendments.

Keywords: employee participation rights, negotiations, special negotiating body, agreements on employees, involvement, standard rules.

1. Introducere.

The cross-border merger of companies, as a way to exercise the freedom of establishment, is inseparably linked to employee protection within the participating companies. The continuity of the employment relationship and the preservation of the employee rights acquired prior to the merger, as well as the preservation of participation rights to administration and management of the company resulting from the cross-border merger within the supervisory and management bodies represent the two aspects regarding to which the European legislation regulated protection mechanisms. Unlike the issue of the continuity of the employment contract within the work conditions grandfathered prior to the cross-border merger, which became the subject of numerous research in juridical literature[1], the right of participation in the administration of the company resulting from the merger and negotiating these rights have been less addressed[2].

The difference is understandable, if we take into account the fact that all Member States of the European Union have regulations regarding the preservation of rights acquired through the labor contracts , but not all of them have a legal framework which allows the employees to participate in the governance of the companies which employed them.

Therefore, on one hand there are Germany and the Netherlands, States in which employee participation rights are considered as being very important, while on the other hand there are States such as Italy or Romania that do not have such a system. In between these two extremes, there are States such as Austria or France, which have a system of employee participation, but are more reserved regarding the degree of participation of the employee in comparison to Germany. Even in those States that do not have a national participation system, there exists the obligation of respecting the employee participation rights by applying the "before and after" principle.

With the purpose of protecting the participation rights of the employees belonging to the companies partaking the process of cross-border merger in case in which the resulting company establishes its social headquarters in a State in which exists the risk of violation of these rights, the European legislator

[*] Lecturer, PhD, Faculty of Political Sciences, University of Bucharest (e-mail:felicia.bejan@fspub.unibuc.ro)

[1] Regarding the employee protection in the case of company transfer through merger, see R. Routier, Les fusions de sociétés commerciales. Prolégomènes pour un nouveau droit des rapprochements, Librairie Générale de Droit et de Jurisprudence, Paris , 2004, pp.342 and s.o.; I.T. Stefanescu, Theoretical and practical treaty, Bucharest, Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2012, p 466-474; A.Uluitu, The employee rights in case of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of undertakings, Romanian Journal for Labor Law number 1/2006, pp 28-35 F.Bejan, Legal aspects of the transposition of the Directive 2001/23/EC regarding the safeguarding of employees rights in the event of transfer in the Romanian Law, Lex Scientia Lesij, Number XX, volume 1/2013, pp 16-23.

[2] Regarding the employee participation rights, see U. Veersma, S. Swinkels - Transfer: In European Reviiew of Labour and Research Participation in European Companies: views from social partners in three Member States Volume11, 2005 pp. 189-205; F.Bejan, "European Union Rules on employee participation right within the framework of cross-bordee merger .", Advances in fiscal, poiitical and law sciences, Proceedings of the 2nd International Conference on Economics, Political and Law Science (EPLS '13), pp 43-49.

adopted a adequate legal frame, contained in article no. 16 Directive 2005/56/EC on cross-border mergers of limited liability companies[3], completed with Regulation(EC) 2157/2001 in the Statute for a European company[4] and with Directive 2001/86/EC supplementing the Statute for a European company with regard to the involvement of employee[5].

Our research is focused on the legal aspects of negotiation of participation rights in resulting companies as they are regulated by the European legislation. Due to the fact that, in practice, negotiations take place at a slow pace and represent an impediment towards finalizing cross-border mergers, we aim to identify the aspects regarding which the present regulation needs to be improved, so that its provisions would be a consistent support for the employees and for companies.

2. Negotiation of participation rights.

The procedure for determining the participation rights in the company resulting from the cross-border merger is based on the model of the European Company. At Community level, Article 16 paragraph (3) extends the legal regime established by Council Regulation no. 2157/2001 and by Directive 2001/86/EC with regard to the involvement. Employees in case of establishing European Companies (EC), which become applicable to cross-border operations. At national level, Member States which established participation mechanisms, have adopted participation rules in relation to the peculiarities of their own social policies, harmonized in accordance with Community rules in the field.

Basically, if the parties do not decide otherwise, participation rights are established following negotiations between employees and employers, carefully and thoroughly regulated. Under certain circumstances, each party may choose to apply standard rules, as alternative to conducting negotiations and concluding an agreement.

According to the relevant provisions of Directive 2001/86/EC, the negotiation of participation rights by the employees and employers is subject to a legally regulated procedure, procedure which begins with the creation by the employees of a special negotiating body (SNB), continues with the ongoing negotiations between the SNB and the management bodies of the merging companies and can be finalized by an agreement between the parties with regard to the employee participation rights.

2.1. Establishing a special negotiating body (SNB)

The interests of the employees during the procedure for establishing participation rights are represented by a special negotiating body - SNB, the members of which are elected or appointed in proportion to the number of employees of the merging companies.

According to the Community rules, SNB are created after the publishing of the draft terms of the cross-border merger. As soon as possible after publishing, the management bodies of the participating companies must provide information about the identity of the companies, subsidiaries, establishments, and the number of their employees, to have all data available to create the special negotiating body and to open negotiations.

Thus, the creation of SNB is conditional upon the execution by the merging companies of a prior obligation to inform, which must be fulfilled as soon as possible after publishing the draft terms of cross-border merger.

In our opinion, the term to set up a special negotiating body is not enough regulated. De lege ferenda it requires a period expressed in time units to replace the current vague wording of the legislation, so as to limit any delays caused by a possible lack of the parties' intention to engage in serious negotiations.

The members of the SNB are established in proportion to the number of employees employed in each Member State by the participating companies and concerned subsidiaries and establishments. The number of members is determined by allocating in respect of a Member State one seat in the SNB corresponding to each 10% or a fraction thereof of the total number of employees employed by the participating companies and concerned subsidiaries or establishments in all the Member States.

The practical ways for appointing or electing representatives are established by the national law of each Member State. The measures taken by the Member States in this regard must ensure, to the extent possible, that each SNB includes at least one representative for each participating company which has employees in the respective Member State.

If there is a large number of companies involved in the merger and the mechanism to appoint SNB members may result in employees of a company that are not represented, the number of members for each Member State can be supplemented. The additional members from each Member State must be established so as to ensure the including in the SNB of at least one representative for each participating company which is registered and has employees in that Member State, and which will cease to exist as a separate legal entity following the merger. The increase of the number of seats in the SNB must be made so that the number of the additional members to not exceed the number of members previously designated and to not result in a double representation of the employees concerned, and if the number of such companies is higher than the number of the available additional seats, these seats shall be allocated to companies in different Member States by decreasing order of the number of employees.

[3] Published in the Official Journal, nº L 310/2005.
[4] Published in the Official Journal, nº L 294/2001.
[5] Published in the Official Journal, nº L 294/2001.

Both in the legal literature[6] and practice in the field, critics were brought to the SNB structure, particularly with regard to the calculation of the number of employees based on which the SNB structure is established. De lege ferenda, a simplified algorithm is required to determine the SNB structure, so as to remove current uncertainties.

With regard to the main role of the SNB, it has the responsibility to negotiate with the representatives of their employers the substance of the employee participation rights in the company resulting from the cross-border merger. Meantime, SNB may decide not to open negotiations or to terminate negotiations already opened.

As a rule, the SNB shall take decisions by double majority, respectively by an absolute majority of the votes of the SNB members provided that such a majority also represents an absolute majority of the represented employees. Each member of the SNB shall have one vote.

Exception to the rule on decisions made by SNB are the situations where the result of negotiations leads to a reduction of participation rights, if participation covers at least 25% of the overall number of employees of the participating companies. In order to meet the requirements of the law in these particular situations, decisions must be taken with a majority of two thirds of the members of the SNB representing at least two thirds of the employees from at least two Member States. Also, given the consequences, the decision not to open negotiations or to terminate negotiations already opened shall be taken with the same special majority.

SNB and the competent bodies of the merging companies are required to conduct negotiations with a view to reaching an agreement on employee participation in the internal structure of the company resulting from the merger. The purpose of negotiation is that the employees preserve their influence on the participating companies, influence which could be affected by the fundamental structural changes in which their employer gets involved.

In order for the negotiations to be opened, the European legislator imposed on employers the obligation to inform employees with regard to the draft terms of the cross-border merger and its actual implementation. The reason to regulate the obligation to inform is to allow the employees' representatives to assess the size of the merger and its impact on their rights, so they can prepare on real and complete grounds the negotiation of the legal system of participation within the internal organization of the company resulting from the cross-border merger.

During negotiations, the SNB may be assisted by experts upon request. Given that the participating companies are financing the functioning of the SNB, it is up to the Member States to limit costs, so that the budget allocated to negotiations to cover the services of one expert.

Regarding the duration of negotiations, the Directive establishes a maximum term of six months commencing as soon as the SNB is established to finalize negotiations. The parties may decide, by joint agreement, to extend negotiations for other maximum six months, so that the duration of negotiations does not exceed one year from the establishment of the Sunbathe participants in the negotiations, the representatives of the employees as well as the companies' representatives, shall, in the exercise of their functions, enjoy the same protection and guarantees provided for the nationals of the state of the beneficiary company's registered office in similar qualities and activities.

All participants in the negotiations, including experts, are obliged not to reveal any information available to them during negotiations and which has been given to them in confidence. The obligation of confidentiality shall apply to the participants in the negotiations even after the expiry of their terms of office.

Except as otherwise provided in Directive 2001/86/EC, the legislation applicable to the negotiation procedure shall be the legislation of the Member State in which the registered office of the company resulting from the cross-border merger has its registered office.

2.2. Negotiating an Agreement

Negotiations between the employees' representatives and the SNB of the merging companies may be terminated by concluding an agreement on arrangements for the involvement of employees.

In principle, the parties are free to determine the applicable rules on participation, according to their interests and as negotiated. The only legal demands of which they are bound are the written form of the agreement and a minimum content including the terms expressly provided by law.

Hence, according to Article 4 paragraph (2) of Directive 2001/86/EC, the agreement shall be concluded in written form and shall specify the following terms of understanding between the parties:

- the scope of the agreement;
- the substance of the arrangements established by the parties with regard to the arrangements for the involvement of employees;
- the date of entry into force of the agreement and its duration; and
- the cases where the agreement should be renegotiated and the procedure for its renegotiation.

Among the measures taken following the negotiations, the document confirming the will of the parties must contain the following aspects related to employee participation:

- the number of members in the supervisory or

[6] B. Keller, The European Company statute-employee involvement-and beyond, in Industrial Relations Journal, Vol. 33, no. 5, 2002, pp. 424–445 administrative bodies which the employees are entitled to elect, appoint, recommend or oppose;

- the procedures as to how these members may be elected, appointed, recommended or opposed by the employees; and
- the rights of the members elected, appointed, recommended or opposed by the employees.

3. Standard rules.

The conclusion of an agreement is only one of the solutions that can be given to the employee participation issue. It should be considered that the negotiation process does not necessarily end by concluding an agreement on arrangements for the involvement of employees, since there is a possibility that the parties cannot reach an agreement in this regard.

Also, the employees, through their representatives, may opt for the conclusion of a bargaining agreement or may find as inefficient the delay of the cross-border reorganization due to the performance of a negotiation process, against the fact that, without a bargaining agreement, their participation rights are, in subsidiary, protected by law.

In our opinion, from the perspective of the participating companies, the conducting of negotiations has some key disadvantages.

One of these concerns the fact that the negotiation procedure may last up to one year. By default, the efficiency of the cross-border merger is affected.

Direct and implied costs of such procedure are equally a disadvantage of the negotiation process. All expenses made during negotiation with regard to the functioning and protection of SNB, respectively of the competent bodies attending negotiations, is financed by the participating companies.

In addition, if we consider that during negotiations, changes can take place in the economic and legal status of the companies involved, the necessary updates are, in turn, time and resource consuming so that the losses encountered by the attendees in this context might question the cross-border decision itself.

Finally, there is a possibility that the parties do not conclude an agreement, either because they so decide or because negotiations were blocked.

Given these aspects, applying the standard rules may be the best solution for establishing the arrangements for the involvement of employees.

3.1. The scope of standard rules

In Article 16 paragraph (4) of the Directive on cross-border mergers, the European legislator gives alternative legal solutions to establishing participation rights based on a negotiation process. According to the cited provisions, under certain circumstances, the social aim may be achieved also by applying the standard rules regarding participation.

The settlement of the scope of standard rules reflects the concern to provide merging companies and employees a variety of options to cover different situations in which they might be. The initiative to apply standard rules can belong to both employees and the competent bodies of the participating companies. In some cases, the decision to implement such alternative solution may be a unilateral act of will and in others may be the results of the agreement between the parties.

Standard rules apply in the following cases:

a) SNB and the competent bodies of the merging companies so agree;
b) SNB has decided not to initiate negotiations or to close negotiations already opened and rely on the standard rules established by the national law of the Member State where the company resulting from the cross-border merger has its registered office;
c) the legal deadline for completing negotiations expired without the parties reaching an agreement on the involvement and the competent bodies of the participating companies decide to apply the standard rules and continue the merger process, while SNB does not decide to open negotiations or terminate negotiations already opened; and
d) The competent bodies of the merging companies decide to directly abide the standard rules of the Member State where the registered office of the company resulting from the merger is to be situated, without prior negotiation.

It has been argued that there is a risk that the implementation of standard rules to be decided by the employers exclusively for their benefit and not for a proper settlement of employee participation. In order to limit this eventual risk, the legal framework in the field was supplemented with several measures.

Thus, the standard rules can be applied only if:

a) before the registration of the cross-border . merger, one or more participating companies applied forms of participations covering at least 33% of the total number of employees in all participating companies or
b) before the registration of the cross-border merger, one or more participating companies applied forms of participations covering at least 33% of the total number of employees in all participating companies and if SNB so decides.(Article 16 paragraph (3) point (e) of Directive 2005/56/EC and Article 7 paragraph (2) point (b) of Directive 2001/86/EC).

Hence, the competent bodies of the merging companies may decide to make use of standard rules only if the participation covers at least one third of the total number of employees in all merging companies. It is estimated that the one third limit rule corroborated with the participation rules established by the standard rules are likely to provide sufficient protection of employee rights.

Exceptionally, where the one third thresholds are not reached, the standard rules may be applied only of SNB so decides. Without the consent of SNB, the standard rules do not apply.

In this second scenario, practically the decision to apply or not standard rules to the participation system is made by the ones directly interested, the ones that can best appreciate the appropriateness and effects of their decisions, so even more the suspicion of violating employee rights is removed.

Besides the actual protective measures referred to above, the directive on cross-border mergers is supporting by provisions of Article 16 paragraph (6) the strengthening of the protection mechanisms of participation systems.

The provisions of the said rule specifically devotes the obligation of the company resulting from the cross-border merger to take a legal form for which the national law establishes a participation system, where at least one of the merging companies knows such a system. For example, if the applicable national law allows the exercise of participations rights only in joint stock companies, the absorbing company or the company newly created by the cross-border merger shall be set up in this form or change its legal form, as the case may be. Certainly, a change of the legal form triggers a series of other changes in the organization and functioning proper to the respective type of company, which, in turn, have to be made. Supported by these measures, the legal system of participation established by applying the standard rules ensures the observance of the "before and after" principle.

3.2. Standard rules and applicable law.

According to the standard rules, the number of members in the administrative and supervisory bodies of the company resulting from the cross-border merger shall be equal to the highest percentage that applies to participating companies.

The allocation of seats in the supervisory or administrative body among members representing employees from different Member States, namely how they can recommend or oppose the appointment of members in these bodies is made by the SNB or by the employees' representatives, as the case may be, depending on the number of employees from each Member State.

In setting the participation mechanisms, the competent body must ensure, where possible, that from each Member State at least one employee is appointed, giving priority, if necessary, to the Member State where the registered office of the company resulting from the cross-border merger is to be established.

Since the members elected, appointed, recommended in the administrative or supervisory body are full members of these structures, they have the same rights and obligations as the shareholders' representatives.

Where the standard rules are implemented, the applicable law is the law of the registered office of the company resulting from the cross-border merger. The applicable standard rules are set in the internal rules of Member States, as these transpose Directive 2001/86/EC with regard to the involvement of employees in its part referring to standard rules, including part three of the annex to the directive.

It should be noted however, that surprisingly, the Community rules give Members States the option to decide to preclude, by the national legislation transposing the directive, with no distinction, the applicability of standard rules. However, none of the Member State made use so far of the right to bring such a regulation.

Obviously, the passing of rules to preclude the alternative to apply standard rules significantly limits the options of the parties and may have serious consequences on the cross-border merger.

In this hypothesis, the only legal means by which the forms of employee participation may be established is negotiation, followed by the execution of an agreement. A failure of negotiations would result in a failure of the entire draft terms of the cross-border merger, given that the operation cannot be registered without establishing a participation mechanism.

From this perspective, the possibility given to Member States to preclude the application of standard rules by internal rules may be considered a breach of the free movement of companies, which de lege ferenda must be removed from the Community regulatory framework with regard to employee participation.

4. Conclusions and de lege ferenda proposals

The negotiation procedure is considered as being a complicated one. We find it useful to configure, in our findings, the essential aspects of employee participation negotiation in the company's management:

a) The establishment of participation rights is not mandatory for all cross-border mergers;
b) The company resulting from the cross-border is mainly subject to any rules relating to employee participation of the Member State where its registered office is to be established by the modifying or constitutive act, and in subsidiary to rules of exception;
c) Negotiations may start only if the management bodies do not decide to apply the standard provisions;
d) Where the negotiations are opened, employee participation often becomes a barrier to the completion of the cross-border merger. In practice, many mergers fail due to the difficulty to find a solution to the social issue;
e) The content of participation rights is established considering the „before and after" principle and is regulated so that the employee participation level in the company resulting from the cross-border merger to maintain, basically, the highest level of participation known before the operation in at least one of the participating companies;
f) The actual influence of the employees on the company's strategic decisions varies from one national law system to another. One of the consequences is that the extent to which the employees influence the activity of the company may start from proposing a candidate in one of its internal structures to deciding equally with shareholders, as it happens in the German system.

In the meantime, after the analysis conducted, we consider that the European regulation of employee participation rights would be subject to de lege ferenda amendments under the following aspects:

a) It is necessary that the future regulation sets a doubtless minimum duration for informing employees, a limited period to form SNB and a shorter term for conducting negotiations, all these to increase the efficiency of the operation. The fact that negotiations may last one year does not meet the required celerity for a cross-border merger. In practice, the duration of negotiations exceeds this term. In practice, the average duration required to form a special negotiating body is of three months after initiating proceedings for this purpose. If we add that employees should be informed "immediately" on the merger, which means another period of time, it obviously results that the duration of negotiations does not help to reach the economic purpose for which the operation was started;
b) The calculation method of the total number of employees according to which the SNB structure is set raises several issues in practice, especially where the participating companies have a large number of subsidiaries and establishments. A different mechanism for forming a SNB, a clear and easy to do one, should be regulated;
c) Given that currently the forms of involvement in different Member States are too diverse, in the view of the Community legislator, a better harmonization of the forms of participation in different Member States;
d) Considering that not all Member States have established in the national law participation mechanisms and consequently, employee protection can be ensured only by applying standard rules, paragraph 3 of Article 7 of Directive 2001/56/EEC, according to which "Member States may provide that the reference provisions in part 3 of the Annex shall not apply in the case provided for in point (b) of paragraph 2 of Article 7" shall be repealed.

The conclusion is that the European legislator has to clarify and modify the legal framework in domain, in order for the participation right to be safeguarded, . Such an improvement of the juridical norms will encourage the cross-border mergers of companies and will guarantee their freedom of establishment.

References

- I.T., Stefanescu*Theoretical and practical treaty*, Bucharest: Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2012
- B. Keller, The European Company statute-employee involvement-and beyond, "Industrial Relations Journal", Vol. 33
- F.Bejan,"European Union Rules on employee participation right within the framework of cross-border merger .", Advances in fiscal, political and law sciences, Proceedings of the 2nd International Conference on Economics, Political and Law Science (EPLS '13, 2013
- U. Veersma, S. Swinkels - Transfer: In European Review of Labor and Research Participation in European Companies: views from social partners in three Member States Volume11, 2005
- Lencou D. , Menjucq M., Les fusions transfrontalieres de sociétés de capitaux: enfin une réalité mais des difficultés persistantes!, Editura Dalloz , Paris, 2009
- Craig, P. and de Burca, G., Dreptul Uniunii Europene, Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2009
- Menjucq, M., Droit international et européen des sociétés, Domat droit privé, Montchrestien, 2008
- R. Routier, Les fusions de sociétés commerciales. Prolégomènes pour un nouveau droit des rapprochements, Librairie Générale de Droit et de Jurisprudence, Paris, 2004
- Council Regulation no. 2157/2001 on the Statute for a European Company published in the OJ 294/1 of November 10, 2001
- Directive 2001/86/EC supplementing the Statute for a European Company with regard to the involvement of employees published in the OJ L 294/22 of November 10, 2001
- Directive 2005/56/EC on cross-border mergers of limited liability companies published in the OJ L 310/1 of November 25, 2005
- Directive 78/855/EEC of 9 October 1978 concerning mergers of public limited liability companies published in the OJ L 295/36 of October 20, 1978

EQUAL TREATMENT OF YOUNG PEOPLE AND SENIORS: "PLEADING" FOR A SPECIAL LAW ON AGE DISCRIMINATION

Felicia BEJAN[*]

Abstract

Prohibition of age discrimination is one of the sine qua non conditions of dignified life of any and every citizen. Regardless if we relate to labour or to other domains of public life, namely education, health, culture, participation in decision making process or access to goods and services, people should be equal in rights throughout their lives. The human life cannot be divided into spans in which the violation of human right is permitted and spans in which it is not. Age is always a quality and never a weakness. However, in real life, exclusion, restrictions and limitations of rights based on age criteria are day-to-day occurrences. Age discrimination affects young and less young individuals, women and men, and seems to be accepted in many countries and is even more so accepted in Romania. It is ordinary for a young person or for a person having a certain age to be rejected by the employers or by some of us, in our day-by-day life. The present paper aims to underline the seriousness of age discrimination, to analyse the rights provided by the legal rules and ignored through different practices according to age criteria, to identify legal measures having as purpose to improve the legal regime of equal treatment regarding age criteria in all fields of public life and to overcome the consequences of discrimination based on age.

Keywords: young people, seniors, age discrimination, equal treatment, de lege ferenda.

1. Introduction

The issue of age discrimination of young and senior employees is relatively new in the Romanian legal system and Romanian juridical literature, aspect which is explainable taking into account that the first normative acts regarding this subject in Romania have been adopted in the year 2000. It should be pointed out that national-level legislative action has risen from our obligation as a candidate state for accession to the European area to embrace the Community acquis in domain.

The mere existence of a legislative framework did not modify the practices of employers. Paradoxically, in the recruitment process, young people are required to have working experience, whilst, for seniors, the same experience is no longer an employment criteria. Either this, or young employees have small salaries because "they are young", and seniors are no longer kept within the company because "they are no longer young". And these are just two of the many cases in which age makes the two previously mentioned categories to be vulnerable within the labour market, marginalized and even stigmatized[1].

Age discrimination is increased in Romania and the consequences are severe and have a great impact on Romanian society. The abilities, needs, and aspirations are regarded in an unlawful, immoral way through their age.

This article aims to achieve to an analyses of the legal regulations regarding age discrimination, which can offer research ideas towards practical and efficient legislative measures, so that compliance with the right to equality of treatment regardless of age and irrespective of the domain of public life in which this right is exercised to be protected, and that the principles of human dignity to find themselves within the life of each and every citizen.

2. The European legal framework on young and seniors discrimination.

The principle of equality of treatment and prohibition of discrimination have been established from the beginning of the European construction, through the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community signed in 1957 and entered into force in 1958. The treaty's norms relate to non-discrimination of producers and consumers within the common agricultural policy, non-discrimination of citizenship of nationality of communitarian employees in the context of free movement of people, non-discrimination between men and women regarding payment for equal work.

The next important legislative step in the field was the Treaty of Amsterdam signed at in 1997, and entered into force in 1999, which extend the power of the Community against other criteria-based discrimination, namely race, ethnic origin, religion, beliefs, disability, age and sexual orientation. Thus, according to provisions introduced in article 13 from TCE (former article 6 a EEC) "Within the limits of the

[*] Lecturer, PhD, Faculty of Political Sciences, University of Bucharest (e-mail:felicia.bejan@fspub.unibuc.ro)

[1] Manolescu A., Brînzea V.-M., The age-Un important criteria of discrimination on the labour market in Analele Universităţii "Constantin Brâncuşi" Târgu Jiu, Seria Economie, Nr. 3/2011, pp 16- 28; Stanciu M. C.,, Ageism in Romania and Intergenerational Practices, Procedia - Social and Behavioral Sciences ,4th Worlds Conference on Educational Sciences (WCES-2012) 02-05 February 2012 Barcelona, Spain Edited by Prof.Dr.Gülsün A. Baskan, Assist.Prof.Dr.Fezile Ozdamli, Sezer Kanbul; Deniz Özcan, Volume 46, 2012, pp 4736-4740 powers provided for, the Council, acting unanimously, on a proposal from the Commission, and after consulting the European Parliament, may take appropriate action to combat discrimination based on sex, racial or ethnic origin, religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation."[2].

In the year 2000, immediately after the entering into force of the Treaty of Amsterdam, the secondary European legislation has adopted the Directive 2000/43/EC of the Council from June 29th, 2000 of implementing the principle of equal treatment between people, without differentiation based on sex or ethnical origin[3]. Given that in the field of employment relationships cases of discrimination are more often than in other fields, the European legislator adopted in the same year Directive 2000/78/EC of the Council, from November 27th, 2000 to create a general framework that would favour equal treatment regarding employment[4].

There are two new aspects brought forth by Directive 2000/78/EC in comparison to Directive 2000/43/EC:

- on one hand, aims to provide a special regulation for the access to labour market and employment relationships, and;
- on the other hand, to extend the field of application of the principle of equal treatment to other protected reasons, expressly providing prohibition of age discrimination.

Thus, according to article 1, the Directive's objective is to "lay down a general framework for combating discrimination on the grounds of religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation as regards employment and occupation, with a view to putting into effect in the Member States the principle of equal treatment."

In accordance with the provisions of article 3 in conjunction with those of article 1 from Directive 2000/78/EC, young people and seniors must have access to employment based on non-discriminatory selection and recruitment criteria, to benefit from vocational training, improvement, promotion, retraining and practical experiences regardless of age, to have equal treatment with regard to employment and work conditions, dismissal and payment conditions, affiliation to an employee organization or any other organization of which members exert a profession. Prohibition of age discrimination is applicable to all the aspects which are entailed by the exercise of the right to equal treatment by its beneficiaries.

Practice in the field has revealed that advertisements and interviews are steps in the employment process in which candidates are constantly discriminated based on their age and we can illustrate with the situations in which employment is conditioned by seniority or by an age which guarantees the existence of a reasonable period of employment before retirement. Employee promotion runs into the same obstacle of a too young or too old age, regarding those who may benefit from the levels of the career. In regard to termination of employment , it is notorious that the employees age is within the unofficial reasons behind the official reasons of dismissal.

Due to the fact that the employers request that an employee must have a minimum and maximum age to exercise within equal terms his or hers right to work is a flagrant infringement of the principle of equal treatment, social realities of such have been founded the provisions of article 6 (1) paragraph 2 f Directive 2000/78/EC, which expressly stipulated that differential treatment based on motives such as age may specifically refer to:

- the setting of special conditions on access to employment and vocational training, employment and occupation, including dismissal and remuneration conditions, for young people, older workers and persons with caring responsibilities in order to promote their vocational integration or ensure their protection;
- the fixing of minimum conditions of age, professional experience or seniority in service for access to employment or to certain advantages linked to employment;
- the fixing of a maximum age for recruitment which is based on the training requirements of the post in question or the need for a reasonable period of employment before retirement.

Employers can oppose the right of non-discrimination based on age criteria in case in which employees invoke those provisions on the Directive 2000/78/EC according to which objective reasons, justified by a legitimate objective and put into force through adequate and necessary methods may justify a different of treatment without this being considered discrimination.

On what can be criticised towards the Directive is the general nature of the norms which regulate the justification of differences of treatment on grounds of

[2] The Treaty of Lisbon gives mandatory legal force and grants juridical value equal to that of treaties to the Charter of Fundamental Rights of The European Union (Article 6 paragraph (1) from EUT), which completes the European legislative framework on discrimination. According to Article 21 (1) from Charter of Fundamental Rights of The European Union "Any discrimination based on any ground such as sex, race, colour, ethnic or social origin, genetic features, language, religion or belief, political or any other opinion, membership of a national minority, property, birth, disability, age or sexual orientation shall be prohibited."

[3] Published in The Official Journal of European Communities (OJEC) L series, no. 180 from June 19th, 2000. It should be specified that the first directive is applicable in labour domain as well.

[4] Published in The Official Journal of European Communities (OJEC) L series, no. 300 from December 2nd, 2000. As a basis of comparison, we underline that in the United States of America, the first federal regulation regarding age discrimination The Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA) was adopted in the year 1967. The Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA) prohibits discrimination of those at the age of 40 or older. Regarding protection of young people, there is no federal law, but some States have regulations that protect young people against age discrimination in labour. The USA States have their very own legislation on employee and possible employee discrimination based on their age. It is notable that the Colorado State has such regulation since 1903.

age, which are often transposed with the same level of generality in the legislation of the Member States, so that in present leave the possibility of interpretations extremely generous with the practices of the employers that discriminate on base of age[5].

From our point of view, de lege lata, European law offers the Member States a articulated set of rules, which allow them, through national act of transposition, to create a state of normality in the field of labour, which benefits both those who want to be employed or those who are already employed, regardless of age, and the employers, which can increase their profit not just by decreasing costs related to work force, but also by valorisation this very work force

De lege ferenda, we acknowledge that the assessment of weather the way in which within national level legislation of the Member States, the intentions of the European legislator lead to an improvement in the juridical conditions of all employees, regardless of age, and is case in which this analysis shows that the objectives have not been reached, Directive 2000/78/EC should be amended towards a more detailed regulation of discrimination based on age criteria in terms of acts of discrimination and justifications of these acts which exclude the existence of discrimination.

3. The Romanian legal framework on young and seniors discrimination.

European directives have been transposed in Romanian law system, trough G.O. no. 137/2000 regarding the the prevention and sanctioning of of all forms of discrimination[6].

As provided for in the regulation field of G.O. no. 137/2000, age is one of the expressly regulated criteria regarding to which discrimination is prohibited[7].

The juridical regime of this type of discrimination is shared with those of the majority of other criteria. Thus, criteria such as race, nationality, ethnicity, language, religion, social category, beliefs, sexual orientation, age do not benefit of a special regulation. Meanwhile, in our legislation there exist other types of discrimination such as discrimination based on gender, which benefits of a special legal framework – Law no. 202/2002 regarding Equal Opportunities of Women and Men, republished[8].[8]

In our opinion, de lege ferenda, a specialized law regarding combating age discrimination presents itself as a solution to both ensuring the respect for the dignity of Romanian citizens and the guarantee of their rights and freedoms, and solving the economic and social problems, at individual and society level, which have their roots in this type of discrimination.

The reasons for which we support the adoption of a normative act are the following:

- a special law would rise awareness regarding age discrimination and promote equal opportunities regardless of age;
- a special law may be focused on discrimination in the field of labour, but may equally regulate age discrimination in other areas of public life;
- a special law would identify clearly, completely and in detail the purpose, the scope of the normative act, the sphere of social relations which are regulate, the rights and the obligations of the subjects to law, and particular behaviour in this respect. We believe that acts of age discrimination currently foreseen in national norms, even if pretty numerous, their phrasing is general, limiting their applicability in practice, either because those entitled do not succeed to the noticed differences of treatment as discrimination, or because those who should respect the right to equal treatment use the general nature of the law in a astute way in order to bypass the consequences of non-compliance with that rules;
- a specialized law may have a better defined preventive effect; stipulating sanctions rigorously defined depending on the particular act of age discrimination and the harm done by this may shape subjects to law behaviour and would prevent discriminatory and abusive practice;
- a special law may have an educational effect and may reconfigure both relationships between employers and employees, between co-workers and the way juniors and seniors are perceived and treated by society.

Such a normative act must first of all be based on a quantitative and qualitative research on acts of age discrimination faced by Romanian citizens within the employment relations and in other areas of public life.

A source of inspiration in preparing an age discrimination normative act proposal can be Law 202/20002 regarding gender equality, which, in our opinion, has an important contribution to the progress made towards equal opportunities and treatment

[5] Article 6 (1), entitled "Justification of differences of treatment on grounds of age" provides the following: "Notwithstanding Article 2(2), Member States may provide that differences of treatment on grounds of age shall not constitute discrimination, if, within the context of national law, they are objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim, including legitimate employment policy, labour market and vocational training objectives, and if the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary."

[6] Republished in The Official Gazette, Part I, no. 166 from March 7th, 2014.

[7] The discrimination is defined in the article 2 of the Ordinance. According to the provisions stipulated under paragraph 1 discrimination is "any distinction, exclusion, restriction or preference based on race, nationality, ethnicity, language, religion, social status, belief, sex, sexual orientation, age, disability, non-contagious chronic disease, HIV infection, membership of a disadvantaged group and any other criteria which has the purpose or the effect of restriction, elimination of recognition, use or exercise of fundamental human rights and freedoms or of rights recognized by the law in the political, economic, social or cultural field or in any other field of public life."

[8] Republished in The Official Gazette, Part I, no. 326 from June 5th, 2013. Law 202/2002 taken over provision from European directives regarding the principle of equal treatment between men and women in the area of work relationships.

between men and women, proving the efficiency of a special regulation.

Research with a view to proposing a special law may also include study of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA)[9], or the laws through which other Member States have transposed Framework Directive 2000/78/EC, laws which present many similarities and differences as well[10]. The latter regard aspects like the definition of discrimination[11], justification of difference of treatment[12], the term in which a request for restore of rights by the discriminated person[13], sanctions which the author of the discrimination act must bear[14].

4. Conclusions

The study of age discrimination regarding both young people and seniors constitutes, first of all, a contribution towards raise the visibility of the vulnerabilities of the previously specified two categories especially in the labour market, but also in other areas of public life[15].

An analysis of European and national level statistics may lead in extremis to the conclusion that the only time span a person can have high level of certainty that he or she will not be discriminated on the base of age is that between 25 years and 40 years.

In other words, the guaranteed active period may be reduced to 15 years, instead of 47 years, which should be the proper timespan for a person who is employed at the age of 18 and retires when he or she is 65. Moreover, for women who chose to become mothers or men who wish to benefit from a leave for child's growth, there are high risks of discrimination, including the period of the "protected" age span (between 25 years old and 40 years old).

The effects that such an abnormality on individual and social levels may become the subject of different research. Although normality would presume the existence of a predefined, secure career route, promotion based solely on competence and labour management in the active period, what happens in reality is quite alarming. Furthermore, normalcy would mean that generations ought to collaborate, to support each other and to bring adds value depending on the professional stage in which individuals find themselves, not to be in conflict, having antagonists relationships[16]. Basically, they have common interests, all generations desire to exercise their right to dignity, their right to equal treatment and they have to stick together in this respect.

In Romanian society, in general, treatment of young and seniors people is still in the sphere of inadequate, insulting language, which is perceived as a good joke, irony, not as a violation of human dignity. Particularly in labour, age discrimination is justified by companies through the objective nature of their employment policies and is permitted by the general character of juridical norms in this domain. In their turn, those discriminated often chose not to file a complaint regarding the discriminatory treatment, as they often appreciate that proving that such discriminatory acts have taken place is hard to prove.

We consider that our proposal towards the adoption of a special law having as purpose to eliminate all types of age discrimination, which should contain detailed provisions regarding regulated social relationships, specifying concrete acts of discrimination and stipulating sanctions for each and [9] According to the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA), an applicant shall not be required to include in their CV information regarding their date of birth or their civil status. Furthermore, relevant professional experience is limited to the last 10 years of work. Any practice that interferes with these norms is considered discriminatory. We identify three situations in which noncompliance with the non-discrimination obligation on age and civil status criteria may be invoked in the American legal text. What draws attention and would be useful to implement in the Romanian law system is the fact that acts of discrimination are specifically stipulated, so that the application of norms does not leave room for misjudgement, thus the restoration of the discriminated rights' is guaranteed.

[10] The Netherlands have adopted in 2004 a special legislative act that prohibits discrimination on age criteria –Age Discrimination Act. Most of the Member States have transposed the Directive into the national laws in similar terms through normative acts including all grounds of discrimination.

[11] In the French law system, discrimination is represented by "every distinction between natural persons based on their origins, sex, family circumstances, pregnancy, physical appearance, vulnerability caused by their financial circumstances, known or unknown by the author of the act of discrimination, family name, residence, medical condition, disability, genetic features, habits or manners, sexual orientation or identity, age, political opinions, trade union activity, affiliation, real or suspected, to a certain ethnicity, nation, race or religion. Moreover, French law prohibits discrimination between legal persons based on the aforementioned criteria (leaving aside pregnancy), with the addition of employee affiliation of these legal persons." The French legislator had chosen an extensive transposition of discrimination concept comparing with our legislator.

[12] In Ireland, according to law, when employment requires training before retiring age, we find ourselves before a justification of difference of treatment, which is why setting a maximum employment age is permitted in this kind of situations.

[13] In Germany, the law provides that the victims of discrimination must file a complaint in a period of maximum two month from the moment the act of discrimination took place, not a year, such as is provided by the legislation of other Member States.

[14] In Austria, the common penalty is an administrative fine of maximum 360 euros; furthermore the victim can require compensation in some situations. In France, the amount to which the victim can request can rise to as much as 45.000 euros and even surpass this sum if the act of discrimination has been carried out under aggravating circumstances.

[15] According to National Statistical Institute, In Romania, in 2017, second semester, the employment rate of people between 20-64 years was 70,5%, of which 65,5% were seniors and 35, 5% were young people. An important part of active human resources, using the their right to free movement within European Union, have left our country in favor of those European countries where they have found jobs. The depopulation phenomenon of Romania is increasing and the prevention of work-force emigration has to be to be a priority for our society.

[16] In October 1999, in Netherlands, there was an international meeting of intergenerational specialists where it was launched The International Consortium for Intergenerational Programmes (ICIP), an international organization, registered under Dutch law, having as purpose to promote intergenerational projects, strategies and public policy from a global perspective, and to improve the relationships between generation, especially between younger and seniors people, through intergenerational practices and activities.

every one of these acts may answer to a social necessity. Such a normative act would support all citizens, regardless of age, helping them build a career, would be beneficial to family relationships due to the fact that the two discriminated categories would have financial stability, not having to consume the resources of active family members anymore. The transposition of this idea into practice would contribute to the improvement of relationships profile between young people and seniors, on one hand, and society, on the other hand.

References

- Stefanescu, I.T., Theoretical and practical treaty of labour law, Bucharest,Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2012
- Țiclea A., Treaty of labour law, Bucharest,Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2012
- Craig, P. and de Burca, G., European Union Law, Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2009
- Manolescu A., Brînzea V.-M. The age-Un important criteria of discrimination on the labour market, Analele Universităţii "Constantin Brâncuşi" Târgu Jiu, 2011
- Stanciu M. C,, *Ageism in Romania and Intergenerational Practices, Procedia - Social and Behavioral Sciences , 4th Worlds Conference on Educational Sciences (WCES-2012) 02-05 February 2012 Barcelona, Volume 46, 2012
- The Treaty of Lisbon
- Charter of Fundamental Rights of The European Union
- Treaty establishing the European Economic Community
- Treaty of Amsterdam
- Directive 2000/43/EC of the Council from June 29th, 2000 of implementing the principle of equal treatment between people, without differentiation based on sex or ethnical origin
- Directive 2000/78/EC establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation
- G.O. no. 137/2000 regarding the combat and penalization of all forms of discrimination
- Law no. 202/2002 regarding Equal Opportunities of Women and Men
- Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA), U.S.A.
- Law no. 2008-496 of 27 May 2008, diverse adaptations of community law in the field of the fight against discriminations, France
- The General Equal Treatment Act (Allgemeines Gleichbehandlungsgesetz,AGG), Germany
- The Equal Treatment Act (Gleichbehandlungsgesetz, GlBG), Austria
- The Employment Equality Acts 1998 to 2008 ("the Acts"), Ireland
- Age Discrimination Act, The Netherlands
- National Statistical Institute :http://www.insse.ro/cms/ro/content/statistica-oficiala-din-romania

COLLECTIVE REDRESS AND ALTERNATIVE DISPUTE RESOLUTION – REMEDIES IN THE „CONSUMER TOOLKIT"

Monica CALU*

Abstract

Collective redress for compensation, also known as a group action or a class action, reunites consumers who have suffered the same or very similar loss or harm caused by the same trader. They come in court as a group and seek redress, in one legal claim.

Alternative dispute resolution it's a collective term for the ways that parties can settle a dispute by means of extra-judicial mechanisms with (or without) the help of a third party.

Even if these two notions of „collective redress" and „ADR", at first sight, apparently have little in common, these two topics have become closely related in disputes regarding consumers who have had their rights violated by traders.

Even if judicial collective redress procedures cannot be replaced by Alternative Dispute Resolution (ADR) or amicable settlements, we must put aside the assumption that the courts offer the only technique that can deliver redress or that is not possible an amicable settlement procedure for mass claims. Parties in dispute should remain free to recourse to alternative means of dispute resolution before or in parallel to the formal introduction of the judicial claim, taking into account all available options.

This study examines the different mechanisms available to consumers to resolve disputes, from private complaints handling to ADR and class actions. This paper aims to analyses the advantages and disadvantages of different approaches to dispute resolution and redress mechanisms, the limits of the out of court settlements and the current situation in the EU Member States, and the cross-border cases and solutions. It also approaches the enhance and the interconnection of the existing national ADR systems in creation of a powerful unified pan-EU mechanism, provided by Directive 2013/11/EU of the European Parliament and of the council on alternative dispute resolution for consumer disputes.

Keywords: consumer disputes, collective redress, alternative dispute resolution, cross-border cases, settlement.

1. Introduction

According to international and European human rights law, the notion of access to justice obliges states to guarantee each individual's right to go to court - or, in some circumstances, an alternative dispute resolution body - to obtain a remedy if it is found that the individual's rights have been violated.

Non-judicial pathways to justice are also considered, including non-judicial bodies and alternative dispute resolution methods. Alternative dispute resolution (ADR) procedures, such as mediation and arbitration, provide alternatives to accessing justice via formal judicial routes. The EU has encouraged the use of ADR with legislation such as the EU Mediation Directive and a variety of consumer protection initiatives.

Dispute Resolution is one of the most talked-about topics nowadays. An area barely known or practiced a decade ago, it has now become the most reachable 'tool' for people who seek justice. Now we know that Court is not the only solution, and even more, we have begun to see it as a last resort solution.

The legal needs of ordinary people as consumers in their disputes with traders have changed over the last decade. After years of litigations and due to the large amounts of money and lengthy judicial procedures involved in the trial process, the consumers and the consumer's communities or consumer's associations have increasingly turned to legal alternatives that are more prompt, private and economical than the courtroom. Also, when the traders are faced with a dispute regarding the consumer's right, due to the changes in consumer protection legislation, the companies are learning that, whenever possible, it is more advantageous to them to solve their differences between themselves rather than relying on an expensive, time-consuming and sometimes inefficient judicial system. Now, the parties in dispute can reach practical and private agreements instead to fight for years and spend huge amounts of money in endless courtroom battles by using the ADR bodies and the Online Dispute Resolution (ODR) bodies have been created and linked together thorough the European Union. Almost all of the ADR systems use one or more of the same elementary dispute resolution techniques of negotiation, mediation, conciliation and arbitration.

Generally, the procedural rules regarding arbitration are more formal that the rules of mediation, but not as strict as procedural rules that govern litigation in court. Therefore, mediation is seen as a non-binding process and arbitration as a binding action, or, simplifying, in ADR, binding arbitration replaces the trial process with the arbitration procedure.

* Consumer Law Expert Pro Consumatori Association (e-mail: monica.calu@apc-romania.ro)

2. A view of ADR in Romania

Alternative Dispute Resolution mechanism in Romania provides arbitration and mediation, according to Government Ordinance no. 38 of 26 August 2015 on Alternative Dispute Resolution between Consumers and Traders. While arbitration procedure is very similar to the common judicial procedure due to provisions regarding the arbitration from the Romanian Civil Procedural Code, that regulate notifications, summoning, compatibilities and binding effect (general legal framework on arbitration is governed by the Code of Civil Procedure, Law No. 134/2010 on the Civil Procedure Code, republished in articles 541-621), mediation is far more different due to the fact that the mediator's activity involves mostly counseling and the mediation agreement is essentially non-binding. Even that arbitration is less formal than court, though the claimant/ the consumer and the other party may present evidences, appear at hearings etc. Unlike mediation, an arbitrator or panel of arbitrators makes a decision and the decision may be legally binding. But, in case an alternative dispute resolution does not settle the problem, the consumer may choose to sue the trader.

Nowadays, after the explosion of the trials against the financial institutions, the insurers, cars producers telecom, internet or energy providers or even against governments illegal actions, we live in a changed reality where many judicial systems face increasing workloads and where access to courts can be expensive. And so, in many aspects of life when a conflict arise, due to the vast amounts of time and money involved in the trial process, the consumers and business communities start increasingly to choose the legal alternatives that are more prompt, private and economical than the courtroom. The principles of shared costs, and the power that multiple complainants can have, are well understood and appreciated by European consumers.

But, despite the advantages provided by these quasi-judicial procedures brought before the non-judicial bodies (these ADR methods are recognized as more expeditious, private, less formalistic and generally much cheaper than a trial), however, the large majority of non-judicial bodies do not have the power to issue binding decisions, and their powers of compensation are generally limited. Also, in case of consumers who have suffered the same or very similar damage from the same trader and gather in a group of claimants, the very large numbers of consumers complicates the evaluation of the case and of damages, and the total value of claim is so high that surpass the capacity of ADR bodies to provide proceedings for mass claims. There are a very few alternative dispute resolution bodies which developed the procedures for mass claims: Swedish and Finnish Consumer Complaint Boards, Spanish Arbitration System. Another limitation of the power of the ADR bodies is that it is impossible to take provisional measures during the negotiations, like to immobilize a company's assets. In these situations of multiple claims situations, ADR or the amicable settlements could be part of the „consumer toolkit", but judicial collective redress procedures cannot be replaced by alternative dispute resolution.

As example of the limits of the ADR use are eloquent in the Volkswagen case, where the company refused to negotiate for compensation with consumers from European Union. In September 2015, in Dieselgate scandal, Volkswagen admitted that 11 million of its vehicles were equipped with software that was used to cheat on emissions tests. In the United States, where the scandal was uncovered, Volkswagen reached a settlement agreement with American consumers. The VW group has agreed to pay $1,000 to 500,000 drivers. US owners of VW diesel cars with proposed to pay $500 on a prepaid visa card and $500 in dealership credits as compensation because it cannot yet remove the illegal software. Even if in Europe over 8 million cars have had this defeat device installed and VW may have broken two directives of EU legislation - the consumer sales and guarantees directive and the unfair commercial practices directive[1], the carmaker has said rules in Europe are different and an engine repair is sufficient compensation.

This is one reason for in many EU's Member States jurisdictions, litigation culture still remains dominant; change may be resisted by parties unwilling to submit their disputes to an unfamiliar process, courts still strain under growing pileup of cases, even that the new consumer rights legislation adopted aims to reduce the burden and the pressure, and inspiring prospective litigants deterred by the prospect of a lengthy court process to pursue alternative options.

3. Collective redress for compensation

What is collective redress for compensation: also known as a group action or a class action, it's the situation when consumers who have suffered the same or very similar harm or loss, caused by the same trader, gather and seek redress in court as a group, in one legal claim. Consumer regress for compensation enables a group of consumers who have had their rights violated, to be represented by a third body (for example, by a consumer organization or by a state authority) which seeks remedies for them especially by litigation against the trader.

The role of collective redress results from the reality that, in our mass consumption society fueled by mass production and the globalization of the markets,

[1] Directive 2005/29/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 11 May 2005 concerning unfair business-to-consumer commercial practices in the internal market and amending Council Directive 84/450/EEC, Directives 97/7/EC, 98/27/EC and 2002/65/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council and Regulation (EC) No 2006/2004 of the European Parliament and of the Council ('Unfair Commercial Practices Directive') violation of legal norms can affect a great number of consumers and individual consumers would not go to court fearing high financial costs, expensive or lengthy procedures, time consuming, emotionally draining process, even intimidating tactics and not to forget the unpredictable result.

Also, there are several advantages for what class action lawsuits can be preferable to individual litigation for consumers. Aggregating multiple suits into one suit expedites the legal process and makes it easier for a case to move through the court system, as a class action lawsuit is decided by one judge in one court. A class action is a unique procedure which implies lower litigation costs (costs will be divided among group members), the opportunity for plaintiffs to seek relief when claiming for small amounts of money and opportunity for all plaintiffs to receive damages. When violated rights have low value for each plaintiff, a class action will allow plaintiffs to seek relief who would not have found it financially prudent to do so in an individual lawsuit. This is the case, for example, in consumer lawsuits pertaining to deception or overcharging, where the only damage produced is monetary damage of low value. Also, the use of collective redress mechanisms attract a large media coverage than individual litigation and/or individual ADR. In case a class action is won by consumers, the judicial precedent is so powerful that the corporation or the authority which would be tempted to abuse its power in the future will retain from such type of abuse.

As example, after the financial crisis caused the inflation of class actions against the financial institutions, the defendants are increasingly wary of their reputation, and media coverage increases the deterrent effects caused by such collective cases than the concomitant abundance of individual litigation.

The downside of the class action brought in front of court is that if the plaintiff's litigator does not plead effectively or the class applicants do not have strong claims, then the legitimate claims of other class members can be hurt.

Also, if the group action is unsuccessful in their lawsuit then individual class members likely do not have the right to bring individual lawsuits in another trial (non bis in idem rule). This is the reason for what the group should consider as first option alternative dispute resolution procedures as a safer way of obtaining redress in mass harm situations. Collective alternative dispute resolution procedure should always be available alongside, or as a voluntary element of judicial collective redress. Even that the principle of party disposition remains the ground principle for the allegations and evidences, applications during the trial and appealing to remedies between the parties and the court in civil proceedings, there is an undeniable tendency, across the Member States, towards a more active role being played by the court. In the content of the principle of the active role of the judge comes in the obligation (and the right of the judge, of course) to put all the diligence as the parties to choose another way of solving the conflict between them, namely the amiable way.

4. Class action in Romania

Under Romanian law, class action is not expressly regulated nor collective redress action. Although, there is not currently explicit regulation of procedure in group action in Romanian law, the Civil Procedural Code allows collective actions considering the regulation of such institutions, as joinder of actions, joint claimants, co-plaintiffs, co-defendants, co-participation in trial etc. Also, the Romanian law does not offer a special proceedings for complex class action.

The notion of collective/class actions is not provided within the Civil Procedure Code, but some elements are regulated in certain special laws related to consumer law, labor rights and in Competition Code (modified recently by Emergency Ordinance 39/2017 on damage claims related to cases of competition law infringements and amending the Competition law no. 21/1996).

However, several persons may file an unique claim, according to article 37 of Romanian Civil Procedure Code, in case of the object of the trial is a mutual right or obligation, or if their rights and obligations have the same cause or if there is a close connection between them e.g. their claims derive from similar contracts concluded with the same person.

Unfortunately, in some situations - like it happened in Romania in the class actions regarding misleading the borrowers to CHF loans (between 2013-2015) - this type of cases are discouraged by administrative reasons of courts. In many of these class actions regarding the freezing of the exchange rate of CHF at the level from the time of the concluding of the contracts, courts severed collective files in hundreds and even thousands of individual files, without scrutinized the identity of the legal issues raised collectively by hundreds of consumers and has disunited collective files in hundreds of individual actions.

Notwithstanding the above, a few type of class action developed in Romania and among them are the actions filed by consumer associations in the matter of infringement of consumers' legally established rights and interests. Social and economic sideslips led to infringements in consumers' rights by major economic actors such as commercial banks or non-banking financial institutions, by telecom, transport, touristic companies, by energy providers. The interest in collective claims has registered an increasing trend due to recent amendments in consume legislation. The Government Ordinance nr.21/1992 provides the possibility to establish consumer association, defined by law as non-profit legal persons founded in the purpose of representing the rights and interests of their members or as well as the general interest. On behalf on their members' rights and interests provided by the Government Ordinance 21/1992, Consumer's Code (Law 296/2004), Law no. 193/2000 regarding the abusive clauses in contracts concluded between consumers and traders and other relevant legislation, these associations, among other legal attributes, have the capacity to file claims before courts of justice for the protection of their members' rights and interests, to initiate claims when providers infringe their legal obligations and put to risk their members' rights and interests. Also, associations that meet legal requirements have the possibility to seek for judicial relief in matters of covering consumer's losses deriving from dangerous goods or inconsistent services, to obtain annulment of abusive clauses in contracts or to injunct dishonest practices that put consumers' rights and interests to risk.

In case of adhesion contracts that comprise abusive clauses, the law authorizes certain control authorities to notify the court from the professional's domicile or headquarters and to request asking to be bound by an order of court injunctions to change the contracts under development, by removing the abusive clauses, as it is provided by art.12 and 13 of Law no.193/2000. These authorities are represented according to art.8 of the law, by the National Authority for Consumers' Protection representatives, as well as by the authorized specialists of other public administration authorities, according to their competencies. Besides them, the consumers prejudiced through the respective contracts have the right to address to the court.

Especially after the amendment of Law no. 193/2000 by Law 76/2012, in the situation of an court action filed by the National Authority for Consumer Protection in front of a tribunal against a professional concerning abusive clauses in consumer contracts, if the court ruling confirms the abusive character of a contractual clause, the judicial decision will be mandatory for the professional with regard to all such on-going contracts and all pre-formulated standard agreements which are to be used. To receive compensation, if the injunction case was won by National Authority of Consumer Protection, a consumer must introduce a separate action in court, according to the Romanian Civil Procedural Code. The National Authority of Consumer Protection is not entitled to make these kind of request in court. Through a civil case, against a trader the professional need to fully repay the price (and interest) and to compensate damages to the consumer and also to pay the judicial charges.

Recently, in Romania, was adopted the Emergency Ordinance no. 39 of 31 May 2017 on the actions in damages in cases of breach of the provisions of the legislation in competition matters, as well as to change and completing Competition Law no. 21/1996. The Government Emergency Ordinance deals with the transposition into national law of Directive 2014/104 / EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 26 November 2014 on certain rules governing actions for compensation under the of national law in the event of infringements of the provisions of competition law in the Member States and the European Union.

5. Collective redress and alternative dispute resolution in the European Union

An European Commission consultation[2] from 2011 it has been Furthermore, it has been revealed that majority of consumers (an EU average of 79%, rising to 90% in Ireland) would be more willing to defend their rights in court if they could join a collective action. The same consultation showed the consumers strongly prefer collective actions in mass claim situations, 96% said they would certainly or likely join a group action with other persons affected by the same business behavior.

Also, in 2011, in all EU Member States (with the exception of Hungary), a majority of respondents agreed that they would be more willing to defend their rights in court if they could join with other consumers who were complaining about the same thing, according to Flash Eurobarometer 299 "Consumer attitudes towards cross border trade and consumer protection", March 2011

In conclusion, consumers in Member States, which do not have collective redress mechanisms in place, are likely to suffer a detriment as a result of the unavailability of such mechanisms.

Therefore, existing individual redress mechanisms are unsuitable for mass consumer claims. For example, only the internal market of the European Union has 500 million potential consumers and the non-compliance of the producers or providers of services or of the sellers with the legal rules regarding the consumers' rights produce mass harm or hazardous situation for the consumers. Only in a few EU Member States as Spain, Portugal, Belgium and Italy it was possible for consumers to make collective redress claims against the company because very few national mechanisms can really be used with positive results, even if there are an amalgam of national collective redress mechanisms currently in place in the European Union.

These inefficient mechanisms cause lack of compensation for harm suffered by the mass of consumers and is an elapse of the legal system that allows for illegal profit to be retained by unfair traders. Moreover, there are numerous cross border mass detriment situations where consumers are not protected because lack of an appropriate mechanism.

But, do collective redress in court works? Does obtains cheaply, rapidly and effective mass solutions? Collective actions also take long time and are also expensive.

[2] http://ec.europa.eu/competition/consultations/2011_collective_redress/ocu_en.pdf

In the OECD's Recommendation on Consumer Dispute Resolution and Redress[3], OECD recommends that all states should adopt mechanisms that enable consumers to be able to resolve disputes effectively, whether individually, collectively or through public authorities, and accentuates the need for a combination of mechanisms, preferring direct negotiation as the first option. Early settlement of disputes should be encouraged whenever possible, and the litigation in court should be viewed as a last choice.

Collective out-of-court dispute resolution schemes should take into account the requirements of Directive 2008/52/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 21 May 2008 on certain aspects of mediation in civil and commercial matters43 but should also be specifically tailored for collective actions.

In the past decade, and especially after adopting the Directive 2013/11/EU on alternative dispute resolution (ADR), alternative dispute resolution has been included within court procedures and separate structures of Consumer ADR have been constructed that are set to expand considerably (Hodges et al. 2012a). Alternative dispute resolution bodies have to meet strict EU quality criteria, which guarantee that they handle the disputes between traders and consumers dispute in an effective, fair, independent and transparent way. Also, under European Union law, consumers can use these bodies to handle all contractual disputes they have with a trader established in the European Union. Alternative dispute resolution can be used for any market sector (such as financial services, e-commerce, tourism, transport, telecoms and energy).

Some of them reached a pan-European coverage, as FIN-NET. FIN-NET is a network of national organizations responsible for settling consumers' complaints in the area of financial services out of court. The network covers the countries of the European Economic Area[4] (the European Union, Iceland, Liechtenstein and Norway). As good example of tool in consumer tool-kit, FIN-NET was set up by the European Commission in 2001 to promote cooperation among national ombudsmen in financial services provide consumers with easy access to alternative dispute resolution (ADR) procedures in cross-border disputes about provision of financial services.

On 11 June 2013, European Commission adopted a Recommendation [5] on common principles for injunctive and compensatory collective redress mechanisms in the Member States concerning violations of rights granted under Union Law. The purpose of this Recommendation is "to facilitate access to justice, stop illegal practices and enable injured parties to obtain compensation in mass harm situations caused by violations of rights granted under Union law, while ensuring appropriate procedural safeguards to avoid abusive litigation". The Recommendation is a proposed framework, is not mandatory and many aspects remained subject to internal national rules for each of Member States. Also, European Commission has published on 26th January 2018 a report[6] regarding the progress made by Member States on the implementation of collective redress measures following the Commission's 2013 Recommendation[7].

The Commission's 2013/396/EU Recommendation stresses that all Member States should have collective redress mechanisms at national level, both injunctive and compensatory, available in all cases where rights granted under Union law are, or have been, violated to the detriment of more than one person.

Regarding collective out-of-court dispute resolution, the 2013/396/EU Recommendation requests Member States to encourage parties to settle their disputes consensually or out-of-court, before or during the litigation and to make collective out-of-court dispute resolution mechanisms available alongside or as a voluntary element of judicial collective redress. Also, suggests that limitation periods applicable to the claims should be suspended during the alternative dispute resolution procedure. Regarding the binding outcome of a collective settlement, the Commission proposes it should be controlled by a court (paragraphs 25 to 28 of the Commission Recommendation, Collective alternative dispute resolution and settlements). Recommendation also provides that the use of collective out-of-court dispute resolution should depend on the express consent of the parties involved, whereas in relation to individual claims it may be mandatory.

The advantages of introducing such schemes of collective alternative dispute resolution and settlements in collective redress mechanisms are the potential positive effects on the length of the proceedings, lowering the costs for parties and for judicial systems, and I foresee them as being an efficient way of dealing with mass harm situations. Using ADR procedures does not prevent parties from exercising their right of

[3] OECD Recommendation on Consumer Dispute Resolution and Redress (Paris: OECD, 2007) at http://www.oecd.org/dataoecd/43/50/38960101.pdf

[4] In Romania, Center of Alternative Solution of litigations in Banking System (CSALB) was constituted according the Government Ordinance no. 38/2015 with the purpose of organizing and managing the alternative solution of litigation in banking sector, respectively between the consumers and credit institutions. Since September 2017 the Ministry of Economy has the responsibility to analyze the requests of bodies wishing to be alternative solution entities litigation, to ensure that they comply with the legal provisions and to notify the list entities admitted to the European Commission. This is the first step of including the Alternative Dispute Resolution Center for Banking (CSALB) in the European Alternative Dispute Resolution Platform, FIN-NET.

[5] Commission Recommendation of 11 June 2013 on common principles for injunctive and compensatory collective redress mechanisms in the Member States concerning violations of rights granted under Union law (2013/396/EU) (OJ L 201 of 26.7.2013) access to the judicial system in case does not settle the problem by out-of-court resolution. At the last resort, the only truly convincing incentive for traders to respond seriously and in good faith to collective redress ADR is the final threat of collective redress.

[6] http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=COM:2018:40:FIN

[7] http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=OJ:JOL_2013_201_R_NS0013

As we see, in fact these two solutions in the consumer toolkit – alternative dispute resolution and collective redress have become recently closely connected, promoted politically and put in practice.

The report shows that the availability of collective redress mechanisms as well as the implementation of safeguards against the potential abuse of such mechanisms is still not consistent across the EU. „Collective redress in the form of injunctive relief exists in all Member States with regard to consumer cases falling within the scope of the Injunctions Directive[8]" (…) Compensatory collective redress is available in 19 Member States (AT, BE, BG, DE, DK, FI, FR, EL, HU, IT, LT, MT, NL, PL, PT, RO, ES, SE, UK) but in over half of them it is limited to specific sectors, mainly to consumer claims." The scope of the Injunctions Directive covers infringements of EU consumer laws as enumerated in its Annex I.

But, also the report reveals that "among the 19 Member States that have compensatory relief schemes, 11 have introduced specific provisions on collective out-of-court dispute resolution mechanisms (BE, BG, DK, FR, DE, IT, LT, NL, PL, PT, UK). This list includes the three Member States that have adopted new legislation after the adoption of the Recommendation (BE, FR and LT) as well as the UK which introduced a specific provision on out-of-court dispute resolution in the competition mechanism. In its legislative proposal, SI is largely following the Recommendation. The remaining 8 Member States that have collective redress schemes apply general provisions on out-of-court dispute resolution to such situations, for instance as implemented in the national legislation pursuant to Directive 2008/52/EC.

Regarding cross-border cases, the Recommendation requires Member States to not prevent, through national rules on admissibility or standing, participation of foreign groups of claimants or foreign representative entities in a single collective action before their courts. In present, in cross border situations, consumers have to act individually to obtain compensation. But, European Court of Justice, in the recent judgment in Case C-498/16 Maximilian Schrems v Facebook Ireland Limited, stated that European consumers cannot group their claims and go to one single court in their home country collectively when faced with the same misconduct and resulting damages by a company.

As still are a large number of European consumers which are deprived from using a collective redress tool, as several Member States have not introduced collective redress mechanisms in their national system, the ruling issued by the European Court of Justice has limited consumer options for better access to justice in mass harm cases. A great divergence between the Member States persists in terms of the availability and the nature of collective redress mechanisms,

Just few EU countries have introduced or amended legislation in this area following the European Commission's recommendation, and 9 countries still do not provide any possibility for consumers to claim compensation collectively.

For example, the Romanian procedural law does not provide expressly for a mechanism for class action or for collective redress and Romanian law does not offer special proceedings for complex class action litigations. The Civil procedure code only provides the legal possibility for claims between different Parties to be united and the fact that the Romanian procedural law allows multiple claimants, it contains no actual legal provisions implementing the Commission Recommendation of 11 June 2013 on common principles for injunctive and compensatory collective redress mechanisms in the Member States concerning violations of rights granted under Union Law (2013/396/EU).

The consumers that suffered damages due to the inclusion of unfair terms in their respective agreements concluded with professionals may claim damages from the professional.

The Government Ordinance nr.21/1992 provides the possibility to establish Consumer Association defined by law as non-profit legal persons founded in the purpose of representing the rights and interests of their members or as well as the general interest.

On 31 May 2017, he Romanian government adopted Government Emergency Ordinance no. 39/2017 on damage claims related to cases of competition law infringements and amending the Competition law no. 21/1996, which transposes to Romanian law Directive 2014/104/EU of 26 November 2014 on certain rules governing actions for damages under national law for infringements of the competition law provisions of the Member States and of the European Union (the "Damages Directive"). The 39/2017 GEO establishes the right of any person that suffered harm caused following an infringement of competition law by an undertaking or association of undertakings to claim full compensation before the competent courts.

6. Conclusions

At this moment, there are powerful consumer protection rules in place in European Union, but regarding public enforcement by way of ceasing infringements and imposing fines, does not in itself enable consumers to be compensated for damage suffered. Through injunctive actions, consumer organizations and/ or national authorities for consumer protection act in court to put an end to illegal practices. European consumers suffering from damage caused by the same trader should be able to coordinate their claims effectively and efficiently into one single action in all European Member States. The integration of European markets and the consequent increase in cross-border activities highlight the need for EU-wide, consistent, redress mechanisms, available in out-of-court, alternative dispute resolution system and also in judicial system. Because of the demand is for a binding instrument at Community level. A collective redress mechanism should be available to every European consumer, for both national and cross border cases, irrespective of the value of the claim. Without functioning collective redress procedures, consumers do not have chances to get remedies even in cases of evident infringements of their rights. The introduction both to judicial and out-of-court of more effective collective actions and collective redress mechanisms that should be common across the Union, while respecting the different legal traditions of the Member States, could yield benefits to consumers in countries where collective redress mechanisms have not been introduced yet, as well as to consumers in countries where collective redress mechanisms are already available.

[8] Directive 2009/22/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 23 April 2009 on injunctions for the protection of consumers' interests

It is possible that the existence of collective redress mechanisms at Community level to create a higher exposure to liability for a company, because other means of redress (such as individual court action) may be in practice unavailable to consumers due to the costs of litigation or other obstacles. Also, existing collective redress mechanisms, both out-of- court or by litigation, may decrease rather than increase the costs for traders, in case that a multitude of separate litigations, potentially in different courts, is replaced by one collective procedure. Therefore, a procedure is necessary to be available in all EU Member States, based on minimum requirements: an equilibrium between the rights of both parties and not making the system too complex and overburdened with procedural requirements and rules. to address certain identified shortcomings of the Consumer Rights Directives could be beneficial by introducing EU-level rights to remedies (such as right to terminate the contract or to receive a refund of the price paid) for victims of unfair commercial practices, improving the awareness, enforcement of the rules and redress opportunities to make the best of the existing legislation.

As the Report on the implementation of collective redress mechanisms by Member States shows that the availability of collective redress mechanisms as well as the implementation of safeguards against the potential abuse of such mechanisms is still not consistent across the EU. EU legislation protects well the rights of consumers, the Commission will propose a "New Deal for Consumers, to further strengthen ways of enforcement and redress for consumers.

References

- Christopher Hodges, Collective Redress: A Breakthrough or a Damp Squibb? in Journal of Consumer Policy 37(1), March 2013
- Christopher Hodges, Current discussions on consumer redress: collective redress and ADR, Published online: 11 January 2012, https://www.law.ox.ac.uk/sites/files/oxlaw/here_2_2.pdf
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=OJ:JOL_2013_201_R_NS0013
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=COM:2018:40:FIN
- http://ec.europa.eu/newsroom/just/item-detail.cfm?item_id=612847
- https://ec.europa.eu/info/business-economy-euro/banking-and-finance/consumer-finance-and-payments/consumer-financial-services/financial-dispute-resolution-network-fin-net_en
- http://www.civic-consulting.de/reports/collective%20redress_study.pdf

RULINGS OF THE NATIONAL COURTS FOLLOWING THE CURIA DECISION IN CASE C-186/16, ANDRICIUC AND OTHERS VS BANCA ROMANEASCA

Monica CALU[*]
Costel STANCIU[]

Abstract

The CJEU's judgment in Andriciuc and Others vs Banca Românească Case C-186/16 that came in September 2017 is an addition to a growing body of case law on procedural obstacles to consumer protection under Directive 93/13/EEC. According to the Court, a contractual term must be drafted in plain intelligible language, the information obligations should be performed by the bank in a manner to make the well-informed and reasonably observant and circumspect consumer aware of both possibility of a rise or fall in the value of the foreign currency and also enabling estimation of the significant economic consequences of repayment of the loan in the same currency as the currency in which the loan was taken out.

Following a succession of consumer-friendly preliminary rulings from European Court of Justice (Case C-26/13, Árpád Kásler, Hajnalka Káslerné Rábai v OTP Jelzálogbank Zrt and Case C-186/16 Andriciuc and Others v Banca Românească, bank customers across the European Union are increasingly taking their banks to court. However, there are still a lot provisions in the national legislations which made the judicial review of unfair contract terms difficult and reveals the limits of consumer protection under Directive 93/13. Also, we focus on the powers of the national court when dealing with a term considered to be unfair (civil) courts and the availability of legal remedies in ensuring the effectiveness of the Directive.

Although the CJEU provides interpretation of EU law, the national court alone has jurisdiction to find and assess the facts in the case before it and to interpret and apply national law. The ruling issued by the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJUE) in the Andriciuc versus Banca Românească case represents a great advantage for some of the European debtors.

In this paper, we intend to examine, starting from the theory of abusive clauses and referring to the jurisprudence of the European Court of Justice in the matter, to what extent it is possible that under Council Directive 93/13 / EEC of 5 April 1993 on unfair terms in consumer contracts and the national laws of the various Member States to order "freeze of the exchange rate" or conversion of the currency of the credit into domestic currency

Keywords: „Unfair terms in consumer contracts"; "plain intelligible language" in „consumer contracts"; „Significant imbalance in the parties" rights and obligations arising under the contract"; „ Case C-186/16 Andriciuc and Others v Banca Românească"; „Case C-26/13, Árpád Kásler, Hajnalka Káslerné Rábai v OTP Jelzálogbank".

1. Introduction

The problem of foreign exchange loans in Romania, as well as in other European Countries, is well known. Banks have been miss selling this kind of loans, especially in Swiss Francs (CHF), to European families with a terrible impact in their economy.

The European Court of Justice ruled on 20th of September 2107 that lenders must be frank with borrowers about the economic consequences of foreign-currency loans. "When a financial institution grants a loan denominated in a foreign currency, it must provide the borrower with sufficient information to enable him to take a prudent and well-informed decision."

A preliminary ruling was requested in a proceedings between Mrs Ruxandra Paula Andriciuc and 68 other consumers with Swiss francs loans and Banca Românească SA ('the Bank'). Ruxandra Paula Andriciuc and 68 other borrowers brought the underlying challenge in the District Court of Bihor, Romania, with regard to loans they obtained in Swiss francs from Banca Românească about a decade ago.

In 2007 and 2008, Mrs Ruxandra Paula Andriciuc and other persons who received their income in Romanian lei (RON) took out loans denominated in Swiss francs (CHF) with the Romanian bank Banca Românească in order to purchase immoveable property, finance other loans, or meet their personal needs. According to the loan agreements concluded between the parties, the borrowers were obliged to make the monthly loan repayments in CHF and they accepted to bear the risk related to possible fluctuations in the exchange rate between the RON and the CHF. In the event that the borrowers failed to repay their loans, the contracts allowed Banca Romaneasca to debit their accounts and carry out any currency conversion where necessary, using that day's exchange rate.

Mrs Andriciuc and the other borrowers claim in their lawsuit that the contracts were unfair, saying the Swiss franc fluctuates significantly against the Romanian leu, and that the bank failed to fully explain the exchange risk despite its foresight about the exchange rate. The exchange rate changed considerably, at enormous cost to the borrowers.

[*] Consumer Law Expert Pro Consumatori Association (e-mail: monica.calu@apc-romania.ro)

[] Associate Professor, PhD, Faculty of Economics and Business Administration, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: costelstanciu@apc-romania.ro)

Between mid-2007 and mid-2011, the lei's value halved against the Swiss frank.

The main argument put forward by the borrowers was that, „at the time of conclusion of the contract the bank presented its product in a biased manner, only pointing out the benefits to the borrowers without highlighting the potential risks and the likelihood of those risks occurring. According to the borrowers, in the light of the bank's practice, the disputed term must be regarded as being unfair."

Judgment C-186/16 was issued on the request of the Appellate Court in Oradea (Romania) for a preliminary ruling, in which the Romanian court asked several questions regarding the scope of banks' obligation to inform clients about the exchange rate risk in foreign currency loans, from the perspective of the Directive 93/13/EEC on unfair terms in consumer contracts.

The Court of Justice ruled in case C-186/16 "that financial institutions must provide borrowers with adequate information to enable them to take well-informed and prudent decisions and should at least encompass the impact on installments of a severe depreciation of the legal tender of the member state in which a borrower is domiciled and of an increase of the foreign interest rate."

If the contract terms were clear is a question that the Romanian court must examine.

In addition, the CJEU took the view that, when determining the existence of an uneven position of contracting parties, the circumstance whether a bank, at the moment of entering into the contract, had certain knowledge on the facts that could affect the performance of contractual obligations has to be taken into account as well.

"First, the borrower must be clearly informed of that fact that, by concluding a loan agreement denominated in a foreign currency he is exposing himself to a certain foreign exchange risk which will, potentially, be difficult to bear in the event of a fall in the value of the currency in which he receives his income," the court said in a statement about the ruling. "Second, the financial institution must explain the possible variations in the exchange rate and the risks inherent in taking out a loan in a foreign currency, particularly where the consumer borrower does not receive his income in that currency."

If the bank has not fulfilled those obligations, the national court must determine whether the bank acted in bad faith and if the parties to the contract are imbalanced.

"That assessment must be made by reference to the time of conclusion of the contract concerned, taking account of the expertise and knowledge of the bank, in the present case the bank, as far as concerns the possible variations in the rate of exchange and the inherent risks in contracting a loan in a foreign currency," the court's statement says[1].

But for the consumers in this case the legal battle is far from over. Having ruled on this point of law, the ECJ handed the case back to the Romanian courts to determine whether the Romanian bank has met these criteria, because the Court of Justice does not decide the dispute itself. It is for the national court or tribunal to dispose of the case in accordance with the Court's decision, which is similarly binding on other national courts or tribunals before which a similar issue is raised.

With this ruling the CJEU has created a very wide space for examining clauses which established the liability to repay the loans in foreign currencies. Namely, as a result of the subject judgment, if it is determined that a bank did not inform its client about possible risks, but emphasized only the advantages when entering into the contract, the subject term may be declared unfair, and consequently null, i.e. without legal effect.

The number of individuals in Romania with Swiss franc loans declined to 37,907 at the end of the first quarter of 2017, half as compared to 2014, before the franc grew strongly against the Romanian leu. At the end of 2014 there were 74,849 francs debtors. Credits in Swiss francs are mainly directed to the population - 98% and 5.3 billion lei respectively. In March 2017, banks had 12,252 mortgage loans and 12,458 mortgage-backed consumer loans denominated in Swiss francs. As a result of the negotiation between debtors in Swiss francs and banks, 37,586 consumers accepted the conversion of the loans from Swiss francs to leu. In front of the Romanian courts are a few thousand consumers asking the declarations that the term according to which the loan must be repaid in CHF, regardless of the potential losses that those borrowers might sustain on account of the exchange rate risk, is an unfair term which is not binding on them in accordance with the provisions of Directive 93/13/EEC[2] on unfair terms in consumer contracts.

2. Content

In C-186/16 case, examining the aspects of the knowledge of average consumers and banks' obligations towards them, the European Court of Justice establishes that contractual terms regarding the denomination of a consumer loan in a foreign currency and the requirement the loan to be paid back in the same currency are core terms of the loan agreement. They are seen as defining the 'main subject matter of the contract' (par. 38). This implies that this contractual clauses are not subject to the unfairness test, provided the terms were transparent.

Curia's decision distinguishes between consumer loan agreements denominated in foreign currency

[1] https://curia.europa.eu/jcms/upload/docs/application/pdf/2017-09/cp170103en.pdf

[2] http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=celex%3A31993L0013

which have to be paid back in the same currency (like in current case), and the loan contracts where the monthly installments only have been indexed to foreign currencies, which means that the repayment occurs in local currency and its rate is calculated on the basis of the exchange rate of foreign currency (para. 39-40):

"39 It is true that the Court held in paragraph 59 of the judgment of 30 April 2014, Kásler and Káslerné Rábai (C-26/13, EU:C:2014:282) that the 'main subject matter of the contract' covers a term incorporated in a loan agreement denominated in a foreign currency concluded between a seller or supplier and a consumer which was not individually negotiated, pursuant to which the selling rate of exchange of that currency applies for the calculation of the loan repayments, only if it is established, which is for the national court to ascertain, that that term lays down an essential obligation of that agreement which, as such, characterizes it.

40 However, as the referring court also pointed out, in the case which gave rise to the judgment of 30 April 2014, Kásler and Káslerné Rábai (C-26/13, EU:C:2014:282), the loans, although denominated in foreign currency, had to be repaid in the national currency according to the selling rate of exchange applied by the bank, whereas in the case in the main proceedings, the loans must be repaid in the same foreign currency as that in which they were issued. As the Advocate General observes, in point 51 of his Opinion, loan agreements indexed to foreign currencies cannot be treated in the same way as loan agreements in foreign currencies, such as those at issue in the main proceedings.). In the second case, the term describing the repayment mechanism could be classified as an ancillary contractual term, and, therefore, subject to the unfairness test. The same cannot be said of the term setting an obligation to repay the loan in the same (foreign) currency:

"...the fact that a loan must be repaid in a certain currency relates, in principle, not to an ancillary repayment arrangement, but to very nature of the debtor's obligation, thereby constituting an essential element of a loan agreement." (par. 38)

Consumers in Andriciuc case did not, therefore, enjoyed the protection of the Council Directive 93/13/EEC of 5 April 1993 on unfair terms in consumer contracts, because, Oradea Court of appeal, in Decision 370/2017 28.11.2017 rendered in file no. 1713/111/2014 that the plaintiffs couldn't prove that the contractual term was non-transparent (not written in plain and intelligible language):

"Although the court finds that the defendant has not proved that it has informed the plaintiffs of the actual consequences of the reimbursement clause, the court of appeal considers that this lack of information is not such as to lead to the absolute nullity of the clause, because an informed average consumer knows that the currency in which it was borrowed is subject to a currency risk, unless it could retain bad faith of the defendant that the lender was aware that there will be a significant depreciation of the national currency, a currency shock, sufficient to break the contractual balance between the parties. In this regard, it should be noted that, as stated above, the clause providing for the repayment of a loan in a foreign currency is the contractual transposition of the principle of monetary nominalism regulated by Art. 1578 Civil code, which in a credit agreement is naturally implicit, even in the absence of a contractual clause in this respect. Foreign currency credit agreements are not characterized by the usual imbalance in consumer contracts caused by the consumer's lack of information or differences in negotiating power, but by an imbalance generated by the attribution of currency risk to the consumer because the bank always receives the currency in which the credit was granted, irrespective of the intrinsic value of the foreign currency in which the credit is denominated, but the consumer who earns the income in another currency, in case of devaluation of it against the currency of the credit, has to submit an additional financial effort to obtain the necessary resources for repayment. Although a certain level of informational asymmetry can be identified between the bank and the consumer even in the case of foreign currency loans, the information held by the bank does not allow it to anticipate the shock events and consumer ignorance no longer plays the same role in the equilibrium contractual imbalance. Forex fluctuations are not only abnormal but are quite typical and predictable, but if course variations can be anticipated, their meaning and magnitude can not be anticipated. The unpredictability of foreign exchange fluctuations must also be related to the different degrees of currency exoticism, but irrespective of the status of the foreign currency on the credit market, currency shocks are generally unpredictable events not only for the consumer but also for the bank."

The Oradea Court of Appeal continues: "Even if one could have anticipated a certain increase in the exchange rate, as existed in previous periods, when there were variations in the course, without these being excessive, from the evidence administered does not result that the defendant could have anticipated the extent of the increase exchange rate CHF/ Leu in the period following the granting of the loans. It was identified only after the economic crisis and after the outbreak of currency shocks into the true size, the problems caused by foreign currency lending, both the recommendation of the ESRB / 2011 and the 2014/17 / EU Directive following them. Even though, as is apparent from the recitals of Directive 2014/17 / EU[3], it was noted that there was an irresponsible behavior of market participants this aspect is not likely to leads to the conclusion that the bank, at the time of the granting of the loans, knew or could have known or anticipate the subsequent currency shock."

[3] Directive 2014/17/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 4 February 2014 on credit agreements for consumers relating to residential immovable property

This reasoning follows also from the European Court of Justice in judgement for a for a preliminary ruling in case C-186/16, Ruxandra Paula Andriciuc and Others v Banca Românească SA, and invoking the European Systematic Risk Board's Recommendation ESRB/2011/1 of 1 September 2011 which specified risks to consumers of lending in foreign currencies (par. 49): "49 In the present case, as regards loans in currencies like those at issue in the main proceedings, it must be noted, as the European Systematic Risk Board stated in its Recommendation ESRB/2011/1 of 21 September 2011 on lending in foreign currencies (OJ 2011 C 342, p. 1)4, that financial institutions must provide borrowers with adequate information to enable them to take well-informed and prudent decisions and should at least encompass the impact on instalments of a severe depreciation of the legal tender of the Member State in which a borrower is domiciled and of an increase of the foreign interest rate (Recommendation A — Risk awareness of borrowers, paragraph 1)."

The Oradea Court concludes: "The Court of Appeal does not dispute that, as a result of the explosive growth of the Swiss franc, the execution the credit agreements would not have become overly burdensome for the applicants, both from the point of view of the financial effort that they must make to pay the rates, as well with regard to the balance of credits, most of plaintiffs are likely to be in a situation where, while paying rates nearly 10 years, the remaining balance in lei equivalent is equal to or even higher than the credit equivalent in RON at the time it was granted, but, as it showed both the court of first instance and the Romanian Constitutional Court by decision no. 62/2017[5], these issues are not likely to lead to nullity of clauses, but could call into question contractually solidarism and adjusting the contract by applying the unpredictability, not covered by the object of case."

The German Federal Court in Karlsruhe (Bundesgerichtshof – BGH is the highest court of civil and criminal jurisdiction in Germany) in case XI ZR 152/17, decided on 19 December 2017 with a judgment in favor of the borrower. Notwithstanding the fact that in a concrete lawsuit it is not about a consumer, who has special protection, the German Federal Court has ruled that the explanatory duty of the bank in terms of foreign currency loans must include specific weaknesses and risks of such a product.

In Spain, the Supreme Court, Civil Chamber, in Ruling no. 608/2017 tof November 15, 2017, which considered that a multi-currency clause did not exceed transparency control. "43.- The lack of transparency of the clauses relating to the denomination in foreign currency of the loan and the equivalence in Euros of the repayment instalments and of the capital pending amortisation, is not innocuous for the consumer but causes a serious imbalance, going against the requirements of good faith, since, by not knowing the serious risks involved in contracting the loan, they could not compare the offer of the multicurrency mortgage loan with those of other loans, or with the option of maintaining the loans already granted and that were cancelled through the multicurrency loan, which generated new expenses for the borrowers, the payment of which came from the amount obtained with the new loan. The economic situation of the borrowers worsened severely when the risk of fluctuation materialised, such that not only the periodic instalment payments increased drastically, but the Euro equivalence of the capital pending amortisation increased instead of decreasing while they were paying regular instalments, which was detrimental to them when the bank exercised its power to terminate the loan early and demand the capital pending amortisation in a foreclosure process, which turned out to be superior to the amount they had received from the lender when arranging the loan."

51. - No matter how much Barclays alleges the difference between the loan object of this appeal and the one which is the subject of the main proceedings in respect of which the questions were referred giving rise to the judgments of the CJEU, and in particular the STJUE of the Andriciuc case, requires the denomination in a given monetary unit of the amounts stipulated in the pecuniary obligations, which is an inherent requirement of monetary obligations.

There is no problem of separability of the invalid content from the loan contract.

55. - This substitution of a contractual regime is possible when it comes to avoiding the total nullity of the contract in which the unfair clauses are contained, so as not to harm the consumer, since, otherwise, the purpose of the Directive on unfair clauses would be contravened.

This was stated by the CJEU in the judgment of 30 April 2014 (Kásler and Káslerné Rábai case, C-26/13), paragraphs 76 to 85.

References

- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/ALL/?uri=CELEX%3A32014L0017
- http://www.fxloans.org/sentencias/supremo/STS_171115_BARCLAYS_REVOCA_150414_AP8_MADRID_REVOCA_140512_JPI84_MADRID_HMD_TRANSPARENCIA_ASUFIN_SIN_ENG.pdf
- http://curia.europa.eu/juris/document/document.jsf?text=&docid=151524&pageIndex=0&doclang=EN&mode=lst&dir=&occ=first&part=1&cid=1358661

[4] https://www.esrb.europa.eu/pub/pdf/recommendations/2011/ESRB_2011_1.en.pdf

[5] Decizia nr. 62/2017 referitoare la admiterea obiecției de neconstituționalitate a dispozițiilor Legii pentru completarea Ordonanței de urgență a Guvernului nr. 50/2010 privind contractele de credit pentru consumatori, text published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 161 03 March 2017

CHALLENGES OF THE NOT-SO-FAR FUTURE: EU ROBOTICS AND AI LAW IN BUSINESS

Roxana Mihaela CATEA[*]

Abstract

The paper focuses on the emerging European legislation in the area of artificial intelligence and robotics, based on the currently fast developing technical procedures for the manufacture of products characterized by autonomy. The importance of having a clear and stable legislation for the production and spread of technical devices has been under discussion for some time now and member states have reached preliminary conclusions regarding the definition and criteria by which one can identify artificial intelligence. Also, continuous innovation lead to the necessity of integrating these AI products in common household economy and therefore, the need for a proper legal framework addressing both liability and limits for creating and operating machines for civil use arose. This article shall review the measures already taken by the European Parliament and the European Commission for the establishment of a standardized legal framework related to robotic and artificial intelligence products. The objectives of this study are to analyze the general guidelines available as created by the EU legislator which shall ultimately be transposed in national legislation, in order to supersede the current lack of regulations for companies developing and selling AI products nation-wide.

Keywords: "civil law rules on robotics", "artificial intelligence and its liability", "Robotics Regulation in the European Union", "robotics liability".

1. Introduction

Law should be the expression of a set of norms emerging from the current real situations mankind is confronted with. For example, once you have the first homicide, the state regulates that homicide is a criminal offence and any perpetrator is punished. But what is the solution when reality is faster than the legal framework and you find yourself in a situation where, for example, a Tesla car without a driver while circulating within the limits of legal obligations applied to any man-driven vehicle, endangers a citizen on a crossing? Or how will a situation when several autonomous cars collide, creating human victims, be dealt with? Who shall bear liability in such case - the car manufacturer, the IT software manager or the person sitting on the left side who did not intervene? And whom shall you prosecute in such a case: the human or the robot itself?

Currently, we are unable to fully reply to these queries, since the available framework applies limitedly and by analogy. We have only stipulated sanctions applicable for the citizens of a country without thinking that one day, damages may be occurred as a result of a non-man intervention. Well, while almost all participants to the legal system have been busy catering to more classical matters, that day has come.

Therefore, based on recent developments, there is the urgent need to establish a proper legal framework which allows citizens and professional to know their rights and obligations when contracting an artificial intelligence tool, a smart contract or when a product which may be identified as a robot creates certain changes in the contractual dynamic between parties.

2. The A-B-C of artificial intelligence

Although many may establish what artificial intelligence is based on the information available through social media or mainstream media, the truth is that there is no accurate definition generally accepted and adopted as a legal norm.

Defining a machine as intelligent was firstly done by Alan Turing, Deputy Director of the Computing Machine Laboratory at the University of Manchester, while developing the world's first stored program digital computer.

In 1950 Alan Turing created the so-called Turing Test[1] for establishing whether a machine is 'intelligent': a machine could be said to 'think for itself' if a human interlocutor could not tell it apart from another human being in conversation. However, the term "artificial intelligence" is known to have firstly been used by Professor John McCarthy at Dartmouth College, New Hampshire, USA in 1956.

In 2010, a definition of artificial intelligence which reflects the basic understanding of the term emerged:

"Artificial intelligence is that activity devoted to making machines intelligent, and intelligence is that quality that enables an entity to function appropriately and with foresight in its environment[2]".

By now, artificial intelligence has been deemed to be the fourth industrial revolution humanity is currently

[*] PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (e-mail: roxana.catea@tuca.ro)

[1] Computing Machinery and Intelligence', Alan Turing, Mind, October 1950 .

[2] The Quest for Artificial Intelligence: A History of Ideas and Achievements', Prof Nils J Nilsson, Cambridge University Press, 2010.

undergoing, in the words of the executive chairman and founder of The World Economic Forum, Klaus Schwab[3], after steam, electricity and computing. Mr Schwab's thesis is that humanity is on the break of substantial IT-driven change where we may expect a 'deep shift' by 2025 which will materially impact our lives.

Already artificial intelligence is used in our households and encountered frequently in a high-pace society. As the Briefing issued in January 2018 by the EPRS | European Parliamentary Research Service[4], artificial intelligence has became the usual technology used in the following cases: automatic translation, provided for example by Google Translate, speech recognition and interpretation, such as the example between English and Chinese demonstrated in November 2012 by Rick Rashid of Microsoft, face recognition systems used in criminal investigations or to unlock a smartphone, Self-driving vehicles: equipped with sensors and analysing gigabytes of information each second, the new generation of automated vehicles combine different AI systems to drive themselves (Tesla or Waymo), medical diagnosis: AI can help physicians establish or confirm a diagnosis (Human Dx), or even Killer robots: lethal autonomous weapons systems are able to select and engage targets with little or no human intervention

2.1. How does artificial intelligence actually work?

Artificial intelligence requires highly skilled systems which are able to learn from humans or even individually, by applying several learning methods, how to reach a result by themselves through autonomous and cognitive thinking. In order to properly operate and gain a higher level of artificial intelligence, these systems learn based on the data usually stored in cloud, with the help of humans which are responsible for guiding the learning process.

− Even in the initial stage of exploring the vast realm of artificial intelligence, the consequences of an improper use of data stored in cloud has kept recent headlines active. The case refers to Facebook's leak of data to Cambridge Analytics, a company which employed several artificial intelligence programs in order to analyze the data pertaining to a large number of people so that certain benefits in political campaigns were envisaged to be gained. European legislators foresaw this type of situation and developed the General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) (EU) 2016/679.

2.2. Practical analysis of cases in which artificial intelligence is used in relation to legal field

Although in Romania, the implementation of artificial intelligence is remote, most likely due to limited legal framework protecting the parties using such tools, the practical approach of other nations implementing these tools is remarkable.

2.2.1. Predictive coding

For example, artificial intelligence has been used by law firms for the analysis of high-volume data. In one case, the English High Court issued a decision approving the use of predictive coding technology for electronic disclosure, at the request of both parties, in Pyrrho Investments Ltd v MWB Property Ltd & Ors [2016] EWHC 256 (Ch)[5]. The most substantial point of dispute was over the most appropriate and proportionate approach to disclosure by the respondent who, it was accepted, held the significant majority of the potentially relevant documents. BLP, an English-based law firm representing the respondent, proposed that the documents were analyzed through predictive Coding, which is a machine learning technology driven by human tuition. Basically, a lawyer would initially review a small set of documents. Then, the result is analyzed by the technology and used to generate a further sample for review. If the review is considered accurate, the system is set to further review all the documents, thus being cost and time efficient. The English court ordered that predictive coding be used by the respondents' solicitors in this case, marking the first such order made without the consent of all parties.

2.2.2. Smart contracts

Another field where artificial intelligence has gained leverage is the contractual one, since by using blockchain technology, parties are able to efficiently record any data on a so-called smart contract. The blockchain is a comprehensive, always up to date accounting record or ledger of who holds what or who transferred what to whom[6]. The principle of blockchain, which became known once the Bitcoin arose in influence, is that the contracting parties may use it to record anything which they agree is the contract's object, such as movable or immovable assets, transactions, shares, financial instruments, databases etc. Blockchain technology is used for legal agreements in a similar way is was used for the creation of the Bitcoin. It is based on cryptography, meaning it allows the parties to authenticate their identities. Afterwards, it creates immutable hashes (digets) of each ledger record, the current page of records (block) and the binding that links (chains) each block to the earlier ones. Once it is created, the blockchain ledger is distributed and a complete and updated copy is held on the computers of each of the network participants - contractual parties (miners) who help keep it up to date.

[3] 'The Fourth Industrial Revolution', Klaus Schwab, World Economic Forum, 2016.

[4] Briefing issued in January 2018 by EPRS | European Parliamentary Research Service addressed to, the Members and staff of the European Parliament as background material to assist them in their parliamentary work.

[5] http://www.blplaw.com/expert-legal-insights/articles/blp-wins-contested-application-predictive-coding.

[6] Richard Kemp, Legal Aspects of Artificial Intelligence, November 2016, available at www.kempitlaw.com, November 2016.

The software can also be used to make and execute chains or bundles of contracts linked to each other, all operating autonomously and automatically. Here, the immutability of the hash (digest) representing each ledger record can get in the way, when all the links in what may end up as a long contractual chain need to execute at the same time to keep the record straight. To get around this, the blockchain is starting to be made editable, with trusted administrators – called oracles – able to change the database.

The underlying difference is that for the use of smart contracts, one must adhere to a new contractual codified infrastructure in which the operator and the user of the contractual platform are linked together by the software developer.

3. Legal and Regulatory Aspects

3.1. Is a new legal framework necessary?

Given that the application of artificial intelligence is continuously growing, it is imperative to establish whether the current legal framework suffices to address the issues regarding the application and implementation of artificial intelligence in our homes and in our businesses.

The issue of a new regulatory background has been addressed for some time now. At the USA Committee of Technology, 12 October 2016, the Executive Office of the President and the National Science and Technology Council (NSTC)[7], stated that "If a risk falls within the bounds of an existing regulatory regime, moreover, the policy discussion should start by considering whether the existing regulations already adequately address the risk, or whether they need to be adapted to the addition of AI. Also, where regulatory responses to the addition of AI threaten to increase the cost of compliance, or slow the development or adoption of beneficial innovations, policymakers should consider how those responses could be adjusted to lower costs and barriers to innovation without adversely impacting safety or market fairness".

Legal aspects regarding the utilization of artificial intelligence determine consequences in the field of contractual law, intellectual property, data privacy and tort law.

3.2. Potential legal framework regulating artificial intelligence in EU

Steps have been carried out at the level of the European Union for the creation of a proper background for the development of clear and responsible guidelines for the creation of intelligent machines and products. Law and regulation of Artificial Intelligence and robots is emerging, fuelled by the introduction of industrial and commercial applications in society.

3.2.1. Report on Civil Law Rules on Robotics

In January 2017, the European Parliament adopted a report on Civil Law Rules on Robotics that includes recommendations to the Commission on Civil Law Rules on Robotics (2015/2103/(INL).

One of the ideas discussed by the Members of the European Parliament was the imperative necessity for the European Commission to adopt legislation to clarify liability issues. Also, a voluntary ethical code of conduct on robotics for researchers and designers was discussed, so that they operate in accordance with legal and ethical standards and that robot design and use respect human dignity. The report outlined the importance of creating a European agency for robotics and artificial intelligence.

Based on the issuance of this report, Parliament's Committee on Legal Affairs (JURI) decided to hold a public consultation specifically on the future of robotics and artificial intelligence, with an emphasis on civil law rules.

3.2.2. Resolution on robotics

Further to the Report on Civil Law Rules, on 16 February 2017 the European Parliament adopted a Resolution on robotics[8] with recommendations to the Commission on Civil Law Rules on Robotics (2015/2103(INL)).

The most relevant aspect of the Resolution on robotics may be summarized as follows:

- the European Parliament called on the Commission to propose common Union definitions of cyber physical systems, autonomous systems, smart autonomous robots and their subcategories,
- a comprehensive Union system of registration of advanced robots should be introduced within the Union's internal market where relevant and necessary for specific categories of robots, and calls on the Commission to establish criteria for the classification of robots that would need to be registered,
- the existing Union legal framework should be updated and complemented, where appropriate, by guiding ethical principles in line with the complexity of robotics and its many social, medical and bioethical implications
- it should always be possible to supply the rationale behind any decision taken with the aid of artificial intelligence that can have a substantive impact on one or more persons' lives; considers that it must always be possible to reduce the artificial intelligence system´s computations to a form comprehensible by humans; considers that advanced robots should be equipped with a 'black box' which records data on every transaction carried out by the machine, including the logic that contributed to its decisions,

[7] Preparing for the Future of Artificial Intelligence', Executive Office of the President and the National Science and Technology Council (NSTC), Committee of Technology, 12 October 2016, page 11 https://www.whitehouse.gov/sites/default/files/whitehouse_files/microsites /ostp/NSTC/preparing_for_the_future_of_ai.pdf.

[8] http://www.europarl.europa.eu/sides/getDoc.do?pubRef=-//EP//TEXT+TA+P8-TA-2017-0051+0+DOC+XML+V0//EN

- asks the Commission to consider the designation of a European Agency for Robotics and Artificial Intelligence in order to provide the technical, ethical and regulatory expertise needed to support the relevant public actors, at both Union and Member State level, in their efforts to ensure a timely, ethical and well-informed response to the new opportunities and challenges, in particular those of a cross-border nature, arising from technological developments in robotics, such as in the transport sector,
- Calls on the Commission and the Member States to ensure that civil law regulations in the robotics sector are consistent with the General Data Protection Regulation and in line with the principles of necessity and proportionality.

Discussions in relation to the adoption of a full normative act and in relation to the harmonization of current framework regarding product liability, machinery standards and intellectual property are still carried out.

3. Conclusions

Although recent legal developments have opened discussions regading a new dimension of humanity's evolution, the outcome of these discussions is yet to be effectively imprimed in a mandatory regulation, at least at the level of the European Union.

Since artificial intelligence machines and programs shall use the data collected from individuals for their analysis, an important prevention step has already been taken by Europeans through the adoption of the The General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) (EU) 2016/679.

However, the necessity of a normative act regulating aspects deriving from the liability of artificial intelligence products still remains unadressed and must be considered also from the perspective of its mandatory character. To this end, it is imperative that the act adopted by the European Union is a regulation and not a directive, which Member States may implement with their own methods. Also, given that the main economies of the United States of America, Japan and Russia are not part of a common union as connected as the European Union, similar rules should be adopted in these countries, as well, so that contractual partners around the world benefit from the same protection.

Other aspects which must receive a final legal regulation are the ones related to the common understanding of the notion of a "robot". Currently, the European Parliament agreed on the several characteristics of a "smart robot", out of which it is relevant to mention the possibility to aquire autonomy through sensors or by exchanging data with its environment (inter-connectivity) and the trading and analyzing of that data and the adaptation of its behavior and actions to the environment.

In addition, it is important that technical specialists fully collaborate with legislators in order to draft full and comprehensive legal standards for the utilization of robotic machines. The development of common technical standards should not be ignored either, since this feature is likely to prevent or to solve cases in which one party bases its claim on the other party's liability and responsibility for the autonomous machine.

Last but not least, a controversial issue was addressed by the European Parliament[9] regarding including a form of "electronic personhood" to ensure rights and responsibilities for the most capable Artificial Intelligence. An improper regulation of this aspect has the most serious consequences in connection to liability of damages produced by robotic machines, applicable currently to non-man driven vehicles, for example.

References

- Alan Turing, Computing Machinery and Intelligence, Mind, October 1950
- Prof Nils J Nilsson, The Quest for Artificial Intelligence: A History of Ideas and Achievements', Cambridge University Press, 2010
- Klaus Schwab, The Fourth Industrial Revolution, World Economic Forum, 2016
- Briefing issued in January 2018 by EPRS | European Parliamentary Research Service addressed to, the Members and staff of the European Parliament as background material to assist them in their parliamentary work
- Richard Kemp, Legal Aspects of Artificial Intelligence, November 2016, available at www.kempitlaw.com
- November 2016
- Preparing for the Future of Artificial Intelligence', Executive Office of the President and the National Science and Technology Council (NSTC), Committee of Technology, 12 October 2016, page 11 https://www.whitehouse.gov/sites/default/files/whitehouse_files/microsites/ostp/NSTC/preparing_for_the_future_of_ai.pdf
- http://www.europarl.europa.eu/sides/getDoc.do?pubRef=-//EP//TEXT+TA+P8-TA-2017-0051+0+DOC+XML+V0//EN
- http://www.blplaw.com/expert-legal-insights/articles/blp-wins-contested-application-predictive-coding
- https://www.theguardian.com/technology/2017/jan/12/give-robots-personhood-status-eu-committee-argues

[9] https://www.theguardian.com/technology/2017/jan/12/give-robots-personhood-status-eu-committee-argues.

AT A CROSSROADS: THE CASE OF `PATHOLOGICAL ARBITRATION CLAUSES` WHICH DETERMINE A JURISDICTIONAL FIGHT

Paul COMȘA*

Abstract

The so-called 'pathological arbitration clauses' are ambiguously drafted arbitration agreements which disrupt the setting in motion of an arbitration proceeding. A particular situation is the case where parties refer both to the jurisdiction of the arbitration tribunals and to that of the domestic courts in their contracts, without giving further detail. Such agreements may be interpreted in different ways and they currently cause controversy among several theorists and practitioners. However, in recent years the arbitration tribunals strive to maintain the validity of the defective arbitration clauses by preferring an interpretation which gives effect to the clauses over one which does not. Our paper briefly examines this kind of defective arbitration clauses and the solutions provided by doctrinaires and courts. In the end, we assess the issue and attempt to establish the parties' true intention in order 'to remedy' the pathology.

Keywords: pathological arbitration clauses, defective arbitration agreements, defective clauses, arbitration problems, jurisdictional fight.

1. Introduction

The 'pathology' of arbitration clauses is, unfortunately, an "evergreen" phenomenon. It is neither new nor uncommon for law practitioners to encounter hypotheses when parties insert ill-drafted arbitration agreements which generate confusion surrounding the setting in motion of an arbitration proceeding. The ambiguity of such contractual terms is rarely intentional. It is true that in certain hypotheses the contractual party who drafts the arbitration clause voluntarily refers to equivoque arbitration procedures or to the jurisdiction of domestic courts in order to discourage the other party to follow the arbitration path. However, in most cases, parties do not act in bad faith. Instead, they usually lack basic knowledge for drafting contractual terms and do not incorporate the arbitration agreements generally recommended by international arbitration courts.

In my opinion, which may be slightly different to the ones of other law theorists, 'pathological arbitration clauses' are not to be confused with null or void clauses. The latter are terms that deviate from one or more of the validity conditions.

Being accepted as a distinct agreement, separate from the underlying agreement[1], the arbitration clause must comply with the essential validity requirements of any contract. Under Romanian law[2], a contract is valid when the parties have the required capacity to conclude it, their consent is freely and validly expressed, respectively the agreement has a specific and lawful subject, a legal and moral aim and a proper form.

Furthermore, any arbitration clause concluded under Romanian law shall comply with the following additional validity requirements:

a) The contracting parties shall have full exercise of their rights[3];
b) The potential litigation considered by the arbitration clause shall be arbitrable[4];
c) The agreement to arbitrate must be concluded in written form[5].

In most cases, `pathological arbitration clauses` are valid agreements, which comply with all the legal requirements highlighted above, but their wording is faulty and they may lead to legal effects other than the ones envisaged by parties at the time of conclusion of the contract.

Stricto sensu, from a practitioners' perspective[6], `pathological arbitration clauses` are defective arbitration agreements of the following types:

a) Clauses where the agreement to arbitrate is absent or equivoque;
b) Clauses which are not clear in terms of the rules to be followed in the event of arbitration;
c) Ambiguous arbitration agreements that do not clearly designate the place of arbitration or the arbitrators;

* Assistant Professor, PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: paulcom7@gmail.com).

[1] See Article 550 paragraph (2) of the Romanian Code of Civil Procedure (Law no. 134/2010 regarding the Romanian Code of Civil Procedure, as republished in the Romanian Official Journal no. 247/2015 and last amended on March 24th 2017).

[2] See Article 1179 of the Romanian Civil Code (Law no. 287/2009 regarding the Civil Code, as republished in the Romanian Official Journal no. 505/2011 and last amended on March 24th 2017).

[3] See Article 542 of the Romanian Code of Civil Procedure.

[4] See Article 1112 of the Romanian Code of Civil Procedure.

[5] See Article 548 paragraph (1) of the Romanian Code of Civil Procedure.

[6] From a theoreticians' perspective, see Jacques Beguin, Michel Menjucq, Droit du commerce international (International Trade Law), Lexis Nexis Publishing House, Paris, 2011, p. 1092 and Nigel Blackaby, Constantine Partasides with Alan Redfern and Martin Hunter, Redfern and Hunter on International Arbitration, Oxford University Press, New York, 2009, pp. 146-149.

d) Arbitration agreements that name arbitrators who are now deceased, incapable or refuse to act;
e) Agreements that provide unreasonably short deadlines in the arbitration procedure;
f) Arbitration clauses which contain various internal contradictions etc.

Among these kinds of ill-drafted terms, one of the most encountered `pathological clauses` are the so-called `optional arbitration agreements`[7] where parties are allowed to choose between an arbitration tribunal and a domestic court of law for settling a potential dispute.

The current paper briefly covers the issue of `pathological optional arbitration agreements', due to the wide variety of interpretation problems they raise in practice.

This matter is not new to doctrinaries. Actually, the term `pathological clauses` ('clauses pathologiques`) was introduced 44 years ago by a French law theorist named Frédéric Eisemann[8]. There is also a rich jurisprudence related to this legal phenomenon. However, the issue still determines many controversies in practice and is not sufficiently debated in the Romanian legal literature.

The aims of this article are to raise awareness on defective arbitration agreements in order to limit the common occurrence of improper drafting and, respectively, to provide remedies for the `pathology` of `optional arbitration clauses`, being inspired by international doctrine and case law.

2. The Pathology of Optional Arbitration Clauses

2.1. General Remarks

Both law theorists and practitioners expressed various opinions concerning the hypothesis of ill-drafted `optional arbitration agreements`.

Among the most frequently encountered types of `pathologies`, I have considered the following to be examined by the current article:

a) The case where parties incorporated two jurisdiction clauses with different provisions, respectively: (i) an arbitration clause according to which all disputes arising under it shall be settled by an arbitration tribunal and (ii) a jurisdiction clause which established that all litigation shall be solved exclusively by a particular domestic court or courts.
b) The hypothesis where parties referred to both the jurisdiction of a particular arbitration tribunal and the one of national courts within the same clause, without giving priority to any of them;
c) The situation where parties incorporated an alternative jurisdiction clause which stipulates that in the event of litigation they shall submit it to arbitration or to national courts.

In all three cases the contracting parties refer both to arbitration and to the jurisdiction of national courts without giving priority to one or another. In such cases, arbitrators have the task to determine the parties' true intention. Commonlly, courts are in favour of saving to the arbitration agreement. However, sometimes the contradiction is so flagrant, that the respective clause or clauses are held void[9].

In the following sections I have grouped the main doctrinary and jurisprudential orientations into three categories, namely:

I. Opinions in favour of arbitration, according to which the claimant has the right to choose between the two types of jurisdiction;
II. Opinions which favour the exclusive competence of ordinary courts of law in case of ambiguity;
III. Opinions which consider that both jurisdiction clauses should be held ineffective.

2.2. Opinions in Favour of Arbitration

At present, a number of courts from many jurisdictions, including Romania, favour the enforceability of arbitration agreements by using the principle of effective interpretation provided by Article 4.5 of the 2016 UNIDROIT Principles[10].

The principle was also incorporated in the Romanian Civil Code[11]. According to Article 1268 paragraph (3), clauses shall be interpreted so as to be effective, rather than not to give any effect[12].

---

[7] To a certain extent, the phrase `optional arbitration agreements`is inaccurate. Actually, either party has the option to choose between arbitration or ordinary courts when the other party is pasive. Under these considerations, theorists proposed a different term for describing such clauses, respectively `non-mandatory arbitration agreements` (E.g. see Gary B. Born, International Commercial Arbitration, Volume I. International Arbitration Agreements, Wolters Kluwer International, 2014, p. 789). However, I consider that the latter descriptive phrase is not the appropriate one for describing the defective agreements envisaged by this article because it also designates other types of ill-drafted clauses, such as hypotheses where parties provide that they *`may`*resort to arbitration in case of litigation, not being bound by their arbtration agreement.

[8] See Frédéric Eisemann, "La clause d'arbitrage pathologique", published in Commercial Arbitration Essays in Memoriam Eugenio Minoli, Unione Tipografico-editrice Torinese, Torino, 1974. According to Frédéric Eisemann, back then honorary Secretary General of the International Chamber of Commerce from Paris, the term `pathological arbitration clauses` designates arbitration agreements that contain defects which may disrupt the smooth progress of the arbitration procedure.

[9] Emmanuel Gaillard, John Savage (ed.), Fouchard, Gaillard, Goldman on International Commercial Arbitration, Citic Publishing House, 2003, p. 270

[10] The Principles of International Commercial Contracts (hereinafter reffered to as `the UNIDROIT Principles` is a document elaborated under the auspices of the International Institute for the Unification of Private Law which intends to help harmonize international commercial contracts law. The last edition of this code of contractual practices was last published in 2016. According to Article 4.5 of the UNIDROIT Principles 2016, "Contract terms shall be interpreted so as to give effect to all the terms rather than to deprive some of them of effect".

[11] Law no. 287/2009 regarding the Civil Code, published in the Romanian Official Journal no. 409/2011.

[12] For a detailed presentation of this principle, see Dragoş-Alexandru Sitaru, Dreptul comerţului international. Tratat.Partea Generală (International Trade Law. General Part), Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, pp. 534-535.

In Romania, under an extensive doctrinary interpretation[13], it was held that if parties did not intend to submit their dispute to be settled through arbitration, they would have ignored any possibility of solving the litigation by an arbitration court. By considering the hypothesis of arbitration, both parties expressed a "stronger consent" in favour of arbitration than the one according to which any litigation falls under the competence of ordinary courts jurisdiction. The latter is, nonetheless, implied in the absence of an arbitration agreement.

Romanian courts also provided an extensive interpretation, in line with the one expressed by Romanian doctrine. In one case[14], the court established that in the presence of an alternative arbitration clause with the following content: "Any disagreement between parties concerning the execution of the current contract shall be settled amiably. In the event that is not possible, the litigation shall be solved by the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania or by a competent court, in accordance with the Romanian law", the non-competence defence raised by the defendant is overruled. The court grounded its decision on the principle of effective interpretation and the rule which states that a contract shall be interpreted according to the common intention of the parties, both provided by the Romanian Civil Code. Furthermore, the tribunal stated that by not giving effect to the arbitration agreement, the settlement of the dispute will be unjustifiably delayed and the parties' right to a speedy trial will be violated. Thus, the court decided that the claimant was entitled to resort to arbitration without seeking the subsequent consent of the defendant.

In another relevant case[15], a Romanian arbitral court decided that when the parties established that potential disputes arising from their contracts shall be resolved either by an arbitral tribunal, either by an ordinary court, then the claimant gains the right to choose between the two jurisdictions in the event of litigation.

A similar approach is found in a more recent arbitral award[16]. The court held that the alternative feature of the `optional arbitration agreement` means that any party is allowed to designate the competent court. The claimant's option does not need to be validated by the defendant, so if he filed a petition for legal action at the Bucharest Court of Arbitration, then the respective arbitral tribunal becomes competent to settle the dispute. Likewise[17], when the parties incorporated an alternative jurisdiction clause without establishing any criterion concerning the priority of competence, the right to choose between jurisdictions belongs to the claimant.

Another arbitral court[18] explained that by requiring a separate agreement in case the arbitration clause does not specify who has the right to choose between the two jurisdictions and does not impose certain conditions for the exercise of the respective right would be the equivalent of rendering the arbitration clause ineffective. Once the claimant submitted the case to an arbitral tribunal, the arbitration clause became valid.

Otherwise, if the action was filed to an ordinary court of law, then the latter would become competent to settle the dispute between the contracting parties[19].

The Romanian courts' interpretation is also encountered in foreign jurisdictions.

In the United States of America there is an extensive case law regarding this legal issue. Under the Federal Arbitration Act (hereinafter abbreviated as `the U.S. F.A.A.`)[20], courts generally gave effect to `optional arbitration agreements` by stating that they permit

---

[13] See Viorel Roș, Arbitrajul comercial internațional (International Commercial Arbitration), Regia Autonomă Monitorul Oficial Publishing House, Bucharest, 2000, p. 158.

[14] See the Bucharest Court of Appeals (Curtea de Apel București), Judgement of April 24th 2002 from Case File no. 390/2001, in Mesagerul economic, a publication of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, no. 32 from August 11th 2002 apud Giorgiana Dănăilă, Procedura arbitrală în litigiile comerciale interne (Arbitration Procedure in Domestic Commercial Litigation), Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2006, p. 97. Similarly, see the reasoning of the Bucharest Court of Appeals in Award no. 144 of September 28th1999 from Case File no. 92/1998.

[15] See the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, Award no. 124 from July 22nd 1999. Similarly, see the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, Award no.145 from December 27th1996. Both decisions are published in excerpt in Jurisprudența Comercială Arbitrală (Arbitral Commercial Jurisprudence) 1953-2000, edited by the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, Bucharest, 2002, p.10.

[16] See the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, Arbitral Award no. 283 from November 25th 2009, published in Vanda Anamaria Vlasov, Arbitrajul comercial. Jurisprudență arbitrală 2007-2009. Practică judiciară (Commercial Arbitration. Arbitral Jurisprudence 2007-2009. Judicial Practice), Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010, pp. 8-9.

[17] See the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, Arbitral Award no. 21 from February 7th 2008, published in Vanda Anamaria Vlasov, op.cit., pp. 9-10. For a similar point of view, see the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, Arbitral Award no. 233 from November 16th 2007, published in Vanda Anamaria Vlasov, op.cit., pp. 10-11.

[18] See the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, Arbitral Award no. 274/2006 from Case File no. 116/2006, published in the Romanian Journal of Arbitration (Revista Română de Arbitraj) no. 4 (8), October-December 2008, edited by the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, Rentrop & Straton Publishing House, Bucharest, pp. 45-46.

[19] See, for instance, the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, Arbitral Award no. 250/2007 from Case File no. 236/2007, published in the Romanian Journal of Arbitration (Revista Română de Arbitraj) no. 3 (7), July-September 2008, edited by the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, Rentrop & Straton Publishing House, Bucharest, pp. 64-65.

[20] The United States Arbitration Act, more commonly referred to as the Federal Arbitration Act or FAA, was first enacted on February 12th 1925 and is currently part of the Code of Laws of the United States of America, the official compilation and codification of the general and permanent federal statutes of the United States (Title 9, Section 1-14).

either party to initiate the arbitration procedure, which afterwards becomes mandatory for both parties[21].

The English courts usually adopted a similar point of view. In a case[22] where parties incorporated, in two different articles of their contract, an arbitration agreement and a clause which provided for the exclusive jurisdiction of the English courts, the High Court maintained the arbitration clause by rulling that "the reference to English courts applied only to incidents arising during the conduct of the arbitration".

French courts were also in favorem validitatis of the arbitration agreement.

According to the Paris Tribunal of First Instance[23], an equivoque arbitration clause shall be interpreted by considering that if the parties did not want to settle their potential disputes through an arbitration procedure, then they would have refrained from mentioning the possibility of arbitration by incorporating an arbitration clause in their contract. By doing so, they understood that they shall submit, on a prioritary basis, any disputes arising from their contract to the arbitral tribunal.

In another case[24], the Paris Court of Appeals held that in contracts containing an `optional arbitration clause`, the jurisdiction clause which attributes the competence of ordinary courts of law is subordinated to the arbitration agreement and is inserted by parties "to cover the eventuality that the arbitral tribunal is unable to rule".

Another example is given by the jurisprudence of the International Court of Arbitration attached to the International Chamber of Commerce from Paris (hereinafter referred to as `ICC Arbitration Court`). In an award[25] made by this arbitration tribunal, a clause which stipulated that "an arbitral tribunal sitting in Algiers would resolve disputes in first and last instance" and a second clause which stated that "in last instance" the Algerian courts have exclusive jurisdiction was interpreted as meaning that the arbitration agreement is effective and the latter provision refers "only to the recourse available under Algerian law against awards made in Algeria".

2.3. Opinions That Favour the Exclusive Competence of Ordinary Courts

There are, however, cases where `pathological arbitration agreements` were considered optional, in the sense that the ordinary courts of law became competent in case of ambiguity and the parties were required to arbitrate only when they subsequently concluded a separate agreement to arbitrate.

In Romania, there were law theorists[26] who stated that according to its "normal meaning" the optional contractual clause puts the arbitration tribunals and ordinary courts on an equal footing. The exercise of the right to choose between the two jurisdictions is, nonetheless, subordinated to the subsequent agreement to arbitrate that shall be concluded by the two contracting parties.

In the Romanian jurisprudence there was a case[27] concerning the interpretation of an arbitration agreement incorporated into a contract which stipulated that "all potential litigation between parties shall be solved amiably; otherwise, the litigation shall be settled by the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania or by an ordinary court".

The claimant submitted a dispute related to the underlying contract to the arbitration tribunal, but the defendant alleged that the parties are not bound to arbitration unless they conclude a subsequent agreement to arbitrate. The court agreed with the defendant by reasoning that, by using the conjunction "or", the contracting parties did not establish a clear hierarchy between arbitration and the ordinary procedure. It ended by stating that the exercise of the option is subordinated to the subsequent consent of the two parties. Thus, this consent not being obtained, the agreement to arbitrate is not held effective.

In my opinion, such interpretations are in flagrant contradiction with the principle in favorem validitatis of the arbitration agreement. When parties referred even marginally to arbitration, they took into account the possibility of arbitration at the moment they concluded the underlying contract. If these agreements were meant only to establish the parties' duty to negotiate the settlement of their potential dispute through arbitration in the future, then these contractual terms would be ineffective, not serving any purpose.

---

[21] See Gary B. Born, op. cit., p. 789.

[22] See The English High Court of Justice, Case Paul Smith Ltd. v. H&S International Holding Inc. (1991), in XIX Y.B. Com. Arb. 725 (1994) apud Emmanuel Gaillard, John Savage (ed.), op. cit., p. 271.

[23] See the Paris Tribunal of First Instance (TGI Paris), Decision from February 1st 1979, Techniques de l'ingenieur, in Revue d'Arbitrage no. 101, 1980 apud Emmanuel Gaillard, John Savage (ed.), op. cit., pp. 270-271.

[24] See the Paris Court of Appeals, Decision from November 29th 1991, Case Distribution Chardonnet v. Fiat Auto France, in Revue d'Arbitrage no. 617 (1993) apud Emmanuel Gaillard, John Savage (ed.), op. cit., p. 271. Similarly, see The French Cour of Cassation, Case Brigif v. ITM-Entreprises, in Revue d'Arbitrage no 544 (1997), with the comments of Daniel Cohen, in Arbitrage et groupes de contrats, apud Emmanuel Gaillard, John Savage (ed.), op. cit., p. 271.

[25] See ICC Arbitration Case No. 6866 of 1992, published in the ICC Bulletin, Vol. 8, No. 2, 1997, available online at htttp://library.iccwbo.org/dr-awards.htm (Last consulted on April 4th 2018).

[26] See Octavian Căpățână, Convenția arbitrală deficitară (Defective Arbitration Agreement), in Revista de drept comercial (Commercial Law Journal) no. 12/1999 apud Viorel Roș, op. cit., p. 158.

[27] See Bucharest Court of Appeals, Judgement no. 179 from November 15th 1999 in Case File no. 250/1998, not published, available in excerpt in Giorgiana Dănăilă, op.cit., p. 96.

2.4. Opinions Which State That Both Jurisdiction Clauses Should Be Held Ineffective

These opinions are rather isolated, being rarely encountered in practice. However, there were cases when both jurisdiction clauses were considered ineffective.

For instance, there was a French court[28] which held that the arbitration agreement, which expresses the will of the contracting parties to give the arbitrators the power to settle their dispute, clearly excludes the intervention of the state judge. Thus, the respective clause is certainly in contradiction with the clause conferring jurisdiction to the Paris Commercial Court. Consequently, the disputed jurisdiction clauses are irreconciliable and shall be deemed not written. Pursuant to the rules of civil procedure law, the litigation was placed within the jurisdiction of the commercial court of the place where the defendant had its headquarters.

In another interesting case[29], the ICC Arbitral tribunal considered that by means of a clause incorporated in their contract, the parties wanted to "preserve" an alternative that allows them to choose between a consular and an arbitral jurisdiction. However, if there is any doubt related to the content of the respective jurisdiction clause, it shall be interpreted contra proferentem. In this hypothesis, the arbitration agreement drafted by the claimant being ambiguous, the arbitral tribunal considered it was not competent to settle the respective dispute.

3. Conclusions

To sum up, this paper presents the issue of `pathological` clauses where the contracting parties refer both to the jurisdiction of arbitration tribunals and national courts without giving priority to one or another.

Doctrinaries and practitioners expressed several opinions concerning the hypothesis of such defective agreements, which can be grouped into three categories, namely:

I. Opinions in favour of arbitration, according to which the claimant has the right to choose between the two types of jurisdiction;
II. Opinions which favour the exclusive competence of ordinary courts of law in case of ambiguity;
III. Opinions which consider that both jurisdiction clauses should be held ineffective.

Each category has many followers. However, the opinions which are in favour of arbitration are the dominant ones, while the opinions that held the jurisdiction clauses ineffective are rather isolated.

I rally with the first category. In my opinion, there are three main principles that shall be observed when interpreting any `pathological` arbitration agreement.

Firstly, courts need to establish the genuine intention of parties at the moment they drafted the respective agreement. In order to achieve that, they need to examine all relevant circumstances, including the ones provided by Article 4.3 of 2016 UNIDROIT Principles, especially the preliminary negotiations between parties, their practices and conduct subsequent to the conclusion of the contract. By doing so, practice showed me that this would reveal previous actions which may give us valuable hints that parties wanted to submit their potential disputes to arbitration.

Secondly, if the true intention cannot be accurately established, the arbitration agreement shall be always interpreted in favorem validitatis. If parties referred to arbitration in their contracts, it would be irrational to consider that they did not take into account the possibility to resort to arbitration in case of a potential dispute at the moment of conclusion of the respective contracts. Parties incorporate clauses in their contracts with the will to make them effective.

Thirdly, this kind of jurisdiction clauses is generally encountered in commercial contracts. When interpreting commercial law rules we need to be flexible and to observe the principle of celerity. By refusing to recognise the competence of the arbitration tribunal that was appointed by the claimant, the procedure length is considerably increased, which is contrary to the parties' right to a speedy trial. Therefore, the claimant shall have the right to choose between the two jurisdictions given to him as option.

In the end, I hope this paper raises awareness on the phenomenon of `pathological optional arbitration agreements`, which are rarely discussed by theorists, even if they are commonly encountered in practice, and it serves as an inspiration for future research on this issue, by considering a more extensive jurisprudential approach.

References

- Jacques Beguin, Michel Menjucq, Droit du commerce international (International Trade Law), Lexis Nexis Publishing House, Paris, 2011
- Nigel Blackaby, Constantine Partasides with Alan Redfern and Martin Hunter, Redfern and Hunter on International Arbitration, Oxford University Press, New York, 2009
- Gary B. Born, International Commercial Arbitration, Volume I. International Arbitration Agreements, Wolters Kluwer International, Alphen aan den Rijn (The Netherlands), 2014

[28] See Case Epoux Saadi v. Huan, C. Paris, November 22nd 2000, in Alexis Mourre (ed.), Les Cahiers de l'Arbitrage (Arbitration Notebooks), Gazette Du Palais, Edition Juillet 2002, p. 294.

[29] See Partial Judgment from 2006 from ICC File no. 13921, in Charles Kaplan, Alexis Mourre (ed.), The Paris Journal of International Arbitration (Les Cahiers de l'Arbitrage), L.G.D.J. Publishing House, Paris, May 2010, pp. 91-93.

- Giorgiana Dănăilă, Procedura arbitrală în litigiile comerciale interne (Arbitration Procedure in Domestic Commercial Litigation), Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2006
- Frédéric Eisemann, "La clause d'arbitrage pathologique", published in Commercial Arbitration Essays in Memoriam Eugenio Minoli, Unione Tipografico-editrice Torinese, Torino, 1974
- Emmanuel Gaillard, John Savage (ed.), Fouchard, Gaillard, Goldman on International Commercial Arbitration, Citic Publishing House, 2003
- Charles Kaplan, Alexis Mourre (ed.), The Paris Journal of International Arbitration (Les Cahiers de l'Arbitrage), L.G.D.J. Publishing House, Paris, May 2010
- Alexis Mourre (ed.), Les Cahiers de l'Arbitrage (Arbitration Notebooks), Gazette Du Palais, Edition Juillet 2002
- Viorel Roș, Arbitrajul comercial internațional (International Commercial Arbitration), Regia Autonomă Monitorul Oficial Publishing House, Bucharest, 2000
- Dragoș-Alexandru Sitaru, Dreptul comerțului international. Tratat.Partea Generală (International Trade Law. General Part), Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017
- Vanda Anamaria Vlasov, Arbitrajul comercial. Jurisprudență arbitrală 2007-2009. Practică judiciară (Commercial Arbitration. Arbitral Jurisprudence 2007-2009. Judicial Practice), Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010
- The ICC Bulletin, Vol. 8, No. 2, 1997, available online at htttp://library.iccwbo.org/dr-awards.htm (Last consulted on April 4th 2018)
- The UNIDROIT Principles of International Commercial Contracts (2016), available at https://www.unidroit.org/english/principles/contracts/principles2016/principles2016-e.pdf (Last consulted on April 15th 2018)
- , Jurisprudența Comercială Arbitrală (The Arbitral Commercial Jurisprudence) 1953-2000, edited by the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, Bucharest, 2002
- , Revista Română de Arbitraj (The Romanian Journal of Arbitration) no. 3 (7), July-September 2008, edited by the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, Rentrop & Straton Publishing House, Bucharest
- , Revista Română de Arbitraj (The Romanian Journal of Arbitration) no. 4 (8), October-December 2008, edited by the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, Rentrop & Straton Publishing House, Bucharest

THE REGIME OF THE LETTER OF GUARANTEE UNDER THE ROMANIAN LEGISLATION AND INTERNATIONAL LEGAL PROVISIONS

Florin CONSTANTINESCU[*]

Abstract

The letter of guarantee is widely utilized in the international trade relations and its regime was regulated through three publications issued by the International Chamber of Commerce from Paris (Publication no.325, Publication no.458 and Publication no. 758); at the same time, it is well known that some of the European countries (and not only) enacted internal laws with regard to the letter of guarantee. The putting into operation of the domestic and international provisions in the field of the letter of guarantee has generated miscorrelations and/or legal conflicts mostly settled by decisions issued by the Courts of Law or by uniform practices accepted by the players from market.

The present article aims at providing a legal analysis of the letter of guarantee taking into consideration mainly the legal traits, the types of the letters of guarantee, the modalities of issuance and utilization, the publicity, the assignment of the receivables deriving from the letter of guarantee.

Also one of the envisaged scope is to submit proposals to amend the current legislation for the large benefit of the business community, legal professionals or theoreticians.

Keywords: Letter of Guarantee, Mortgage, Receivables, Assignment, Trade Finance, Joint-Stock Company, Limited Liability Company.

1. Introduction

1.1. What matter does the paper cover?

The subject matter of the present study is to emphasize the role performed by the letter of guarantee and also its strategic importance in the banking industry from Romania, under the Publication no.325, Publication no. 458, Publication no. 758 issued by the International Chamber of Commerce from Paris and also under the internal legislation; it is important to be highlighted that the letter of guarantee was not expressly regulated by the national legislation until the entering into force of the new Civil Code (October 1st, 2011).

In accordance with the former legislation, the letter of guarantee was compared with the surety (Rom. fideiusiune) but maintaining its particular traits meaning the autonomy towards the underlying transaction.

To the same extent, the letter of guarantee was called "autonomous guarantee" or "demand guarantee".

Thus, the present paper will provide a legal analysis of the letter of guarantee taking into account the following: the definitions and the evolution of the concept over the time, the legal nature of the letter of guarantee, the main legal traits of the letter of guarantee, the principal types of the letter of guarantee used in Romania, the extent to which the receivables deriving from a letter of guarantee may form the subject of a movable mortgage as provided by the new Civil Code, the publicity related to the letter of guarantee and/or related to the movable mortgage set over the receivables coming from the letter of guarantee, the legal report between the international rules and the national legislation (inclusively the potential conflicts), proposals to amend the existing legislation.

Nowadays the letter of guarantee are issued by the institutions of credit like banks and non-financial institutions the main scope being to safeguard the commercial and financial interests of the beneficiary in case of a non-compliant event (regarding the performance of the underlying transaction) shall be generated by the applicant.

Taking into account the fact that the letter of guarantee is currently regulated by the new Civil code, the first covered domain is the civil law.

At the same time, it has to be underpinned that the letter of guarantee is applied to the trade relations (national or international) between the companies; so the second covered domain is the commercial law.

Although there are contradictions displayed by the local doctrine regarding the autonomy of the commercial law[1], we consider that the commercial law has full autonomy towards the civil law, even the commercial law derives from the civil law. The civil law and the commercial law may peacefully coexist for the benefit of the business environment and legal professionals.

1.2. Why is the studies matter important?

The importance of the present paper consists mainly in the following:

a) to gather the relevant arguments with the scope to deliver an overall legal analysis of the letter of guarantee applicable in the current business

[*] PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: florinconstantinescu110@hotmail.com)

[1] Stanciu D. Carpenaru, Treatise Of Romanian Commercial Law (Bucharest: Universul Juridic Publishing House, 5th edition, updated, 2016), 21;

milieu;
b) to point-out the practicality and the real benefits issued by the use of the letter of guarantee in trade relations (domestic and international);
c) to submit amendments regarding the applicable legislation.

The pursued objectives of the study are:
a) to strengthen the importance of the letter of guarantee as an instrument prone to streamline the business relations;
b) to outline the aspects needed to be improved and/or shifted;
c) to present in greater details the modalities by which the international regulations in the field of the letter of guarantee may be harmonized with the national legislation in this regard.

1.3. How does the author intend to answer to this matter?

The means aimed to be utilized in order to complete the research are:
a) the critical and contrastive analysis of the foregoing and current applicable legislation;
b) the investigation of the relevant practice;
c) the study of the significant legal doctrine.

The main methods that will be used are: the logical method, the contrastive method and the historical-teleological method.

1.4. What is the relation between the paper and the already existent specialized literature?

The existent legal literature has not sufficiently debated the following aspects:
a) a) the difficulty of proper application of the Article 2321 (regarding the letter of guarantee) from the new Civil Code versus the issues arising from the legal practice;
b) b) the possibility to established a mortgage over the receivables arising from letter a guarantee;
c) c) the possibility to be taken into guarantee the beneficiary's right to claim the payment deriving from the letter of guarantee.

Bearing in mind the aforesaid, the present paper intends to supply arguments, ideas, solutions in order to streamline and also to facilitate the trade finance relations.

2. The letter of guarantee. Concept. Traits. Legal nature

2.1. As provided by the Article 2321 from the new Civil Code, the letter of guarantee is the irrevocable and unconditional commitment by which a person called "issuer" undertakes, upon the request of the other person, called "applicant", in consideration of a prior obligational report, to pay an amount of money to a third party, called "beneficiary", in compliance with the already assumed commitment.

2.2. In the architecture of the new Civil Code, the letter of guarantee is an autonomous guarantee, which is a sub-category of the personal guarantee. It means that the entire patrimony of the issuer will be dedicated to the payment of the letter of guarantee, in case of a demand in this regard (usually, a payment demand is made when an event of default-deriving from the trade relation between applicant and beneficiary- occurs).

2.3.Until the entering into force of the new Civil Code, there was no specific regulation with regard to the letter of guarantee.

The letter of guarantee was called "independent bank guarantee" and the general opinion was that such atypical guarantee is generated by the bank customs.

In fact, the aforesaid bank customs were originated by the uniform rules regarding the letter of guarantee, issued by the International Chamber of Commerce from Paris, France.

The first step in the direction to codify the applicable rules regarding the letter of guarantee was the year 1978 when the International Chamber of Commerce from Paris issued the Publication no.325 on demand guarantee aiming at assure the uniformity of the practices based on a fair balance between the contracting parties[2].

Following the same trend and taking into consideration the latest developments in the trade finance relations, the International Chamber of Commerce from Paris issued (in 1992) a new set of Uniform Rules on Demand Guarantee, applicable since January 1st, 1994 (Publication no. 458).

The latest version of the abovementioned uniform rules was provided in 2010 through the Publication no. 758 – Uniform Rules on Demand Guarantee, issued by the International Chamber of Commerce from Paris.

In order to avoid any doubt it has to be mentioned that the Publication no. 758 hasn't abrogated the Publication no. 458 but it has updated the Publication no. 458.

2.4. It has to be highlighted that, in accordance with the Article 2 from the Publication no. 458, a demand guarantee was defined as any guarantee, obligational title or payment commitment (however it would be called or depicted by a bank, insurance company or any other natural person or legal entity), provided in writing, for the payment of an amount of money at the presentation (in conformity with the assumed commitment) of a written payment requirement and any other documents that may be mentioned with the demand guarantee, based on the assumed commitment: (i) upon request or based on the instructions and on a party's liability (applicant); (ii) upon request or based on the instructions and on a liability of a bank, insurance company or any other natural person or legal entity, acting based on the applicant's instructions in the benefit of a third party ("beneficiary").

[2] Boroi, Gabriel, Ilie, Alexandru. The Commentaries of the Civil Code. The personal guaranties. The privileges and the real guaranties (Bucharest: Hamangiu Publishing House, 2012), 64;

With regard to the abovementioned definition, it is worthy to mention that 3 principles[3] were generated by the Publication no. 458 meaning:

a) a demand guarantee is irrevocable (Article 5);
b) the documentary trait of a demand guarantee;
c) a demand guarantee is a formal title, respectively the guarantor will pay only if the payment requirement and/or the documents are conformable with the text of the demand guarantee.

2.5. Legal traits

A demand guarantee has the following traits:

a) it is an irrevocable title, as moment as the Article 2321, 1st paragraph from the new Civil Code stipulates that a letter of guarantee is an irrevocable title. It means that the demand guarantee may be not retracted before the expiry date;
b) it is an autonomous title in comparison with the underlying transaction. Thus, the issuer may not sustain before the beneficiary the legal exceptions arising from the obligational report prior to the assumed commitment; moreover, the issuer may be not held to pay in case of an abuse or obvious fraud.
c) it is an independent title, meaning the safeguard provided is not ancillary to the secured obligation in comparison with the surety (where the surety is an accessory of the secured obligation), as provided by the Articles 2288-2290 from the new Civil Code);
d) it is a formal title, as moment as the payment will be made in accordance with the terms of the assumed commitment, as provided by the Article 2321, 1 st paragraph from the new Civil Code. Moreover, this trait is also supported by the Article 14 from the Publication no.758 based on which the payment demand under the guarantee shall be supported by other documents as the guarantee specifies;
e) it is an unilateral document because the issuer obliges to pay an amount of money for the benefit of a third party. Although, the Article 2321 from the new Civil Code uses the wording "at the applicant's request", this fact will not negatively impact the unilateral trait because the applicant's offer is a simple proposal; furthermore, the issuer may be not obliged by the applicant to issue a demand guarantee. The issuance of such guarantee is the result of the issuer's will;
f) it is an unconditional title meaning the payment will be made at first and simple request of payment, following the terms and conditions as provided by the demand guarantee;
g) it is a documentary title, as moment as the payment shall be made in accordance with the terms and conditions as stipulated by the demand guarantee;
h) it is an intuitu personae title, meaning the guarantee may be not transmitted concomitantly with the transfer of the rights and obligations deriving from the prior obligational title, in lack of a contrary provision, as provided by the Article 2321, 5th paragraph from the new Civil Code;
i) it bears a connection with the prior obligational report which shall not impact the autonomy of the letter of guarantee;
j) it bears a financial trait, meaning the letter of guarantee is expressed in money;
k) it is considered issued when is out of the issuer's control (Article 5 from the Publication no. 758).

3. Legal nature. Form. Types

3.1. The letter of guarantee is a personal guarantee, being framed as an autonomous guarantee.

3.2. A letter of guarantee must be issued in a written form although it is not expressly mentioned by the law. The main argument in this regard is based on the customs specific to the banking activity meaning the formalism and the documentary requirement.

We have in mind the provisions of the Article 121 from the Emergency Govern Ordinance no.99/2006 on the credit institutions and the adequacy of the capital, based on which the credit institutions must keep an exemplar of the document contracts at its offices.

Moreover, the letter of guarantee is a writ of execution and during the foreclosure process the lender must prove/document the real existence of the letter of guarantee.

To the same extent, we emphasize that the letter of guarantee is subject to the communication, taking into consideration its trait of unilateral act, as provided by the Article 1326, 1st paragraph from the new Civil Code.

3.3. The Romanian banks mostly issue the bid bond, the performance bond, the advance payment guarantee, the payment guarantee etc.

4. The legal relation between applicant and issuer

4.1. It is undoubtedly that there is a relation of mandate between the applicant and the issuer, as moment as the letter of guarantee shall be issued by bank upon the applicant's request as provided by the Article 2321, 1st paragraph from the new Civil Code.

With regard to the mandate, we underline that there is a mandate without representation, as provided by the Article 2039, 1st paragraph from the Civil Code.

The relation of mandate does not impact the autonomy of the letter of guarantee towards the underlying transaction, because the applicant undertakes to pay independently towards the prior obligational report, in accordance with the Article 2321, 1st paragraph from the new Civil Code.

[3] Negrus Mariana, Payments and international guarantees (Bucharest: C.H.Beck, 3rd edition, reviewed and updated, 2006), 336

4.2. Having in mind the above, the applicant has the following obligations:

a) to furnish instructions to the issuer

In this respect, the Article 8 from the Publication 758 provides that the instructions must be clear, precise and should avoid the excessive detail; the letter of guarantee must specify, amongst others, the following: the applicant, the beneficiary, the issuer, the guarantor, the amount or maximum amount payable and the currency, the expiry date, the party liable for the payment of any charges etc.;

b) to pay an issuance fee to the bank, in conformity with the Article 32 from the Publication no.758

Moreover, this fee is justified because the issuing bank grants a loan to the applicant fact that ensues some outlays for the bank; to the same extent, the bank is a joint-stock company that must pursue to gain profit;

c) to reimburse the issuer with the amount that represents the object of the letter of guarantee

The bank supplies a non-cash loan to the applicant and the repayment also includes the related interests and other bank fees;

d) to provide collaterals to the bank[4]

The usual guarantees requested by the Romanian banks are: (i) movable mortgage over the receivables arising from the underlying agreement, enrolled with the Electronic Archive; (ii) movable mortgage over the bank account open by the applicant to the issuing bank enrolled with the Electronic Archive; (iii) mortgage over a real estate, enrolled with the Land Book.

Regarding the beneficiary of a letter of guarantee, he may dispose by the proceeds deriving from the letter of guarantee. It means that a different bank than the issuing bank may set movable mortgage over such proceeds under the condition that the letter of guarantee is transferable and the conditions stipulated by the Article 33 from the Publication no.758 are followed.

Pursuant to a prudential approach a bank will require previously the documents attesting that the beneficiary of the transferred letter of guarantee had took over all the rights and obligations deriving from the letter of guarantee [Article 33, letter d), subpoint i) from the Publication no. 758].

The aforesaid movable guarantee will be enrolled with the Electronic Archive.

Also, it is worthy to be mentioned that the issuing bank may take into guarantee the beneficiary's right to claim the payment (deriving from the letter of guarantee) unless otherwise is provided; this operation may be set through a movable mortgage enrolled with the Electronic Archive. The new Civil Code took over the aforesaid principle mentioned by the Article 4 from Publication no. 458 based on which the beneficiary's right to request the payment of the guarantee is transferable unless otherwise is provided by the letter of guarantee.

4.3. The issuer has the following obligations:

a) to examine the payment demand

The issuer has to make a formal check of the payment demand because the letter of guarantee is independent towards the underlying transaction;

b) to pay or to reject the payment demand

The issuer may be not hold to make the payment in case of an abuse or obvious fraud, as provided by the Article 2321, 3rd paragraph from the new Civil Code;

The abuse of law may occur when the a right is exerted with the scope to harm or to prejudice a third party or in an excessive way contrary to the good faith, based on the Article 15 from the new Civil Code. From a practical perspective, it means that a payment demand must be exerted with an explicit aim (as mentioned above) and the issuing bank should have a clear representation of this thing based inclusively on the held information, documents regarding the beneficiary, its status etc.

The new Civil Code documents the fraud at law; in accordance to the Article 1237 from the new Civil Code, the cause is illicit when the agreement is the mean by which the putting into operation of a legal imperative norm is breached. From a practical perspective, it means that a payment demand is made in flagrant contradiction with the law, being the modality by which the law is breached.

Regarding the both cases as mentioned above, the assessment of the bank must be performed very carefully taking into consideration the potential indemnities that the bank shall pay to the beneficiary if a Court of Law will decide otherwise.

We deem that the assessment should be as much objective as possible based on effective evidences that may be submitted before a Court of Law; therefore it is advisable that the bank should display good faith and needed prudence in accordance with the law and with the professional customs applicable in the business milieu.

4.4. The issuer who made the payment may claim the paid amount from the applicant

Obviously the issuer is entitled to receive the paid amount, the issuance fee and the related interest.

5. The legal relation between issuer and beneficiary

5.1. The letter of guarantee is the legal foundation of the relation between issuer and beneficiary.

5.2. The first obligation of the issuer is to pay the guarantee at first and simple demand coming from beneficiary.

The issuer has to decide if a guarantee is payable or not in 5 days (Article 20 from the Publication 758); if the issuer's representation is that the payment demand is not conformable it may contact the beneficiary aiming to remediate the irregularities, if possible. On the contrary, the beneficiary will be acknowledged in writing with regard to the rejection and the reasons on which the rejection was grounded (Article 24, letter d from the Publication 758).

[4] Nedelea Zina, The banking demand guarantee (Bucharest: C.H.Beck Publishing House, 2010), 83-85

6. The legal relation between beneficiary and applicant

6.1. The underlying transaction is the fundamental relation between beneficiary and applicant.

6.2.Besides the applicant's main undertaking to provide a letter of guarantee, the applicant must find a bank able to issue a letter of guarantee taking into consideration the underlying transaction.

6.3. The applicant may claim the restitution of the paid amount from the beneficiary who displayed a fraudulent conduct (if the case).

7. The governing law. The cessation of the letter of guarantee

The governing law is the law applicable to the registered office of the issuer if it is not otherwise provided by the letter of guarantee. As a rule, the national laws are mostly preferred as governing law; as a consequence, the international provisions (comprised in publications) complement (and detail) the national legislation.

The letter of guarantee is ceased at the expiry date mentioned with the letter of guarantee independently by the remittance of the original unless it is otherwise provided (Article 2321, 6th paragraph from the new Civil Code).

8. Conclusions

8.1. Main outcomes of the study

The main outcomes of the present paper are:

a) an overall presentation of the legal regime of the letter of guarantee with focus on the relevant aspects;
b) the highlight of some new securities that may be set by the issuing bank in connection with the letter of guarantee meaning the movable mortgage over the proceeds deriving from the letter of guarantee (if the letter of guarantee is transferable) and also over the beneficiary's right to transfer the right to claim the payment of the letter of guarantee.
c) a screening of the relevant former and current legislation;
d) the applicability of the national legislation of the issuer, the international provision being secondary;
e) the proposal to amend the new Civil Code as follows: (i) to be expressly mentioned the possibility to be settle the securities as provided by the letter b) above and their registration with the Electronic Archive; (ii) to be detailed the concepts of abuse and obvious fraud as provided by the Article 2321, 6th paragraph from the new Civil Code and the criteria based on which the issuing bank may or must consider when it decides to reject a payment demand.

8.2. Expected impact of the outcomes

The impact of the outcomes consists mainly in the following:

I. to strengthen the importance of the letter of guarantee in the current business relations due to its direct, streamlined and agile way of doing business;
II. to create the context by which the recommendations contained by the Article VIII.1, letter a) above shall be transposed into legal norms;

8.3. Suggestions for further research

The main suggestion is to amend the new Civil Code as follows:

I. to be expressly mentioned the possibility to be settle the securities as provided by the Article VIII.1, letter b) above and their registration with the Electronic Archive;
II. to be detailed the concepts of abuse and obvious fraud as provided by the Article 2321, 6th paragraph from the new Civil Code and the criteria based on which the issuing bank may or must consider when it decides to reject a payment demand.

References

- Stanciu D. Carpenaru, Treatise Of Romanian Commercial Law (Bucharest: Universul Juridic Publishing House, 5th edition, updated, 2016), 21
- Boroi, Gabriel, Ilie, Alexandru. The Commentaries of the Civil Code. The personal guaranties. The privileges and the real guaranties (Bucharest: Hamangiu Publishing House, 2012), 64
- Nedelea Zina, The banking demand guarantee (Bucharest: C.H.Beck Publishing House, 2010), 83-85
- Negrus Mariana, Payments and international guarantees (Bucharest: C.H.Beck, 3rd edition, reviewed and updated, 2006), 336

THE EUROPEAN UNION DIRECTIVE PROPOSAL ON RESTRUCTURING AND SECOND CHANCE: A CHECK OF COMPLIANCE BY ROMANIAN LAW

Corina Georgiana COSTEA*

Abstract

The European Commission is highly active in the field of insolvency, by making big steps towards reforming the concept of insolvency, beginning with the Recast of the European Insolvency Regulation, which has entered into force on 26th of June 2017, with small exceptions. On 22nd November 2016, the European Commission presented the Proposal for a Directive on restructuring frameworks, second chance and measures to increase the efficiency of restructuring, insolvency and discharge procedures and amending Directive 2012/30/UE. The Proposal itself aims at reforming the concept of insolvency by trying to build a new entrepreneurial culture, based on rescuing financially distressed yet viable debtors. The effects of the actual European culture regarding insolvency, which prioritizes liquidation, have been quantified in job losses, a high rate of non-performing loans and low percentage of creditors' recovery rate. The Proposal invites Member States to put in place its provisions, by offering them a set of key principles and rules. The Proposal's general objective is to eliminate the barriers to the free flow of capital, but it also provides adjacent targets, which encourage cross-border investments and limit the rate of non-performing loans. This paper aims to analyze a check of compliance by Romanian law, in order to identify the way that our national law will need to be adapted to the Proposal's provisions.

Keywords: financial difficulties, preventive restructuring frameworks, insolvency, second chance, debt discharge.

1. Introduction

The European Commission is continuously working on increasing the efficiency of the single market. In order to fulfill this objective, the Capital Markets Union Action Plan[1] has been developed. One of the key objectives of the Action Plan is to stimulate the free flow of capital in the single market by eliminating identified barriers, some of which result from the differences among Member States' restructuring and insolvency frameworks. The first step towards identifying the barriers has been the quantification of the current situation in Europe regarding insolvency. As a result, statistics show that less than 50% of businesses survive for a five-year period.[2] Bankruptcy comes along with the stigma of failure and it's also the main fear of Europeans if they were to start a business.[3] Considering the high rates of business deaths in several Member States[4], due to the priority of liquidation instead of restructuring, their impact upon the single market and also the Europeans' fear of becoming an entrepreneur, the European Commission has issued a Recommendation on a new approach to business failure and insolvency[5] (the Recommendation) that aims at providing early restructuring frameworks for viable businesses and also a second chance for bankrupt but honest entrepreneurs. A next step in reforming the concept of insolvency consisted of the adoption of the European Insolvency Regulation of 20 May 2015[6] (EIR), which extended its field of application, therefore including pre-insolvency proceedings. In 2014, INSOL Europe has submitted a study to the European Commission[7], entitled Study on a new approach to business failure and insolvency – Comparative legal analysis of the Member States' relevant provisions and practices[8], which revealed that 13 Member States haven't put in place early restructuring frameworks. Thus, as a next step, in order to accelerate and consolidate a business rescue culture and a second chance for entrepreneurs, the European Commission has presented, on 22nd November 2016, the proposal for a Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council on preventive restructuring frameworks, second chance and measures to increase the efficiency of restructuring, insolvency and discharge procedures and amending Directive 2012/30/EU[9] (the Proposal). This legislative initiative

* PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (e-mail: corinacostea23@gmail.com)

[1] Brussels, COM/(2015) 468 final: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/PDF/?uri=CELEX:52015DC0468&from=EN

[2] http://ec.europa.eu/eurostat/statistics-explained/index.php/Business_demography_statistics#High_growth_enterprises

[3] Flash Eurobarometer 354 (2012) Entrepreneurship in the E.U. and beyond, p. 72

[4] http://ec.europa.eu/eurostat/statistics-explained/index.php/File:Figure6_Trend_of_enterprise_death_rates,_business_economy,_2014-2015_ (%25).png

[5] Brussels, 12.3.2014, C(2014) 1500 final, available at http://ec.europa.eu/justice/civil/files/c_2014_1500_en.pdf

[6] Regulation (E.U.) 2015/848 of the European Parliament and the Council of 20 May 2015 on insolvency proceedings (Recast), O.J.E.U., L141/19.

[7] https://www.insol-europe.org/eu-study-group-publications

[8] Stefania Bariatti, Robert van Galen, TENDER No. JUST/2012/JCIV/CT/0194/A4, available at : http://ec.europa.eu/justice/civil/files/insol_europe_report_2014_annexes_en.pdf

[9] Strasbourg, 22.11.2016, COM (2016) 723 final : http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/PDF/?uri=CELEX:52016PC0723&from=EN

is an ambitious European project that stimulates Member States' cooperation in achieving the E.U.'s goals. The Proposal offers Member States minimum standards regarding pre-insolvency, insolvency and discharge proceedings. Insolvency has also been reformed in Romania, by adopting the Law no. 85/2014 regarding pre-insolvency and insolvency proceedings[10]. This paper aims to analyze the way that the Romanian law complies with the Proposal's provisions. A check of compliance is necessary because once the Proposal becomes binding[11], Member States will need to take measures to ensure that their national legislative context complies with the Proposal's provisions. If the Romanian law regarding pre-insolvency, insolvency and discharge proceedings doesn't fully comply with the Proposal's provisions, it will need to undergo several amendments in order to fulfill the minimum standards promoted by the European Commission.

1.1. The Proposal's structure

The Proposal is structured into 47 recitals and 36 articles focusing on three main concepts: access to preventive restructuring frameworks, second chance for honest entrepreneurs and increasing the efficiency of restructuring, insolvency and discharge procedures through targeted measures.

1.2. The Proposal's objective(s)

The Proposal itself is a European objective that accelerates an insolvency reform. It is a flexible instrument setting minimum standards that Member States will use in order to comply with the current needs of the single market. As it mentions, the key objective is to reduce the barriers to the free flow of capital stemming from differences in Member States' restructuring and insolvency frameworks. Moreover, the Proposal's provisions themselves are objectives that need to be fulfilled by Member States. The aim is also to provide a common E.U.-wide framework, ensuring the removal of obstacles to the exercise of fundamental freedoms, such as the free movement of capital and freedom of establishment. Over-indebted debtors that don't have access to debt discharge proceedings may change their jurisdiction in order to benefit from a true second chance, so it might be said that they no longer have the freedom of establishment. The free movement of capital consisting in cross-border investments is also discouraged by the length and costs implied by an insolvency proceeding. Lastly, even though the Proposal doesn't specify, another objective is to stimulate Member States into putting their efforts to ensure the implementation and development of efficient legislative frameworks covering these matters. Reforming the concept of insolvency and consolidating a business rescue culture is a process that needs time, and also synergic efforts of European institutions, on one side, and Member States on the other side.

2. A check of compliance by the Romanian law

Insolvency has been reformed in Romania though the adoption of the Law no. 85/2014, just a few months after the European Commission has issued the Recommendation on a new approach to business failure and insolvency. However, the Proposal sets targeted rules that Member States are invited to put in place. A check of compliance is not only an analysis of the Romanian law, but also an indicator of its standards in relation to the European standards.

2.1. Preventive restructuring frameworks

Preventive restructuring frameworks are regulated by Title II of the Proposal. In the European vision, preventive restructuring frameworks are important because they could be used as an instrument that reduces the rate of unnecessary business liquidations. If debtors across Europe had access to efficient, early restructuring frameworks, negotiations carried out with creditors may be eased, especially if they are managed by a practitioner in the field of restructuring, as they are defined in Article 2 (15) of the Proposal. A specialized negotiator will have two main objectives: they shall manage the difficulties that may cause a state of insolvency while making sure that the debtor's liabilities are covered. The Proposal aims at ensuring the availability of preventive restructuring frameworks in all Member States, which may decrease the rate of insolvent businesses. Preventive restructuring proceedings are to be triggered when there is likelihood of insolvency. Their role is to restore and enhance the debtor's viability through restructuring, while aiming at avoiding insolvency. Preventive restructuring frameworks are not limited, since the Proposal mentions that they may consist of one or more procedures and measures. The involvement of judicial or administrative authorities is limited to where it is necessary and should ensure the protection of affected parties' rights. Preventive restructuring proceeding may be accessed by the debtor, or by creditors which have the debtor's consent. In Romania, preventive restructuring frameworks have been a traditional commercial instrument, since the adoption of the Commercial Code in 1887, which regulated the pre-bankruptcy moratorium. The preventive composition has been firstly regulated by the Law of preventive composition from 1929, which has been abrogated in 1938. In the modern context, the traditional pre-bankruptcy moratorium took the shape of the ad-hoc mandate, which, along with the preventive composition, is regulated today by the Law no. 85/2014 regarding pre-insolvency and insolvency proceedings. Therefore, in Romania, two types of pre-insolvency proceedings are made available. They can be triggered only by the debtor[12], when there is likelihood of insolvency. Both of them are submitted to confirmation by the Court. If the Court states that the debtor is in a state of insolvency, the pre-insolvency proceedings will not be opened. The state of financial difficulty is the main condition that needs to be fulfilled in order to access either the ad-hoc mandate, either the preventive composition. The Law no. 85/2014 provides several measures which can be adopted by the debtor in order to avoid insolvency through restructuring, but they have an exemplary and not a limiting nature. If voted by creditors, any measures considered adequate could be adopted. The Court's involvement is limited but also necessary. When accessing the preventive composition proceeding, the debtor may request, under several conditions, a temporary stay of individual enforcement actions. If admitted by the Court, a certain protection of creditors' rights is required. The Court's involvement in pre-insolvency proceedings is limited to the legal aspects implied by each proceeding. In regards of the availability of early restructuring frameworks, the Romanian law fully complies with the Proposal's provisions. In terms of facilitating negotiations in order to adopt a preventive restructuring plan, the Proposal provides the following minimum standards. First of all, the debtor should remain totally or at least partially in control of their assets and day-to-day operation of the business. This requirement is particularly important due to the separation of preventive restructuring from formal restructuring unfolded in an insolvency proceeding, where the debtor may or may not remain in possession. The Proposal also states that appointing a practitioner in the field of restructuring shall not be mandatory in every case. This particular requirement targets micro, small and medium enterprises, which may not carry out the costs implied by an early restructuring proceeding. According to the Annual Report on SMEs[13], firms with 0 and 1 to 4 employees accounted for 98% or more of all business deaths in 15 Member States (...) and for between 95% and 97% of all business deaths in 9 other Member States (...) This shows us that the Proposal is flexible enough to provide an efficient preventive restructuring framework for SMEs, in order to stimulate entrepreneurship. In the Proposal's view, the appointment of a practitioner in the field of restructuring may be required in two cases: if the debtor is granted a general stay of individual enforcement actions and where the restructuring plan needs to be confirmed by a judicial or administrative authority by means of a cross-class cram-down. The Romanian law maintains the debtor in possession, but in a preventive composition proceeding, if the debtor seriously violated the terms negotiated with creditors, through actions such as favoring one/more creditors or asset alienation, the creditor's meeting may decide to file a request of the composition's resolution. There is no sanction for the debtor that limits the control over the business. However, the Romanian law provides that during the proceeding, the debtor has control over the business and day-to-day operations, in the terms negotiated in the preventive composition and under the supervision[14] of the assigned insolvency practitioner. As we can see from above, the Romanian law complies with the Proposal's provisions regarding the debtor in possession, except the provisions which state that the appointment of a practitioner in the field of insolvency shall not be mandatory in every case. According to the Law no. 85/2014, the organs applying the ad-hoc mandate are the president of the Court and the insolvency practitioner, while the organs applying the preventive composition proceeding are the syndic-judge and the insolvency practitioner. A financially distressed debtor may resort to an informal mediation procedure, where the appointment of an expert is not mandatory, but these types of proceedings are not recognized as pre-insolvency proceeding by the law. In means of a temporary stay of individual enforcement actions, the Proposal provides that Member States shall provide a framework which allows a debtor to benefit from a temporary stay of individual enforcement actions, if and to the extent such a stay is necessary to support the negotiations of a restructuring plan. The temporary stay of individual enforcement actions may also target secured creditors, and may be general (covering all creditors) or limited (covering one or more creditors). So far, the Romanian law complies with the Proposal's provisions, since the preventive composition allows the debtor to benefit from a temporary stay of individual enforcement action, if and only if at least 75% of the value of creditors' claims is engaged in the proceeding. However, the Proposal limits the stay of individual enforcement actions to 4 months. This period may be extended under the following conditions: firstly, if there is evidence that progress has been made in the negotiations of a restructuring plan and secondly, if the extension of the stay does not unfairly prejudice the rights or interests of any affected parties. The total duration of the stay of individual enforcement actions should be limited, in the Proposal's view, to maximum twelve months. In this matter, the Romanian law does not comply with the Proposal's provisions, since the preventive composition allows a debtor to benefit from a temporary stay of individual enforcement actions throughout the whole duration of the proceeding, respectively 24 months from the date of the composition's homologation, with the possibility of extending it with maximum 12 months. The debtor may [12] However, article 26 (2) from the Law no. 85/2014 provides that the negotiations (but not the proceeding) may also be initiated by the creditors or by the debtor's shareholders.

[10] Published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 466 from 25th of June 2014

[11] The Proposal will enter into force on the twentieth day following the day of its publication in the Official Journal of the European Union.

[13] Patrice Muller, Shaan Devnani, Jenna Julius, Dimitri Gagliardi, Chiara Marzocchi, Annual Report on European SMEs 2015/2016, November 2016, p. 58, available at: https://ec.europa.eu/jrc/sites/jrcsh/files/annual_report_-_eu_smes_2015-16.pdf

[14] The Law no. 85/2014 doesn't provide a definition of the conciliator's supervision, but provides instead a definition of the supervision exercised in an insolvency proceeding.

also request a temporary stay of individual enforcement actions even before the composition's homologation. Moreover, the Law no. 85/2014 provides that the conciliator may file for approval a request to postpone the payment of dissent creditors' claims with maximum 18 months, under the condition of offering these creditors equivalent guarantees. In matters of the period of the stay of individual enforcement actions, the Romanian law exceeds the period recommended by the Proposal. Also, it doesn't provide the possibility of lifting the stay of individual enforcement actions, but instead provides that when the creditors' meeting decides to file for the preventive composition's resolution, the preventive proceeding is suspended ope legis. If the preventive composition is suspended, creditors may continue their enforcement actions. In terms of consequences of the stay of individual enforcement actions, provided by Article 7 of the Proposal, the aim is to facilitate the debtor's restructuring while protecting the interests of affected parties. Therefore, the Proposal provides that the obligation of filing for insolvency proceeding should be suspended for the duration of the stay. The Romanian law doesn't clearly specify it, but a homologated composition may still continue when the debtors becomes insolvent, if they fully respect the terms negotiated with creditors. The law also provides that when a debtor is in a negotiation[15] process with its creditors and meanwhile becomes insolvent, the obligation of filing for insolvency proceedings arises in a period of 5 days from the date of the negotiations' failure. Also, if the preventive composition is homologated, insolvency proceedings may not be commenced. In reference to those creditors whose claims arise after the stay is granted, the Romanian law provides two alternatives: either they adhere to the preventive composition by their inclusion in negotiations, either they may recover their claim by any other means provided by the law. In matters of the restructuring plans content, stated in Article 8 of the Proposal, a minimum amount of information is required, as following. Firstly, the debtor's identity is required, as well as a valuation of the present value of the debtor/debtor's business and a reasoned statement on the causes and the extent of the financial difficulties. Secondly, the identity of the affected parties and their claims/interests covered by the restructuring plan is required. Also, affected parties should be grouped in classes, in order to exercise their vote upon the restructuring plan, while mentioning the value of claims in each class. Non-affected parties are also to be mentioned in the plan, along with a statement of reasons why it is not proposed to affect them. Furthermore, another minimum requirement of the Proposal concerns a reasoned statement by the person responsible for proposing the plan which explains why the business is viable, how implementing the proposed plan is likely to avoid insolvency and restore long-term viability. Lastly, in terms of the plan, the minimum requirements of the Proposal consist of three main elements: its proposed duration, any proposal by which debts are rescheduled or waived or converted into other forms of obligations and any new financing anticipated as part of the restructuring plan. Looking at the Law no. 85/2014, the formalities of the preventive composition are commenced in the base of the preventive composition offer, which will be submitted for approval to the creditors. The offer will include the following: the preventive composition's project, a list of known secured and unsecured creditors including the value of their claims and the debtors' state referring to its financial difficulties. Furthermore, the preventive composition's project needs to include the following:

I. the analytic situation of the debtors' assets and liabilities (certified by an expert accountant or audited by an authorized auditor)
II. the causes of financial difficulties including planned measures taken by the debtor in order to overcome these difficulties (until the moment of the offer's submission for approval)
III. a projection of the financial and accounting evolution on the following 24 months
IV. a detailed recovery plan.

The recovery plan in the preventive composition proceeding resembles the recovery plan as part of a judicial reorganization proceeding. The Romanian law also requires the recovery plan to include the following: the debtor's activity reorganization and targeted measures planned to be adopted in order to avoid insolvency. The law gives some examples of several measures which could be adopted. In reference to the plan's content, the Romanian law fully complies with the Proposal's provision. It doesn't specifically require a reasoned statement of the person proposing the plan which explains why the business is viable, how the plan's implementation is going to result in avoiding insolvency and restore the business's long-term viability. However, considering that the recovery plan is the main instrument in a preventive composition proceeding, it cannot be elaborated without approaching these requirements. Pre-insolvency and insolvency proceedings, in Romanian law, commence based on the state of the debtor: a debtor in state of insolvency needs to file for insolvency proceedings and a debtor in state of financial difficulty will file for pre-insolvency proceedings (ad-hoc mandate or preventive composition). Thus, in order to access pre-insolvency proceedings, the state of financial difficulty must be reasoned and proved. One of the Proposal's most significant provisions requires Member States to make a model for restructuring plans available online, in national and other languages, containing at least the information required under national law and also general and practical information on how the model is to be used. This particular requirement is highly beneficial for micro, small and medium enterprises but also for the entrepreneurial environment. In Romanian law, the preventive composition proceeding is based on the creditors' votes upon the preventive composition offer. The recovery plan may include rescheduled and/or reduced claims and also new financing. After the creditors approve the preventive composition offer, the practitioner in the field of restructuring will file for the Court's approval a request of the composition's homologation. The syndic-judge verifies if the debtor fulfills the following legal requirements: (i) the value of challenged claims doesn't overcome 25% of the total value of claims and (ii) the composition has been approved by creditors holding at least 75% of the total value of accepted and unchallenged claims. Also, the syndic-judge verifies the preventive composition offer, with all included documents. The judicial involvement is limited to verifying if the debtor fulfills the legal conditions. The aspect of opportunity that lies in the debtor's recovery and its possibility to avoid insolvency is fully control by the creditors. The syndic-judge doesn't have the possibility to refuse confirming a restructuring plan that doesn't have a reasonable prospect of preventing the debtor's insolvency and ensuring the viability of the business. In reference to the plan's confirmation duration, the Romanian law provides that the parties will be summoned by the syndic-judge within 48 hours from the day the request was filed and decisions shall be urgently adopted. Even though the list of creditors mentions the nature and value of the claim, creditors are not divided into classes; the law only requires mentioning which creditors are secured and unsecured. Their right to vote upon the restructuring plan and its further amendments is determined by reporting the value of their claim to the total value of claims. The Romanian law doesn't require the approval of at least one class of affected creditors. In reference to equity holders, article 27 (6) of the law provides that they may vote upon the restructuring plan, only if they are given less than they would receive in case of bankruptcy (a liquidation value is to be determined). In regard of creditors, if they challenge the restructuring plan on grounds of an alleged breach of the best interest of creditors' test, the Romanian law doesn't explicitly provide the obligation of determining the liquidation value. However, in practice, even though pre-insolvency proceedings are rarely used, the syndic-judge may order an evaluation of the debtor's business, which shall be elaborated by an appointed expert. In terms of the effects of restructuring plans, the Romanian law provides that, if creditors holding at least 75% of the total value of claims vote in favor of the restructuring plan, it will be submitted for the Court's confirmation and after its confirmation, it becomes binding upon all participant creditors, including those creditors who voted against the plan. If new claims arise during the preventive composition proceeding, held by creditors who weren't initially involved in the plan's adoption, these particular creditors aren't affected in any way by the plan. The decision which confirms the plan's adoption may be appealed within 7 days, calculated from its pronouncing for those who were present, and from its communication, for those who weren't present. Filing an appeal against the decision which confirms the plan's adoption has no suspensive effects on the plan's execution. The judicial authority which adopts a decision in regards to an appeal is the Court of Appeal, which may decide to reject the restructuring plan's adoption. However, if the Court of Appeal decides in favor of the plan's adoption, dissenting creditors will not be granted monetary compensation. The reason is because, according to the legal definition of the state of financial difficulty, the debtor pays or is able to pay its obligations and is not insolvent. This is also the reason why the law doesn't provide a priority rule in terms of payments. It is assumed that the debtor is able to pay all its obligations, but accesses the preventive composition in order to re-negotiate or reschedule some of these payments, to prevent a future state of insolvency. In respects to Article 16 of the Proposal, which provides protection for new and interim financing, the Romanian law's provisions comply. Actually, the Law no. 85/2014, which consisted of a national insolvency reform, has adopted 13 fundamental principles[16] which apply to both pre-insolvency and insolvency proceedings. The eighth principle states that debtors should be granted access to financing in pre-insolvency proceedings, in the observation period and also in judicial reorganization, while creating an adequate regime in order to protect these claims. Therefore, article 24 paragraph (2) point b) states that in the preventive composition proceeding, in the debtor is granted new financing, these claims benefit from a priority in distribution, after the procedural expenses. Actually, this particular provision is the only one mentioning a certain priority rule in the preventive composition. New and interim financing benefit from the same protection regime, both in the observation period [art. 87 paragraph (4)] and judicial reorganization [art. 133 paragraph (5) point b)]. The Romanian law doesn't provide that grantors of new and interim financing shall be exempted from liability in case of the debtor's subsequent insolvency, but this is because creditors control the opportunity aspects of reorganization (both in insolvency and pre-insolvency proceedings). Therefore, no financing will be granted without the creditors' favorable vote, in the stated conditions for each type of proceeding. In respects of Article 17 of the Proposal, some transactions mentioned at point 2 are included in the restructuring plan, which is submitted for the creditors' approval, and transactions regarding restructuring fees and the appointment of a practitioner in the field of restructuring are also submitted for the creditors' confirmation, before the plan. In order to elaborate a restructuring plan, the practitioner and its emolument need to be previously submitted for the creditors' approval and only after a decision is made, the plan may be drafted. Actually, any transaction, measure or premise must firstly be submitted for the creditors' approval and then submitted for the syndic-judge's confirmation. In regard to Article 18 of the Proposal, which states the directors' duties in the likelihood of insolvency, it might be said that the Romanian law doesn't provide any kind of obligation. Accessing pre-insolvency proceedings is the debtor's option, while accessing insolvency proceedings is indeed an obligation. The likelihood of insolvency may be translated in the state of financial difficulty provided by the Romanian law.

[15] The Romanian law limits the duration of negotiation to a period of maximum 60 days. The prior regulation of pre-insolvency proceedings (Law no. 381/2009, currently abrogated) provided a maximum period of 30 days.

[16] The fundamental principles were inspired from the World Bank's principles.

2.2. Second chance for entrepreneurs

Second chance for honest but bankrupt entrepreneurs is regulated by Title III of the Proposal. According to Articles 19-23 of the Proposal, Member States are invited to put in place debt discharge proceedings, in order to give honest but bankrupt entrepreneurs a true second chance. The discharge period is also a key factor in ensuring over-indebted entrepreneurs a second chance. Therefore, the discharge period is recommended to take no longer than 3 years starting from: (a) the date on which the judicial or administrative authority decided on the application to open such a procedure, in case of a procedure ending with the liquidation of an over-indebted entrepreneur's assets; or (b) the date on which implementation of the repayment plan started, in case of a procedure which includes a repayment plan. Member States also need to ensure that on expiry of the discharge period, over-indebted entrepreneurs are discharged of their debts. At the end of the discharge period, the entrepreneur is protected by any disqualifications related to the over-indebtedness. Member States are given the option to derogate from these provisions, by maintaining or introducing provision restricting the access to discharge proceedings, when justified by a general interest. As examples, the Proposal provides the following cases: (i) when the over-indebted entrepreneur acted dishonestly or in bad faith towards the creditors when becoming indebted or during the collection of the debts, (ii) when the over-indebted entrepreneur does not adhere to the repayment plan or to any other legal obligations aimed at safeguarding the creditors' interests; (iii) in case of abusive access to discharge proceedings and (iv) in case of repeated access to discharge procedures within a certain period of time. Member States are given the option to exclude several categories of debts from discharge, such as secured debts, debts arising out of criminal penalty or tortious liability. The Proposal also treats situations where over-indebted entrepreneurs having both professional and personal debts, by stating that all debts should be treated in a single proceeding, for the purpose of obtaining a discharge. The Proposal also provides derogation, stating that both proceedings should be coordinated for the purposes of obtaining a discharge. The Proposal's provision regarding second chance frameworks are the result of constant analysis made at E.U. level, which revealed that a true second chance given to the entrepreneur to re-launch a business and also to the entrepreneur as a natural person may easily contribute to strengthen the single market's efficiency. Actually, 82% of Europeans[17] believe that people who started their own business and failed should be given a second chance. The Romanian law doesn't provide a debt discharge framework for over-indebted entrepreneurs. It is true that a debtor going bankrupt will be discharged of the debts which couldn't be covered by liquidation, but this is only because after bankruptcy proceeding ends, the debtor ceases to exist and only if it is proven that the debtor acted honestly and in good-faith. Also, these provisions regard strictly the debtor as a legal person and not as a natural person. There is no other law beside the Law no. 85/2014 that provides a debt discharge framework. In this particular matter, the national law doesn't comply at all with the Proposal's provisions. The insolvency of a natural person is not regulated by the Law no. 85/2014, but by the Law no. 151/2015, which began to be applied starting with 1st of January 2018 and therefore the legislative outcomes are not yet known. In the doctrine it has been shown[18] that a debt discharge may, is some hypothesis, take more than 12 years. Therefore, it is recommended for our national law to implement the Proposal's provisions even before the deadline, since it has been proven that a second chance benefits the economic environment.

2.3. Measures to increase the efficiency of restructuring, insolvency and second chance

In the Proposal's view, the judicial or administrative authorities applying the proceedings should receive initial and further training to a level appropriate to their responsibilities, in order to ensure expeditious treatment of the procedures. The same condition is requested for practitioners in the field of restructuring, be they mediators, insolvency practitioners or other practitioners appointed in the restructuring, insolvency and second chance matters. The goal is for them to provide their services in an effective, impartial, independent and competent way in relation to the parties. The Romanian law provides initial and further training for both judicial authorities and practitioners in insolvency. Organs applying the proceedings operate under their specific Code of ethics. In reference to the appointment of the practitioners in the field of restructuring, in both pre-insolvency and insolvency proceedings the practitioner's appointment must be approved by creditors and subsequently confirmed by the judicial authority. The Romanian law also provides clear criteria of the practitioner's removal and resignation. In pre-insolvency proceedings, the practitioner in the field of restructuring is named by the debtor and must be then approved by the creditors and confirmed by the judicial authority (the president of the Court in case of ad-hoc mandate or the syndic-judge in case of preventive composition). Creditors may decline the appointment of a practitioner in insolvency, and suggest the appointment of another practitioner, but he/she still must be approved by at least 50% of the votes of creditors which are present to the meeting (or send their vote electronically). In insolvency proceedings, the practitioner in insolvency may be appointed either by the debtor or creditor, either by the Court. The practitioner in insolvency may decline its appointment. But if accepted, he/she still must be confirmed by at least the majority of creditors in meetings unfolded in the presence of at least 30% of the value of claims. The procedure-related fees undergo the same conditions. In complex cases, the appointment of the practitioner in the field of restructuring may be considered in respects to their experience and expertise. Both pre-insolvency and insolvency proceedings are being judicially supervised. The syndic-judge verifies all legal aspects of the proceeding, ensuring protection of the creditors' and debtor's interests. In relation the Article 28 of the Proposal referring to the use of electronic means of communication, the third fundamental principle of pre-insolvency and insolvency proceedings states that organs applying the proceedings shall ensure an efficient proceeding, including adequate mechanisms of communication, in order to unfold the proceeding in a reasonable time, objectively and impartially, with a minimum of costs. The Romanian law encourages the use of electronic means of communication, in order to limit the costs and make the proceeding as efficient as possible. In reference to Title V of the Proposal, which treats the monitoring of restructuring, insolvency and discharge procedures, Member States are invited to ensure and sort data collection for the first full calendar year following the date of application of implementing measures, in accordance with Article 29 of the Proposal, which will be annually transmitted to the Commission, by 31st of March of the calendar year following the year for which the data is collected. This requirements is explained by the review clause, stated in Article 33 of the Proposal, according to which no later than 5 years from the date of start of application of implementing measures and every 7 years thereafter, the Commission shall present to the European Parliament, the Council and the European Economic and Social Committee a report on the application of this Directive, including on whether additional measures to consolidate and strengthen the legal framework on restructuring, insolvency and second chance should be considered. " The Proposal does not provide rules regarding the way data will be collected, which means that Member States have the liberty of creating their own suitable context that will ensure this obligation's fulfillment."[19]

[17] Flash Eurobarometer 354 (2012) Entrepreneurship in the E.U. and beyond, p. 9.

[18] Gavrilescu Luiza Cristina, O analiză a conformității legii române a insolvenței personale cu recomandările Comisiei Europene sub aspectul reglementării eliberării de datorii a debitorului, the Romanian Magazine of Business Law no. 7/2015, article consulted in the database www.sintact.ro.

3. Conclusions

The Law no. 85/2014 on pre-insolvency and insolvency proceedings is considered to be a modern law[20], which responds to the current needs of the market. However, if we refer to pre-insolvency proceedings, they are rarely accessed (official statistics revealed that there were around 200 preventive compositions accessed by debtors from 2009 to 2017). The Romanian law, as we saw, mostly complies with the Proposal's provisions in relation to Title II and Title IV. In relation to Title III however, the Romanian law doesn't comply at all, since debt discharge proceedings (as an effect of the Law no. 85/2014 for legal persons and of the Law no. 151/2015 for natural persons, and not a separate accessible proceeding), may exceed the period of 3 years recommended by the Proposal. In conclusion, the Romanian law doesn't comply with the following Proposal's provisions: Article 3, Article 5 paragraph (2), Article 6, Article 8 paragraph (2), Article 10 paragraph (3), Article 13 and Title III. Therefore, the Romanian law shall adopt several amendments in order to fulfill the Proposal's requirements. It is recommended that, after the final draft of the Proposal is published, the Romanian law shall adopt the minimum standards even before the deadline. Creating a uniform framework across Member States would ensure a more stable economy, by eliminating insolvency-related risks and fears for investors and also by limiting the non-performing loans.

References

- Brussels, COM/(2015) 468 final
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/PDF/?uri=CELEX:52015DC0468&from=EN
- http://ec.europa.eu/eurostat/statistics-explained/index.php/Business_demography_statistics#High_growth_enterprises
- Flash Eurobarometer 354 (2012) Entrepreneurship in the E.U. and beyond, p. 72

[19] Costea Corina Georgiana, The E.U. Directive Proposal on restructuring an second chance: an analysis of the most relevant concepts, in process of publication on www.insol-europe.org, essay presented on 19th of January 2018, on The High Level Course on Insolvency Law in Eastern European Jurisdictions 2017/2018, Bucharest.

[20] Insolvency, at national level, has been reformed by the Law no. 85/2014, which brought several substantial modifications.

- http://ec.europa.eu/eurostat/statistics-explained/index.php/File:Figure6_Trend_of_enterprise_death_rates,_business_economy,_2014-2015_(%25).png
- Brussels, 12.3.2014, C(2014) 1500 final, available at http://ec.europa.eu/justice/civil/files/c_2014 _1500_en.pdf
- Regulation (E.U.) 2015/848 of the European Parliament and the Council of 20 May 2015 on insolvency proceedings (Recast), O.J.E.U., L141/19
- https://www.insol-europe.org/eu-study-group-publications
- Stefania Bariatti, Robert van Galen, TENDER No. JUST/2012/JCIV/CT/0194/A4, available at
- http://ec.europa.eu/justice/civil/files/insol_europe_report_2014_annexes_en.pdf
- Strasbourg, 22.11.2016, COM (2016) 723 final
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/PDF/?uri=CELEX:52016PC0723&from=EN
- Patrice Muller, Shaan Devnani, Jenna Julius, Dimitri Gagliardi, Chiara Marzocchi, Annual Report on European SMEs 2015/2016, November 2016, p. 58, available at: https://ec.europa.eu/jrc/sites/jrcsh/files/annual_report_-_eu_smes_2015-16.pdf
- Gavrilescu Luiza Cristina, O analiză a conformității legii române a insolvenței personale cu recomandările Comisiei Europene sub aspectul reglementării eliberării de datorii a debitorului, the Romanian Magazine of Business Law no. 7/2015, article consulted in the database www.sintact.ro
- Costea Corina Georgiana, The E.U. Directive Proposal on restructuring an second chance: an analysis of the most relevant concepts, in process of publication on www.insol-europe.org, essay presented on 19th of January 2018, on The High Level Course on Insolvency Law in Eastern European Jurisdictions 2017/2018, Bucharest

THE RIGHT OF THE DONOR/RECIPENT TO INFORMATION IN THE CASE OF TRANSFER AND TRANSPLANT OF ORGANS, TISSUES AND HUMAN CELLS FOR THERAPEUTIC PURPOSES

Ramona DUMINICĂ*

Abstract

The current study starts from the fact that, in the contemporary society, the patient can no longer be considered a simple consumer of services totally subordinated to the doctor, but he is an active participant in the performance of the medical act, having a series of rights, among which his right to information. This right completes the right to life and to health, his right to physical and psychical integrity, the right to dispose of oneself and the right over his own body. Knowing, accepting and bearing the consequences of his own (in) actions are important aspects for each individual, more valuable for the person subjected as donor or recipient of a transplant of organs, tissues or human cells for therapeutic purposes, given the implications of such a procedure. This is why a decision concerning the human body and health of an individual can be taken only after serious, real and intelligible information regarding the risks and benefits of the intervention to which that individual shall be subjected to.

Keywords: right to information, donor, recipient, doctor's obligation to inform, organ transplant, human tissues and cells for therapeutic purposes.

1. Introduction

Starting from the fact that in many cases the conflict between the doctor and the patient occurs because the patient has not been informed about the specificity of the illness, the difficulties of the medical profession and the sometimes limited possibilities of medical science[1], was adopted the European Charter of patients' rights that expressly entitle the patient to be informed. In the same meaning, the Convention on Human Rights and Biomedicine ratified by Romania by Law No 17/2001, states in Art 10 Para 2 that "Everyone is entitled to know any information collected about his or her health. However, the wishes of individuals not to be so informed shall be observed".

In the same spirit, the Romanian legislator expressly stated the right of the patient to be informed, by Law No 46/2003 on the patient's rights[2].

By "patient", according to Art 1 Let a) of the above mentioned law, it is defined the healthy or ill person benefiting from a health insurance. In the virtue of the legal provisions, the person shall have the right to be informed regarding: the available medical services, their means of use, the identity and professional status of the health services providers, his own health condition, the proposed medical services, the potential risks of each procedure, the existing alternatives for each proposed procedure, including about risks of non-complying with the treatment or with the medical recommendations, as well as information regarding the diagnosis and prognostics. Also, the hospitalized patient has the right to be informed regarding the rules and customs to be complied with during his hospitalization.

In the same time, the Law No 46/2003 acknowledges for the patient the possibility to decide if he wants to be informed if the medical data presented to him would cause sufferance, having the right to expressly ask for him not to be informed and to appoint another person to receive the information.

Correlative with the patient's right to information, the Deontological Code of the Romanian College of Physicians[3] states the doctor's obligation to inform. Thus, Art 14 states that no intervention in the health condition shall be performed without the consent of the person to be subjected to it. The consent shall be asked for only after the doctor has given appropriate information regarding the purpose and nature of the intervention, regarding the consequences and risks of the intervention. As far as possible, the language shall be appropriate for each patient, clear and respectful, minimizing as possible the specialist terminology, and if the patient is not familiar with the language, the information shall be brought to them knowledge in the native language or in the language they know or, where appropriate, another form of communication will be sought.

* Lecturer, PhD, Faculty of Economic Sciences and Law, University of Piteşti (e-mail: duminica.ramona@gmail.com).

[1] Liviu Oprea, "Un studiu analitic asupra relației medic-pacient" (Part 1), in Romanian Magazine of Bio-ethics, 7th Volume, No 2 (2009): 57-70; G. C. Curcă, "Aspecte conceptuale privind răspunderea deontologică și malpractica medicală", Romanian Magazine of Bio-ethics, 8th Volume, No 1(2010): 51-59.

[2] Official Gazette of Romania, No 51/20 January 2003.

[3] Official Gazette of Romania, No 981/7 December 2016.

2. The donor/recipient's right to information in the case of organs, tissues and human cells harvesting and transplant for therapeutic purposes

The Additional Protocol to the Convention on Human Rights and Biomedicine concerning Transplantation of Organs and Tissues of Human Origin, signed in Strasbourg on 20 February 2015 and ratified by Romania in 2016 by the Law No 9/2016[4] guarantees, without discrimination, the compliance with the human integrity and with the other types of rights and fundamental freedoms in the field of transplantation of organs and tissues of human origin.

For the purposes of the Protocol, the term "transplantation" covers the complete process of removal of an organ or tissue from one person and implantation of that organ or tissue into another person, including all procedures for preparation, preservation and storage; and the term "removal" refers to removal for the purposes of implantation.

Similarly, Law No 95/2006 on healthcare reform[5] defines the transplant as being that medical activity which, for therapeutic purposes, within the body of a patient, named recipient, is transplanted or grafted an organ, tissue or cells harvested from another person, named donor", and the harvesting as being "the removal of healthy organs and/or tissues and/or human cells for the purpose of a transplant".

Currently, in Romania, the harvesting and transplant of organs, tissues or human cells from a living patient are being performed in accordance to Art 68 of the Civil Code and the Law No 95/200 on health care reform, republished.

The legislator also states that the harvesting and transplant of organs, tissues or human cells from living donors shall be made exclusively for the cases and conditions states by the law, based on the written, free expressed and prior agreement and only after they have been informed upon the risks of the procedures. For all cases, it is forbidden the harvesting of organs, tissues or human cells from minor persons, as well as from living persons without discernment due to a mental handicap, a serious mental disorder or from another similar reason, except the cases mentioned by the law. As exceptions, the republished Law No 95/2006 states in Art 145 Para 2 that the harvesting of bone marrow (hematopoietic stem cells) can also be performed from a minor person relative up to the 4th degree with the recipient, in compliance with the following conditions: the harvesting shall be performed only with the consent of the minor who has turned the age of 10 and the written agreement of his legal representative (parents, guardian or curator), according to the form approved by a Minister's order. If the minor is under the age of 10, the harvesting can be performed with the legal representative's consent. The written or verbal consent of the minor aged at least 10 years old shall be expressed in front of the president of the court, after a mandatory psycho-social investigation of the General Directorate of Social Assistance and Child Protection.

Therefore, from the above-mentioned legal provisions result the following conditions to be fulfilled by the consent given for the harvesting and transplant of organs, tissues and human cells[6]:

- The consent shall be free, namely not altered by any vice of consent, being forbidden the harvesting of organs and/or tissues and/or human cells if the procedure is performed due to the physical or moral constraint of a natural person, this being the case of the violence as vice of consent;
- The consent must be prior, its subsequent expression not being allowed;
- The consent must be expressed, not deduced from the concerned person's behavior nor determined under certain aspects by a third party, as for the common law;
- The consent must be informed regarding the possible physical, psychical, family and professional risks and consequences resulting from the harvesting.

The harvesting of organs, tissues or human cells from a living donor shall be performed with the approval of the commission for approvals of transplants from living donors, established in the hospital in which the transplant is being performed, thus guaranteeing the free, informed and altruistic features of the consent. The members of the commission shall also sign the document expressing the consent for harvesting, thus certifying that all legal conditions have been fulfilled. In his position, the recipient shall sign this document after being informed about the risks and benefices of the procedure, as stated by Art 150 of the Law No 95/2006. By signing the document by the recipient, he is confirming that the harvesting is not the object of legal acts or facts, for the purpose of receiving a material benefit or of other nature. This is the proof of complying with another legal condition: the harvesting must be performed only for a transplant whose beneficiary shall be a certain person. Signing that document also by the recipient does not turn the donation of cells, tissues or human organs into a contract, the human body not being tradable[7].

For the case in which the recipient is not able to express his consent, it can be given in written by one of the family members or by his legal representatives. The transplant can be performed even without the prior consent if, due to objective circumstances, cannot contact as soon as possible the family or the legal representative, and the delay would inevitably result in the death of the patient, this situation being reported by the chief doctor and the patient's doctor, using the form

[4] Official Gazette of Romania, No 62/28 January 2016.
[5] Republished in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, No 652/28 August 2015.
[6] See also Eugen Chelaru, Drept civil. Persoanele, în reglementarea NCC, 4th Edition (Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2016), 31-32.
[7] Chelaru, Drept civil. Persoanele, în reglementarea NCC, 30-31; Eugen Chelaru and Ramona Duminică, „Brief considerations about the informed consent of the patient", in Legal and administrative studies, No 2 (2017): 7-27.

approved by Minister's order. As exception, for the minors or persons without capacity of exercise, the consent shall be given by the parents or other persons legally representing the minor.

For the purposes of harvesting and transplant of organs, tissues or human cells it is mandatory the information both of the donor, as well as of the recipient[8] by the doctor, social assistant or other medically trained persons on the possible risks and consequences for the physic, psychic, family and professional, resulted from the procedure.

In this meaning, Art 5 of the Strasbourg Protocol states that "the recipient and, where appropriate, the person or body providing authorisation for the implantation shall beforehand be given appropriate information as to the purpose and nature of the implantation, its consequences and risks, as well as on the alternatives to theintervention", while Art 12 states that "the donor and, where appropriate, the person or body providing authorisation [...] shall beforehand be given appropriate information asto the purpose and nature of the removal as well as on its consequences and risks.They shall also be informed of the rights and the safeguards prescribed by law for theprotection of the donor. In particular, they shall be informed of the right to have access toindependent advice about such risks by a health professional having appropriate experience and who is not involved in the organ or tissue removal or subsequent transplantation procedures".

The condition for the information of the donor about the risks deriving from the procedure has been stated in order to insure the informed consent of the donor, who has the possibility of rejecting, at any moment, the offer of harvesting the tissue should they consider that they would suffer unacceptable damage[9].

After harvesting, the physical perfection of the donor's body, as well as the physic and psychical potential shall be reduced or even disappear, there may be possible professional damaging risks or consequences, as well as a new attitude of the family members regarding the harvesting and the subsequent physical and psychical state of the donor, aspects to be known and accepted before the medical intervention.

From this perspective, the draft-project of the Law for human transplantation, in public debate, represent a step forward from our perspective, maintaining the direction established by the Law No 95/2006 and bringing a series of novelties and clarifications in the shape of certain guarantees for the donor/recipient's right to be informed about the procedure to which he shall be subjected to. Thus, Art 46 of the draft-project details the conditions in which the harvesting of organs, tissues or human cells from a living donor shall be performed:

a) The harvesting of human organs, tissues or cells for the purpose of a human transplantation, shall be performed from living major persons, with full capacity of exercise, after receiving their informed, written, free, prior and express consent, according to the form approved by a Minister's order. Thus, it is forbidden the harvesting of organs, tissues and/or human cells from persons without capacity of exercise;
b) The consent shall be signed only after the donor has been informed by the doctor, social assistant or other persons with specialized training about the possible physical, psychical, family, professional and social risks and consequences resulting from the harvesting;
c) The donor can reconsider his given consent, until the moment of harvesting;
d) The harvesting and transplantation of organs, tissues and/or human cells as result of a physical or psychical constraint against a person are strictly forbidden;
e) The harvesting and transplantation of organs, tissues and/or human cells cannot represent the object of legal actions or facts for material purposes for themselves and/or third parties;
f) The donor and the recipient shall sign an authenticated document declaring that the harvesting of human organs, tissues and/or cells shall have a humanitarian purpose, altruistic and shall not represent the object of legal actions or facts for the purpose of receiving material benefits or of other nature, according to the form approved by Minister's order;
g) The donor of hematopoietic stem cells shall sign an authenticated document stating that the donation shall have a humanitarian purpose, an altruistic feature and shall not represent the object of legal actions or acts for the purpose of receiving material benefits or of other nature, according to the form approved by a Minister's order;
h) As exception from Let f) and g) if the donor does not wish to reveal his identity, the confidentiality shall be preserved;
i) The donor shall be exempted from the payment of hospitalization resulted from the harvesting, as well as from the costs of the periodical medical controls post-harvesting.

3. The obligation for information of the doctor

Correlative to the right of the patients to medical information, Art 649 of the Law No 95/2006[10]and the Code of Deontology of the Romanian College of [8] Ovidiu Ungureanu, "Noile dispoziţii legale privind prelevarea şi transplantul de organe, ţesuturi şi celule de origine umană în scop therapeutic", Dreptul Magazine, No 5(2007): 19.

[9] In the same meaning, see also Chelaru, Drept civil. Persoanele, în reglementarea NCC, 30-31.

[10] Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, No 372/28 April 2006.

Physicians[11] states the obligation of the medic to correct, complete and understandable information given to the patient or other designated personto approve the medical intervention.

For the harvesting and transplant of organs, tissues or human cells, the doctor has the obligation to really inform the donor, without minimizing or exaggerating the damaging consequences[12]. Also, he has the obligation to specifically, really and intelligibly inform the recipient regarding the risks and benefits of the procedure and, when appropriate, his family members, his legal representative, aiming the legitimate purpose of protecting the persons involved and thus excluding the possibility of distorting the intention to carry out the transplant.

Guaranteeing an informed consent of the donor/recipient assumes the provision of all the relevant information by the doctor using an easily understandable for the patient to be able to decide fully aware of the situation. Also, it refers to the evaluation of the patient on the understanding of the information and the insurance that, as it is possible, the patient has the freedom to choose between medical alternatives without coercion or manipulation[13].

The obligation to information for the donor/recipient and/or legal representative has the nature to remove the possibility of any vice of consent, such as the error or the dolus. This does not mean that, practically, they cannot exist, being situations in which there is the complicity or unprofessionalism of the one compelled to inform the donor/recipient. For example, the literature[14] has showed that any form of reluctance of the donor in expressing his approval must be seen as vice of consent.

This is why the professional obligations of the doctor[15] towards its patients are the base of the legal construction of the medical malpractice, representing a starting point in the evaluation of the behaviour of the responsible. According to Art 653 Para 1 Let b) of the Law No 95/2006, malpractice represents the "professional error committed in the performance of the medical or medical-pharmaceutical act causing prejudices for the patient, by implying the civil liability of the medical personnel and of the supplier of medical, sanitary or pharmaceutical services and products".

Regarding the obligation for information, it is considered[16] that it is an obligation of result, whose violation may entail the liability of the doctor on objective grounds, namely that of the risk of his profession, Art 653 Para 3 of the Law No 95/2006 establishing that the medical personnel is civil liable also for the prejudices resulted from the non-compliance with the regulations regarding the informed consent of the patient.

By entailing the civil liability does not exclude the criminal liability, if the action which generated the prejudice represents an offence according to the law and/or of the disciplinary liability of the doctor. According to Art 155 of the Law No 95/2006 it represents an offence the harvesting or transplant of organs and/or tissues and/or human cells without the consent given as stated by the law.

Also, the violation of the patient's right to medical information may entail the disciplinary liability of the doctor[17], as mentioned by Art 37 of the Law No 46/2003 and the Code of Ethics. Non-compliance of the rules of medical ethics, including of those regarding the obligations correlative with the patient's rights, shall entail such liability.

4. Conclusions

Given the importance of the rights endangered in case of a transplant of organs, tissues or human cells of therapeutic purposes, the statement of the right to information of the patient has represented a necessity for the performance of the medical act.

The patient's consent represents an important decision regarding his life, health and body integrity, this is why he shall base the decision on correct information provided by his doctor.

References

- Boilă, Lacrima-Rodica. Răspunderea civilă delictuală subiectivă, 2nd Edition, Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2009
- Boilă, Lacrima-Rodica. "Malpraxis. Propuneri legislative privind despăgubirea victimelor accidentelor medicale". Romanian Private Law Magazine, no. 5 (2012): 29-55
- Butnariu, Angela, Iustin Lupu and Mircea Buta. "Consimţământul informat în practica pediatrică şi în cercetarea vizând copilul". Romanian Bioethics Magazine VII, no. 7 (2009): 38-46
- Chelaru, Eugen. Drept civil. Persoanele, în reglementarea NCC, 4th Edition. Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2016

[11] Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, No 981/7 December 2016.

[12] Iancu Tănăsescu, Gabriel Tănăsescu and Camil Tănăsescu, Transplantul şi prelevarea (Bucharest: C.H. Beck Publ.-house, 2008), 48-52.

[13] Angela Butnariu, Iustin Lupu and Mircea Buta, "Consimţământul informat în practica pediatrică şi în cercetarea vizând copilul", Romanian Magazine of Bio-ethics, 7th Volume, No 1(2009): 40-41.

[14] Ungureanu, "Noile dispoziţii legale privind prelevarea şi transplantul de organe, ţesuturi şi celule de origine umană în scop therapeutic", 19; Chelaru, Drept civil. Persoanele, în reglementarea NCC, 32.

[15] For an analysis of these obligations, see also Lacrima-Rodica Boilă, "Malpraxis. Propuneri legislative privind despăgubirea victimelor accidentelor medicale", in Romanian Magazine of Private Law, no. 5 (2012): 52.

[16] Lacrima-Rodica Boilă, Răspunderea civilă delictuală subiectivă, 2nd Edition (Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2009), 392-393; Chelaru and Duminică, „Brief considerations about the informed consent of the patient", 7-27.

[17] Silviu Morar, Horatiu Dura, Mihaela Cerunşcă-Miţariu and Adrian Cristian, "Reflectarea drepturilor pacienţilor în noile coduri deontologice din domeniul medical", in Acta Universitatis Lucian Blaga, No 1(2013): 34.

- Chelaru, Eugen and Duminică Ramona. „Brief considerations about the informed consent of the patient". Legal and administrative studies, No 2 (2017): 7-27
- Curcă, G. C. "Aspecte conceptuale privind răspunderea deontologică şi malpractica medicală". Romanian Magazine of Bio-ethics, 8th Volume. No 1(2010): 51-59
- Morar, Silviu, Mihaela Cernuşcă-Miţariu, Horaţiu Dura and Adrian Cristian. "Reflectarea drepturilor pacienților în noile coduri deontologice din domeniul medical". Acta Universitatis Lucian Blaga no. 1 (2013): 25-35
- Oprea, Liviu. "Un studiu analitic asupra relaţiei medic-pacient" (Part 1). Romanian Magazine of Bio-ethics, 7th Volume. No 2 (2009): 57-70
- Tănăsescu, Iancu, Tănăsescu Gabriel and Tănăsescu Camil. Transplantul şi prelevarea. Bucharest: C.H. Beck Publ.-house, 2008
- Ungureanu, Ovidiu. "Noile dispoziţii legale privind prelevarea şi transplantul de organe, ţesuturi şi celule de origine umană în scop terapeutic". Dreptul no. 5 (2007): 14-19

THE TRADE FUND AS A CONTRIBUTION TO THE FORMATION OR INCREASE OF THE SHARE CAPITAL OF A COMPANY

Gabriela FIERBINŢEANU[*]
Vasile NEMEŞ[]

Abstract

Through this paper, the authors propose to go through some of the practical problems that may arise in the event of a legal act having as object the bringing of the trade fund as a contribution to a commercial company. The fact that until the conclusion of the legal act itself, there is doctrinal confrontations regarding the establishment of the legal nature of the trade fund in the context of theoretical regulations that do not cover a topic of overwhelming importance in the exploitation of an enterprise lead us to emphasize the importance of a more fluid regulation and more adapted to the economic realities. Although there is no longer a definition of the fund, the references to it have not been eliminated and we are considering the regulations regarding the legal acts the object of which is it and those concerning its elements constitutive of tangible or intangible assets, mobile or immovable . In the light of the newly emerged regulations on the patrimony of affection and under the provisions of the Civil Code defining the patrimony divisions, it would also be necessary to amend the Law.no26/1990 regarding the trade register, first of all to clarify its legal regime .Business and asset transfer, legal acts on the trading fund and trends in its qualification and the applicable legal regime represent several landmarks in dealing with the proposed subject.

Keywords: trade fund, legal nature of the trade fund, factual universality, business transfer, asset transfer.

1. Introduction

Although the references to the trade fund are maintained under the Trade Register Law no.26 / 1990, the normative acts do not currently offer the notion of the commerce fund, so that the doctrine in this context has the role of formulating more theories about its legal nature. The article is an attempt to present some of the most important theories regarding the notion of trade fund and some of the differences between trade fund input operation to the share capital of companies governed by Law no. 31/1990 on transferring companies and the transfer of assets as defined by national legislation and European acts.

The goods used by professional traders in the course of their activity form a universality intended to carry out various commercial operations, called the "trading fund".

In the literature[1], the trading fund is defined as "a set of movable and immobile, corporeal and incorporeal goods that a trader affects in the conduct of his commercial activity in order to attract clients and, implicitly, to obtain profits." The trading fund is not confused with the notion of patrimony, as the trading fund is the whole of the movable and immovable, corporeal or incorporeal assets afflicted by the trader in the course of a commercial activity, while the patrimony represents all the trader's rights and obligations of economic value.

Currently[2], without defining the fund, the Law no. 26/1990 on the Trade Register stipulates in art. 21 lit. a) that in the Trade Register will be recorded the "donation, sale, hiring or real security on the fund of commerce, as well as any other act amending the recordings in the trade register or terminating the firm or fund trade". Also, the same normative act sends in art. 41 to the notion of a trading fund, stipulating that the acquirer under any title of a fund may continue to work under the earlier firm in the cases provided for by law, with the express agreement of the previous holder or his successors in title and with the obligation to mention the quality of that successor company".

The legislator of the Civil Code does not repeal the notion of the commerce fund and uses it in the various legal texts, art. 340, art. 745, art. 2638, but without giving a definition of it. Starting from the notion, the doctrine has developed several theories that try to establish the juridical nature of the fund of commerce in relation to the notions of patrimony or enterprise[3], being more of a consideration taken from the doctrinal opinions the theory that approximates the legal nature of the fund of commerce to that of the patrimony of affection[4], namely the theory that regards the fund of commerce as a factual universality[5].

[*] Assistant Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: gabriela.fierbinteanu@gmail.com)
[] Lecturer, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: nemes@nemes-asociatii.ro)

[1] St.D. Cărpenaru, Commercial Treaty, 5 th edition, Legal Universe Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p. 96.

[2] The main regulation of the trade fund was found in the content of art. 11 lit. c) of Law no. 11/1991: "the trade fund shall be the whole of the movable and immovable, tangible and intangible assets (trademarks, firms, emblems, patents, inventions) used by a trader for the purpose of carrying out its activity", which has not been maintained by the legislator in the amendment to Law no. 11/1991 through O.U.G. no. 12/2014

[3] ST.D. CĂRPENARU,cited work., 2016, p. 98, GH. PIPEREA, Commercial Law, vol. I, Publishing House .CH Beck, Bucharest, 2016, p. 98

[4] ST.D. CĂRPENARU,cited work., 2016, p. 102

[5] I. SCHIAU, MONICA IONAŞ-SĂLĂGEAN, About dedicated assets in Romanian Journal of Business Law. no. 6 , 30 of June 2016

Moreover, beyond the idea of the universality actually defined by Article 541 paragraph 1 Civil code as the whole of the goods belonging to the same person and having a common destination established by its will or by law, paragraph 2 of the same article states that the goods that make up the universality in fact, together or separately, may be the subject of separate legal acts or relationships. Starting from this text, it can be appreciated that the trade fund may also be distinct from the constituent rights, as an embedded mobile asset, even if the content of universality includes immovable property (except in the case that all its assets are immovable), since the object of the legal acts referred to in paragraph 2 of the article may be the goods separately (as patrimonial rights) as well as the factual universality itself. The fact that the legal acts referred to in the text may include alienation or dismantling (Article 745 Civil code) makes universality the object of a property right in atypical form, thus qualifying it as an incorporeal movable asset[6].

2. Transmitting the trading fund as a contribution to the capital of trading company

The most numerous legal acts concluded in practice in connection with the fund of commerce, both as universality and as separate elements, are: the sale of the purchase, the contribution in a company, the lease, the mortgage and the pledge[7], which are governed, in the absence to special legal regulations, to the common law represented by the Civil Code.

The transaction of transferring ownership of the fund as a contribution to the company differs from the sale of the trading fund. The Fund Transmitter acquires the status of associate and, instead of the price, will receive shares according to the legal form of the company. For this reason, the transmission of the fund as a contribution to society is governed by Law no. 31/1990 on societies.

The latter normative act stipulates in art. 16 the main ways of contribution, namely the cash contributions, mandatory for the constitution of any form of society, the contributions in kind necessary to be economically evaluable, admitted to all forms of society and paid by transferring the corresponding rights and by effectively transferring to the company the goods in use and the contributions in debt, which have the legal status of contributions in kind, being not admitted to the public limited liability companies, nor to the limited partnerships shares and limited liability companies.

We may consider that the rules applicable to the sale of the fund are also applicable if it is contributed as a contribution in kind to the formation or increase of the share capital of a company to which the fund holder participates, but the two transactions must not be confused. The sales contract may also have as its object only one of the elements of the trading fund, and such a sale will have to take into account the legal provisions specific to the item that is the subject of the sale. Among the elements of the trade fund that can be sold separately are the emblem, as well as industrial property rights and copyright, the firm being exempt from the separate sale (Article 42 of Law 26/1990) and for reason identity, we believe that the same solution should be applied when the entire trading fund is brought in as a contribution in kind to the formation or increase of the share capital of a company. A short observation is to be made regarding the firm(the name of the company). Regarding the indissoluble link between the commerce fund and the denomination it is necessary to observe that the text of the law does not refer to the mark but to the name under which the trader carries out his activity. In this sense, it is useful to distinguish between the role of the trade name and the brand. As the Court pointed out "The use of a social name, trade name or emblem in accordance with its functions and within the limits of the protection conferred on its holder by its registration in the trade register, the identification of the company or designation of the fund of commerce, cannot be forbidden by the proprietor of the trade mark because the social name, trade name or emblem does not in itself have the function of distinguishing goods or services, a function which is specific to the marks. As such, in the context of the application of the provisions of Article 36 paragraph 2 (b) of Law 84/1998, it is necessary to determine whether using the signing of the sign takes place 'for goods or services', that is, if such use is made by affixing the sign which constitutes the trade name on the goods marketed or, even in the absence of the sign on the goods, it is used in such a way that it is established a link between the sign which constitutes the trade name and the products marketed, that is to say, if the trade name is used as a trade mark and thus affects the functions of the trade mark, in particular, to guarantee the origin of the goods or services to consumers. Such an analysis must be carried out by the court in relation to the concrete way in which the incriminated sign is used "[8].

Also, in case of such a contribution, it is necessary to evaluate it. In this respect, Law no. 31/1990, art. 16, par. 2, according to which "in-kind contributions must be economically measurable. They are admitted to all forms of society and are paid through proper transfer of rights and by the effective surrender of the goods in use to society "and the Methodological Norms concerning the way of keeping the trade registers, recording and disseminating information, approved by Order No. 2594 / C / 2008, article 137, letter c), according to which "The application for registration of the mention of the increase of the share capital by contributions in kind shall be attached: ... c) the evaluation report .

[6] V.Stoica,Incorporeal goods notion in Romanian Civil Law, Journal of Private Law no 3 - 2017, available at idrept.ro
[7] V Nemeş, Commercial Law, 3 rd edition, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest 2018 , p 82.
[8] decision no. 331/31 st January 2014, ICCJ, www.scj.ro

According to the doctrine[9]," The contribution to the formation or increase of the share capital of a company is a legal act itself, more precisely, an act of disposition, through which the associate transfers the right of ownership, another right or the right to use one's property in the patrimony of the society. If contributions consist of goods (corporeal or incorporeal), rights or claims, it is necessary to individualize them".

Regarding the composition of the commerce fund and the individualization of its elements, the problem in the practice of the courts of law was raised by the possibility that through the operation of alienation of the commerce fund (the situation in question can be evaluated also from the perspective of bringing the trade fund as contribution to the formation or increase of the share capital of a company) to commit a fraud to the law by circumventing certain provisions that require the acquiring company to obtain special authorizations for the activity it will carry out as a result of the transmission of this fund.

The promoted action raised in The Court the question of whether the Ministry of Health may issue operating licenses for new holders as a result of the purchase of operating licenses from their holders, in the appearance of the sale or purchase of a trade fund to which such a license would belong. In the opinion of the plaintiff , if a company buys the fund of commerce of a Community pharmacy, it does not acquire also the Community pharmacy which is a place of business of the trading company that sold the fund. The plaintiff pointed that In this case it is clear that the company acquires the vocation to obtain a new authorization for the operation of its new pharmacy (set up as its place of business) in the same way as any other company that has to fulfill the legal conditions for the establishment of a pharmacy no matter the place of its location, in compliance with the provisions of art. 10 of the Law no. 266/2008 .

The Purchaser of the Pharmacy Fund cannot acquire a special priority, because in fact the vendor of the trade fund cancels the Community pharmacy, clearing his place of business , so that without his subject the authorization ceases to operate due to the cessation of the activity of the pharmacy (the terminated place of business) and the buyer of the trade fund sets up a new place of business for which it must obtain the operating authorization as for any new Community pharmacy in compliance with the provisions of art. 12 of the same law. According to the pronounced Court ruling, under art. 11 paragraph 2 of the Emergency Ordinance no. 130/2010, "The change of the operating authorizations which have is done with the keeping of the operating authorization number at the request of the legal entity, by issuing a new authorization, on the basis of the documents stipulated in the norms for the application of the Law no.266 / 2008, republished, for the following situations: a) change of the holder - the legal person, entered as a mention on the operating authorization issued prior to the coming into force of the present emergency ordinance" . By applying the rule of interpretation, where the law does not distinguish, the interpreter must not distinguish, "it follows that any change of the owner leads to the fact that any change of the legal person on whose behalf the original authorization was issued justifies the release a new authorization for the new legal entity, and not only in the case the reorganization of the legal person. In this case, there was a change of the legal person, to which belongs the Community pharmacy, as a result of the sale of the trade fund. The right over the trade fund has no character intuitu personae. Nor is the authorization for operation to be intuitu personae, since the law permits the change of the legal person on whose behalf the authorization was issued and the issuance of a new authorization for the new legal entity. The claimant's claim that the "extension of the legal capacity to use" of the defendant "by issuing the operating authorization" was generated, is not correct. The right to carry out the pharmaceutical activities was not born at the time of the takeover of the commerce fund, but at the date of the issuance of the operating authorization from 06.07.2012, changed on 04.09.2012[10].

It should also be borne in mind that the trade fund is not only a corpus of corporeal and incorporeal assets but an activity present on the market which can be assigned a turnover, the object of the transfer being an independent economic activity.

In this respect, at the time of the contribution, must not be ignored the provisions of point 21 of the Competition Council's Instructions of 5 August 2010[11] on the concepts of economic concentration, the undertaking concerned, full operation and turnover, according to which "the acquisition of control is carried out on entities with legal personality or just legal assets. Asset control is considered an economic concentration only if these assets constitute the entire trading fund of the enterprise or a part of it, namely a commercial activity present on the market, to which it may assign a turnover. "

In the last part of this paper we aim to take a look at the concept of transfer of business that can be achieved also by the contribution of the commerce fund to the formation or increase of the share capital of a company. Although not defined by the Commercial Law, the notion of business transfer was considered by the doctrine[12] as representing "the operation through transferring one or more branches of activity or part of a branch of activity, namely organized and independent economic activities between two legally independent companies / entities, irrespective of the type of

[9] St. D. Carpenaru, Gh. Piperea, S. David, Company Law -Articles comments -5 th edition , CH.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, p 13, p 112
[10] decision no.1717 from 30.05.2014, Court of Appeal Bucharest, Secţia a VIII-a C Administrativ şi Fiscal, available at http://www.rolii.ro/
[11] Official Journal, I st part , no. 553 bis 5th of august 2010
[12] L.Tuleaşcă, Transfer of business, Romanian Journal of Business Law no. 7/2016 , p. 53-71

agreement or the name used by the parties to the contract: transfer of assets, transfer / assignment of business, usufruct or lease of an enterprise, sale / transfer of a trade fund, transfer of the patrimony of affinity, fiduciary contract, merger, division ".The transfer of a business finds a place in the Fiscal Code in the form of the transfer of assets. According to art. 32 par. (1) lit. (d) Fiscal Code, the transfer of assets is defined as the operation by which a company transfers, without dissolving, all or one or more branches of its business to another company in exchange for the transfer of the units representing the capital of the recipient company. The concept was taken into account in the Sixth Council Directive 77/388 / EEC of 17 May 1977 on the harmonization of the laws of the Member States relating to turnover taxes - Common system of value added tax: uniform basis of assessment ('the Sixth Directive') , currently Council Directive 2006/112 / EC on the common system of value added tax of the EU. The concept of transfer of assets was also interpreted by the ECJ as meaning that it includes the transfer of a trading fund or an autonomous part of an undertaking comprising tangible and, where appropriate, intangible assets which together constitute an undertaking or a part of an undertaking which is capable of carrying on an autonomous economic activity but that it does not include mere disposal of goods such as the sale of a stock of products.[13] Transfer of assets is not a mere transfer of assets or a set of rights and obligations (assets and liabilities), but is a total or partial transfer of assets, not individually treated, but as a unitary one, representing an independent business, being essential that all the assets or assets transferred be sufficient to allow the continuation of the economic activity carried out by those assets. In the light of the above, the doctrine rightly appreciated that the "transfer of assets" does not necessarily have the same meaning as the transfer of a branch of activity, but it may also be broader but not narrower[14].

In order to identify the situations in which we can assume that we are in the presence of a transfer of assets, a useful tool is even the ECJ case law. Thus, in Christel Schriever (C-444/10), we are in the presence of a transfer of assets, of liabilities; a trader gives up the shop lease contract plus the stock of merchandise and commercial furniture in the store he owns; the first question to the Court was whether 'there is a' transfer 'of all assets within the meaning of Article 5 (8) of the Sixth Directive ... when an entrepreneur transfers ownership of the stock of goods and the equipment of his sales unit the retail of a buyer and just rents the commercial space he owns? ".The question was also whether it is a transfer of assets, even if the lease could be terminated at any time by both sides, which casts a shadow over the continued exploitation of the assets. The Court notes that the first sentence of Article 5 (8) of the Sixth Directive provides that Member States may take the view that, in the event of the transfer of all the assets of a company or part thereof, there is no supply of goods and the person to whom the goods are transferred is the successor of the transferor. It follows that when a Member State has made use of this possibility, the transfer of all or part of the assets is not considered a supply of goods of the Sixth Directive and is therefore not subject to VAT under Article 2 of that directive. As for the concept of 'transfer for consideration or not in the form of contribution to a company, other assets or part thereof', referred to in the first sentence of Article 5 (8) of the Sixth Directive, the Court emphasized that already it constitutes an autonomous concept of Union law that must be interpreted uniformly throughout the Union. In the absence of a definition of this notion in the Sixth Directive or an express reference to the law of the Member States, its meaning and scope must be determined by reference to the context of the provision and the objective pursued by that legislation (Zita Modes, C-497 / 01, paragraphs 32-35). It follows that, in order to establish the transfer of a trading fund or an autonomous part of a undertaking within the meaning of Article 5 (8) of the Sixth Directive, all the elements transferred must be sufficient to permit the continuation of an autonomous economic activity.

3. Conclusions

Through this paper the authors have proposed to go through some of the practical problems that may arise in the event of a legal act having as object the bringing of the trade fund as a contribution to a commercial company without claiming that they have exhausted the whole range of implications of the transfer. While there is a theoretical level of controversy both in terms of the applicable special rules or in the plan of the common law, both regarding the legal nature of the trade fund or the way of concluding and the content of the legal acts underlying the transfer as well as regarding the applicable tax regime, given the increase in the number of operations that have this object, we believe that, also as a result of the practice in the field, the theoretical notions will be clarified.

References

- St.D. Cărpenaru, Commercial Treaty, 5 th edition, Legal Universe Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016
- Gh. Piperea, Commercial Law, vol. I, Publishing House .CH Beck, Bucharest, 2016
- V Nemeş, Commercial Law, 3 rd edition, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest 2018

[13] case Zita Modes, C-497/01, recital 40, case Schriever, C-444/10, recital 24, available at curia.europa.eu

[14] R Bufan, Transfer of business, fiscal effects, Romanian Journal of Business Law no. 3/2015, available at https://idrept.ro/

- St. D. Carpenaru, Gh. Piperea, S. David, Company Law -Articles comments -5 th edition , CH.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014
- I. Schiau, Monica Ionaş-Sălăgean, About dedicated assets in Romanian Journal of Business Law. no. 6- 30 of June 2016
- V.Stoica, Incorporeal goods notion in Romanian Civil Law, Journal of Private Law no 3 - 2017, available at idrept.ro
- L.Tuleaşcă, Transfer of business, Romanian Journal of Business Law no. 7/2016
- R Bufan, Transfer of business, fiscal effects, Romanian Journal of Business Law no. 3/2015, available at https://idrept.ro/
- decision no. 331/31 st January 2014, ICCJ, at www.scj.ro
- decision no.1717 from 30.05.2014, Court of Appeal Bucharest, Secţia a VIII-a C Administrativ şi Fiscal, available at http://www.rolii.ro/
- case Zita Modes, C-497/01, case Schriever, C-444/10, available at https://curia.europa.eu

THE POSIBILITY OF THE DEBTOR TO REQUEST PUBLIC JUDICIAL ASSISTANCE IN THE FORM OF BAIL EXEMPTION OR REDUCTION DURING A PROVISIONAL SUSPENSION OF THE FORCED EXECUTION CASE

Bogdan Sebastian GAVRILĂ[*]

Abstract

The situation is becoming more and more common nowadays. A debtor, lacking in sufficient fonds, is forced to request public judicial assistance from the Court so that he may be exempted from the obligation of paying bail during a provisional suspension of the forced execution case. The article shall focus on the applicability of Article 6 of the E.C.H.R., on the national provisions and on whether or not they may allow such a request to be analysed by the Court and not be rendered inadmissible. Some practitioners have viewed this possibility as inadmissible in accordance to our national legislation. In their view, no legal text allows the debtor to request this type of aid and no legal means are offered to regulate this type of legal problem. Others have granted public judicial assistance after careful consideration of the economic situation of the debtor, in regards to the fact that his right to a fair trial extends even to this particular situation. By not granting him the opportunity to present his arguments at this stage of the trial due to a lack of funds, a sort of discrimination may be generated in favour of the debtors who can financially afford to present their case as opposed to those who cannot. The article shall thus carefully ponder the interests and obligations of the parties involved in the trial so as to establish some useful conclusions or good practices regarding the issue at hand.

Keywords: public judicial assistance, bail exemption, provisional suspension, forced execution, Court's role.

1. Introduction

1.1. What matter does the paper cover?

The paper deals with the situation of a forced execution of a legal title. The debtor considers that his creditor is not entitled to execute the title and thus calls upon the court to suspend the execution. However, the timing is not financially acceptable for the debtor. He is unable to pay bail, despite the obligation as laid out in Article 719 par. 7 of the Civil Procedural Code[1] and thus his request to suspend the execution cannot be analysed by the court. Thus, some debtors have chosen to employ the use of Emergency Ordinance no. 51/2008, soliciting public judicial assistance in the form of the exception or reduction of the bail fees. The effect of this request means placing the judge into a situation of not being able to establish the legal text that may address this particular issue.

The main objective of the study is to come accros an acceptable solution for this legal difficulty, one which may provide the legal subjects with a means of establishing both a predictable and accessible course of action as laid out in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights.

1.2. Why is the studied matter important?

The studied matter is very important because there are a great number of cases regarding a provisional suspension of the execution of the title in which the debtor has invoked the right to be exempted from bail or at least it's reduction. Finding a balance between his interests and the interests of the creditor is of the utmost importance, and the courts are obligated to balance the two so as to reach an equitable solution. In doing so, potential infringements of Article 6 of the European Convention of Human Rights[2] may be avoided, thus allowing for a lawful trial and a proper analysis of the merits of the suspension request.

1.3. How does the author intend to answer to this matter?

After a proper analysis of the applicable legal texts, and a further study of the opinion of nationally renowned authors, some key insights regarding the issue may be found. Thus, a future consensus may be reached between both the courts and the other legal subjects, so as to avoid inconsistencies in the jurisprudence of the courts, which have generated tremendous inequalities in the past. The European Court of Human Rights jurisprudence shall also be the subject of scrutiny, in order to retain the conventional standard applicable in this legal situation and thus align the potential solution to the rigours of European values regarding the civil rights of the individual.

1.4. What is the relation between the paper and the already existent specialized literature?

Despite the evident importance, there are only a few analyses regarding the proper course of action which is to be employed in order to solve the legal [*] PhD Candidate, Bucharest University of Economic Studies, Romania, Judge (e-mail: gavrila.bogdan.sebastian@gmail.com).

[1] Law no. 134 of July 1, 2010 regarding the Civil Procedure Code, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 247 of April 10, 2015.

[2] European Convention on Human Rights: " In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law " problems which stem from the application of Emergency Ordinance no. 51/2008 in this particular situation. The merits of each opinion expressed by the studied authors shall receive the proper attention, in enabling the article to establish acceptable solutions which may be easily implemented in practice.

2. The legal applicable texts and European Court of Human Rights rullings

2.1. The Civil procedural Code

Firstly, our national Civil Procedural Code[3] outlines in Article no. 719 the legal framework regarding the suspension procedure of the forced execution: " Until the appeal to the enforcement or other enforcement request has been resolved at the request of the interested party and only for good reasons, the competent court may suspend execution. Suspension may be requested with the challenge of execution or separate request.

(2) In order to order the suspension, the person who requests it must give a preliminary bail, calculated at the value of the object of the appeal, as follows:…

(6) On the request for suspension, the court shall, in all cases, pronounce by conclusion, even before the time limit set for the examination of the appeal. The parties will always be quoted, and the conclusion may be appealed separately, only on appeal or, if it is delivered by the court of appeal, only on appeal, within 5 days of pronouncement for the present part, or from the communication for the missing one.

(7) If there is an emergency and if, in the cases provided in paragraph (2) and paragraph (3), the bail was paid, the court may order, by concluding and without summoning the parties, the provisional suspension of the execution until the settlement of the request for suspension. The decission is not subject to any appeal. The bail referred to in this paragraph shall remain unavailable even if the application for interim suspension is rejected and is deductible from the final bail, as the case may be…"

The law has sought to establish a general rule regading the issue at hand, by obligating the debtor to forfeit a fixed sum of money in order to protect the interests of the creditor. The fonds are to remain unavailable so as to serve four purposes, in accordance with Article no. 720 of Civil Procedural Code: " If the appeal is rejected, the claimant may be ordered to pay damages for infringements caused by delay of execution*, and when the contestation was* conducted in bad faith*, he will also be liable* to pay a fine from 1,000 lei to 7,000 lei … When the appeal was dismissed, the sum representing the bail will remain unavailable, and will serve to cover the receivables shown in par. (3) or those established by the enforceable title*, as the case may be, in which case the bailiff will be notified and the receipt for the payment of this amount.* "

2.2. Emergency Ordinance no. 51/2008

Article 1 of the Emergency Ordinance no. 51/2008[4] points out the main objective of the law: " Judicial public assistance is that form of State assistance aimed at ensuring the right to a fair trial and guaranteeing equal access to justice, for the realization of legitimate rights or interests by judicial process, including the enforcement of judgments or other enforceable titles ".

The forms in which the scope may be attained are laid out in Article no. 4 -" Any natural person may solicit the provision of public legal aid under this Emergency Ordinance in the event that he or she can not afford the costs of a trial or those involving legal advice to defend a right or legitimate interest in the law, without jeopardizing his or her family's maintenance. " and in Article no. 6 :" Public judicial assistance may be granted in the following forms:…(d) exemptions, reductions, staggered payments or deferrals from the payment of legal fees provided for by law, including those due at the forced execution stage. ".

As it can be easily noticed, the list of possible methods of soliciting the aid of the state in order to avoid " jeopardizing his or her family's maintenance " is an exhaustive one. No other requests can be made, should the natural person wish to invoke these legal texts. There are no express provisions regarding the exemption or reduction of bail fees.

2.3. European Court of Human Rights rulling in the case of Weissman and Others v. Romania- 63945/00 [2006]

The conventional standard is indicated at par. no. 37[5] and reads as follows: " the amount of the fees, assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of a given case, including the applicant's ability to pay them and the phase of the proceedings at which that restriction has been imposed, are factors which are material in determining whether or not a person enjoyed his or her right of access to a court or whether, on account of the amount of fees payable, the very essence of the right of access to a court has been impaired " thus leading the Court to concur that " the State failed to strike a fair balance between, on the one hand, its interest in recovering the costs of proceedings and, on the other, the applicants' interest in having their claims examined by the courts."

There are cases in which the debtor bases his request of bail exemption or reduction on the Emergency Ordinance no. 51/2008, Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights or on the jurisprudence of European Court of Human Rights.

[3] Law no. 134 of July 1, 2010 regarding the Civil Procedure Code, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 247 of April 10, 2015.
[4] Emergency Ordinance no. 51/2008, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 327 of April 25, 2008
[5] Weissman and Others v. Romania- 63945/00 [2006] European Court of Human Rights.

2.3. European Court of Human Rights rulling in the case of Iosif and Others v. Romania- 10443/03 [2006]

The conventional standard is indicated at par. No. 60[6] and reads as follows:" The Court observes that the obligation imposed on the applicants to pay an extremely high sum of money to enable them to bring an action was deprived of the opportunity to obtain an examination of the substance of the case and, consequently, of their right of access to a court. Moreover, it notes that the Constitutional Court, which has been notified in another case with an exception to the unconstitutionality of the legal provision on the establishment of the value of the bail, decided that it was not in compliance with the Constitution ".

3. The interpretation of the courts and legal authors

3.1. The opinion of the Courts

Most of the cases in which the matter at hand has been brought before the courts, the solution was to repeal the request as inadmissible, given the fact that no legal framework has been provided in order to regulate this type of situation.

With an almost overwhelming majority, the request has been repelled, with the mention of the possibility for the applicant to subject it to a re-examination by another judge, in accordance with article no. 43[7] par. 4 :" Against the conclusion, interested parties may file a review request within 5 days of the date of the communication of the conclusion. The request is exempt from stamp duty.".

The opinion can be subjected to criticism, given the fact that since the request was deemed as inadmissible in the first place, it is evident that the review itself is inadmissible. Despite this, some judges indicate a means of appealing an initial decision that is not mentioned in any legal text.

Other judges[8] base their analysis on the European Court of Human Rights conventional standard previously indicated, interpreting it in such a way that a reduction or exemption be granted in order to avoid an infringement to the right of the debtor to a fair trial. The precarious economic situation of the debtor is invoked to justify the measure, given the fact that the request may be the only chance that he shall have to temporarily suspend the execution before a proper analysis can be made regarding the opportunity of suspension in accordance with article no. 719 par. 1 of the Civil Procedural Code.

3.2. The opinion of the legal authors

Some legal authors have expressed the idea that it is mandatory for the courts to perform the analysis of the request, since it is not inadmissible. " It is clear that the courts can not refuse to hear claims for reduction or exemption from bail. On the contrary, they have to analyze on the merits such requests, assessing, in particular, whether they are founded or not. In this approach, the courts will consider various criteria, such as: the amount of the bail, the income of the party, the stage of the procedure, the purpose of the tax, the proportionality of the interference for that purpose, the procedural guarantees granted to the party, the foreseeability of the tax. "[9]

Other legal authors, in recently analysing the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights have stated that " the Court's reasoning shows that Article 6 of the Convention is applicable, under certain conditions, also to those procedures referred to by the Court of Justice, that is to say those procedures which do not directly address the substance of civil rights and obligations (such as, for example, with the proceedings for suspension of enforced execution, discussed in the present case, other procedures such as the presidential orders or the precautionary measures, etc[10])."

Another prominent author[11] has stated that the analysis of the conditions needed to temporarily suspend the execution of the title is more formal, and that a more thorough one is to be carried out later on. This is indicative of the fact that the request usually is subjected to a proper inquiry only during the debate during the normal suspension request, as stated in Article no. 719 par. 1 of the Civil Procedural Code.

The matter has been further treated in other works. Another problem has been identified by an author[12], in the sense that the judge who has already expressed his opinion regarding the necessity of the provisory suspension may be incompatible to decide on the suspension request until the first instance court's decision.

---

[6] Iosif and Others v. Romania- 10443/03 [2006] European Court of Human Rights.

[7] Emergency Ordinance no. 80/2013, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 392 of June 29, 2013

[8] https://www.luju.ro/static/files/2013/octombrie/09/madularescu_ghica_Incheieri_26.09.2013-dosar_37103.pdf

[9] Marinela CIOROABĂ, Florin RADU, „ Despre reducerea cautiunii sau scutirea de la plata acesteia in materia suspendarii executarii silite", last modification 27.02.2018. https://www.juridice.ro/126524/despre-reducerea-cautiunii-sau-scutirea-de-la-plata-acesteia-in-materia-suspendarii-executarii-silite.html

[10] Claudiu Drăgușin, „ Aplicabilitatea art. 6 CEDO în privința cererilor de suspendare a executării silite, în special sub aspectul scutirii / reducerii / eșalonării sumelor stabilite cu titlu de cauțiune - decizia de inadmisibilitate în cauza S.C. Eco Invest S.R.L. și Ilie Bolmadar c. României", last modification 27.02.2018. http://www.hotararicedo.ro/index.php/news/2017/01/aplicabilitatea-art-6-cedo-cererilor-suspendare-a-executarii-silite-scutirii-reducerii-esalonarii-cautiune-inadmisibilitate-sc-eco-invest-srl-ilie-bolmadar-c-romaniei

[11] Răducan, Gabriela et Dinu, Mădălina (2016), „ Fișe de procedură civilă "[Civil Procedure Charts], București: ed. Hamangiu, p. 387.

[12] Boroi, G. (ed.), (2013), „ Noul Cod de Procedură Civilă Comentat, vol.2 " [The Commented New Civil Procedural Code, vol. 2], București: Ed. Hamangiu, p. 213.

4. The interpretation of the author

Firstly, upon a proper analysis of the European Court of Human Rights jurisprudence, one can note that article 719 par. 7, in its present form has never been the subject of any criticism.

Also, the Constitutional Court of Romania has never stated that this legal text may be unconstitutional. Neither the interpretation of Emergency Ordinance no. 51/2008 in the sense that such a request is inadmissible. Thus, at this moment, until further notice, the provisions and their interpretation are valid in the opinion of the two Courts.

However, the interpretation can be justfully criticised up to one point.

Should the judge establish a bail obligation for the debtor based on improper calculations, the debtor, under article 6 of the Europeean Convention on Human Rights should be allowed to subject the calculations to a proper re-examination by another of his colleagues. Despite the fact that our national legislation does not specify such a means, challenging the calculations should be allowed. Repealing such a request as inadmissible prima facie can be viewed as an infringement on the right to a fair trial of the debtor.

However, subjecting the request for public judicial assistance to an analysis in terms of the economic situation of the debtor in justifying a potential reduction or exemption of the fee can lead to an infringement of the rights of the creditor.

In the European Court of Human Rights case of Weissman against Romania, the impediment for the applicant was regarding the legal fees which would should have been paid to the state. Indeed, the margin of appreciation of the state in this regard may be reduced in order to allow a private individual to present his case before the court. Should he win, the costs shall be supported by the opposing party. Should he loose, the state may regain the sum, under the provisions of the article 19 par. 2 of the Emergency Ordinance no. 51/2008.

In the European Court of Human Rights case of Iosif against Romania, the impediment for the applicant was regarding the bail which had to be paid in order to be able to challenge the legality of the forced execution, in order to defend himself against the creditor. Not being able to present his defence due to a financial impossibility was justly viewed by the European Court of Human Rights as an infringement to the applicant's right to a fair trial.

However, the situation analised in the article deals only with the obligation to pay bail in order to temporarily suspend the execution. The amount of bail can in some cases prove rather burdensome for any individual. Despite this, the debtor is able to present his defences before the court regarding the legality of the execution itself. The failure to pay the bail fees can not constitute an impediment in exercising this legal right.

The greatest dangers which may arise from the impossibility of provisionally suspending the execution can stem from the sale of the property of the debtor at the price well bellow the market. Should he successfully contest the execution, he may request the return of his property, in accordance with article 723 par. 1 of the Civil Procedural Code[13]: " In all cases where the enforceable title or enforcement itself is annuled, the person concerned has the right to return the enforcement by re-establishing the previous situation. The enforcement costs for the acts performed remain with the creditor." He may also request the difference between the actual value of the goods and what the adjudicating third party paid for them, in accordance with article 1349 of the Civil Code since the fault for an unlawfull execution belongs to the creditor.

Thus, the risks involved for the debtor which may arise from not paying the bail fees are less problematic that in the past when the old legislation obligated him to pay them in order to be able to annul the execution itself.

Another important matter that is relevant to the subject at hand is to weigh in these risks with the ones created for the creditor should the request be admitted.

Firstly, should the request for bail reduction or exemption be accepted by the judge, the imminent danger may arise from the deprivation of the creditor of the sums of money needed to fulfil one of four purposes stated in article 720 of the Civil Procedural Code: " pay damages for infringements caused by delay of execution, and when the contestation was conducted in bad faith, he will also be liable to pay a fine from 1,000 lei to 7,000 lei When the appeal was dismissed, the sum representing the bail will remain unavailable, and will serve to cover the receivables shown in par. (3) or those established by the enforceable title, "[14].

No doubt these specific provisions have been drafted in order to ensure certain rights for the creditor, so that he may satisfy his claim.

To infringe upon them, by limiting his capability to satisfy his claim, to prolong the moment of execution, just because the other party is unable to support the financial burden of paying the bail fees, is by itself an infringement on the creditor's right to property.

Should a hypothetical claim be made before the European Court of Human Rights by the creditor in which he would raise these arguments, soon after it would be established that both Article no. 6 and Article no. 1 of Protocol no. 1 are applicable. The analysis would then concentrate on whether or not the measure was in accordance with the national provisions.

Most certainly, the European Court of Human Rights would not be able to find a legal provision that could regulate the benefit created for the debtor and limit the right of the creditor to benefit from the sums paid as bail fees. " The principle of lawfulness also presupposes that the applicable provisions of domestic law be sufficiently accessible, precise and foreseeable in their application "[15]. Since there are no legal texts which may allow for the judge to grant such a request, there can be no discussion regarding the accessible, precise and foreseeable conditions for the text in order to justify the measure.

[13] Law no. 134 of July 1, 2010 regarding the Civil Procedure Code, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 247 of April 10, 2015.
[14] Law no. 134 of July 1, 2010 regarding the Civil Procedure Code, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 247 of April 10, 2015.

Thus, the evident conclusion would be that a violation of the rights of the creditor protected by Article 1 of Protocol 1 and Article no. 6 of the Europeean Convention on Human Rights has taken place. And the analysis would not even reach the point of verifying whether or not a fair balance has been maintained between the interests of the debtor and those of the creditor.

The state, which enjoyes a large margin of appreciation in this respect in regulating the conditions needed to solicit the temporary suspension, has established the obligation to pay the bail fees.

To interpret the legal texts in order to justify such a measure by the judge, under the umbrella of the necessity to respect the debtor's right to a fair trial is erroneous and unlawfull.

It would also create a difficult situation for the creditor, who after the efforts of obtaining the executory title, has to support the risks of the postponed execution, without the scenario ever even been regulated by law.

Moreover, the analysis of the European Court of Human Rights jurisprudence as previously laid has yielded the fact that the obligation to pay the bail fees by the debtor beforehand, should he solicit the temporary suspension of the execution, has never been viewed as problematic in the case law.

5. Conclusions

5.1. Summary of the main outcomes

There is no doubt that there are some who view the solution of granting the request of bail exemption or reduction as equitable and in complete accordance with the highest values promoted by the European Court of Human Rights.

Indeed, the aid for the debtor is evident, as he needs merely to prove his precarious financial situation in order to present to the court his arguments.

However, there are other interests involved which require a most careful analysis on whether or not to proceed with this course of action.

Given the arguments previously presented, the necessity to ensure the rights of the creditor, as granted to him by the state, should prevent any legal contra legem interpretations in order to avoid any violations of Article no. 6 or Article no. 1 of Protocol 1 to the Europeean Convention on Human Rights. The state has specifically established this safeguard for him, in order to discourage further impediments to this right to execute his title.

Since he has already reached the point where he is obligated to call upon the coercive force of the state because the debtor has failed to fulfil his obligations, to reach an equitable outcome would mean for the judge to refrain from granting the debtor's request.

5.2. The expected impact of the research outcomes

The aim of the article is to endeavour to shed light on the subject, in order to aid the reader to circumvent potential difficulties in deciding on the matter.

Also, it is also hoped to spread the idea of potential de lege ferenda sollutions in the form of explicitly mentioning in the provisions of Emergency Ordinance no. 51/2008 that it is not applicable in this particular situation.

5.3. Suggestions for further research work.

Given the fact that the European Court of Human Rights can sometimes radically change its views, such as in the case of Micallef v. Malta of 2009, further research could potentially follow the case law of the Court, in identifying future instances in which the legal texts mentioned in the article have been subjected to an analysis.

References

- Law nr. 134/2010, republished in the Oficial Monitor, Part 1, no. 247/10.04.2015
- Emergency Ordinance no. 51/2008, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 327 of April 25, 2008
- Weissman and Others v. Romania- 63945/00 [2006] European Court of Human Rights
- Iosif and Others v. Romania- 10443/03 [2006] European Court of Human Rights
- Emergency Ordinance no. 80/2013, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 392 of June 29, 2013
- https://www.luju.ro/static/files/2013/octombrie/09/madularescu_ghica_Incheieri_26.09.2013-dosar_37103.pdf
- Marinela CIOROABĂ, Florin RADU, ,, Despre reducerea cautiunii sau scutirea de la plata acesteia in materia suspendarii executarii silite", last modification 27.02.2018. https://www.juridice.ro/126524/despre-reducerea-cautiunii-sau-scutirea-de-la-plata-acesteia-in-materia-suspendarii-executarii-silite.html
- Claudiu Drăgușin,,, Aplicabilitatea art. 6 CEDO în privința cererilor de suspendare a executării silite, în special sub aspectul scutirii / reducerii / eşalonării sumelor stabilite cu titlu de cauţiune - decizia de inadmisibilitate în cauza S.C. Eco Invest S.R.L. şi Ilie Bolmadar c. României", last modification 27.02.2018. http://www.hotararicedo.ro/index.php/news/2017/01/aplicabilitatea-art-6-cedo-cererilor-

[15] Dickmann and Gion v. Romania, 10346/03 and 10893/04 [2017] European Court of Human Rights.

suspendare-a-executarii-silite-scutirii-reducerii-esalonarii-cautiune-inadmisibilitate-sc-eco-invest-srl-ilie-bolmadar-c-romaniei

- Răducan, Gabriela et Dinu, Mădălina (2016), ,,Fișe de procedură civilă "[Civil Procedure Charts], București: ed. Hamangiu
- Boroi, G. (ed.), (2013), ,, Noul Cod de Procedură Civilă Comentat, vol.2 " [The Commented New Civil Procedural Code, vol. 2], București: Ed. Hamangiu
- Dickmann and Gion v. Romania, 10346/03 and 10893/04 [2017] European Court of Human Rights

UNLAWFUL CONDUCT ON THE CAPITAL MARKET

Cristian GHEORGHE[*]

Abstract

European Union Law had explicitly authorized the use of a double punishment (administrative and criminal) in the context of the fight against illegal conduct on the financial markets. Thus many facts and behaviours on the capital market have a double regulation, especially in the area of market abuse. For example, we have the misconduct of market manipulation punished with administrative (pecuniary) penalty and the market manipulation offense punished with criminal penalty. Criminal liability conditions are different from administrative liability but generating facts and behaviours are rigorously identical. Therefore acts of market manipulation are punished as misdemeanours (administrative procedure) when acts are committed without the form of guiltiness required by law to qualify them as offenses (criminal procedure).

The question raised by European and Romanian regulations on financial market is the compatibility with or violation of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). In order to ensure the integrity of markets and to enhance investor confidence in those markets, European law has created broad administrative offences, which punish the risk of harm to the market with severe, pecuniary and non-pecuniary penalties. Access to a subsequent court in administrative proceedings is an evasive guarantee that does not compensate the unfairness of the administrative procedure. ECHR case law concluded that market pressure and need for compliance in that field cannot prevail over international human rights obligations of States bound by the Convention (ECHR).

Keywords: capital market, market abuse, double punishment, ne bis in idem, ECHR.

1. Introduction.

Many facts and behaviours on the capital market have a double regulation, especially in the area of market abuse. Romanian law provides the misconduct of market manipulation punished with administrative penalty[1] and market manipulation offense, punished with prison[2]. Of course, criminal liability is inflicted under different conditions than administrative contravention, but the facts are rigorously identical. This is even suggested by the law when declares guilt as the only difference between provisions. Thus acts of market manipulation are sanctioned as offenses when deeds are committed without the form of guiltiness required by law to qualify them as offenses[3].

2. Administrative liability and criminal liability on the Capital Market.

The Romanian Capital Market Law suggests a certain timeline in the investigation of the acts related to market abuse. Respectively the identification of such facts requires first a criminal investigation for criminal offense. If the criminal procedure is completed without incurring criminal liability and applying a penal penalty - explicitly the act was prosecuted as an offense and subsequently it was established that it constitutes an administrative contravention only - then administrative liability remains incumbent[4].

The applicable law on administrative contravention emphasizes the same indisputable principle of criminal liability primacy[5].

Administrative contraventions are generally defined by their legal object represented by social values threatened or injured through misbehaviours, values less important to be protected by criminal law. Theoretically it is not possible administrative liability overlapping criminal liability simply because the offense and the administrative contravention are mutually exclusive (have different legal object)[6].

However, capital market regulation, following the European regulation (Market Abuse Regulation), does not follow this exclusion[7]. Double regulation of the same acts as crimes and administrative offenses contravenes the general principles of national regulation.

The anticipated conduct of Romanian Authority of the Capital Market (Financial Supervisory Authority – FSA) seems to solve the overlapping of liabilities, in practice. Respectively the FSA will assess the possible criminal nature of the reported facts and notify the criminal investigation authorities for the investigation [*] Associate Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: profesordrept@gmail.com).

[1] Regulation (EU) no. 596/2014, Market Abuse Regulation (MAR), Art. 30 para (1) a) and Art. 15. Romanian Law no. 24/2017, Art. 132 para (1) which refers MAR.

[2] Law no. 24/2017, Art. 134 para (5).

[3] Law no. 24/2017, Art. 132, para (3) b) i).

[4] Law no. 24/2017, Art. 133 para (5).

[5] Government Ordinance (GO) no 2/2001, Art. 30.

[6] GO no 2/2001, Art. 1. The law (contravention) protect social values which are not protected by penal law.

[7] Administrative misbehaviours related to market abuse are enacted directly by European Regulation no. 596/2014 (MAR), Art. 30. Criminal liability are inflicted by European Directive on market abuse (for the same facts).

of the facts in criminal proceedings. To the extent that criminal liability is established and a criminal penalty will be imposed, any administrative procedure ceases. FSA will no longer apply any sanction.

This chronology of events is above all criticism. In the rest of the situations, however, the legal perspective is more tumultuous.

If criminal liability is not engaged (termination or acquittal in the criminal proceedings), FSA resumes its investigation, the statute of limitation for administrative procedure being declared suspended during criminal procedure[8].

At first glance this situation seems beyond any controversy. It not seems to be a double prosecution. The perpetrators are subject to a criminal investigation and then subject to an administrative investigation for the same facts.

The non bis in idem principle prohibits not only a double conviction but also a double trial or investigation for the same facts. The principle in question is a principle with wide international recognition, but in criminal law only.

3. Ne bis in idem.

Immunity acquired for the same facts as a result of a previous criminal trial has a wide European and international recognition, in a sensibly different form. United Nations Covenant on Civil and Political Rights states that: "No one shall be liable to be tried or punished again for an offence for which he has already been finally convicted or acquitted in accordance with the law and penal procedure of each country."[9]

Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union[10] reads as follows: "No one shall be liable to be tried or punished again in criminal proceedings for an offence for which he or she has already been finally acquitted or convicted within the Union in accordance with the law."

American Convention on Human Rights[11] establishes that: "An accused person acquitted by a non-appealable judgment shall not be subjected to a new trial for the same cause."

The Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) has also enshrined the principle in its jurisprudence[12].

Of particular importance for European countries is the ECHR Convention[13]. No one shall be liable to be tried or punished again in criminal proceedings under the jurisdiction of the same State for an offence for which he has already been finally acquitted or convicted in accordance with the law and penal procedure of that State[14].

If, in the past, the principle was assimilated to a negative effect of the double-jeopardy clause which protect defendants from the burdens of multiple trials, domestic law (procedural criminal law) has now included ne bis in idem by enacting that no person can be prosecuted for committing an offense when that person has been previously given a final criminal judgment on the same offense, even under a different classification of the offense[15].

In the ECHR case law a person enjoys three distinct guarantees derived from the ne bis in idem principle: he cannot be prosecuted, tried or punished twice for the same conduct. From this perspective, even if the first proceedings end with acquittal (criminal charges) and the person is subsequently subject to the second proceedings (administrative charges), there is a violation of the Convention. There is no need to be two convictions for the violation of the Convention. The ECHR expressed the view that the perpetrator's acquittal of the charge under the criminal code did not deprive him of his status as a "victim" of the alleged violation of Article 4 of Protocol No. 7 of the Convention[16].

4. Cumulation of criminal liability with administrative liability.

National law does not explicitly address aggregation of administrative and penal liability but excludes it by defining the concepts. Placing administrative penalties outside the object of the criminal offenses should make it impossible to overlap the two concepts. But the content of many criminal offenses contains elements or circumstances that may constitute contraventions. In the case of market abuse, the situation is even more manifest as the same conduct is also a criminal offense and a contravention so that cumulation of liabilities is a possible situation. If administrative investigation is found to be inadmissible after criminal liability and punishment as a criminal offense, in the rest of the cases administrative liability remains applicable. The administrative procedure, pending after the criminal nature has been removed in [8] Law no. 24/2017, Art. 133 para (6). However in all cases an elapsed term of 4 years from time of facts excludes the application of a penalty.

[9] UN Convention, Art. 14 par. 7, adopted by UN General Assembly on December 16th 1966, http://www.ohchr.org/EN/ProfessionalInterest/Pages/CCPR.aspx.

[10] Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, proclaimed by the European Parliament, the Council and the Commission in Strasbourg on 12 December 2007 (OJ 14.12.2007), C 303/1, Art 50.

[11] American Convention on Human Rights, Art. 8 par. 4. http://www.cidh.org/basicos/english/basic3.american%20convention.htm.

[12] CJEU, https://curia.europa.eu/jcms. Limburgse Vinyl Maatschappij NV (LVM) and Others v. Commission of the European Communities, Joint cases C-238/99 P, C-244/99 P, C-245/99 P, C-247/99 P, C-250/99 P la C-252/99P and C-254/99 P, § 59, 15.10.2002. Norma Kraaijenbrink, Case C-367/05, 18.07.2007.

[13] Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms known as European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).

[14] Article 4 of Protocol No. 7 ECHR.

[15] Romanian Criminal Procedure Code, Art. 6.

[16] Sergey Zolotukhin v. Rusia, Case no. 14939/03, ECHR Judgement on 10.02.2009, para (119).

a criminal proceedings, is expressly regulated (by suspending the prescription of the application of the sanction in investigation of the administrative nature). However, this case does not involve cumulation but a successive check of the conditions of the criminal liability and contravention.

The premise of undeniably cumulation is that of imposing an administrative sanction by the FSA (which may consider that no criminal investigation is required). Such conduct of FSA does not hinder by anything the subsequent action of criminal prosecution authorities. They have no impediment (ex officio or by criminal complaint of others than FSA) to pursue investigation as they are not held by the FSA's opinion that the conduct is a contravention, not a crime.

The French doctrine has constantly held that criminal liability and contravention have different grounds so that the situation of the cumulus of contravention liability with criminal liability is allowed[17]. Cumulation is unambiguously accepted in French law, with the imputation of the administrative fine on the possible criminal fine. Thus, when the competent authority (in France this is the Sanctions Committee of the Financial Market Authority - AMF) imposed a financial penalty that became final before the criminal court finally ruled on the same facts, the criminal court may order that the pecuniary sanction to be deducted from the fine the court may pronounce[18]. Such provision basically validates the right of the criminal court to impose a penalty (fine or imprisonment) in criminal proceedings, after an administrative proceedings.

The evolution of French law on the matter. After constant criticism in the doctrine regarding the double incrimination and non-compliance with the ECHR Convention, Constitutional Council of France declared unconstitutional the cumulating of criminal and administrative penalties for the same deed, in particular the situation in which the same facts are subject to a plurality of sanctions.

By allowing the prosecution of similar behaviours to those pursued before the administrative regulator (AMF) in violation of the non bis in idem principle, these provisions violate the principles of the necessity of offenses and punishments, the proportionality of the punishment and respect for legally acquired rights.[19]
Romanian law faces the same situation with respect to Art. 134 para (2) (offense of misuse of privileged information) and Art. 132 para (3) of the Law no. 24/2017 (contravention). Respectively for the same facts there are administrative and criminal proceedings that can lead to double incrimination.

5. Double incrimination on the Capital Market in ECHR case-law. Civil limb and criminal limb of the right to a fair trial.

French case law as well as European developments on capital market unlawful conducts have been strongly influenced by the constant jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights to classify administrative sanctions in this field as "criminal" in nature. This practice enables the ne bis in idem principle in order to stop the effects of double prosecution, judgments and incriminations.

The jurisprudence of the ECHR applicable to the capital market was strongly influenced by the case Grande Stevens v. Italy.[20] In essence, the case concerns market manipulation. The competent authority of the market has investigated and punished the unlawful conduct by imposing significant pecuniary penalty aimed to deter market manipulation. Criminal investigation authorities have also been referred to as a result of the right conferred on Member States to impose administrative sanctions without prejudice to the right of States to apply criminal sanctions[21].

The criminal court also pronounced a conviction for the same conduct of market manipulation. The ECHR first examined the application of the Art. 6 of the Convention (right to a fair trial). This rule has civil limb (civil rights and obligations) and criminal limb (criminal sanctions). The ECHR has invoked its consistent case-law that the existence of a "criminal charge" requires verification of three elements: the legal classification of the measure in national law, the nature of the measure and the nature and severity of the sanction[22]. These criteria are alternative and not cumulative. In the case, the conduct of market manipulation investigated by the competent authority does not constitute a criminal charge (under Italian law). The facts were punished with an "administrative" sanction. But the qualification given by the national law has only a relative value in terms of the applicability by the ECHR Court of Article 6 of the Convention in its criminal limb[23].

Deficiency of a fair trial. The Court of the ECHR analysed the sanctions imposed in the area of market abuse and concluded that they are of special gravity and [17] A.-D. Merville, Droit financier, Gualino, 2015, p. 356. Constitutional Council of France formerly decided that double penalties, as they have different nature, are allowed and principle non bis in idem is not infringed, Decision 89-260 DC (Constitutional Council) from 18.07.1989.

[18] French Monetary and Financial Code, Art. L 621-16, quoted after https://www.legifrance.gouv.fr

[19] Constitutional Council of France, Decision no. 2014-453/454 QPC and 2015-462 QPC din 18.03.2015 - John L. Daimler AG and others, quoted after http://www.conseil-constitutionnel.fr/conseil-constitutionnel/francais/les-decisions/acces-par-date/decisions-depuis-1959/2015/2014-453/ 454-qpc-et-2015-462-qpc/version-en-anglais.143599.html.

[20] Grande Stevens v. Italia, Case no. 18640/10, ECHR Judgment from 4.03.2014, quoted after https://hudoc.echr.coe.int.

[21] Directive 2003/6/EC, Article 14, which invited the member States of the European Union to apply administrative sanctions against persons responsible for manipulating the market, contained in turn the phrase "without prejudice to the right of Member States to impose criminal sanctions". The provision is now in Regulation (EU) no 596/2014 (MAR), Art. 30 para (1) that replaces the Directive.

[22] Engel and Others v. the Netherlands, 8 June 1976, § 82, Series A no. 22.

[23] Öztürk v. Germany, 21 February 1984, § 52, Series A no. 73.

are of a criminal nature which leads to the application of Art. 6 § 1 of the Convention in its criminal limb. The requirements of a fair trial are stricter in the sphere of criminal law. The absence of a hearing is mainly the weakness of the proceedings before the competent authority. The Court concludes that the procedure before the authority, in the light of the classification of sanctions as criminal, is not satisfactory[24].

Independent and impartial tribunal condition. The Italian authority has an investigation office and the commission itself. The ECHR considers that they are departments of the same administrative body, acting under the authority of a single president. In this way the investigative and sanctioning functions are cumulated by a single body. In criminal matters such a combination of functions is not compatible with the requirements of impartiality laid down by Article 6 § 1 of the Convention[25].

Non bis in idem. ECHR has found that the unlawful conduct of market abuse is the same thing in administrative and criminal proceedings which means a double prosecution and breach of the Convention[26].

ECHR conclusions concern the regulatory capital market system of Italy and of all EU Member States that share the same legislation in the field. ECHR judgment is equally valid in its conclusions in Romania (lack of a fair trial, non-compliance with the requirement of the independent and impartial tribunal, non bis in idem in administrative and criminal proceedings for market abuse).

6. Conclusions

Judgment of the ECHR did not draw its conclusions, but dissenting opinion (partly concurring, partly dissenting opinion) pointed more precisely the context of the controversy.

European States are confronted with a dilemma. In order to ensure the integrity of European markets and to enhance investor confidence in those markets, States have created very broad administrative conduct-based offences, which punish the abstract risk of harm to the market with severe, undetermined pecuniary and non-pecuniary penalties, which are classified as administrative sanctions and applied by "independent" administrative authorities in inquisitorial, unequal and prompt proceedings. These authorities combine punitive and prosecutorial powers with a broad power of supervision over a particular sector of the market, and exercise the latter in such a way as to pursue the former, sometimes imposing on the supervised/suspected person an obligation to cooperate in the bringing of charges against him or her.[27]

Access to a subsequent court in administrative proceedings is only an evasive guarantee that does not compensate the unfairness of the procedure.

The conclusion of the divergent opinion of the ECHR is that market pressure cannot prevail over international human rights obligations of States bound by the Convention (ECHR).

We expect that this judgment will provide the domestic courts with an opportunity to deliver full justice to the applicants, and the Italian legislature with the incentive to remedy the structural deficiencies in the administrative and judicial procedure for the application and review of administrative sanctions by the CONSOB [Italian authority for Capital Market]. If the Italian legislature is up to this challenge, its work could provide an example of cross-fertilization to other legislatures which are faced with a similar systemic problem[28].

References

- St. D. Cărpenaru, Tratat de drept comercial roman, Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2016
- St. D. Cărpenaru et al., Legea societăților. Comentariu pe articole. Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2014
- C. Duțescu, Legea privind piața de capital. Comentarii pe articole, Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2009
- I.L. Georgescu, Drept comercial român, Bucharest: All Beck, 2002
- Cristian Gheorghe, Drept comercial român,, Bucharest: CH Beck, 2013
- Cristian Gheorghe, Dreptul pietei de capital, Bucharest: CH Beck, 2009
- C. Hamangiu, I.Rosetti-Bălănescu, Al. Băicoianu, Tratat de Drept Civil Român, Bucharest: All, 1996
- N.K. Kubasek et al., The legal environment of business, Prentice Hall, Upper Saddle River, New Jersey, 1996
- A.-D. Merville, Droit financier, Issy-les-Moulineaux: Gualino, 2015
- O. Manolache, Drept comunitar, Bucharest: All Beck, 2003
- T. Prescure, N. Călin, D. Călin, Legea pieței de capital, Comentarii și explicații, Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2008
- I. Tanoviceanu, Tratat de Drept și Procedură Penală, Tome V, Bucharest: Curierul Judiciar, 1927

[24] Grande Stevens v. Italia, para (123).
[25] Piersack v. Belgium, 1.10.1982, §§ 30-32, Series A no. 53 and De Cubber v. Belgium, 26 October 1984, §§ 24-30, Series A no. 86.
[26] Grande Stevens v. Italia, para (227), (228).
[27] Grande Stevens v. Italia, Case no. 18640/10, Partly concurring, partly dissenting opinion of judges Karakaş and Pinto de Albuquerque, para (32).
[28] Ibidem, para (33).

THEORETICAL AND PRACTICAL ISSUES REGARDING THE CHILD'S CARE

Dan LUPAȘCU[*]
Cristian MAREȘ[]

Abstract

Following the entry into force of Law No. 257/2013 for the amendment of Law No. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of the child's rights new provisions were adopted in relation with the child's protection whose parents work abroad. This regulation was necessary in view of the increasing number of parents who, due to the need to ensure a decent living for the dependent children, are forced to work outside of Romania, but for this reason they neglect to raise and to care for them. The study examines theoretical issues of the child's care that raise some debates in the doctrine. The research also consists in the analysis of the new regulation related to the child's care both from theoretical and practical perspectives. The authors intend to carry out an analysis of the relevant case law of the courts of law in the matter of child's care. From this perspective, there are some issues in relation to a child's dwelling when his parents do not live together anymore. As far as the change of the child's dwelling is concerned, we have to distinguish between the children entrusted to one of the parents according to the Family Code and the children for whom the parental authority has been ordered to be jointly exercised and to have their place of residence with one of their parents, according to the provisions of the Civil Code. With respect to the child's dwelling, both within the doctrine and the case law, it has emerged the notion of alternative or sharing dwelling of the child.

Keywords: child's care, child's protection, child's dwelling, custody authority, parental authority.

1. Introduction

This paper intends to clarify a few issues related to the child's care that raise some debates in the doctrine.

Two years after the entry into force of the Civil Code (Law no. 287/2009, republished)[1], it was adopted the Law no. 257/2013 on the amendment and addition of Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of the rights of the child, which governed for the first time within our legislation the child's protection whose parents are working abroad. After two more years from the entry into force of the Law no. 257/2013, it was adopted the Government Decision no. 691/2015 approving the Procedure of monitoring the way of raising and caring for the child with parents abroad and the services they can benefit from, as well as approving the Working Methodology on Collaboration between the general directions of social assistance and child protection and public social services and the standard model of documents developed by them. Therefore, a thorough analysis of these provisions regulating the child's protection whose parents work abroad is important not only for the authors of family law, but also for the legal practitioners.

Additionally, our intention is to examine some main theoretical issues of the child's care and the main authors' opinions of family law already expressed in doctrine.

This paper will provide an analysis of the relevant doctrine, of the main legal provisions and of the jurisprudence in order to outline some options to be considered both by the authors of family law and by the legal practitioners.

2. Content

2.1. The child's protection whose parents work abroad

As of the 3rd of October 2013, it was brought under regulation this new maintenance obligation cathegory, as a novelty, through the last amendments to the Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of the rights of the child, republished[2], with the following amendments and supplements[3].

As per article 104 paragraphs (1), (2) and (4) of Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of the rights of the child, the parent who solely exercises the parental authority or with whom the child is living, or the parents, who are about to go work abroad, have the obligation to notify this intention to the public social

[*] Professor PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: prof.danlupascu@gmail.com);
[] Lecturer PhD, Faculty of Law and Administrative Sciences, "Valahia" University, Târgoviște (e-mail: cristian.mares@mares.ro);

[1] Published in Official Gazette of Romania No. 505 of July 15, 2011 as further amended.

[2] Republished in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 159 of March 5, 2014 under article V of Law no. 257/2013 on the amendment and addition of Law no. 272/ 2004 on the protection and promotion of the rights of the child, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 607 of September 30, 2013, giving the text a new numbering.

[3] As amended and supplemented by Government Emergency Ordinance no. 65/2014 for amending and completing certain normative acts, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 760 of October 20, 2014 and Law no. 131/2014 for the amendment of paragraphs (1) and (2) of article 64 of the Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of the rights of the child, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 740 of October 10, 2014.

service from their domicile with at least 40 days before leaving the country, with the mandatory indication of the appointed individual who shall take care of the child during their absence.

According to this provision, the obligation to notify the intention of working abroad shall be beared by the following: either by (i) the parent who solely exercises the parental authority or with whom the child is living, or by (ii) both parents, should the parental authority is jointly exercised or by (iii) the tutor.

These individuals have the obligation to duly notify such intention with at least 40 days prior to leaving the country to the public social service in whose division they are domiciled.

Said notification must comprise all identification data of the individual who shall take care of the child during the parents' absence or of the tutor.

In order to be appointed for the temporary exercise of the parental authority with respect to a child, an individual must cumulatively fulfill the following conditions:

a) to be part of the extended family[4];
b) to be at least 18 years old;
c) to meet all material conditions and moral guarantees necessary for the raise and care of a child[5].

The public social services organised at the level of municipalities, cities, communes assure to the appointed individuals guidance and information with respect to the liability of the growth and development of the child on a period of time of 6 months[6].

The confirmation of the individual that shall take care of the child shall be made by the custody court[7].

The custody court shall rule the temporary delegation of the parental authority with respect to the child, during the parents' absence, but no longer than one year, to the appointed individual[8]. Therefore, said delegation shall regard only the personal aspect of the child's care, and not the parental authority exercice with respect to the child's assets. As far as the child's assets are concerned, as long as the law does not regulate anything, we consider that the custody court shall render, depending on the circumstances, either the joint exercise by both parents or the exercise by one of them, as in the other cases of parental authority delegation to a third person (as in the case of a divorce, the nullity of a marriage etc.).

The individual to whom the parental authority is to be delegated must express his/her personal consent in front of the custody court[9].

At this request shall be annexed documents attesting the fulfillment of the above-mentioned conditions with respect to the appointed individual[10].

The request of parental rights and duties delegation shall be settled in a non-contentious procedure, as per the Civil Procedure Code, in a 3 days term as of its registration to the custody court[11].

The rulling shall comprise the express mention of the rights and duties to be delegated and the period of time for which the delegation takes place, which, as we have already provided hereinabove, can not exceed one year[12].

Once the custody court decides to delegate the parental rights, the individual responsible for the childcare must follow a counseling program in order to prevent conflictual situations, misconduct, or negligence in the relationship with the child[13].

The court shall communicate a copy of the delegation ruling to the mayor from the parents' or guardian's domicile, as well as to the mayor from the domicile of the individual to whom the parental authority has been delegated[14].

As per article 106 of the Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of the rights of the child, republished, the local authorities through the public social security services can initiate, within the state or local budget provisions and within the revenue and expenditure budget having this destination, information campaigns for parents, in order to:

a) parenting awareness of the risks assumed by going to work abroad;
b) inform the parents with respect to their obligations in case they intend to leave abroad.

Two years after the entry into force of the Law no. 257/2013, the Government Decision no. 691/2015[15] approving the Procedure of monitoring the way of raising and caring for the child with parents abroad and the services they can benefit from, as well as approving the Working Methodology on collaboration between the general directions of social assistance and child protection and public social services and the standard model of documents developed by them[16] was adopted.

---

[4] According to article 4 letter c) of Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of the rights of the child, republished, extended family means "the relatives of the child up to the fourth degree inclusive".
[5] Article 105 paragraph (1) of the Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of children's rights, republished.
[6] Article 105 paragraph (2) of the Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of children's rights, republished.
[7] Art. 104 paragraph (3) of the Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of children's rights, republished.
[8] Article 105 paragraph (3) of the Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of children's rights, republished.
[9] Article 105 paragraph (4) of the Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of children's rights, republished
[10] Article 105 paragraph (5) of the Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of children's rights, republished.
[11] Article 105 paragraph (6) of the Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of children's rights, republished.
[12] Article 105 paragraph (7) of the Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of children's rights, republished.
[13] Article 105 paragraph (8) of the Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of children's rights, republished.
[14] Article 105 paragraph (9) of the Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of children's rights, republished.
[15] Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 663 of September 1, 2015.
[16] According to article 107 of Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of the rights of the child, republished, the procedure for monitoring the way of raising and caring for the child with parents who have left work abroad and the services to which they can benefit is

2.2. The child's dwelling

As per the provisions of article 496 paragraphs (1) and (2) of the Civil Code, the child lives with his parents, and when his parents are not living together, they shall mutually agree upon the child's dwelling.

Therefore, the rule in relation with the child's dwelling is that the child shall live with his parents and the exception shall be the situation when the parental authority is split, when the child's dwelling shall be established at one of the parents.

According to paragraph (3) of article 496 of the Civil Code, when the parents do not agree upon the establishment of the child's dwelling, the custody court shall decide, taking also into consideration the finding of the psychosocial inquiry report and listening of the parents and the child, in case the latter is 10 years old.

In the divorce matter we have the same regulation, according to which "in the absence of an agreement between the parents or if it is against the best interest of the child, the custody court shall establish, along with the divorce, the child's dwelling with the parent with whom the child usually resides"[17].

The Civil Code does not define the meaning of the phrase "with the parent with whom the child usually resides". We consider that this phrase should be understood as the situation where the child usually lives with one of his parents until the settlement of the divorce request. Such a situation may arise when the parents are living separately before the divorce is pronounced and the child lives with one of his parents.

In case the child has been living before the divorce with both parents, the court shall establish the child's dwelling at one of them, taking into account the best interest of the child[18].

In assessing the child's interest, the court may also consider aspects such as:[19]

a) the needs of physical, psychological developments, education and health, security and stability and family affiliation;
b) the child's opinion, depending on his/her age and maturity;
c) the child's history, taking into consideration, especially, the situations of abuse, neglect, exploitation or any other form of violence against the child, as well as the potential risk situations that may occur in the future;
d) the parents' capacity or the capacity of the persons that shall take care of the child to meet his concrete needs;
e) maintaining the personal relationships with the individuals with whom the child has developed attachment relationships;
f) the availability of each of the parents to involve the other parent in the decisions concerning the child and to respect the parental rights of the latter;
g) the availability of each of the parents to allow the other one to maintain the personal relationships;
h) the housing situation of each parent in the last 3 years;
i) the history of parental violence against the child or other individuals;
j) the distance between the domicile of each parent and the institution providing the child's education.

Although there is no express regulation on the criteria to be taken into consideration when establishing the child's home, it is equaly important to maintain the brothers together, by establishing their dwelling at the same parent. The separation of the children is possible in exceptional situations, provided they are in their best interest[20].

Article 400 paragraph (3) of the Civil Code stipulates that "exceptionally, and only if it is in the best interest of the child, the court can establish his dwelling at the grandparents or other relatives or individuals, with their consent, or at a care institution. They exercise the child's supervision and undertake all normal acts with respect to the health, education and teaching of the child".

As previously stated[21], within the case law of several European countries, the appreciation of the child's best interest in establishing his dwelling is also analysed from the point of view of the so-called "Californian Principle", according to which it represents an advantage the capacity of each parent to allow the other one to exercise his parental rights with respect to the child[22].

According to the provisions of article 400 of the Civil Code, the establishment of the child's dwelling must be made at one of the parents, according to his best interest, the law does not foresee whether it is necessary to establish the exact address at which the child will live with the parent. Therefore, it has been considered[23] that, in the silence of law, it is not mandatory to mention the address of the parent with established by a Government decision, at the proposal of the Ministry of Labor, Family, Social Protection and the Elderly, in collaboration with the Ministry of Regional Development and Public Administration.

[17] Article 400 paragraph (1) of Civil Code.

[18] Article 400 paragraph (2) of Civil Code. See Court of Appeal of Bucharest, 3rd Civil Section, decision no. 112 of February 1, 2011, in C. Mareș, Family Law, Second Edition, C.H. Beck Publising House, Bucharest, page 217-218.

[19] Article 21 paragraph (1) and article 2 paragraph (6) of Law No. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of the child's rights, republished.

[20] See Court of Appeal of Timișoara, 1st Civil Section, decision no. 831/2013, in Săptămâna Juridică 8 (2014), page 23; Court of Appeal of Craiova, Section for children and family, decision no. 9 of January 24, 2007, www.portal.just.ro; Neamț Tribunal, Civil Section, decision no. 345/AC/2008, www.portal.just.ro.

[21] Dan Lupașcu and Cristiana Mihaela Crăciunescu, Family Law, Third Edition, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, page 363.

[22] In the French Civil Code this principle was introduced in Art. 373 2 11 (3), which states that the judge shall consider: "The ability of each of the parents to assume their obligations and to observe the rights of the other".

[23] See the Conference of the National Institute of Magistracy of February 20, 2012, entitled Provisions of the New Civil Code in the Field of Family Law - Unification of Practice, page 15 (http://www.inm-lex.ro/fisiere/pag_115/ det_1506/8453.pdf).

whom the child shall live, given the possibility of changing it even repeatedly[24]. Nevertheless, changing the child's dwelling must be made with the consent of the other parent, should it affect the parental authority exercise or other parental rights, in case of misunderstandings the custody court having the competence to decide. In this case, however, it has been considered that the court must specify where the new home of the child shall be established, at least in terms of the elements affecting the parental rights exercise, such as the country or locality.

At the same time, it has been shown that the child's dwelling can be also be established abroad, together with one of the parents, if this shall meet the best interest of the child. Whenever possible, it can be decided for a psychosocial inquiry report to be done, in order to know the conditions offered by the parent to whom the child will live.

The change of the circumstances envisaged in the judgment may entail the change of the measure establishing the child's dwelling, which can be settled at the other parent or at other individuals or care institutions if the case may be.

Changing the decision on the child's dwelling can only take place if his interest so requires, that is, only when the parent where the home was established can no longer provide him the necessary conditions for a proper development[25].

As far as the change of the child's dwelling is concerned, we have to distinguish between the children entrusted to one of the parents according to the Family Code[26] and the children for whom the parental authority has been ordered to be jointly exercised and to have their place of residence with one of their parents, according to the provisions of the Civil Code.

Thus, with respect to the child entrusted to one of the parents according to the Family Code, since the Civil Code provisions regulate the parental authority institution, without the institution of entrusting a child to one of the parents, it can be at any times requested changing the measure of his custody and, therefore, changing his dwelling from the parent to whom he was entrusted, even if the circumstances taken into consideration by the court at his entrustment have not changed.

As regards a child for whom the custody court has ruled, under the provisions of the Civil Code, that the parental authority shall be exercised jointly by both parents[27] or, by way of exception, only by one of them[28], being thus established the dwelling at one of the parents, changing said dwelling can only be requested in case the circumstances envisaged by the custody court have changed at the time when the change of the child's dwelling is requested.

Therefore, according to the new regulations, disregard the parent with whom the child's dwelling shall be established, the latter shall benefit from the care of both parents who, in the form of joint parental authority exercise, shall collaborate in taking all important decisions with respect to the child, being actively involved in raising and educating him.

The Family Code provided the possibilty of entrusting the child for his raise and education to one of the parents, which implies that the parent ensures the raising and education of the child, the other parent having the possibility to look after the manner in which these obligations are fullfiled. Therefore, the child lived with the parent to whom he was entrusted for his raise and education, whithout the court expressily rulling it.

In the application of the previous legislation, when the child was entrusted to be raised and educated by one of the parents, the supreme court has ruled that: "the choice of children to be entrusted to one of the parents does not have a preponderant role in adopting the solution, but can not be disregarded when they are at the age when they can properly appreciate their interest, but must be duly analysed and considered in relation to the other administered evidence"[29]. In this regard, we consider that the children's option regarding the establishment of their dwelling, in relation to their age and degree of maturity could also be envisaged in the current legislation (under article 264 of the Civil Code).

As per the provisions of article 496 paragraph (4) of the Civil Code, the "child's dwelling, established in accordance with this article, cannot be change without the approval of the parents, except in cases expressly provided by the law".

Moreover, article 497 paragraph (2) of the Civil Code stipulates that changing the child's dwelling, together with the parent with whom he lives, cannot occur without the prior consent of the other parent, in case it affects the exercise of the parental authority or other parental rights.

In case of misunderstandings between the parents, the custody court shall decide, according to the best interest of the child, taking into account the [24] See also C. Mareș, op. cit., page 219; B.D. Moloman, L.-C. Ureche, The new Civil Code. 2nd Book. About family. Articles 258-534. Commentaries, explanations and jurisprudence, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, page 465.

---

[25] See Supreme Court of Justice, Civil Section, decision no. 2448/1993, Buletinul Jurisprudenței. Culegere de decizii pe anul 1993, Continent XXI & Universul Publishing House, Bucharest, 1994, page 109-112; Court of Appeal of Alba Iulia, Section for children and family, decision no. 64/R/2008 and no. 35/R/2008, http://www.jurisprudenta.org/; Court of Appeal of Cluj, Civil Section, of labour and social securities, for children and family, decision nro 237/R of January 25, 2008 and no. 1855/R of October 3, 2008, http://www.jurisprudenta.org/.

[26] Law no. 4/1953 entered into force on the 1st of February 1954, published in Official Gazette no. 1 of January 4, 1954, as further amended and supplemented.

[27] Article 397 and article 503 paragraph (1) of Civil Code.

[28] Article 398 and article 507 of Civil Code.

[29] See Supreme Court of Justice, Civil Section, decision no. 1848/1991, in Probleme de drept din deciziile Curții Supreme de Justiție 1990-1992, Orizonturi Publishing House, Bucharest, 1993, page 217-219; see also Court of Appeal of Iași, Section for children and family, decision no. 140/R of October 23, 2008, www.portal.just.ro.

conclusions of the psychosocial inquiry report and listening to the parents and to the child[30].

With respect to the child's dwelling, both within the doctrine and the case law, it has emerged the notion of alternative or sharing dwelling of the child.

Together with other authors[31], we consider that the legislator did not regulate the possibility of interchanging the child's dwelling from one parent to the other. Notwithstanding, should the parents agree with interchanging the child's dwelling from one to another and should this be considered in the best interest of the child, the court may rule in this respect based on the parents' mutual agreement and not based on a legal provision that would regulate this. On the contrary, in case the parents do not agree with interchanging the child's dwelling from one to another or in case this measure would not be in the best interest of the child, the court can not establish an alternative dwelling of a child at both parents.

According to another opinion[32], there is accepted the possibility of interchanging the child's dwelling from one parent to the other in case this is in the child's best interest and the parental authority is to be exercised by both parents.

We consider that, as per the provisions of article 400 of the Civil Code, it is not possible to establish an alternative dwelling of a child at both parents, the legislator stipulating under the paragraph (1) that, in case of misunderstanding between the parents or if such understanding shall be against the best interest of the child, the custody court shall determine, along with the divorce, the dwelling of the child at the parent with whom he usually lives and, under paragraph (2), that, if prior to the divorce the child lived with both parents, the court shall establish his dwelling at one of them, as per his best interest, excluding the possibility of establishing the alternating dwelling of the child.

At the same time, within the case law[33] it was noted that the principle 3.20 paragraph (2) from the Principles of the European Law on Parental Authority, adopted by the European Commision on the family legislation stipulates that " the child may alternatively reside with the holders of the parental authority, either as a result of an agreement approved by the competent authority or of a decision taken by the latter", but this recommendation is not mandatory, by means of a recommendation the institutions disclose their opinion and suggest ways of action, without imposing any legal obligation to the recipients of the recommendation, and the provisions of article 400 Civil Code, under their current form, do not allow the settlement of an alternating dwelling in case of divorce.

2.3. The competent court to settle the request for establishing the child's dwelling

As per article 107 paragraph (1) of the Civil Code, the proceedings undertaken by the Civil Code with respect to the protection of the individuals fall within the competence of the custody and family court, established according to the law. Moreover, according to article 94 point 1 letter a) of the Civil Procedure Code[34], the courts shall rule in trial court the claims provided by the Civil Code under the competence of the custody and family court, unless otherwise expressly provided by law.

Thus, the custody court has the jurisdiction to rule with respect to the relationships between the parents and their children during marriage and also in case of divorce of after their divorce. Futhermore, the court's jurisdiction shall exist with respect to the relationships between the parents and their children outside of marriage.

From the territorial point of view, according to article 114 paragraph (1) from the Civil Procedure Code, the requests for the individuals' protection, provided by the Civil Code under the jurisdiction of the custody and family court, shall be ruled by the court in whose territorial jurisdiction the protected individual is domiciled or resided, unless otherwise provided by law.

According to article 76 of the Law no. 76/2012 for the implementation of Law no. 134/2010 regarding the Civil Procedure Code[35], "until the organization of the custody and family courts, the courts or, as the case may be, the tribunals or specialized tribunals for children and family shall act as custody and family courts, having the jurisdiction as provided by the Civil Code, the Civil Procedure Code, the present law, as well as special regulations in force".

Therefore, as stated within the practice of the courts[36], in accordance with the legal provisions, the jurisdiction for ruling a case having as object the change of the child's dwelling lies with the court in whose territorial jurisdiction the domicile or residence of the protected individual is located, the exclusive competence regulated by the provisions of article 114 paragraph (1) of the Civil Procedure Code having the character of public order competence in relation to the provisions of article 129 paragraph (1) point 3 of the Civil Procedure Code.

2.4. The summons of the custody authority in the lawsuits with children

According to article 396 paragraph (1) and (2) of the Civil Code, the custody court shall rule, along with the divorce, with respect to the relationship between the divorced parents and their children, taking into account

[30] Article 497 paragraph (2) Civil Code.

[31] E. Florian, Family law. Marriage. Matrimonial regimes. Filiation, 5th Edition, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, page 350; M. Avram, Civil law. Family, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013, page 161.

[32] C. C. Hageanu, Family law and the civil status acts, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, page 205.

[33] Bucharest Tribunal, 5th Civil Section, civil decision no. 1282A of March 30, 2016, not published.

[34] Law no. 134/2010, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 247 of April 10, 2015, as amended and supplemented.

[35] Published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 365 of May 30, 2012, as subsequently amended and supplemented..

[36] High Court of Cassation and Justice, 1st Civil Section, decision no. 1007 of June 13, 2017, in Săptămâna Juridică 41 (2017), page 8-9.

the best interest of the children, the conclusions of the psychosocial inquiry report and, if case, of the parents' consent, whom the court shall listen to, but also of the child's opinion, also heard by the court (the provisions of article 264 of the Civil Code being applicable).

We consider that, within such cases with children, involving the parental authority exercise, establishing the child's dwelling, which falls under the jurisdiction of the custody and family court, it is necessary to summon the custody authority, which must draw up a psychosocial inquiry report, duly taken into consideration by the custody and family court when ruling within said case, corroborating it also with the rest of the evidence administered.

As previously stated[37], according to the provisions of the Civil Code, which regulates the necessity of a psychosocial investigation in cases concerning the dissolution or nullity of marriage, as well as those concerning the exercise of parental authority over children resulting from a concubinage relationship when the parents do not live together, the hearing of the custody authority and, as a consequence, its summons is necessary. Given that the pshychosocial investigation is mandatory in such cases, the custody authority must be summoned by the court in order to draft the psychosocial inquiry report.

According to another opinion[38], based on the provisions of article 396, the custody authority must not be summoned by the court, given that there is no express legal procedural provision in this respect. We consider that without the summons of the custody authority, the psychosocial inquiry report could not be drafted. Therefore, the summons of the custody authority is mandatory in order to inform this authority that a psychosocial inquiry report must be drafted, although a representative of such authority is not necessary to be present in front of the court.

3. Conclusions

In conclusion, the legal provisions on child's care whose parents go to work abroad regulate a social reality with a significant impact on raising and caring for children whose parents are forced to go abroad. This regulation was necessary in view of the increasing number of parents who, due to the need to ensure a decent living for the dependent children, are forced to work outside of Romania, but for this reason they neglect to raise and to care for them. Besides material means of subsistence, a child needs permanent care, which can not be ensured remotely by the parents.

With respect to the child's home, the custody court is obliged to decide where said dwelling shall be established, besides the way of exercise of the parental authority by the parents of a child.

The competent court to settle an application for a child's dwelling is the custody and family court in whose territorial jurisdiction the domicile or residence of the protected individual is located, unless otherwise provided by law.

As regards the evidence to be administrated in a case having as object the child's care, the exercise of parental authority, the establishment of the child's home, we consider necessary to summon the custody authority, given the fact that the court must take into account the conclusions of the psychosocial inquiry report, together with the best interest of the child and, as the case may be, the consent of the parents and the child's hearing.

References

- Marieta Avram, Civil law. Family, (Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2013, 2016)
- Emese Florian, Family law. Marriage. Matrimonial regimes. Filiation, Fifth Edition, (Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2016)
- Cristina Codruța Hageanu, Family law and the civil status acts (Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2017)
- Dan Lupașcu and Cristiana Mihaela Crăciunescu, Family Law, Third Edition, (Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2017)
- Cristian Mareș, Family Law, Second Edition, (Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2015)
- Bogdan Dumitru Moloman and Lazăr-Ciprian Ureche, The new Civil Code. 2nd Book. About family. Articles 258-534. Commentaries, explanations and jurisprudence, (Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2016)
- Bogdan Dumitru Moloman and Lazăr-Ciprian Ureche, Ancheta psihosocială a autorității tutelare – personaj special în distribuția cauzelor aflate pe rolul instanței de tutelă. Act adminsitrativ sau simplu mijloc de probă?, in Revista Română de Jurisprudență 3 (2013)

[37] B.D. Moloman, L.-C. Ureche, op. cit., page 420; B.D. Moloman, L.-C. Ureche, Ancheta psihosocială a autorității tutelare – personaj special în distribuția cauzelor aflate pe rolul instanței de tutelă. Act adminsitrativ sau simplu mijloc de probă?, in Revista Română de Jurisprudență 3 (2013), page 151.

[38] M. Avram, Civil law. Family, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, page 158.

REINSURANCE FORM THE PERSPECTIVE OF PROPERTY INSURANCE CONTRACT

Dănilă Ștefan MATEI[*]

Abstract

The most significant means by which insurance markets operate to spread risks beyond like risk pools is reinsurance.

The reinsurance operation has the advantage that the original insured can increase his financial capacity in order to cover the risks that he cannot bear alone. The risks are therefore spread and the danger of insolvency or of decreasing the financial capacities either disappears or is reduced.

The reinsurance involves a new insurance, carried out by a new policy, for the same original insured risk, for the purpose of compensating the insured persons for the previously concluded insurances. Both contracts exist at the same time.

By reinsurance the reinsurer receives reinsurance premiums, in return for which it contributes, according to the obligations assumed, to bearing the indemnities that the reinsured pays on the occurrence of the risk subject to reinsurance; the reinsured cedes reinsurance premiums, in return for which the reinsurer contributes, according to the obligations assumed, to bearing the indemnities that the reinsured pays on the occurrence of the risk subject to reinsurance.

The reinsurance does not terminate the insurer's obligations and does not establish any legal relationship between the insured and the reinsurer.

This paper offers an introduction to key features of reinsurance, and some of the sources of complexity in the legal issues that arise

Keywords: reinsurance, property, risk, aggregate, insurance, retrocession, treaty, proportional, facultative.

1. The concept of reinsurance

The practice of reinsurance is as old as insurance insurance itself.

Under the English law, the earliest definition of insurance belongs to Lord Mansfield[1] and is found in Delver v Barnes, a case law in which the Court of King's Bench[2] was asked to decide whether the defendant, an insurance broker, entered into a reinsurance contract.

On that occasion, Lord Mansfield indicated the fact that the reinsurance is a new insurance, effected by a new policy on the same initial insured risk, for the purpose of indemnifying the insured persons for the previously concluded insurances; both policies exist at the same time [3].

Other more modern definitions have described the reinsurance operation as follows: a contract whereby an insurer brings a third person to insure him against loss of liability due to an original insurance[4]; the reinsurance is the contractual liability insurance which involves the payment of claims arising under direct insurance or reinsurance contracts[5]; reinsurance includes those contractual arrangements through which an insurance company transfers to another company all the risks or only a part of the risk that it underwrites to that insurer[6].

In the national doctrine, reinsurance is defined as the contract by which the reinsurer, in proportion to the premiums received and the risks taken over from the reinsured, bears part of the insurance indemnity owed by the reinsured in case of occurrence of the sinister[7].

Art. 2240 para. 1 of the Civil Code of 2009 provides that the reinsurance is the operation of insurance of an insurer, as insured, by another insurer, as reinsurer.

Art. 2240 para. 2 of the Civil Code of 2009 provides that by reinsurance, the insurer receives reinsurance premiums, in return for which he

[*] PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: mstdanila@yahoo.com)

[1] According to Wikipedia: William Murray, 1st Earl of Mansfield, (2 March 1705 – 20 March 1793) was a British barrister, politician and judge noted for his reform of English law.

[2] The Court of King's Bench (or "Court of Queen's Bench", during the reign of a female monarch), formally known as The Court of the King Before the King Himself, was an English court of common law in the English legal system. Created in the late 12th to early 13th century from the curia regis, initially following the monarch on his travels, the King's Bench finally joined the Court of Common Pleas and Exchequer of Pleas in Westminster Hall in 1318, making its last travels in 1421.

[3] "This contract, although it much resembles yet does not fully amount to a reassurance, which consists to a new assurance effected by a new policy on the same risk which was before insured in order to indemnify the underwriters from their previous subscriptions: and both polices are to be in existence at the same time."

[4] Graydon S. Staring, "Law of Reinsurance" (New York:Clark Boardman Callaghan, 1993), p 1-2

[5] Robert Carter Leslie Lucas & Nigel Rlph, "Reinsurance 4 th Ed". (Great Britain: Reactions Publishing Group, 2000), p 5

[6] Aviva Abramovsky, "Reinsurance: The Silent Regulator?" (2008-9) 15 Conn. Ins. L.J. 345: Reinsurance agreements "likely lead to the institutionalization of systems beyond and not necessarily congruent with many of the expectations and avowed puposes of some regulatory activities"

[7] I. Sferdian, "Dreptul asigurărilor", Editura C.H. Beck, București, 2007, p. 26 contributes, according to the obligations taken, to bearing the indemnities that the reinsurer pays when bringing the risk that was the subject of reinsurance. The reinsured cedes reinsurance premiums, in exchange for which the reinsurer contributes, according to the obligations assumed, to bearing the indemnities that the reinsured pays on the occurrence of the event that was the subject of reinsurance." "Reinsurance does not understand the obligations of the insurer and does not establish any legal relationship between the insured and the reinsurer" (Art. 2240 paragraph 3 of the Civil Code of 2009).

Therefore, the insurance relationship takes place between the direct or initial insurer, which is a ceding company, and the reinsurer. There is no relationship between the original insured and the reinsurer. Thus, the loss suffered by a ceding company is spread to multiple companies, and so being more movable.

In fact, reinsurance is the insurance of the insurers, which is the most commonly used definition in the subject-matter.

The reinsured is the insurer of the original contract (the direct insurer or the ceding company that accepts the risk from his insured), but that cedes part of the risk to the insurer of another insurance or reinsurance company.

The two parties of the reinsurance contract are: the reinsured (or direct insured) and the reinsurer, who accepts the reinsurance from a direct insurer.

2. Purpose and reinsurance functions

To protect the direct insurer against the damages caused by the same event is the main role of the reinsurance

In the doctrine[8], other reinsurance objectives have also been identified, such as:

"Reinsurance permits the insurer to give cover which, because of the magnitude of the possible liability involved, could, might otherwise, be uninsurable by a single insurer without significant threat to both balance and solvency.

Reinsurance enables an insurer to maintain a certain stability in results from year to year and to operate without fear of unanticipated conincidence of expensive claims, which may arbitrarily and against the odds fall upon one office.

Last but not least, by operating across national boundaries, reinsurance may help to distribute amongst nations the domestic impact of large-scale and unexpected events, such as natural disasters, explosions and alike"

By reinsurance, different insurers are protected against the losses caused by the occurrence of high risks, which would jeopardize their very solvency.

By spreading larger losses over a longer period of time, a procedure analyzed by the conclusion of contracts for protection against catastrophic events, a certain degree of stability of the rate of possible damages can be ensured.

The French doctrine[9] also indicates the fact that reinsurance helps increasing the financial capacity of the insurer, giving him the possibility to receive more risks. In this way, the spread of the contract occurs, i.e., its splitting up to several insurers.

At the same time, the reinsurance increases the insurer's flexibility, as well as its ability to underwrite more risks. Therefore, by ceding all the risks, a ceding company may withdraw itself from a business category or geographical area, for a certain period of time[10].

The reinsurance can also cover risks faced by the reinsured which do not arise under insurance contracts but under, for example, bonds.

Catastrophe bonds[11] are bond issued to the capital market by a body established for purpose (a Special Puspose Entity- SPE) whos affairs are managed by a trustee

In recent years, concerns over capacity, the impact of catastrophic losses, and the short term nature of most reinsurance contracts have led to the adoption of other mechanisms. New form of reinsurance contracts have been developed. The earliest class was "financial reinsurance", which in some of its forms is closer to a banking transaction than a reinsurance arrangement and amounts to little more than a loan of premium and its return of investment income exceeded losses[12].

3. The insurance and the reinsurance contract. Similarities and differences.

Despite some noticeable differences over time in the definition of the reinsurance operation by the doctrine, the elements of the reinsurance operation remain the same.

First of all, reinsurance is a contract distinct from the original insurance contract.

The reinsurance contract, as a separate agreement, will also take the form of an insurance contract.

The purpose of the reinsurance contract is not necessarily to cover the entire initial obligation. However, coverage by reinsurance may not be larger than the original, initial one.

---

[8] John S. Butler, "Reinsurance law", looseleaf (London: Thomson Reuters Ltd., 2009), p. 10003

[9] H. Louberege, "Economie et finance de l assurance et de la reassurance", Paris, Dalloz, 1981, p.188 et seq.

[10] L. Văcărel, Fl. Bercea, "Asigurări şi reasigurări", Editura Expert, Bucureşti, 2007, p. 455

[11] Discuseed in the presentation by David Greenwald to the Reinsurance Working Party of the International Association of Insurnace Law (AIDA) in Lisbon in May 2011, available at http://www.aida.org.uk/workpart_reinsurance_nextmeeting.asp.

[12] Rob Merkin, Jenny Steele, "Insurance and the law of obligations", Oxford University Press, 2013, p156

The reinsurance contract must cover the same risks as the original contract.

The initial insurance and the reinsurance contract must coexist[13].

Many of the principles and practices that apply to insurance generally also apply to reinsurance.

The rules that apply to the interpretation and application of the insurance contracts also apply to the reinsurance contracts.

However, from some perspectives, reinsurance contracts differ from the insurance ones.

First of all, an insurer contracts with individuals, corporations or organizations whose businesses are not generally that of insurance, while the reinsurance contracts are concluded between at least two insurance companies, the contracting parties being always legal persons[14], without involving the insured in the relation between them.

The reinsurance contract does not represent a transfer of the rights and liabilities already existing under the direct insurance contract of all or some of these rights/liabilities.

As distinct from the insurance contract, within the reinsurance contract, the insurer is involved in covering the claims only if there is a payment obligation, as specified in the contract.

Another aspect is that the insurer is indirectly interested in the losses suffered by the original insured person. He covers, in part, only the amounts paid by his insured.

Thus, in reinsurance practice, most of the contracts provide partial compensation, a fraction of these losses being borne by the insured himself.

Another difference is that, while not all insurance contracts are subject to the principle of compensation or indemnity (except for life, accident and sickness insurance policies), the reinsurance contracts are indemnity contracts, the former being limited to payments made by the reinsured, under the conditions it has underwritten.

Also, the insurance contract takes the form of a policy, while, depending on the type of reinsurance, the reinsurance contract takes different forms and very rarely the reinsurance appears in the form of a reinsurance policy (for example, facultative fire reinsurance).

Another distinction refers to the fact that, while direct insurance are, mainly, of an internal kind, with the exception of maritime and aviation insurance, reinsurance is, by its nature, an activity of international kind.

The insurance contract is an insurance contract for the situation of damages occurrence, unlike the reinsurance contract that isn't always of compensation, indemnity nature, it can cover risks faced by the reinsured which do not arise under insurance contracts but under bonds.

As the liability belongs to the insurer under the insurance contract, the reinsurance is a liability of civil, contractual nature and not of conflictual nature.

For the insured, the liability has no direct effect because it is not a third-party liability insurance. Therefore, between the initial insured and the reinsurer, the conclusion of the reinsurance contract does not generate legal relations. However, because the insurer is secured by the reinsurance contract in respect of its obligation towards the insured, this guarantee mechanism indirectly benefits the insured.

To the reinsurance contract, the capacity of third party is held by the insured, the person who is responsible for the damage, but also the beneficiary of the initial insurance.

4. Retroceding or retrocession.

The reinsurer, in his turn, in order to keep his covering capacity, proceeds to the conclusion of other ceding contracts of a part of the reinsurance accepted by him.

This operation is called retroceding or retrocession. The parties of this contract are the retrocedent (the ceding company) and the retrocessionaire (the reinsurer).

In Romanian law, within art. 2241 of the Civil Code of 2009 it is indicated that "by the retrocession operation, the reinsurer may, in its turn, cede a part of the accepted risk."

5. Reinsurance characteristics

Reinsurance may be unilateral or reciprocal.

Reinsurance is unilateral in the event that one of the contracting parties takes over a part of the risks assumed by the other party under the reinsurance contract.

When by the same contract or by different contracts, each party cedes or takes over a part of the risks assumed under insurance and reinsurance contracts, the reinsurance is reciprocal[15].

The reinsurance contract has the following characteristics: it is a consensual, synallagmatic, onerous, random, with successive execution and pre-formulated standard contract. As the parties of the reinsurance contract are from different countries, a peculiarity of this contract is the element of extraneity[16].

[13] John S. Butler, op. cit., p. 10138

[14] See Fr. Deak, "Tratat de drept civil. Contracte speciale", Editura Universul Juridic, București, 2007, p 471 et seq.

[15] Fr. Deak, Tratat de drept civil. Contracte speciale, Ediția a III a, actualizată și comentată, Editura Universul juridic, București, 2001, p.472

[16] I. Sferdian. op. cit., 2013, p.22

The reinsurance contract exists concurrently with the insurance contract, it is conditional on it, but it also has a distinct character[17].

Since reinsurance contracts are concluded at international level, the principles of good faith/fair presentation of the risk have a very important role.

The reinsured is under the duty to disclose material facts to the reinsurers before the contract is concluded.

Two of such jurisprudence examples are revealed in doctrine[18]: In Wise Underwriting Agency Ltd v Grupo Nacional Provincial SA, the original insurance policy was in Spanish and when the reinsurance risk was presented, the Spanish word ”watc” was translated as ”clock” into English. The Rolex watches were to be carried from Miami to Cancun. The loss occurred when a quantity of goods was stolen from a container parked outside the assured s warehouse premises in Cancun. The reinsurers rejected the claim on the score of material misrepresentation of the subject matter insured, which was accepted by the court. The presentation of the subject matter insured as clock was a material fact, given that watches and in particular brands such Rolex are regarded by underwriters as attractive targets for thieves, being portable, high value and easily disposable. The reinsurers nevertheless had to pay to the reinsured in this case as they were held to have breach the duty of good faith/.

In Aneco Reinsurnace Underwriting LTD (In Liquidation) v Johnson & Higgings Ltd, the reinsurnace agreement was in the facultative obligatory form. When obtaining the retrocession cover for the reinsurance contract, the broker did not disclose the true nature of the reinsurnace. This was a material fact in a retrocession contrcat which was in the excess of loss form.”

Most often, reinsurance contracts are concluded in written form.

The terms of the reinsurance contract refer to the following elements: the name of the parties of the reinsurance contract, their office and exact address, the type of the contract, the risks covered, the extent of the liability as value and per territory, omissions and errors, the date of entry into force of the contract, the duration of the contract, the cases of force majeure, the level and the payment method of the insurance premium and premium reserves, the damages due to interruption, the retention of the ceding company, the fee, the brokerage, the accounting reconciliation, the reserve fund, the payment method of compensations, the excluded risks, the settlement of disputes between the parties of the contract[19].

If disputes arise between the parties of the reinsurance contract, they may be settled amicably (agreement, conciliation or arbitration), and if this is not possible, there shall be used the litigation procedure in court.

6. Reinsurance methods

6.1. Preliminary specifications.

An insurer may transfer the risk to another insurer proportionally or non-proportionally.

Proportionally and non-proportionally reinsurance contracts may be in form of facultative, obligatory or facultative obligatory.

Mainly, two basic methods are used in international reinsurance operations: the facultative method and the obligatory or contractual method (treaty reinsurance).

The facultative-obligatory method is also identified in the doctrine, a method also called the insurance pool method.

Reinsurance involes international transactions. For instance, a Romanian insurer may insure a local risk and reinsure the risk in London. It may be the case that the insurer insures 100% of the risk and then transfers the whole risk to the reinsurers in London. This arrangement is named as ”fronting”, as the insurer is acting as a front for the reinsurers.

6.2. Forms of reinsurance

Reinsurance may take two forms[20]: (i) proportional reinsurance and (ii) non-proportional reinsurance.

Proportional reinsurance

In the case of proportional reinsurance, the liability of the contracting parties is determined in proportion to the insured amount.

It is the first form of reinsurance, but which continues to be used, due to the low volume of work carried out for its management, while being simple and convenient.

In their turn, proportional reinsurance contracts have two versions, namely: the “quota share-treaty” and the “surplus treaty”.

The “quota-share” reinsurance consists in the fact that, of the maximum limit of the insured amount provided by the contract, the participation of the reinsured is established at a fixed percentage share, and the reinsurer takes over a part of this amount, also as a fixed percentage share.

It is mentionable the fact that the reinsurer will be able to take over a fixed share of all liabilities assumed by the insured, under an obligatory reinsurance contract.

This fixed share refers both to the amount of the premiums received and to the amount of the claims registered by the reinsured.

---

[17] I. Dogaru (coord), ”Drept civil. Contracte speciale”, Editura all Beck, p.896

[18] Ozlem Gurses, ”Marine Insurance Law”, sec edition, Routledge Taylor & Francis Group, 2017, p. 328

[19] I. Sferdian, op.cit.,2007, p.27

[20] I. Sferdian, ”Asigurări, Privire specială asupra contractului de asigurare din perspectiva Codului civil”, Editura C.h. Beck, București, 2013, p. 24

The reinsured and the reinsurer may participate with fixed shares of the insured amount for the risks that they expressly accept, in case of facultative reinsurance.

The main disadvantage of the quota-share insurance is that, even if the reinsured could bear all the risks on his own, he has the obligation to cede them all.

"Surplus" reinsurance is the most common form of reinsurance.

Thereby, the reinsurer takes over a part of the risk, for a certain limit of the insured amount for which the reinsured is liable for. The part taken over is called "retention" or 'line".

The reinsurer will pay the premiums and will bear the losses in proportion to the surplus of the insured amount.

It should also be specified the fact that there can be subject to reinsurance only those contracts where the insured sums exceed the level of "retention"

"Surplus" reinsurance is in the detriment of the insurers who have to take over high values risks, therefore less profitable.

Also, both for the reinsurers and the ceding company, the management of the contract is complex and the expenses are higher.

Non-proportional reinsurance

Unlike proportional reinsurance, the non-proportional reinsurance shares results[21].

According to this form of reinsurance, the reinsurer is bound to cover only some damages that exceed a certain value limit established by the reinsured.

In non-proportional reinsurance, the premium is much lower, not proportionate to the commitments taken over by the parties of the contract.

This fact means that the probability of occurrence of large claims (which are borne by the reinsurer) is much lower than the probability of occurrence of small claims, which are totally borne by the reinsured.

There are two forms of non-proportional reinsurance contracts: "excess of loss" reinsurance contracts, and "loss ratio" or "stop loss" reinsurance contracts.

In case of "excess of loss" reinsurance, the liability of the insured is limited to a certain ceiling for each individual loss, but the reinsurers are liable only for the part of the loss that exceeds this ceiling.

As it avoids the negative consequences of the plurality of risks, this form of reinsurance is frequently used in international practice.

6.3. Methods of reinsurance

The facultative method. The facultative method is the oldest form of reinsurance to be used[22].

This method allows the companies to reinsure themselves for a specific risk, a specific contract or a group of contracts.

If facultative reinsurance is proportional, the contract transfers a single risk to the reinsurer. For instance, if the mobile offshore drilling unit is worth £ 1 m and if the policy is valued, upon total loss of the subject matter insured the insurer indemnifies the assured for £ 1 m. Assuming that the reinsurer took over 50% of the risk insured, the reinsured may then claim half of the loss form the reinsurer[23].

Facultative insurance is the reinsurance of an individual risk or an individual contract, where the reinsurer has the right or the faculty to accept or reject the risk[24].

Therefore, in the case of the facultative method, the reinsurer does not have the obligation to conclude the contract under the conditions proposed by the reinsured. The ceding insurer and the reinsurer agree to the terms and conditions of each individual contract.

Consequently, a reinsurer has the opportunity to exercise its own underwriting and analysis in relation to each individual risk offered for reinsurance.

The method is facultative for both the reinsured and the reinsurer.

The former is free to select the risk categories, and the latter may accept them or not.

Facultative reinsurance contracts have the greatest effect on the cost of covering some unusual or low incidence risks[25]. Thus, although the administrative costs of facultative reinsurance are high, this type of reinsurance is indicated in some cases, such as low incidence risks or high loss risk, situations when the risk is considered inappropriate for a treaty reinsurance[26].

Contractual (obligatory) method or treaty reinsurance.

If the risk transferred is not a single risk but the insurance and the reinsurance cover a large number of risks, reinsurance appears in the form of a treaty.

Treaty reinsurance is that form of the reinsurance contract involving the conclusion of a reinsurance agreement with a foreign insurer, regarding the reinsurance of multiple insurance contracts, including even contracts that have not yet been underwritten by the insurer.

This form of reinsurance may be regarded as a master agreement form, a continuous relationship between the cedent and the reinsurer covering the portions or (insurance) classes of business of the original insurer for a long period of time[27], a framework facility under which risks falling within its scope may be ceded to the reinsurers.

---

[21] I. Sferdian, op.cit., 2013, p 26
[22] John S. Butler, op. cit., p. 10017
[23] Ozlem Gurses, "Marine Insurance Law", sec. edition, Routledge Taylor & Francis Group, 2017, p. 326
[24] Richard C. Manson & James E. Pfeifer II, "A Closer Look at Facultative Reinsurance", 31 Tort & Ins. L.J. 641 1995-1996, p. 641
[25] Robert Carter, Leslie Lucas & Nigel Ralph, op. cit, p. 88.
[26] Aviva Abramovsky, op. cit., p. 358; Robert Carter, Leslie Lucas & Nigel Ralph, op.cit., p. 90
[27] John S. Butler, op. cit., p. 10031

Treaty reinsurance allows an insurer to reinsure its risks on a collective basis.

A treaty may cover specific accounts (for example marine or motor), specific forms of loss (for example earthquakes), or even the insurer s whole account[28].

Treaty may be proportional or non-proportional.

In a proportional treaty the reinsured cedes to the reinsurers an agreed proportion of all risks accepted. Surplus or quota share treaties are proportional types of treaty.

The most common type of non-proportional treaty is an excess of loss treaty which the reinsurers become liable when reinsured s aggregate losses reach a stated sum.

If the treaty is facultative, the reinsured has discretion to cede a risk and the reinsured has to accept, those risks cover by the treaty.

Therefore, the reinsurer has to accept all the risks (globally) that the reinsured wants to cede.

Thus, neither the ceding company nor the reinsurer can cancel only certain risks (groups of risks) that they can cover.

Moreover, reinsurance treaties are usually renewable on an automatic basis, unless one of the parties wants new renewal terms. This characteristic ("automatic renewal") of the treaties makes them relatively easy to implement and cheaper to operate.

However, certain disadvantages may be found, as the reinsurer actually loses the right to select the individual risks subject to the reinsurance operation.

For this reason, before entering into a treaty reinsurance contract, a prudent reinsurer will want to know as much as possible about the ceding company, including information about its owners, history, financial position, company's experience in management and claims management[29].

The contractual method is the obligatory form of reinsurance.

Facultative-obligatory method. The facultative-obligatory method is defined by the fact that it is facultative for the reinsured, but it is obligatory for the reinsurer.

The choice of reinsurance ceding risks and the establishment of the conditions of the contract are made by the ceding company, the proposed version being obligatory for the reinsurer.

The insurance associations who all contribute to the capital in order to reinsure a part of the risks underwritten by these companies form the insurance pools[30].

Although the reinsurance activity, mainly, takes place on international markets, due to the development of trade, there have not been created conditions for insurances to be also concluded internally in economically developed countries[31].

6.4. The aggregation mechanism of insurance claims

In general terms, aggregation is a term used to describe the mechanism in which several losses are put together for the purpose of analyzing them as a single claim.

The aggregation clause was implemented, first of all, for the protection of the cedent from the financial impact caused by a series of relatively modest losses which, individually, do not exceed the retention in the insurance, but which, as a result of the aggregation, could become sufficiently significant as financial amount.

Secondly, it was intended to avoid the conceptual difficulties with regard to the decision of what is an "event" or an "occurrence".

The amount representing the indemnity is often affected by the aggregation clauses, whose purpose is to group the claims arisen, consequence of several occurrences coming from the same cause (they have the same causality).

Even if this seems to be easy to say, it is not always easy to determine "when" or "if" an occurrence, or a series of occurrences, come from the same cause or not.

The answer will depend on the circumstances of the case as well as on the specific contractual language that has been used.

Often, aggregation clauses provide the definition of what will be considered an event or occurrence.

The concept of "aggregation" is simple when the terms of the contract allow two or more separate losses covered by the contract to be treated as a single loss for deductibility or other purposes, when they are bonded by a single unifying factor of any kind.

By its nature, the so-called unifying factor determines the biggest debate.

In each case, the test depends on how well it is stated the clause defining it.

Where the act or event described in the aggregation clause is widely defined, an insured with thousands of linked claims may be able to make an insurance claim, whereas a narrow aggregation clause would mean that every individual claim fell within the deductible and the insurer or reinsurer pays nothing.

Aggregation applies for the benefit of both parties to the contract[32]:

It is advantageous to the insured or reinsured that he can aggregate in order to show that his loss has exceeded the limit of the retention or excess in the policy.

---

[28] Rob Merkin, Jenny Steele, "Insurance and the law of obligations", Oxford University Press, 2013, p 148

[29] Robert Carter, Leslie Lucas & Nigel Ralph, op.cit., p. 91

[30] I. Sferdian,op.cit., 2013, p.28

[31] V. Ciurel, "Asigurări şi reasigurări. Abordări teoretice şi practici internaţionale", Editura, Bucureşti, 2000, p.28

[32] http://www.devereuxchambers.co.uk/resources/articles/view/watch-your-words-aggregation-clauses

Conversely, the aggregation clause is advantageous to the insurer or reinsurer bacause he can reply upon the relevant limit of his liability in relation to the aggregation of the various losses. For this reason it will not often be a clause that has to be construed against the insurer (contra proferentum), but will generally be construed neutrally.

Aggregation clauses often provide the definition for what will be considered an event or occurrence for the purposes of the policy. Accordingly, the starting point for any determination of the purpose of the liability should be with reference to the aggregation clause and the definitions contained therein.

Event and occurrence are generally used as interchangeable terms, and there are a number of general principles which govern the meaning of those terms.

These principles include[33]: ”

I. An event or occurrence is a unifying factor that allows a number of individual losses to be aggregated and, therefore, to be treated as arising from single happening;
II. What has occurred must be capable of being described as an event or occurrence. Thus, something specific must have happened that is distinguishable from a general state of affairs. An event of occurrence is also to be distinguished from the cause of an event, as a result even through the cause of an occurrence may be present, until that cause rise to the event there is no occurrence;
III. An event or occurrence is somtheing which has happened and which has given rise to one or more losses;
IV. Where a number of individual loses have been sufferd, it is necessary for those losses to be sufficiently closely connected with each other to be regarded as having resulted from a single event or occurrence. The relevant ”unities” are time, locality, cause and motive;
V. There must be a sufficient causal connection between the individual losses and the event or occurrence from which they are said to result;
VI. (vi) The losses must not be too remote from the aggregating event;
VII. In assessing whether the individual losses can be aggregated as a single event or occurrence, the matter must be approached from the perspective of an informed observer and the assessment is to be made both analytically and as a matter of common sense”.

Conclusions

Reinsurance is a separate and unique industry with many of its own rules, traditions and practices.

Reinsurance permits the insurer to give cover which, because of the magnitude of the possible liability involved, could, might otherwise, be uninsurable by a single insurer without significant threat to both balance and solvency and to maintain a certain stability in financial results from year to year, giving the insurer the possibility to receive more risks, to increase it’s flexibility, as well as its ability to underwrite more risks.

Reinsurance is unilateral in the event that one of the contracting parties takes over a part of the risks assumed by the other party under the reinsurance contract.

When by the same contract or by different contracts, each party cedes or takes over a part of the risks assumed under insurance and reinsurance contracts, the reinsurance is reciprocal.

Reinsurance may take two forms: (i) proportional reinsurance and (ii) non-proportional reinsurance.

Proportionally and non-proportionally reinsurance contracts may be in form of facultative, obligatory or facultative obligatory.

The facultative-obligatory method is also identified in the doctrine, a method also called the insurance pool method.

The amount representing the indemnity is often affected by the aggregation clauses, whose purpose is to group the claims arisen, consequence of several occurrences coming from the same cause (they have the same causality).

When dealing with reinsurance policies, one must be aware and alive to the differences and the special features of reinsurance agreements and the potential for conflict of law issues that may arise in the reinsurance context.

References

- Graydon S. Staring, ”Law of Reinsurance” (New York:Clark Boardman Callaghan, 1993)
- Robert Carter Leslie Lucas & Nigel Rlph, ”Reinsurance 4 th Ed”. (Great Britain: Reactions Publishing Group, 2000)
- Aviva Abramovsky, ”Reinsurance: The Silent Regulator?” (2008-9) 15 Conn. Ins. L.J.
- I. Sferdian, ”Dreptul asigurărilor”, Editura C.H. Beck, București, 2007
- John S. Butler, ”Reinsurance law”, looseleaf (London: Thomson Reuters Ltd., 2009)
- H. Louberege, ”Economie et finance de l assurance et de la reassurance”, Paris, Dalloz, 1981
- L. Văcărel, Fl. Bercea, ”Asigurări și reasigurări”, Editura Expert, București, 2007,
- Rob Merkin, Jenny Steele, ”Insurance and the law of obligations”, Oxford University Press, 2013

[33] John S. Butler, ”Reinsurance law”, looseleaf (London: Thomson Reuters Ltd., 2009), 30220-30221

- Fr. Deak, ”Tratat de drept civil. Contracte speciale”, Editura Universul Juridic, București, 2007
- I. Dogaru (coord), ”Drept civil. Contracte speciale”, Editura all Beck
- Ozlem Gurses, ”Marine Insurance Law”, sec edition, Routledge Taylor & Francis Group, 2017
- I. Sferdian, ”Asigurări, Privire specială asupra contractului de asigurare din perspectiva Codului civil”, Editura C.h. Beck, București, 2013
- Richard C. Manson & James E. Pfeifer II, ”A Closer Look at Facultative Reinsurance”, 31 Tort & Ins. L.J. 641 1995-1996
- V. Ciurel, ”Asigurări și reasigurări. Abordări teoretice și practici internaționale”, Editura, București, 2000
- http://www.devereuxchambers.co.uk/resources/articles/view/watch-your-words-aggregation-clauses
- http://www.aida.org.uk/workpart_reinsurance_nextmeeting.asp.

BRIEF COMMENTS ON ISSUES CONCERNING THE FORFEITURE OF RIGHT TO SUBMIT EVIDENCE IN THE CIVIL TRIAL

Emilian-Constantin MEIU[*]

Abstract

The Code of Civil Procedure lays down a series of timeframes in which the parties may propose the evidence under the sanction of the forfeiture of this right and, on the other hand, at the written stage regulated by art. 200 Civ. Proc. Code the application may also be annulled because the applicant has not proposed evidence within the 10-day time limit set by the court to fill the claim. We propose to analyze both the interferences between the sanction of the cancellation of the application and the forfeiture of right at the regularization stage, but also the scope of art. 254 par. (2) Civ. Proc. Code, respectively the cases in which the evidence may be submitted beyond the term stipulated by the law. In the paper we will propose solutions to the applicable sanction for not showing evidence in the civil action, analyzing the arguments proposed by the doctrine both for nullity and for forfeiture of right. In this respect, we will discuss the particular cases of art. 194 lit. e) Civ. Proc. Code on witness identification data and interrogators of the legal entity. In the last part, we will address the question of the removal of the sanction of forfeiture in cases where the administration of the evidence does not lead to the adjournment of the trial, more precisely the situations in which this law is to be applied.

Keywords: nullity, forfeiture of right, art. 254 Civ. Proc. Code, evidence.

1. Introduction

First of all, the analysis of the institution of forfeiture of right in civil procedural law is a complex issue that we do not intend to do on this occasion. In the present study, we aim only to present solutions for some issues that are not solved by both doctrine and judicial practice. In our opinion, these issues of interpretation and others which are not subject to our analysis, have arisen due to insufficient regulation of the forfeiture of right in the Civil Procedure Code, which led to the interpretation of the rules by using the guiding principles of the civil procedure regulated in the articles 5-23 Civ. Proc. Code, including the right of the parties, the role of the judge in finding out the truth, the legality, the obligations of the parties in the civil trial.

The correlation of these principles by giving greater weight to some or other of them has resulted in different solutions precisely because they are often antagonistic, although they have complementary roles, together forming a unitary one designed to govern the conduct of the civil process. n interpreting the rules on decoupling but also in other cases, divergences of solutions also arise from the difficulty in determining whether that rule primarily protects a private interest or, on the contrary, primarily protects public order.

In interpreting the rules on forfeiture of right but also in other cases, divergences of solutions also arise from the difficulty in determining whether that rule primarily protects a private interest or, on the contrary, primarily protects public order.

2. The applicable sanction for non-indicating evidence in the civil action.

This first point that we propose to consider in the course of this study has several components, and we will gradually consider the answer to several questions to provide a solution to the main problem. The first of these questions is to determine what the sanction is if the claimant does not request evidence in the civil action.

From the regulation of the written stage, respectively, art. 194 - 201 Civ. Proc. Code, it results that for non-fulfillment of the requirements stipulated by art. 194 - 197 Civ. Proc. Code the sanction is the anullment of the demand. The doctrine also expressed the view that in the case of non-evidence, the sanction should be the forfeiture of right to submit evidence[1]. Also, part of the judicial practice adopted this solution, considering that for failing to show evidence, the applicant could be sanctioned on the occasion of their approval.

To begin with, we can not fail to notice that the divergence of solutions in practice arises in this matter because there is a problem in determining which of the two sanctions is to be applied with priority, forfeiture of right or nullity. It seems useful to observe that the very premise of antithesis of the two sanctions is not a natural one, because the procedural act accomplished over the term is null due to the effects of the forfeiture of right, according to art. 185 par. (1) C. pr.civ. Therefore, it is in the logic of the Civil Procedure Code that the forfeiture of right to effect a procedural act leads to the annulment of that act. The distinction between the nullity and the forfeiture of right in the particular issue that we are analyzing is only of a temporal nature, as nullity operates during the regularization, and forfeiture of right occurs at the time of proposing the evidence beyond the statutory deadline. However, in addition to the above, the evidence submited after the legal term has passed will be penalized in essence also with nullity. In practice, the court establishes the forfeiture of right to propose evidence and rejects the request for evidence because it was submited overdue[2], but behind the solution is also a nullity of the procedural act represented by the proposal of evidence beyond the legal deadline.

[*] PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: meiuemilian@yahoo.com).

[1] G.C. Frenţiu. D.-L. Băldean, Noul Cod de procedură civilă comentat şi adnotat, Ed. Hamangiu, 2013, p. 396;

The answer we will give to this is based on the principle that the application of the sanction of forfeiture of right with regard to the proposition of evidence or, more precisely, the postponement of the imposition of a sanction in this respect until the moment of the admission of the evidence, defeats the purpose of the writen phase in the civil trial, that the parties declare in this stage the weapons they will later use.

If the sanction for failure to substantiate evidence in the request to sue would be the applicant's forfeiture of right to propose evidence, the defendant would find it difficult at the time of the complaint, since he could only rely on the evidence he considered useful from his point of view and not from the evidence proposed by the applicant in action. Subsequently, at the time of proposing the evidence, the court would have to find the forfeitor of right for the applicant to propose evidence, except for the incidence of one of the cases provided by art. 254 par. 2 pt. 1-5 Civ. Proc. Code. This would lead to a situation that should be prevented, and for which the legislator foresaw the solution at an earlier stage. In particular, the regularization procedure has the purpose of bringing the application in a position to be judged, including in terms of evidence. An application in which the applicant does not refer to any evidence should be annulled in so far as the applicant does not provide evidence[3] within the 10-day time limit set by the court for that purpose (art. 200 par. (3) and (4) Civ. Proc. Code). Not to apply this sanction in the regularization phase and to postpone it for a later moment of the trial means the non-application of the sanction of the anullment of the request set by the legislator for the regularization stage, and the effect is the elimination of regularization from the point of view of evidence request. It could not be a reason for the request not to be canceled, nor for the potential future agreement of the defendant at the time of the endorsement of the evidence doubled by the proposal by the applicant for further evidence. This reasoning is also not justified by the principle of availability, since in such situations priority is given to the principle of legality. Civil proceedings must be conducted in accordance with the law, even if the court is required to settle the dispute in accordance with the limits set by the parties. Forfeiture of right is therefore a sanction distinct from that of the cancellation of the application and applies later to the regularization stage. In the context of regularization, the only applicable sanction is the cancellation of demand. Subsequently, to the extent that the request for suing survives the regularization procedure, the sanction of the forfeiture may be applied for the evidence that the parties will propose beyond the deadline under art. 254 Civ. Proc. Code

3. The sanction applicable for non-compliance with the provisions of art. 194 lit. e) Civ. Proc. Code on witness identification data and interrogatories of the legal entity.

At the previous point, we concluded that the application would be canceled if the applicant did not show any evidence in support of his action. We believe that the same solution is also necessary if the applicant asks for the witness evidence, but does not indicate the name, surname or address. The absence and only of one of these elements of identification may mean that the witness can not be identified and the defendant will not be able to prepare his defense properly and the court will not be able to summon the witness for the first term[4]. Also, the request should be canceled if the interrogation of the defendant legal person is requested, but at the request of the court, the applicant does not submit the written questioning for communication.

The rule should apply regardless of the number of witnesses proposed and the fact that some are missing identification data only. There is no justification for a waiver in the sense that since for example three witnesses were proposed, out of which for two were given the name, surname and address, for the

[2] The procedural exception used by the case law for submittng a request overdue is called in romanian excepția tardivității and comes from the french word tardiveté, wich means latenss/ tardiness.

[3] A possible exception identified in the doctrine is the fact that the plaintiff expressly states in the application that he seeks to cause the defendant to be recognized and has no other evidence at hand; We also believe that this support is in fact a request for evidence by which the applicant seeks the interrogation of the defendant, it is not possible to specify by way of action only that the applicant is awaiting the respondent's reaction, the only hope of admitting the action is that the defendant will meet the claims formulated; the actual adherence to certain claims must be based on certain evidence that is usually exhibited by the applicant. For example, if a loan is to be paid and the claimant fails to submit a document or request further evidence, the plaintiff's passive position can not be considered as an attitude, and the submission of written notes or statements in a public hearing recognizing the existence of the loan will be a confession; normally by way of an application by the court, the plaintiff will have to indicate this if his only evidence could constitute the defendant's confession. However, this hypothesis has an extremely limited applicability field, so it should not be a ground for solving the problem under analysis.

[4] Although we do not propose an in-depth analysis of the Article 203 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we only specify that the court may order a series of preparatory measures for the first term, and among them it is possible to summon the witnesses proposed. We appreciate that this measure should be used with caution of this right only when it is anticipated that the hearing of the cited witnesses will take place at the first term.

unidentified witness the sanction forfeiture of right will be applied in the phase of evidence proposal. This denial is based on the same misapplication of the sanction of forfeiture of right at the regularization stage, or more correctly, the non-application of any sanction and the transfer of the sanction at the procedural moment of the approval of the evidence.

It has also been argued that the provisions of art. 254 par. (1) according to which, under the sanction of the forfeiture of right, the applicant may propose the evidence by means of a request for a summons, to be a special rule in relation to the provisions of art. 200 Civ. Proc. Code, so the forfeiture of right should be applied with priority. This statement is wrong first of all because art. 254 is, as its marginal name suggests, the text that generally governs the proposition of evidence. Its general nature in proposing evidence is conferred by its placement in ”Paragraph 1. General Provisions" of ”Subsection 3. Evidence”, of ”Section 2. Process Investigation". Far from being a special norm, art. 254 is the framework norm in the matter of proposing evidence in the judicial investigation phase, and in its first paragraph only sets out the general rule as to the time of proposing the evidence. The purpose of the first paragraph of the text of the law is to establish the temporal scope of the sanction of forfeiture of right and is in fact the premise for paragraphs 2 to 6, in which the legislator has understood to detail the sanction of forfeiture of right regime. Another argument for which we find that between art. 254 and art. 200 Civ. Proc. Code there is no special to the general relation is that the two rules are located in the regulations of different stages of the civil process. While art. 200 Civ. Proc. Code governs the regularization procedure within the written stage, the provisions of art. 254 Civ. Proc. Code are intended, as we have indicated above, to lay down the rules applicable to the proposal of evidence in the judicial investigation phase. So the legislator's intention was that each of these rules should be applicable at different times in the civil process, and saying that one of them has priority in a particular case is a disregard for the scope of law provided for by each of the two rules of law.

4. The scope of art. 254 par. (2) point 4. Civ. Proc. Code on the removal of the sanction of forfeiture in cases where "the administration of the evidence does not lead to the adjournment of the trial"

The main problem that comes with the interpretation of this rule is to know whether it should be understood restrictively in the sense that the evidence can be administered at that term, that is, the administration of the evidence itself does not lead to postponement or we can interpret this text in the sense that the administration of the evidence does not lead to the postponement because there are other reasons for postponement for which a new term of trial will be granted.

The first solution, according to which the meaning of the text is that the evidence itself does not lead to the postponement of the judgment, is not only a strict interpretation of the text that maintains within the literal meaning of the syntagm, but also an abstract, purely formal approach which can also produce undesirable consequences. For example, if we look at the hypothesis of proposing the evidence with witnesses, interpreting strictly the point number 4 of art. 254 par. (2) Civ. Proc. Code it would result that this evidence should only be admissible when witnesses are present at the time of their proposal. Only this interpretation would be in accordance with the principle that the evidence itself does not have a dilatory effect on the judgment. But most of the time, witnesses will not be heard at the same time as they were proposed, but at a later date, so the court will approve the evidence because it does not postpone the trial, but will also establich another date for the hearing of the witness .

Of course, this hypothesis is just the starting point, it can undergo changes, so the solution will also be nuanced for each of the various hypotheses. Before moving on to the analysis of various scenarios and possible solutions, we believe it is important to identify the purpose for which the rule in question was edited in order to be able to use the teleological interpretation. We firmly believe that teleological interpretation should always prevail, even though grammatical and logical-juridical interpretation is often sufficient to clarify the scope of a text. However, if the text is presented in a form in which these methods can not determine exactly what the meaning of the norm is, the balance should be leaning against the purpose for which the provision subject to the exegesis has been edited. In the case provided by art. 254 par. (2) point 4. Civ. Proc. Code is that the party enjoys the right to a defense even if he has not proposed the overdue evidence due to negligence, but the administration of the evidence does not cause the process to be prejudiced in order to harm the adversary and the speed with which the courts are required to settle a dispute. In other words, this rule is intended to give the negligent right to the defense, but without disregarding the right of the adverse party to benefit from the speed of the settlement process, in other words the settlement of the case within an optimal and predictable timeframe.

For example, if the defendant puts forward the documentary evidence over the term and puts them in the file, the question arises whether the court may find the forfeit on the ground that the indirect administration of the evidence with these documents leads to the adjournment of the trial because the applicant requests a time limit for the examination of the submitted documents. We believe that the answer should be negative because such an interpretation would excessively restrict the scope of the text and only documents with such limited content would be admissible than any court would find it unnecessary to grant a term for their study.

Starting from the previous example, in practice it was cconsidered that the request of contrary revidence by the opposing party is also a reason why the evidence would not meet the requirement not to delay the trial. But this solution violates art. 254 par. (3) Civ. Proc. Code that establishes the right of the other party to propose the contrary evidence as a natural consequence of the admission of a later probation. urning to the purpose of the rule, if it contains both the right of defense of the party and the principle of celerity by granting the opponent the right to put forward the opposite proof, the legislator has once again set the priority of the right of defense over celerity, but this time it is conferred to the other party who was surprised with a new trial weapon. A simpler expression would be that the lawmaker accepts that the party breaks the deadline for proposing evidence, but only in certain cases and with respect for the other party's right to defend themselves. We appreciate that celerity has been left behind in the editing of these exceptions from the sanction of forfeiture of right, precisely so that the parties can support each thesis with the help of evidence, so that the right to defense and the finding of truth are prevalent principles within these rules. This is precisely why we believe that this conclusion should also be applied in altered assumptions in which a test is proposed over time, and the judge must determine whether or not this leads to the adjournment of the trial.

At the beginning we gave the example of the evidence, which should not always lead to the postponement of judgment itself. If, according to art. 254 par. (3) the opposing party has the right to the contrary, and we have indicated that his exercise could not be regarded as a ground for postponing the trial, we considere that a fortiori the right to study the written documents should not have this effect, because the study of some writings is also an exercise of the right to defense, in a less energetic form than the submission of evidence to the contrary.

Next, it is likely that the party proposing the evidence with overdue documents shows that it is not in a position to submit it to this deadline for certain reasons. If the court finds that it will retain the case for settlement of this term, then it will undoubtedly notice the decline of the right to propose the documentary evidence because it leads to the adjournment of the trial. But even in this case the legislator, by art. 254 par. (5) Civ. Proc. Code, provides the possibility to administer the evidence with the ex officio documents insofar as the evidence already administered is not capable of leading itself to complete the process.

But if the court has other grounds for postponing, the question arises whether the overdue proposed evidence leads to the adjournment of the trial or not. The easiest interpretation is to notice the decline because the administration of the sample by itself leads to postponement. Turning to the balance between the right of defense and celerity, we consider that, since celerity is not affected, the right to defense should be respected by administering the document to be filed at the next term, and the evidence should be granted because it does not cause delays in concrete, but only in abstract. This reasoning should also apply when the party proposes to the late first term the evidence with a witness but does not bring it to the moment of the proposal, knowing that the most predictable, the trial will have a postponement for the hearing of all the witnesses, thus as is usually the case. Also in this case, although the evidence will be rejected as late because it leads to the adjournment of the trial, the court will allow the hearing of the witnesses proposed in due time. We believe that the evidence should be admitted regardless of the presence in the room of late-proposed witnesses if the judgment is postponed for any reason. Of course, as we have shown, there is no art incident. 254 par. (2) point 4. Civ. Proc. Code if the court is to retain the case for settlement even at the time the witness evidence is proposed.

5. Conclusions

The analyzed issues concern the interpretation of the application of the sanction of decay either independently or in relation to the sanction of nullity in the regularization. It follows from the foregoing analysis that in practice there are difficulties in determining the scope of the sanction of deferral in relation to other sanctions that occur during the civil process. On the other hand, the different jurisprudential interpretations given to rules on decoupling lead to the conclusion that this institution is interpreted in a non-uniform manner in judicial practice.

The solutions we have provided above are our vision of an interpretation of norms in the matter of decay in spirit rather than in their letter.

References

- G. Boroi, M. Stancu, Drept procesual civil, Ed. Hamangiu, 2017
- G. Boroi (coord.), O. Spineanu-Matei, D. N. Theohari, A. Constanda, M. Stancu, C. Negrilă, D.M. Gavriș, V. Dănăilă, F.G. Păncescu, M. Eftimie, Noul Cod de procedură civilă. Comentariu pe articole, vol. I, Ed. Hamangiu, 2016
- V. M. Ciobanu și M. Nicolae (coordonatori), Noul Cod de procedură civilă comentat și adnotat, vol. I, Ed. Universul Juridic, 2016
- G.C. Frențiu. D.-L. Băldean, Noul Cod de procedură civilă comentat și adnotat, Ed. Hamangiu, 2013
- M. Tăbârcă, Drept procesual civil, vol. II, Ed. Universul juridic, 2013
- L. Zidaru, Unele aspecte privind regularizarea cererii de chemare în judecată și noua reglementare a taxelor judiciare de timbru, disponibil la https://www.juridice.ro/293074/unele-aspecte-privind-regularizarea-cererii-de-chemare-in-judecata-si-noua-reglementare-a-taxelor-judiciare-de-timbru-2.html

RESOLUTION ON INSURANCE

Vasile NEMEŞ[*]
Gabriela FIERBINŢEANU[]

Abstract

The insurance activity as a whole is of interest and concern for the state power which, by virtue of the principle of market economy organization, must, on the one hand, intervene in order to provide a favorable framework for the insurance activity to be exercised by insurers and, on the other hand , to adopt prudential rules to protect insured and potential insured.

In order to implement the prudential rules in the insurance field, the Supervisory Authority controls the patrimonial situation of the insurance companies and steps in when it finds financial difficulties such as the decrease of the solvency margin, the decrease of the minimum safety fund, the imbalance between the tangible assets and the liabilities of the company, of the patrimonial situation.

Under the main measures to maintain and, where appropriate, restore the financial situation of insurance companies, the most important are the financial recovery procedure regulated by Law No. 503/2004 on financial recovery, bankruptcy, dissolution and voluntary liquidation in the insurance business and the resolution procedure, regulated by Law no. 246/2015 regarding the recovery and resolution of insurers.

Keywords: insurers, financial difficulty, financial recovery, resolution, bankruptcy.

Preliminary specifications

The insurance activity[1] is carried out by the insurance companies, which, according to our legislation, are divided into two categories: insurers of insurance companies and insurers of mutual insurance companies. The phenomenon of insurance, as a whole, interests and concerns the state power which, by virtue of the principle of market economy organization, must, on the one hand, intervene in order to provide a favorable framework for carrying out the insurance activity by the insurers and, on the other hand, to adopt prudential rules in order to protect the insured persons or the potential insured persons/policyholders. The intervention of the state is required to protect the policyholders. The intervention and protection of the state are justified / based on the particularly technical and complex character of the insurance operations, the professionalism of the insurers and, from the point of view of the insurance consumers, on the grounds that the policyholders are unfamiliar in this matter, may be subject to abuses by the insurance traders. Therefore, the states have set up administrative authorities to control, supervise and sanction, as the case may be, the abusive practices of the insurers[2]. In Romania, such authority is the Financial Supervisory Authority[3], which, as the name itself suggests, ensures the legality of the insurance phenomenon in our country. As the insurance operations are of particular importance for the economic and social activity[4], the legislator has set up a special legal regime which also covers the

[*] Lecturer, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: nemes@nemes-asociatii.ro)
[] Assistant Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: gabriela.fierbinteanu@gmail.com)

[1] The main insurance regulations are: the Law no. 237/2015 for the authorization and supervision of insurance and reinsurance activity, the Official Gazette no. 800 of 28.10.2015; the Law no. 132/2017 on compulsory insurance against traffic civil liability for the damages caused to third parties by motor vehicle and trams accidents, the Official Gazette no. 431 of 12.07.2017; the Law no. 32/2000 on the activity and supervision of the intermediaries in the insurance and reinsurance activity, the Official Gazette no. 148 of 10.04.2000; the Law no. 503/2004 on financial recovery, bankruptcy, dissolution and voluntary liquidation in the insurance activity, the Official Gazette no. 1193 of 14.12.2004; the Law no. 246/2015 on the recovery and resolution of insurers, the Official Gazette no. 813 of 02.11.2015.; the Law no. 213/2015 on the policyholders' Guarantee Fund; the Official Gazette no. 550 of 24.07.2015; the Law no. 86/2014 on insolvency and insolvency prevention procedures, the Official Gazette no. 466 of 25.06.2014.

[2] For example, in France, the prudential control and supervision are exercised by the Prudential and Resolution Supervisory Authority to address scientific issues, see L. Grynbaun (collectively), Assurances, Acteur. Contract. Risques desconsommateurs. Risques des entreprises, L'Argus editions de l'assurance, 2018, page 103 and the next ones; in the Italian system, the administrative authority is called IVASS (Instituto per la vigilanza sulle assicurazioni) and it is governed by the Private Insurance Code, see, G. Cassano, R. Razzante, N. Tilli, M. Distasi, M. Iaselli, A. Macrillo, V. Aragona, A. Catricala, Diritto delle assicurazioni. Questioni risarcitorie e liquidazione danni, Giuffre editione, Milano, 2017, page 3 and the next ones; in Denmark, the entity responsible for the supervision and control in the insurance field is the Financial Supervisory Authority (for details, see R. Blanpain, P. Lyngs, International Encyclopedia of Laws, Kluwer International Publishing House, Boston, 1992, pages 19-20). In the Belgian law, the control is exercised by the Banking, Financial and Insurance Commission (B.F.I.A.), set up in 2004 under the subordination of the Ministry of Economic Affairs (see M. Fontaine, Droit des assurances, 3[e] ed., Larcier Publishing House, Bruxelles, 2006, page 41 and the next ones).

[3] The Financial Supervisory Authority was set up by the G.E.O. no. 93/2012 on the setting up, organization and operation of the Financial Supervisory Authority, the Official Gazette no. 874 of 21.12.2012.

[4] We take into account the many forms of insurance regulated by the legislation in force, such as: the compulsory insurance of civil liability for the owners of motor vehicles, the insurance specific to different professions (lawyers, experts, insolvency practitioners, physicians etc.), the insurance for people, the property insurance, the credit insurance etc.

situations of financial difficulty that the insurance providers go through during their existence.

1. The legal treatment applied to insurance companies in financial difficulty

1.1.Introductory considerations

As has been seen, the legislator expresses a particular concern over the patrimony of the insurance companies in order to create a sound financial situation thereof, a sound and prudent management of the patrimony and the protection of the policyholders and injured persons, as a result of the occurrence of risks that were the subject of an insurance report. In this respect, the insurers are required to provide a minimum safety fund, a solvency margin and to contribute money to the Guarantee Fund, the Road Traffic Victims Protection Fund etc.

The Financial Supervisory Authority is authorized by law to control the patrimonial situation of insurance companies and, when it finds financial difficulties, such as the decrease in the solvency margin, the decrease of the minimum safety fund, an imbalance between the assets and liabilities of the company etc., establishes certain measures to restore the patrimonial situation[5].

Among such measures, the most important are those that make up the financial recovery procedure and the insurers' resolution procedure. These measures are designed to prevent the financial collapse of insurers and, implicitly, to initiate the bankruptcy proceeding against them.

1.2. The financial recovery procedure for the insurance companies

Brief presentation

According to the provisions of article 3, paragraph (1) letter b) of the Law no. 503/2004, the financial recovery procedure means all the methods and administrative measures carried out by the Financial Supervisory Authority, as a competent authority, designed to preserve or to restore the financial situation of an insurance/reinsurance company. It follows that the financial recovery is a special administrative procedure conducted under the supervision of the Supervisory Authority[6].

The measures specific to the financial recovery procedure are carried out in two distinct ways[7]:

a) the recovery of the insurance company on the basis of a financial recovery plan;
b) the recovery of the insurance company by a special administration.

Each of the two methods of recovery is subject to a special regime, and the actual method of recovery is determined by a motivated decision, by the Financial Supervisory Authority[8].

1.3. The resolution in the insurance field

A special category of measures available to the Financial Supervisory Authority, aiming to prevent, identify and address the situations of financial difficulty of the operators in the insurance market, are those that make up the resolution in the insurance field.

The resolution in the insurance field means the legal regime made up of a set of instruments available to the Financial Supervisory Authority, necessary to intervene promptly, at an early stage, in the activity of a non-viable insurer or of an insurer liable to go into difficulty, so as to ensure continuity of the critical financial and economic functions thereof, at the same time minimizing the impact of the insurer's difficulty on the economy and financial system (article 2, point 39 of the Law no. 246/2015).

According to the law, the main objectives of the resolution in the insurance field are as follows:

a) protecting the insurance creditors;
b) minimizing the impact on the protection funds, protecting the public funds by minimizing the dependence on public financial support;
c) avoiding the significant adverse effects on the financial stability of the insurance market, in particular by preventing the contagion, including the market infrastructures, and by maintaining the discipline in the market (article 40).

It is easy to see that the main purpose of the resolution in the insurance field is the same with the purpose of the financial recovery regulated by the Law no. 503/2004, namely the identification in optimal time of the insurance operators with financial difficulties and the establishment of measures and procedures designed to contribute for recovering the patrimonial situation and avoiding the bankruptcy of the insurer who is found in such a situation.

---

[5] See St. D. Cărpenaru, M-A Hotca, V. Nemeş, the commented Insolvency Code, 2nd Edition, revised and supplemented, Universul Juridic / Legal Universe Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, page 642.

[6] There were law systems, such as the Italian one, where the financial recovery procedure for the debtors in the common law is carried out under the direction and control of an administrative authority in this field, called the Controlled Administration Institute (A. Fiale, cited works, page 935 and the next ones). This procedure was abrogated by the decree of January 9, 2006.

[7] The Italian legislation regulates the institution of the provisional management commissioner who is a specialist appointed by the administrative authority (I.S.V.A.P.), authorized to manage the company found in difficulty. While exercising the mandate of the provisional management commissioner, the other institutions are suspended, but this procedure cannot last more than two months (S. Lanna, cited works, page 118).

[8] For more details concerning the recovery of the financial situation of the insurance companies on the basis of a recovery plan and by a special administration, see, V. Nemeş, Insurance Law, 4th Edition, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2012, page 120 and the next ones.

3.1. The recovery plan within the resolution of insurers

According to the law, the insurance companies with a significant influence in the national insurance system[9] have the obligation to draw up a recovery plan.

The recovery plan should include, in particular, the measures to be taken by the insurer for the recovery of the financial situation in case of significant deterioration of the financial indicators and must contain the following elements:

- a summary of the main elements of the plan;
- the information provided in the annex to the law [10];
- the measures which may be taken by the insurer if the conditions for early intervention provided by law are met;
- the appropriate conditions and procedures to ensure the implementation of the recovery measures in due time, as well as the recovery options;
- additional information and scenarios provided in the regulations issued by the Financial Supervisory Authority;
- a summary of the important changes made in relation to the insurer, according to the most recent information relevant for resolution purposes;
- a presentation of the method in which the critical functions and core business lines could be separated from other functions, legally and economically, to ensure the continuity thereof in case of major difficulty of the insurer;
- an estimate of the timing of the implementation of each important aspect of the plan;
- a description of the procedure for determining the value and the possibility of sale of the critical functions, core business lines and insurer's assets;
- a detailed description of the measures designed to ensure that the required information is updated and made available to the FSA, at any time;
- a presentation of the method in which FSA considers that the resolution measures could be funded;
- a detailed description of the different resolution strategies which could be applied according to the possible scenarios and applicable deadlines;
- an analysis of the impact of the plan on the insurer's employees, including an assessment of any associated costs and a description of the consultation procedures during the resolution process of the staff, of the employers' organization and of the trade union or of the employees' representatives, as appropriate;
- a communication plan with the media and the audience;
- the solvency capital requirements and the minimum capital, as well as the qualitative and quantitative requirements of own funds and the deadline for reaching this level, if applicable;
- a description of the essential operations and systems in order to maintain the continuous operation of the insurer's business process;
- as the case may be, any opinion expressed by the insurer regarding the resolution plan;
- a detailed description of the assessment of the possibilities for implementing the resolution plan;
- a description of all the measures necessary to remove the obstacles to the implementation of the resolution plan[11].

The law forbids insurers to base the recovery plan relying on the access to the public financial support.

The recovery plan is approved by the insurer's management bodies and then it is submitted for evaluation to the Financial Supervisory Authority. The Supervisory Authority examines the recovery plan and assesses to what extent it contains the information and meets the requirements provided by law, as well as whether the plan provides the measures to preserve or to recover the viability and financial position of the insurer in a short time and efficiently, avoiding to the maximum the significant adverse effects on the financial or insurance system. If the Financial Supervisory Authority considers that the recovery plan has major deficiencies or significant obstacles to the implementation of the plan, it shall communicate to the insurer the outcome of the evaluation and shall request him/her to make a presentation, within two months, of a revised plan containing solutions to remedy the deficiencies or to overcome the obstacles (article 15). If the insurer fails to comply with the requirements of the Financial Supervisory Authority, it may require the insurer to take the following measures:

- the decrease in the risk profile of the insurer, including the decrease in the solvency and/or liquidity risk;
- applying recapitalization measures;
- reviewing the insurer's business strategy and structure;
- the change in the management structure and leadership of the insurer;
- to check the adequacy of the technical reserves and covering them with admissible assets (article 16).

In order to achieve the purpose of the resolution, the Financial Supervisory Authority shall reassess and, where appropriate, shall update, annually and after any significant change in the organizational structure, the resolution plans of the activity or financial situation of the insurer, which could have a significant impact on [9] For the purposes of the law, an insurer has a significant influence in the national insurance system, if meets any of the following conditions: a) the value of the insurer's gross technical reserves exceeds 5% of the total value of the gross technical reserves at market level; b) he/she has a market share of at least 5%.

[10] The Law no. 246/2015 contains the annex on the information to be included by the insurer in the recovery plan within the resolution.

[11] The main measures to be provided by the resolution plan are set out in the article 8 and article 23 of the law; as regards the procedure and the measures which can be taken within the bank resolution, see the provisions of the Law no. 312/2015 on the recovery and resolution of credit institutions and investment companies, as well as for amending and supplementing some legislative acts in the financial field, the Official Gazette no. 920 of 11.12.2015, and for a thorough study in this field, we recommend J.S. Capdeville, M. Storkp, R. Routier, M. Mignot, J.-Ph. Kovar, N. Ereseo, Droit bancaire, Daloz, 2017, page 273 and the next ones.

the effectiveness of the resolution plans or which would require a modification thereof (article 22 of the Law no. 246/2015).

3.2. Early intervention

As we pointed out above, the FSA must monitor the financial situation of the supervised insurers in order to identify their financial crisis situations. The leverages by which the FSA can intervene to identify and prevent the financial difficulties are called "early intervention measures".

Under the terms of the law, the early intervention measures are those measures provided by the Financial Supervisory Authority in order to recover the financial situation of the insurer and to avoid the deterioration of the solvency capital, as well as the own funds covering the solvency capital requirement (article 2, point 29 of the Law).

In particular, the law regulates that if an insurer breaches or is likely to breach the requirements for maintaining the authorization provided by law, in the near future, as a result of a sudden deterioration of the financial situation which includes a deterioration of the solvency capital situation and of the own funds covering the solvency capital requirement, the Financial Supervisory Authority, besides the corrective or punitive measures, may take, as appropriate, the following measures:

- to request the management body of the insurer to implement one or more measures established in the recovery plan or to update such a recovery plan if the circumstances which led to the early intervention are different from the assumptions foreseen in the initial recovery plan and to implement one or more of the measures foreseen in the updated plan, in a certain period of time;
- to request the management body of the insurer to examine the situation, to identify the measures addressing to any identified problems and to develop an action program for solving such problems and a timetable for the implementation thereof;
- to request the management body of the insurer to convene a general meeting of the shareholders of the company or, if the management body fails to comply with this requirement, to directly convene that meeting and, in both cases, to establish the agenda and to require certain decisions to be taken into account in order to be adopted by the shareholders;
- to require the replacement of one or more members of the management body or senior management of the insurer, if these persons prove to be inappropriate for exercising their duties;
- to request the management body of the insurer to develop a plan to negotiate the restructuring of the debts of the insurer's creditors, in accordance with the recovery plan, as appropriate[12];
- to request changes in the business strategy of the insurer;
- to request changes in the business/operational structure of the insurer;
- to request the insurer to provide all the necessary information in order to update the resolution plan and to prepare a possible resolution of the insurer, as well as to perform an assessment of the assets and liabilities.

If the aforementioned measures do not achieve their purpose or if there is a significant deterioration of the insurer's financial situation or there are serious violations of the legislation, the Financial Supervisory Authority may require the replacement of the senior management or the management body of the insurer, as a whole, or the replacement of some of his/her members (article 29 of the Law).

3.3. The appointment of the temporary administrator

According to the law, if the Financial Supervisory Authority considers that the replacement of the senior management or of the management body is insufficient to remedy the situation, it may appoint one or more temporary administrators of the insurer, also establishing their role, duties and powers.

For the purposes of the Law no. 246/2015, the temporary administrator is any natural person or legal entity, including the policyholders' Guarantee Fund, appointed by the Financial Supervisory Authority for the supervision or temporary replacement of the insurer's management body, in order to maintain or to recover his/her financial situation and to ensure a sound and prudent management of the insurer's activity.

The appointment of the temporary administrator is public, except when he/she is not authorized to represent the insurer. The temporary administrator may be entrusted with all the powers of the insurer's management body, in accordance with the articles of association of the insurer and the applicable national legislation, including the power to exercise any and all the administrative duties of the insurer's management body.

The actions of the temporary administrator, excepting those relating to the current activity of the insurer, are subject to the prior approval of the Financial Supervisory Authority.

With the approval of the FSA, the temporary administrator may exercise, in any case, the power to convene the general meeting of shareholders of the insurer and to establish the agenda of that meeting (article 34).

The period for which a temporary administrator may be appointed cannot exceed one year, but, in special circumstances, this period may be extended by the FSA.

[12] This measure is very similar to the institution of the preventive arrangement with the creditors regulated by the Law no. 85/2016, for details on preventive arrangement with the creditors, see St. D. Cărpenaru, M-A Hotca, V. Nemeş, cited works, page 67 and the next ones; R. Bufan, A. D. Diaconescu, F. Moțiu (collectively) Practical Insolvency Treaty, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, page 107; N. Țăndăreanu, Commented Insolvency Code, Universul Juridic / Legal Universe Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, page 99 and the next ones.

According to the law, the Financial Supervisory Authority is responsible for determining to what extent the conditions for keeping a temporary administrator are met and to justify such a decision in front of the shareholders.

3.4. The conditions for triggering the resolution in the insurance field

The law provides that the Financial Supervisory Authority may take a resolution measure on an insurer if the following conditions are cumulatively met:

a) if it determines that the insurer is or may be in a major difficulty;
b) the resolution measure is necessary from the public interest point of view.

An insurer is or may be in a major difficulty if any of the following conditions is met:

- the insurer violates the requirements for holding the authorization or is likely to violate them in the near future, due to a sudden deterioration of the financial situation which includes a deterioration of the solvency capital situation and own funds covering the solvency capital requirement to an extent that would justify the withdrawal of the operating license, inclusively, if the insurer has incurred or is likely to incur losses which will deplete all or a significant part of his own funds;
- the assets of the insurer are inferior to the obligations or, according to objective elements, it can be concluded that this will happen in the near future;
- the insurer is unable to pay the damages/indemnities due to the insurance creditors or, according to objective elements, it can be concluded that this will happen in the near future (article 43).

3.5. General principles of the resolution in the insurance field

In the procedure for implementing the resolution, the Financial Supervisory Authority should ensure that the resolution measures are taken in accordance with the following principles:

a) the shareholders of the insurer subject to the resolution are the first to bear the losses;
b) the creditors of the insurer subject to the resolution shall bear the losses after the shareholders, in accordance with the order of priority of their debts in the ordinary insolvency procedure, unless expressly provided otherwise in the law;
c) the management body and the senior management of the insurer subject to the resolution are replaced, excepting the cases when the full or partial keeping of the management body or of the senior management, according to circumstances, is considered necessary to achieve the objectives of the resolution;
d) the management body and the senior management of the insurer subject to the resolution provides all the support necessary to achieve the objectives of the resolution;
e) the natural persons and legal entities who have contributed to the major difficulty of the insurer subject to the resolution are held liable, according to the civil or criminal law;
f) the creditors in the same category are equally treated;
g) no creditor shall bear losses higher than those which would have been borne if the insurer had been liquidated by ordinary insolvency procedure;
h) the assets admitted to cover the technical reserves are fully protected; and
i) the resolution measures are taken in compliance with the safety mechanisms (article 44).[13]

3.6. The administrator of the resolution

In order to carry out the measures set out in the resolution, the Financial Supervisory Authority, in its capacity of resolution authority, in compliance with the state aid legal framework, may appoint an administrator of the resolution in order to replace the management body of the institution subject to the resolution, in which case the appointment is made public.

According to the law, the administrator of the resolution is any natural person or legal entity, including the policyholders' Guarantee Fund, appointed by the Financial Supervisory Authority in order to implement the resolution measures (article 2, point 2).

The administrator of the resolution has all powers of the shareholders and of the insurer's management body. However, the administrator of the resolution may exercise such powers only under the control of the Financial Supervisory Authority (article 50).

According to the law, the administrator of the resolution has the obligation to take all the necessary measures to achieve the objectives of the resolution and to implement the resolution measures, in accordance with the decision of the Financial Supervisory Authority. The resolution measures may include a capital increase, the change of the shareholders structure of that insurer or the taking over of the control by the insurers with an adequate financial strength.

The administrator of the resolution has the obligation to draw up and submit to the Financial Supervisory Authority, on a regular basis established by it, as well as at the beginning and at the end of his mandate, reports on the economic and financial situation of the insurer to whom he/she has been appointed as administrator of the resolution and the actions undertaken during the exercise of his/her duties.

The mandate of an administrator of the resolution cannot exceed one year. It may be renewed, in exceptional cases, if the Financial Supervisory Authority considers that the conditions for the appointment of an administrator of the resolution are still met (article 54).

[13] The principles of the resolution are partly different from the principles of the insolvency procedure provided by the Law no. 85/2016, for details, see St. D. Cărpenaru, M-A Hotca, V. Nemeș, cited works, page 67, page 30 and the next ones; R. Bufan, Cărpenaru, R. Bufan, A. D. Diaconescu, F. Moțiu (collectively), cited works, page 61 and the next ones; N. Țăndăreanu, cited works, page 20 and the next ones.

It is noted that the duties of the administrator of the resolution are similar to those of the temporary administrator[14].

In the absence of explicit and detailed provisions regarding the situations and the conditions for the appointment of the two categories of bodies, FSA will be the only one who will choose one of the two options. The cause is common, namely the insufficiency or lack of competence of the administrative and management bodies of the insurer found in a financial difficulty.

3.7. The assessment of the insurer subject to the resolution

Before undertaking any resolution measure, is required a fair, prudent and realistic assessment of the insurer's assets, liabilities and equity, which will be performed by a financial auditor - a legal entity.

The objective of the assessment is to determine the value of the assets and liabilities of the insurer who fulfills the conditions for triggering the resolution (article 57).

The purposes of the assessment are:

- to support the assessment of the manner in which the conditions for triggering the resolution or the conditions for the decrease or conversion of the debts into relevant capital instruments are met;
- if the conditions for triggering the resolution are met, to contribute to the decision on the appropriate resolution action to be undertaken in relation to the insurer;
- upon exercising the power to decrease the value or to convert the debts into relevant capital instruments, to contribute to the decision on the extent to which the shares or other proprietary tools are canceled or reduced, as well as the extent to which the decrease or conversion of the debts into relevant capital instruments occur;
- upon applying the bridge institution tool or the asset separation tool, to contribute to the decision on the assets, rights, liabilities, shares or other proprietary tools to be transferred and the decision on the value of any consideration to be paid to the insurer subject to the resolution or, as the case may be, to the owners of the shares or other proprietary tools;
- upon applying the sales tool for the business and portfolio, to contribute to the decision on the assets, rights, liabilities, shares or other proprietary tools to be transferred and to provide information enabling the Financial Supervisory Authority to determine what measures are necessary for a transfer, according to the law;
- in all the cases, to ensure that any losses concerning the insurer's assets are fully assumed when applying the resolution tools (article 58).

The law provides that the assessment is an integral part of the decision to apply a resolution tool or to exercise a resolution power or of the decision to exercise the power to decrease the amount or to convert the debts into relevant capital instruments.

3.8. The resolution tools in the insurance field

The resolution procedure in the insurance field is carried out by various legal means bearing the specific name of "resolution tools".

According to the Law no. 246/2015, the resolution tools in the insurance field are:

1. the sale of business and portfolio;
2. the bridge institution;
3. the asset separation[15].

The resolution tools may be established by the FSA, individually or in any combination, in compliance with the law, but the asset separation tool can be applied only together with another resolution tool (article 70).

3.8.1. The sale of business and portfolio

In accordance with the provisions of the Law no. 246/2015, the sales tool of business and insurance portfolio is the mechanism by which a resolution authority transfers shares or other proprietary tools, issued by an insurer subject to the resolution, or assets, rights or liabilities of an insurer subject to the resolution, in whole or in part, to an asset management vehicle or to an insurer who fulfills the solvency requirements.

According to the Law no. 246/2015 (article 2, point 42), the asset management vehicle in the insurance field is the legal entity controlled by the Financial Supervisory Authority and created to receive, in whole or in part, the assets, rights and liabilities of one or more insurers subject to the resolution or of a bridge institution.

For the implementation of the sales tool of the activity and portfolio of an insurer, the Law (article 73) provides that the Financial Supervisory Authority may transfer to a buyer who is not a bridge institution:

- shares or other proprietary tools issued by an insurer subject to the resolution;
- any categories of assets, rights or liabilities of an insurer found in resolution or all of them, including the transfer of portfolio in the insurance field.

For carrying out the transfer is not required the agreement of the shareholders of the insurer subject to the resolution or of any third party, other than the buyer, or the compliance of any procedural requirement provided by the civil law or by the legislation specific to the insurance market, except as provided in articles 89 and 90 of the Law. However, the transfer must be carried out in compliance with the provisions of the [14] It is easy to see that the prerogatives of the administrator of the resolution are almost identical to those specific to the judicial administrator in the judicial reorganization procedure within the insolvency chapter of the common law, see St. D. Cărpenaru, M-A Hotca, V. Nemeș, cited works, page 177 and the next ones; R. Bufan, Cărpenaru, R. Bufan, A. D. Diaconescu, F. Moțiu (collectively), cited works, page 154 and the next ones; N. Țăndăreanu, cited works, page 204 and the next ones.

[15] As can be seen, the resolution of insurers lacks the internal recapitalization tool provided by article 281 and the next ones of the Law no. 312/2015.

Law no. 32/2000 and in accordance with the legal framework on the state aid.

The price of the transferred assets is paid, as the case may be, to the owners of the shares or of other proprietary tools or to the insurer subject to the resolution if the transfer aims the assets or liabilities of the insurer found in resolution.

An extremely important effect caused by the transfer of shares/tools/assets is that the shareholders or creditors of the insurer subject to the resolution and other third parties whose assets, rights or liabilities are not transferred have no right over the transferred assets, rights or liabilities or in connection therewith.

The law provides that, after applying the sales tool of the activity and portfolio, FSA may exercise, with the buyer's approval, the transfer powers in respect of the transferred assets, rights or liabilities for the transfer of the assets, rights or liabilities back to the insurer subject to the resolution or of the shares or other proprietary tools back to their original owners, and the insurer subject to the resolution or the original owners have the obligation to take back any such assets, rights or liabilities, shares or other proprietary tools (article 78).

If we consider that we are found in the presence of a transfer of assets, we can think that the transfer of a business or enterprise could also have some implications in the insurance field.[16] Although it is not legally enshrined under this terminology, the transfer of an enterprise is required by current economic evolutions, materialized in many operations of merger, conversion, division or outsourcing of certain types of services[17]. The transfer of assets is also regulated by the Tax Code, but unlike the provisions of the legislation in the insurance field where the price of the transferred assets is paid, as the case may be, to the owners of the shares or of other proprietary tools or to the insurer subject to the resolution, the article 32, paragraph 1, letter (d) of the Tax Code provides that, by the transfer of assets, a company transfers, without being dissolved, all or one or more branches of its business to another company in exchange for the transfer of the shareholdings representing the share capital of the beneficiary company.

3.8.2. The bridge institution

The bridge institution tool in the insurance field is defined as the mechanism by which a resolution authority transfers the shares or other proprietary tools, issued by an institution subject to the resolution, or the assets, rights or liabilities of an insurer subject to the resolution, to a bridge institution (article 2, point 25).

As can be seen, by the bridge institution tool, only shares and other proprietary tools may be transferred, and not the assets, rights or liabilities of an insurer subject to the resolution, as in the case of the sale of business and portfolio. In other words, the ability to acquire of the bridge institution is narrower than the ability of the management vehicle.

From the economy of the provisions of the Law no. 246/2015, the legal status of a bridge institution in the insurance field has the following features:

- is a legal entity set up as a joint stock company and it can be set up with only one shareholder;
- upon the setting up, the share capital cannot be less than the equivalent in RON of EUR two million;
- is controlled by the Financial Supervisory Authority;
- is designed to receive and to hold some or all the shares or other proprietary tools issued by an insurer subject to the resolution or some or all the assets, rights and liabilities of one or more insurers subject to the resolution in order to maintain the access to the critical functions and to the sale thereof;
- the persons who provide the management of the departments responsible for the risk management activities, internal audit, compliance, as well as any other activities which may expose that bridge institution to significant risks, are appointed by the FSA[18]. The bridge institution may acquire shares or other proprietary tools issued by an insurer subject to the resolution, as well as any assets, rights and liabilities of one or more insurers subject to the resolution. The transfer to the bridge institution shall be performed without the consent of the shareholders of the insurer subject to the resolution or of any third party and without complying with the procedural requirements provided by the Law no. 237/2015 for the authorization and supervision of the insurance and reinsurance activity.

The price of the shares and other proprietary tools shall be paid to their owners and the price of the assets or liabilities shall be paid directly to the insurer subject to the resolution.

Like the other resolution tools, the FSA may transfer:

- shares or other proprietary tools or assets, rights and liabilities from the bridge institution to a third party;
- rights, assets or liabilities from the bridge institution back to the insurer subject to the resolution or shares and other proprietary tools back to their original owners, and the insurer subject to the resolution or the original owners have the obligation to take them back, provided that this aspect is expressly stipulated in the tool by which the transfer was made or if the transfer conditions are not met (article 93).

The loss of the legal status of a bridge institution in the insurance field occurs in accordance with the provisions of article 95 of the Law no. 246/2015 in the following situations:

[16] See L.Tuleașcă, Transfer of business, Romanian Journal of Business Law no. 7/2016, pages 53-71

[17] Transfer of enterprise. Categories of employees, Court of Appeal, Bucharest, the 7th Civil Department and for labor disputes, the civil decision no. 3951 of June 12, 2012, sent, in the summary and with an approving comment, by the Judge Dr. Romeo Glodeanu, Romanian Journal of Jurisprudence no. 5 dated May 31, 2012, https://idrept.ro

[18] See St. D. Cărpenaru, M-A Hotca, V. Nemeș, cited works, page 663

- the merger of the bridge institution with another entity;
- the bridge institution no longer complies with the requirements provided by law;
- the transfer of all or part of the assets, rights or liabilities of the bridge institution to a third party takes place;
- a period of two years elapsed from the date of the last transfer from an insurer subject to the resolution or at the end of the extension period;
- the assets of the bridge institution are completely liquidated, and its liabilities are fully paid.

It is noted that the occurrence of any of the above mentioned situations entails the cessation of the existence of the bridge institution in the insurance field.

3.8.3. The asset separation

The asset separation tool in the insurance field is the mechanism by which a resolution authority transfers an insurance portfolio of an insurer subject to the resolution to an asset management vehicle.

Upon applying the asset separation tool, the Financial Supervisory Authority may order the transfer of the assets, rights or liabilities of an insurer subject to the resolution or of a bridge institution to one or more asset management vehicles. Like the other resolution tools, the asset separation tool does not require the consent of the shareholders of the insurers subject to the resolution or of any third party, other than the bridge institution and does not require the compliance of any procedural requirement provided by law.

As shown above, the asset management vehicle in the insurance field is the legal entity controlled by the Financial Supervisory Authority and created in order to receive, in whole or in part, the assets, rights and liabilities of one or more insurers subject to the resolution or of a bridge institution.

In the process of setting up and operating an asset management vehicle, the Financial Supervisory Authority has the following powers:

- approves the content of the documents regarding the setting up of the asset management vehicle;
- appoints or approves the management body of the asset management vehicle;
- approves the remunerations of the members of the management body and establishes their responsibilities;
- approves the strategy and the risk profile of the asset management vehicle (article 115).

According to the law, the Financial Supervisory Authority may order the application of the asset separation tool only if one of the following conditions is met:

- the situation on the specific market of those assets is such that their liquidation under the normal insolvency procedure could have a negative effect on one or more financial markets;
- such a transfer is necessary to ensure the proper operation of the insurer subject to the resolution or of the bridge institution; or
- such a transfer is necessary to maximize the proceeds from the liquidation.

The Financial Supervisory Authority shall also determine the consideration in exchange for which the assets, rights and liabilities are transferred to the asset management vehicle, in accordance with the principles provided by law and with the legal framework on the state aid.

The Financial Supervisory Authority can also transfer assets, rights and liabilities from the insurer subject to the resolution to one or more asset management vehicles, several times, and can transfer back assets, rights and liabilities of one or more asset management vehicles of the assets to the insurer subject to the resolution, and the insurer subject to the resolution has the obligation to take back any such assets, rights and liabilities (article 120).

4. The reduction in the value of the capital instruments

The Financial Supervisory Authority may order the reduction or conversion, as applicable, of the debts of the insurer subject to the resolution, regardless of the actual method, in relevant capital instruments (article 126).

The reduction or conversion of the debts in relevant capital instruments operates if one of the following conditions is met:

a) if the Financial Supervisory Authority has determined that all the conditions for triggering the resolution provided by law have been met before the implementation of a resolution measure;
b) the Financial Supervisory Authority establishes that, if the power is not exercised in respect of the relevant capital instruments, the insurer will cease to be viable.

The law provides that an insurer is no longer viable if the following conditions are cumulatively met:

- the insurer is or is likely to be in a difficult situation;
- the alternative measures in the private sector, the supervisory measures, including early intervention measures, excepting the measure of reduction of value or conversion into capital, taken individually or combined with another resolution measure, are not likely to eliminate the difficult situation of the insurer;
- there is no reasonable perspective according to which an insurer's difficulty could be hindered in due time by a measure, either an alternative measure in the private sector or a supervisory measure, including an early intervention measure, a measure of reduction of value or conversion of the debts in relevant capital instruments, taken individually or combined with a resolution action (article 128).

5. Security and funding mechanisms

During the implementation of the resolution instruments, the Financial Supervisory Authority has the obligation to comply with the security and funding mechanisms specifically regulated by law.

Specifically, the article 133 of the Law no. 246/2015 provides that the Financial Supervisory Authority shall ensure that, in cases where one or more resolution tools have been applied and only certain parts of the rights, assets and liabilities of the insurer found in resolution are transferred, the shareholders and those creditors whose debts have not been transferred shall receive, as a settlement of their debts, an amount at least equal to the amount which would have been received if the insurer found in resolution had been liquidated by the insolvency procedure when taking the decisions regarding the implementation of the resolution measures.

As regards the funding mechanisms, shall be set up, pursuant to the law, the Resolution Fund for the insurers whose resources are used according to the objectives and principles of the resolution and it will be managed by the policyholders' Guarantee Fund.

Conclusions

From the analysis of the above mentioned regulations, it is noted that the specific measures and the resolution tools are very different from the mechanisms and procedures applicable to the common law professionals, mainly regulated by the Law no. 85/2016.

Moreover, the resolution procedure with the specific implementation tools is a complex mechanism for identifying, preventing and recovering the patrimonial situations of the insurers having a poor financial situation.

In order to achieve the purpose of the resolution, the Financial Supervisory Authority is entitled to implement the measures provided by law which are thus mandatory both for the insurer subject to the resolution and for those persons holding shares in the share capital of that insurer.

Finally, the main purpose of the resolution is to protect the legitimate interests and the rights of the insurance creditors, by implementing all the measures provided by law, for recovering the financial situation, in order to prevent the insolvency and to avoid the bankruptcy procedure of the insurers in financial difficulty.

References

- St. D. Cărpenaru, M-A Hotca, V. Nemeș, the commented Insolvency Code, 2nd Edition, revised and supplemented, Universul Juridic / Legal Universe Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017
- V. Nemeș, Insurance Law, 4th Edition, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2012
- R. Bufan, A. D. Diaconescu, F. Moțiu (collectively) Practical Insolvency Treaty, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014
- N. Țăndăreanu, Commented Insolvency Code, Universul Juridic / Legal Universe Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017
- L. Grynbaun (collectively), Assurances, Acteur. Contract. Risques desconsommateurs. Risques des entreprises, L'Argus editions de l'assurance, 2018
- G. Cassano, R. Razzante, N. Tilli, M. Distasi, M. Iaselli, A. Macrillo, V. Aragona, A. Catricala, Diritto delle assicurazioni. Questioni risarcitorie e liquidazione danni, Giuffre editione, Milano, 2017
- R. Blanpain, P. Lyngs, International Encyclopedia of Laws, Kluwer International Publishing House, Boston, 1992
- Droit des assurances, 3e ed., Larcier Publishing House, Bruxelles, 2006
- J.S. Capdeville, M. Storkp, R. Routier, M. Mignot, J.-Ph. Kovar, N. Ereseo, Droit bancaire, Daloz, 2017
- L.Tuleaşcă, Transfer of business, Romanian Journal of Business Law no. 7/2016
- Transfer of enterprise. Categories of employees, Court of Appeal, Bucharest, the 7th Civil Department and for labor disputes, the civil decision no. 3951 of June 12, 2012, sent, in the summary and with an approving comment, by the Judge Dr. Romeo Glodeanu, Romanian Journal of Jurisprudence no. 5 dated May 31, 2012, https://idrept.ro

THEORETICAL AND PRACTICAL ASPECTS REGARDING LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANIES

Radu Ștefan PĂTRU*

Abstract

Limited liability companies represent an important category of companies within the Romanian legislative system. Being on the border between partnerships and the capital companies in terms of legal regime, these categories of companies offer several advantages to their members by taking over the favorable features from partnerships and the capital companies. In this study, we will analyse the essential aspects relating to the legal regime of limited liability companies. LLC was first regulated in 1990, Law no. 31/1990 (of companies) offering a new category of company that takes over the main characteristics of the major categories of companies. While retaining a closed nature in terms of the maximum number of associates, 50, as well as in the matter of social parts, that can not be transmitted except under the strict exceptions provided by law, LLC presents a real advantage over the minimum amount of the share capital , respectively 200 lei, but also in the matter of the liability of the associates, who answer only in the limit of the contribution brought to society. Here are two nuances that place this societal category in a more favorable situation than other forms of doing business. These considerations have led to a significant increase in the number of LLCs in the national economy, moreover, at present, this societal category is the most encountered. In this study, will be mentioned the categories of contribution that can be brought to society as well as the attributions of the representative bodies. The analysis will also cover aspects regarding the facilities offered by the legislator for the young people who open their LLC for the first time. The ability of professionals to conduct a single member LLC business will be analyzed from the point of view of practical considerations, respectively relative to the status of authorized natural person or a sole proprietorship. The advantages of single member LLC will be balanced against the benefits of authorized natural person and sole proprietorship to provide a clear picture between these categories of professionals. In the matter of the practical aspects of the subject, a case will also be examined regarding the dissolution of LLC.

Keywords: limited liability companies, legal regime, first-time LLC, single-member LLC, registration, operation.

1. Introduction

The Law no. 31/1990 on companies[1] regulates the company categories such as partnerships characterized by their limited character, e.g. general partnerships and limited partnerships[2], the capital companies and joint-stock companies, the partnerships limited by shares and the limited liability companies which combine characteristics from the two large categories of companies mentioned above.

The limited liability company was regulated for the first time in the internal legislative frame through the Law no. 31/1990.

This form of society was initially regulated in Germany, and subsequently the limited liability company was taken over in the French law as well[3].

The advantages of the limited liability company consist in the reduced capital at the time of set up, namely 200 lei, partners' liability which is limited to their contributions to the share capital, a relatively large number of partners that may set up the company (50 at most) and the possibility to have a vast object of activity.

The legal regime in terms of shares, which usually cannot be alienated, makes the LLC be quite similar to partnerships.

The Romanian legislator openly regulates the limited liability company by instituting the legal framework both for LLC with a sole partner, and provisions to encourage the young entrepreneurs to initiate a business within this form of company through a first-time LLC.

2. Limited liability companies. Legal regime[4]

2.1. General aspects

The articles of incorporation of the limited liability company are made up of the memorandum of association and the articles of association.

Just like the other company forms, the LLC acquires legal personality from the moment of its registration to the Trade Registry[5].

* Assistant professor, PhD, Law Department of Bucharest University of Economic Studies (e-mail: radupatru2007@yahoo.com)

[1] Republished in O.J., Part I, no. 1066 of November 17, 2004.

[2] The categories of companies have been defined in the doctrine as archaic forms of companies that are more and more rarely used nowadays. See C. Păun, Dreptul afacerilor. Teoria. Profesioniștii. Impozitarea. Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, pp. 99 – 101.

[3] For more details see C. Lefter, Societatea cu răspundere limitată în dreptul comparat, Ed. Didactică și Pedagogică, Bucharest, 1993.

[4] See S. Cărpenaru, Tratat de drept comercial, Ediția a V a actualizată, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, pp. 373 – 398.

[5] As for the legal regime of LLC see G. T. Nicolescu, Drept societar, Curs universitar, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2018, pp. 91 – 124.

Pursuant to article 7 of the Law no. 31/1990, the articles of incorporation contain the following information: partners' identification data, the form, name and headquarters, company's object of activity mentioning the main activity, the share capital, the contribution in cash or in kind of each partner, the value of in kind contribution and the manner of evaluation. The number of nominal value of shares and the number of shares attributed to each partner for their contribution, the partners who represent and manage the company or the non-partner administrators, their identification data, the powers they have been given and if they are going to exercise them together or separately, the censors or the financial auditor, the identification data of the first censors, and of the first financial auditor, each partner's share of benefits and losses, the secondary headquarters – braches, agencies, representation offices or other similar units without legal personality - if they are set up simultaneously with the company or the conditions for their subsequent set up, if such a set up is envisaged, company's duration, the manner of company's dissolution and liquidation shall be specified for the limited liability companies.

The general assembly of partners represents company's management body as is the case with other companies provided under the law.

The General Meeting of Associates has the following main obligations: a) to approve the annual financial statement and to determine the distribution of the net profit; b) to designate the administrators and censors, to revoke them and to dismiss them, and to decide the contracting of the financial audit, if it is not binding, according to the law; c) to decide the prosecution of the administrators and the censors for the damages caused to the company, also designating the person who has the duty to exercise it; d) amend the constitutive act.

The administrators are obliged to convene the assembly of the associates at the registered office, at least once a year or whenever necessary.

An associate or a number of associates, representing at least one fourth of the share capital, may request the convening of the general meeting, indicating the purpose of the convocation.

The convocation of the meeting shall be in the form provided for in the constitutive act, and in the absence of a special provision, by registered letter, at least 10 days before the day set for its maintenance, the agenda shall be presented (Article 195 law).

In the case of limited liability companies with a single associate, it will exercise the attributions of the general meeting of the associates of the company.

The sole member shall immediately notify in writing any decision. The sole associate may be the employee of the limited liability company whose sole counterpart is.

Company's management is carried out by one or several administrators, natural or legal persons designated under the conditions of the articles of incorporation[6].

The Law no. 31/1990 institutes administrators' civil liability for the damages produced to the company. It is obvious that partners' liability may be cumulated with misdemeanor or even criminal liability according to the committed deeds.

In what concern the management audit within the limited liability company, this is carried out by one or several censors (in the latter case the number of censor shall be uneven)[7].

As for the work relationships within a LLC, administrators act on the basis of a mandate legal relationship as they cannot have the quality of company's employees.

If administrators are elected among employees, they shall suspend their employment contracts until the end of the administrator mandate.

Apart from the administrator, employees that carry out their activity in accordance with the work legislation may be hired in a LLC.

As for the contributions brought to this form of company, the legislator has established the contribution in cash as being mandatory, the partners having the opportunity to bring a contribution in kind. The contribution in receivables is not possible for this form of company[8].

The legislator has broadly established the following rights for the LLC partners[9]: the right of information, the right to vote, the right to ask for the carrying out of surveys, the right to resort to law courts, the right to withdraw from the company, and the right to profit.

As for profit, the share capital is divided into shares having an equal value, the minimum value of a share being 10 lei.

Shares have the following features: they are indivisible, non-transferable and non-negotiable.

The legislator stipulates certain situations in which shares may be transferred, namely:

- between the LLC partners if the General assembly allowed it;
- to third parties with the approval of the general assembly through the vote of partners holding at least ¾ of the share capital;
- to the heirs of the deceased partner but only if a clause of continuation with heirs has been provided in the articles of incorporation.

[6] For company management see L. Tuleașcă, Drept comercial. Comercianții. Ediție revăzută și adăugită, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2018, pp. 280 – 324.

[7] See St. D. Cărpenaru, Gh. Piperea, S. David, Legea societăților. Comentariu pe articole, Ediția 5, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, pp. 648 and next.

[8] As for contributions see F. C. Stoica, Dreptul societar. Note de curs, Ediția a II a revăzută și adăugită, ASE Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, pp. 66 – 69.

[9] C. Păun, op. cit. pp. 119 – 120.

The cases of dissolution of the limited liability company are the common law situations applicable to other legal persons as well.

As a practical matter regarding the dissolution of LLC, we present the following case: By request to the Constanta Court of Appeal, the applicant SC A & N I. SRL requested that the court decision to declare the lawfulness of the decision on the division of SC A & N I. SRL, 238 par. (3) of the Law no. 31/1990, by detaching part of its patrimony and sending it to other 6 companies, as well as the modifying act and having their registration in the Trade Register.

The action was addressed to the Constanţa Court of Appeals because the Constanţa Tribunal rejected the application for division of the company as unfounded because one of the six companies involved in the division did not submit the decision on the approval of the division, thus the provisions stipulated in art. 246 par. (1) and art. 243 par. (2) of the Law no. 31/1990 (of companies).

The applicant company based its claim on the provisions of Art. art. 283 par. (3) of the Law no. 31/1990 and art. 304, point 9 of the Civil Proceedings Code, arguing that, for reasons unrelated to the applicant, the summons did not arrive in time, so that they were unable to comply with the court's demands and, on the other hand, all the six companies signed the decision of the General Assembly of the Associations on the division, which is apparent from the above-mentioned document attached to the file.

Moreover, the divestment procedure was of fundamental importance for the companies concerned because of the specificity of the company (taxi services), the extension of the transport licenses was necessary, which also justified the division.

The Constanta Court of Appeal accepted the application filed by the company concerned under Art. 238 par. (3) of the Law no. 31/1990 which states that "the merger or division of companies may also take place between companies of different forms".

Division is a particularly important event in the life of a society that is based on the exclusive will of associates manifested in accordance with legal requirements.

The Court's judgment was also based on the following points [10]:

- the provisions of art. 246 of Law no. 31/1990 stipulating that: (1) Within 3 months from the date of publication of the draft merger or division in one of the ways provided by art. 242, the general meeting of each participating company shall decide on the merger or division, subject to the conditions for its convocation. 2. In the event of a merger by the establishment of a new company or division by the formation of new companies, the draft terms of merger or division and, if contained in a separate document, the instrument of incorporation or the draft constitutive act of the new companies will be approved by the general meeting of each of the companies that are about to cease to exist;
- another important aspect was the increased interest of the associates in achieving the division of the company (financial issues and the extension of the transport authorizations);
- from the corroboration of art. 246 par. (2) with art. 238 par. (1) lit. a) which provides that one or more companies are dissolved without going into liquidation and transfer all their assets to another company in exchange for the distribution to the shareholders of the company or companies absorbed by the shares in the acquiring company and possibly a cash payment of maximum 10% of the nominal value of the shares thus distributed, the court concluded that the approval of the draft of merger or division by the general meeting of each company that ceases its existence would no longer be necessary, only the report and the arrangements for informing the general meeting by art. 243 index 2 LSC.

Moreover, the administrative evidence resulted from the fact that the decision of the General Assembly of the Associates of the company that had separated from the mother company was later filed, so that in this context the decision of the court of first instance appears to be erroneous.

In view of the above, we believe that the solution of the Constanţa Court of Appeal is judicious, because the court of first instance erroneously rejected SC A & N I. SRL's request for division.

2.2. Practical aspects: single-member LLC, NAP (natural authorized person) or Sole proprietorship (SP).

The practical realities impose a series of decisions to professionals that will influence the proper functioning of their business.

Such an aspect is the choice of business form, especially when the natural person professional can choose among several quite similar organization forms.

The single-member LLC gives the holder a series of advantages such as the liability limited only to the share capital, holder’s possibility to be the employee of such company, and a vast range of options in terms of the object of activity.

The disadvantages of this form of organization are the relatively high registration fees and the double entry accounting system, therefore each single-member LLC must resort to the services of an accountant.

As for the natural authorized person, they have the opportunity to select among 5 NACE fields of activity and to hire 3 employees at most.

An advantage in relation to the LLC is the simple-entry accounting system that may be carried out by the NAP without resorting to the services of an accountant.

The main disadvantage for a NAP in relation to single-member LLC is the liability, thus the NAP shall answer with their entire fortune as a supplement to the patrimony by appropriation, a fact that represents an important disadvantage.

[10] Ibidem.

As for the sole proprietorships, the situation is similar to that of NAP, with the only difference that the holder of a sole proprietorship has the possibility to hire 8 employees and to select among 10 NACE domains.

The aspects shown above lead to the conclusion that, in principle, the single-member LLC is an optimal solution for the business carried out by natural persons in conditions more advantageous than those offered by G.E.O. 44/2008 on the performance of economic activities by self-employed persons, sole proprietorships and family businesses[11].

Despite all that, the carrying out of business as a NAP or SP may be a good solution according to the specificity or the selected type of business.

2.3. First-time LLC

G.E.O. no. 6/2011 on the stimulation of set up and development of microenterprises by the first-time entrepreneurs[12] regulates the possibility for the young entrepreneurs to carry out businesses as a first-time LLC since they enjoy certain benefits from the state.

The beneficiaries, who are natural persons having their full capacity of exercise, shall meet the following conditions (article 2 from G.E.O. no. 6/2011):

- not to have held or not to hold the quality of shareholder or partner of an enterprise set up in the European economic area;
- to set up for the first time a limited liability company under the conditions of the Company law no. 31/1990, as republished;
- to declare by taking their own responsibility that they meet the condition mentioned above;

The company set up shall meet the following conditions (article 3 of G.E.O. no. 6/2011):

- to be a limited liability company (LLC),
- to fall into the category of microenterprises under the conditions of the Law no. 346/2004, as subsequently amended and supplemented, on the 2011 on the stimulation of set up and development of small and medium enterprises, and of GEO no. 6/2011;
- to be set up by a first-time entrepreneur as sole partner or by 5 (five) first-time entrepreneurs at most. The conditions for the first-time entrepreneur must be met by each partner separately;
- to be managed by the sole partner or by one or more administrators selected among partners;
- to have in the object of activity 5 (five) groups of activity at most among the ones provided in the classification of activities in the national economy in force (NACE Rev 2). The following activities cannot be included in the 5 (five) groups of activity as company's object of activity: financial brokerage and insurances, real estate transactions, gambling and betting activities, production and sale of armament, ammunitions, explosives, tobacco, alcohol, substances under national control, narcotic and psychotropic plants, substances and preparations, as well as the activities excluded by the European standards for which no state aid can be granted.

3. Conclusions

The limited liability company is a representative category of companies among the ones provided in the Law no. 31/1990 (on companies).

Borrowing characteristics from partnerships and capital companies and improving certain aspects in the legal regime thereof, the LLC is an advantageous choice both for the jointly carrying out of a business by several partners and in case of a single-member LLC.

Regarding the way of organizing LLC as we have shown, these categories of societies have a way of organization similar to the others, so the leadership is carried out by the General Assembly of the Associates, the administration by an administrator or several in an odd number, not excluding the presence of a board within this category of society.

Management control can be achieved, as we have submitted by the associates themselves, and if the number of associates is greater than 15, the presence of censors is mandatory.

The advantages of a LLC mainly consist in the reasonable value of the share capital and partners' limited liability.

The advantages to the capital companies are mainly reflected in the minimum amount of the share capital - 200 lei and in the way of administration of the company, without the unitary or dualist system as in the joint-stock companies. The main advantage over the partnership societies is the responsibility of the associates limited to the social contribution brought to the firm.

To facilitate the set up of LLC by young entrepreneurs, the legislator has, through first-time LLC programme, offered certain advantages to the young entrepreneurs mainly through their exemption from certain taxes and fees.

References

- S. Cărpenaru, Tratat de Drept comercial, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016
- F. C. Stoica, Drept societar - Note de curs, ASE Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017
- C. Păun, Dreptul afacerilor. Teoria. Profesioniștii. Impozitarea. Curs universitar, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015
- L. Tuleașcă, Drept comercial. Comercianții. Ediție revăzută și adăugită, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2018

[11] Published in the O.J. no. 328/April 25, 2008.
[12] Published in the O.J. Part I, no. 103 of February 9, 2011.

- G. T. Nicolescu, Drept societar, Curs universitar, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2018.
- C. Lefter, Societatea cu răspundere limitată în dreptul comparat, Ed. Didactică și Pedagogică, Bucharest, 1993
- St. D. Cărpenaru, Gh. Piperea, S. David, Legea societăţilor. Comentariu pe articole, Ediţia 5, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014
- Law no. 31/1990 (on companies)
- G.E.O. no. 6/2011 on the stimulation of se up and development of microenterprises by first-tie entrepreneurs
- G.E.O. no. 44/2008 on the performance of economic activities by self-employed persons, sole proprietorships and family businesses
- www.portal-just.ro

CONSIDERATIONS REGARDING THE LEGAL REGIME OF JOINT – STOCK COMPANIES SET UP BY PUBLIC SUBSCRIPTION

Radu Ștefan PĂTRU*

Abstract

Capital companies (joint stock companies and partnerships limited by shares) may be set up under the Law no. 31/1990 (on companies)[1] by instantaneous subscription or by public subscription. The companies set up by public subscription have certain features that make them stand out within the system of companies regulated by the national law. We mention that these categories of societies have the same legal regime as the societies that are constituted by instantaneous subscription, there are only a few different aspect which makes them more particular. An essential aspect that specifies these categories of companies is the prospectus. It is an official document drawn up in authentic form, having essentially the same content as the constitutive document, less the data on administrators and censors. The prospectus, which necessarily includes the subscription end date, must be signed by the founding members and submitted for validation to the trade registry. This document is very important since the subscription of the shares is on the back of the prospectus. A particularly important aspect within these categories of companies is the legal status of the founding members who enjoy certain additional prerogatives in relation to the shareholders who subsequently enter the company by filling in the prospectus. However, the legislator limited the advantages that the founding members have, so that their influence in the firm is not discretionary, and there is a balance imposed by the legislator on the relations between the shareholders. Regarding the categories of contribution, as we shall present in the text, the legislator has, in principle, established the possibility of bringing the same contributions in these categories of companies as in joint stock companies constituted by instantaneous subscription, except for receivables. A particular peculiarity of this typology of society is the legal regime of the constituent Assembly of Shareholders that takes place after the fulfillment of the general legal conditions and of the publicity stipulated by the law. In this text we will analyse the aspects related to the main characteristics of this category of companies mentioned above.

Keywords: capital companies, joint stock companies, public subscription, prospectus.

1. Introduction

Capital companies are regulated by the legislator under two forms, namely joint stock companies and partnerships limited by shares.

The main characteristic of the capital companies is their intuitu pecuniae character. If the partnerships are set up by taking into consideration the personal qualities of their members and they have a close character of intuitu personae type, the capital companies are set up according to strictly financial criteria, the personal relation among its members being irrelevant.

This fact results from the minimum value of the share capital required by law for the legal setting up of these categories of companies, namely 90000 lei or the equivalent of 30000 Euros.

Capital companies may be set up by instantaneous subscription or public subscription.

The instantaneous subscription takes place through the full and simultaneous subscription of the share capital by the founders under legal conditions and the articles of incorporation.

The public subscription consists in the invitation of the public to become a shareholder in the capital company set up by the founding members.

The joint – stock companies set up by public subscription are termed open company or public owned company[1].

Subscription is made by means of a prospectus that must meet the substantive and formal conditions established by law for the validity thereof.

In the following lines we will present the main aspects relating to the legal regime applicable to the joint-stock companies set up by public subscription.

2. Capital companies set up by public subscription. Legal regime[2]

2.1. The prospectus[3]

The central document for the authorization of these companies is the prospectus.

The prospectus is the document drawn up in written form under the sanction of absolute nullity by the founding members of a company which, similarly to the provisions of the articles of incorporation, contains the essential aspects relating to the operation

* Assistant professor, PhD, Law Department of Bucharest University of Economic Studies (e-mail: radupatru2007@yahoo.com)

[1] Republished in O.J. no. 1066/November 17, 2004.

[1] See F. C. Stoica, C. Ene, Business Law, Business Organisations, ASE Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p. 55.

[2] For the set up of companies, see S. Cărpenaru, Tratat de Drept comercial, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, pp. 314 – 323.

[3] For prospectus see F. C. Stoica, Drept societar - Note de curs, ASE Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, pp. 55 – 58.

of the company to which the date of subscription closure is added.

Unlike a company's articles of incorporation, the prospectus does not contain provisions regarding the administrators or censors. The prospectus is mandatorily signed by the founding members.

In the doctrine there is a dispute regarding the legal regime of the founding members in terms of the difference of legal regime between them and the founding members of a capital company set up by instantaneous subscription.

We support the opinion according to which the founding members of a joint-stock company set up by public subscription have the same legal regime and status as the members of a company set up by instantaneous subscription[4].

The particular aspect of this company typology is the fact that the founding members represent the central nucleus manifesting an active role in attracting other members into the company.

As for the content of the prospectus, the Law no. 297/2004 on the capital market[5] stipulates as follows in article 84: the offer prospectus shall contain the information which, according to issuer's characteristics and the securities offered to the public, is necessary to the investors in order to make an informed evaluation regarding the situation of assets and liabilities, the financial situation, profit and loss, the perspectives of the issuer and of the entity guaranteeing the fulfillment of the obligations assumed by the issuer, if necessary, as well as of the rights afferent to such securities[6].

(2) The offer prospectus shall be valid for 12 months after the approval thereof by C.N.V.M., and it may be used in many issues of securities in this interval, provided that it is updated under article 179.

(3) The prospectus also contains a summary presenting in a concise and non-technical language the essential information in the language in which the prospectus was initially elaborated. The form and content of the prospectus summary provide together with the prospectus adequate information about the essential elements of the securities in question to help investors to decide whether they want to invest in such securities.

(4) The summary is drawn up in a common form to facilitate comparison with the summaries afferent to some similar securities and contains essential information relating to the securities in question to help investors to decide whether they want to invest in such securities. The summary must also contain a warning for the potential investors regarding the fact that:

a) it must be read as an introduction to the prospectus;
b) any investment decision must rely on the information contained in the prospectus considered in its entirety;
c) before the initiation of the judiciary procedure having as object the information contained in a prospectus, the plaintiff shall bear the costs relating to the translation of the prospectus into Romanian;
d) if the summary is misleading, is inconsistent or imprecise or it is contradictory in relation to other parts of the prospectus, the civil liability shall be incumbent on the persons who drew up the summary, including those who did the translation and the persons who notify about cross-border public offers.

As for the content of prospectus, the legislative instrument mentioned above also provides the following in article 85:

The prospectus may be drawn up in a unique form or a form with several components such as:

a) issuer's presentation sheet containing the information relating to them;
b) the note regarding the characteristics of securities offered or proposed to be accepted for trade in a regulated market
c) prospectus summary.

The judge delegated in the trade registry at company's headquarters shall rule on the legality of the prospectus and endorse the publication of the prospectus, if the validity conditions are met.

We wish to underline that the prospectus must be mandatorily endorsed by the National Securities Commission.

The delegated judge shall verify the following aspects relating to the prospectus:

a) if the prospectus contains the same information as that in the article of incorporation,
b) if the date of subscription closure is mentioned,
c) the authentic form and the signature of the prospectus by the founding members.

If the prospectus is concluded according to the legal conditions, the delegated judge shall authorize the publication of the prospectus in the trade registry and implicitly allow the opening of subscription.

The lack of any of the elements mentioned above shall result in the nullity of the prospectus if the founding members fail to remake the prospectus within the specified period of time.

As for the publicity formalities, the Law no. 297/2004 on the capital market stipulates in article 175 that the prospectus/offer document is considered to be available to the public in one of the following situations:

a) it is published in at least one printed or online newspaper, according to the European regulations in force regarding the content and publication of prospectuses as well as the broadcast of communiqués having an advertising character;
b) it may be obtained for free, on paper, by a potential investor at last at the headquarters of the offerer or [4] See C. Păun, Dreptul afacerilor. Teoria. Profesioniștii. Impozitarea. Curs universitar, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, p. 107.

[5] Published in the O.J. Part I, no. 571 of June 29, 2004.

[6] See S. Bodu, Tratat de Drept Societar, Volumul I, Rosetti Educational Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, pp. 372 – 405.

the intermediate of such offer, or at the headquarters of the regulated market operator in which the respective securities are accepted for trading;

c) it is published in electronic format on the website of the offerer or the offer intermediate;
d) it is published in electronic format on the website of the market operator where the trading of such securities is envisaged;
e) it is published in electronic format on the website of the National Securities Commission if the latter has decided to provide this service.

From the manner of formulation of the text it results that the legislator established the publicity sources for the prospectus alternatively and not cumulatively, therefore if the members publish the prospectus in any of the presented forms, the legal obligation is deemed as met.

2.2. Public subscription of shares

The public subscription of shares is made on the prospectus copies and represents the juridical operation by which a person called subscriber agrees to become a member of the company by completing the prospectus and implicitly through the submission of the capital contribution and receiving shares in exchange proportionally to the contribution submitted[7].

Pursuant to article 19 of the Law no. 31/1990, share subscriptions shall be made on one or several prospectus copies of founders endorsed by the delegated judge.

Subscription shall contain subscriber's last name and first name or name or headquarters, the number in letters of subscribed shares, the subscription date and the express declaration by which the subscriber knows of and accepts the prospectus.

Mention must be made of the fact that the contribution in receivables is not allowed for this type of company. As article 21 of the Law no. 31/1990 stipulates, the company may be set up only if the entire share capital has been subscribed and each acceptor has paid in cash half of the value of shares subscribed at Casa de Economii si Consemnatiuni - C.E.C. - S.A. or at a bank or one of the units thereof. The remainder of subscribed share capital shall be paid within 12 months since registration.

If public subscriptions exceed the share capital provided in the prospectus or are less than this, the founders shall ask for the approval of the constitutive assembly in terms of the increase or reduction, as the case may be, of the share capital at the level of subscription (article 22 of the Law no. 31/1990).

2.3. The constitutive assembly[8]

Founding members shall summon the Constitutive assembly under the law.

The Law no. 31/1990 stipulates as follows in article 20: within 15 days at the latest since the closure of subscription, the founders shall summon the constitutive assembly through a notice published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part IV, and in two widely distributed newspapers, 15 days before the date of the assembly.

The notice shall contain the place and time of assembly, which shall be within two months since the date of closure of subscription, and the issues that shall make the object of debates.

Founders shall draw up a list of those who, once they accepted the subscription, are entitled to participate to the constitutive assembly with the mention of the number of shares of each of them, under the law. This list shall be posted at the venue for the assembly at least 5 days before the assembly.

The assembly shall elect a chairperson and two or more secretaries. The participation of acceptors shall be recorded by attendance lists signed by each of them and endorsed by the chairperson and one of the secretaries.

Pursuant to article 28 of the Law no. 31/1990, the Constitutive assembly shall have the following obligations:

a) to check the existence of payments;
b) to analyse and validate the report of the experts who evaluate the contributions in cash;
c) to approve founders' contributions to profit and the operations concluded on company's behalf;
d) to discuss and approve company's articles of incorporation, the present members also representing the absent members for this purpose, and to designate those who will come for the authentication of the document and to fulfill the formalities required for the company set up;
e) to appoint the members of the management board, and of the supervisory board and the first censors or, as the case may be, the firs financial auditor.

2.4. Legal status of the founding members

The Law no. 31/1990 stipulates in articles 32-34 the rights held by the founding members in a company set up by public subscription.

The person whose quality of founding member has been recognized in the company's articles of incorporation shall have the quality of founding member under the law.

The constitutive assembly shall decide on the net profit share incumbent on the founders of a company set up by public subscription.

The share provided for founders cannot exceed 6% of the net profit and cannot be granted for a time period longer than 5 years since the date when the company was set up.

In case of increase of the share capital, founders' rights shall be exercised only over the profit corresponding to the initial share capital.

[7] For the set up of companies by public subscription see L. Tuleașcă, Drept comercial. Comercianții. Ediție revăzută și adăugită, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2018, pp. 216 – 218.

[8] See also G. T. Nicolescu, Drept societar, Curs universitar, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2018, 130 – 133.

The legislator did not give the founding members a discretionary right over company's profit thus limiting the share to maximum 6%.

In case of early dissolution of the company, founders shall be entitled to claim for damages from the company, if the dissolution took place to the detriment of their rights.

The right to the claim for damages shall be prescribed after 6 months have passed since the date of publication of the decision of the general meeting of shareholders who decided the early dissolution in the Official Journal of Romania, Part IV.

Founders' main obligation is to bear the costs relating to the set up of the company.

After the company has been set up, the founders shall, in the Constitutive assembly, deliver the entire documentation to the administrators who shall take over the prerogative of administration from founders.

3. Conclusions

The capital companies setup by public subscription represent a category of companies that have a different manner of setting up in relation to the capital companies that are set up by instantaneous subscription by involving certain special set up formalities.

We mention the fact that operation of these companies is identical in terms of the legal regime to the operation of the companies set up by instantaneous subscription with the following particularities that we highlight synthetically:

- to validly set up these companies it is necessary to fill in a document in authentic form called prospectus;
- the prospectus shall be validated by the delegated judge at the Trade Registry in the county where the company has its headquarters;
- shares shall be subscribed on the very copies of the prospectus;
- the National Securities Commission shall mandatorily endorse the prospectus;
- the contribution in receivables is forbidden for this category of companies;
- the Constitutive assembly summoned under the law shall approve company's articles of incorporation and fulfill the formalities necessary for company's operation;

The companies set up by public subscription are the expression of intuitu pecuniae character of the capital companies and are characteristic both to large businesses such as banking or leasing companies and smaller businesses where the founding members do not have sufficient share capital to start the business.

References

- S. Cărpenaru, Tratat de Drept comercial, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016
- F. C. Stoica, Drept societar - Note de curs, ASE Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017
- C. Păun, Dreptul afacerilor. Teoria. Profesioniștii. Impozitarea. Curs universitar, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest 2015
- L. Tulească, Drept comercial. Comercianții. Ediție revăzută și adăugită, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2018
- G. T. Nicolescu, Drept societar, Curs universitar, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2018
- S. Bodu, Tratat de Drept Societar, Volumul I, Rosetti Educational Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014
- F. C. Stoica, C. Ene, Business Law, Business Organisations, ASE Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016
- Law no. 31/1990 (on companies)
- Law no. 297/2004 on the capital market

THE PRINCIPLE OF RELATIVE EFFECT OF CONTRACTS - A HISTORICAL VIEW AND ASPECTS OF COMPARATIVE LAW

Tudor Vlad RĂDULESCU*

Abstract

The contract shall take effect only between the Contracting Parties; it does not in any way affect third parties, unless the law otherwise provides. This is the principle of the relativity of the effects of the contract, a rule established since Roman law.

In Romans, the principle developed in close connection with the formalism of the contracts, but also with the personalist concept and the individualistic spirit of law, with exceptions to the rule being admitted initially.

Over time, the relative effect that the contract has produced has become a basic principle in the law of many countries, some legislations devoting it express text (such as French law, Spanish law), others recognizing its existence from the interpretation of legal texts for example, German and Swiss law).

The article aims to deal briefly with the origins and the emergence of the principle of relativity, its development and exceptions to the rule, starting from the Roman law and passing through the French, Swiss, German and, of course, the Romanian civil code.

In this latter approach, the material proposes a brief review of the relative effect, as regulated in the previous civil code, in art. 973, with references to the exceptions established by the literature, so-called real exceptions (the stipulation for another) and the apparent exceptions (port-fort convention, representation, direct actions, etc.).

Keywords: relativity of contract, comparative law, roman law, res inter alios acta.

The principle of res inter alios acta has its roots in Roman law, when the legal relations were characterized by extreme personalization.

According to the definition we find in Justinian's Institutes, obligation[1] was seen as a chain of law (vinculum juris) under which we are necessarily compelled to make a certain supply in accordance with the legal prescriptions of the fortress[2].

In the Roman primitive conception, obligation was conceived in the image and resemblance of the property right, in the sense that the holder of the right of claim can dispose of the person of his debtor in the same way as the owner of the good that forms the object of his property. In this conception, obligation could not but produce relative effects, thus creating a personal bond between the creditor and the debtor, the claim giving the former a direct power over the latter's physics[3].

This close relationship between the subjects of the judicial report can be explained if we consider, on the one hand, the way of concluding the contracts, and, on the other hand, the different types of contracts.

Thus, in the old Roman law, in order for a contract to produce legal effects, it had to respect certain forms, it was necessary for the parties to use certain gestures or certain words, and the presence of the parties at the moment of the will expression was mandatory [4].

Obligations, once born, produced two effects, a normal effect, on the one hand, and an accidental effect, on the other, in the event that the normal effect did not occur first[5].

The normal effect of the obligations lies in the debtor's act of executing the obligation assumed by the contract so that the creditor can use its debt rights. The obligation was enforced according to the principles of the civil procedure, at the place specified in the contract or in absentia, at the place where the creditor can bring the action.

From the point of view of those who could bind, we speak of aliens iuris or sui iuris persons, meeting three cases: when pater familias, as a sui iuris person, took part in the contract; when a slave or a person under the power of pater familias took part in the contract, and finally, when another family pater took part in the conclusion of a contract[6].

The principle of relativity, expressed by the rule of res inter alios acta, aliis neque nocere, neque prodesse potest, used to find application when pater familias participated in the contract. That principle essentially implied that the effects of the contract were made only in respect of the persons who participated in

* PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: tradulescu@yahoo.com).

[1] For a brief overview of the origins of the obligation, see, E. Molcuț, Drept roman, Edit Press Mihaela SRL, București, 1999, p. 155-158, nd the authors cited in the footnote.

[2] V. Hanga, M.D.Bocșan, Curs de drept privat roman, ed. Rosetti, București, 2005, p. 161; M.V.Jakotă, Dreptul roman II, Editura Fundației Chemarea, Iași, 1993, p. 378.

[3] See in this respect, C. Firică, Excepții de la principiul relativității efectelor contractului, ed. CH Beck, București, 2013, p.12.

[4] For a classification of contracts, see Valerius M. Ciucă, Lecții de drept roman, vol. III, ed. Polirom, Iași, 2000, p. 789 și urm.

[5] Ș. Cocoș, Drept roman, ed. ALL BECK, Bucureşti, 2000, p. 183.

[6] Idem, p. 184.

the conclusion of the contract, to their heirs and their creditors who are not holders of a real right[7].

From the strict personal character of the object of the contract[8], from which also derives the principle of relativity of the effects of the contract, there were developed other basic principles of the Roman law, namely the principle of nullity of stipulation for another, the principle of nullity of promise for another and of non-representation in legal acts, which, over time, have lost their original character, the latter being even removed[9].

The rule according to which the validly concluded contracts take effect only on the parties, not affecting parties foreign of the contract, namely third parties, has been taken over and is recognized today by all European laws.

The Napoleonic Civil Code assigns to this principle art. 1165, in the following terms: Les conventions n'ont d'effet qu'entre les parties contractantes; elles ne nuisent point au tiers, et elles ne lui profitent que dans le cas prevu par l'article 1121.

Therefore, contracts only have effect between parties whose wills have been expressed for the purpose of concluding the convention, by the parties being understood both those present at the time of the consent of wills and those who have been represented legally or conventionally. As a result, third parties will not be able to take advantage of, or suffer from the conclusion of the contract between the parties. However, alongside the parties, the contract will also influence the inheritors, including the chirographic creditors, the universal and private successors.

From the principle of relativity, the French law, doctrine and jurisprudence see as true exceptions the stipulation for another, as it is mentioned in art. 1165, which refers to the provisions of art. 1121 French Civil Code, the promise of another's deed, the transfer of contracts concluded in relation to a good (in the matter of the lease agreements - Article 1743 of the Civil Code, insurance and labor contract), and direct actions.

French law recognizes direct actions in favor of the lessor against the Sublessee (Article 1753 French civil code) in favor of the principal against the sub-agent (Article 1944 French civil code) in favor of the victim against the insurer of the person responsible for the insured event[10].

The Swiss Code of Obligations does not contain a provision similar to that in Art. 1165 French Civil Code, however, in Part I, Title II, Chap. III, under the title Effects of obligations on third parties, we find legal figures such as the stipulation for another, the subrogation and the porte-fort convention (articles 110-113).

The Italian Civil Code took over, in art. 1372, the rule on the relative effect of conventions, providing that Il contratto non produce effetto rispetto ai terzi che nei casi previsti dalla legge.

The Italian doctrine has argued that the foundation of the principle of res inter alios acta must be sought in the "protection that law must accord to contractors who, as a rule, do not consent that others may benefit from legal relationships at the formation of which they were wholly foreign and were not targeted[11]".

In principle, the contract is considered to be ineffective to third parties, but at the same time it is recognized that a contract may have direct effects on them in the circumstances where the contract is the necessary instrument to prevent the performance of another contract. These situations, defined in the past as contracts to the detriment of third parties, are now legal figures that recognize the possibility of an "aquile tutelage" of the contract or non-contractual liability derived from the contract[12].

The civil code of the province of Quebec recognizes, in Art. 1440, the same principle of relativity of the contract, without, however, indicating, as an exception, the stipulation for another, but showing that a valid contract concluded takes effect only between the parties, except in the cases provided by the law.

The aforementioned principle is no longer an absolute principle after the reform of the civil code of the province of Quebec, but has become a temperate rule of the requirement of good faith, which applies to both parties and third parties.

In reality, although it is acknowledged that a contract is effective only between the parties, it is impossible, in the context of the present law, to allow third parties to ignore this legal fact and behave in a manner contrary to the requirements of good faith[13].

Like other systems of law, thecivil law of the province of Quebec also knows exceptions to relativity; the direct action of the sub-lessee against the lessor is such an exception[14], the liability of the manufacturer for the defects of the good sold, to the buyer, the sale of an enterprise, the direct recourse of the victim against the insurer, the collective labor contract, all represent recognized derogations from res inter alios acta.

The German Civil Code (BGB) does not contain any provision similar to Art. 1165 French Civil Code,

---

[7] Ibidem.

[8] For developments see, V.M. Ciucă, op.cit., p. 740 et seq.

[9] For the evolution of these legal figures in Roman law, seeV.M.Ciucă, op.cit., 742 și urm., , Ș.Cocoș, op.cit, p. 184-185, E. Molcuț, op.cit., p. 172-174.

[10] P.Malaurie, L.Aynes, P.Stoffel-Munck, Les Obligations, Defrenois, 2007, Paris, p. 447.

[11] Tartufari, Dei contratti a favore di terzi, p.304, apud A.Circa, Relativitatea efectelor convențiilor, Editura Universul Juridic, București, 2009, p. 44-45.

[12] M. Franzoni, La Rilevanza del Contratto Verso i Terzi, pe http://www.ildirittodegliaffari.it/upload/articoli/20130531012521_Inserito-Franzoni.pdf , site consultat la data de 01.03.2018.

[13] K. Vincent, Les obligations, vol. I, Wilson et Lafleur, Montreal, 2015, p. 882.

[14] For an overview of this exception and its evolution, see K. Vincent, op.cit., p. 899-909.

but it has been judiciously argued that there is a principle relating to the relativity of the judicial report that can be deduced from the interpretation of two articles relating to the content of the judicial report, 241 and 311 BGB[15].

A special situation is encountered in English law, where the relativity of the effects of the contract (called the privity of contract) is very limited. Most of the time, this principle is expressed in a procedural manner: the third party has no action based on a contract to which he is not a party[16]. It may be in favor of a third party, but the court can not oblige the promisor to respect his promise. His engagement is devoid of what is called consideration because the beneficiary generally does not bring anything in consideration.

Privity of contract implies that a contract can not, as a general rule, confer rights or impose obligations on a person outside that act.

The principle has been interpreted in common law in close connection with two rules: only a promisee may enforce the promise, that is if a third party is not also a promisor, then he can not be related to the contract and consideration must move from the promisee, that is a third party that does not offer consideration can not claim anything to the parties.

It has been argued in the doctrine that the rule according to which only parts of a contract can be held liable under that contract is fair and equitable. However, the rule that no one except the parties can enforce the contract can cause inconvenience in the sense that it prevents the person concerned in concludind the contract from doing this. The many exceptions to the privity doctrine make this rule tolerable in practice, but have raised the question of whether it is more useful to modify it or even wholly abolish it[17] .

Among the exceptions to this doctrine are the collateral contracts; thus the contract concluded between two parties may be accompanied by a collateral contract concluded between one party and a third person in close connection with the original contract. For example, in Shanklin Pier v Detel Products (1951), the applicants contracted a number of people to paint a pontoon, forcing them to buy the paint from the defendant. He assured them that the purchased paint has a lifetime of 7 years, but it has lost its property after just three months. The court ruled that the applicants could bring an action against the defendant on the basis of the collateral contract concluded, considering that there was also a consideration on their part.

Another exception is the agency contract. Through this contract, the agent contracts on behalf of the principal with a third person and forms a binding relationship between the principal and the third person.

Other exceptions include trust contracts, servitudes closely linked to land, and so-called statutes, respectively legal provisions expressly setting exceptions to privity[18].

Romanian law embraced the principle of relativity of the effects of the contract, expressly acknowledging it in art. 973 Civ. Code 1865, the following: Conventions shall have effect only between the Contracting Parties.

As has been consistently stated in the Romanian doctrine, the effects of contracts and, consequently, of the obligations arising from the contract do not regulate and concern only the relations between the contracting parties, as well as between persons who, although they have not personally participated in the conclusion of the contract, however, will be considered to be represented and bound by the act of will concluded, in such a way that the act is regarded as theirs and that the rights and obligations recognized or transmitted by act are also acknowledged and transmitted to them also[19].

Thus, the scope of this principle has been outlined, to the parties, to their universal or private successors (subject to certain conditions) and to the chirographic creditors of the parties, considered to be in an intermediate situation between the universal successors and the parties[20].

It has also been argued that the relative effect of the mandatory force of legal acts is explained and grounded in the nature of the legal act. Being essentially volunteer, it is only natural for the legal act to be binding on those who have given their consent at its conclusion, and not for third parties who have not expressed their will to acquire any right or to assume obligation through it[21]. However, it is only the internal, binding effect of the contract, in that it only gives rise to, amends or extinguishes legal ties or relationships between the Contracting Parties, which become creditors and debtors to each other; the other persons, by whom are understood the third parties, can not become debtors and, as a rule, no creditors by contract to which they are foreign[22], but are bound to observe the legal reality born of the valid contract concluded between the parties.

---

[15] A. Circa, op.cit., p. 29.

[16] M.Oudin, Un droit européen ... pour quel contrat ? Recherches sur les frontières du contrat en droit comparé, în Revue internationale de droit comparé. Vol. 59 N°3, 2007. p. 488.

[17] GH Treitel, The Law of Contract, Sweet & Maxwell/Stevens & Sons, London, 1995, p.588, pe https://www.lawteacher.net/PDF/contract-law/Privity%20Lecture%20&%20Cases.pdf .

[18] Pentru dezvoltări, a se vedea https://www.lawteacher.net/PDF/contract-law/Privity%20Lecture%20&%20Cases.pdf ., M.Oudin, op. cit., p. 488 și urm.

[19] M.B.Cantacuzino, Elementele dreptului civil, Editura ALL , București, 1998, p. 450.

[20] C. Hamangiu, I. Rosetti-Bălănescu, Al. Băicoianu, Tratat de drept civil român, vol.II, Editura All, București, 1998, p. 522.

[21] D.Cosma, Teoria generală a actului juridic civil, Editura Ştiinţifică, Bucureşti, 1969, p. 381.

[22] L. Pop, Tratat de drept civil. Obligaţiile. Volumul II: Contractul, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2009, p. 560.

As regards the exceptions to this principle, the doctrine before 2011, was unanimous in recognizing this character only to the stipulation for another, although the Romanian legislator did not take over the legislative solution presented in art. 1119-1121 French Civil Code referring to this legal institution, while in the category of apparent exceptions several legal figures were included: the promise of the other's deed, the direct actions, the representation, the assignment of the debt.

The current civil code took over this principle in art. 1280 Civil Code, which states that the Contract shall take effect only between the parties, unless otherwise provided by law.

Conclusions

As can be seen from this brief incursion into the origins and evolution of the principle of relativity, the rule res inter alios acta has largely retained its essence, but the importance that Roman law has recognized, most of the European laws adopting this principle as law.

If in what regards the principle, its content and its scope, there are no major differences between the laws of the European States, as regards the exceptions to this principle, the opinions expressed differ even now, more than 200 years after the adoption of the Napoleonic Civil Code, the precursor of modern European civil codes. But this discussion goes beyond the scope of this material, whose purpose was merely a brief review of the principle of relativity, from a temporal and spatial point of view.

References

- E. Molcuț, Drept roman, Edit Press Mihaela SRL, București, 1999
- V. Hanga, M.D.Bocșan, Curs de drept privat roman, ed. Rosetti, București, 2005
- M.V.Jakotă, Dreptul roman II, Editura Fundației Chemarea, Iași, 1993
- C. Firică, Excepții de la principiul relativității efectelor contractului, ed. CH Beck, București, 2013
- Valerius M. Ciucă, Lecții de drept roman, vol. III, ed. Polirom, Iași, 2000
- L. Pop, Tratat de drept civil. Obligaţiile. Volumul II: Contractul, editura Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2009
- Ș. Cocoș, Drept roman, ed. ALL BECK, București, 2000
- M. Planiol, Traite elementaire de droit civil, tome deuxieme, Librairie Cotillion, Paris,1900
- M.B.Cantacuzino, Elementele dreptului civil, Editura ALL , București, 1998
- C. Hamangiu, I. Rosetti-Bălănescu, Al. Băicoianu, Tratat de drept civil român, vol.II, Editura All, Bucureşti, 1998
- M.Oudin, Un droit européen ... pour quel contrat ? Recherches sur les frontières du contrat en droit comparé, în Revue internationale de droit comparé. Vol. 59 N°3, 2007
- D.Cosma, Teoria generală a actului juridic civil, Editura Ştiinţifică, Bucureşti, 1969
- K. Vincent, Les obligations, vol. I, Wilson et Lafleur, Montreal, 2015

INFORMATION REGARDING FIDUCIARY CONTRACTS AND THEIR LEGAL SPECIFICITIES

Ciprian Raul ROMIȚAN*

Abstract

The sources of the fiducia are the law and the contract concluded in authentic form. Fiducia must be express and its running by an unilateral act or by judicial way is excluded. The fiduciary contract is an act conveyancing the ownership title, it is onerous, synallagmatic, commutative, intuitu personae and solemn.

The fiduciary contract is the contract by which a party (the settlor), transmits as a trust to the other party (the trustee) goods and rights for the exploitation thereof for a determined purpose. Therefore, according to the provisions of the Civil Code in force, the parties to the fiduciary contract are the settlor (settlors) and the trustee (trustees). As one shall notice during out study, the beneficiary(-ies), the third party mentioned in the legal text defining the notion of fiducia, is not regarded as a party to the fiduciary contract.

According to the author, the object of the fiducia supposes three successive stages of the complex contractual procedure: the transfer of patrimony rights from the settlor to the trustee, the actual management of the patrimony mass in the beneficiary's favor, the transfer of the profit to the beneficiary, once or in successive stages.

From the point of view of its legal nature, fiducia is a legal operation having as object the transfer of the property, receivable, security or other patrimony rights, whether existing or future, or a combination of such rights, to one or several trustees, exerting them in order to fulfill a determined purpose, in the favor or one or several beneficiaries. All these rights set up an patrimony mass distinct from the trustees' other patrimony rights and obligations.

As one could notice during the study, the fiduciary contract must comprise, under the sanction of absolute nullity, the following elements: real rights, receivable rights, guarantees and any other patrimonial rights transferred. In this regard, the transferred rights must be described in the fiduciary contract, by clearly indicating all identification elements; the period of the transfer, which cannot exceed 33 years as of the date of its conclusion; the identity of the settlor or settlors; the identity of the trustee or trustees; the identity of the beneficiary or beneficiaries or at least the rules allowing the determination thereof; the purpose of the fiducia and the scope of the powers of administration and disposition of the trustee or of the trustees.

Keywords: trust, trust agreement, grantor, trustee, right of ownership.

1. Introduction

The article presents in a complex manner all the elements of the fiduciary contracts, as regards the definition, legal nature, the parties, the contents and termination.

Fiducia, this new Romanian law institution, was first regulated in the Civil Code enforced as of 1 October 2011[1] where a whole title is dedicated to it (Title IV - Fiducia), in Book 3, "On Assets"[2]. A number of 19 articles are expressis verbis dedicated to fiducia (art.773-791), inspired by the similar provisions in the French Civil Code adopted pursuant to the Law no. 2007-211 of 19 February 2007.

2. Content

2.1. Fiducia. Definition and Subject

The institution of fiducia is continental to that of trust[3] in the common law system and it "represents the actual application of the patrimony divisibility, being included amongst the assigned patrimonial assets listed under art. 31(3) of the Civil Code"[4]. In other author's

* Assistant Professor, PhD. Faculty of Law, "Romanian-American" University, Associate Lawyer "Roș și Asociații" Law Firm (e-mail: ciprian.romitan@rvsa.ro)

[1] Law no. 287/2009 regarding the New Civil Code, published with the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 511 of 24 July 2009. The Civil Code came into force on 1 October 2011, according to the Law no. 71/2011 regarding the enforcement of Law no. 287/2009 on the Civil Code, published with the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 409 of 10 June 2011 (hereinafter referred to as Official Gazette).

[2] Regulations regarding the choice of the material law regarding fiducia are also available in art.2659-2662 of Book VII (Private International Law Provisions), Title II (Conflicts of Laws), Chapter VIII (Fiducia).

[3] The trust is defined as "a legal entity established by a settlor, for designated beneficiaries, on the basis of the legal regulations and of a valid fiduciary instrument, the trustee holding the fiduciary duty to manage the assets and revenue representing the subject of the fiducia in the favor of the beneficiary" (Cătălin R. Tripon, Fiducia, result of the interference of the two large legal systems: the continental civil law and the Anglo-Saxon law. The concept, classification, evolution and validity prerequisites of fiducia, in "Romanian Private Law Magazine", issue 2/2010, p.168). For details, also see Luminița Tuleașcă, The concept of the trust in Romanian law, in "Romanian economic and business review", pp.150-160. For a review of the regulation of the trust in the other state's laws, also see Daniel Moreanu, Fiducia and Trust, "C.H.Beck" Printing House, Bucharest, 2017, pp.457-477.

[4] Gabriel Boroi, Carla Alexandra Anghelescu, Bogdan Nazat, Civil Law Course. Key Property Rights, 2nd issue, revisited and supplemented, "Hamangiu" Printing House, Bucharest, 2013, p.163.

opinion[5], the regulation of this legal institution by the Civil Code is dissatisfactory and it is characterized by excessive, counter-productive and unjustified formalism, even though, as already mentioned, the Romanian legislator took inspiration from the French Civil Code.

Art.773 of the Civil Code defines fiducia as "the legal operation through which one or several settlors transfer property rights, receivable rights, securities or other patrimony rights or a combination of such existing or future rights to one or several trustees exerting them with a determined purpose, in the favor of one or several beneficiaries. These rights set up an autonomous patrimony mass, distinct from the other rights and obligations in the trustees' patrimonies." This definition was not, however, exempt from criticism in the specialized literature[6] and attempt were actually made to propose a new definition[7].

With regards to the subject of fiducia, the reading of the definition above shows that, even though the law text only concerns the transfer of the property and receivable rights, without any reference to the assets these rights are related to, we appreciate, similarly to other authors[8], that "upon the transfer of the rights, the transfer of the assets these rights concern should also be considered"[9]. Pursuant to the review of the definition of fiducia as stipulated in art. 773 of the Civil Code, it further follows that fixed or any other, tangible or intangible, assets may be subjected to the transfer (receivables, intellectual property rights, goodwill, etc.), whether present or future. It should be mentioned that if fiducia concerns goodwill, it is in the interest of the parties to indicate the structure of the goodwill, to describe the assigned elements, including clients, a key element of goodwill[10].

Moreover, certain key property rights may represent the subject of fiducia, such as: the ownership title, the superficies rights, the beneficial right and the right of servitude. Concerning the beneficial right, we should mention that it can represent the subject of the fiducia since, according to art.714 of the Civil Code, the beneficial right may be assigned, and the right of servitude may only become the subject of the fiducia alongside the master fund. With regards to the right of use and habitation, whereas the provisions in art.752 of the Civil Code forbid their assignment, these rights may not be transferred through the fiduciary operation either[11].

Finally, pursuant to the review of the provisions in art.773 of the Civil Code, it may be stated that the securities listed under the category of the property rights in art.551 of the Civil Code, i.e., the security interests, which as ancillary property rights regulated by the Civil Code, i.e.: fidejussion [art.2480-2320 Civil Code], mortgage [art. 2343-2479 Civil Code] and pledge [art. 2480-2494 Civil Code][12].

We should further mention, as actually shown by other authors, as well[13], that "regardless of its subject, fiducia may not represent the means through which indirect liberation is achieved in the beneficiaries' favor, the fiduciary contract being stricken by absolute nullity in the case of the failure to observe this provision" (art. 775 Civil Code).

2.2. Legal Nature and Sources of Fiducia

Pursuant to the definition of fiducia, as mentioned din art.773 of the Civil Code, it follows that, from the point of view of its legal nature, fiducia is a legal operation having as object the transfer of the property, receivable, security or other patrimony rights, whether existing or future, or a combination of such rights, to one or several trustees, exerting them in order to fulfil a determined purpose, in the favor or one or several beneficiaries. These rights set up a patrimony mass distinct from the trustees' other patrimony rights and obligations[14].

According to art.774 (1) of the Civil Code, fiducia may be established by law or contract, which must take the authenticated form ad validitatem. Per a contrario, it follows that fiducia may not derive from testament or court order.

The aforementioned law text further orders that fiducia should be explicit, which means that the [5] For details, see Gheorghe Buta Conflicts of Laws in the Field of Fiducia, in "Legal Studies and Researches", issue 4, October-December/2015, pp.501-524. Also see a summary of the article signed by Reinhart Dammann, Fiducia-guarantee and conflict of laws in France, translated by Alexandru F. Măgureanu, in "Romanian Pandects", issue 6/2013, pp.121-130.

[6] For details, see Bujorel Florea, Civil Law. Key Property Rights, "Universul Juridic" Printing House, Bucharest, 2011, pp.216-217; Bujorel Florea, Certain Considerations on the Fiduciary Contract as Regulated in the New Civil Code, in "Law" magazine, issue 8/2013, pp. 62-64; Cristian Jora, Civil Law. Property Rights in the New Civil Code, "Universul Juridic" Printing House, Bucharest, 2012, p.37.

[7] See Bujorel Florea, op.cit., (2013), p.64.

[8] Gabriel Boroi, Carla Alexandra Anghelescu, Bogdan Nazat, op.cit., p.163.

[9] For a review of the fiducia regulations, see Rodica Constantinovici, in "New Civil Code. Comments per articles" (coordinators Flavius Antoniu Baias, Eugen Chelaru, Rodica Constantinovici, Ioan Macovei), "C.H.Beck" Printing House, Bucharest, 2012, pp.822-836; Cătălin R. Tripon, op.cit., pp.162-199; Nicoleta Diaconu, Law Applicable to the Fiducia with a Foreign Element According to the Civil Code, in "Dreptul", issue 9/2012, pp.85-95; Daniel Moreanu, Fiducia and Trust. Definition, Practical Uses and Main Differences, in "Legal Studies and Researches", issue 2, April-June/2014, pp.150-160; Luminița Gheorghe, Fiducia in the New Civil Code: An Example of the Activation of the Relation Between the Romanian Law and the Common Law by the International Business Law, in "Judiciary Courier", issue 3/20115, pp.129-133; Sergiu Golub, Fiducia. Legal Definition Review. Genus Proximum, in "Romanian Business Law Magazine", issue 11/2016, pp.31-58; David-Domițian Bolduț, Fiducia-Unusual Romanian Law Legal Operation (I), in "Romanian Business Law Magazine", issue 9/2014, pp.98-119.

[10] Ioan Popa, Fiduciary Contract Regulated by the New Civil Code, in "Romanian Private Law Magazine", issue 2/2011, p.225.

[11] Gabriel Boroi, Carla Alexandra Anghelescu, Bogdan Nazat, op.cit., p.164.

[12] Sergiu Golub, Fiducia. Legal Definition Review. Specific Difference, in "Romanian Legal Science Magazine", issue 1/2016, pp.24-30.

[13] Gabriel Boroi, Carla Alexandra Anghelescu, Bogdan Nazat, op.cit., p.164.

[14] For details, see Liviu Marius Harosa, Brief Considerations on Fiducia as Regulated by the New Civil Code, in "Romanian Business Law Magazine", issue 9/2013, pp.40-42.

intention to establish a fiducia may not be presumed and that it must be clearly and unequivocally expressed. If fiducia is established under the law, the provisions in the Civil Code are supplemented by the legal provisions, if not contrary to the same [art.774 (2) of the Civil Code][15]. Starting from the two sources of fiducia, the specialized literature[16] has appreciated that fiducia is of two types: legal fiducia, deriving from the law, and conventional or contractual fiducia, deriving from the consent of the parties to the fiduciary contract.

2.3. Fiduciary Contract

Specialized literature defines fiduciary contract as "the contract based on which one or several settlors transfer property, receivable, security or other patrimony rights or a combination of such rights, whether present or future, to one or several trustees who exert them for a determined purpose, in favor or one or several beneficiaries"[17] or "the contract pursuant to which, one of the parties, referred to as settlor, assigns rights and obligations, as fiducia, to the other party, referred to as trustee, in order to use them for a determined purpose"[18].

2.3.1. Parties to the Fiduciary Contract

According to art.776 in the Civil Code, the parties to the fiduciary contract are the settlor(s) and the trustee(s). As it may be noticed, the beneficiary (-ies), the third party mentioned in art.773 of the Civil Code defining the notion of fiducia, is not regarded as a party to the fiduciary agreement.

Settlor

Art.776 (1) of the Civil Code stipulates that any natural or legal entity may hold the capacity of settlor. However, in order for a natural or legal entity to hold the capacity as settlor under a fiduciary contract, it must be the holder of the rights representing the subject of the transfer[19].

With regards to the representation of the settlor's interest, as also stipulated in art.778 of the Civil Code, "Unless stipulated otherwise, the settlor may, at all times, appoint a third party to represent his interests in the enforcement of the contract and to exert his rights arising from the fiduciary contract"[20].

Under the fiduciary contract, the settlor undertakes two main obligations: the obligation to transfer the fiduciary patrimony mass to the trustee and the obligation to pay to the trustee the remuneration corresponding to the services it provided under the fiduciary contract[21].

Trustee

With regards to the trustee capacity, pursuant to the provisions in art. 776(2) of the Civil Code, this capacity may only be held by six exhaustively listed categories of persons, which the legislator regarded as holding the professional capacities to exert the rights acquired from the settlor, i.e.: credit institutions, investment and management companies, financial investment services companies, legally established insurance and reinsurance companies[22]. Considering these provisions that restrict the categories of persons that may hold the capacity of trustee, it may be stated that the trustee is a qualified lawful subject of the fiduciary contract[23].

In certain author's[24] opinion, such a limitative listing should be eliminated and other categories of persons should also be allowed to acquire the capacity as trustee, provided that they observe the requirements regarding solvency and trustworthiness.

According to art. 776(3) of the Civil Code, notaries public and lawyers may hold the capacity as trustees, regardless of the manner in which they exert their profession[25]. Concerning this right granted to lawyers under the law to act as trustees, it may be stated that it is not a novelty. In this regard, Law no. 51/1995 regarding the organization and practice of the lawyer profession[26] stipulated, prior to the amendments brought by Law no.71/2011 on the enforcement of Law no.287/2009 regarding the Civil Code, the possibility of this category of professionals to carry out "fiduciary activities"[27], but a review of art. 3(1) (g) of the Law no.51/1995 illustrates that the fiduciary activities the lawyer was entitled to perform were expressly and exhaustively listed.

Currently, pursuant to all amendments made, the Law no.51/1995 stipulates, in art.3 (1) (g), that "the attorney's activity is carried out through fiduciary activities carried out according to the Civil Code", provisions that were somewhat extended through the [15] For details on the subject, we recommend that you see Daniel Moreanu, op.cit. pp. 180-187.

[16] Vasile Nemeș, Fiduciary Contract, according to the New Civil Code, in "Judiciary Courier", issue 10/2011, p.518.

[17] Iosif Robi Urs, Petruța Elena Ispas, Civil Law. Theory of Property Rights, 2nd issue, revisited and supplemented, "Hamangiu" Printing House, Bucharest, 2015, p. 272.

[18] Dan Adrian Doțiu, Enforceability of the Fiduciary Contract, in "Romanian Forced Execution Magazine", issue 4/2016, p.22.

[19] Mona Lisa Belu – Magdo & Co, New Civil Code. Remarks, Doctrine and Case law, vol. I-III, "Hamangiu" Printing House, Bucharest, 2012, p.1094.

[20] Also see Gheorghe Buta, Fiducia and Management of Another Party's Assets, "Universul Juridic" Printing House, Bucharest, 2017, p.49.

[21] For details, see Iosif Robi Urs, Petruța Elena Ispas, op.cit. pp. 283-284; Daniel Moreanu, op.cit. pp. 269-270; Vasile Nemeș, op.cit. p.521.

[22] For details regarding these categories of persons, see Iosif Robi Urs, Petruța Elena Ispas, op.cit. pp. 278-281.

[23] Similarly, see Vasile Nemeș, op.cit. p. 518.

[24] Cătălin R. Tripon, op.cit. p. 196.

[25] For details, please see Gheorghe Buta, The Lawyer and the Notary Public as Trustees, in "Romanian Case Law Magazine", issue 4/2016, pp.135-143; Rodica Constantinovici, in Flavius Antoniu Baias, Eugen Chelaru, Rodica Constantinovici, Ioan Macovei (coordinators), op.cit., p. 825.

[26] Published with the Official Gazette of Romania no. 116 of 9 June 1995.

[27] According to art. 3(1) (g), the lawyer's activity was carried out through "fiduciary activities consisting of the receipt in custody, in the name and on behalf of the client, of fiduciary funds and assets, resulting from the sale or implementation of enforceable titles, after the conclusion of the inheritance procedure or of the liquidation, as well as the placement and sale thereof, in the name and on behalf of the client, activities for the management of the funds or assets they were placed in".

provisions in the Status of the Lawyer Profession[28] [Chapter III (Lawyer's Professional Activity), Section I (Content of the Professional Activity), Sub-section 4 (Fiduciary Activities)].

In other author's opinion[29], the wording in art.3 (1) (g) is "very wide, but the reference to the Civil Code provisions limits and clarifies its scope".

With regards to the possibility of notaries public to hold the capacity as trustees, Law no.36/1995 of the notaries public and the notary activity[30] expressly stipulates, in art. 12(l) that the notary public carried out "fiduciary activities, according to the law"[31].

The Civil Code also regulates the trustee substitution institution. In case the trustee fails to fulfil its obligations or endangers the interests entrusted to it pursuant to art.788 (1) of the Civil Code, the settlor, its representative or the beneficiary may request the settlor's replacement in court[32]. As it also follows from art.788 of the Civil Code, the trustee has certain duties that it undertakes on the fiduciary contract conclusion date. One of the trustee's main obligations deriving from the very art.773 of the Civil Code is the patrimony mass management obligation, followed by other obligations, such as: the obligation to disclose the relation to third parties in the capacity in which it operates, the obligation to register the fiduciary contract for tax purposes, the obligation to be held accountable for the services and activities carried out for the fulfilment of the fiduciary contract, the obligation to remedy the prejudice cause pursuant to the fiduciary mass conservation management acts and, last but not least, the obligation to return the fiduciary patrimony mass[33].

Beneficiary

According to art.777 of the Civil Code, "the beneficiary of the fiducia may be the settlor, the trustee or a third party". Pursuant to the review of this text, we believe two different situations may be distinguished, i.e.: the first situation in which the beneficiary is the settlor and/or the trustee and the second one in which the beneficiary is another person. Hence, if in the first of the two situations, the beneficiary is a party to the fiduciary contract, in the second one, it does not hold the capacity as party to the fiduciary contract.

Even though in the beneficiary's case, the Civil Code does not impose any special conditions, art.779 (e), marginally entitled "Content of the Fiduciary Contract", does comprise a general remark: "The fiduciary contract must mention, under the sanction of complete nullity, the identity of the beneficiaries or, at least, the rules allowing for the determination thereof". Hence, the fiduciary contract where the beneficiary was not determined as on the conclusion date is valid only if the parties set sufficient elements to determine it upon the execution of the contract.

2.4. Contents of the Fiduciary Contract

According to art.779 of the Civil Code, the fiduciary contract must mention, under the sanction of complete nullity, the following elements:

- the property rights, the receivable rights, the securities and any other patrimony rights transferred. In this regard, the transferred rights must be described in the fiduciary contract, by clearly indicating all identification elements;
- the transfer term, which may not exceed 33 years as of its conclusion date. The legislator has not stipulated the possibility of extending this type of contract beyond the term stipulated in art.779(1)(b) of the Civil Code, but it should, however, be mentioned that the fiduciary term may also be subjected to early termination within the set term. For instance, the fiduciary contract may be terminated in case it is found that the purpose for which it was concluded was achieved;
- the settlor(s)' identity;
- the trustee(s)' identity;
- the identity of the beneficiary (-ies)' or, at least, the rules allowing for the determination thereof;
- the purpose of the fiducia and the extent of the trustee(s)' management powers. In this case, we appreciate that the provisions in art. 775 of the Civil Code should be taken into account. According to these provisions, the fiduciary contract is stricken by complete nullity if it provides for indirect liberation in the beneficiary's favor.

2.5. Legal Features of the Fiduciary Contract

The legal features of the fiduciary contract are: it is a designated, synallagmatic, official, commutative or random onerous or free-of-charge contract and intuitu-personae.

It is a designate contract because it is expressly included in the Civil Code (art.773-791).

The synallagmatic (bilateral) nature resides in the fact that it generates mutual rights and obligations between the parties to the contract[34]. In this regard, the trustee holds, inter alia, the obligation to assign him

[28] Adopted through the Decision no. 64/2011 of the Council of the Romanian National Bar Association, published with the Official Gazette no. 898 of 19 December 2011.

[29] Daniel Moreanu, op.cit. p. 204.

[30] Republished in the Official Gazette no. 72 of 4 February 2013.

[31] For details, see Gheorghe Buta, op. cit., (2016), pp.141-143.

[32] According to art.788 (2) of the Civil Code, "Up to the settlement of the replacement request, the settlor, and its representative or, in the absence thereof, the beneficiary, shall appoint a provisional fiduciary mass manager. In case the settlor, its representative or the beneficiary simultaneously appoint a provisional manager, the settlor's or its legal representative's appointment shall prevail".

[33] For details, see Roxana Mariana Popescu, Evelina Oprina, Fiducia and its Legal Consequences on Forced Executions, in "Romanian Forced Execution Magazine", issue 4/2011, pp.76-78; Iosif Robi Urs, Petruța Elena Ispas, op.cit., p. 284; Daniel Moreanu, op.cit., pp.271-274; Vasile Nemeș, op.cit., p.521.

[34] According to art.1171 of the Civil Code, "The contract is synallagmatic if the obligations it generates are mutual and interdependent. If not, the contract is unilateral, even if its execution triggers obligations for both parties."

property rights, the receivable rights, the securities and any other patrimony rights agreed upon, and the fiduciary is bound to exert them according to the legal purpose agreed upon between the parties.

The fiduciary contract is an official contract because its enforcement requires the observance of a certain form, which is the authenticated and express one [art.774 (1) of the Civil Code].

It is a commutative contract because the parties are clearly aware of their rights and obligations, starting the very fiduciary contract conclusion date[35].

In certain situations, the fiduciary contract may be random. For instance, even though the duration of the fiduciary contract may not exceed 33 years as of its conclusion date [art.779(b) of the Civil Code], an undesirable event may occur, such as the beneficiary's decease.

It is an onerous contract because, in general, each party to the contract desires to obtain a patrimony interest, i.e. to receive a benefit in exchange for the service it undertakes to provide[36].

Finally, the intuitu-personae nature of the fiduciary contract follows from the fact that the conclusion thereof relies on the trustee's skills or professional training. In other words, the trustee's qualities in exerting the rights assigned as fiducia are of essence in the conclusion of the fiduciary contract.

2.6. Termination of the Fiduciary Contract

According to art. 790 of the Civil Code, the fiduciary contract may be terminated as follows:

- through the elapse of the term, which, according to art.779(b) of the Civil Code, may not exceed 33 years as of its conclusion;
- through the achievement of the envisaged purpose, in case it occurs prior to the elapse of the term;
- through the waiver of the fiducia by all beneficiaries, unless the contract stipulates how it is that the fiduciary relations are to be continued in such as situation. All beneficiaries must issue waivers and all such statements must be subjected to the same registration formalities as the fiduciary contract. The termination shall come into force as of the completion date of the registration forms for the last waiver;
- pursuant to the opening of the insolvency procedure against the fiduciary or in the case of the legal entity's reorganization.

3. Conclusions

Now that we have reached the end of our brief review, it may be stated, as it actually also follows from the reading of the definition of fiducia in art.773 of the Civil Code, that its subject supposes three successive stages of the complex contractual procedure: the transfer of patrimony rights from the settlor to the trustee, the actual management of the patrimony mass in the beneficiary's favor, the transfer of the profit to the beneficiary, once or in successive stages.

Moreover, it should be mentioned that, under the sanction of full nullity, the fiduciary contract and the amendments thereto must be registered, upon the trustee's request, within one month as of its conclusion date, with the tax body holding jurisdiction over the management of the amounts due by the trustee to the general consolidated state budget [art. 780(1) of the Civil Code]. At the same time, according to the provisions in art. 780(2) of the Civil Code, in case the fiduciary patrimony mass comprises real estate property rights, they are to be registered, under the same sanction, with the specialized department of the local public administration holding jurisdiction over the management of the amounts due to the local budgets of the administrative and territorial where the building is located.

Finally, it should also be retained that, according to art. 780(4) of the Civil Coe, if the assignment of other rights requires the fulfilment of other special form requirements, a separate document shall be concluded, in compliance with the legal requirements. In these cases, the failure to register the contract for tax purposes shall trigger the application of the administrative sanctions stipulated under the law.

References

- Mona Lisa Belu – Magdo & Co, New Civil Code. Remarks, Doctrine and Case law, vol. I-III, "Hamangiu" Printing House, Bucharest, 2012
- David-Domițian Bolduț, Fiducia-Unusual Romanian Law Legal Operation (I), in "Romanian Business Law Magazine", issue 9/2014
- Gabriel Boroi, Carla Alexandra Anghelescu, Bogdan Nazat, Civil Law Course. Key Property Rights, 2nd issue, revisited and supplemented, "Hamangiu" Printing House, Bucharest, 2013
- Gheorghe Buta, Fiducia and Management of Another Party's Assets, "Universul Juridic" Printing House, Bucharest, 2017

[35] According to art.1173 (1) of the Civil Code, "The commutative contract is the one where the existence of the rights and obligations of the parties is certain, and the extent thereof is determined or determinable, as on the conclusion date".

[36] See art. 784 of the Civil Code, according to which "the trustee shall be remunerated according to the agreement between the parties, and in the absence of such an agreement, according to the rules applicable to the management of another party's assets", and the provisions in art. 793(1) of the Civil Code, "unless, according to the law, the incorporation deed or the subsequent agreement between the parties or to the concrete circumstances, the management is provided free-of-charge, the manager shall be entitled to a remuneration established through the incorporation deed or the subsequent agreement between the parties, under the law or, in the absence of such provisions, through a court order. In this latter case, the common practice and, in the absence of such a criterion, the counter value of the services provided by the manager shall also be taken into account."

- Gheorghe Buta Conflicts of Laws in the Field of Fiducia, in "Legal Studies and Researches", issue 4, October-December/2015
- Gheorghe Buta, The Lawyer and the Notary Public as Trustee, in "Romanian Case Law Magazine", issue 4/2016
- Rodica Constantinovici, in "New Civil Code. Comments per Articles" (coordinators Flavius Antoniu Baias, Eugen Chelaru, Rodica Constantinovici, Ioan Macovei), "C.H.Beck" Printing House, Bucharest, 2012
- Reinhart Dammann, Fiducia-guarantee and conflict of laws in France, translated by Alexandru F. Măgureanu, in "Romanian Pandects", issue 6/2013
- Nicoleta Diaconu, Law Applicable to Foreign Element Fiducia According to the Civil Law, in "Law" magazine, issue 9/2012
- Dan Adrian Doțiu, Enforceability of the Fiduciary Contract, in "Romanian Forced Execution Magazine", issue 4/2016
- Bujorel Florea, Civil Law. Key Property Rights, "Universul Juridic" Printing House, Bucharest, 2011
- Bujorel Florea, Certain Considerations Regarding the Fiduciary Contract as Regulated under the New Civil Code, in "Law" magazine, issue 8/2013
- Luminița Gheorghe, Fiducia in the New Civil Code: Fiducia in the New Civil Code: An Example of the Activation of the Relation between the Romanian Law and the Common Law by the International Business Law, in "Judiciary Courier", issue 3/20115
- Sergiu Golub, Fiducia. Legal Definition Review. Genus Proximum, in "Romanian Law Magazine", issue 11/2016
- Sergiu Golub, Fiducia. Legal Definition Review. Specific Difference, in "Romanian Business Law Magazine", issue 12/2016.
- Liviu Marius Harosa, Brief Considerations on Fiducia as Regulated by the New Civil Code, in "Romanian Business Law Magazine", issue 9/2013
- Cristian Jora, Civil Law. Property Rights in the New Civil Code, "Universul Juridic" Printing House, Bucharest, 2012
- Daniel Moreanu, Fiducia and Trust, "C.H.Beck" Printing House, Bucharest, 2017
- Daniel Moreanu, Fiducia and Trust. Definitions, Practical Uses and Key Differences, in "Legal Studies and Researches", issue 2, April-June/2014
- Vasile Nemeș, Fiduciary Contract, according to the New Civil Code, in "Judiciary Courier", issue 10/2011
- Ioan Popa, Fiduciary Contract Regulated by the New Civil Code, in "Romanian Private Law Magazine", issue 2/2011
- Roxana Mariana Popescu, Evelina Oprina, Fiducia and its Legal Consequences on Forced Executions, in "Romanian Forced Execution Magazine", issue 4/2011
- Cătălin R. Tripon, Fiducia, Result of the Interference of the Two Large Law Systems: Continental Civil Law and Anglo-Saxon Law. The concept, classification, evolution and validity prerequisites of fiducia, in "Romanian Private Law Magazine", issue 2/2010
- Luminița Tuleașcă, The concept of the trust in Romanian law, in "Romanian economic and business review"
- Iosif Robi Urs, Petruța Elena Ispas, Civil Law. Theory of Property Rights, 2nd issue, revisited and supplemented, "Hamangiu" Printing House, Bucharest, 2015
- Romanian Civil Code
- Law no. 51/1995 on the organization and practice of the lawyer profession
- Law no.36/1995 on notaries public and notary activities
- Status of the Lawyer Profession

USUCAPTION AS A MEANS OF ACQUIRING THE OWNERSHIP TITLE

Ciprian Raul ROMIȚAN*

Abstract

According to the Civil Code in force, the ownership title may be acquired, according to law, by convention, legal or testamentary inheritance, accession, usucaption, as effect of the good-faith possession in case of movable assets and fruits, by occupation, tradition, as well as by court decision, when it is not conveyancing by itself. Moreover, according to the law, the ownership title may also be acquired by to the effect of an administrative act, and the law may further regulate other means of acquiring the ownership title.

Therefore, the usucaption is that modality of acquiring the ownership title and other main real rights by exercising an uninterrupted possession over an asset, within the term and under the conditions provided for by the legislation in force.

In Romanian modern law, referred to as acquisitive prescription, usucaption was first regulated in the Civil Code adopted on 1864, which stipulated two types, i.e.: short-term usucaption, of 10 to 20 years and long-term usucaption, of 30 years.

The institution of usucaption is justified, in relation to the situation of the owner, as the need for stability of the situations and of the legal relations imposes, at a certain time and subject to compliance with certain conditions provided for by the law, the acknowledgment of certain legal effects to the long appearance of property, until transforming a situation de facto in a situation de jure. Concurrently, as the courts also considered, in justifying the institution of usucaption one cannot put aside the situation of the former owner, meaning that, indirectly, the usucaption is also a sanction against the former owner's passivity, who waived his own good and has not been interested in it for a long time, leaving it in the possession of another person who behaved as owner or as holder of another main real right.

Depending on the nature of the asset susceptible of usucaption, the usucaption may be of two main types: immovable usucaption and movable usucaption. In its turn, immovable usucaption may be extra-tabular immovable usucaption and immovable tabular usucaption.

As one will establish during the study, the extra-tabular usucaption operates in favor of the holder of the asset representing the subject of an ownership title over an immovable asset that was not registered with the land register, tabular immovable usucaption operates in the favor of a person who is registered in the land register as the rightful onwer of a key immovable property right, only if the registration was maded without "legitimate grounds".

Keywords: usucapio, right of ownership, possession, real estate usucapio, movable assets usucapio.

1. Introduction

The article presents the usucapio as a modality of acquiring the right of ownership and other main real rights by exercising an uninterrupted possession over an asset, within the term and under the conditions provided for by the legislation in force. It should be mentioned that were taken into consideration the relevant dispositions of the Civil Code and the most important jurisprudence in the field.

2. Content

2.1. Means of Acquiring the Ownership Title

If in the 1864 Civil Code[1], the listing of the means to acquire the ownership title was imprecise and incomplete[2], being often criticized for the conflict it generated to the rules and principles of law[3], in the Civil code in force[4], art.557 with the marginal title "Acquiring the Ownership Title" orders, under paragraph (1), in a more rigorous and clearer systematization, that "The ownership title may be acquired according to the law, by convention, legal or testamentary inheritance, accession, usucaption, as an effect of the good-faith possession in the case of

* Assistant Professor, PhD. Faculty of Law, "Romanian-American" University, Associate Lawyer "Roș și Asociații" Law Firm (e-mail: ciprian.romitan@rvsa.ro)

[1] Published with the Official Gazette no.271 of 4 December 1864, no. 7 (suppl.) of 12 January 1865, no.8 (suppl.) of 13 January 1865, no. 8 (suppl.) of 13 January 1865, no. 8 (suppl.) of 14 January 1865, no. 11 (suppl.) of 16 January 1865, no. 13 (suppl.) of 19 January 1865.

[2] For details, see Corneliu Bîrsan, Civil Law. Key Real Property Rights in the New Civil Code, "Hamangiu" Printing House, Bucharest, 2013, p.353.

[3] Claudia Vișoiu, Usucaption Procedure. Regulated by the 1864 Civil Code, Law Decree no. 115/1938 and by the New Civil Code, "Hamangiu" Printing House, Bucharest, 2011, p.9.

[4] Law no. 287/2009 regarding the New Civil Code, published with the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 511 of 24 July 2009. The Civil Code came into force on 1 October 2011, according to the Law no. 71/2011 regarding the enforcement of Law no. 287/2009 on the Civil Code, published with the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 409 of 10 June 2011 (hereinafter referred to as Official Gazette).

movable assets and of the fruit thereof, through occupation, Traditio, as well as by court order, if it involves property transfer as such" (our emphasis). Moreover, according to the law, the ownership title may also be acquired by to the effect of an administrative act (paragraph 2), and the law may further regulate other means of acquiring the ownership title paragraph (3).

At the same time, according to art. 557(4), except for certain situations stipulated under the law, in the case of fixed assets, the ownership title is acquired by registration with the real estate register, in compliance with the provisions in art.888 of the Civil Code[5]. According to art. 56(1) of the Law no.71/2011 on the enforcement of the new Civil Code, the provisions in art. 557 (4) only apply after the completion of the of cadaster works for each administrative-territorial unit and the opening, upon request or ex-officio, of the real estate registers for the respective properties, according to the provisions in Law no. 7/1996 on cadaster and real estate publicity, republished, as amended and supplemented[6].

It should be mentioned that usucaption should not be mistaken for occupation[7], regulated by art.941 of the Civil Code, and which is another primary means of acquiring title, even though the two institutions are similar, since they both are effects of possession.

2.2. Acquiring the Onwership Title through Usucaption

2.2.1. Preliminary Remarks and Notion

Usucaption, "this benevolent tribute of the law before this status quo-possession"[8], was first mentioned in Romanian Laws of the XII Tables (lex duodecim tabularum) of 449 BC and it was defined as "usus autoritas fundi biennium, ceterarum rerum annuus est usus", which imposed an ownership period of two years in the case of fixed assets and of one year in the case of movable assets[9].

In Romanian modern law, referred to as acquisitive prescription[10], usucaption was first regulated in the Civil Code adopted on 1864, which stipulated two types, i.e.: short-term usucaption, of 10 to 20 years (art.1895) and long-term usucaption (logissimi temporis), of 30 years (art.1890).

In the Civil Code enforced on 1 October 2011, usucaption, which the editors of the 1804 French Civil Code described as "the most necessary for social order of all civil law institutions"[11], is legally regulated in Book III (On Assets), Title VIII (Possession), Chapter III (Effects of Possession), where a number of 8 articles are dedicated to it (art.928-934 and art.939).

Usucaption is defined as "the means of acquiring the onwership title and other key property rights by exerting uninterrupted possession over an asset, within the term and under the conditions stipulated in the laws in force"[12]. Other opinions describe usucaption as "a means of acquiring the key property rights through the possession of assets representing their subject throughout the period stipulated under the law and through the positive exertion of the right of option with regards to the usucaption, as a discretionary option"[13], or "a means of acquiring the ownership title or other property rights concerning a certain asset, through the uninterrupted possession of the respective asset for the period set under the law"[14].

Usucaption, as a means of acquiring key property rights[15], has a complex structure reuniting the stricto sensu legal fact of possession with all the determinations imposed under the law and a unilateral legal act, i.e., the manifect will of the person interested in acquiring a certain key material right[16]. It may be stated that usucaption, as a manner of acquiring key

---

[5] Art.888 of the Civil Code stipulates that the entry of the acquisition of an ownership title with the real estate publicity register is carried out "on the basis of the authenticated notary document, of the final court order, of the heir certificate or on the basis of any other document issued by the administrative bodies, if so stipulated under the law."

[6] Published with the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I no. 459 of 25 June 2015. For a detailed review of the usucaption regulation, see Adrian Stoică, Anthony Murphy, Review of Usucaption as regulated under the New Civil Code, in "Dreptul" Magazine no.7/2016, pp.66-76.

[7] According to art.941 of the Civil Code, "(1) The holders of an asset pertaining to no one becomes the owner of the respective asset, by occupation, as of the date on which they came into the possession of the same, but only if such coming into possession abides by the legal provisions. (2) Stray assets are abandoned movable and fixed assets, as well as assets that, through their very nature, do not have an owner, such as wild animals, fish and living aquatic resources in natural fish habitats, forest fruit, spontaneous flora edible mushrooms, medicinal and aromatic plants and other such. (3) Movable assets of very low value or extensively damaged that are left in a public area, including on a public road or on public transportation means, are regarded as abandoned assets".

[8] For details, see Philippe Jestaz, Prescription et possession en droit français des biens, Recueil Dalloz-Sirey, 1984, Chronique, 5e Cahier, p.27, apud Eugen Roșioru, Usucaption in Romanian Civil Law, "Hamangiu" Printing House, Bucharest, 2008, p.1.

[9] Eugen Roșioru, op.cit. p.7.

[10] The Calimach Code, compiled by Christian Flechtenmacher and Anania Cuzanos, with the contribution of Andronache Donici, Damaschin Bojincă and of other jurists of the time, passed in 1817, regulated "usucaption" (art.1907) distinctly from "extinctive prescription" – "loss of a right" (art.1906), even though the two phrases are equivalent. See Eugen Roșioru, op.cit., pp.5-6.

[11] See the Recitals to the title "De la prescription", in Marcel Planoil, Georges Ripert, Droit civil français, t. III: Les Biens, Librairie Générale de Droit et Jurisprudence, ed. II-a, Paris, 1952, p.697, apud Ana Boar, Certain Aspects Regarding the New Regulation of Usucaption in the New Civil Code, in "Studia Universitatis Babeș-Bolyai, Jurisprudentia", no.4/2013, p.9.

[12] Gabriel Boroi, Carla Alexandra Anghelescu, Bogdan Nazat, Civil Law Course. Key Property Rights, 2nd issue, revisited and supplemented, "Hamangiu" Printing House, Bucharest, 2013, p.272.

[13] Valeriu Stoica, Civil Law. Key Property Rights, 3rd issue, "C.H. Beck" Printing House, Bucharest, 2017, p.363.

[14] Corneliu Bîrsan, op.cit. (2013), p.385.

[15] The High Court of Cassation and Justice, 1st Civil Division, Decision no.123 of 19 January 2017 passed in closed session, available at www.csj.ro (accessed on 04.02.2018).

[16] For details, see Corneliu Bîrsan, op.cit., p.386 and the following, Valeriu Stoica, op.cit., p.361 and the following property rights, encompasses possession. In other words, "possession is an element of usucaption"[17].

Usucaption also is a primary means of acquiring property, but, at the same time, as the law courts have also statuated, in justifying the usucaption institution, the former owner status cannot be disregarded, in that usucaption indirectly also is a sanction against the passive attitude of the former owner who relinquishe its asset and left it unattended for a long period of time, leaving it in the possession of another person who behaved as the owner or holder of a different key material right[18]. Moreover, as Professor Corneliu Bîrsan also appreciated, usucaption "concerns a legitimate general interest purpose, meant to favor legal security, by paralyzing the possible action for recovery of possession lodged by the actual owner"[19].

2.2.2. General Scope

Even though in everyday activity it is stated that assets are acquired through usucaption, in reality, usucaption allows for the acquiry of the ownership title and of other key property titles over the assets representing the subject of these rights, such as: usufruct, superficies, and servitudes. In so far as easements are concerned, according to art.763 of the Civil Code, tabular usucaption allows for the acquiring of all types of servitude, whereas extra-abular usucaption only allows for the acquiring of positive servitudes[20]. Moreover, according to art.928 of the Civil Code, the holder may acquire the ownership title over the possessed asset or, as applicable, the ownership title over its fruit. Receivables may not be the subject of usucaption[21].

Usucaption may not apply in the case of public property fixed assets because both the Constitution of Romania, in art.136 (4)[22], and other regulations, such as the provisions in art.120 (2) of the Local Public Administration Law no.215/2001, republished[23], in art.5 (2) of the Law no.18/1991 on the Land Fund[24], stipulate that the assets that belong to the public or administrative-territorial unit domain are "inalienable, imprescriptible and unattachable". It should be further mentioned that fixed assets belonging to the state or administrative-territorial unit public property are "imprescriptible both extinctively and acquisitively"[25].

2.3. Types of Usucaption in the Civil Code System in Force

Depending on the nature of the asset susceptible of usucaption, the usucaption may be of two main types: immovable usucaption (art.930-934) and movable usucaption (art.939). In its turn, immovable usucaption may be extra-tabular immovable usucaption and immovable tabular usucaption.

2.3.1. Extra-tabular Immovable Usucaption

According to art.930(1) of the Civil Code, with the marginal title "extra-tabular usucaption", the ownership title over an immovable asset and its dismemberments may be entered with the land register, on the grounds of the usucaption, in favor of the party holding possession over the same for 10 years, if:

a) the owner entered with the land register is deceased or if the owner was a legal entity that ceased to exist;
b) the ownership waiver was entered with the land register;
c) the property was not entered in any land register.

In all cases, according to the provisions in pargraph (2) of the same article, the usucapant may only acquire the right if the land register entry application was submitted before a third party entered its own application for the registration of the title in its favor, on the basis of legitimate grounds, during or even after the elapse of the usucaption term[26].

According to art. 932(1) of the Civil Code, in the cases stipulated under art. 930(1)(a) and (b), the usucaption term only starts lapsing after the decease or, as applicable, the cessation of the legal existence of the owner, respectively after the entry of the property waiver application, even if the entry into possession occurred at a prior date. In other words, in the case stipulated in art.930(1)(a) of the Civil Code, the 10-year term starts lapsing as follows: as of the possession commencement date, if the usucapant starts exerting the possession over the property prior to the decease of the physical person or, as applicable, the cessation of [17] Valeriu Stoica, The Right of Option Regarding Usucaption, in "Dreptul", Magazine no. 4/2006, p.47.

[18] See the High Court of Cassation and Justice, Panel of Judges for the settlement of certain legal matters, Decision no.24 of 3 April 2017, published with the Official Gazette no. 474 of 23 June 2017; the High Court of Cassation and Justice, Civil and Intellectual Property Division, Decision no.2550 of 31 March 2005, apud Gabriel Boroi, Carla Alexandra Anghelescu, Bogdan Nazat, op.cit., p.272.

[19] ECHR, Grand Chamber, Decision of 30 August 2007, passed in the case of J.A. Pye (Oxford) Ltd. and J.A.Pye (Oxford) Land Ltd vs. United Kingdom, §74, unpublished, www.echr.coe.int, apud Corneliu Bîrsan, Civil Law. Key Real Property Rights in the New Civil Code, 3rd issue, revisited and updated, "Hamangiu" Printing House, Bucharest, 2017, p.385.

[20] For details, see Irina Sferdian, Servitude Usucaption in the New Civil Code, in "Revista română de științe juridice" no. 1/2015, pp.59-71.

[21] Also see Rodica Peptan, Usucaption in the New Civil Code, in "Dreptul" Magazine, pp.12-13. For information on the regulation of usucaption in other law systems, see Dan Teodorescu, Scope of Usucaption in the Austrian Law System, in "Studia Universitatis Babeș-Bolyai, Jurisprudentia", no. 4/2009, accessible at https://studia.law.ubbcluj.ro/articol/316 (accessed on 06.02.2018).

[22] According to art.136 (4) of the Constitution of Romania, "Public property assets are inalienable. According to the organic law, their administration may be assigned to the public companies or institutions or they may be granted under concession or leased; moreover, they may also be granted for free use to public utility units".

[23] Republished in the Official Gazette no. 621 of 18 July 2006 and rectified in the Official Gazette no. 776 of 13 September 2006, where the texts were renumbered.

[24] Republished in the Official Gazette no. 299 of 4 November 1997.

[25] Corneliu Bîrsan, op.cit. (2017), p.386.

[26] For further information, please see Valeriu Stoica, The Discretionary Right of Extra-Tabular Immovable Usucaption, in "Revista română de drept privat", no. 3/2013, pp. 9-23.

the existence of the legal person entered as owner in the land register; as of the decease or existence cessation date of the owner entered with the land register, if the usucapant started exerting possession prior to the decease or cessation of existence.

Moroever, in the case stipulated in art. 930(1)(b) of the Civil Code, the 10-year term shall start lapsing: as of th entry date of the property waiver, if the entry into possession occurred prior to or even on this date; as of the possession commencement date, if the usucapant started exerting possession subsequent to the entry of the property waiver.

With regards to the situation stipulated in art. 930(1) (c) of the Civil Code, the 10-year term starts lapsing as of the possession commencement date[27].

However, as it also follows from the review of art. 930(2) of the Civil Code, for the three cases of extra-tabular usucaption, it is not sufficient to only exert useful possession, but, instead, it is mandatory that the usucapant submits the land register application before a third party enters its own application for the registration of the title in its favor, on the basis of legitimate grounds, during or even after the elapse of the usucaption term[28].

Pursuant to the above, it may be stated that in order to acquire a key property title by extra-tabular usucaption, certain conditions must be fulfilled, i.e.: the possession over the asset must extent over 10 years; the possession must be useful, i.e., untainted, because, according to art.922(1) of the Civil Code, it is only the useful possession that is able to produce legal effects[29] and the last condition is that the usucapant enter is title registration application in its favor before a third party enters its own title registration application, on the basis of legal grounds, during or even after the lapse of the usucaption term[30].

Finally, the specialized literature defines extra-tabular usucaption as "the means of acquiring the private property right or a dismemberment of this right over a fixed asset by exerting the property title over such asset for 10 years, according to the legal provisions"[31].

2.3.2. Tabular Immovable Usucaption

According to art. 931(1) of the Civil Code, "The rights of the person who was registered, without due grounds, with the land register as owner of an asset or holder of a different property right, may no longer be challenged if the person registered in good-faith possessed the immovable asset for 5 years as of the entry of the registration application, if the possession was not tainted". Moreover, paragraph (2) of the same article stipulates that "it is sufficient that the good-faith exists upon the entry of the registration application and upon the entry into possession"[32].

Starting from these provisions, Professor Corneliu Bîrsan has defined tabular immovable usucaption as "the means of acquiring a key property right over an immovable asset through the exertion, by the person registered in the land register without legitimate grounds as the holder of the right, of untainted and good-faith possession for 5 years"[33].

A review of the legal text (art.931 of the Civil Code) reveals that in order for tabular usucaption to operate, the following preconditions must be observed[34]:

- a real estate property right must be registered with the land register, without any legitimate grounds;
- the registered individual must have exerted useful possession over the asset representing the subject of the immovable property, i.e., the property must be untainted and in good-faith;
- the possession must extend for at least 5 years.

Generally, the phrase "without legitimate grounds" used in art. 931(1) of the Civil Code, as shown by Professor Valeriu Stoica, designates "an invalid acquisition title, because it is affected by a cause of absolute nullity and which, in most cases, emanates from the actual owner, and from a non dominus"[35].

Good-faith means "the mistaken belief of the holder that he acquired the asset from the actual owner". Good-faith must exist, according to the provisions in art. 931(2) of the Civil Code, upon the entry of the registration application and upon the entry into possession. The fact that the holder subsequently

---

[27] Gabriel Boroi, Carla Alexandra Anghelescu, Bogdan Nazat, op.cit., p.230.

[28] Also see Sergiu I. Stănilă, Exceptions from the Constitutive Nature of the Land Register Entry. Inheritance. Usucaption, in "Revista română de științe juridice", no.1/2013, pp.200-209.

[29] According to art.922 of the Civil Code, "(1) Except for the situations stipulated under the law, only useful possession may produce legal effects. (2) Discontinuous, disturbed or clandestine possession is not regarded as useful. Until proven differently, possession is presumed useful". Also see Bujorel Florea, Civil Law. Key Property Rights, "Universul Juridic" Printing House, Bucharest, 2011, p.173.

[30] See Eugen Chelaru, Civil Law. Key Real Property Rights in the New Civil Code, 4th issue, "C.H. Beck" Printing House, Bucharest, 2013, p.437.

[31] Corneliu Bîrsan, op.cit. (2017), p.403.

[32] The provisions in art. 931 of the Civil Code on immovable usucaption only apply if the possession started after the enforcement date thereof. For the cases in which the possession started prior to this date, the provisions regarding usucaption in force as on the posession start date shall apply. Concerning the properties for which, upon the possession start date, prior to the enforcement of the Civil Code, no land registers were open, the provisions regarding usucaption in the 1864 Civil Code shall continue to apply (see art. 82 of the Law no. 71/2011).

[33] Corneliu Bîrsan, op.cit. (2017), p.406. For a review of tabular usucaption, see Marian Nicolae, Tabular Usucaption in the New Civil Code. Material and Transitory (Intertemporal) Law Aspects, in "Dreptul" Magazine, no.3/2013, pp.13-48.

[34] Regarding these preconditions, please see Valeriu Stoica, op.cit., (2017), p.395; Gabriel Boroi, Carla Alexandra Anghelescu, Bogdan Nazat, op.cit., p.232; Corneliu Bîrsan, op.cit., (2017); Eugen Chelaru, op.cit., pp.436-437; Iosif Robi Urs, Petruța Elena Ispas, Civil Law. Theory of Property Rights, 2nd issue, revisited and supplemented, "Hamangiu" Printing House, Bucharest, 2015, pp.165-166; Cristian Jora, Civil Law. Property Rights in the New Civil Code, "Universul Juridic" Printing House, Bucharest, 2012, p. 290.

[35] For details, see Valeriu Stoica, op.cit. (2017), pp.394-395.

realized the error is of no relevance (mala fides superveniens non impedit usucapionem)[36].

The ownership title is acquired on the basis of the title entered with the land register, the acquisition time being the date of the application for the entry of the right with the land register[37].

2.3.3. Movable Usucaption

The possibility to acquire a movable asset by usucaption is, for the first time, regulated in the Romanian civil law[38]. Thus, according to art.939 of the Civil Code, "The person possessing another person's asset for 10 years, under other conditions than the ones stipulated herein, may acquire the ownership title, on the grounds of usucaption. The provisions in art. 932(2), art. 933 and 934 shall duly apply". Pursuant to the review of the aforementioned text, it may be noted that this actually is a subsidiary means, applicable to the holder who cannot invoke good-faith possession as a means of acquiring the ownership title over the asset.

Hence, movable usucaption may be invoked only if the following conditions are observed:

- the possession exerted by the holder must be useful, i.e., untainted. All taints shall suspend the course of the usucaption, in which case the provisions in art. 932(2) of the Civil Code shall apply, according to which "The tainting of possession suspend the course of the usucaption";
- the holder must possess the asset for 10 years, whether it is in good- or ill-faith[39].

As professor Gabriel Boroi & Co have shown[40], in "the absence of explicit legal provisions, we only have to admit that movable usucaption does not apply retroactively, hence, the holder becomes an owner as of the elapse of the 10-year term, and not as of the possession commencement date".

3. Conclusions

At the end of this research, it may be concluded that usucaption is a means of acquiring key property rights, but not a primary one of acquiring the ownership, which is why it is appreciated that it is the most necessary civil law institution, useful for social order, seeking a legitimate, general interest purpose, meant to favor legal safety.

Moreover, it may be noted that while extra-tabular usucaption operates in favor of the holder of the asset representing the subject of an ownership title over an immovable asset that was not registered with the land register, tabular immovable usucaption operates in the favor of a person who is registered in the land register as the rightful onwer of a key immovable property right, only if the registration was maded without "legitimate grounds".

References

- Corneliu Bîrsan, Civil Law. Key Real Property Rights in the New Civil Code, 3rd issue, revisited and updated, "Hamangiu" Printing House, Bucharest, 2017
- Corneliu Bîrsan, Civil Law. Key Real Property Rights in the New Civil Code, "Hamangiu" Printing House, Bucharest, 2013
- Ana Boar, Certain Aspects Regarding the New Regulation of Usucaption in the New Civil Code, in "Studia Universitatis Babeș-Bolyai, Jurisprudentia", no.4/2013
- Gabriel Boroi, Carla Alexandra Anghelescu, Bogdan Nazat, Civil Law Course. Key Property Rights, 2nd issue, revisited and supplemented, "Hamangiu" Printing House, Bucharest, 2013
- Ion P. Filipescu, Andrei I. Filipescu, Civil Law. Ownership Title and Other Property Rights, "Universul Juridic" Printing House, Bucharest, 2006
- Bujorel Florea, Civil Law. Key Property Rights, "Universul Juridic" Printing House, Bucharest, 2011
- Eugen Chelaru, Civil Law. Key Real Property Rights in the New Civil Code, 4th issue, "C.H. Beck" Printing House, Bucharest, 2013
- Philippe Jestaz, Prescription et possession en droit français des biens, Recueil Dalloz-Sirey, 1984, Chronique, 5e Cahiei
- Cristian Jora, Civil Law. Property Rights in the New Civil Code, "Universul Juridic" Printing House, Bucharest, 2012
- Marian Nicolae, Tabular Usucaption in the New Civil Code. Material and Transitory (Intertemporal) Law Aspects, in "Dreptul" Magazine, no.3/2013
- Rodica Peptan, Usucaption in the New Civil Code, in "Dreptul" Magazine
- Marcel Planoil, Georges Ripert, Droit civil français, t. III: Les Biens, Librairie Générale de Droit et Jurisprudence, 2nd issue, Paris, 1952
- Eugen Roșioru, Usucaption in Romanian Civil Law, "Hamangiu" Printing House, Bucharest, 2008
- Irina Sferdian, Servitude Usucaption in the New Civil Code, in "Revista română de științe juridice" no. 1/2015

[36] Ion P. Filipescu, Andrei I. Filipescu, Civil Law. Ownership Title and Other Property Rights, "Universul Juridic" Printing House, Bucharest, 2006, p. 320.

[37] Valeriu Stoica, op.cit. (2017), p.395.

[38] Iosif Robi Urs, Petruța Elena Ispas, op.cit. p.166.

[39] See Corneliu Bîrsan, op.cit. (2017), Valeriu Stoica, op.cit., (2017), p.396; Eugen Chelaru, op.cit., p.441; Iosif Robi Urs, Petruța Elena Ispas, op.cit., p.166.

[40] Gabriel Boroi, Carla Alexandra Anghelescu, Bogdan Nazat, op.cit., p.234.

- Sergiu I. Stănilă, Exceptions from the Constitutive Nature of the Land Register Entry. Inheritance. Usucaption, in "Revista română de științe juridice", no.1/2013
- Valeriu Stoica, Civil Law. Key Property Rights, 3rd issue, "C.H. Beck" Printing House, Bucharest, 2017
- Valeriu Stoica, The Discretionary Right of Extra-Tabular Immovable Usucaption, in "Revista română de drept privat", no. 3/2013, pp.9-23
- Valeriu Stoica, The Right of Option Regarding Usucaption, in "Dreptul", Magazine no. 4/2006
- Adrian Stoică, Anthony Murphy, Review of Usucaption as Regulated under the New Civil Code, in "Dreptul" Magazine no.7/2016
- Dan Teodorescu, Scope of Usucaption in the Austrian Law System, in "Studia Universitatis Babes-Balyai Jurisprudentia", nr.4/2009, accessible at https://studia.law.ubbcluj.ro/ articol/316
- Iosif Robi Urs, Petruța Elena Ispas, Civil Law. Theory of Property Rights, 2nd issue, revisited and supplemented, "Hamangiu" Printing House, Bucharest, 2015
- Claudia Vișoiu, Usucaption Procedure. Regulated by the 1864 Civil Code, Law Decree no. 115/1938 and by the New Civil Code, "Hamangiu" Printing House, Bucharest, 2011
- Civil Code

SCHOLASTIC LEGAL ENTITIES

Dan-Alexandru SITARU*

Abstract

The purpose of this paper is to bring into light a newly appeared type of legal person unknown until now, or at least until the Education Law in 2011. Since nothing concrete has been made to implement this new type of legal entity in the general picture, except for some small decisions of the Ministry for Education, nowadays the practice and the fiscal administration forces this intro the reality of things.

A scholastic entity has on purpose only and that is to allow education services to be provided in an organizes manner. This entity is similar to a company, association or foundation but differs from all these by the fact that it does not have a patrimony of its own and it is funded by a financing entity which registers it and supports it in order that throw it to make the activity of education.

Long has the idea of education been debated if education is a profit or non-profit orientated activity or a mixed one. By compiling different rules from different laws, we may wet get a picture of what a scholastic legal entity should be and how it works, because it must be implemented to provide this service any more.

Keywords: Legal entity, scholastic, financing entity, education, activity.

1. Introduction.

A legal entity is fiction of the law that has legal capacity to assume right and obligations, to own assets and have liabilities and who has there main characteristics: (i) has personal patrimony composed of goods given to it by the founding members, (ii) has its own governing bodies, independent from the shareholders, that give purpose and conduct the will of the legal entity, (iii) has an independent scope, different from that of its shareholders, that is given by the founding members and declared from the beginning within the constitutive act of the entity. The scope may be either commercial (profit orientated), civil (non-profit orientated) or administrative (public legal entity)[1].

All legal entities must have at least one main domain in which to operate. Whether it is for profit or not, upon drafting the constitutive acts of a legal entity the founding members must declare a purpose and at least one main activity as a condition for the legal entity to be legally registered. Depending on the scope of the legal entity, there is the Trade Office for registering a profit orientated company[2], there are the Courts of Justice for registering a non-profit orientated company[3] and there are special registration conditions for public legal entities.

Scholastic activities are specified as one the activities that may be chosen by the founding members as a legal entity's main activity. Education is a form of activity[4] that, until recently could have been either profit or non-profit orientated. Lately the legislation tends to consider education as non-profit orientated activity and to regulate it by giving birth to a new legal entity specially tailored for education, with its own registry and set of rules.

Until now, should a person desire to provide education services, it may register either a profit-oriented company such as a limited liability company or a non-profit orientated company such as association or a foundation. But the discussion by the practitioners of law is long regarding whether education can be catalogued as a profit orientated activity since all education providers, regardless if they are private or public schools, are part of the national education system and serve a public purpose.

2. Definitions

Most of the terminology used in the education domain is defined by the Education Law[5]. This states in art. 22 that the national system for education is composed by all the public, private, confessional seminars or professional schools that are licensed to operate in Romania.

According to this law, education may be public or private. Also, education is pre-university or university level. The present article only refers to the pre-university level of education, giving mention of all sub

* Lecturer, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Lawyer, member of the Bucharest Bar (e-mail: dan.alexandru@sitaru.ro)

[1] See G. Boroi, Civil law. General part. Persons., edition 4, 2010, Hamangiu printing, page 83 and next.

[2] See Law no. 26/1990 regarding the trade office, published in Official Gazette, part I, no. 49/1998.

[3] See Ordinance no. 26/2000 regarding associations and foundation, published in the Official Gazette, part I, no. 39/2000.

[4] All activities permitted by the Romanian law are listed in the Classification of activities of the national economy, which has the rank of a law, published in the Official Gazette , Part I, no. 293/2007. Education is listed as activity no. 85 and has many species.

[5] See National Education Law, no. 1/2011, published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no. 18/2011.

levels such as pre-school, junior school, high school or professional schools.

Also, from art. 22 mentioned above, the conclusion derives that the national education system is composed of scholastic entities that have legal entity status. This entities function under the direct control of the local county or prefecture.

By explicitly augmenting the law, the Ministry for Education in Romania has issued a series of explanatory directives regarding the creation, registration, legal regime and functioning of the scholastic legal entities. The most important of all is Directive no. 33675/28.02.2013 regarding the registration and obtaining of legal entity status by private scholastic entities. This Directive is arguing for the necessity of scholastic legal entities and setting some guidelines for newly or already existing companies that provide education services. This all so that all those who already provide such services, or wish to do so, may enter into legality and a pattern and order be achieved.

A definition of the scholastic entity may be found in Order no. 5472/2017 of the Ministry for Education[6], which regulates also the methodology regarding the national educational network. In art. 20 pt. b) of the Order one may find that the scholastic legal entity is any education entity fully or provisory licensed to provide pre-university education services, having a specific set of elements that define it: a constitutive act or a Court order, fiscal identification no, stamp and bank account.

Separately, the same Order regulates, at pt. c) of the same article, that there are also assigned scholastic entities which represent scholastic entity without legal entity status, being subordinated to a scholastic legal entity, this representing a branch of it to provide services in another location.

By interpreting the same Order, another terminology arises, that of the financing entity that registers and supports the above mentioned scholastic legal entities[7]. The financing entity is either a profit-orientated or non-profit orientated company, being registered in compliance with the law that governs its statute, that sets up as one of its activities to provide education services. Such an entity may have education as its primary or secondary activity. It may expand any of those other activities in accordance to the specific provisions of the law, but should it desire to actually provide education services it has to separately register a scholastic legal entity, thus becoming the creator and the supporting body for that new entity.

In conclusion, a scholastic legal entity is a sui generis form of legal entity, created and financed by a company, an association or a foundation, having independent patrimony and decision capacity, that emits no shares, by which education services may be provided on behalf of the creating entity.

3. Characteristics and conditions for functioning

3.1. A scholastic legal entity is mandatory henceforward. This conclusion derives from the explanatory directive issued by the Ministry for Education, that puts into effect the before unclear articles of Education Law no. 1/2011. Art. 92 (6) and 2541 (3) of Law no. 1.2011 mentioned the separation between the scholastic legal entity and the financing entity but do not define or explained the relationship between the two. Directive no. 33675/28.02.2013 sets clear the separation between both entities and also makes mandatory that, for the future, all entities that provide educational services are t be separated and special scholastic legal entity be created that has independent patrimony and leadership, also have a different judicial statute.

The Directive explains that the separation between the two entities comes from the need to catalogue all education service providers, thus creating a special register different from those that already exist and catalogue companies in general and also from different practices that can be found in different regions that need to be standardized. Non-the less, a unified taxation was taken into consideration.

Specifically, Directive no. 33675/28.02.2013 argues that under the provisions of Law no. 87/2006[8], which sets the preliminary conditions needed to be fulfilled by an aspirant to provide education services, most of the current situation may be summed up as the full company is registered as an education provider although it has may other activities that are under performance. In most cases the separation between the two entities war not made, resulting in the fact that scholastic activities were a simple extension of the company, association or foundation, with no independent legal or fiscal status. From this, first of all results an unclear transfer of funds for the education providing activity and other activities; secondly, the education personnel are not separated and enters into work contract with the company, association or foundation, and not with the scholastic entity, which is in direct violation of Law no. 1/2011 regarding national education; thirdly, although the license for education service provider has been issued no government funds for education may be accessed due to a lack of separation between the scholastic entity which is solely entitled to such funds.

[6] Order no. 5472/2017 of the Ministry for Education, published in Official Gazette, part I, no. 914 from 22 November 2017, for the underlining the no of schools distribution of scholars within the pre-university system among the scholastic entities and for issuing the bill for the organization of the national pre-university education network for the 2018-2019 school year. The Order contains a Methodology for implementation of the pre-university educational system. The order is issued every year and is applied to that specific school year.

[7] See art. 23 or 27 (2) of the Methodology for Order no. 5472/2017.

[8] Law no. 87/2006 for the validation of Government Ordonnance no. 75/2005 regarding quality standards in education services, published in Official Gazette part I no. 334/2006.

3.2. A scholastic legal entity is separated from its creator and financing entity but bears strong connections with it. Therefor it is a legal entity, having some characteristics of a legal entity, namely it has a it has separate governing bodies and leadership and it has a separate sole scope to provide educational activity (in contrast to a company, association or foundation which may have multiple activities). But although it my have its own patrimony the ownership of the assets is the financing entity.

Unlike a company, it does not issue shares. The point of a scholastic entity is not to create dividends for the shareholders, its organization resembles more towards an enterprise, as regulated by the Civil Code in art. 3. But it would be a mistake to catalogue it as an enterprise because it is a legal person thus having rights and obligations of its own not of the entrepreneur or members it is composed of like and enterprise. The only similarities between an enterprise and a legal person are that they both have an activity and use capital to realize that activity.

Speaking of activity, a scholastic legal entity is solely allowed by law to provide education services. The point of the legislator is to set once and for all that education is a non-profit activity but with a special legal regime. This refers to the fact that not only non-profit organizations may create and finance a scholastic legal entity but also a profit orientated company regulated by Company Law no. 31/1990[9]. But in all cases, who finances the company must not have any impact upon the nature of the activity, education must remain a civil activity. The Fiscal Code already provides such a distinction by setting a separate set of rules for taxation of pre-university educational services provides by a private entity, then those of a profit orientated company[10].

3.3. As mentioned in the definition given by Order no. 5472/2017 of the Ministry for Education, a scholastic legal entity must have a set of defining elements. All these elements must be met all at once.

Firstly, it must be created and registered based on either a constitutive act, a Court order or a public authority issued order. These possibilities come from the fact that education services may be provided by a private entity, in which case a constitutive act must be drafted by the financing entity, or by a public entity, in which case the hierarchically superior public entity must draft a public bill laying out the statute and rules of caring out the activity. A by ruling a Court of Law may give legal status to a scholastic entity should the financing person be a non-profit association or foundation, or in the case were the creating or registration of a scholastic entity is challenged in court for any reason, and the courts rules in favor of constituting it.

Secondly, it must have a fiscal identification number, different from that of the financing entity. This allows it to be a separate taxation subsect, to receive special fiscal privileges and to be able to access government funs for education.

Thirdly, it must have a special stamp. This stamp differs from the regular stamps of the financing entity because it is allowed to bear the name of the ministry of education and the emblem which are public domains and otherwise forbidden from usage by private persons. This stamp stays with the specially appointed manager or director who has the authority to sign on behalf of the scholastic entity and apply the stamp to all issued documents.

Fourthly, it must have both a treasury account and a special bank account opened on the scholastic entity's name. The treasury account serves the purpose of receiving government funds for education and paying taxes. The bank account serves for the current daily activities, such as paying salaries and bills.

Last, it must have all the conditions for obtaining the license to provide education services. This is more of a future functioning condition than a registration condition but it is very important. Unless the license is obtained, at least the provisory license, no activity may begin.

3.4. In close relation with the last above mentioned defining element, art. 27 of the Methodology for Order no. 5472/2017 states that after registration and obtaining the license to provide education services, the financing entity must report to the local public authority all the specific required date regarding the scholastic entity (constitutive act, designation, address, levels of schooling, contact info etc.) for the purpose of being included in the local school network. This is also a condition for functioning by the law.

3.5. Finally, in accordance with art. 21 of the Methodology for Order no. 5472/2017, the scholastic legal entity shall have its own budget and will keep the books separately form the financing entity, in accordance with the Accountancy Law no. 82/1991[11] and other public finance laws. The designated accountant shall have all the responsibilities given to him by these laws and must organize a separate accounting compartment even if it also keeps the books for the financing entity as well, due to the fact that scholastic entities receive government funds for education, for which he is directly liable.

4. Management and the relation with the financing entity

4.1. According to Law no. 1/2011 management of the scholastic legal entity and the financing entity must be separate. The director of such an entity is also the manager of it. As long as the conditions for being a director of a scholastic entity are met, anybody may be named because nowhere in the legislation can be found that it must be a completely different person than one in connection with the financing entity. But managing the two entities, in respect to the specializes activities, the management must be kept different.

[9] Law no. 31/1990 regarding companies, republished in Official Gazette no. 1066/2004.
[10] See art. 15 (1) pt. b) of the Romanian Fiscal Code from 2015 republished.
[11] Accountancy Law no. 82/1991 published in Official Gazette part I no. 454/2008.

The directors of the scholastic entities are appointed by the management of the financing entity. The director must have all the qualifications required by law to occupy this position within the education system, in terms of professional, managerial skills and morality[12]. The act of appointment must be communicated to the educational public committee immediately after it was implemented[13].

The main responsibilities of a director are, in accordance to the same law[14], as follows:

- it legally represents the scholastic entity and manages it;
- it manages funds and budget;
- it is responsible for the conduct of all personnel and the success of providing education services;
- it may sign or terminate labor contracts with the tutors or other staff;
- coordinates all activities and makes reports or other obligations towards the public authorities etc.

The financing entity is free to appoint one or more directors and to set a hierarchy, making also a set of internal rules or instructions for conduct. Also, to set a duration for the term of a director and add to the conditions to be met for occupying this position. In the end, management rules and any other special rules may be set by the constitutive act of the scholastic entity and the director shall conduct its affairs in strict compliance to the law, the decisions of the board of directors of the scholastic entity and the internal regulations.

4.2. The relation between the scholastic legal entity and the financing entity must be based on a contract. Directive no. 33675/28.02.2013 does not nominate a specific contract but it gives examples such as a contract for administration, for lending money or goods either free or by means of retribution or for managing.

From all this, upon careful examination and in respect to the fiscal authorities who might not recognize the independent statute of the scholastic entity, it is recommended that a trust or a transaction contract be made. By this solution, the financing entity may support the scholastic entity with all the capital or goods it needs. Since the latter entity cannot support itself, as I have mentioned before, all the capital belongs to the financing entity in terms of ownership. The only personal funds of the scholastic entity are the governments funds for education that it is entitled to once a year.

The financing entity may only give away the necessary funding for all the activities of the scholastic entity, especially salaries for tutors, directors and other personnel, rent, maintenance etc. Therefor it must be pointed out that labor contract and all other contracts shall be signed by the scholastic entity by its directors, appearing as subject of right, but with the funds provided by the financing entity. As for expenditures this will be billed and registered in the accountancy books as of the scholastic entities but will also be funded by the financing entity. However, payment shall not be made directly from the financing entity to the tertiary party, but will be budgeted a couple of times a year to the scholastic entities bank account and it will pay all third parties. This idea comes from labor law who regulates in matters of labor contract that salary must be paid directly from employer to employee. Also fiscal law regulates that once a payment may be subject to tax deduction should it concern that legal entity and not another person.

At the end of the fiscal year, there is no need for the surplus of funds to be returned to the financing entity, but this operation may be made. If the capital remains in the scholastic entities bank account it may only be used to finance next years activity in the same manner (like we mentioned before, there are no shares therefore are no dividends). Under no circumstances may the governmental funds for education appropriated to the scholastic entity be given back to the financing entity, this being sanctioned as a possible fraud scheme.

As an intermediary conclusion, a trust or transaction contract is the best solution taking into consideration the present-day context of the law. This contract must lay the rules for payment, refunding, conditions for transfer, independent right of the scholastic entity to use the funds as it see fits under the provisions of the law and in accordance with its internal rules and board of directors decisions and especially a clause regarding a calendar for payments.

5. Conclusions and de lege ferenda proposals

It is clear that this entity is new and forming a complete analysis at this point is seemingly impossible. But a couple of things are clear, like the fact that education should be a non-profit activity and that having a registry for scholastic entities is a must have.

There is a good factor coming out of this lack of legislation, and that it the fact that practice will bring to light probably the best solution for how this new entity must fit in. But, this does not compensate for the fact that in other areas there is no legislation at all. Very important areas must be regulated, such as relation between entities, conditions for capital transfers between entities, defining terminology, setting criteria for governing and management, harmonization with other laws etc.

Sure, if a special law is incomplete one must apply the general law. But general law is vague and you have to cicle throw a lot of institutions in order to have an answer to a simple wet delicate question such as what is a the taxation of such an entity or can a scholastic entity be created and financed by both a profit or non-profit orientated company. This latter idea comes from the fact that education should be only non-profit but professional schools may not be. Again, there is no distinction and this is counterproductive for the demands of a modern economy, education being the fuel of this economy.

[12] See art. 254[1] of Law no. 1/2011, republished.
[13] See art. 60 of Law no. 1/2011, republished.
[14] See art. 97 of Law no. 1/2011, republished

Non-the less, a start has been made and we expect in the next years to have a continuation either by means of regulations and laws or by practice which will force an alignment.

References

- Text G. Boroi, Civil law. General part. Persons., edition 4, 2010, Hamangiu printing
- Law no. 26/1990 regarding the trade office
- Ordinance no. 26/2000 regarding associations and foundation
- Classification of activities of the national economy
- National Education Law, no. 1/2011
- Order no. 5472/2017 of the Ministry for Education
- Methodology for Order no. 5472/2017
- Law no. 31/1990 regarding companies
- Romanian Fiscal Code from 2015
- Accountancy Law no. 82/1991
- Civil Code of Romania

SUCCESSORAL CAPACITY PECULIARITIES OF THE ROMANIAN ECLESIASTICAL STAFF – A CASE OF ANOMALOUS INHERITANCE

Veronica STOICA*
Tiberiu Nicușor CHIRILUȚĂ

Abstract

The present study aims at radiographing the condition of the legal capacity to inherit, situated at the confluence of two domains, the legal and the theological one, with convergence points, but also with some distinct consequences. Thus, the basic benchmark of the study focuses on one of the fundamental conditions of the individual to be able to exploit mortis causa of their cujus patrimony, the ability to inherit. From this perspective, the authors have proposed to analyze the particular situation in which the person called to inherit under the law is a person of a special status, belonging to the ecclesiastical staff. Thus, special situations are identified, which derogate from the common law, with derogatory consequences from the normative character of the successor transfer. This is the case of monk succession, which is subjected, as we shall see, to special rules that generate, in the case of legal devolution, an anomalous succession in favor of the Diocese or the monastery, with the total exclusion of legal heirs.

Using the systemic method, the authors submitted to interpretation both the provisions of the Civil Code and some norms with a special character, which represent a reference point in the analyzed issue. In the absence of any doctrinal assessments as well as jurisprudential solutions, the present study may represent a starting point for the consecration of this anomalous succession case and the different consequences it identifies.

Keywords: legal inheritance, successoral capacity, church, monk, special law.

1. Introduction

The question of law to be analyzed derives from an attribute inherent in the human being, materialized and constitutional in that "the right to inheritance is guaranteed"[1]. The imperative of protecting this right also confers the legitimacy and the guarantee of the right to inheritance, thus constituting its intangibility.

The present approach has as a starting point a somewhat special hypothesis of the right to inheritance, that of the capacity to inherit of a category of individuals with a special status, that is, the ecclesiastical staff, a situation which at first sight should not deviate from the rules of common law, the Civil Code making no reference in this case.

The hypothesis is intended, of course, to interpret the provisions of the Civil Code and some special norms, being subject to provisions of the Functioning and Organization Statute of the Romanian Orthodox Church[2] (Statute of the Romanian Orthodox Church), Part IV, lit. D "Provisions on the succession rights of hierarchs and monks", art. 192-194. Is the latter a normative act that implies an atypical character of the well-known principles of the devolution of the inheritance? In particular, did the Statute referred to have and play the role of a special law that removes the applicability of civil provisions in the matter?

In order to answer these questions, a minimum of rigour obliges us to state both the laws that become applicable and, above all, the text that states the special effects, even the ones that are derogating from the legal legacy of the monks, to which we also join a brief presentation of the categories of ecclesiastical staff, which are the subject of this discussion.

Although at first sight an analysis of succession capacity in the context of current civil regulation[3] may seem an easy subject, however, all human activity, regardless of the field, is based on the synthetic concept of civilian capacity, and its exercise according to the legal milestones and boundaries gives the individual the general and abstract ability to have civil rights and obligations through the conclusion of legal acts, an aptitude that has a great influence in the legal life of a person.

Man is the cause and purpose of the law, both of civil and divine law. Claiming a privileged place within

* Professor, PhD, „Alexandru Ioan Cuza" Police Academy, Bucharest (e-mail: verostoica@yahoo.com).
 PhD Candidate, „Alexandru Ioan Cuza" Police Academy, Bucharest (e-mail: chirilutatiberiu@yahoo.com)

[1] Article 46 of the Romanian Constitution refers to both legal inheritance and testamentary legacy. The Constitution was amended and supplemented by the Law on the Revision of the Romanian Constitution no. 429/2003, published in the Official Journal no. 767 of 31 October 2003 and entered into force on 29 October 2003.

[2] Text approved by the Holy Synod of the Romanian Orthodox Church by Decision no. 4768/2007 and recognized under Law no. 489/2006 on religious freedom and the general regime of denominations, through Romanian Government Decision nr. 53 of 16 January 2008, published in the Official Journal of Romania Part I, no. 50 of 22 January 2008.

[3] The general regulation of the matter of inheritance is ensured by the Civil Code, in Book IV, entitled "On Inheritance and Liberties", art. 953-1163 and is concerned with legal relations that produce their effects at the end of a person's life. Prior to October 1, 2011, there were also other normative acts affecting legacy (for example, Act No. 319/1944 on a surviving spouse inheritance rights). We appreciate that the unitary regulation of the matter is beneficial in a single normative act.

the civil law, the succession field reflects, in essence, the completion of a person's life course, as a "legal response to the natural occurrence of death."[4]

"Inheritance," according to jurisconsult Julian, is nothing more than the acquisition of the whole right that the deceased had."[5] In other words, the succession right comes to legitimize the posterity of the deceased person, the accumulated patrimonial values, because the legal norms regard primarily the family of the missing person. On the other hand, the civil life of the person, the earthly life of the individual, is not indifferent to the Church, for the laws established by canons have as sole purpose the "salvation of the faithful"[6]. If in legal terms the death of a dead person implies the cessation of the civilian capacity of the deceased, from a religious point of view, death is only "the separation of the soul from the body", the soul being immaterial and eternal.

According to art. 953 Civil Code, "the inheritance is the transmission of the assets of a deceased individual to one or more persons in existence"[7]. From the interpretation of this text in conjunction with the provisions on property, according to art. 557 par. (1) C. civ., "The right to property can be acquired, under the law, by convention, by legal or testamentary inheritance (...)" it follows that inheritance is a way of acquiring mortis causa property through which de cujus, the deceased person, passes his or her heritage to one or more persons in existence[8].

Analyzing the definition given by art. 953 Civil Code, we can state that legacy is the transmission of the de cuius patrimony to one or more natural or legal persons, as acquirers[9]. The patrimony of a natural person - all of the patrimonial rights and obligations - is the permanent companion of the person throughout their life. The patrimony (the patrimonial asset and liability) does not disappear with the individual's termination of life, it is a factual reality in search of a legal subject to be attributed to[10]. Therefore, there can be no patrimony without a subject of right. Inheritance law provides the legal solution to transferring the patrimony of an individual at their time of death.

On the other hand, among the means of "patrimony acquirement," the Church can be the recipient of both inter-vivos and mortis causa liberties. In terms of patrimony, as a form of acquiring church heritage, canonists considered both the testamentary heritage, the most common type and the ab intestat one. According to how the Church was or was not recognized at different historical moments, there is much evidence proving the faithful believers desire to write legal documents to churches, monasteries[11]. In addition to these wills, the ab instestat form of inheritance is also mentioned, without a testament. This succession took place when someone, capable of having some heritage, dies without a testamentary heir, and the beneficiaries were governed by law. If there were no legal heirs, "the fortune was attributed to the Church, and especially to the monasteries, to serve the salvation of souls."[12].

Thus, in view of the above, the Church, as a legal person, may be the beneficiary of ties, by way of the testamentary inheritance. Throughout the paper, there will be identified atypical situations that have been missed by the legislator in drafting the Civil Code, situations that allow us to appreciate that the Church, through its dioceses and monasteries, may have a "legal" successor capacity, under its own regulations, and not under those of ordinary law. Obviously, we will talk about the situation of an anomalous heritage. In this context, we will refer to the inheritance of ecclesiastical staff and other normative forms of legitimacy in the field. Thus, by distinguishing the succession rights of this category, provisions will be interpreted in the functioning and organization Statute of the Romanian Orthodox Church[13].

2. Considerations about ecclesiastical staff

In accordance with the canon law, we will highlight and analyze the relevant canonical-legal aspects of the domestic law regarding the ability of ecclesiastical staff to inherit by comparative reporting to Orthodox canonical norms, seen as "legal rules of Christian society[14]."

A. Laity (or layman) is a broad category recognized by the Church, which includes the totality

[4] Jozsef Kocsis, Paul Vasilescu, Civil Law, Bucharest, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2016, p 1. The authors justify the role of establishing the set of legal rules not in the sense of "patrimonizing death", but in order to provide legal solutions for the fate of the heritage temporarily left without a holder, establishing by their content the destination of the asset and or the successor passive.

[5] Hereditas nihil est quam successio in universum ius quod defunctus habuit.

[6] Ioan N. Floca, Orthodox Canon Law. Church Law and Administration, Volume I, Bucharest, IBMBOR Publishing House, 1990, p. 43. Starting from the classification of canonical norms as prospective, pastoral, pedagogical and teleological, the author surprises the teleological type with a well-defined purpose: the believers' salvation.

[7] Art. 1 of the Law no. 71 for the implementation of the Civil Code: "Inheritances opened before the entry into force of the Civil Code are subject to the law in force at the date of the inheritance."

[8] Francis Deak, Romeo Popescu, Successor Law, vol. I, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013, p. 19.

[9] Veronica Stoica, Laurentiu Dragu, Legal Heritage, Bucharest, Publishing House Universul Juridic, 2012, p. 14; Gabriela Lupșan, Civil Law. Succesoral Law, Galati, Danubius Publishing House, 2012, pp. 14-15.

[10] D. C. Florescu, T*he Right of Inheritance in the New Civil Code*, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2012, p. 7.

[11] For details, dates, the role and status of the Church at various historical stages, see I. Floca, op.cit., Pp. 466-469; Arghiropol Ioan, What is meant by church wealth, Bucharest, 1937; Iorgu Ivan, The Church Goods in the First Six Centuries, Bucharest, 1937. Along with the simple bonds, universal or private, there were also the pious purposeful links, a real source of wealth.

[12] Ibid.

[13] Part IV of the BOR Statute, lit. D "Provisions on the succession rights of hierarchs and monks", art. 192-194.

[14] Constantin Dron, Current Value of Canons. Iași, Doxologia, 2016, p. 117.

of Christian believers, members of the Church, who do not have priestly status or the status of inferior servants of the Church[15]. From a confessional point of view, in order to have this secular quality as a member of the Church, the person in question must have received the Sacrament of the Holy Baptism. In other words, the layman is similar to the civilian law.

As a mere difference, within the civil law, the person acquires civilian capacity to use and implicitly to inherit, from the very birth or by exception, before birth, during the conception stage (provided that he is born alive[16]), while within canonical law, by receiving baptism, the individual acquires legal capacity of canon law, thus becoming a subject of rights and obligations from a canonical point of view. That difference, on the other hand, does not imply any dependency between the two areas. Thus, although he did not receive the mystery of baptism, the secular can inherit. Even the non-baptized, who do not belong to any ritual church, will not be religiously prevented from exercising their subjective right to inherit.

Thus, the layman - a majority of the ecclesiastical staff and a subject of the canon law, acquires legal succession capacity by applying the rules of civil law without any religious impediment.

B. The Clerics are all the priests established by ordination. Ordination[17] means "stretching out the hand," and ordination is the service through which the Sacrament or ministry of the priesthood is given or transmitted. By ordination, the consecration of the candidates for the steps of the higher clergy is done, namely the consecration to the deacon, the priest and the bishop or the bishop. Therefore, by clergy we understand the bishop, the priest and the deacon.

The Bishop represents the first and highest step of the clergy in the Orthodox Church. The bishop is that person chosen and sanctified through the sacrament of the priesthood, anointed in the upper episcopate by at least two bishops, to whom a diocese is usually given for pastoral care[18].

According to art. 130 of the Organization and Functioning Status of the Romanian Orthodox Church, "It is considered to be eligible for the service, the worthiness and responsibility of the Archbishop and the eparhial bishop any hierarchical member of the Holy Synod, starting from the vacant diocese, as well as any archimandrite or priest widow by death, fulfilling canonical conditions, who has a PhD or is a graduate in Theology and has distinguished himself through pure life, theological culture, ecclesiastical dignity, missionary zeal, and household abilities. The list of eligible hierarchs is drawn in descending order, starting with the vacant eparchy. "

It is important to note in the field of succession that the bishop can not be married.

The Priest - The Romanian explanatory dictionary defines the priest as "a person who officiates the religious cult, being, in this posture, a mediator between man and divinity and representing his fellows in the sphere of the sacred without disturbing it."

Article 123 of the BOR Statute stipulates that "ministers and deacons are recruited from doctors, Masters graduates and graduates of theological faculties, specialized in Pastoral Theology, who have held the priestly capacity examination." Among the main attributions of this category we can mention the following: it is the delegate of the chariarch in the parish, charged with the spiritual pastoral care of the faithful believers, and within the administrative activity he is the head of the parish administration, being the president of all the existing fora in the parish, Parochial Assembly, Council and Committee.

In their turn, the category of priests knows a subclassification, the priestly priests, the celibate priests and the monks priests, the last two categories being subject to distinct rules of inheritance and the capacity of inheritance. If the priest is ordained as an unmarried clergy (celib), he will no longer be able to marry after he has joined the clergy.

The deacon is the third hierarchical rank of divine institution, and serves as a helping hand to the bishop and priest in the sacramental and administrative life.

C. Monks are another category of ecclesiastical staff. Monks can be either clergy, or laymen. The monks form the third state of the church together with the clergy and laity. In short, a layman can embrace the monastic state, not necessarily haing to be a cleric[19]. These, through the monastic votes deposited at the entrance to monasticism - the vote of poverty, the vote of virginity, the vote of obedience, give up the worldly things. In ancient times the entrance to the monastic rank was similar to a civil death and a spiritual rebirth, which is one of the reasons why the monks were obliged to give up any present or future property prior to the deposition of monastic votes by donation[20] or by will.

---

[15] The inferior servants of the Church are those persons who have received the ordination, consisting of a prayer which grants one of the steps of the lower clergy: the singer or reader and the hypo deacon that is, a lower step than the deacon and who do not represent sacramental function within the church.

[16] According to Article 36 of the Civil Code, "the rights of the child are recognized from the conception stage, but only if the infant is born alive".

[17] Ordination (< gr. heirotonia „the power of the hand") female noun (In the Christian ritual) The mystery of the priesthood in which, through the prayer of invoking the Holy Spirit, by blessing and sacramental laying of hands by the bishop (or two or three bishops) on the head of the sacerdotal ministers, they are consecrated into one of the three steps: deacon, priest, bishop.

[18] Explanatory Dictionary of Romanian Language, 2nd edition, Bucharest, Univers Enciclopedic Publishing House, 1996, p. 842.

[19] Liviu-Marius Harosa, Canonic Law, Bucharest, Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2013, pp. 93-94.

[20] For details on the donation contract and the causes of its revocation, see Mirela Costache, Civil Law. Contracts. Course notes, Galati, Editura Zigotto, 2013, pp. 66-80.

3. Legitimate legacy of ecclesiastical staff as a case of anomalous inheritance

As I have previously argued, if laymen and the priests of myrrh, who are categories of ecclesiastical staff, are subject to civil law on the capacity to inherit, a special category is the monastic rank.

It is interesting to analyze the interference of the norm with civil law by which the monk renounces the goods he has and to the future goods in favor of others. According to private law, it is forbidden to renounce the personal assets[21].

We can not capitalize the subjective right of the monk's legal inheritance, without briefly specifying the rules of welcoming to the monastic life. Among these conditions, with incidence in the current analysis, we observe the provision in art. Article 16 (g) of the Regulations on the Organization of Monastic Life and the Administrative and Disciplinary Functioning of the Monasteries[22]: "The person wishing to enter the monastic life is obliged to give proof of the military service and the declaration that he renounces his property by donating it to his relatives or monastery[23]." Moreover, according to art. 41 of the same regulations, "it is not permitted for the abbot and for any monk to possess personal goods such as: cars, houses, apartments, studios, plots etc. This state contradicts the rules of authentic monastic life and monastic votes. "

The way in which the Church acquires property over temporal goods[24], through inheritance, is that of the succession of goods belonging to monks and hierarchs, the main source being the provisions of the Regulations and the BOR Statute cited above[25].

The Chapter in the Statute with implication in the matter is inappropriately entitled "Provisions concerning the inheritance of hierarchs and monks". By proceeding to a minimum reading and interpretation of these provisions, no rules are identified regarding the succession capacity of the hierarchs, on the contrary, rules are laid down claiming the succession to their possessions, the specific vocation coming to the eparchies[26]. Thus, the title misleads us as to the deception of the spirit of the established norm.

Regarding the unitary character of the successor transmission that ensures succession equality to those who fulfill the legal conditions to inherit, established by the Civil Code[27], the incidence in the matter and other rules for the award of the patrimony are what the doctrine calls anomalous succession[28]. The competition of the Civil Code texts with those of the BOR Statute imprints an anomalous character in the case of the succession law of the Diocese to the hierarchs / monks' property, but with some reservations regarding their priority application.

As in the case of the civil law and regarding the texts of the Orthodox church law concerning the succession to the hierarchs and monks property, there is a conflict of laws, the reference moment being the year 2008, in which the new Statute entered into force, the old one being abrogated. In this case, according to the principle of non-retroactivity of the law, the devolution of property will be governed by the law in force at the date of its opening. We can therefore talk about:

a) successions to the assets of hierarchs and monks opened under the old statute, prior to January 22, 2008;
b) successions to the hierarchs and monks' assets after January 22, 2008.

In either case, the statute texts do not refer to the rules of inheritance devolution established by the civil norms, nor vice versa. Neither the provisions of the old Code or the Civil Code in force qualify the Statute as a special law. Neither the civil doctrine we have reported will identify as an anomalous succession in our case. We are in the position of finding a "legal fracture" in this case. Moreover, another particularity created by this type of succession refers to the fact that it creates succession rights to a legal person, other than the State or the administrative-territorial unit, in the sphere of legal inheritance, which is the Diocese. This is the result of the autonomous interpretation of art. 192 of the [21] The patrimony is not transmissible through acts among the living.

[22] The Regulation for the organization of monastic life and the administrative and disciplinary functioning of the monasteries drawn up by the Holy Synod is an integral part of the BOR Statute, approved by the Holy Synod of the Romanian Orthodox Church by Decision no. 4768/2007 and recognized under Law no. 489/2006 on religious freedom and the general regime of denominations, through Romanian Government Decision nr. 53 of 16 January 2008, published in the Official Journal of Romania Part I, no. 50 of 22 January 2008.

[23] The one who wishes to join the monastic life is obliged to submit to the Chiliarch of the place a written request, accompanied by the following documents: a) the birth certificate; b) the baptism certificate; c) the graduation documents (if the applicant is a minor, they should be a graduate of the Secondary School, should have at least the consent of the parent or guardian; d) the criminal record; e) civil status certificate, which states that they do not have any of the family obligations stipulated by the Civil Code; f) the parish priest's recommendation; g) the military service document and statement that he renounces his property by donating his property and assets to his relatives or to the monastery; h) the medical record regarding the state of physical and mental health.

[24] By temporal good, in a narrow sense, only the thing that offers economic utility and can be approached is meant. For details on the classification of goods, see Liviu-Marius Harosa, op. cit., pp. 108-138.

[25] These norms are based on the provisions of the Apostolic Canon 40, the Canon 24 of the Fourth Synod of Antioch and the canons 22 and 32 of the Local Council in Carthage.

[26] Articles 192-194 of the Statute. Art. 192: "The dioceses have a vocation on all the successions of their hierarchs." Art. 193: "The goods the monks and monasteries brought with them or donated to the monastery when they joined monasticism, as well as those acquired in any way during their life within the monastery remain entirely the property of the monasteries they belong to and can not be subject to any subsequent claims." Article 194: "For the retired or withdrawn hierarchs, the Holy Synod will regulate their rights in accordance with statutory and church regulations."

[27] Veronica Stoica, Laurentiu Dragu, op. cit., p. 21.

[28] Regarding the typology and specificity of anomalous succession, see also Dan Chirică, Treaty of Civil Law, Succesions and Liberties, C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2014, p. 8.

Statute: "The dioceses have a vocation upon all the property of their hierarchs." In the present case, it is a legal legacy, as it is known that the legal heir is recognized as a universal heir.

Thus, we believe that by assigning and recognizing unequivocally the status text of a vocation to all the succession wealth, a successor capacity of the Diocese is created in the legal legacy.

A) The successions to the goods of the hierarchs and monks opened under the old statute, prior to January 22, 2008

The situation of the anomalous heritage has as concrete reflection the provisions of the Statute of the Romanian Orthodox Church of 1948[29]: "The possession of the monks and monasteries brought with them in the monasteries, as well as that acquired in any way during monasticism, remains entirely to monastery of which it holds". As it can be seen, the Monastery, a canonical legal person of public law, has an exclusive vocation to the legal succession of monks and nuns. According to this vocation and the attributed succession capacity, the monastery had the highest inheritance, by excluding both the classes of legal heirs and the categories of heirs reserved by the civil law, the inheritance reserve covering the entire succession. As a consequence, the will attributed by the monk to a person other than the institution to which he belongs does not have legal effects. Can we appreciate that the monastery even became a legal heir with a special status? As an exception, retired hierarchs or returnees at the Monastery, although monks, could test within the available limits of share provided by art. 194 and art. 197 of the BOR Statute of 1948.

B) successions to hierarchs and monks' assets after January 22, 2008

Art. 192 of the current BOR Statute does not bring substantial changes in the content of the legal norm, stating that "the Dioceses have a vocation on all the succession property of their hierarchs." The same exclusive vocation attributed to the Eparchy and the same quality of the "quasi-legal heir". The civilian capacity to inherit is therefore returned to the dioceses. At the same time, art. 193 of the new Statute provides that "Goods monks and nuns brought with them or donated to the monastery entry into monasticism and those acquired in any way while living within the monastery remain totally to the monastery they belong to and may not be subject to subsequent claims."

In this regulation as well we can talk about an anomalous succession of the eparchy, namely of the monastery, over "all" the hierarchs, monks and nuns. At a first glance, it appears that the Eparchy's vocation is on all the goods of the hierarchs[30], but we consider that art. 193 circumscribes the succession only to the goods brought with or donated to the Monastery at the entrance to monasticism, as well as those acquired in any way during monastic life (ie, all goods).

Special attention should be given to the latter article, which provides "the property which the monks and nuns brought with them or donated to the monastery at the entry into monasticism and those acquired in any way while living in the monastery remain totally monastery belonging and they may not be subject to subsequent claims."

The same prohibition is also enshrined in the Law on Cults 489/2006[31], by art. 31 paragraph 1: "the goods which are subject to contributions of any kind - contributions, donations, successions - as well as any other property lawfully entered into the patrimony of a cult, can not be the subject of subsequent claims."

Again, we must negatively note the major inaccuracy of the text and the legal terms used, as well as the incompatibility with the principles of the civil law, as well as of the constitutional ones[32], in the sense that the text of the fundamental law defends and guarantees the right to property, implying here the possibility of claiming the goods from the hands of any person who unfairly holds them. Thus, if a literal interpretation is given to Art. 193, it would appear that third parties would no longer be able to use the claim, irrespective of the way in which their property became the possession of the monk and later of the monastery.

Neither the provisions of the Civil Code on Inheritance make any mention or refer to any special law governing certain situations, such as the present one, of the inheritance of monks and hierarchs. A legal fracture between the special provisions contained in the canonical rules and the statutes of religious cults and the rules of the civil law is not perpetuated, although the Canonical Codes of the Catholic Churches and the United Church with Rome[33] are part of the domestic law, based on the provisions of the Law of Cults, and the Statute of the Romanian Orthodox Church is new.

In Art. 5 par. 4 the Law of Cults states that "in their activity, religious cults, associations and groups have the obligation to observe the Constitution and the laws of the country and not to prejudice public security, public order, health and morals, as well as human rights and fundamental freedoms." However, the revised Constitution in 2003 states that the State defends and guarantees the right to property, thereby implicitly defending the right to property through the action for revocation. Even if there were no legal norms concerning the special succession of monks and hierarchs and the succession capacity of the Church (through its canons), a reference to canonical norms, an integral part of the Romanian legal system, would have been necessary.

---

[29] Statute for the Organization and Functioning of the Romanian Orthodox Church in 1948, in force since February 17, 1949, issuing the Great National Assembly, published in the Official Bulletin of February 23, 1949.

[30] According to art. 192 of the BOR Statute.

[31] Law no. 489/2006 on religious freedom and the general regime of denominations, published in the Official Journal no. 201 of 21 March 2014.

[32] Art. 44 para. 2 of the Constitution: "Private property is guaranteed and protected equally by law, regardless of the holder".

[33] Regarding the types of norms established by the canonical codes of the Catholic Church and the Orthodox Church, see Liviu-Marius Harosa, op. cit., pp. 96-97.

In the silence of the Code, we consider that, given the quality of a hierarch or a monk and the origin of the goods, the eparchies and the monasteries are the beneficiaries of an anomalous succession by virtue of which they have a vocation to the entire mass of the deceased, consisting of the goods brought with it or donated at the entry into monasticism, as well as those acquired in any way during the life of the monastery (as provided for monks, article 193 of the BOR Statute). Consequence that is in the field of the civil law: indirect exertion. We can also discuss here a legal exertion, both in the legal succession and the testamentary succession.

According to the rules of interpretation, the special law applies as a matter of priority. The general derogatory specialty is a legal principle which implies that the special rule is the one which derogates from the general rule and that the special rule is a strict interpretation of the case. Moreover, a general rule can not remove a special rule from application. Thus, the High Court of Cassation and Justice of Romania[34] ruled that the concurrence between the special law and the general law is solved in favor of the special law, even if this is not expressly provided for in the special law , and if there are inconsistencies between the special law and the European Convention on Human Rights, the latter has priority[35].

The conflict between the previous special law and the subsequent general law is solved by the concurrent application of the principles according to which the special rule applies with priority to the general rule - the general special exception - and a special rule can only be changed or abrogated by a special rule, a subsequent general rule.[36]

Therefore, we assume that in the competition between the two, the civil provisions do not apply in the matter of the anomalous succession we are discussing. Thus, strictly related to the goods brought into monachism by the Hierarch or monks donated to the monastery, to the Church (by its legal persons under public law) or to the Pastoral Diocese, or to possessions acquired in any way during the monastic life, and to which the hierarch or monk arranged during his life in favor of other persons, at the time of the opening of the succession, no heir reservist can have a vocation to succession.

4. Conclusions

As we have argued, the open legacies of the Hierarchs, monks, and monks are subject to special rules which, in the case of legal devolution, create an anomalous succession in favor of the Diocese or the monastery, with the complete exclusion of the legal heirs. The general rules established by the Civil Code do not apply, and doctrinal points of view do not yet exist.

Thus, the succession vocation of the legal heirs disappears in the situation where de cujus embraced one of the indicated forms of monasticism. Even when legal documents or wills are established in favor of the legal heirs, they can not be executed for the same reasons. By its rules, the BOR Statute here plays the role of a special law, in the sense of inadmissibility of the rules of common law established in the case of the successor inheritance of a natural person. .

References

- The Romanian Constitution of 2003
- The Romanian Civil Code
- Law no. 489/2006 on religious freedom and the general regime of denominations, published in the Official Journal of Romania no. 201 of 21 March 2014
- Statute of the Romanian Orthodox Church, text approved by the Holy Synod of BOR by Decision no. 4768/2007 and recognized under Law no. 489/2006 on Religious Freedom and the General Religious Regime, by Government Decision no. 53 of 16 January 2008, published in the Official Journal of Romania Part I, no. 50 of 22 January 2008
- The Statute for the Organization and Functioning of the Romanian Orthodox Church of 1948, in force since 17 February 1949, issuing the Great National Assembly, published in the Official Bulletin of 23 February 1949
- Explanatory Dictionary of Romanian Language, 2nd edition, Bucharest, Univers Enciclopedic Publishing House, 1996
- Jozsef Kocsis, Paul Vasilescu, Civil Law. Successions, Bucharest, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2016
- John N. Floca, Orthodox Canon Law. Church Legislation and Administration, vol. I, Bucharest, IBMBOR Publishing House, 1990
- Francis Deak, Romeo Popescu, Successor Law, vol. I, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013
- Veronica Stoica, Laurenţiu Dragu, Legal Heritage, Bucharest, Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2012
- D. C. Florescu, Inheritance Law in the New Civil Code, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2012
- Daniela Negrilă, Heritage in the new Civil Code. Theoretical and Practical Studies, 3rd edition, revised and added, Bucharest, Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2018

[34] High Court of Cassation and Justice, Decision no. 33/2008, published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 108 of 23 February 2009.

[35] v High Court of Cassation and Justice, Decision no.27 of 14.11.2011, File no. 28/2011, published in the Official Journal no. 120 of February 17, 2012, http://www.legex.ro/Decision-27-2011-118553.aspx.

[36] High Court of Cassation and Justice, Decision no. 13/2012, File no. 14/2012, accessed online at http://www.lege-online.ro/lr-DECISION-13%20-2013-(146010).html

- Arghiropol Ioan, What is meant by church wealth, Bucharest, 1937
- Iorgu Ivan, Church Goods in the First Six Centuries, Bucharest, 1937
- Ilioara Genoiu, Right to inheritance in the new Civil Code, Bucharest, C.H. Beck, 2012
- Constantin Dron, The Current Value of Canons. Iaşi, Doxologia, 2016
- Liviu-Marius Harosa, Canonic Law, Bucharest, Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2013
- Soreaţă Marieta, Legislative News on the succession introduced by the new Civil Code, Bucharest, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2013
- Gabriela Lupșan, Civil Law. Succesoral Law, Galati, Danubius Publishing House, 2012
- Dan Chirică, Civil Law Treaty, Successions and Liberties, C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2014
- Mirela Costache, Civil Law. Contracts. Course notes, Galati, Editura Zigotto, 2013
- High Court of Cassation and Justice, Decision no. 33/2008, published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 108 of 23 February 2009
- High Court of Cassation and Justice, Decision no.27 of 14.11.2011, File no. 28/2011, published in the Official Journal no. 120 of February 17, 2012, http://www.legex.ro/Decision-27-2011-118553.aspx
- High Court of Cassation and Justice, Decision no. 13/2012, File no. 14/2012, accessed online at http://www.lege-online.ro/lr-DECISION-13%20-2013-(146010).html

THE RIGHTS OF THE PERSONAL CREDITORS OF THE HEIRS IN THE INHERITANCE DIVISION

Silviu-Dorin ŞCHIOPU*

Abstract

As opposed to the situation of an asset that is in co-owner-ship, in the case of an inheritance the fraud of the personal creditors of an heir may occur more easily. That's why article 1156 of the Romanian Civil code regulates the rights of the personal (unsecured) creditors of the heirs regarding the inheritance partition.

The personal creditors of the heirs may request the partition of the inheritance on behalf of their debtor when the debtor, in the prejudice of the creditor, refuses or neglects to demand the partition. They may claim to be present at the voluntary partition or may intervene in the judicial partition in order to supervise that the partition is carried out correctly in accordance with the legal provisions. Also, creditors can request even the revocation of the partition either without being obliged to prove the fraud of the co-owners, when they requested to be present but the partition was done in their absence, either under the conditions of general law, situation in which the fraud of the heirs is no longer presumed, but they will have to prove it.

For a better understanding of their rights in the inheritance partition, this short overview presents, on the one hand, the means available to creditors to avert a possible fraud, and, on the other hand, how can they remove a fraud committed by the debtor against their interests within the inheritance partition.

Keywords: inheritance partition (division), heirs, personal (unsecured) creditors, opposition to partition, revocation of the inheritance division.

1. Introduction

Following the opening of the inheritance, when we have a plurality of heirs the co-owned succession is born, each co-heir receiving an ideal quota in the inheritance, none of them being the exclusive holder of an asset or of a material fraction of an asset.

In order to put an end to this state of co-ownership between co-heirs, in the sense that the inherited assets mutually owned are divided, in their materiality, among the heirs who thus become exclusive owners of their respective assets[1], the inheritance partition must intervene. As a result, the ideal undivided quota on the inherited assets is replaced, with exclusive rights of each of the co-heirs on some assets (values) determined in their individuality[2].

The end to this state of co-ownership between co-heirs is necessary because, according to art. 1156 paragraph (1) from the Civil Code[3], the personal creditors of an heir can not track the heir's part from the assets of the inheritance before the inheritance partition. In this context, the Romanian legislator regulated several rights for the benefit of the personal creditors of the heirs so that they could make their claims. Thus, the personal creditors of the heirs may request the partition of the inheritance on behalf of their debtor, they may claim to be present at the voluntary partition or may intervene in the judicial partition. Also, creditors can request even the revocation of the partition in case it was done in fraud of their rights.

Taking into account the above, for a better understanding of their rights in the inheritance partition, this short article presents, on the one hand, the means available to creditors in order to avert a possible fraud, and, on the other hand, how can they remove a fraud already committed by the debtor (heir) against their interests within the inheritance partition.

2. The purpose of regulating the rights of the personal (unsecured) creditors of the heirs in the inheritance partition

As opposed to the situation of an asset that is in co-owner-ship, in the case of an inheritance the fraud of the personal creditors of an heir may occur more easily by the fact that the co-owners may understand to one another that the part of the indebted heir should be less than it must actually be, for example, by assigning over-valued assets (with the occult payment of a balancing payment), so that his/her creditors will not be able to cover the debt, they may sustain that the debtor-heir must report a fictitious donation, which implicitly would diminish the heir's part from the succession assets, that another co-heir or a third part is the creditor of the inheritance or that certain movables are not part

* PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: dorinxschiopu@gmail.com).

[1] See Gabriel Boroi, Carla-Alexandra Anghelescu, Bogdan Nazat, Curs de drept civil: drepturile reale principale (Course of Civil law: Main Real Rights) (Bucureşti: Hamangiu, 2013), 115.

[2] See Francisc Deak, Romeo Popescu, Tratat de drept succesoral. Transmisiunea şi partajul moştenirii (Treatise on Succession law. The Transmission and the inheritance's partition), vol. III (Bucureşti: Universul Juridic, 2014), 178.

[3] Law no. 287 from 17th July 2009 on the Civil Code, republished in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 505 from 15th July 2011.

of the succession. Likewise, there could be included easy-to-hide assets, including money, or unsalebles, in the debtor-co-heir lot, rendering a forced execution ineffective.

Due to these possibilities of fraud of the creditors' interests, so that their rights will not remain ineffective, paragraphs (2) and (4) of the art. 1156 from the Civil Code provide several rights for the benefit of the personal creditors of the heirs.

3. The rights of the personal (unsecured) creditors of the heirs in the inheritance partition

First of all, according to art. 1156 paragraph (2) from the Civil Code, „the personal creditors of the heirs […] may request the partition in the name of their debtor". Second of all, according to the same paragraph, they „may pretend to be present at the voluntary partition or they may intervene in the judicial partition". Third of all, according to paragraph (4), they „may request the revocation of the partition without being forced to prove the co-owners' fraud only if, although they had requested to be present, the partition was done in their absence and without being summoned".

Thus, the creditors of the heirs can get involved in the partition of the inheritance, either by provoking it or by intervening in the voluntary or judicial partition already started, the intervening creditors being able to prevent the possible fraud by their presence, or by requesting the revocation after the partition took place in order to remove a fraud committed by the debtor against their interests within the inheritance partition.

4. The right to provoke the inheritance partition (oblique action)

According to art. 1560 paragraph (1) from the Civil Code regarding the oblique action, the creditor whose debt is certain and exigible can exercise the rights and the actions of the debtor when the debtor, in the prejudice of the creditor, refuses or neglects to exercise them. As an exception, the creditor will not be able to exercise the rights and the actions which are closely connected to the creditor's person. Since the right to introduce the action for the inheritance partition is not a strictly personal right, as a particular application of the oblique action, the Civil Code provides, in paragraph (2) of art. 1156, that the personal creditors of the heirs may request the partititon on behalf of the debtor.

The existence of a right of the creditors to provoke the partition is required especially as, according to art. 1156 paragraph (1) from the Civil Code, the personal creditors of a heir can not track the heir's part from the assets of the inheritance before the succession partition. Consequently, if the debtor heir refuses or neglects to exercise the right to partition the inheritance, the creditors, by means of oblique action, could require the partition so that, subsequently, they would be able to make their claims. However, the other heirs mai obtain the rejection of the partition introduced by the creditor by paying the debt in the name and on behalf of the debtor heir.

In the hypothesis in which the creditors could make their claims through direct actions resulted from their legal relashionships with the debtors, the inheritance partition introduced by means of oblique action will be rejected if it turns out that the creditor only pursued an abuse of law, a vexatory purpose[4]. If the partition was already requested by the heirs, then the action of the creditors would lack the interest, leaving them only the right to intervene[5].

5. The right to participate in the inheritance partition (right of intervention and opposition)

The right of the personal creditors to participate in the inheritance partition used to be named in the doctrine „the right of opposition[6] (of intervention)", name that was taken in the marginal name of the art. 894 of the 2004 Draft of the new Civil code [7]. However, the Amending Commission of the 2004 Draft of the new Civil code mentioned that the name „opposition to partition" is improper because the creditors do not oppose to partition, but they demand a certain way of realizing it. For reasons related to getting accustomed with the name we prefer to continue to use it, obviously with the limitations expressed by the Amending Commission.

As we have seen, the opposition to partition has the purpose to avoid the fraud of the interests of the creditors by the heirs. Thus, according to paragraph (2) of the art. 1156 from the Civil Code, the personal creditors of the heirs may pretend to be present at the voluntary partition or they may intervene in the judicial partition.

As the Civil Code specifies in art. 1409 that the creditor could, even before meeting the condition, do acts to conserve his or her right, and the opposition or the intervention to the partition is an act of conservation, this also gives benefits to the creditors

[4] See Valerius M. Ciucă, Procedura partajului succesoral (The Procedure of inheritance partition) (Iași: Polirom, 1997), 184, n. 431.

[5] See Dimitrie Alexandresco, Explicaţiunea teoretică şi practică a dreptului civil român în comparaţiune cu legile vechi şi cu principalele legislaţiuni străine: Succesiunile ab intestat (Theoretical and Practical Explanations on Romanian Civil Law as Compared to the Old Laws and to the Main Foreign Laws), vol. III - part II, (Bucureşti: Atelierele Grafice Socec & Co., 1912), 766.

[6] See Francisc Deak, Tratat de drept succesoral (Treatise on Succession Law), (Bucureşti: Universul Juridic, 2002), 515.

[7] See Proiectul Noului Cod Civil (The Draft of the New Civil Code) (Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2006), 183.

whose debts are affected by a condition or a term[8]. In the case of a plurality of creditors, the opposition exercised only by one of them produces effects only in favour of the opposing creditor, excepting the situation in which the debt is joint, that is in the case of an active solidarity when the opposing creditor represents the other joint creditors, or in the situation when the claim is indivisible and the creditor is deceased but he/she has more heirs but only one of the heir of the creditor made opposition[9].

The law does not provide a certain way in which the opposition must be made, so that the jurisprudence considered that to be valid any act from which would clearly result the intention of the creditors to oppose the partition (e.g. notification to co-owners through court bailiffs or by simple or recommended letter, the fulfillment of an act from which results the intention of the creditor to take part in the partition, as in the case of a request of partition made by the creditor by means of an oblique action etc.) For the opposition to take effect it is enough that all the co-heirs get acquainted with it. The opposition can be made until the partition becomes final (until the date of the settement of the judicial partition by the court or until the conclusion of the partition convention by the co-heirs in the case of the voluntary partition), that is, aslong as the partition operations are in progress[10].

If the creditors asked to be present at the voluntary partition or to intervene in the judicial partition process, the co-heirs are obliged to call them to all the partition operations, and the creditors have the right to supervise the partition being able to oppose to the acts that would be done in their fraud, without being able to interfere in the partition operations. So the rights of the creditors are limited to the faculty to control the partition, to be carried out correctly in accordance with the legal provisions.

Consequently, the opposition produces a number of legal effects. First of all, the creditor who exercised the right of opposition must be called to participate in the partition operations, no matter if the partition is voluntary or judicial. If the creditor was not supoenaed, the creditor would be able to attack the partition by means of revocative action (Paulian), in this case the fraud of the heirs being presumed.

Second of all, the creditor has the right to supervise the regularity of the partition, especially in what concerns the evaluation of the assets, the composition of the lots (forming the lots equal in value) and their assignment, but the creditor cannot claim that the partition should be done in accordance with his interests (e.g. he cannot claim that a certain asset should be assigned to his debtor). Likewise, the creditor can not claim that the partition should be done by means of a trial when the co-heirs agree to do it by private agreement, and nor can it prevent the making of a donation report when proven that the conditions for its realization regarding its debtor are fulfilled.

Third of all, opposition values deduction (seizure), solution admitted under the old Civil Code by the judicial practice and by the doctrine[11], in the sense that the succession assets that fall into the heir's lot become unavailable, that is the debtor can not alienate them, because otherwise the opposition would be devoid of the purpose for which it was conceived[12]. Likewise, nor can he recover the sums that are due to him from inheritance[13].

No least, the creditor who did not oppose the partition may require its revocation only under the conditions of general law (art. 1562 Civil Code), situation in which the fraud of the heirs is no longer presumed, but he will have to prove it.

6. The right to request the revocation of the inheritance partition (Paulian action)

Regarding the right to request the revocation of the inheritance partition, the Civil Code dispenses in art. 1156 paragraph (4) that „The creditors may request the revocation of the partition without being obliged to prove the fraud of the co-owners only if, even though they requested to be present, that partition was was done in their absence and without being summoned. In all the other cases, the action in the revocation of the partition remains subject to the provisions of the art. 1562." According to paragraph (1) of the art. 1562 from the Civil Code regarding the revocative action, the creditor, if he proves a prejudice, may request that the legal acts concluded by the debtor in breach of his or her rights be declared unenforceable, like the ones through which the debtor creates or increases his state of insolvency.

[8] See Alexandresco, Explicaţiunea teoretică şi practică a dreptului civil român în comparaţiune cu legile vechi şi cu principalele legislaţiuni străine: Succesiunile ab intestat (Theoretical and Practical Explanations on Romanian Civil Law as Compared to the Old Laws and to the Main Foreign Laws), 768.

[9] See Francisc Deak, Romeo Popescu, Tratat de drept succesoral. Transmisiunea şi partajul moştenirii (Treatise on Succession law. The Transmission and the inheritance's partition), vol. III, 208.

[10] I. Rosetti-Bălănescu, Ovid Sachelarie, Nic. G. Nedelcu, Principiile dreptului civil român (The Principles of Romanian Civil Law) (Bucureşti: Editura de Stat, 1947), 588-589.

[11] See Dan Chirică, Tratat de drept civil: succesiunile şi liberalităţile (Treatise on Civil Law: Successions and liberalities) (Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2017), 489.

[12] See Doina Anghel, Partajul judiciar în reglementarea noilor coduri (The Judicial Partition in the New Codes), (Bucureşti: Hamangiu, 2015), 339. For the contrary opinion, see Alexandresco, Explicaţiunea teoretică şi practică a dreptului civil român în comparaţiune cu legile vechi şi cu principalele legislaţiuni străine: Succesiunile ab intestat (Theoretical and Practical Explanations on Romanian Civil Law as Compared to the Old Laws and to the Main Foreign Laws), 774-775.

[13] See Mihail Eliescu, Transmisiunea și împărțeala moștenirii în dreptul R.S.R. (The Transmission and Partition of Inheritance under the S.R.R. Law) (București: Editura Academiei R.S.R., 1966), 281.

From the above-mentioned results that, in the case that, although the personal creditors of the heirs asked to be present, the partition was done in their absence and without being summoned, these, being extempt from proving the fraud of the copartner heirs, could request the revocation of the partition under conditions lighter than the ones of the creditors who had not exercised their right of opposition.

If the creditor, although he exercised his right of opposition, was not summoned, he may attack the partition act by means of a revocative action (Paulian) simplified in the sense that the fraud of the heirs is presumed. The partition in the absence of the opposing creditors determins the overturning of the presumption of good faith, transforming it into a presumption of fraud[14]. The creditor who did not oppose could request the revocation of the partition only under the conditions of the general law, situation in which the fraud of the heirs will no longer be presumed, but it should be proved.

In the end, we specify that the period of prescription in the case of the Paulian action is of one year and it starts, according art. 1564 from the Civil Code, from the date in which the creditor of the heir knew or was supposed to know the prejudice resulted from the succession partition.

7. Conclusions

The Romanian legislator, separately from the rights of the personal creditors of the co-owner regulated in the art. 679 from the Civil Code, stipulated a special norm regarding the situation of the personal creditors of the heirs just because of the particularities of the inheritance partition, as opposed to the usual partition of an asset. Thus in the art. 1156 from the Civil Code were regulated both the means available to creditors to avert a possible fraud, and the possibility to remove a fraud committed by the debtor against their interests within the inheritance partition.

The means available to creditors to avert a possible fraud include the right to provoke the inheritance partition (oblique action), in the absence of the partition the personal creditors of a heir not being able to track his part in the assets of the inheritance to make the claims, and the right to participate in the inheritance partition (right of intervention and opposition), which allows the creditors to control the partition so that this should be exercised corectly respecting the legal dispositions. We also have to mention that, de lege ferenda, it would be necessary to clarify the effects of the right to participate in the inheritance partition (right of intervention and opposition) in the sense of the express regulation of freezing the succession assets that fall into the lot of the debtor heir, in the limit necessary to the providing of the creditor who opposed, thus ensuring the claim of the latter.

Subsequent to the partition, the removal of a fraud committed by the debtor against their interests within the inheritance partition could be done due to the Paulian action which allows the creditors of the heirs to revoke the partition done with the fraud of their interests.

References

-  Proiectul Noului Cod Civil (The Draft of the New Civil Code), Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2006
- Dimitrie Alexandresco, Explicaţiunea teoretică şi practică a dreptului civil român în comparaţiune cu legile vechi şi cu principalele legislaţiuni străine: Succesiunile ab intestat (Theoretical and Practical Explanations on Romanian Civil Law as Compared to the Old Laws and to the Main Foreign Laws), vol. III - part II, Bucureşti: Atelierele Grafice Socec & Co., 1912
- Doina Anghel, Partajul judiciar în reglementarea noilor coduri (The Judicial Partition in the New Codes). Bucureşti: Hamangiu, 2015
- Gabriel Boroi, Carla-Alexandra Anghelescu, Bogdan Nazat, Curs de drept civil: drepturile reale principale (Course of Civil law: Main Real Rights). Bucureşti: Hamangiu, 2013
- Dan Chirică, Tratat de drept civil: succesiunile şi liberalităţile (Treatise on Civil Law: Successions and liberalities). Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2017
- Valerius M. Ciucă, Procedura partajului succesoral (The Procedure of Inheritance Partition), Iași: Polirom, 1997
- Francisc Deak, Tratat de drept succesoral (Treatise on Succession Law). Bucureşti: Actami, 1999
- Francisc Deak, Romeo Popescu, Tratat de drept succesoral. Transmisiunea şi partajul moştenirii (Treatise on Succession law. The Transmission and the inheritance's partition), vol. III. Bucureşti: Universul Juridic, 2014
- Mihail Eliescu, Transmisiunea și împărțeala moștenirii în dreptul R.S.R. (The Transmission and Partition of Inheritance under the S.R.R. Law), București: Editura Academiei R.S.R., 1966
- I. Rosetti-Bălănescu, Ovid Sachelarie, Nic. G. Nedelcu, Principiile dreptului civil român (The Principles of Romanian Civil Law), Bucureşti: Editura de Stat, 1947

[14] See Ciucă, Procedura partajului succesoral (The Procedure of inheritance partition), 185.

THE EXERCISE AND LIMITATIONS FOR THE EXERCISE OF NON-PATRIMONIAL RIGHTS AND OBLIGATIONS OF THE SPOUSES

Nicoleta Roxana ŞERBĂNOIU*

Abstract

The evolution of contemporary private law is due to the recognition of the importance of human rights, knowing a real progress in the last period of time, which has led to the promotion and protection of the person's subjective civil rights. It is very important that, in addition to legal coercive values, society should accept the importance of civil subjective rights and respect them. Correspondences to civil subjective rights are the obligations, and in terms of family law, the personal obligations of spouses are of particular importance.

In order not to be ineffective, these rights must be applied rationally and it is necessary that they come to defend the injured person both physically and mentally. It is very important that, in addition to legal coercive values, society should accept the importance of civil subjective rights and respect them. Although at European level we can observe an exponential increase of the values protected by the adoption of the European Convention on Human Rights and its implementation from the adoption until now in Romania the respect of the civil subjective rights remains at the discretion of each individual, force can not cover all the cases that may arise.

Correspondences to civil subjective rights are the obligations, and in terms of family law, the personal obligations of spouses are of particular importance.

The husband's personal rights and obligations are inseparable from spouses and can not be alienated. They can not be the subject of the matrimonial agreement or of any other contracts. This provides an essential principle of family law - the equality of spouses in family - and excludes any attempt to violate it by concluding legal acts. Equality of spouses in rights derives from all social relations based on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the Convention on the Political Rights of Women, adopted by the United Nations on 20 December 1952, the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women adopted on 18 December 1979, Civil Code.

Keywords: non-marital rights and obligations of spouses, cohabitation, fidelity, name.

Introduction

The current civil law brings important changes in the sphere of private law institutions. By introducing several special laws into the Civil Code, romanian legislator sought the harmonization of civil law and the uniformity of non-unitary judicial practice. Family relationships enjoy a new, modern approach that seeks to meet the needs of contemporary family life.

The new civil regulation brings significant changes to marriage although innovative in relation to previous regulation, the solution offered by the legislator is limiting and, therefore, criticism may occur from this point of view. Legislation should be more flexible in the sense of introducing the possibility of concluding customized matrimonial conventions to enable spouses to determine non-patrimonial issues.

1. The obligation of cohabitation

Under article 309 (2) civil code, spouses have the obligation to live together.[1] In some situations they can live separately, for example: to pursue a profession, health care, training, etc.[2] The refusal of one of the spouses to live together may constitute grounds for divorce thoroughly. [3] Traditionally the wives have a duty to live together, because the purpose of marriage is to live a life in common. This obligation does not imply, however, that either spouse may be compelled to cohabitation, through coercive measures.[4]

1.1. The choice of domicile

The Romanian legislator gave the possibility for spouses to choose their domicile or residence. As a legal principle common to the spouses, housing is where they live constantly dwelling on, i.e. they choose by mutual agreement. Domicile is, in principle, the result of a voluntary act. The choice of the place of residence of the spouses disagree about is can

* PhD Candidate, Lucian Blaga University of Sibiu, second year doctoral studies in Law, guided by Prof. Dr. Teodor Bodoaşcă (e-mail: roxanaserbanoiu@yahoo.com)

[1] Prof. Dr. Teodor Bodoaşcă, family law, 3rd Edition, Rev., Bucharest, Editura Universul Juridic, 2015, p. 94

[2] Tribe., dec. civ. No. 546 of March 6, 1973, in 1974, CD p. 169; Tribe., dec. civ. No. 1334 from 1970, in 1970, pp. CD 114-117; Tribe. jud. , Dec. civ. No. 849 of 18 September 1986, CD nr. 2 of 1987, p. 65.

[3] Ion P. Filipescu, Andrei i. Filipescu, treatise on family law, 6th Ed. All Beck, Bucureşti, 2001, p. 41

[4] Aurelian Ionascu, Mircea Mureşan Mircea b. Carter, Victor Stewart, the family and its role in the socialist society, ed. Dacia, Cluj Napoca, 1975, p. 109

materialize through expressing one of the spouses to change his place of residence or the desire to establish separate residences. [5]

1.2. The residence of spouses and family housing

The actual location where the family is probably more important for the majority of the couples than the notion of residence or domicile[6]. In proclaiming the equality of spouses in family housing choice, the legislator had to ensure equality and same spouses in respect of ownership rights to dwellings. So the wife cannot, one without the other, to avail itself of the right of ownership of the dwelling or to goods falling within its membership.

This co-insurance-management of family housing thus protects each spouse against the other acts on them may end alone and that would endanger the common dwelling property. Therefore, this community of life for the spouses (and their children) is ensured through common housing.

Through art. 321 of the Civil Code shall be suburban home defines the term family as custom-built municipality or, failing the spouses, the spouse dwelling upon which lies the children. These legal provisions relating to housing family double perspective: that of the residential building and that of family life. As a consequence of the Declaration of the building housing the family is that the spouse who is not the owner may oppose acts of disposition over the property, even though it is the exclusive property of the other spouse. In this situation the husband owner cannot dispose of his rights over the property without the consent of the other spouse, in the event of a sale, mortgage: usufruct, waiver of a right, lease, etc. There are stipulated provisions regarding family housing assets. In order to avoid any abuses, you can straighten the owner spouse against spouse who opposes such action being within the competence of the Court of guardianship.

Another issue concerns the situation of spouses who live in a property held under a lease. So, in this case, each spouse will have a housing law. In the event of a divorce each of the spouses will have their own right to live in housing rented, will be determined by the Court which of the two spouses to retain the right, depending on the needs of each.

1.3. Evacuation and protection order

In practice, several difficult situations have been shaped and the question is whether one of the spouses has the opportunity to obtain, through the court, the evacuation of the other spouse from the joint house, but the opinions were contradictory. However, we believe that an evacuation action is admissible because most situations are critical and require the protection of the spouse who formulated the action. The evacuation[7] of the other spouse may be requested for reasons leading to the impossibility of continuing coexistence, such as domestic violence, which could seriously endanger life, body integrity, health of the other spouse or members family.[8] The evacuation solution is temporal and has no consequence of the loss of ownership of the house.

According to article 23 of Law No. 217/2003 for the prevention and combating of family violence, republished[9], the person whose physical or mental integrity is endangered, may ask the Court for a protection order.[10] This measure is provisional and requires certain obligations and prohibitions imposed to protect the injured spouse

1.4. The property consequences of the absence of cohabitation

As regards the heritage consequences of the absence of cohabitation we will refer to the contribution of the spouses to household expenditure. Thus, the refusal of one of the spouses to Cohabita does not prevent the other spouse from getting a contribution from his husband to household expenditure, even more so as they have children together.

But if the link between the contribution and the common residence is not or is no longer compulsory, the courts will tend to link the obligation to contribute and the legitimacy of this refusal of life in common. Therefore, in the light of the circumstances of the case, the courts may oblige the spouse who refuses to coexist to contribute to the expense of the other spouse.[11]

1.5. The separation in fact of the spouses

A husband may refuse the cohabitation, both in his marital aspect and in his material aspect, that of living in the same house. Separation can also be the result of the common will of the spouses. However, in order for the factual separation to be a good reason for divorce, it is necessary to pass a period of two years.[12]

As a sociological phenomenon that the law cannot ignore, de facto separation may be amicable or solicited by one of the spouses. This is manifested by the choice of a separate residence by one of the spouses. Its duration will depend only on the will of the spouses.

[5] M. Avram, N. Nagaraju, matrimonial regimes, Ed. Hamangiu, Bucharest, 2010, p. 116
[6] Ioan Albu, family Law, Ed. Didactic and Pedagogical, Bucharest, 1975, p. 111
[7] Prof. Univ. Dr. Teodor Bodoaşcă, Family Law, 3rd edition, Rev., Bucharest, publishing House of the Legal universe, 2015, p. 95
[8] Ion P. Filipescu, Andrei I. Filipescu, treated by family Law, ed. VI, ed. All Beck, Bucharest, 2001, p. 42
[9] Law No. 217/2003 for the prevention and combating of family violence, republished, M. Of. No. 205 of 24 March 2014
[10] Emese Florian, Family Law. Marriage. Matrimonial regimes. Parentage. Edition 5, Ed. C. H. Beck, Bucharest, 2016, p. 93
[11] Judicial practice Fractional Instances: Civic 1, May 8, 1979, Civil Bull I, No. 135, D. 1979. IR 495, Obs. D. Martin; Civ. 1, 16 Feb. 1983, D. 1984. 30, note J. Revel, and the case-law cited; Adde: Bordeaux, January 8, 1985, Cah. Around. Aquitaine 1985, 66; Civ. 1 7 November 1995, Nr. 92-21.276, Bull. Civ. I, No. 394, Dr. and Shabeena., 1996, p. 72, Obs. A. Bénabent, RTD Civ. 1996. 227, Obs. B. Vareille
[12] Emese Florian, Family Law. Marriage. Matrimonial regimes. Parentage. Edition 5, Ed. C. H. Beck, Bucharest, 2016, p. 94

2. The obligation of fidelity

2.1. The notion of fidelity

The duty of loyalty constitutes a part of marriage. This promise of spouses to comply with and be loyal to each other is of the essence of marriage[13]. Considering that the wives have freedom in expressing the will of the conclusion of the marriage, consider it their duty to respect each other and thus comply with the obligation of fidelity later celebration of marriage[14].

If we look at in terms of the word etymologically, fidelity, we can see that it comes from the Latin word ' fides ' meaning faith[15]. The ideology of the obligation of loyalty is based on the fact that spouses must be faithful to each other. Mutual trust and awareness of the importance of love worn each other are fundamental to a marriage.

The duty of fidelity presents two important aspects:

a) a positive aspect, which implies a positive obligation to have intimate relationships within the marriage,
b) a negative aspect, not to maintain intimate relationships outside of marriage.

Failure to comply with this obligation may even lead to the divorce of the marriage, for reasons attributable to the unfaithful husband. However, it is important to note that this obligation can not restrict the individual freedom of each spouse, so the refusal of one of the husbands to have intimate relationships can not be a valid reason for defamation of marriage.

2.2. The principle of monogamy

Because marriage is monogamous[16] in Romanian civil law, the obligation of fidelity in its negative aspect is a necessary corollary. The principle of monogamy is based on the fact that the conclusion of marriage takes effect between the two spouses, who owe each other love and fidelity. Due to the principle of monogamy, in Romanian civil law, the paternity presumption of the mother's husband contracted, without the need to prove the filiation of the child born within the marriage[17].

The sanction of the breach of the duty of fidelity, namely the principle of monogamy, was sanctioned in the old Romanian criminal legislation. Although adultery has been disinclined, the law allows the deceased husband to promote divorce on grounds of husband's infidelity, which is a cause of marriage dissolution.

2.3. Extending the notion of infidelity

Closely related to the legal definition of marriage, the duty of fidelity seemed to be protected directly by law, but as a very personal area, the legislator did not want to interfere in a limited way in spouses' relations. We believe, however, that infidelity is a topic of topicality and a good reason for divorce, and the development of this subject is imperative from a practical point of view. Although the obligation of loyalty requires that spouses have marital relationships only with the other spouse, being forbidden to sex with third parties, we consider that this obligation does not refer only to physical but moral obligations[18]. For example, there have been some cases of correspondence exchanges which, by their nature, have morally violated the obligation of loyalty to the other spouse. Given that we find ourselves in an era of digitization, the question is whether virtual messages can be the basis for divorce. We consider that, to the extent that they are made public and their obtaining does not violate the secrecy of correspondence, they may be a valid reason for breaking marriage.

2.4. Finding infidelity

The abstracto's assessment of infidelity is hard to prove, but infidelity based on an extramarital relationship can be proven.

Infidelity is appreciated in concrete by the judge and will therefore be done in a subjective, personalized manner. In order to establish a blame in a divorce case, the judge must assess the existence of a serious violation or continued violation of the obligations arising out of marriage. In addition, violation of the loyalty obligation made it unacceptable to maintain a common life. This allowed the judge to appreciably extend his discretion to both the gravity of the infringement and the responsibility for such an infringement.

2.5. Responsibility for Infidelity

In order for infidelity to be invoked in the defense of a spouse, it must be imputable. In practice, there may be different cases that may disguise the unfaithful husband, such as: factual error, personam error, violence exerted on him by a third party to compel him to engage in intimate extramarital relationships, believed to be free from marriage, and so on In these cases, the husband must be in good faith.

2.6. Agreements on loyalty

We must bear in mind that, although marriage involves certain aspects of a civil contract, the obligation of loyalty can not be determined by the two spouses only. The loyalty obligation can not be regarded as a mere contractual obligation from which the spouses could discard.

---

[13] Aurelian Ionascu, Mircea Mureşan Mircea b. Carter, Victor Stewart, the family and its role in the socialist society, ed. Dacia, Cluj Napoca, 1975, p. 106

[14] Prof. Univ. Dr. Teodor Bodoaşcă, Family Law, 3rd edition, Rev., Bucharest, publishing House of the Legal universe, 2015, p. 94

[15] www.limbalatina.ro/dictionar.php

[16] Aurelian Ionascu, Mircea Mureşan Mircea b. Carter, Victor Stewart, the family and its role in the socialist society, ed. Dacia, Cluj Napoca, 1975, p. 106

[17] Idem., p. 106

[18] Idem., p. 106

We have in this regard the model of the United States of America, where husbands can set prenuptial contracts clauses for the situation where one of them is unfaithful. These clauses may contain moral and material damage. In France, for example, there have been requests to draw up twinning arrangements. In this regard, both the judicial practice and the French doctrine have concluded that a marriage can not be concluded in the form of a brokerage contract, and fidelity can not be negotiated[19].

2.7. Obligation of fidelity and divorce proceedings

The fate of fidelity during divorce proceedings can be taken into account by judging the judge's husband's culpable divorce, in which sense the judge is a true guardian of public order, especially in the function of protecting the divorce.

However, we consider that from the date of filing the divorce request, none of the spouses can no longer oppose the other duty of loyalty. With the request for divorce and the divorce of the spouses, the effects of the marriage are suspended until the final settlement of the divorce request is terminated.

2.8. Sanction

The sanction will, of course, be divorce or separation for violating the loyalty obligation resulting from marriage. The severity and consequences of unfaithful behavior during marriage can be determined in the divorce proceedings, and may lead to the divorce of the unfaithful husband.

3. The marital obligation

3.1. Notion

The new Civil Code does not expressly provide for this obligation, but in the literature[20] the importance of marital duties is attached.

The marital obligation is separate from that of the common dwelling and there is no matter whether the spouses have a common dwelling or do not live separately.

3.2. The marital obligation is strictly related to marriage

It is important to note that although the Civil Code does not refer to the marriage obligations of married couples, there were some canonical laws that imposed the "carnalis copula"[21] as a condition for the validity of marriage. This ideology lasted until the 12th century and claimed that it is imperative that the relationship be consumed in marriage to make it indissoluble. This can also be justified by the fact that marriage was perceived as a remedy for concupiscence.

3.3. Failure to comply with the marriage obligation

There is no explicit sanction in our Civil Code for non-observance of the obligation of loyalty or marital debt, however non-compliance may lead to divorce, so that in this case the judge will have to set the limits.

First of all, from the point of view of divorce, in order for this obligation to be a valid reason for the dissolution of marriage, one of the spouses must be at fault and the refusal to represent the wrongful husband's behavior. We can discuss a thorough ground of divorce in the context of breaching the common obligation by denying physical relationships or by applying a behavior of rejecting the other husband in these relationships. In his defense, the deceived husband can invoke medical reasons (for example, impotence, etc.) or moral (desire for chastity, for religious or other reasons).

3.4. Lack of consent and legal recognition of the offense of rape between spouses

Even though these aspects of the loyalty obligation have been introduced to establish a normality of marital behavior, the issue of rape appears between spouses. Traditionally, in the past, it is possible for the husband to force his wife to maintain intimate relationships. There were no legal provisions to protect the wife from such abuses, and society did not consider the obligation to maintain intimate relationships between spouses as rape.

Although the illicit nature of coercion in sexual relations between spouses is not expressly established, however, the application of the provisions of Art. 218 The Criminal Code also applies to rape with the wife injured as a person.

Therefore, the courts recognize the notion of rape between spouses, and there is European jurisprudence: ECHR March 22, 1995, S.W. and C.R. v. United Kingdom, Civ. 1996, 512, obs. J.-P. Marguénaud: The Court makes an explicit reference to "a civilized notion of marriage." In practice, there have been cases of rape with violence. The presumption of consent of spouses or complicity in the privacy of marital life can only be valid until the proof of the opposite[22].

We believe that the current criminal legislation could be improved, following the model of the French Criminal Code, which provides in Art. 222-22 par. The following provisions: "Rape and other sexual assaults are constituted when they have been imposed on the victim in the circumstances provided for in this section, regardless of the nature of the relationship between the aggressor and his / her victim, united by the marriage ties. In this case, the presumption of the consent of the spouses to the act Sexuality is valid only until the evidence goes wrong. "

[19] M.-T.-CALAIS AULOY, for a wedding in conventionally limited effects, RTD civ . 1988. p. 255
[20] Prof. univ. Teodor Bodoaşca, Family Law, Third Edition, Rev., Bucharest, Publishing House Universul Juridic, 2015, p. 95
[21] V. C. SAINT-ALARY-HOUIN, Sexuality in Contemporary Civil Law, Ann. Do. Toulouse, Vol. 33, 1985, p. 7
[22] CEDO 22 march1995, S.W. şi C.R. v. United Kingdom Civ. 1996, 512, obs. J.-P. Marguénaud

It should be noted that it is not a system of protection only for husbands, but for all couples, even unmarried.

It is found that there is a contradiction, on the one hand, a marital duty is imposed on married couples and, on the other hand, any constraint in the sexual relations between spouses is repressed.

Since sexual intercourse must be voluntary, one should state the constraint that one of the spouses can use for the other to fulfill the marital legal obligation.

The issue must also be studied under the consent given at the time of marriage. In order not to be in a situation of a constraint that enters the sphere of the penalty, the question arises whether this consent should always be repeated for every constituent act of the spouses' sexual relations. Thus, each spouse's responsibilities with regard to the marriage obligation should be clarified. Such clarification, however, can not be made objectively, but the particularities of each couple relationship must be taken into account.

If such a case is invoked in a divorce process, it should be determined primarily whether failure to comply with this obligation has led to the impossibility of continuing marriage. In this case, we can assume that the consent expressed at the end of the marriage is valid throughout the marriage, and the marriage relationship is a constituent part of the marriage.

However, then we are discussing a criminal case, it is obvious that we must consider whether at the time of the rape deed, respectively, the husband had the consent of the wife. When we talk about marital relationships through violence, we will rightly consider that the consent expressed at the end of the marriage was given for consensual relations and under no circumstances can it be used by the husband to discredit abusive behavior.

4. Obligation of moral support

4.1. The concept of moral support

In fact, it has always been very difficult to establish the concrete legal content of this obligation. As a result of marriage, the moral support obligation refers to the assistance given by spouses to each other in matters of daily life during marriage[23].

Wives are morally obliged to consult each other about marriage issues. Certain authors[24] consider that marriage should be governed by the principle of co-decision. It requires that the spouses decide together to complete an act or make a decision, choosing the most appropriate solution[25].

4.2. Obligation to assist in case of illness

In practice, certain situations may arise which extend the effects of mutual moral support from a purely moral point of view to an obligation to do, which occurs essentially when one of the spouses is unable to produce income for non-imputable reasons or is ill or infirm.

The obligation of mutual moral support may also have a pecuniary nature, where for improper reasons one of the spouses can not produce an income and thus can not secure his existence. In this situation, we may consider it the duty of the income-producing spouse to provide the necessary living. Family maintenance is an obligation for the spouse who produces income. In practice, there are countless cases where the wife has to deal with one or more juvenile children, providing them with raising and educating, in which case the husband, income producer, owes to support both minors and children his wife.

4.3. Obligation of the guilty husband to grant the other husband moral support in the case of divorce

Violation of the moral support obligation may occur in several ways, such as: lack of sincerity, patience, solidarity, honor, courtesy, mutual respect, etc. These moral values are fundamental to any relationship and, moreover, to a marriage. It is almost impossible to force a husband, guilty of violating this obligation during marriage, to respect the divorce. As a coercive measure, the husband may be forced into at least civilized behavior that does not even affect the other husband. If it is found that failure to comply with this obligation causes serious harm, the spouse affected by inappropriate behavior may request possible moral damages.

4.4. Sanction

Breach of the obligation of mutual moral support may entail civil, contravention or criminal liability of the guilty party[26].

Art. 378 paragraph 1 lit. of the Criminal Code provides that the commission by a person of an act likely to endanger the life of a family member constitutes the offense of family abandonment. These legal provisions also apply if the offense is committed by one of the spouses by leaving the other husband in need, exposing him to certain physical or moral suffering.

It is punishable from the criminal point of view, the fact of leaving a member of the family, or the husband without help, and the fact of failing to pay the legal obligation of maintenance. Although both facts are committed by inaction, they can have particularly serious consequences.

[23] Aurelian Ionașcu, Mircea Mureșan, Mircea N. Costin, Victor Ursa, The Family and Its Role in the Socialist Society, Ed. Dacia, Cluj Napoca, 1975, p. 108

[24] Emese Florian, Family Law. The marriage. Matrimonial regimes. Filiation. Edition 5, Ed. C. H. Beck, Bucharest, 2016, p. 95

[25] Prof. univ. Teodor Bodoașca, Family Law, 3rd Edition, Rev., Bucharest, Publishing House Universul Juridic, 2015, p. 93

[26] Prof. univ. dr. Teodor Bodoașcă, Dreptul familiei, Ediția a III-a, rev., București, Editura Universul Juridic, 2015, p. 93

5. Obligation of mutual respect

5.1. Exercising the duty of mutual respect

The legal duty of respect may embody several types of obligations. In addition to the above-mentioned obligations, we can say that husbands are obliged to behave properly for each other during the marriage.

Spouses must respect the profession of the other and support each other in all its aspects. In the same sense, it is necessary for spouses to respect their passions, habits, social relationships, to offer affection to each other.

5.2. Sanction

Failure to comply with this obligation may result in the impossibility of continuing marriage. These deficiencies may lead to the divorce of the marriage depending on the seriousness of the offense committed by the spouse, and may even result in criminal offenses. These may include physical or mental injuries or aggressions to the other spouse. The most common are: lack of loyalty to the other, violation of honor, lack of affection, neglect, refusal to participate in activities of interest to the other spouse, prohibition of certain inter-human relationships, development of certain vices, etc.

Some situations may arise in court practice, for example: alcoholism or refusal to undergo medical treatment to suppress addiction[27] may be a reason for divorce for breach of the duty of mutual respect, refusal to seek nursing care or the procreation of a child without taking into account the opposition of the other husband[28], the fact of having surgery to change sex without the consent of the husband[29].

6. The effects of marriage on spouses' names

6.1. Effects on the spouse's name during marriage

The spouses have, according to art. 282 Civil Code, several variants: the preservation of names before marriage, the bearing of the common name of any of the spouses, the bringing together of both names or the bearing by one of the spouses of the names together.

According to art. 311 The Civil Code is obliged to bear the declared name at the end of the marriage. Changing the name of one of the spouses, when they have a common name, is allowed by administrative means, but only with the consent of the other spouse. We believe that this solution could be changed in the sense that the law could allow the name change without the consent of the other husband for good reasons (for example, the profession of the spouse who wants to change his name, the commencement of divorce proceedings when the preservation of the common name affects the image , dignity or honor, etc.).

In the doctrine[30] some special situations regarding the spouses' names were analyzed. One of the cases is that of the surviving spouse bearing the predecessor's family name. If he wants to remarry, he can keep the name of his predecessor and, moreover, he can agree to be the common name in the new marriage. The considerations underlying this view refer to the fact that the right to name can not be restricted, but also to the fact that the legislator does not make the difference between the ways of acquiring the name when referring to the name of the future spouses.

6.2. The existence of a right of use over the name worn during marriage

The marriage declaration entitles the spouses to use the name after the marriage. In the event of a divorce, the spouses may decide to return to the previously worn-in name or, with the consent of the other spouse, to keep the name worn for the duration of the marriage.

Divorce does not distinguish between husband and wife, which is why both spouses lose their husband's name in case of divorce. Use of the name can only be done with the consent of the other spouse. From a practical point of view, the question arises if the husband is entitled to request the return of his wife to the name before marriage. Judicial practice has held that it is contrary to Art. 8 and 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights, that national law should establish the name of the spouse.

A practical problem occurs when the husband, who has received the other husband's consent to the common name, remarries because art. 282 The Civil Code also applies in this case. Otherwise, the spouse of the second marriage may decide to bear the name obtained by her husband after her first marriage. From a legal point of view this situation is not foreseen and the question arises whether the spouse whose name is in question can intervene in this situation. We believe that once the divorce has been completed, the husband who has given his consent to the other spouse's name can no longer return to this matter. There is, however, the possibility of requesting in this case possible damages[31], where the use of the name may affect the image[32], for example in the case of a public figure, or simply causes discomfort to the former spouse whose name is in question.

---

[27] Aix-en-Provence, February 27, 2008, Dr. fam 2008. Comm. 142, obs. V. Larribau-Terneyre, D. 2009. Pan. 832, obs. L. Williatte-Pellitteri Bordeaux, March 19, 2008, Family Dr. 2008. Com. 142, D. 2009. Pan., 832, L. Williatte-Pellitteri obs.

[28] Nimes, March 21, 2007, JCP 2007. II, 10149, note J. Vassaux, Dr. fam. , 2008. 91, Obs., J. Hauser

[29] Nimes, June 7, 2000, Dr. fam 2001. Comm 4 Obs H. Lécuyer, RTD civ 2001 335 Obs J. Hauser

[30] Alexandru Bacaci, Viorica Claudia Dumitrache, Cristina Codruța Hageanu, Family Law, 6th Edition, C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2009, p. 40

[31] TGI Briey, June 30, 1966, JCP 1967. II. 15130, note by J. Carbonnier

[32] Anne Claire Aune, The phenomenon of multiplication of droit subjectifs en droit de personnes et famille, Ed. Presses Universitaires d'aix Marseille, 2007, p. 247

6.3. The effects of marriage termination on the name worn during marriage

If the marriage ends by the death of one of the spouses, the choice to maintain the use of the name worn during the marriage is done automatically. This is mainly a consequence of the social character of the spouse's name during marriage. In Romanian civil law, bearing the name of a deceased husband after marriage has an absolute character.

In practice, there were certain situations in which the deceased's family opposed the use of the common name by the surviving spouse, because they considered it abusing the name of the worn by various means. This aspect can be noticed in concrete terms if the surviving spouse chooses to remarry[33].

Unlike the situation of ending marriage by death, in the case of divorce the spouse who has taken the common name can not keep this name except with the consent of the spouse whose name it bears.

The ability to use the spouse's name may result from his / her consent or from the court's solution, but only if the applicant warrants a special interest for him / her or for the children.

Conclusion

Non-matrimonial rights of spouses are part of the category of personal rights, being found in the subcategory called the doctrine of rights relating to the existence and integrity of the person.

The provisions governing the spouses' personal relations are declaratory and do not contain sanctions for violation of the provisions stipulated in them. However, they are of particular importance in ensuring the equality of the spouses in the family, protecting the interests of each of them and ensuring the effective education of children in the family.

It is preferable for the legislator not to be involved in the personal matters of spouses, but if they so wish, they should be able to lay down certain clauses on non-pecuniary rights and obligations (loyalty, cohabitation, etc.) and possible sanctions for non-compliance.

References

- Prof. Dr. Teodor Bodoaşcă, family law, 3rd Edition, Rev., Bucharest, Editura Universul Juridic, 2015
- Emese Florian, Family Law. Marriage. Matrimonial regimes. Parentage. Edition 5, Ed. C. H. Beck, Bucharest, 2016
- M. Avram, N. Nagaraju, matrimonial regimes, Ed. Hamangiu, Bucharest, 2010
- Ion P. Filipescu, Andrei i. Filipescu, treatise on family law, 6th Ed. All Beck, Bucureşti, 2001
- Alexandru Bacaci, Viorica Claudia Dumitrache, Cristina Codruţa Hageanu, Family Law, 6th Edition, C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2009
- Aurelian Ionascu, Mircea Mureşan Mircea b. Carter, Victor Stewart, the family and its role in the socialist society, ed. Dacia, Cluj Napoca, 1975
- Ioan Albu, family Law, Ed. Didactic and Pedagogical, Bucharest, 1975
- Anne Claire Aune, The phenomenon of multiplication of droit subjectifs en droit de personnes et famille, Ed. Presses Universitaires d'aix Marseille, 2007
- C. RONDEAU-Rivier, Resignation, Thesis, Lyon, 1981, p. 173 et seq
- TGI Briey, June 30, 1966, JCP 1967. II. 15130, note by J. Carbonnier
- V. C. SAINT-ALARY-HOUIN, Sexuality in Contemporary Civil Law, Ann. Do. Toulouse, Vol. 33, 1985
- M.-T.-CALAIS AULOY, for a wedding in conventionally limited effects, RTD civ . 1988
- Law No. 217/2003 for the prevention and combating of family violence, republished, M. Of. No. 205 of 24 March 2014
- Tribe., dec. civ. No. 546 of March 6, 1973, in 1974, CD p. 169; Tribe., dec. civ. No. 1334 from 1970, in 1970, pp. CD 114-117; Tribe. jud. , Dec. civ. No. 849 of 18 September 1986, CD nr. 2 of 1987
- Judicial practice Fractional Instances: Civic 1, May 8, 1979, Civil Bull I, No. 135, D. 1979. IR 495, Obs. D. Martin; Civ. 1, 16 Feb. 1983, D. 1984. 30, note J. Revel, and the case-law cited; Adde: Bordeaux, January 8, 1985, Cah. Around. Aquitaine 1985, 66; Civ. 1 7 November 1995, Nr. 92-21.276, Bull. Civ. I, No. 394, Dr. and Shabeena., 1996, p. 72, Obs. A. Bénabent, RTD Civ. 1996. 227, Obs. B. Vareille
- CEDO 22 march1995, S.W. și C.R. v. United Kingdom Civ. 1996, 512, obs. J.-P. Marguénaud
- Aix-en-Provence, February 27, 2008, Dr. fam 2008. Comm. 142, obs. V. Larribau-Terneyre, D. 2009. Pan. 832, obs. L. Williatte-Pellitteri
- Bordeaux, March 19, 2008, Family Dr. 2008. Com. 142, D. 2009. Pan., 832, L. Williatte-Pellitteri obs.
- Nimes, March 21, 2007, JCP 2007. II, 10149, note J. Vassaux, Dr. fam. , 2008. 91, Obs., J. Hauser
- Nimes, June 7, 2000, Dr. fam 2001. Comm 4 Obs H. Lécuyer, RTD civ 2001 335 Obs J. Hauser

[33] C. RONDEAU-Rivier, Resignation, Thesis, Lyon, 1981, p. 173 et seq.

ATAD (DIRECTIVE 2016/1164/EU) AND BEPS

Ancuta-Larisa TOMA*

Abstract

In the latest tax competition between the European countries, and not just them (as we will see that this is happening at a global level), made the private companies to chose the best optimization plan for their businesses in all areas so choosing the country that best fitted their needs. This aroused multiple complaints from the countries that had a higher levele of taxation blaming the others and the business men for fiscal crime. As a result of this argument an labeling, there were born two important legislative acts: BEPS and ATAD. In this article I will try to show the connection between this two legislative acts, showing their importance in the intelectual property area and also in the business field. We will se the similarities between them and why this exists and I will explain just a part of the numerous rules established by the international acts BEPS and ATAD. The importance of fiscality and of the businesses, of the multinationals in the context of the globalisation and of the R&D, patents, trademarks, copyrights, all of them are connected and cannot survive without each other in nowadays society, that is why I consider important to present this article and to have together a look into the complicate world of fiscal law.

Keywords: BEPS, ATAD, tax, fraud, company.

Introduction

When we talk about the European Union, as we are regarding its legislative acts, we ask ourself in the actual context – which one was the first, BEPS or ATAD? Both legislative acts contain references to the same fiscal aspects, but no are the both applying to all the European Union state members. If we are talking about Romania, for sure we will have the tendency to say that is is ATAD the first, because we are not an OECD member, but our Romanian law no 124/2017 regarding the approval for the Romania participating as an associate state to the BEPS plan - Base erosion and profit shifting – concieved by the The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD). So here we are, applying BEPS legislation!

But what is exactly BEPS? What is ATAD? And mor, why ATAD 1 (Directive (EU) 2015/1164 of 12 July 2016 laying down rules against tax avoidance practices that directly affect the functioning of the internal market) and ATAD 2 (Directive (EU) 2017/952 of 29 May 2017 amending Directive (EU) 2016/1164 as regards hybrid mismatches with third countries)?

1. BEPS

Alias BEPS, Base Erosion and Profit Shifting, is a project started by The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development – alias OECD – which regards theb state members fiscal planfication in order to stop the tax avoidance strategies that allows the business companies to shift the profits in other countries than those were they are having their activity, countries that have a low level of taxation or even a non-existing one. In few, they are trying to avoid fiscal fraud, but in my opinion, this project was kindly exagerated because it seems like it forgets about the term "fiscal optimisation" and it does make the things even more difficult for the business world, which is already supra-taxed.

How was born the idea of BEPS and why I am presenting it as linked to the intellectual property? This is, probably, a questions already aroused by you. Why fiscality and intelectual property both together and, especially, this two acts that are regarding exclusively fiscality aspects? Well, IP BOX REGIMES. This is the answear.

Starting with the 1970's at an European level a new curent of taxation was born which meant a different taxation of the revenues from the intelectual property than those from other activities. The digitization,the internet conexions, all the tehnlogical advance that made possible the growing and the spread of the music, movies, arts in general, then of the databases and computer's softwares, of all the patents, all this contributed to the intelectual property's amplitude - copyright and industrial property alike. The goal was the encouragement in this ares and as a fact, what else was to do than a smaller taxation?

Irleand was the first country to put in legality the "box regime" fiscal system by Section 34 in the Finances Act from 1973 which stipulated an easier burden, from the fiscality's point of view, for the copyrights and the licenses patented in Ireland. It was a system loved by those who obtained such revenues and hates by the European Community, SAU and G20, a duality which attracted the big companies to establish a small headquarter in Ireland (Google, Facebook, Apple etc.), especially in the IT area, but a system that eventually gave birth to an alignament for the fiscal policies acording to the OECD recommendations named in BEPS – however, late in 2015 (Ireland being the first country which adopted the so-called Knowledge Development Box, a smaller taxation –

* PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: toma.ancutalarisa@yahoo.com).

6.25% - for the research and development (R&D) results that were provided by intelectual property activities).

"IP box regime" aroused in amplitude starting with 2000's when it was adopted in many Eurpoean countries, starting with France, 15% and then Hungary 2003 – taxation 8% for the copyrights. Then, in 2014, 14 coutries had their own preferential system for the intangible assets coming from intelectual property activities and R&D: the Neatherlands (hitting 5% taxation in 2010), Spani (15%), Belgium (the taxation with 34% for just 20% of the revenue coming from the intelectual property activities and R&D), Malta (0%), Luxemburg (5.76%), Great Britain (10%), Switzerland (8.5%), the Nidwladen canton (8.8%), Cyprus (2.5%), Liechtenstein (2.5%), Portugal (15%). The wish to stimulate and to atract new investors, but also to collect funds for the state's bugets from a smaller taxation but a large number of companies, "IP box regimes" have become a fiscal optimisation competition.

However, nowadays, there are rumors that the Great Britain is a fiscal pradise from this point of view, and it is hoped thet after the Brexit the country will regain a kinder system for taxation, as Theresa May said "if we are forced to be something different, then we will have to become something different"[1].

The idea of this regim and it's labbeling as bad is directly connected with de globalization phenomena and the existence of more and more multinationals. As an effect, they are connecting countries, but also them are struggling between the legislative differences of each country. Every budget wants to collect more and when other country preffers to collect less, but to be sure it will collect something, the one with a more drastic regim will rebel and will consider this concurential act as a fiscal paradise. "In such conditions, the state, but also the private realised that the finances that they are obtaining and to which they respond need to be managed separately, in different conditions: while the state (compelled to manifest transparently) is interested that the public money to follow a strict rule (to which path can be easily found), the other entities – legal entities and individuals feel the need of a mor relaxed management of funds (...)[2]".

I believe that an alignment towards a kinder taxation will be a response that will give results more than continous watching and the rashly accusation for fiscal fraud or „fiscal paradise". As the fiscal burden is bigger, so more obvious will be it's avoidance. And also we should not forget that there exists the term „fiscal optimisation" which reffers exactly to this thing: the possibility of chosing the most favorable regim. But from the latest trends, if a company does this it is a higer possibility that it will be labelled as a fraud operating in a fiscal paradise.

Channing Flynn, EY Global Technology Industry Leader in the taxation area said once that the multinationals are forced to constantly balance between the intelectual property's oportunities from a country A and the risks of the anti-tax avoidance campains from countries B and C, but the reality is that, in fact, the multinationas just need a permanent establishment from where to conduct it's business[3]. The problem of the moment are the fiscal paradises, or better said, the attempt to eradicate them. So, this is how the idea of BEPS was born, in 15 different actions:

- Action: 1 Address the tax challenges of the digital economy
- Action 2: Neutralise the effects of hybrid mismatch arrangements
- Action 3: Strengthen CFC rules
- Action 4: Limit base erosion via interest deductions and other financial payments
- Action 5: Counter harmful tax practices more effectively, taking into account transparency and substance
- Action 6: Prevent treaty abuse
- Action 7" Prevent the artificial avoidance of PE status
- Actions 8, 9, 10: Assure that transfer pricing outcomes are in line with value creation
  - Action 8 – Intangibles
  - Action 9 – Risks and capital
  - Action 10 – Other high-risk transactions
- Action 11: Establish methodologies to collect and analyse data on BEPS and the actions to address it
- Action 12: Require taxpayers to disclose their aggressive tax planning arrangements
- Action 13: Re-examine transfer pricing documentation
- Action 14: Make dispute resolution mechanisms more effective
- Action 15: Develop a multilateral instrument.

From all of these, with direct impact for intelectual property are Actions 5 and 8-10, as I will describe them below, but all the plan's actions will apply to each and every company which is activating in the business area.

2. ATAD

As it is revealed in the preamble of the Directive 2016/1164 of 12 July 2016 laying down rules against tax avoidance practices that directly affect the functioning of the internal market, it is necessary to „identify common, yet flexible, solutions at the EU

[1] Adam Bienkov, Theresa May 'stands ready' to turn Britain into a tax haven after Brexit (http://uk.businessinsider.com/theresa-may-stands-ready-to-turn-britain-into-a-tax-haven-after-brexit-2017-1).

[2] M.Șt. Minea, C.F. Costaș, Dreptul finanțelor publice, Vol. I. Drept financiar, ed. a II-a revizuită, Ed. Universul Juridic, București, 2011, p. 18.

[3] Stephen Bates, Ray Beeman, Ian Beer, Joe Bollard, Andrew Choy, Jim Hunter, Global taxation of intellectual property: new and emrging tax policies create high-stakes balancing act (http://www.ey.com/Publication/vwLUAssets/EY-global-taxation-of-intellectual-property-20160518.pdf/$FILE/EY-global-taxation-of-intellectual-property-20160518.pdf)

level consistent with OECD BEPS conclusions" and that the best method for applying it is by european legal instruments – such as directive. The areas in which the directive is applying are: limitations to the deductibility of interest, exit taxation, a general anti-abuse rule, controlled foreign company rules and rules to tackle hybrid mismatches, taking in account also the double taxation. Very important to observe is that the directive is applying also to the resident entities from third parties of the Union if these have a permanent establishment in one or more Member State.

But what is a permanenet estalishment? Aligning to the OECD recommendation, the taxation of the companies is managed to be done at the place where the business is conducted. This is the place where the economical, strategical and necessary decisions for the existing of the business are made or is the place were the executive director is having his activity. In this case, living in the full ares of the technology, where can we say that is this place of the efective conduting when the decisions are made in on-line (teleconferences, for example) or even at the phone, or how do we establish this place when the directors of the company have their departments in different countries? Well, the jurispruence in this ares is very contradictory and does not offers very clear answears. For example, in Unit Construction Co. Ltd. c. Bullock (1960) 3 big companies registred in Kenya were considered to be fiscal residents in the country where was registred the parent company, because there were considered to take in place the major decisions. In other case[4], as opposite, there was established that a company registred in Great Britain is fiscal resident in Neatherlands because the management decisions were made at the advice of a consultant living there. In this way, we can see that the place of the efective management is left to interpretations and we do not have imperative stipulations to establish the exact criteria for this terminology.

However, BEPS has an action dedicated to this term of „permananent establishment". This definition is present in all the countries jurisdictions and, especially, in the treaties for the avoidance of double taxation. BEPS suggeested two situations to which will apply this terminology: the first is that of a fixed place in other country, a place where the activity is conducted also in the name of tha parent company, and the second of an dependent agent – meaning a person which is working on another teritory but on behalf of the parent company and who has the ability to sign contracts in the name of the company. Also, it is remembered about the permanent establishment in the Model-Convention of the OECD when it talks about royalty that comes from a contractant state and for which the efective beneficiar is a resident of the other contractant state, this royalties will be taxaed only in that other state. However, this will not be applied if the effective beneficiar of the royalty, being a resident of a contractant state, has activity as an entrepreneur in the other contractant state – from which the royalty comes from – by the means of a permanent establishment situated there and the rights or the property for which are the royalties paid is effective linked to that permanent establishment. In the same direction, Action 5, or the so-called Nexus Approach, proposed by the OECD's members and then developed in BEPS plan, says that the companies should benefit from a preferential fiscal regim only for the substantial activities which generated the revenues in that country where the fiscal burden is smaller. In other words, there should exist a direct link between the revenues and the activity that contributes to it in order to obtain fiscal benefits. However, the actual fiscal regimes will be applied for all the memebers imperatively and progressively until 30 june 2021.

At 29 may 2017 it was decised that „It is necessary to establish rules that neutralise hybrid mismatches in as comprehensive a manner as possible. Considering that Directive (EU) 2016/1164 only covers hybrid mismatches that arise in the interaction between the corporate tax systems of Member States, the ECOFIN Council issued a statement on 12 July 2016 requesting the Commission to put forward by October 2016 a proposal on hybrid mismatches involving third countries in order to provide for rules consistent with and no less effective than the rules recommended by the OECD report on Neutralising the Effects of Hybrid Mismatch Arrangements[5]". In this way was born the Directiva 2017/952 of 29 May 2017 amending Directive (EU) 2016/1164 as regards hybrid mismatches with third countries. This defines the "hybrid mismatche" as being an "entity or arrangement that is regarded as a taxable entity under the laws of one jurisdiction and whose income or expenditure is treated as income or expenditure of one or more other persons under the laws of another jurisdiction". The directive actions should be applied by the state members until first of January 2022, so there exists a derogatory term from the Directive 2016/1164 - 2021.

3. Intangible Assets

When we talk about the intelectual property we are automatically talking about what is called intangible assets. A book, a CD, a invention, this objects just give birth to the rights from which the creative person will aquire legal protection and will benefit from all the economical and non-economical advantages. This rights are a part from the intangible assets and what is called by BEPS Hard To Value Intangibles (HTVI) and to which it dedicates a plain plan – Action 8. „The business enterprise has two– and only two–basic functions: marketing and innovation. Marketing and innovation produce results;

[4] Wood c. Holden (2008).
[5] Directive (UE) 2017/952 alin. (5) Preamble.

all the rest are costs"[6], how beautiful could caption the essence itself of BEPS and ATAD in the area of intelectual property Peter Druker in this quotation! The world is going to a continuous digitizations, towards an ease of day-by-day life and all of this can be done through R&D, creations, writings and innovation. The intangible capital is formed from assets without material substance, how are in the intelectual property are the patents, the trademarks, the softwares etc. – assets for which there exist rules IAS 38 (International Accounting Standards Board) for evaluating them, because so hard is to establish their value at an international level.To the companies which are activating in this area of business there are applying the stipulations of BEPS and ATAD and because of them this two legislative acts were born. But when it comes to copyrights, even for each individual author, the rules are present, so the royalty that comes from a contractant state and for which the efective beneficiar is a resident of the other contractant state, this royalties will be taxaed only in that other state. However, this will not be applied if the effective beneficiar of the royalty, being a resident of a contractant state, has activity as an entrepreneur in the other contractant state – from which the royalty comes from – by the means of a permanent establishment situated there and the rights or the property for which are the royalties paid is effective linked to that permanent establishment. Also, in the case when because of some special relationships existing between the he who pays and the effective beneficiar or both of them and another third parties, the amount of the royalty regarding to using it, the right or thr information for which is paid, overcomes the amount that was agreed between the payer and the effective beneficiar, and this was not applicable if there was not about that special relationship, than were applicable the rules of the Model-Convention only for the amount mentioned. In this situation, the excendentary part of the payments will remain taxable as the law in every contractany state establish it.

4. BEPS - ACTION 5

Since 2016 there started the tranzition fromthe old fiscal systems regarding the intelectual property to a new system, harmonized, at the level of all the OECD state member for reducing the possibilities of the business companies to avoid tax payement. „Action 5" from BEPS is dedicated especially to this thing and it highlights the importance of transparency, of rewarding just of a few specified substantial activities regarding intangble assets, from the OECD analyze emerging that the base activity that generates revenues as those from R&D, the expenditures should be supported by the entrepreneur itsfel. The new joiners are not allowed to benefit from no preferential regim that exists, starting eith 30 June 2016, for them being mandatory applicable BEPS rules. The new joiners are considered to be the new registred companies after 30 June 2016, but also the ones to whom is applicable the old system until 2021, but for the intelectual property revenues after the date of 30 June 2016, this ones are submissed to the new legislation.

Action 5 is based, especially, on Nexus Approach, a direct connection between the reveues which are submissed to this benefits and the activity that contributes to this revenue and it refers only to the patents and the results of the research and development activities. So, the fiscal benefits are dependent to the expenditure implied in the R&D process.

$$\frac{\text{Qualifying expenditures incurred to develop IP asset}}{\text{Overall expenditures incurred to develop IP asset}} \times \text{Overall income from IP asset} = \text{Income receiving tax benefits}$$

5. BEPS - ACTIONS 8-10

The principle of Arm's lenght is applicable to all the transactions with related parties, shareholders, inclusively for the ones with a foreign legal entity and its permanent establishment from another country. As the Directiva 2016/1164 says, an "associated enterprise" means:

a) an entity in which the taxpayer holds directly or indirectly a participation in terms of voting rights or capital ownership of 25 percent or more or is entitled to receive 25 percent or more of the profits of that entity;
b) an individual or entity which holds directly or indirectly a participation in terms of voting rights or capital ownership in a taxpayer of 25 percent or more or is entitled to receive 25 percent or more of the profits of the taxpayer;

If an individual or entity holds directly or indirectly a participation of 25 percent or more in a taxpayer and one or more entities, all the entities concerned, including the taxpayer, shall also be regarded as associated enterprises.

For the purposes of Article 9 and where the mismatch involves a hybrid entity, this definition is modified so that the 25 percent requirement is replaced by a 50 percent requirement[7].

As the Arm's length principle says, the transaction must be made at what the price of that transaction would be on the open market for the same transaction, in other words at the same agreements as the transaction is made between two parties freely and independently of each other, and without some special relationship. If the price is another, and the general tendency for it is to be smaller, then tha level of the taxed amount is affected and the action can be interpreted as tax fraud. As a control method, there was born the transfer pricing documentation, as a plan of BEPS, and which is periodically controled by the fiscal authorities from each member state.

[6] Peter Druker, The Practice of Management, 1954.
[7] Art. 2.4 Directive 2016/1164.

Conclusion

In the end, we are takling about two different legislative acts of the fiscal area, ATAD that was born because of the need for the uniformity and harminy in this ful era of the globalization, esspecially at the business level, from BEPS, a reformal plan sprung from the dissatisfaction of some countries which whished to tax mor the intelectual property, seeing in this field e future economical boom. The general tendency for the countries is to be submissive to this rules and we have the example of Malta which already announced the adopting of the rules sincer 2016.

References

- M.Șt. Minea, C.F. Costaș, Dreptul finanțelor publice, Vol. I. Drept financiar, ed. a II-a revizuită, Ed. Universul Juridic, București, 2011, p. 18
- Peter Druker, The Practice of Management, 1954
- Adam Bienkov, Theresa May 'stands ready' to turn Britain into a tax haven after Brexit (http://uk.businessinsider.com/theresa-may-stands-ready-to-turn-britain-into-a-tax-haven-after-brexit-2017-1)
- Stephen Bates, Ray Beeman, Ian Beer, Joe Bollard, Andrew Choy, Jim Hunter, Global taxation of intellectual property: new and emrging tax policies create high-stakes balancing act (http://www.ey.com/Publication/vwLUAssets/EY-global-taxation-of-intellectual-property-20160518.pdf/$FILE/EY-global-taxation-of-intellectual-property-20160518.pdf)

THE LEGAL REGIME OF UNFAIR CLAUSES IN COMPARATIVE LAW

Gabriel VASII[*]

Abstract

The concept of unfair clauses has legitimately held the headlines in recent European case law and its relevance is due to the innovative case law solutions and due to the increasing volume of legal contractual relationships which may be considered as being under the legal regime of abusive clauses. The purpose of this article is to analyse unfair clauses in countries with a long history in consumer law, by comparing the manner in which these clauses are stipulated and what each state deems to be unfair. Also, the author's study is aimed to outline the legal solutions identified by the foreign legislator in comparison with the ones established by the Romanian legislator with respect to unfair consumer clauses.

This study is also directed towards emphasizing the necessity of amending the current legal framework regulating abusive clauses, since current technological developments are susceptible of creating situations where the consumer is unlikely to be guarded from a legal point of view. For example, even though contracts concluded online are highly frequent nowadays, consumer protection is still directed towards more classic contracts and is unable to provide for relevant liability in cases when the consumer is subject to intelligent agents acting in cyber space. In particular, the usual lists of clauses deemed as abusive does not reflect and are not exactly applicable to cases when the consumer orders a product or a service through online platforms and therefore, the legal framework must be amended in accordance with common cases usually encountered in today's modern reality.

Keywords: unfair clauses, unfair contract terms, standard contract terms, good faith, contractual balance, consumer protection rules.

1. Introduction

All parties enter a contract, when trying to perform an activity, regardless if the activity is focused on selling or procuring assets, obtaining financing for the establishment of a business or insuring their existing business. Contracting parties may be both professionals or individuals. If the parties to the same contract are one professional and one individual, there is a significant protection which the individual should be aware of, since, based on consistent legal provisions, in most cases the individual is deemed to be a consumer.

Under European Union laws[1], the consumer is defined as any natural person who, in contracts covered by this Directive, is acting for purposes which are outside his trade, business or profession, whereas the seller or supplier' means any natural or legal person who, in certain contracts, is acting for purposes relating to his trade, business or profession, whether publicly owned or privately owned. For the purpose of this analysis, we shall refer to such a seller or supplier as a "professional".

The importance of establishing adequate and balanced contractual relationships in cases when a consumer enters a contract where the contracting party is a professional has been emphasized both by European Parliament and by member states officials whose purpose was to create a coherent and convergent legal framework for the protection of consumers.

The creation of this legal framework is fully justified and was embraced by consumers who requested the application of such framework in their own agreements. For example, large law offices have sustained that there is a growing tendency in recent years for borrowers in Spain to file claims alleging that certain provisions included in their mortgage loans are abusive or unfair[2]. In Romania, this tendency has also been increased in cases where consumers who benefited from credits in CHF reacted promptly by filling claims financial instituitions for the annulment of potentially abusive clauses. This tendency was exacerbated most likely by the huge increase of CHF exchange rate[3] and the tendency of Romanian courts is to determine that most clauses related to the manner of establishing interest rates and certain commissions are abusive and therefore, should be annulled.

2. Legal framework regarding abusive clauses and unfair terms in the European Union

The necessity to ensure proper guidelines at the level of the European Union was considered given that it is the responsibility of the European Union to supervise and ensure that contracts concluded with consumers do not contain unfair terms. Also, Member [*] PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: gabriel.vasii@tuca.ro).

[1] http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=CELEX%3A31993L0013

[2] http://www.allenovery.com/publications/en-gb/european-finance-litigation-review/southern-europe/Pages/Increasing-litigation-in-Spain -regarding -abusive-clauses-in-mortgage-loans.aspx

[3] https://www.economist.com/blogs/economist-explains/2015/01/economist-explains-13

States took into consideration the creation of a tool aimed to facilitate the stablishment of the internal market and to safeguard the citizen in his role as consumer when acquiring goods and services under contracts which are governed by the laws of Member States other than his own.

Based on these premises of protecting European citizens from the risks of unfair terms practiced by other contracting countries, Member States adopted Council Directive 93/13/EEC of 5 April 1993 on unfair terms in consumer contracts (hereinafter "Directive no. 93/13/EEC").

Directive no. 93/13/EEC focuses on the notion of "good faith" to prevent imbalances in the rights and obligations of consumers on the one hand and sellers and suppliers on the other hand.

Under EU law, standard contract terms used by traders have to be fair. Based on Directive no. 93/13/EEC, a contractual term which has not been individually negotiated shall be regarded as unfair if, contrary to the requirement of good faith, it causes a significant imbalance in the parties' rights and obligations arising under the contract, to the detriment of the consumer.

Since Directive no. 93/13/EEC was aimed to create a legal environment safeguarding consumer, it has produced a large influence regarding fundamental notions and principles of contract law in the traditional domestic legal systems of the Member States[4].

Further on, this article shall analyze the manner in which some Member States have implemented Directive no. 93/13/EEC and how the protection exercised by the European Union has affected consumers.

3. Legal framework regarding abusive clauses and unfair terms in Romania

Directive no. 93/13/EEC has been transposed in Romania through Law no. 193/2000 regarding unfair terms in contracts concluded between professionals and consumers (hereinafter "Law no. 193/2000").

Law no. 193/2000 establishes basic principles for contracts concluded between professionals and consumers for the sale of assets or for the performance of services, which include the provision of clear contractual clauses which may be understood by any individual, without specialized knowledge.

Also, pursuant to Law no. 193/2000, any unclear clauses shall be interpreted in favour of the consumer.

Law no. 193/2000 establishes a complex mechanism for determining the abusive character of a contractual clause. As per article article 4 of Law no. 193/2000, a clause which was not subject to negotiation directly with the consumer shall be deemed as abusive if by itself or along with other contractual clauses, creates with bad-faith a significant imbalance between your rights and obligations as a consumer and the rights and obligations of professionals. Also, a clause shall be deemed as not being directly negotiated with the consumer in case it has been established without the consumer's effective possibility to influence its content.

If specific terms in a contract are unfair, they are not binding on the consumer and the professional may not rely on them.

If the unfair term is not an essential element of the contract, the rest of the contract, except for the unfair term, remains valid and must be observed by the parties.

It is relevant to observe that the notions of "good-faith" and "significant imbalance" are not defined by Law no. 193/2000. To this end, consumers may revert to the practice of the European Court of Justice, which states that a significant imbalance should not been seen only in connection to an economical quantitative difference between the total value of the contractual operation and the costs borne by the consumer. More precisely, in the Court's opinion[5], a significant imbalance may result solely from a sufficient damage to the legal situation of the consumer, as a contractual party, manifested as a limitation of the consumer's rights or as a restriction for the exercise of such rights.

Also, in another case[6], the Court deemed that the observance of the good-faith should be analyzed in connection to the legal situation of the consumer, by considering the mechanisms available to the consumer as per the national legislation for the termination of unfair terms usage. In the same case, the Court mentioned that the national court must verify whether the professional could have had reasonable expectations that the consumer accepts a potentially unfair clause following an individual negotiation.

National doctrine[7] emphasizes the importance of the evaluation of the professional's behavior in general, by considering several elements, both prior and subsequent to the conclusion of the contract, for the establishment of the professional's good faith.

A point which national doctrine[8] correctly emphasized is that some clauses inherently connected to and which define the object of the contract or establish the equivalence between the price and the product or service provided by the professional are excluded from the application of Law no. 193/2000 and implicitly, Directive no. 93/13/EEC, if they are expressed in a clear and intelligible language.

As opposed to most continental law, US laws do not comprise a definition of unfair terms and do not provide

[4] Paolisa Nebbia, Unfair Contract Terms in European Law. A Study in Comparative and EC Law, , Hart Publishing, 2007.
[5] ECJ, Judgment of the Court (First Chamber), 16 January 2014, Constructora Principado SA v José Ignacio Menéndez Álvarez
[6] Judgment of the Court (First Chamber), 14 March 2013, Mohamed Aziz v Caixa d´Estalvis de Catalunya, Tarragona i Manresa (Catalunyacaixa)
[7] Lucian Mihali Viorescu, Clauzele abuzive in contractele de credit, Ed. Hamangiu, p. 176.
[8] Liviu Stanciulescu, Curs de drept civil. Contracte, Ed. Hamangiu, 2014, p. 100.

criteria for establishing whether a clause may be deemed as unfair[9]. However, good faith is defined by US laws and this provision may be a proper start for determining whether by breaching good contractual faith, one may generate a significant imbalance to a consumer.

4. The black and grey lists of unfair terms as per Directive no. 93/13/EEC and Law no. 193/2000

Current legal framework does not only provide the conditions which a clause must meet in order to be deemed as unfair, but also exemplifies the types of clauses which may be ab initio considered as unfair.

For example, the Annex of Directive no. 93/13/EEC provides several types of indicative and non-exhaustive list of the terms which may be regarded as unfair. Some of these terms refer to requiring any consumer who fails to fulfil his obligation to pay a disproportionately high sum in compensation, irrevocably binding the consumer to terms with which he had no real opportunity of becoming acquainted before the conclusion of the contract, enabling the professional to alter the terms of the contract unilaterally without a valid reason which is specified in the contract or to to alter unilaterally without a valid reason any characteristics of the product or service to be provided or even obliging the consumer to fulfil all his obligations where the professional does not perform his.

This list has been considered as a „grey list" by Romanian doctrine[10], since the determination of the abusive character of such clauses must be performed by analysing the conditions set our in national legal framework. This point of view emerged from European practice[11], based on the findings of the European Court which mentioned that the Annex of Directive no. 93/13/EEC serves as a „grey list" of terms which may potentially be deemed as unfair, whereas the Annex of Law no. 193/2000 represents a „black list" of clauses which must be interpreted as unfair, without any subsequent analysis.

The Annex to Law no. 193/2000 comprises, among others, clauses which allow the professional to unilaterally amend the contractual terms, without a serious ground which must also be stipulated in the contract, clauses which oblige the consumer to observe contractual conditions which he could not effectively be aware of at the date of signing of the contract and clauses which allow the professional to exlusively interpret contractual terms.

In addition, the Annex to Law no. 193/2000 also includes clauses based on which the consumer must may substantial amounts of money if the consumer does not observe certain obligations. These amounts of money are usually excessive in comparison with the actual damage suffered by the professional. Also, another type of abusive clauses are the ones in which the professional is entitled to claim damages from the consumer even if the professional did not execute its own obligations. Legal doctrine[12] identifies that certain clauses comprised in agreements concluded by professionals with phone companies are abusive, since these provide that the consumer must pay penalties for the non-observation of his obligation to pay the due amounts. In some cases, these penalties even exceed the main amount, therefore the lack of proportionality of the clause is more than clear.

Under Romanian law, if a clause may not be initially included in the Annex of Law no. 193/2000, the national court must analyse whether the conditions stipulated within article no. 4 of Law no. 193/2000 are cumulatively met in order to determine that said clause represents an unfair term.

5. Unfair terms in comparative law

Even prior to the adoption of Directive no. 93/13/EEC, both Member States and foreign states have been preoccupied in addressing the issue of consumer protection.

For example, foreign literature[13] revealed that in the United Kingdom, in 1973, the Supply of Goods (Implied Terms) Act 1973 was adopted, limiting for instance the use of warranty exclusion clauses, considered unfair, particularly in consumer contracts.

In France, the Loi No 78-23 du 10 janvier 1978, Loi sur la protection et l'information du consommateur de produits et de services was the normative act which innovatively introduced the concept of abusive clause in contracts entered into between professionals and consumers. This Law provided that certain clauses may be prohibited, limited or regulated when imposed on non-professionals or consumers by the other party's abusive use of economic power, which confers an advantage to the professionals.

In Germany, the Act against Misleading Advertising (Das Gesetz gegen den unlauteren Wettbewerb) was adopted in 1965. On December 9, 1976, Germany adopted the General Conditions of Sale Act (Das Gesetz zur Regeland des Rechts des Allgemeinen Geschäftsbedingungen), which was not limited only to consumer contracts and protected natural as well as legal persons against unfair pre-formulated (standardized) contract clauses.

---

[9] Anca Ruen, Paradoxurile juridice ale bunei-credințe în contractele de consum. Privire comparativă între sistemul continental şi sistemul american, Revista Jurisprudentia nr. 3/2011.

[10] Lucian Mihali Viorescu, Clauzele abuzive in contractele de credit, Ed. Hamangiu, 2018, p. 142.

[11] European Court of Justice, Judgment of the Court (Ninth Chamber) of 26 February 2015, Bogdan Matei and Ioana Ofelia Matei v SC Volksbank România SA

[12] Ana-Maria Lucia Zaharia, Clauzele abusive în contractele încheiate de consumatori, Revista Forumul Judecătorilor nr. 3/2009.

[13] Union des consommateurs, Ending abusive clauses in consumer contracts - Final Report of the Project presented to Industry Canada's Office of Consumer Affairs, Canada, September 2011.

Currently, the perspective on unfair terms has been treated both in common law and in continental law.

For example, in the United Kingdom, in 1977, the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 (hereinafter the "UCTA") was adopted. This Act incorporated SOGITA's regulation of liability limitation or exemption clauses and extended the law's scope to adhesion contracts between merchants. Once Directive no. 93/13/EEC was adopted, United Kingdom has integrated its dispositions in the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations (hereinafter the "UTCCR"), for the first time in 1994 and then in 1999. Currently, both normative acts are applied. As opposed to the UCTA, the UTCCR proposes a list of clauses presumed unfair and contains no list or example of clauses considered unfair.

French doctrine[14] states that the theory of contractual obligations is influenced by socialist ideology, which substitues contractual equality with the protection of the weakest party, by developing consumer rights. In France, the credit agreement is currently regulated within the Consumer Code and Loi nº 95-96 du 1er février 1995 transposing Directive no. 93/13/EEC. Specialized literature[15] pointed out that the so-called "Loi L.M.E."(Loi no 2008-776 du 4 aout 2008 de modernisation de l'economie) of 2008 provided for two lists of unfair clauses depending on the features and conditions related to the terms of the: a grey and a black list of clauses. While the grey list presumes some clauses are unfair and the professional must prove the non-abusive nature of the clause, the black list comprises clauses which must be considered as abusive.

In Spain, as in other European countries, the legal framework allows consumers to address courts in view of censoring the unfair terms included in contracts concluded between consumers and professionals. Recently, there is an accentuated tendency in case law that leans towards declaring the abusiveness of many clauses standardly used by financial institutions in the mortgage market. For example, Spanish Supreme Court has ruled that rounding-up clauses are unfair since they generate a significant contractual imbalance between parties[16]. Once the rounding-up clause is rendered nul land void, the bank is obliged to repay the excess amounts it has collected as a result of the operation of the clause. The Court's conclusion is reasonable, considering that rounding-up clauses represent standard clauses in floating interest mortgage loans and facilities, whereby the lender is entitled to always round up an interest rate to the nearest full percentage point. Also, the Spanish Supreme Court has deemed that default interest rate clauses which specify that a default interest rate is more than three times the legal rate of interest (measured as at the date of default), it shall be declared abusive.

In the Netherlands, the fundamental premise of contract law is not contract freedom, but "reason and fairness", as per the Dutch Civil Code of 1992, in the sense that "a contract term that conflicts with the requirements of reason and fairness is not applicable[17]". Based on this general principle, in Dutch law the notion of an adhesion contract is not acceptabile. Dutch law provides a distinction between general terms, which are basically represented by all contractual clauses, except for the ones destined for the actual purpose of an agreement, including its price. Nevertheless, Directive 93/13/EEC has been integrated in the Dutch Civil Code, which contains two lists of clauses which must be or may be considered as abnormally onerous – a black list and a simple list.

3. Conclusions

By adopting Directive 93/13/CEE, a new legal framework was created, leading to an almost uniformization of the legislation regarding the protection of consumers in the European Union. Directive no. 93/13/EEC also represented the basis on which some Member States adopted a stricter policy regarding consumer rights and unfair terms in contract concluded between professionals and consumers. Its relevance is that prior to the adoption of Directive no. 93/13/EEC, professionals had the liberty to include unfair terms in their contracts, without any sanction. In present, the high tendency of consumers to address the court for the annulment of unfair clauses has emerged based on the protective legislation created by the European Union. Therefore, professionals cannot insert standard, unfair terms in their agreement and if these clauses are successfully contested, professionals may bear financial liability before consumers.

Although not all Member States have adopted black lists of clearly unfair terms, the progress made in the field of protecting consumers has been hugely appreciated. Nevertheless, this European progress should be assessed also in relation to the impact that this may have on the domestic traditions which may have been more permissive with potentially unfair clauses in the past.

Last but not least, consumer laws should also be adapted considering the increase in technology development, which leads to a higher numer and type of agents offering services in online to consumers. As such, the interest of the legislator should be guided also towards the innovative nature brought by intelligent agents[18], such as the legally binding nature of a web page, the neutrality of an intelligent agent etc.

---

[14] Rémy Cabrillac, Droit des obligations, 3e édition, Dalloz, Paris, 1998, p.5.

[15] Anna Tarasiuk-Flodrowska, Abusive clauses in consumer and insurance contracts – Recent developments in Europe, published in The European insurance law review no.1/2014, available at http://www.erevija.org/eng/home.php.

[16] http://www.allenovery.com/publications/en-gb/european-finance-litigation-review/southern-europe/Pages/Increasing-litigation-in-Spain-regarding-abusive-clauses-in-mortgage-loans.aspx

[17] Art. 6:2 al. 2 Nieuw Burgerlijk Wetboek (NBW).

[18] Silvia Feliu, Intelligent Agents and Consumer Protection, International Journal of Law and Information Technology, Vol. 9, No. 3, Oxford University Press 2001.

References

- Paolisa Nebbia, Unfair Contract Terms in European Law. A Study in Comparative and EC Law, , Hart Publishing, 2007
- Liviu Stanciulescu, Curs de drept civil. Contracte, Ed. Hamangiu, 2014
- Lucian Mihali Viorescu, Clauzele abuzive in contractele de credit, Ed. Hamangiu, 2018
- Rémy Cabrillac, Droit des obligations, 3e édition, Dalloz, Paris, 1998
- Union des consommateurs, Ending abusive clauses in consumer contracts - Final Report of the Project presented to Industry Canada's Office of Consumer Affairs, Canada, September 2011
- Anca Ruen, Paradoxurile juridice ale bunei-credințe în contractele de consum. Privire comparativă între sistemul continental și sistemul american, Revista Jurisprudentia nr. 3/2011
- Anna Tarasiuk-Flodrowska, Abusive clauses in consumer and insurance contracts – Recent developments in Europe, published in The European insurance law review no.1/2014, available at ,http://www.erevija.org/eng/home.php
- Silvia Feliu, Intelligent Agents and Consumer Protection, International Journal of Law and Information Technology, Vol. 9, No. 3, Oxford University Press 2001
- Ana-Maria Lucia Zaharia, Clauzele abuzive în contractele încheiate de consumatori, Revista Forumul Judecătorilor nr. 3/2009
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=CELEX%3A31993L0013
- http://www.allenovery.com/publications/en-gb/european-finance-litigation-review/southern-europe/Pages/Increasing-litigation-in-Spain-regarding-abusive-clauses-in-mortgage-loans.aspx
- https://www.economist.com/blogs/economist-explains/2015/01/economist-explains-13
- ECJ, Judgment of the Court (First Chamber), 16 January 2014, Constructora Principado SA v José Ignacio Menéndez Álvarez
- ECJ, Judgment of the Court (First Chamber), 14 March 2013, Mohamed Aziz v Caixa d´Estalvis de Catalunya, Tarragona i Manresa (Catalunyacaixa)
- European Court of Justice, Judgment of the Court (Ninth Chamber) of 26 February 2015, Bogdan Matei and Ioana Ofelia Matei v SC Volksbank România SA

ACTION FOR DECLARING THE ABUSIVE CHARACTER AND FOR ASCERTAINING THE ABSOLUTE NULLITY OF SOME CLAUSES FROM A CREDIT CONTRACT CONCLUDED BETWEEN A PROFESSIONAL MERCHANT AND A CONSUMER. CONDITIONS OF ADMISSIBILITY FROM THE PERSPECTIVE OF THE SPECIAL LAW AND OF THE COMMON LAW. EFFECTS ON THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE CONTRACT

Eugenia VOICHECI[*]

Abstract

The Council Directive 93/13/EEC on unfair terms in consumer contracts was transposed into the Romanian legislation under the Law no. 193/2000 on unfair terms in the agreements concluded by professionals and consumers.

The above legislation sets the legal framework of consumer protection, defines both the consumer and professional and establishes the conditions to be cumulatively met in order for a term to be declared unfair.

The above-mentioned legislation does not institute a juris et de jure presumption regarding the unfairness of the terms listed in the annex, therefore the supervisory body and courts of law are called upon to assess in each case subjected to control whether a certain term is unfair or not.

The Council Directive 93/13/EEC and the Law no. 193/2000 do not impose, exhaustive definitions for the professional and the consumer status and do not exclude the incidence of other provisions of internal law, either lex specialis or lex generalis, for determining such status.

The above-mentioned legislation does not exclude the possibility to invoke other grounds for nullity specified in other lex specialis or in lex generalis in a trial for ascertaining the unfairness of the terms and the nullity of certain clauses. Thus, an analysis of the specific jurisprudence reveals a juxtaposition of distinctive legal grounds.

Not lastly, the above-mentioned legislation does not expressly provide whether the courts of law are competent to modify a term which was declared unfair, nor does it provide the circumstances under which an agreement could be executed after the elimination of the unfair term. The above-mentioned legislation provide in terminis solely the incumbent nature of the consumer's agreement for the continuation of the contractual relationship. In this context, the relevant materials for finding solutions which could lead to safeguarding the agreement are the C.J.E.U. case-law and the Romanian law.

Keywords: credit contract; consumer; abusive clauses; nullity; the carrying out of the contract.

Introduction

The objectives of the paper are focused on shaping the legal regime of this type of legal action and on highlighting its peculiarities, while harmonizing the internal legislation with the European legislation, changing at national level the paradigm of the system for regulating the relations of private law in the context of the existence of a manifest inconsistency in the regulatory framework in defining the concept of „professional" and the increased frequency of The study addresses the topic of consumer rights protection in concluding and executing contracts concluded by them with professionals, by means of an action for finding unfair terms in these contracts, regulated by the European Union legislation and the national law.

The analysis is of particular importance since the approach of this procedural protection mean shows the legislator's concern for safeguarding the contractual balance by setting up measures in favour of the weak contractor, who has to resort to the contracts concluded with the professionals that represent the constancy of social and economic relations of satisfying the general interests court cases in which the allegedly unfair nature of contractual terms is claimed.

In order to meet the stated objectives, the approach must go from the exhaustive presentation of the internal and European legal framework, from underlining the basic concepts, to highlighting the common elements, but especially particular elements of the action in finding the unfair nature of the terms in the concluded contracts between professionals and consumers in determining the consequences of admitting such an action, highlighting the main guidelines of a rich judicial practice of the Romanian courts and the Court of Justice of the European Union.

The need for this study emerged from the fact that there is a wide jurisprudence in the matter, but that the problem of the particular nature of the action in finding the unfair terms has been poorly addressed in the doctrine, and that it needs highly welcome theoretical specifications.

The content itself

By Law no 193/2000 on unfair terms in the contracts concluded between professionals and consumers, the Council Directive 93/13/EEC on unfair terms in consumers contracts was transposed into the Romanian legislation and between the two legal acts there are no notable differences.

[*] PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: eugenia_voicheci@yahoo.com)

Article 1 of the Law no 193/2000 specifies the types of contracts concerned, namely those relating to the sale of goods or the provision of services, and the article 3 paragraph 1 extends the scope of the law and to other contractual instruments (requisition orders, delivery bills, tickets, vouchers), provided they refer to the pre-established general conditions.

Article 1 sets out three guiding principles, all in favour of consumers:

1. the types of contracts announced must contain clear contractual terms, for which understanding no specialty knowledge is required;
2. in the event of doubt as to the interpretation, the unclear terms shall be interpreted in favour of the consumer;
3. it is forbidden for professionals to stipulate unfair terms. From this perspective, the contracts the Law no 193/2000 refer to can be considered contracts with terms prohibited by law, and they are, in this context, part of the forced contracts category.

In the article 2 of the Law no 193/2000 „the consumer" and „the professional" are defined.

With the abolition of the Romanian Commercial Code of 1887, which operated with the notion of „trader" and provided the Law no 287/2009 on the Civil Code operates with the notion of „professional", who is defined as the person operating an enterprise, the definition proposed by the article 2 paragraph 2 of the Law no 193/2000 for a professional appears doubtful and contradictory to the purpose of the law itself, since in the traditional activities associated with trade the legislator unjustifiably adds liberal professions.

Besides, it should be noted that in the initial form of the legal act to which we refer the legislator referred in the title of the law to the contracts concluded between traders and consumers, in which case we can conclude that the protection regime provided by the legal act analyzed concerns the situation of the professionals-traders. An argument in this respect is also the provision in the article 4 paragraph 2, which discusses the general conditions practiced by the merchants (emphasis added) on the market of the respective product or service.

Article 4 of the Law no 193/2000 establishes the legal status of the terms considered to be abusive.

From the examination of this ample article the following theses are broken:

1. The premise of qualifying a term as unfair is its non-negotiated nature. It is considered as not non-negotiated directly with the consumer the term that was established without giving the consumer the opportunity to influence its nature, meaning in which the article 4 paragraph 2 of the law refers to pre-formulated standard contracts or to the general conditions of sale practiced by traders on the concerned product or service market.

The non-negotiated nature is not removed when only certain terms were negotiated if, for the rest of the contract, a global assessment leads to the conclusion that it was pre-established by the professional.

Related to the non-negotiated character of the term, the legal act analyzed provides in the article 4 paragraph 3 the final thesis that if the professional claims that a standard term was negotiated directly with the consumer, the professional has the burden of proof of this aspect, by way of derogation - we underline - from the actori incumbit probatio rule, since in the actions for annulment the professional is a defendant.

In this way, the legislator constituted in terms of evidence a consumer's favour regime, establishing virtually a presumption of non-negotiation of terms in the pre-formulated contracts, a relative presumption that the professional may overturn according to the principle in excipiendo reus fit actor.

It is necessary to emphasize that the wording of the Law no 193/2000 unquestionably reveals that the legislator understood to establish in favour of consumers a special regime that will protect them from possible imbalance in the contractual relations with the professionals and this regime mainly concerns the moment of conclusion of the contract and the stage of the negotiations, this is why the analysis of all the conditions required to verify the unfair nature of a term must relate to those two moments, being, in that logic and in terms of the unfair nature of the terms, quasi-irrelevant that a contract was enforced with regard to retrospective character of the nullity sanction attached to that unfair nature.

The evidence thesis to be traced and proved by the professional – trader concerns a stage prior to that of the agreement of will, namely the negotiation phase, from the logical-grammatical interpretation of the evoked legal text, and it can be reasonably inferred that the legislator does not give unconditional preference to the aspect formally related to the signing of the contract, but to the way the agreement of will is achieved and the real possibility for the consumer to discuss the terms proposed by the professional, negotiate them and accept them knowingly and in accordance with their own interest.

In this logic, we have to highlight, exempli gratia, grace in the loan agreements, which are most frequently denounced, that it is irrelevant that the borrowers - consumers signed the loan agreements and the fact that they have opted for a particular type of pre-formulated contract from a series of similar contracts of the same type, as long as the legislator does not consider sufficient to adhere to the contract or the choice between several types of adhesion contracts, but firmly requires proof of direct negotiation of the contract in its entirety or some of its terms, respectively the proof of those discussions prior to the conclusion of the contract showing the borrower's agreement was reached regarding the content of the denounced term.

2. The terms considered to be unfair are set out in an exemplary annex to the law.

We appreciate that this inventory of unfair terms in the annex to the law cannot lead to the conclusion that these terms are unfair de plano.

In this respect, we evoke the provisions of the article 4 paragraph 1 of the legal act examined, which states that the contractual term is considered to be unfair, which „by itself or with other provisions of the contract, creates a significant imbalance between the rights and obligations of the parties, to the detriment of the consumer and contrary to the requirements of good faith".

The provisions of the paragraph 5 of the article 4 cited above lead to the same conclusion, which provide the parameters against which the unfair nature of a contractual term is assessed (emphasis added):

a) the nature of the products or services which are the subject of the contract at the time of its conclusion;
b) all the factors that led to the conclusion of the contract;
c) other terms of the contract or other contracts on which it depends.

The annex 1 to the Law no 193/2000 comprises a list containing terms considered as unfair and the Annex to Directive no 93/13/EEC is relative to the terms referred to in the article 3 paragraph 3 of the Directive.

Both legal acts show that in the accompanying annexes there is an inventory of some terms that can be considered unfair .

None of the legal reference acts provides that in the annexes there is an exhaustive inventory of the terms considered unfair.

None of the legal acts mentioned provides in terminis that the terms mentioned are presumed to have per se - in the absence of any other conditionings - an unfair character.

On the contrary, by reference to the article 3 paragraph 3 of the Directive, even in the title of the Annex, the conclusion that imposes is that the inventory of the terms in the Annex does not contain unfair terms only to the extent they meet the other conditions required to declare their unfair nature.

Under the circumstances, we consider that the reference to a certain typology of the terms contained in an exemplary list, not limitative, cannot in itself lead to the conclusion that those terms are presumed juris et de jure as unfair, since the absolute legal presumptions must be expressly stated in unequivocal terms not deducted per a contrario or by other interpretative considerations, in which case it is proposed to consider that the annex to a legal act may derogate from the rules which make up the body of that legal act.

Consequently, we consider that there can be no absolute presumption of the unfair nature of the terms mentioned in the annexes cited and that this unfair nature must be proved in the circumstances of the article 4 of Law no 193/2000, respectively under the article 3 and following of the Directive no 93/13/EEC.

3. According to the article 4 paragraph 6 of the Law no 193/2000, certain terms cannot be censored from the point of view of their unfair character:

„The assessment of the unfair nature of the terms is not associated either with defining the main object of the contract or with the quality of meeting the price and payment requirements on the one hand and the goods and services offered on the other, to the extent these terms are expressed in a readily understandable language".

Although the text outlined seems to censor those intimate terms related to the contract price and the specific nature of the consideration, the exemption is only partial and justifiably operates only when the terms are expressed in easily understandable language.

The doctrine and the jurisprudence consistently established that whenever a term of the kind provided in the article 4 paragraph 6 of the law does not meet the requirement of clear and easily comprehensible expression, it can be examined under the same article in terms of its unfair nature.

This is the case, for example, of the terms regarding the interest and bank charges, where the courts, retaining their essential character, nevertheless made an assessment of the unfair nature precisely because of the unclear expression and concluded that the positions expressed and assumed by the litigants show that the borrower and the lender had different representations of the interest variability rate at the time of the conclusion of the contract; this aspect, in conjunction with the absence in the special contract concluded with each borrower, a contract which necessarily singularizes the terms of the agreement and to which all the assumed concrete obligations have to be reported, of any indication regarding this variability criterion makes the contractual provision relating to the variable reference interest be considered unquestionably a provision expressed in terms of maximum equivocal, which authorizes the examination of this term in the light of the provisions of the article 4 paragraphs 1 and 2 of Law no 193/2000.

The courts went further and analyzed, referring to the specificity of the contracts concluded and the particular form of the denunciated terms, that the expression in a readily understandable language cannot be limited to a correct grammatically, morphologically, syntactically and semantically and that easily intelligible language means that in the case of conventions, each of the contracting parties should have the unambiguous representation of the nature and extent of its own acquired rights and obligations and of the rights and counterparts of the other side.

4. We consider that, in order to establish/declare the unfairness of a term, it must meet cumulatively the requirements of the article 4 paragraphs 1 and 6 (if it is an essential term of the contract) of the law, respectively the term was not negotiated directly with the consumer, was not expressed in a language that is easy to understand and creates, contrary to the requirements of good faith, by itself or together with other provisions of the contract, a significant imbalance between the rights and the obligations of the parties. They are, in fact, the conditions for the admissibility of the action for annulment, to which is added the requirement-premise of the existence of a contract concluded between a professional and a consumer, a contract which, as provided by the article 3 paragraph 2 of the Law no 193/2000 does not fall under any other legal text in force.

Also from the point of view of the admissibility conditions, we consider that it is necessary to specify that the law in the analysis concerns the contracts for the sale of goods and the services, mentioned in the article 1 paragraph 1 of the law. In this context, we note that the provisions of the article 7 of the Law no 193/2000 have an improper or rather incomplete wording, given that the contracts provided by the legislator include, together with successive enforcement contracts, also contracts with unoictu execution, which would require that the resolution be mentioned and sanctioned together with that of termination, expressly provided.

For reasons to be further shown, we consider that the action to establish the unfairness of contractual term, based on the provisions of the article 4 of Law no 193/2000 has the effect of ascertaining the absolute nullity of those terms, which, in accordance with a consistent doctrine and case-law on that point, requires an examination of the grounds for nullity and of the requirements imposed by the article 4 paragraphs 1 and 6 of the law at the time of the conclusion of the contract.

For this particular type of action, however, the examination of the significant imbalance requirement between the rights and obligations of the parties exceeds this reference moment of the conclusion of the contract and is, in reality, placed in the overwhelming majority of cases in the next time, that of the execution of the contract.

This is because the consumer's rights are actually harmed not at the time when an unclear term is stipulated and left exclusively at the hands of the professional – trader, but at the time when the latter uses it. The establishment and collection of a fluctuating interest rate, generally increasing, depending on changes considered significant in the financial market, the anticipated maturity of the balance in case of alleged devaluation of the collateral, the increase of the principal to be repaid when the exchange rate fluctuates, etc. are significant in this respect.

The wording of the text of the Law no 193/2000 implicitly shows that an action for finding the unfairness of the contractual terms can be promoted also during the course of the contract and the provisions of the article 6, article 7, article 12 paragraph 4, article 14 of the law can be interpreted as such. It reinforces the idea that the assessment of the contractual imbalance is inevitably placed on the executive realm, exceeding the moment of conclusion of the contract, when the terms in question have only the potential to create an imbalance between benefits.

In many of the judgments pronounced, the Court of Justice of the European Union ruled on the moment of the conclusion of the contract as the one to which it relates, including the establishment of the imbalance between benefits. It is relevant the judgment of the Court (Second Chamber) of 20 September 2017 in case C-186/16 Ruxandra Paula Andriciuc and others against Banca Românească S.A., in which the Court stated the following:

„The article 3 paragraph (1) of the Directive 93/13 is to be interpreted as meaning that the assessment of the unfairness of a contractual term must be made in relation to the time at which the contract is concluded, taking into account all the circumstances the professional might have known at the time and were likely to influence the subsequent performance of the contract in question. It is for the referring court to assess, having regard to all circumstances of the main case and taking into account, in particular, the expertise and knowledge of the professional, in the present case of the bank, regarding possible fluctuations in foreign exchange rates and the risks inherent in the contracting of a foreign currency loan, the existence of any imbalance within the meaning of that provision" [1].

It is retained from the grounds of that judgment that „It follows that, as the advocate general observed in points 78, 80 and 82 of these conclusions, the assessment of the unfairness of a contractual term must be made in relation to the time at which that contract was concluded, taking account of all circumstances of the case which the professional could have known at that time and which were likely to influence the subsequent execution of the contract, a contractual term involving an imbalance between the parties which would not occur until the performance of the contract.

In the present case, it is apparent from the order for reference that the term in question in the main case, inserted in foreign currency loan contracts, states that the monthly repayment rates of the loan must be made in the same foreign currency. Such a term places the risk of foreign exchange to the consumer in case of devaluation of the national currency in relation to that foreign currency.

In that regard, it is for the referring court to assess, in the light of all circumstances of the main case and having regard, in particular, to the expertise and knowledge of the professional, in this case the bank, as to possible fluctuations in foreign exchange rates and risks inherent in contracting a foreign currency loan, in the first place, the possible non-compliance with the requirement of good faith and, second, the existence of any significant imbalance within the meaning of the article 3 paragraph (1) of the Directive 93/13.

In order to ascertain whether a term such as that at issue in the main dispute, contrary to the requirement of good faith, a significant imbalance between the rights and the obligations of the parties to the contract, to the detriment of the consumer, the national court must verify whether the professional by acting fairly and fairly towards the consumer, it could reasonably be expected that the latter would accept such a term following an individual negotiation (see, to that effect, the Decision of March 14 2013 Aziz, C415/11, EU:C:2013:164, points 68 și 69)"[2].

[1] The judgment can be found at http://curia.europa.eu/juris/document/document.jsf?text=&docid=194645&doclang=RO

Or, while the judgement firmly referenced at the reference point of the conclusion of the contract, the Court of Justice of the European Union itself cannot categorically separate the timing of the contract to be executed while referring to the placement of foreign exchange risk in the consumer's task, which implies the execution of the contract.

That is why we believe that the approach of this kind of action must be done with maximum finesse and taking into account its specificity, which, for a fair and judicious application of the requirement to assess the significant imbalance between the parties' performance must be transgressing from the moment of the formation of the contract at the time when it is enforced, but without thereby confusing the unpredictability mechanism, provided it is based on a non-negotiated term, contrary to good faith and potentially harmful, therefore virtually null.

Moreover, we believe that in order to understand the peculiarity of the action based on the article 4 of the Law no 193/2000 should be referred to the virtual nullity institution, the effects of which shall be objectified during the execution of the contract. Since an abrupt and strict approach to assessing the significant imbalance between benefits only from a theoretical perspective by limiting at the time of the conclusion of the contract is not intended to make that procedural remedy an effective remedy to protect the consumer since an assessment in abstracto imposed even to a professional, especially in the case of those long-term loan contracts, is unrealistic and makes the stated intention of protecting the consumer a dead letter.

Action to establish the unfairness of contractual terms.Characters and effects

The provisions of the Law no 193/2000 do not link in terminis, but only implicitly the action for finding/declaring the unfair nature of contractual terms of the nullity action, but that is undoubtedly apparent from the corroborated examination of the article 6, and article 7 and article 12 paragraph 4 of the law, legal texts which refer to the fact that the terms found to have unfair nature do not have any effect on the consumer, that they will be deleted/removed from the contract and the consumer who opposes an adhesion contract containing unfair terms has the right to invoke the nullity of the term by way of action or exception, according to the law - we emphasize - before the common law court.

The systematic interpretation of the analyzed legal texts leads to the conclusion that the declaration/finding of the unfair nature of a term (some terms) is the premise and also the cause of its nullity, a sui generis nullity cause, based on the non-negotiated character (which can be subsumed to the lack of consent) and the injurious character of contractual balance.

Although the type of nullity is not provided in the Law no 193/2000, we consider that it can only be absolute nullity. In order to reach this conclusion, we proceed from the very purpose of the Law no 193/2000, to establish a legal protection regime for the consumer in contractual relations with the professional – trader, which implies vigorous sanctions for violation of the rules of protection issued for this purpose, public order rules in our appreciation.

Secondly, if we start from the sanction related to the non-negotiated nature of the term/terms, we can conclude that the legislator has understood to protect the parties' willingness to consent, which presupposes the existence of consumer's consent to the insertion of contractual terms. Or, under the Civil Code regime of 1864 (under which the Law 193/2000 was adopted), the lack of consent at the conclusion of the act is sanctioned with absolute nullity, according to the provisions of the article 948 point 2 of the Civil Code.

Last but not least, related to the provisions of the article 12 paragraph 4 of the law, referring to the nullity regime deduced from the interpretation of the provisions of the article 2 of the Decree no 167/1958 (in force at the time of the adoption of the Law no 193/2000), only absolute nullity could be invoked at any time, either by way of action or by way of exception.

Establishing the type of nullity implied by the unfair character of a (some) contractual term(s) is of particular interest, because in the wording of the Law no 287/2009 regarding the Civil Code the rule is the relative nullity, as it results from the interpretation of the provisions of the article 1252: „In cases where the nature of the nullity is not determined or is not unquestionably apparent from the law, the contract is reversible". In the present case, according to the preceding arguments, the nullity is absolute, as it is clear from the law.

A constant problem in court practice has been the possibility for the consumer to invoke also the grounds for common law nullity, in addition to the unfair nature and disregard of the provisions laid down by the special law.

We appreciate this accumulation as possible, considering that the provisions of the article 12 paragraph 4 of Law no 193/2000 confers the right of the consumer to invoke the nullity by way of action or exception, under the law (emphasis added). Or, as long as there is no obligation on the consumer to use only the route provided by lexspecialis, we consider that he has open the way of common law in which he may juxtapose grounds for nullity provided by consumer protection law and grounds for nullity provided for by common law, the purpose of the action being one and the same, namely the lack of efficiency of the terms that are contrary to the law.

[2] idem

In accordance with the principle of safeguarding the contract (favor contractus), the Romanian legislator in 2000 reaffirmed the settled rule of nullity, namely partial nullity, endorsing it in the article 6, article 12 paragraphs (3)-(4) and the article 13 paragraph (1) of the legal act above mentioned.

Therefore, the rule is to continue the performance of the contract after the cancellation of the terms found to be null, provided that it can still be executed in the absence of these terms and provided that the consumer agrees to do so.

The latter condition seems somewhat bizarre, and can be regarded as a consumer-recognized surplus of protection. This is because, for the assumption that the contract may continue after the abolition of unfair terms, it must be acknowledged that this also benefits the consumer, who does not contest the contract as a whole. In that case, the expression of the consumer's consent appears to be excessive, especially as it has been given the reparation function of the nullity penalty, which is the removal of the term and the full repair of the damage suffered by the parties in the previous situation (restitutio in integrum).

Where the contract no longer produces legal effects after cancellation of a term/some terms, the consumer is granted the right to request termination (we have shown in the previous one that the termination in the contracts with enforcement at a time), with damages. We consider this provision to be inappropriate, since the impossibility to execute the contract leads to the application of the sanction of its obsolescence.

Conclusions

In the analysis made we aimed to tackle the following research directions of the topic chosen:

Thus, we identified the types of contracts covered by the Law no 193/2000 and we highlighted the principles imposed by this legal act for the elaboration of the contracts concluded between professionals and consumers and we characterized these contracts as contracts with terms prohibited by law considering the legal prohibition to insert unfair terms in them.

I have synthesized the legal definitions of the professional and the consumer, highlighted the inadequate and inappropriate nature of the professional definition, and concluded, with regard to the provisions of the new Civil Code, but also to the original title of the law and certain legal provisions that survived the changes that occurred in the course, that the legal act refers to the category of professionals-traders.

We have extensively presented the legal regime of unfair terms, with theoretical arguments and examples of judicial practice.

Finally, we highlighted the characters, the specificity and the effects of the action in finding the unfair nature of some contractual terms.

We appreciate that the present study will be a starting point, an opportunity for reflection and a theoretical and practical guide to understanding and solving actions to establish the unfair nature of contractual terms, being - to the author's knowledge - the first attempt to synthetically and systematically tackle the issues addressed.

We consider that the researched field is far from exhausted and future directions of analysis will have to go towards the crystallization of the definitions of the professional and the trader, the delimitation between the actual consumer and the irregular traders, depending on the type of activity carried out, towards the position the conventions concluded between the consumers and liberal professions has in the wording of these contracts.

We also believe that there are still arguments to be exploited in relation to the type of nullity implied by a term declared unfair in the context of the regulation of the new Civil Code, especially from the point of view of the characterization of the economic public order, but also from the perspective of the formation of the will agreement as the expression of consent and the aspect of lesion regulation.

Last but not least, we consider that the interferences between the institutions of unpredictability and the nullity action, as well as between the institution of termination/cancellation and the caducity or other causes of ineffectiveness of legal acts may be exploited in a beneficial sense.

References

- The Council Directive 93/13/EEC
- The Law no. 193/2000

INTERACTION BETWEEN HAGUE CONVENTION ON THE CIVIL ASPECTS OF INTERNATIONAL CHILD ABDUCTION AND DOMESTIC LITIGATIONS CONCERNING DOMICILE OF THE CHILD AND PARENTAL AUTHORITY

Anca Magda VOICULESCU[*]

Abstract

In the vast majority of cases, international abduction of a child determines almost per se litigations both at international and national level, namely an international litigation based on provisions of Hague Convention on the civil aspects of international child abduction and a domestic litigation aiming at establishing the domicile of the child in the state of destination and other different measures concerning the child which fall within the area of parental authority (joint or exclusive).

The purpose of the article is to analyze the interaction between the international and the national case and how they influence each other from a double perspective (procedural and substantial), taking into account that the two litigations are generally pending at the same time. Even the mere coexistence of the two litigations gives rise to the question which one should have priority in solving.

Therefore, the objectives of this study are, on the one hand, to examine the implications in the domestic litigation of the decision pronounced in the Hague litigation (international competence, suspension of the national case, elements which are covered by the res judicata principle), and on the other hand to identify how a national decision on domicile and parental authority may influence the solution in the Hague case.

Keywords: international abduction of a child, international litigation, domestic litigation, procedural implications, substantial implications.

1. Introduction

The present study aims to analyze the interaction between two types of litigations (one national and the other international), which generally appear at the same time in case of international child abductions.

The subject presents significant importance, from both practical and theoretical point of view.

International child abductions give birth in practice, almost automatically, to an international case based on provisions of the 1980 Hague Convention on the civil aspects of international child abduction that pursues to return the child to the state of origin, as well as a to a domestic litigation, where the goal is to establish the domicile of the child in the state of destination (and eventually other different measures concerning the child that fall within the area of parental authority – joint or exclusive).

The parties involved in these disputes have opposite interests on the same major aspect that is at stake in both cases, namely to establish the domicile of the child[1] in the state of origin (the parent left-behind) or in the state of destination (the abductor parent).

Depending on the solution on this point, other procedural and substantial aspects are to be determined. Moreover, the mere coexistence of the two litigations gives rise to the question which one should have priority in solving.

In this context, it comes natural that there is an interaction between the two cases, which expresses both in procedure and substance, and not only during court proceedings, but also after settlement by judicial judgement.

The great number of cases in the particular area of international child abductions where national and international litigations coexist, doubled by the fact that this aspect has not yet been discussed in Romanian juridical literature, fully illustrates the importance of identifying the interdependence aspects of and providing an answer to questions raised by this interdependence.

To reach this purpose, we intend to make a short presentation of the 1980 Hague Convention (nature, objectives, mechanism provided to assure the prompt return of abducted children to the state of origin), in connection to Council Regulation (EC) no. 2201/2003 (applicable for Member States of European Union).

As in practice 1980 Hague Convention and the Regulation apply in compliance with national law, we will also identify relevant provisions in Romanian domestic law and present case law (both national and international).

Specialized opinions (where they have been expressed) will also be identified and discussed.

[*] PhD, Judge at Bucharest Tribunal, trainer in family law at Romanian National Institute of Magistracy, Romanian designated judge in International Network of Hague Judges for 1980 Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction (e-mail: ancamagda.voiculescu@gmail.com)

[1] „Habitual residence" in the words of the 1980 Hague Convention (notion specific to 1980 Hague Convention, distinct from the notion of domicile in national legislations).

Interconnecting all these different perspectives (legislative, judicial and doctrinal), we will finally conclude over the main interaction points in procedure and substance and solutions proposed from our national domestic perspective.

2. Content

2.1. The 1980 Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction

The Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction is an intergovernmental agreement concluded at The Hague on October 25, 1980, during the 14th Session of the Hague Conference on Private International Law, which entered into force on December 1, 1983[2].

Similar to other Hague Conventions, an Explanatory Report was drafted by Eliza Pérez-Vera[3] and is a useful working tool for professionals who deal with international child abductions in their practice.

The 1980 Hague Convention governs issues related to parental kidnapping of children under the age of 16[4] across international borders and involving the jurisdiction of different countries[5].

It's objectives are „to secure the prompt return of children wrongfully removed to or retained in any Contracting State and ensure that the rights of custody and of access under the law of one Contracting State are effectively respected in the other Contracting States" (Article 1 of 1980 Hague Convention).

The very first article of 1980 Hague Convention expresses threfore the idea that this international agreement does not address the question who should have domicile of the child[6], but only aims to achieve the objectives presented above[7], of which the most important is considered to be the prompt return of the child to the state of origin[8].

Once the child has been returned to the state of habitual residence, the dispute concerning domicile and parental authority can then be solved in the courts of that jurisdiction under the applicable national law[9].

The mechanism provided by 1980 Hague Convention to achieve the immediate return of the child is simple and efficient and should be applied complemented by domestic law of each Contracting State[10].

Each country party to 1980 Hague Convention designates a Central Authority to carry out specialized Convention duties. Central Authorities cooperate in order to achieve the objects of the convention (Articles 6 and 7 of 1980 Hague Convention).

Any person, institution or other body claiming that a child has been removed or retained in breach of custody rights may apply either to the Central Authority of the child's habitual residence or to the Central Authority of any other Contracting State for assistance

[2] For an online text, see for example www.hcch.net. In 1999, the Hague Conference established INCADAT, a database of significant decisions in the area of international child abductions, available in general in summary and full text, in English, French, Spanish and sometimes the original language at www.incadat.com.

[3] Explanatory Report on the 1980 Hague Child Abduction Convention drafted by Eliza Pérez-Vera, Madrid, April 1981, published in 1982 and available online at the following link: https://www.hcch.net/en/publications-and studies/publications2/explanatory-reports, last accession on 28.02.2018; 17,57.

[4] The 1980 Hague Convention does not apply to unborn children (cases involving pregnant mothers). Also, it considers age 16 of the child, specific to this international instrument and different from the age of emancipation in different domestic legislations.

[5] M. Welstead & S. Edwards, Family Law, Oxford University Press, 2nd Edition, 2008, p. 352-353: „Where abduction occurs in countries which are signatories to the Convention, the Convention applies. (…) Where countries are not signatories to the Hague Convention, inter-country cooperation is difficult and outcomes for parents are haphazard and unpredictable, with the result that the courts have adopted divergent rules with regard to non-Convention cases."

[6] K. Standley, Family Law, 6th Edition, Palgrave Macmillan Publishing House, New York, 2008, p. 352: „The scheme of the Convention is to provide a speedy extradition-type remedy whereby Contracting States agree to return abducted children to their country of habitual residence so that the matter can be dealt with there. In this sense it is a provisional remedy, for Hague Convention proceedings are not concerned with the merits of a custody issue – that is a matter for the court in the child's country of habitual residence."

[7] For the same conclusion, see D.F. Barbur, Autoritatea părintească, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2016, p. 215. ECtHR held that failure of national authorities to secure return of abducted children may lead to a breach of Article 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and therefore national authorities must take positive measures to enable parents to be reunited with their children, unless contrary to children's best interests (ECHR, Decision adopted on 29 April 2003, Application no. 56673/00, case Gil and Aui v. Spain; ECHR, Decision adopted on 26 June 2003, Application no. 48206/99, case Maire v. Portugal).

[8] C. Mol LL.B., Non-traditional Family Forms & the International Dimension of Family Life: A Report on the ERA Seminar, 'Recent Case Law of the European Court of Human Rights in Family Law Matters', p. 1, available online at the following link: http://www.familyandlaw.eu/tijdschrift/fenr/2016/06/FENR-D-16-00006/fullscreen, last accession on 28.02.2018; 19,14: „ (…) at the time of the adoption of the Hague Convention the opinion was that it is in the best interests of the child to be returned immediately to the country of habitual residence. Primarily because most abductors were believed to be fathers who no longer had custody rights and abducted the children out of frustration or spite, but also because the Hague Convention aimed to dissuade parents from abducting their children as it is in children's best interests not to be abducted. However, research has shown that nowadays most abductors are mothers with the role of primary caretakers." Starting from case Neulinger and Shuruk v. Switzerland (ECtHR, Decision adopted on 6 July 2010, Application no. 41615/07), the author expresess doubts that, at present, automatic and prompt return is still considered to be in the best interests of the child (ECtHR developed the opinion that a swift return is not always in the best interests of the particular abducted child, and the best interests of the child must be assessed in each individual case).

[9] There are countries where abducting a child is a criminal offence (e.g., United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, under the Child Abduction Act 1984 - see K. Standley, op. cit., p. 350).

[10] K. Standley, op.cit., p. 352: „Instead of making a return order, the English courts have sometimes adopted the practice of accepting an undertaking from a party to the proceedings. An undertaking is a promise to the court (for example, to return the child, to provide accommodation, travel costs or maintenance) and breach of the undertaking can be contempt of court. (…) The problem with undertakings, however, is that, compared to court orders, they are not easily understood by foreign courts and enforcement abroad may be difficult."

in securing the return of the child (Article 8 of 1980 Hague Convention).

The judicial and administrative authorities of the Contracting States under the Convention are required to use the most expeditious procedures for the return of children according to their national law (Article 2 of the Hague Convention).

To this respect, a period of six weeks from the date of commencement of the proceedings is recommended in order to take a decision (Article 11 of 1980 Hague Convention).

Participation of Romania to 1980 Hague Convention was assured by Law no. 100/1992 for Romania's accession to 1980 Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction[11].

Subsequently, Law no. 369/2004 on the application of 1980 Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction[12] provided procedural and substantial domestic rules under which international child abductions are dealt with[13].

In Romania, the designated Central Authority is the Romanian Ministry of Justice.

Since 2004, Romania has unified national territorial competence for international child abductions in Bucharest (Bucharest Tribunal is the first instance and Bucharest Cort of Appeal is the instance of appeal).

The case may be brought to court either by the Ministry of Justice as Central Authority or by any person, institution or other interested body and no costs are attached.

By exeption to the general rule, no defence procedural act is mandatory; free legal aid and advice by an attorney are assured.

The period between court sessions cannot be longer than two weeks and participation of the prosecutor is imperative.

Adoption of judgement may be postponed 24 hours and motivation of decision should be made within 7 days from date of pronouncement.

2.2. Connection to Council Regulation (EC) no. 2201/2003

Abduction of children is a growing problem in European Union, where citizens increasingly move freely across borders. It is a frequent situation that abductions occur among EU citizens, who decide either to wrongfully remove, or illegally retain a child in the territory of another EU Member State[14].

Relation between 1980 Hague Convention and the Council Regulation no. 2201/2003[15] is very important, as there are EU State Members which at the same time are contracting parties to 1980 Hague Convention[16].

The connection between them is legiferated by Article 60 of the Regulation, according to which, in relations between Member States, the Regulation shall take precedence over the Hague Convention in so far as they concern matters governed by the Regulation[17].

Nevertheless, 1980 Hague Convention will continue to govern issues not dealt by the Regulation, as well as abduction cases involving EU State Members and third countries that are parties to 1980 Hague Convention[18].

Recital 17 of the Preamble of the Regulation clarifies that in case of wrongful removal or retention of a child, provisions of 1980 Hague Convention will continue to apply, as complemented by article 11 of the Regulation[19].

In this context, we consider important to underline the progress made by the Regulation in comparison to 1980 Hague Convention, related to some particular matters concerning international child abductions[20].

First, when applying Articles 12 and 13 of 1980 Hague Convention[21], it shall be ensured that the child

[11] Published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 243/30.09.1992.

[12] Published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 888/29.09.2004 and republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 468/25.06.2014.

[13] For short references to 1980 Hague Convention (without further comments), see M. Avram, Drept civil. Familia, 2nd Edition revised and completed, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2016, p. 492.

[14] Most of international abduction cases in which Romania is involved concern Italy, Spain, France, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and Germany. Also, there have been cases with Hungary, Austria, Ireland, Greece, Cyprus, Portugal, Mexic, USA.

[15] Council Regulation (EC) no. 2201/2003 concerning Jurisdiction and the Recognition and Enforcement of Judgments in Matrimonial Matters and the Matters of Parental Responsibility, repealing Regulation (EC) no. 1347/2000, OJ L338/1 (12/23/2003).

[16] This „double participation" arises the problem of priority/armonisation between 1980 Hague Convention and Regulation no. 2201/2003.

[17] The Regulation is not limited to issues related to child abduction. It intends to solve, in general, conflicting issues related to jurisdiction, recognition and enforcement of judgments in family relations and questions of parental responsibility, in order to create a common judicial area in civil matters, based on trust and mutual confidence in judicial systems of EU Member States.

[18] K. Standley, op. cit., p. 377: „If a child is abducted (...) to a country which is not party to the Hague or European Conventions, the wronged parent is in a precarious position because (...) there are no international mechanisms in place. A parent will therefore have to try to reach an amicable settlement with the abducting parent, or commence legal proceedings in the country to which the child has been taken. (...) Bringing proceedings in countries with Islamic legal systems can be particularly difficult."

[19] To this respect, see T. Papademetriou, Implications of European Union Regulation Hague Convention on International Child Abduction, in Hague Convention On International Child Abduction. An analysis of the applicable law and institutional framework of fifty-one jurisdictions and the European Union, Report for Congress, June 2004, p. 11, James Madison Memorial Building; 101 Independence Avenue, S.E.; Washington, DC, available on-line at the following link: https://www.loc.gov/law/help/archived-reports/hague-convention-on-international-child-abduction.pdf, last accession on 27.01.2018, 15:38.

[20] For some references to this aspect, see A.-G. Gavrilescu, Drepturile și obligațiile părintești. Drept român și comparat, Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2011, p. 293.

[21] Exceptions to the general rule of prompt return, in case the child integrated to the new environment (Article 12) or lack of interest/consent of the holder of rights concerning the child/grave risk for the child in case of return (Article 13).

is given the opportunity to be heard during the proceedings, unless this appears inappropriate having regard to his or her age or degree of maturity (Article 11 Para 2 of the Regulation)[22]. The importance attached to the voice of the child is thus enhanced, as in the context of 1980 Hague Convention the child is to be heard only in case of Article 13 Para 2 (when the child opposes to return)[23].

Secondly, according to Article 11 Para 4 of the Regulation, a court cannot refuse return of a child on the basis of Article 13b of 1980 Hague Convention if it is established that adequate arrangements have been made to secure the protection of the child after his or her return (this exception is not prescribed by 1980 Hague Convention)[24].

Thirdly, pursuant to Article 11 Para of the Regulation, a court cannot refuse to return a child unless the person who requested the return of the child has been given an opportunity to be heard (another exception not to be found in the Hague Convention).

Finally, the Regulation introduced new obligations for the court settling 1980 Hague case by a non-return order based on Article 13 of the Hague Convention (Article 11 Para 6-8 of the Regulation). The central idea is that a non-return decisions in 1980 Hague cases must be followed by a clarification of legal situation of the child in the courts of the jurisdiction where the child was habitually resident immediately before the wrongful removal or retention[25].

2.3. Procedural interconnections

Procedural interconnections between the national and the international case appear while they are both pending, but also if 1980 Hague dispute is settled first[26].

It is of great importance to establish how these interconnection points are to be solved, as the two disputes generally take place at the same time under jurisdictions of different Contracting States.

Thus, the Hague case is always settled by courts in the state of destination and the domestic litigation falls within the competence of jurisdiction of the state of habitual residence[27].

a) Suspension of national litigation

The 1980 Hague Convention has specific provisions for the situation that the two disputes mentioned above are pending at the same time.

According to Article 16 of 1980 Hague Convention: „After receiving notice of a wrongful removal or retention of a child in the sense of Article 3, the judicial or administrative authorities of the Contracting State to which the child has been removed or in which it has been retained shall not decide on the merits of rights of custody until it has been determined that the child is not to be returned under this Convention or unless an application under the Convention is not lodged within a reasonable time following receipt of the notice." (our underline)

As clearly explained in Pérez-Vera Explanatory Report (Para 121), „ (…) so as to promote the realization of the Convention's objects regarding the return of the child, (this article – our note) seeks to prevent a decision on the merits of the right to custody being taken in the State of refuge. To this end, the competent authorities in this State are forbidden to adjudicate on the matter when they have been informed that the child in question has been, in terms of the Convention, wrongfully removed or retained." (our underline)

Nevertheless, 1980 Hague Convention gives no clue to application in practice of the principle prescribed by Article 16 presented above. The response is thus to be looked for in national law of each Contracting State (in general, procedural law[28]).

There are still courts considering that no provision of domestic law is necessary and apply directly (and only) Article 16 of 1980 Hague Convention when deciding suspension of the domestic case[29].

Our opinion is that the above-mentioned Article 16 prescribes a mere principle and therefore its application in practice must be individualized by provisions of domestic law (as already precised, procedural provisions left at the discretion of each Contracting State).

In Romanian case-law there was no debate on the procedural solution of suspension of national litigation; nonetheless, an intensely debated question concerns the legal nature of suspension: mandatory or facultative?

In our opinion, the answer resides in application of Article 412 pt. 8 of Romanian Procedural Civil Code, under which: „ (1) Suspension of cases operates by law:

[22] See ECJ, Decision adopted on 22 December 2010, C-491/10, case Aguirre Zarraga v. Pelz, where a question concerning whether the child has had the opportunity to be heard under Regulation (the case was based on Article 42 of the Regulation, but in essence the reasoning should also apply to Article 11). ECJ's approach was to emphasize the mutual trust between EU courts (if Spanish courts certified that the child had the opportunity to be heard, then they should be trusted). ECtHR's approach was very different and examined (not trusted) whether the Spanish courts had adequately protected the child's human right to be heard.

[23] K. Standley, op. cit., p. 356: „It has been increasingly recognised in Hague Convention cases that children may not be being heard enough."

[24] For example, in case of a violent parent left-behind in the state of origin, the authorities of this state assure for returning parent and child protection in houses and state-sponsored shelters.

[25] This provision exemplifies an application of the well-known principle of best interests of the child and represents at the same time a type of cooperation among different national courts.

[26] The 1980 Hague Convention promotes the idea that domestic litigation should be settled after the Hague case, as it will be argued in the foregoing considerations.

[27] Habitual residence of the child prior to removal to the state of destination is to be established in 1980 Hague case.

[28] In case of Romania, Romanian Procedural Civil Code adopted by Law no. 134/2010, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 606/ 23.08. 2012.

[29] E.g., case no. 36836/301/2015 (judgement pronounced on 30.03.2016), where Judecătoria Sector 3 Bucureşti decided suspension of the domestic case concerning parental authority, based only on Article 16 of 1980 Hague Convention.

… 8. in other cases provided by law" (in case of international child abductions, the „law" to which Article 412 pt. 8 makes reference is to be individualized in Article 16 of the Hague Convention).

We consider application of Article 412 pt. 8 of Romanian Procedural Civil Code to be the right solution because it is a case of mandatory suspension (by force of law) that fully accomplishes the idea expressed by Article 16 of 1980 Hague Convention.

Romanian case-law is not unified on this aspect, and there are courts considering that Article 413 pt. 3 or Article 413 Para 1 pt. 1 of Romanian Procedural Civil Code should be applied (facultative suspension)[30].

We have strong doubts concerning this procedural solution.

Article 16 of 1980 Hague Convention is formulated in binding terms: „the judicial (…) authorities of the Contracting State to which the child has been removed or in which it has been retained shall not decide" – our underline. Likewise, the Explanatory Report Eliza Pérez-Vera states that „the competent authorities in this State are forbidden to adjudicate on the matter" (our underline).

Moreover, Article 413 of Romanian Procedural Civil Code allows national judge to appreciate upon suspension of the domestic litigation (suspension does not imperatively operate by law but falls within the margin of appreciation of the domestic judge).

Or, a facultative suspension is contrary to the text of 1980 Hague Convention quoted above.

Also, it is contrary to the spirit of 1980 Hague Convention. Let us remind that the primary scope of 1980 Hague Convention is to ensure prompt return of the child to the state of origin. This goal would become much more difficult to be attained if, prior to settling the 1980 Hague case, the national court establishes that the domicile of the child is in the state of destination[31].

Another question appeared in Romanian jurisprudence, namely suspension should be considered only in case of national litigations concerning the merits, or also in case of litigations concerning provisional measures asked to be taken by the urgent procedure in Romanian Procedural Civil Code called „ordonanță președințială"[32]?

In disagreement to the case-law[33], we consider that suspension must be decided indepently of nature of the measures asked for in the domestic case (on the merits or provisional).

We argue by the same teleological interpretation of 1980 Hague Convention presented before and also paying attention to the fact that Article 16 of 1980 Hague Convention makes no diference between provisional measures/merits of the case.

In addition, according to Article 13 of Law no. 369/2004, measures of protection concerning the child under Romanian domestic legislation (provisional by their own nature) may be taken only by the court seized with 1980 Hague case[34].

Or, there is no good reason to consider that, contrary to the spirit of these provisions, other provisional measures might be taken by domestic courts, while the Hague case is still pending.

We conclude that suspension of national litigation is mandatory if a 1980 Hague Convention case is pending at the same time, albeit the domestic litigation concerns the merits of the case or simply provisional measures.

In Romanian law, the correct procedural solution is to apply Article 412 pt. 8 of Romanian Procedural Civil Code, which prescribes a case of imperative suspension.

b) International competence

If 1980 Hague dispute is settled first, the judgement pronounced in this case establishes indirectly (but undeniably) the international competence of domestic court invested with the dispute concerning measures for the child under national legislation which fall within the area of parental authority (domicile, exercise of parental authority, etc.).

Article 8 of Regulation (EC) no. 2201/2003 stipulates as a rule on the matter of international competence[35]: „The courts of a Member State shall have jurisdiction in matters of parental responsibility over a child who is habitually resident in that Member State at the time the court is seised". (our underline)

As already pointed out, the state of habitual residence of the child prior to his/her removal to the state of refuge is always established in the international abduction case.

This aspect, once decided in 1980 Hague dispute, will be covered by the res judicata principle and therefore the national court must take it into account when deciding on its own competence.

---

[30] For example, in case no. 14153/193/2017 registered at Botoșani Tribunal (judgement pronounced on 01.11.2017), the court decided suspension of domestic case based on Article 413 pt. 3 of Romanian Procedural Civil Code in connection to Article 16 of 1980 Hague Convention (facultative suspension). In a smilar reasoning of facultative suspension, Judecătoria Sector 1 București decided in case no. 16819/299/2017 (judgement pronounced on 17.01.2018), suspension based on Article 413 Para 1 pt. 1 of Romanian Procedural Civil Code (it is to be noted that, in this case, a different basis for facultative suspension was considered).

[31] For example, one may consider that, in this situation, the child is lawfully retained in the state of destination and Hague application for return should be dismissed, as conditions prescribed by Article 3 of 1980 Hague Conventin are not fulfilled.

[32] Articles 997 and subsequent of Romanian Procedural Civil Code.

[33] E.g., in case no. 37303/301/2015 (judgement pronounced on 15.01.2016), Judecătoria Sector 3 București denied suspension of national litigation („ordonanță președințială" concerning domicile of the child and exclusive parental authority) arguing that the measures making the object of the case were provisional and did not concern the merits of the case. Further on, the court decided to establish the domicile of the child to the abductor, to whom also granted exclusive parental authority.

[34] Article 13 Para 1 of Law no. 369/2004.

[35] There are also other situations apart from the general rule, where competence is attained by other means (prorogation of competence, presence of the child, etc.), according to Articles 9-14 of the Regulation.

In Romanian law, under Article 131 of Romanian Civil Procedural Code, the national judge is obliged to verify the general (international), material and territorial competence of the court at the first hearing[36].

If 1980 Hague dispute is settled and habitual residence of the child has been established in the state of origin, the national court in the state of refuge should deny its general competence.

According to Article 17 of the Regulation: „Where a court of a Member State is seised of a case over which it has no jurisdiction under this Regulation and over which a court of another Member State has jurisdiction by virtue of this Regulation, it shall declare of its own motion that it has no jurisdiction".

A similar solution is provided by Romanian Civil Procedural Code: „ If the court decides it has no jurisdiction (...) it shal reject the request (...) as not falling under the jurisdiction of Romanian courts" (Article 132 Para 4).

If 1980 Hague dispute is settled and habitual residence of the child has been established in the state of refuge, the courts in this state will gain international competence.

Finally, if the 1980 Hague dispute has not yet been settled (and international competence has not yet been established), we consider the national court should apply Article 16 of 1980 Hague Convention complied to domestic legislation and dispose suspension of the domestic case until the Hague case is pronounced by definitive judgement.

2.4. Substantial interconnections

As soon as one of the two disputes in discussion is settled, important substantial interconnections appear.

If the international dispute is solved first, juridical elements and even facts discussed and settled fall afterwards within the area of application of the principle of res judicata.

One example is parental authority and it's exercise prior and after removal of the child from one Contracting State to another.

Upon Article 3 of 1980 Hague Convention[37], parental authority (common or exclusive according to the law of the state of origin or judgements already pronounced in this state) and it's practical exercise represent conditions to be necessarily analyzed in order to determine if removal or retention of a child was wrongful (or not) and and decide on admission or denial of 1980 Hague application.

Once these juridical or factual elements have been established in 1980 Hague case, they must be considered by the national court and, according to appreciation of the national judge, may influence the solution to be pronounced.

Depending on the aspects established in the international litigation, the outcome in the national dispute may result in exclusive authority, change of domicile of the child to the left-behind parent and/or restricted rights of access for the abductor parent.

For example, in a 1980 Hague case, Romanian court decided return of the children to USA, stating that their habitual residence was in USA[38].

In the state of the habitual residence (even prior to the decision in the Hague case[39]), the court decided to change the custody agreed by parents at divorce (joint common legal and sole physical custody in favour of the abductor parent) into sole physical and legal custody in favour of the left-behind parent.

At the same time, the domestic court in USA decided to restrict the time to be spent by the abductor parent with children to "supervised visitation at a commercial parental supervision facility due to (…) risk of flight and abduction of the minor children[40]".

Another example consists in factual elements in the corpus of a decision of non-return based on Article 12 Para 2 or Article 13 Para 1 b of 1980 Hague Convention (integration of the child in the new environement in the state of refuge/grave risk to physical or psychological harm to the child in case of return to the state of origin)[41].

---

[36] Article 131 of Romanian Civil Procedural Code: „ (1) At the first hearing when the parties are legally summoned before the court, the judge must, ex officio, examine and determine whether the court seised has general, material and territorial jurisdiction ... (2) In exceptional cases, if clarifications or additional evidence are necessary for establishing jurisdiction, the judge will take the conclusions the parties and provide a single postponement for this purpose".

[37] Article 3 of 1980 Hague Convention: „The removal or the retention of a child is to be considered wrongful where: a) it is in breach of rights of custody attributed to a person, an institution or any other body, either jointly or alone, under the law of the State in which the child was habitually resident immediately before the removal or retention; and b) at the time of removal or retention those rights were actually exercised, either jointly or alone, or would have been so exercised but for the removal or retention. The rights of custody mentioned in sub-paragraph a above, may arise in particular by operation of law or by reason of a judicial or administrative decision, or by reason of an agreement having legal effect under the law of that State."

[38] Bucharest Tribunal, case no. 24670/3/2017, judgement no. 1522 pronounced on 27.10.2017.

[39] We are of the opinion that Article 16 of 1980 Hague Convention should have been applied.

[40] The Fourth Circuit Tribunal for Knox County, Tennessee, USA, case no. 131115, judgement pronounced on 17.07.2017, where the court reasoned as follows: „There has been no valid reason presented to this Court or to any Court to explain …(the abductor parent 's – our note) actions in failing to obey Orders of this Court, for denying the plaintiff coparenting time, and for removing the minor children to Romania and refusing to return them. (…) the Plaintiff has been forced to seek legal relief under the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of Child Abduction and there is an upcoming trial set in Romania (…) (The abductor parent – our note) has unilaterally and without cause completely denied the Plaintiff his coparenting time and as such, does not have the ability to facilitate a relationship between the Father and the minor children (…) did abduct the minor children, has refused to follow a child-custody determination of this Court (…) has engaged in conduct that Court considers relevant to risk of abduction, specifically seeking Romanian citizenship for the children (…)."

[41] Article 12 Para 2 of 1980 Hague Convention: „The judicial or administrative authority, even where the proceedings have been commenced after the expiration of the period of one year referred to in the preceding paragraph, shall also order the return of the child, unless it is demonstrated that the child is now settled in its new environment."

Integration of the child in the state of destination with the abducting parent may very well lead to establishment of domicile of the child to this parent.

Similarly, great risc to physical or psychological harm to the child based on mental illness of the left-behind parent may justify granting to the abductor parent domicile of the child and even exclusive parental authority[42].

On the other hand, the situation where the national case is pronounced first is a bit different and is expressly dealt with in 1980 Hague Convention.

Articles 17 and 18 of Hague Convention[43] invest the court solving the international case with a large margin of appreciation concerning reasons of national decision which may be taken into account in applying Hague Convention; practice has proved that, in general, courts are reluctant to refuse a return order[44].

This difference in treatment (as there is no provision in 1980 Hague Convention to leave to the appreciation of national judge the effects of the jugement pronounced in the international litigation) may well be explained by the aim to discourage national courts to solve their cases in breach of Article 16 of 1980 Hague Convention discussed above[45].

Considering limitation by law itself of influence of decision pronounced in the national litigation (Articles 17 and 18 of 1980 Hague Convention), we conclude that it is the judgement pronounced in the abduction case that has a more pregnant influence, as presented above.

3. Conclusions

In case of coexistence of national and international disputes based on situations of international child abduction, the international litigation should be settled first, according to Article 16 of 1980 Hague Convention.

This first procedural interaction between the two disputes while they are both pending should be solved according to domestic legislation, whereas 1980 Hague Convention does not prescribe a specific procedural means in order to ensure practical application of Article 16 referred to above.

Under Romanian law, we consider that the solution consists in application of Article 412 pt. 8 of Romanian Procedural Civil Code (mandatory suspension by law of the national case).

Nevertheless, taking into consideration that Romanian case – law on this point is not unified (a considerable number of courts decide facultative suspension under Article 413 of Romanian Procedural Civil Code), we appreciate that a clear legislative solution would be very useful.

In this respect, we suggest a solution similar to the one legiferated in Article 412 Para 1 pt. 7 of Romanian Procedural Civil Code[46] in case of preliminary questions pursuant to Article 267 TFEU (ex. Article 234 EC) addressed to ECJ by domestic courts, which expressly states mandatory suspension of the national dispute.

This clear legislative procedural solution would eliminate all possible interpretations of national courts that are against the text and spirit of 1980 Hague Convention and ensure at the same time a correct application of Article 16 of the same Hague Convention.

Once the 1980 Hague litigation is (priorily) settled, the implications of this decision in the national case concern both procedural and substabtial aspects.

First, it is obvious that return/non-return of the child (admission or denial of Hague application) imply establisment in 1980 Hague case of the habitual residence of the child in the state of origin or the state of destination.

Once this problem is settled, a very important procedural consequence arises in the national case, respectively international competence of the domestic court to decide on the merits in the national case.

Depending on the state of habitual residence as established in 1980 Hague case, international competence to take measures concerning the child belongs either to the court in the state of origin, or to the court in the state of destination.

Article 13 Para 1 b of 1980 Hague Convention: „Notwithstanding the provisions of the preceding Article, the judicial or administrative authority of the requested State is not bound to order the return of the child if the person, institution or other body which opposes its return establishes that (…) there is a grave risk that his or her return would expose the child to physical or psychological harm or otherwise place the child in an intolerable situation."

[42] Article 398 of Romanian Civile Code (Law no. 287/2009 concerning Romanian Civil Code, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 511/24.07.2009 and republished per Article 218 from Law no. 711/2011, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 409/10.06.2011, in force from 01.10.2011) and Article 36 Para 7 of Law no. 272/2004 concerning protection and promotion of children's rights, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 557/23.06.2004, successively modified and lastly republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 159/05.03.2014.

[43] Article 17 of 1980 Hague Convention: „The sole fact that a decision relating to custody has been given in or is entitled to recognition in the requested State shall not be a ground for refusing to return a child under this Convention, but the judicial or administrative authorities of the requested State may take account of the reasons for that decision in applying this Convention." (our underline)

Article 18 of 1980 Hague Convention: „The provisions of this Chapter do not limit the power of a judicial or administrative authority to order the return of the child at any time." (our underline)

[44] K. Standley, op. cit., p. 366: „Thus, the alleged abductor has a heavy burden to establish a defence. Even if a defence is proved, the court retains an overriding discretion under art. 18 to order the child's return."

[45] The Explanatory Report drafted by Eliza Pérez-Vera states on this point that: „The solution contained in this article (article 17 – our note) accords perfectly with the object of the Convention, which is to discourage potential abductors, who will not be able to defend their action by means (…) of a decision obtained subsequently, which will, in the majority of cases, be vitiated by fraud."

[46] Article 412 Para 1 pt. 7 of the Romanian Procedural Civil Code: „ (1) Suspension of cases operates by law: (…) 7. in case that the national court addresses a preliminary question to the ECJ according to the Treaties on which the Union is founded."

Secondly, there are certain substantial aspects comprised in the merits of the decision pronounced in 1980 Hague case that are covered by the res judicata principle and therefore become mandatory for the national court and influence/may influence the solution in domestic case.

Such aspects are always those concerning parental authority and it's exercise prior and after removal of the child from one state to another (conditions imposed to be analyzed by Article 3 of the 1980 Hague Convention in order to determine if a wrongful cross-border removal or retention of a child has taken place).

In adition, in case of non-return based on Articles 12 Para 2 or 13 Para 1 b of 1980 Hague Convention, integration of the child in the new environement of the state of destination or grave risc to expose the child to physical or psychological harm in the state of origin are also substantial aspects discussed and settled in the international litigation.

All these substantial aspects may influence the national decision on parental authority (joint or exclusive), domicile of the child or rights of acces to the child.

In case the national dispute is pronounced before 1980 Hague (contrary to Article 16), the influence of the national judgement on the solution to be adopted in the international dispute is much weaker. It may appear only in substance and is to be decided always by the judge invested with 1980 Hague dispute, depending on the particularities of the case.

Article 17 and 18 of 1980 Hague Convention are relevant to this aspect and give to the court solving the international case a large margin of appreciation concerning reasons of the national decision which may be considered in applying Hague Convention.

We consider that all aspects taken in discussion above could help to ensure a unified case – law on procedure and substance of courts settling both national and international case, a goal necessary to be reached in general and moreover in a realm as sensible as international abduction of children.

Also, corresponding to the foremost importance that the European Court of Human Rights has attached to settling international abduction cases in a reasonable time within the sense of Article 6[47] of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms[48], we consider that some specific legislative solutions may be taken into consideration.

To this end, expres prohibition of regularization and prealable procedure prescribed by Articles 200 and 201 of Romanian Procedural Civil Code as a rule would be clear means to ensure faster settlement of international abduction cases[49].

The judge invested to solve such a dispute will thus establish automatically the date of first court session from the very moment of receiving the file case and not consider waiting for the prealable procedure to be exhausted.

Also, shorther express legal periods of time for receiving citation by parties in cases of international child abductions might offer a solution.

On the one hand, given the fact that Romania has unified territorial competence in Bucharest, it is a usual situation that parties have domiciles all over Romania and shorter periods as proposed above would be useful, in connection to the recommended period of 6 weeks to solve the 1980 Hague case[50].

On the other hand, it is not always the case that judges use the possibility to shorten themselves these periods per Article 159 of the Romanian Civil Procedural Code[51].

References

- Avram Marieta, Drept civil. Familia, 2nd Edition revised and completed, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2016
- Barbur Diana Flavia, Autoritatea părintească, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2016
- Gavrilescu Alin-Gheorghe, Drepturile și obligațiile părinteşti. Drept român și comparat, Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2011
- Mol Charlotte LL.B., Non-traditional Family Forms & the International Dimension of Family Life: A Report on the ERA Seminar, 'Recent Case Law of the European Court of Human Rights in Family Law Matters'
- Papademetriou Theresa, Implications of European Union Regulation Hague Convention on International Child Abduction, in Hague Convention On International Child Abduction. An analysis of the applicable

[47] The notion of „reasonable time" should be interpreted in the specific area of international child abduction in connection to Article 11 Para 2 of 1980 Hague Convention: „If the judicial or administrative authority concerned has not reached a decision within six weeks from the date of commencement of the proceedings, the applicant or the Central Authority of the requested State, on its own initiative or if asked by the Central Authority of the requesting State, shall have the right to request a statement of the reasons for the delay." (our underline)

[48] Concluded in Rome, 04.11.1950, ratified by Romania through Law no. 30/18.05.1994, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 135/31.05.1994.

[49] E.g., in adoption cases the legislator expressly excepted this type of litigations from application of Article 200 of the Romanian Procedural Civil Code (Article 87 of Law. no. 273/2004 concerning adoption procedure, lastly republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 283/14.04.2016).

[50] Should the period for receiving citation not be respected, the case must be postponed for a regular citation, which takes generally one month if the domicile of parties is not in Bucharest.

[51] According to Article 159 of the Romanian Civil Procedural Code, the first date of session in court is established as to ensure respect of a period of 5 days before the date of the hearing.

law and institutional framework of fifty-one jurisdictions and the European Union, Report for Congress, June 2004, James Madison Memorial Building; 101 Independence Avenue, S.E.; Washington, DC
- Standley Kate, Family Law, 6th Edition, Palgrave Macmillan Publishing House, New York, 2008
- Welstead Mary & Edwards Susan, Family Law, Oxford University Press, 2nd Edition, 2008
- ECtHR, Decision adopted on 29 April 2003, Application no. 56673/00, case Gil and Aui v. Spain
- ECtHR, Decision adopted on 26 June 2003, Application no. 48206/99, case Maire v. Portugal
- ECtHR, Decision adopted on 6 July 2010, Application no. 41615/07, case Neulinger and Shuruk v. Switzerland
- ECJ, Decision adopted on 22 December 2010, C-491/10, case Aguirre Zarraga v. Pelz
- Judecătoria Sector 3 București, case no. 36836/301/2015, judgement pronounced on 30.03.2016
- Judecătoria Sector 3 București, case no. 37303/301/2015, judgement pronounced on 15.01.2016
- The Fourth Circuit Tribunal for Knox County, Tennessee, USA, case no. 131115, judgement pronounced on 17.07.2017
- Bucharest Tribunal, case no. 24670/3/2017, judgement pronounced on 27.10.2017
- Botoşani Tribunal, case no. 14153/193/2017, judgement pronounced on 01.11.2017
- Judecătoria Sector 1 București, case no. 16819/299/2017, judgement pronounced on 17.01.2018
- European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Rome, 04.11.1950, ratified by Romania through Law no. 30/18.05.1994, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 135/31.05.1994
- Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction concluded at The Hague on October 25, 1980
- Explanatory Report on the 1980 Hague Child Abduction Convention drafted by Eliza Pérez-Vera, Madrid, April 1981, published in 1982
- Law no. 100/1992 for Romania's accession to 1980 Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 243/30.09.1992
- Council Regulation (EC) no. 2201/2003 concerning Jurisdiction and the Recognition and Enforcement of Judgments in Matrimonial Matters and the Matters of Parental Responsibility, repealing Regulation (EC) no. 1347/2000, OJ L338/1 (12/23/2003)
- Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, Official Journal C 326, 26/10/2012
- Law no. 369/2004 on the application of 1980 Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 888/29.09.2004 and republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 468/25.06.2014
- Law no. 272/2004 concerning protection and promotion of children's rights, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 557/23.06.2004, successively modified and lastly republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 159/05.03.2014
- Law. no. 273/2004 concerning adoption procedure, lastly republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 283/14.04.2016
- Romanian Civile Code, Law no. 287/2009 concerning Romanian Civil Code, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 511/24.07.2009 and republished per Article 218 from Law no. 711/2011, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 409/10.06.2011
- Romanian Procedural Civil Code, Law no. 134/2010, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 606/ 23.08. 2012

PARENTAL AUTHORITY VERSUS COMMON CUSTODY

Anca Magda VOICULESCU*

Abstract

The notion of parental authority introduced to Romanian legislation by the New Romanian Civil Code is totally distinct from the notion of custody specific to other domestic legislations both in theory, as in practical consequences implied.

The purpose of the article is to make a comparative presentation of the two different notions mentioned above, as they are (still) constantly confused, even though a significant period of time has elapsed since the New Romanian Civil Code entered into force. Confusion comes mainly from the fact that Romanian Civil Code was inspired from Quebec Civil Code, where the legislation formally refers to the notion of parental authority, but in substance this notion presents nevertheless the caharacteristics of the concept of custody.

Therefore, the objectives of the present study are to identify the content and forms regulated in legislation for each of the notions, by studying legal provisions relevant for parental authority in Romanian legislation, respectively custody in national legislations of other states. As a result, the main theoretical resemblances and differences between the two concepts will be decelated.

Furthermore, the study will identify the practical consequences generated by their common points (important decisions are to be taken by agreement of both parents, whereas routine decisions can be made individually) and main differences (domicile of the child/alternate domicile and rights of access).

Keywords: parental authority, custody, domicile of the child, rights of access, best interests of the child.

1. Introduction

The present study aims to make a comparative presentation of two different notions – parental authority and custody – by identifying from a theoretical point of view their content and forms prescribed in legislation, but also the practical consequences generated by their differences.

The subject has great importance, as the two notions are still confused by practitioners of law, although a significant period has elapsed since Romanian Civil Code[1] (which introduced to our domestic legislation the concept of parental authority) entered into force.

To reach this aim, the study will identify legal provisions relevant for parental authority in Romanian legislation and custody in national legislation of other states. Furthermore, it wil concentrate on clarifying the content and forms regulated in legislation for each of the notions.

Also, case – law relevant for the subject will be presented, both domestic and foreign, as it reflects how these notions were understood and applied in practice.

Doctrinal opinions will also be identified and systematized, with the necessary mention that preponderence goes to studies from abroad, as in Romanian juridical literature the subject has scarcely been discussed.

Coroborating all these different, but interconnected perspectives, the article will conclude over the main theoretical resemblances and differences between the two concepts.

At the same time, it will point out practical aspects reflected in case – law in close connection to parental authority and common custody (specially domicile of the child /alternate domicile and rights of acces/„equal time" for the child with both parents).

2. Content

2.1. Content and forms of parental authority in Romanian legislation

Article 483 of Romanian Civil Code („Parental Authority") provides the definition and main characteristics of the notion of parental authority[2].

According to the above-mentioned article: „ (1) Parental authority is the set of rights and obligations concerning both person and property of the child which belong equally to both parents. (2) Parents exercise parental authority only in the best interests of the child,

* PhD, Judge at Bucharest Tribunal, trainer in family law at Romanian National Institute of Magistracy, Romanian designated judge in International Network of Hague Judges for 1980 Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction (e-mail: ancamagda.voiculescu@gmail.com).

[1] Law no. 287/2009 concerning Romanian Civil Code, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 511/24.07.2009 and republished per Article 218 from Law no. 711/2011, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 409/10.06.2011, in force from 01.10.2011.

[2] References to parental authority are to be found also in other legislations, e.g. Articles 371-373 of French Civil Code or Articles 597-612 of Quebec Civil Code. Despite of the formal title („parental authority"), the concept corresponds more to the notion of custody, whereas parental authority and custody cannot be assimilated in substance. Likewise, Civil Code of Luxemburg (Title IX) refers to „parental authority". Therefore, this notion is not new in Romanian law (details to this respect in A.-G. Gavrilescu, Drepturile și obligațiile părintești. Drept român și comparat, Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2011, p. 242).

with due respect to his person, and associate the child in all decisions affecting him, considering the age and maturity of the child. (3) Both parents are responsible for bringing up their minor children." (our underline)

Subsequently, Article 487 of Romanian Civil Code („Content of parental authority") offers details about the content of the concept of parental authority in our domestic law: „Parents have the right and duty to raise the child, taking care of the child's health, physical, mental and intellectual upbringing, and also the child's education and training, according to their own beliefs, characteristics and needs of the child; they are bound to give the child guidance and advice needed in order to properly exercise the rights granted by the law".

General provisions of Romanian Civil Code must be corroborated to special legislation, respectively Law no. 272/2004[3] (Article 36), according to which: „ (1) Both parents are responsible for raising their children. (2) Exercise of parental rights and obligations must be in the best interests of the child and ensure material and spiritual welfare for the child, especially by providing care, maintaining personal relationships and providing growth, education and maintenance, as well as legal representation and administration of patrimony" (our underline).

In case of divorce, the general rule is common parental authority[4], whereas sole/exclusive parental authority is the exception, in cases stipulated both by Romanian Civil Code (objective exceptions[5]), respectively Romanian Civil Code and Law no. 272/2004 (subjective exceptions[6]).

In each of the cases, the decision to grant exclusive parental authority belongs to the court, which will establish, considering the specificities of the case, if the best interests of the child recommend common or sole parental authority; in the latter case, it is also for the court to choose the parent who presents the guarantees for exercising sole parental authority.

From corroboration of legal provisions detailed above, it results that parental authority (either joint or sole), deals with rights and obligations of the parents that must be exercised only in the best interests of the child[7]. To reach this aim, parents take decisions on behalf of the child, by common consent or unilaterally (depending on exercise of parental authority - joint or exclusive).

In this context, it is important to underline a major distinction between the notion of parental authority introduced by Romanian Civil Code and the notion of „încredinţare" legiferated by the former Romanian Family Code[8].

The notion of „încredinţare" implied both domicile of the child and right to make unilaterally decisions for the parent who had the domicile[9]. According to actual legislation, the notion of parental authority encompasses the right to make decisions (jointly or exclusively)[10], but does not include domicile of the child (which is to be decided over different criteria from parental authority[11]).

Although common parental authority was introduced to our domestic legislation to encourage maintenance of parental responsibility after divorce, in certain cases it may give rise to abuses/perpetuate the conflict between parents, and the consequences are inflicted directly and primarily on the child.

In this case, we consider that the recommended solution is sole parental authority. Despite a significant resistance against exclusive parental authority in the beginning (save for the objective situations limitedly

---

[3] Law no. 272/2004 concerning protection and promotion of children's rights, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 557/23.06.2004, successively modified and lastly republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 159/05.03.2014.

[4] Per Article 397 of Romanian Civil Code: „After divorce, parental authority rests jointly to both parents, unless the court decides otherwise".

[5] Article 507 of Romanian Civil Code („Exclusive parental authority") provides an exhaustive list of objective exceptions: "If one parent is deceased, declared dead by judgment, under interdiction, deprived of the exercise of parental rights or if, for any reason, it is impossible for him or her to express his or her will, the other parent exercises parental authority alone". (our underline)

[6] Article 398 of Romanian Civil Code („Exclusive parental authority") opens the possibility for the court to appreciate in favour of sole parental authority in subjective situations, depending on circumstances specific to each case: „For serious reasons, given the interests of the child, the court decides that parental authority is exercised exclusively by a parent. (2) The other parent retains the right to watch over the child's care and education and the right to consent to adoption" (our underline). Subsequently, Article 36 Para 7 of Law no. 272/2004 exemplifies in a nonexhaustive list the subjective reasons mentioned by Civil Code in a general manner, as follows: „There are considered serious grounds for the court to decide that parental authority is exercised by a single parent alcoholism, mental illness, drug addiction of the other parent, violence against children or against the other parent, convictions for human trafficking, drug trafficking, crimes concerning sexual life, crimes of violence, as well as any other reason related to risks for the child that would derive from the exercise by that parent of parental authority." (our underline)

[7] M. Welstead & S. Edwards, Family Law, Oxford University Press, 2nd Edition, 2008, p. 242: „ (…) parental rights and parental responsabilities (…) have been displaced in favour of the responsabilities of parents towards their children, and (…) under certain circumstances the rights of children prevail. Parental rights have been reframed as responsabilities (…)".

[8] Law no. 4/1953, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 4/04.01.1954, amended by Law no. 4/1956 published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 11/ 04.04.1956, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 13/18.04.1956, succesively amended, lastly by Law no. 59/1993, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 177/26.07.1993.

[9] M. Avram, Drept civil. Familia, 2nd Edition revised and completed, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2016, p. 152.

[10] M. Avram, op. cit., p. 160: „ (…) exercise of parental authority does no longer split by entrusting the child to one of the divorced parents, situation which does not exclude the possibility for the court to decise otherwise, but nevertheless these measures of splitting parental authority operate only in exceptional situations".

[11] For the same conclusion, F. Emese, Dreptul Familiei. Căsătoria. Regimuri matrimonial. Filiaţia, 5th Edition, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p. 521.

prescribed by Article 507 of Romanian Civil Code), present case-law[12] accepts exclusive authority.

A parent who, by his own behavior, comes to present a significant risk for the child (even appreciated by subjective standards offered by Article 398 of Romanian Civil Code and Article 36 Para 7 of Law no. 272/2004), must not be allowed to exercise parental authority.

Also, not all parents are suitable for joint authority. Parents should respond in an analogous way to the child's needs (physical, material, emotional, spiritual, etc.) and must be able to handle a functional and non-conflictual communication.

We consider that at least the following criteria are important in deciding over exercise of parental authority: parents have no difficulty in working together; they both agree on joint parental authority and take their share of responsibility; there is no violence, resentment or revenge between the parents; they agree on domicile of the child; they have similar style education and values; in case of divergence, they are ready to negotiate and give in; they are supporting each other as partners equal to raise and educate the child; they are able to maintain a stable environment including extended family (grandparents, uncles, aunts, cousins) and even reconstituted families (stepmothers or stepfathers may represent distinct forms of attachment for children).

If these criteria are not met, we consider that joint parental authority becomes only the means to continue and expand after divorce the conflict between parents and child is caught between different (even opposite) systems of education and values.

2.2. Content and forms of custody

By contrast to Romanian legislation which recognizes the notion of parental authority, domestic legislations of other states refer to the notion of custody[13], which encompasses two forms (legal custody and physical custody).

Legal custody considers the authority to make major (important) decisions on behalf of the child and includes sole legal custody and common (joint) legal custody.

The parent who has sole legal custody is the only person who has legal authority to make major decisions concerning the child.

On the contrary, joint legal custody means that both parents have legal authority to make important decisions for the child.

There are certain advantages of sole legal custody, such as: it is easier to make major decisions when there is only one parent legally responsible; it may result in greater consistency for the child; for situations when one parent is completely absent, it is necessary for the other (present) parent to be able to make important decisions without having to consult and decide with a parent who is not available.

In case of joint legal custody, the major disadvantage is that, when disagreements arise over various decisions, it is often the case that neither of the parents compromises on his or her convictions, and the court must be seized to take the decision for them. The inevitable consequence is that decisions cannot be taken but at the end of litigation, whereas it is well known that celerity is very important in taking decisions concerning children[14].

Physical custody refers to the aspect where the child lives most of the time (it is sometimes referred to as „residential custody").

Similar to legal custody, physical custody encompasses two forms: sole physical custody and joint physical custody.

In case of sole physical custody, the child physically resides in one location (with „custodian parent"). In most cases, „non-custodial" parent is awarded generous visitation rights, including sleepovers.

In case of joint physical custody (also called „shared custody", „shared parenting" or „dual residence"), the child lives with one parent for part of the week (or month/even year), and with the other parent during the remaining time. The division of time spent at each location is approximately equal.

It is important to note that parents can potentially share joint legal custody without having joint physical custody.

There is also a third option, called „bird's nest custody". This appears when the children live in one central location, and the parents rotate in and out of the children's home on a regular schedule[15].

While this child-centered approach can ease transitions for the children, it can be costly (to impossible) to maintain three separate residences and difficult for parents to constantly move from one [12] Bucharest Tribunal, Fourth Civil Section, decision no. 938/A pronounced on 22.10.2012 (the court appreciated that exclusive parental authority was justified in the situation where one of the parents encountered real difficulties to obtain the consent of the other parent for important decisions concerning the child, such as participation of the child in crossborder sport competitions with the national team).

[13] S.P. Gavrilă, Instituții de dreptul familiei în reglementarea Noului Cod Civil, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2012, p. 205: „ (…) notion borrowed from other legal systems, which does not overlap identically to exercise of parental authority (…)".

[14] This might be the reason why some legislations prescribed an original (and very practical) solution for situations where parents cannot reach an agreement concerning a certain type of important decisions. According to B. D. Moloman, L.-C. Ureche, Noul Cod Civil. Cartea a II-a. Despre familie. Art. 258-534. Comentarii, explicații și jurisprudență, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, p. 671, Article 1628 of German Civil Code stipulates that in such situations, at the request of parent(s), the court may transfer authority to take that type of decisions to one of the parents. Romanian legislation does not have such a solution, and thus it is necessary to seize the court every time parents do not agree over an important decision (even if the situation is repetitive) - Article 264 of Romanian Civil code and Article 36 Para 8 of Law no. 272/2004.

[15] For example, parents spend alternate weeks at the children's home.

residence to another[16] (this type of custody remains just a proposal that we have never met in practice).

2.3. Important decisions/routine decisions

As a common point between parental authority and custody (when they are jointly exercised, and in addition custody encompasses the form of joint legal custody[17]), major decisions concerning the child are to be taken by agreement of both parents.

On the contrast, decisions concerning routine aspects of the child's every day life can be made individually by the parent who is currently exercising his or her parenting time.

In this context, it is of high importance to identify if a decision is major or merely routine.

If not prescribed by the domestic law or clarified in the judgment governing parental authority/custody, it can sometimes be difficult to determine whether a specific decision is important or routine.

As a general rule, major decisions are distinguished from day-to-day decisions by their importance and their nonrepetitive nature[18]; likewise, major decisions are those which „exceed daily needs of the child"[19].

Important decisions are, in general, decisions regarding education, religion, and healthcare.

Examples of major decisions include e.g., where the child should go to school, what type of religious upbringing he or she will have, non-emergency medical decisions.

As consequence, routine decisions encompass all the other aspects that do not enroll in the area of major decisions.

This type of decisions is to be taken individually and the other parent cannot interfere[20].

In conclusion, the general rule is that important decisions shall be made jointly by applying what was called „principle of codecision"[21] and routine decisions shall be made individually.

Should both parents not agree on an important issue, one parent will have to petition the court to make the decision for them, based on the child's best interests.

If important decisions are made unilateraly by one parent or if a parent believes that the other parent is engaging in harmful routine decisions regarding the child, he or she may ask the court to modify rights of access (parenting time) or even the domicile of the child (or custody).

In Romanian legislation, the initial form of Law no. 272/2004 did not prescribe which types of decisions were important. Therefore, it was often the case that parents seized courts to decide over this aspect and the case-law was quite diverse, generated by lack of even general criteria that at least should have been regulated by the legislator.

This is the reason why, in 2013, among other modifications, the legislator decided to expressly and limitatively state which decisions are important[22].

Article 36 Para 3 of Law no. 272/2004 (actual form) provides that: „If both parents exercise parental authority, but do not live together, important decisions, such as type of education or training, complex medical treatment or surgery, residence of the child or administration of property shall be taken only with the consent of both parents."

Also, to avoid non-implication/abuse in making important decisions, the legislator stipulated two limits.

The first limit regards the non-responsive parent, who does not provide any answer on important decisions needed to be taken, even specifically asked by the other parent. In this case, the decision is to be made by the parent who has been entrusted with the domicile of the child.

The second limit concerns the abusive parent, who makes important decisions that are not in the interests of the child, taking advantage of the non-interested conduct of the other parent. In this case, the decision cannot be taken unilaterally, and most often will be decided by the court[23].

2.4. Alternate domicile

As already pointed out, under Romanian Civil Code, the domicile of the child does not fall in the area of parental authority, and this is the first and most important distinction between parental authority and custody[24].

---

[16] Nevertheless, it is far more difficult for children to move from one location to another in case of alternate domicile (joint physical custody).

[17] Physical custody, as already pointed out, does not deal with making decisions on behalf of the child, but with periods of time spent by the child with each of the parents.

[18] J. S. Ehrlich, Family Law for Paralegals, 7th Edition, Wolters Kluwer Publishing House, New York, 2017, p. 202.

[19] D. Lupașcu, C. M. Crăciunescu, Dreptul Familiei, 3rd Edition amended and actualized, Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2017, p. 557.

[20] „If the other parent is interrogating you about the way you handle routine matters related to the children, you should feel comfortable politely telling him/her to back off. It is YOUR parenting time. YOUR rules apply. If the court determined you were fit to have parenting time, the court also determined that you were fit to make routine decisions regarding the children without your ex-wife's or ex-husband's unwanted input". (D.M. Germain, Joint Legal Custody & Decision-Making during your visitation, available on-line at http://www.bestinterestlaw.com/joint-legal-custody, last accession on 28.02.2018; 19:12).

[21] F. Emese, op. cit., p. 523.

[22] Article 31 Para 2^1 of Law no. 272/2004, introduced by Law no. 257/2013, in force from 03.10.2013.

[23] The premise for this situation is a non-responsive behaviour of one parent, and therefore the decision cannot be taken in common. At the same time, decision cannot be taken unilaterally by the other parent, as it is against the best interests of the child. By consequence, the only solution is asking the court to make the decision.

[24] Physical custody implies alternate domicile of the child. Alternate domicile of the child is legiferated, for example, in United Kingdom (Children Act, 1989), Belgium (Law from 18.07.2006), Spain (Law from 08.07.2005), Italy (Law from 08.02.2006). Even in countries where the law allows alternate domicile, this subject generated intense discussion with extensive arguments in favour or against it (L. Briad, Résidence alternée et conflit parental, A.J. Famille no. 12/2011, p. 570-573; M. Juston, De la coparentalité à la déparentalité, A.J. Famille no. 12/2011,

As consequence, in case of divorce and absence of agreement between parents[25], the court must decide separately and under different criteria on the one hand regarding exercise of parental authority (common or sole) and on the other hand concerning domicile of the child (which is to be established at one of the parents)[26].

According to Article 400 of Romanian Civil Code: „ (1) In the absence of agreement between the parents or if it is contrary to the best interests of the child, the guardianship court shall decide, at the same time with divorce, the domicile of the child to the parent with whom he or she lives constantly. (2) In case that before pronouncement of divorce the child lived with both parents, the court shall establish the domicile of the child to one of them, given the child's best interests."

The criteria under which the court decides which parent should have the domicile of the child are prescribed by Article 21 of Law no. 272/2004:

„ (1) If parents do not agree on domicile of the child, the guardianship court will establish the domicile to one of them, according to Article 496 Para (3) of the Civil Code. In evaluating the interest of the child, the court may consider, in addition to the items stipulated in Article 2 Para (6), issues such as:

a) availability of each parent to involve the other parent in decisions related to child and to respect parental rights of the latter;
b) availability of parents to allow each other to maintain personal relationships;
c) housing conditions in the last three years of each parent;
d) history of parents' violence against children or other persons;
e) distance between the house of each parent and education institution of the child."

In conclusion, alternate domicile under Romanian Civil Code is not possible[27].

Nevertheless, a natural question appears: if it were possible (as it is in other national legislations), would it be a satisfactory solution for the child?

Our opinion is that, even in absence of legal arguments presented above which operate in the context of our domestic legislation, alternate domicile is not an option in the best interests of the child.

Juridical literature sustains our opinion: „We doubt that from the child's point of view the idea of alternate domicile is, as a rule, the happiest choice, whatever the rhythm of alternance in hosting child, and even if geographical proximity of the two locations would exempt additional shortcomings"[28].

2.5. Rights of access

According to Article 496 Para 5 of Romanian Civil Code: „The parent with whom the child does not live constantly has rights of access to the child at the latter's domicile. Guardianship court may limit the exercise of this right if it is in the best interests of the child".

Article 17 Para 4 of Law no. 272/2004 states that: „In case of disagreement between parents on exercise access rights to the child, the court will set out a schedule based on the child's age, needs care and education of the child, intensity of affection between child and parent who does not have the domicile of the child, the behavior of the latter, as well as other relevant issues in each case."

Subsequently, Article 18 of Law no. 272/2004 details different forms of rights of access: „a) meetings between the child and parent or other person who, per law, has the right to a personal relationship with the child; b) visiting the child at his domicile; c) hosting child, for a limited period, by the parent or other person with whom the child does not live habitually."

The rights of access as described above by Romanian legislation cannot come to application in practice of the idea of „equal time" of child with both parents, specific to common physical custody and consisting, in reality, in alternate domicile[29].

Also, alternate domicile the child (not allowed by Romanian law) can not be confused with a large programme of personal ties, because the two concepts are distinct and, as a rule, rights of access imply a prior establishment of the domicile of the child (not alternating) to one of the parents.

3. Conclusions

Parental authority legiferated by Romanian Civil Code and (common) custody prescribed by other

p. 579-583; A. Gouttenoire, Autorité parentale, in P. Murat (coord.) Droit de la Famille, 5ème Édition, Dalloz, Paris, 2010, p. 803-807, in F. Emese, op. cit., p. 532).

[25] Nonetheless, in the light of Article 8 of Law no. 272/2004, agreements between parents must be verified by court as follows: „In all cases concerning children's rights, the court verifies that agreements between parents or concluded by parents with other persons should fulfill the best interests of the child."

[26] By consequence, the other parent has only rights of access.

[27] For the same conclusion, M. Avram, op. cit., p. 165; D.F. Barbur, Autoritatea părintească, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2016, p. 126, p. 170; D. Lupașcu, C. M. Crăciunescu, op. cit., p. 568.

[28] F. Emese, op. cit., p. 532. The author explains as follows: „Fulfilling parental duties is a daily task, and implies continue and sustained involvement, without the inevitable gaps of „exchange of shifts" between parents. Ensuring stability and continuity in care, upbringing and education of the child (…) cannot be done sequentially (…) we are not of the opinion that the right of the child to be raised by his parents (…) implies alternance of domicile".

[29] For example, case no. 54/4/2013 registered at Bucharest Tribunal, Fourth Civil Section, decision no. 648A/19.05.2014, where the court denied alternate domicile (presented as „equal time" of child with both parents).

domestic legislations remain two entirely different concepts[30].

At large, one may consider that parental authority as regulated in Romanian legislation may be approached to legal common custody, where the child lives most of the time with one parent („resident parent") and the other parent („non-resident parent") has right of decision over important matters concerning the child and relatively large rights of access.

Thus, under Article 400 of Romanian Civil Code and Article 21 of Law no. 272/2004, the court has the obligation to establish the domicile of the child after divorce to one of the parents (different from physical common custody, associated to alternate domicile).

Nevertheless, parental authority in our national legislative system remains different even from legal common custody.

We argue this point of view as, according to clarifications brought by Article no. 36 of Law no. 272/2004, important decisions to be taken by agreement of both parents are limited in number and expressly regulated by our domestic law (and not to be decided from case to case, as in case of common custody).

On the other hand, rights of access for the parent who has not been entrusted with the domicile of the child are to be established, in the light of Article 17 Para 4 of Law no. 272/2004, from case to case, depending on factual circumstances specific to each litigation, and not considered de plano to be large (the case of legal common custody).

As a first consequence of this conclusion according to which parental authority and (common) custody are different notions, it results that under parental authority in Romanian law alternate domicile of the child after divorce of parents is not legally possible.

In adition to this legal point of view, alternate domicile is not a solution in the best interests of the child also considering the effort it would impose (only) on the child, forced to adapt and readapt continuously to different environment, rules, etc. and with serious psychological consequences on long term basis.

In conclusion, common parental authority decided/agreed in case of divorce implies only that important decisions are to be taken by mutual consent, whereas the domicile of the child will be established in favour of one parent (and the other parent will have access rights).

A second consequence resides in the fact that rights of access organized on the so-called principle „equal time" also are not possible, mainly because „equal time" means shared residence of the child and is frequently used in practice as a disguised form of alternate domicile.

We identified a single real common point between notions of parental authority and custody, namely that in case they are exercised by both parents, important decisions necessarily imply agreement of both parents, whereas day-to-day decisions are to be taken by the parent who takes care of the child at that moment.

We consider that this firm theoretical distinction between parental authority and custody and its practical consequences reflecting in application of other notions of family law (as detailed above) could help to ensure a unified case-law, most necessary to be reached in an area as sensible as measures concerning children.

In the light of specificity of issues generated by family law (some of them presented above), given the fact that at present family cases often encompass cross-border implications and necessarily specific training of judges, we consider that the legislator should seriously ponder the idea of a reasonable number of courts in Romania specialised in family law.

To this respect, we argue that there is already such a specialised court, namely Brașov Family and Minors Tribunal.

Also, in the area of international child abductions[31], the legislator unified territorial competence in Bucharest[32].

In both cases, the benefice of unified jurisprudence is evident and immediate and therefore a „network" of family courts should be construed.

---

[30] Confusion comes mainly from the fact that Romanian Civil Code was inspired from Quebec Civil Code, where the notion of parental authority, as already pointed out, corresponds in substance to the concept of custody. Still, even according to Quebec legislation, common custody implying alternate domicile of the child is considered to be a solution only if it is in the best interests of the child and considering the need of stability, relations between parents are good, the opinion of the child is in favour of this type of arrangement (J. Dutil, La garde partagée au Québec, A.J. Famille no. 12/2011, p. 596-597; M. Castelli, D. Goubau, Le droit de la famille au Québec, 5ème Édition, Presses Université Laval, 2005, p. 331-333, as presented by F. Emese, op. cit., p. 531). In a similar manner, French legislation allows alternate domicile of the child only based on agreement of parents or, in absence of it, disposed by the court as a provisional measure for a limited period; at the end of the „trial period" the issue of child domicile should to get a final solution (L. Delprat, L'autorité parentale et la loi, Studyrama, 2006, p. 78, as presented by F. Emese, op. cit., p. 531).

[31] The specific legal instrument in this area is the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction concluded at The Hague on October 25, 1980, during the 14th Session of the Hague Conference on Private International Law. Participation of Romania to 1980 Hague Convention was ensured by Law no. 100/1992 for Romania's accession to 1980 Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 243/30.09.1992.

[32] Law no. 369/2004 on the application of 1980 Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 888/29.09.2004 and republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 468/25.06.2014 prescribes that international abduction cases are to be solved by Bucharest Tribunal as first instance and Bucharest Court of Appeal as second instance.

References

- Avram Marieta, Drept civil. Familia, 2nd Edition revised and completed, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2016
- Barbur Diana Flavia, Autoritatea părintească, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2016
- Briad L., Résidence alternée et conflit parental, A.J. Famille no. 12/2011
- Castelli M., Goubau D., Le droit de la famille au Québec, 5ème Édition, Presses Université Laval, 2005
- Delprat L., L'autorité parentale et la loi, Studyrama, 2006
- Dutil J., La garde partagée au Québec, A.J. Famille no. 12/2011
- Ehrlich J. Shoshanna, Family Law for Paralegals, 7th Edition, Wolters Kluwer Publishing House, New York, 2017
- Emese Florian, Dreptul Familiei. Căsătoria. Regimuri matrimonial. Filiația, 5th Edition, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016
- Gavrilă Simona Petrina, Instituții de dreptul familiei în reglementarea Noului Cod Civil, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2012
- Gavrilescu Alin-Gheorghe, Drepturile și obligațiile părintești. Drept român și comparat, Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2011
- Germain Dennis M., Joint Legal Custody & Decision-Making during your visitation
- Gouttenoire A., Autorité parentale, in P. Murat (coord.) Droit de la Famille, 5ème Édition, Dalloz, Paris, 2010
- Juston M., De la coparentalité à la déparentalité, A.J. Famille no. 12/2011
- Lupașcu Dan, Crăciunescu Cristiana Mihaela, Dreptul Familiei, 3rd Edition amended and actualized, Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2017
- Moloman Bogdan Dumitru, Ureche Lazăr-Ciprian, Noul Cod Civil. Cartea a II-a. Despre familie. Art. 258-534. Comentarii, explicații și jurisprudență, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017
- Welstead Mary & Edwards Susan, Family Law, Oxford University Press, 2nd Edition, 2008
- Bucharest Tribunal, Fourth Civil Section, decision no. 938/A pronounced on 22.10.2012
- Bucharest Tribunal, Fourth Civil Section, decision no. 648A/19.05.2014, case no. 54/4/2013
- Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction concluded at The Hague on October 25, 1980
- Law no. 100/1992 for Romania's accession to 1980 Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 243/30.09.1992
- Law no. 272/2004 concerning protection and promotion of children's rights, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 557/23.06.2004, successively modified and lastly republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 159/05.03.2014
- Law no. 369/2004 on the application of 1980 Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 888/29.09.2004 and republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 468/25.06.2014
- Romanian Family Code, Law no. 4/1953, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 4/04.01.1954, amended by Law no. 4/1956 published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 11/ 04.04.1956, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 13/18.04.1956, succesively amended, lastly by Law no. 59/1993, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 177/26.07.1993
- Romanian Civile Code, Law no. 287/2009, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 511/24.07.2009 and republished per Article 218 from Law no. 711/2011, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 409/10.06.2011
- French Civil Code
- Quebec Civil Code
- Luxemburg Civil Code
- German Civil Code

REFLECTIONS REGARDING THE ENFORCEMENT OF THE PREVENTION LAW IN THE AREA OF EMPLOYMENTS RELATIONSHIPS

Aurelian Gabriel ULUITU[*]

Abstract

The Law no 270/2017 - Prevention Act is an inedited step in the Romanian legislation. For the first time in Romanian legislation, the ascertaining agent of a contravention has the obligation to establish several remedial measurements in order to clarify the legal framework of their specific activity. Because of the numerous contraventions regulated by the labor legislation, the Prevention Act concerns all the employers. Within the present paper, the author indicates the specific Labor law contraventions which permit the application of the Prevention Act and the contraventions which are incompatible with this Law.

In the matter of contraventional liability, the relation between the public body responsible for control and enforcement, on the one hand, and the subject of law whose activity is to be checked in order to make sure that it complies with the law, on the other hand, involves a median element between the full compliance situation (abiding by the applicable legal provisions) and the non-compliance situation (not abiding by the rules is punishable by a civil fine).

As in other areas covered by contraventional sanctioning, as far as employment relationships are concerned, the legislator elected a small number of contraventions to which the special rules provided for by the Prevention Law could be applied.

Keywords: prevention, prevention measures, contraventional liability, labour law, labour legislation.

I.

1. Law no. 270/2017 on prevention[1] represents a unique regulatory approach to legislation in Romania. For the first time in the history of national regulations, the legislator lays down a set of measures and instruments aimed at ensuring the prevention of committing contraventions.

Basically, in the matter of contraventional liability, the relation between the public body responsible for control and enforcement, on the one hand, and the subject of law whose activity is to be checked in order to make sure that it complies with the law, on the other hand, involves a median element between the full compliance situation (abiding by the applicable legal provisions) and the non-compliance situation (not abiding by the rules is punishable by a civil fine). This median element is represented by the very measures and instruments that are used in the event of a situation of non-compliance with legal rules, in order to remedy the non-compliance situation and, thus, to avoid the enforcement of a legal sanction for a contravention.

2. The remedy is, according to art. 2 let. a) of the Law, any measure taken by the investigating official included in the remedial plan which aims to make the person having committed a contravention fulfil his obligations under the law.

The remedial plan represents the annex to the report on the contravention committed and the enforceable sanction, completed as provided for in art. 4 of the Law, by means of which the investigating official sets out measures and remedial terms. The remedial term is the period of time, no longer than 90 calendar days since the date of delivery or, where appropriate, since communicating the report on the contravention committed and applying the legal sanction for the contravention thereof consisting of warning, concluded under art. 4 of the law, which specifies that the person having committed the contravention has the opportunity to remedy the irregularities which have been found and fulfil legal obligations; the length of the remedial term is determined taking into account the circumstances of committing the offense and the length of time necessary to fulfil legal requirements. The length of the remedial term established by the control body cannot be changed.

3. According to art. 3 para. (1) of Law no. 270/2017, all public authorities and institutions with powers to control, determine and sanction contraventions shall, in accordance with the areas under their responsibility, within three months of the entry into force of the law, draft and disseminate reference materials and guides and allocate special sections dedicated to public information on their website, regarding:

a) legislation in force relating to determining and legally sanctioning contraventions;
b) the rights and obligations of these public authorities / institutions in carrying out the activities related to determining contraventions and applying legal sanctions, as well as the rights and obligations of persons subject to these activities;
c) providing separate detailed information about each contravention for which the public authority /

[*] Associate Professor, PhD, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: gabi_uluitu@yahoo.com)

[1] Published in The Official Gazette of Romania, part I, issue 1037, December 28th, 2017.

institution has capacity to determine and apply the legal sanctions and / or other applicable measures.

According to their areas of competence, public authorities and institutions with control powers shall direct interested persons so that the legal provisions are fairly and unitarily enforced. In carrying out these guiding activities, public authorities and institutions with control powers shall:

a) a) draft guidance and control procedures to be used by all the persons having the capacity to carry out control activities;
b) b) display on their sites highly frequent court cases and guidance solutions issued in these cases, as well as guidance and control procedures;
c) c) actively exercise their role of guiding the persons being controlled in each control activity, offering, according to the procedures, the necessary instructions and guidance so that future abuse of the legal provisions could be avoided. The fulfilment of this obligation will be expressly stated in the control report, showing the instructions and guidance that have been offered.

Central public administration authority having nationwide powers to coordinate the business environment shall, within six months of the entry into force of this Law, develop and operate a portal providing, in a centralized way, online services and resources in order to disseminate information regarding the matters referred to in art. 3 para. (1) of the Law.

4. The Prevention Law does not have a general area of applicability, in the sense that it does not concern, hypothetically, all the contraventions regulated by national legislation. The solution of the legislator was to establish by means of a separate low-level legislative act, the list of contraventions for which the Prevention Law applies. Thus, by means of the Government Decision (GD) no. 33/2018 on the establishment of the contraventions covered by the Prevention Law no. 270/2017, as well as the model for the remedial plan[2], this list of contraventions was approved.

According to art. 4 para. (1) of the Law, in case of determining that one of the contraventions laid down by GD no. 33/2018 was committed, the investigating official concludes a report of the contravention by means of which he enforces a warning sanction, enclosing a corrective plan. In this situation, no complementary contaventional sanctions are enforced.

Exceptionally, the investigating official does not prepare a remedial plan, in which case only the warning sanction is enforced, in the following circumstances:

a) if, during the control, the person having committed a contravention fulfils his legal obligation;
b) if the contravention committed is not continuous.

The warning sanction is also enforced if the sanctioning of contraventions, as provided in GD no. 33/2018 expressly stipulates the exclusion of the warning from being applied.

The responsibility for fulfilling the remedial measures is reserved to the person who, by law, is contraventionally liable for the determined facts.

If a person commits multiple contraventions, from the ones provided in GD no. 33/2018, determined at the same time by the same investigating official, it is concluded only one report on ascertaining the contravention committed and the sanction being enforced, to which a corrective plan is enclosed, as appropriate.

5. The investigating official shall check in the control ledger, as well as in the records of the authority / public institution the person having committed the contravention is part of, if the latter has previously benefited from the measure provided in art. 4 of the Law.

For those persons who are not required to keep a control ledger (document regulated by Law no. 252/2003 on the control ledger[3]), the official investigator shall check the records of the public institution / authority the person having committed the contravention is part of, if the latter has benefited from the provisions comprised by art. 4 of the Law.

The investigating official shall make entries in the control ledger referring to the remedial plan. After completing the control, the number and date of the control document are entered in the control ledger.

6. The violation of the provisions in art. 4 para. (1) and (2) of the Law no. 270/2017 causes nullity of the report on the contravention committed. If the violation of the provisions in art. 4 para. (1) and (2) covers only a part of the contraventions determined and sanctioned by means of the report, this document is void only in respect to the contraventions thereof (partial nullity).
7. According to the art. 8 para. (1) of Law no. 270/2017, within 10 working days since the closing date of the remedial term, the public authority / institution with control powers shall resume the control activity and complete the second part of the remedial plan enclosed to the report on the contravention committed and the sanctions enforced and, where appropriate, the control ledger, with details on how to respect the remedy measures set.

If, when resuming control, it is ascertained that the person having committed the contravention failed to fulfil his legal obligations under the remedial measures set, within the timeframe allowed, the investigating official concludes another report of the contravention committed and sanctions enforced, by means of which the contraventions are determined and the legal sanction(s) enforced, other than warning, complying with the legislation which lays down and sanctions the contraventions provided for by GD no. 33/2018.

If, within three years since the date the report of the contravention committed and the sanctions

[2] Published in The Official Gazette of Romania, part I, issue 107, February 5th, 2018.
[3] Published in The Official Gazette of Romania, part I, issue 429, June 18th, 2003, as amended and supplemented.

enforced as provided for in art. 4 of the Law, the person having committed the contravention commits the same contravention again, the legal provisions in force, regulating the way in which petty offences are determined and sanctioned, are directly applicable, and it is no longer possible to enforce the Prevention Law.

If, within three years since the date the report on the contravention committed and the sanctions enforced as provided for in art. 5 of the Law, the person having committed the contravention commits one or more of the contraventions provided for in GD no. 33/2018, the legal provisions in force, regulating the way in which contraventions are determined and sanctioned, are directly applicable.

8. In accordance with art. 10 para. (1) of the Prevention Law, since the entry into force of this regulation (January 17, 2018), notwithstanding the provisions in Government Ordinance (GO) no. 2/2001 on the legal regime of contraventions[4], approved with amendments and supplements by Law no. 180/2002[5], as amended and supplemented, so as to determine and sanction the contraventions included in the GD no. 33/2018, the provisions of the Prevention Law are enforced.

Regarding the sanctions enforced under the provisions comprised by the Prevention Law, the sanctions thereof complement the provisions of the GO no. 2/2001, approved with amendments and supplements by Law no. 180/2002, as amended and supplemented.

When enforcing the Prevention Law, the contraventions, as well as the model for the remedial plan to be enclosed to the report on the contravention committed and the sanctions enforced were also laid down by GD no. 33/2018.

II.

1. With reference to the branch of law named labour law, the contraventional liability is a form of legal liability in its own right, but it is not part of the labour legislation (law) [6].

The Labour Code - Law no. 53/2003[7] refers only to sanctioning certain contraventions (covering facts, circumstances which are generic, focusing on expressing legal employment relationships). Law no. 62/2011 on social dialogue[8] is similar in this respect. Otherwise, in about 40 pieces of legislation in various fields, over 180 contraventions are regulated, which require as a prerequisite the existence of a legal employment relationship (which usually stems from the conclusion of an individual contract of employment)[9].

2. The legislative acts regulating contraventions related to employment relationships, other than those of the Labour Code and Law no. 62/2011 can be grouped into two categories: a) legislative acts which partially or totally belong to employment legislation; b) legislative acts which do not belong to employment legislation[10].

a) Legislative acts which partially or totally belong to employment legislation:

- Law no. 142/1998 regarding the granting of meal vouchers;
- Law no. 108/1999 on the establishment and organization of Labour Inspection;
- GO no. 25/2014 on the employment and secondment of foreigners in Romania and on amending and supplementing some legislative acts on the regime of foreigners in Romania;
- Law no. 202/2002 on equality of chances between women and men;
- Law no. 217/2005 regarding the establishment, organization and functioning of the European Works Council;
- Law no. 279/2005 on apprenticeship in the workplace;
- Law no. 67/2006 on the protection of employees' rights in case of transfer of the undertaking, the units or parts thereof;
- Law no. 193/2006 regarding the granting of gift and childcare vouchers;
- Law no. 200/2006 on the establishment and use of the Guarantee Fund for payment of wage debts;
- Law no. 319/2006 on job safety and health;
- Law no. 448/2006 on the protection and promotion of the rights of disabled persons;
- Law no. 467/2006 on establishing the general framework for informing and consulting employees;
- G.O. no. 137/2000 on preventing and sanctioning all forms of discrimination;
- G.D. no. 905/2017 on the general registry of employees[11];
- GD no. 846/2017 for establishing the gross minimum basic wage guaranteed for payment[12].

b) Legislative acts which do not belong to employment legislation:

- Law no. 82/1991 on accounting;
- Law no. 76/2002 on the unemployment security system and on the stimulation of employment;
- G.O. no. 37/2007 on the establishment of the application of the rules on driving times, breaks and rest periods for drivers and the use of equipment to record

[4] Published in The Official Gazette of Romania, part I, issue 410, July 25, 2001.
[5] Published in The Official Gazette of Romania, part I, issue 268, Aprilie 22, 2002.
[6] See I.T. Ştefănescu, Tratat teoretic şi practic de drept al muncii (Theoretical and Practical Treatise of Labour Law), ediţia a IV-a, revăzută şi adăugită, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2017, p. 915.
[7] Republished in the The Official Gazette of Romania, part I, issue 345, May 18, 2011, as amended and supplemented.
[8] Republished in the The Official Gazette of Romania, part I, issue 625, August, 31, 2012, as amended and supplemented.
[9] See, for a presentation in extenso of these contraventions, A. Ţiclea, Tratat de dreptul muncii. Legislaţie. Doctrină. Jurisprudenţă (Labour Law Treatise. Legislation. Doctrine. Caselaw), Ediţia a VIII-a, revizuită şi adăugită, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2014, p. 922-990.
[10] See I.T. Ştefănescu, op. cit., p. 920-921.
[11] Published in The Official Gazette of Romania, part I, issue 1005, December 19th, 2017.
[12] Published in The Official Gazette of Romania, part I, issue 950, November 29th, 2017.

their work;

– Government Emergency Ordinance no. 158/2005 on leave and social security allowances.

In legal literature dedicated to labour law, it is shown that a successive timely ordering of the statutes which provide for and contraventionally sanction employment related acts, as well as the excessive number of these contraventions raise the question of the need for a thorough substantive analysis, which should result in narrowing down (by grouping them, if this is the case) the contraventions in this area and to integrate, following the logic of their seriousness and that of the protected issues, those that must remain in the Labour Code and in the Law on Social Dialogue[13].

This approach is all the more necessary now, given the option of the legislator to regulate the preventive measures to (directly) apply a pecuniary contraventional sanction.

III.

As in other areas covered by contraventional sanctioning, as far as employment relationships are concerned, the legislator elected a small number of contraventions to which the special rules provided for by the Prevention Law could be applied.

According to GD no. 33/2018, in the matter of legal employment relationships only the following eight contraventions are enumerated:

1. Art. 23, for violation of the provisions of art. 5, art. 7 para. (1), art. 8 para. (2), art. 9, para. (1) and (4), art. 11 and art. 12 of Law no. 279/2005 on apprenticeship in the workplace, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, issue 498 of August 7, 2013, as amended.

The acts considered are:

– art. 5: The employer shall appoint an apprenticeship coordinator who shall guide the apprentice so that the latter could acquire the professional competencies necessary to obtain the qualification for which the apprenticeship in the workplace is organized;

– art. 7 para. (1): The person who cumulatively meets the following conditions may enter into a contract of apprenticeship:

a) he takes the necessary steps towards finding a job by himself or by applying for a job at the employment agency in whose jurisdiction he is domiciled, or, where appropriate, he is a resident, or at another employment services provider accredited under the law;
b) he reached the age of 16;
c) he is not qualified for the occupation in which apprenticeship is organized in the workplace;
d) he meets the access requirements to be trained through apprenticeship in the workplace, on qualification levels, according to GO no. 129/2000 on adult professional training, republished, as amended and supplemented;

– - art. 8 para. (2): The registered sole trader or, where applicable, the designated representative of the family owned and operated business trains apprentices, acting at the same time as apprenticeship coordinator;

– - art. 9 para. (1) and (4):

- Para. (1) The duration of the apprenticeship contract is determined by the qualification level for which the apprentice is going to be prepared, and may not be less than:

a) 12 months, if the apprenticeship in the workplace is organized to achieve the competencies corresponding to a level 2 qualification;
b) 24 months if the apprenticeship in the workplace is organized to achieve the competencies corresponding to a level 3 qualification;
c) 36 months, if the apprenticeship in the workplace is organized to achieve the competencies corresponding to a level 4 qualification;

- Para. (4) The timeframe necessary for the theoretical training of the apprentice is included in the normal hours of work;

– art. 11:

- Para. (1): The apprentice status gives him all the rights and obligations under Labour Law, this Law and, where appropriate, all the special laws governing the occupation.

- Para. (2): The apprentice benefits from legal provisions applicable to the other employees, to the extent that they are not contrary to the apprentice status;

– art. 12: In order to professionally train the apprentice, the employer shall provide the apprentice with access to theoretical and practical training, as well as all the necessary conditions so that the authorized training provider and the coordinator would fulfil their duties as far as the training of the apprentice is concerned.

2. Art. 217 para. (1) let. c) of the Law on Social Dialogue no. 62/2011, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, issue 625 of August 31st, 2012, as amended and supplemented.

According to art. 217 para. (1) let. c) of Law no. 62/2011, it is a contravention and is thus sanctioned with a fine amounting to 3,000 lei, the failure of the parties signing the collective labour agreement at unit group or industry level to submit the agreement thereof for publication. Responsibility is equally shared by the parties.

3. Art. 13 para. (1) of Law no. 67/2006 on the protection of employees' rights in case of transfer of the undertaking, the unit or parts thereof, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, issue 276 of 28 March 2006.

The rule states that failure by the transferor or transferee to fulfil the obligations of this law is a contravention and is sanctionable by a fine amounting from 1,500 to 3,000 lei.

4. Art. 113 let. a), b), e), h) of the Law no. 76/2002 on the unemployment security system and on the stimulation of employment, published in the

[13] See I.T. Ştefănescu, op. cit., p. 921.

Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, issue 103, February 6th, 2002, as amended and supplemented.

According to art. 113, it is a contravention if:

- let. a) there is no compliance with art. 10 of the Law concerning the obligation of employers and providers of employment services, respectively, to communicate the number of job vacancies or, where appropriate, the number of the unemployed who were counselled and employed;
- let. b) they do not use the Classification of Occupations in Romania under the provisions of art. 15 of the law;
- let. e) there is no compliance with art. 41 para. (2) of the Law - employers who employed, according to the law, individuals among the recipients of unemployment benefits shall notify, within 3 days, the employment agencies where they were registered;
- let. h) there is failure to communicate the data and information requested in writing by the National Agency for Employment or the local employment agencies in order to fulfil the duties provided by the law other than those regarding the communication of data, information, as well as if there is failure to produce all the documents and any other information and documents requested by the official bodies which control local employment agencies, while conducting control activities and so as to meet statutory duties.

5. Art. 9 of Law no. 467/2006 on establishing a general framework for informing and consulting employees, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, issue 1006, December 18th, 2006.

According to art. 9, it is a contravention to fail to fulfil obligations under the art. 5 of the Law, which provides:

- para. (1): Employers shall inform and consult employees' representatives, according to the laws in force concerning:

a) the recent and probable development and economic situation of the company;
b) the situation, structure and probable development of employment within the company, as well as regarding any anticipatory measures envisaged, especially when there is a threat to employment;
c) the decisions which can lead to substantial changes in labour organization, contractual relations or employment relationships, including those covered by Romanian legislation on specific procedures for information and consultation on collective redundancies and the protection of employees' rights, in case of company transfer;

- para. (2) Information shall be given at a time, in a manner and with a content appropriate to enable employees' representatives to examine the issue properly and prepare, where appropriate, consultation;
- para. (3) Consultation shall take place:

a) at an appropriate time, in an appropriate manner and with an appropriate content to enable employees' representatives to examine the issue properly and develop a point of view;
b) at a relevant representation level for the management and the employees' representatives, depending on the subject being discussed;
c) based on the information supplied by the employer and on the view that employees' representatives are entitled to express;
d) so as to allow the employees' representatives to meet the employer and obtain a reasoned response to any point of view that they might express;
e) so as to negotiate an agreement on the decisions falling within an employer's obligations referred to in para. (1) let. c).

6. Art. 35 para. (1) of Law no. 335/2013 regarding the traineeship for higher education graduates, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, issue 776, December 12th, 2013, as amended.

According to art. 35 para. (1), it is a contravention and is sanctionable by a fine amounting from 1,000 lei to 2,000 lei, the violation of the provisions relating to:

- the use of trainees to carry out other activities and / or perform other tasks than those provided in the job description and the traineeship contract;
- the experience of the mentor supervising the trainees' activity and the fact that a mentor can coordinate and monitor at the same time, no more than 3 trainees;
- the activity of the trainee evaluation committee, under the provisions of the art. 8 para. (1) and (3) of the Law;
- the fact that the report of the committee evaluating the traineeship period is made known to the trainee on the date of its completion by the evaluation committee;
- the fact that within five days from the completion of the traineeship, the employer is required to issue the certificate of completion of the traineeship;
- maximum duration of the traineeship contract;
- the fact that the trainee's basic monthly salary, established by the individual employment contract, is the one negotiated by the parties, for an average schedule of 8 hours per day or 40 hours per week, under the law, which is to be completed by provisions included in the applicable collective labour contract;
- the trainee's obligation not to resign within a period determined by addendum to the individual employment contract.

7. Art. 39 para. (2) for the violation of the provisions of art. 13 let. c) art. 39 para. (6) let. a) for the violation of the provisions in art. 9 para. (1), art. 39 para. (6) let. b) for the violation of the provisions of art. 14 and 15, art. 39 para. (8) let. a) for the violation of the provisions of art. 12 para. (1) let. d), art. 13 let. g) and art. 18 para. (6), as well as art. 40 of the Law on Job Safety and Health no. 319/2006 published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, issue 646, July 26th, 2006, as amended.
8. Art. 23 para. (1) of Law no. 200/2006 on the establishment and use of the Guarantee Fund for payment of wage debts, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, issue 453, May 25th, 2006, as amended.

IV.

The conclusion that can be expressed after considering the option of the legislator on indicating the contraventions in the area of employment relationships is that none of the general acts contraventionally sanctioned under the Labor Code and the Law on Social Dialogue was considered.

The enumeration in Appendix 1 to the G.D. no. 33/2018 is limitative. The special rules governing the norms that regulate preventive measures cannot be applied by analogy to other contraventions, even if it could be argued that they are less serious than the contraventions for which the Prevention Law is applied.

References

- 1. I.T. Ştefănescu, Tratat teoretic şi practic de drept al muncii (Theoretical and Practical Treatise of Labour Law), ediţia a IV-a, revăzută şi adăugită, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2017
- 2. A. Ţiclea, Tratat de dreptul muncii. Legislaţie. Doctrină. Jurisprudenţă (Labour Law Treatise. Legislation. Doctrine. Caselaw), Ediția a VIII-a, revizuită şi adăugită, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucureşti, 2014

THE CONSTITUTIONAL PRINCIPLE OF EQUALITY

Marius ANDREESCU[*]
Claudia ANDREESCU[]

Abstract

The equality in human rights and obligations, the equality of citizens before the law are fundamental categories of the theories on social democracy but also conditions of the lawful state, without which constitutional democracy cannot be conceived. In Romanian Constitution, this principle is consecrated in the form of equality of the citizens before the law and public authorities. There are also particular aspects of this principle consecrated in the Fundamental Law. The equality before the law and public authorities cannot imply the idea of standardizing, uniformity, enlisting of all citizens under the same legal regime, regardless of their natural or socio-professional situation. The constitutional principle of equality requires that equal treatment be applied to equal situations. This social and legal reality implies numerous interferences between the principle of equality and other constitutional principles: the principle of identity and diversity, the principle of pluralism, principle of unity and, in particular, the principle of proportionality.

In this study, by using theoretical and jurisprudential arguments, we intend to demonstrate that, in relation to contemporary social reality, equality, as a constitutional principle, is a particular aspect of the principle of proportionality. The latter one expresses in essence the ideas of: fairness, justice, reasonableness and fair appropriateness of state decisions to the facts and legitimate aims proposed.

Keywords: Equality as a constitutional principle, philosophical and legal content of the principle of proportionality, interference between the principles of equality and proportionality, Equitable balance, Principle of equality and tax obligations.

1. Introduction

The analysis of the link between the two principles of law must start from their meanings. The purpose is to determine their sphere of interference.

The principle of equality is consecrated in Article 16 of Romanian Constitution, in the form of equality of citizens before the law and public authorities. These provisions are corroborated with Art. 4, paragraph (2), which prohibits discrimination, according to the criteria mentioned. There are other Romanian constitutional provisions involving the principle of equality (Articles 4, 6, 38, 41, 44, 56 and 62). The Romanian constitutional provisions are in line with international regulations in the field. To remember the provisions of Articles 14 and 26 of the International Convention on Civil and Political Rights, that consecrates this principle and Article 24 regulating the causes of discrimination. The principle of equality is also stipulated by Article 14 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.

In the literature in specialty was shown that the constitutional principle of equality is characterized by polyformism. "Whether we consider it as an objective principle of law or a fundamental subjective right, it expresses itself through a series of pair - values that have already become commonplace, strict equality (relative equality, formal equality), material equality, equality before the law, equality by law, etc[1]." This polyformism explains the difficulty of defining this principle. The legal nature of the constitutional principle of equality is considered different in the comparative law: a principle of law, which is a means of guaranteeing the citizens' rights and freedoms, or as a subjective right. Also, the doctrinal and jurisprudential definitions are different, depending on the significance and peculiarities of the principle[2]. Regarding the juridical nature of the constitutional principle of equality in Romanian doctrine, we remember the view according to which "the formulation of the present Romanian Constitution makes of the constitutional principle of equality a fundamental right, with the value of a general principle for the fundamental rights matter"[3].

---

[*] Lecturer, PhD, University of Pitesti, Judge-Court of Appeal Pitesti (e-mail: andreescu_marius@yahoo.com).

[] M.A. Diplomacy and negotiations, SNSPA, Bucharest.

[1] Simina Elena Tănăsescu, Principiul egalităţii în dreptul românesc; "Principle of Equality in Romanian Law", AllBeck Publishing House, Bucharest1999., p. 3

[2] For the analysis of the juridical nature of the principle of equality and the definition of the principle, see Simina Elena Tănăsescu, quoted works., pg. 6 – 72; Ioan Muraru, Simina Elena Tănăsescu, Drept constitutional şi instituţii politice, "Constitutional Law and Political Institutions", Ch Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, vol. I, pp. 163-165; Tudor Drăganu, Tratat elementar de drept constituţional, Constitutional Law - Elementary Treaty, Lumina Lex Publishing House Bucharest ,1998 ., pp. 185 – 187, Andreescu Marius , Andra Nicoleta Puran, Drept constituţional –Teoria general, Constitutional Law – General Theory, Sitech Publishing House, Craiova, 2014,pp. 204-231, Andreescu Marius, Principiul proporţionalităţii în dreptul constituţional, Principle of Proportionality in the Constitutional Law, Ch. Beck Publishing House , Bucharest 2007, pp. 288-312

[3] Simina Elena Tănăsescu, quoted works., p. 11

The general principle of equality, regulated by Article 16 of Constitution, refers to a formal legal equality and not to an equality of conditions. However, the equality before the law and public authorities does not involve the idea of uniformity, in the sense of applying to all citizens the same legal regime, regardless of their natural or socio-professional situation. The principle of equality implies that equal treatment should apply to equal situations. At the same time, it also supposes the right to differentiation in legal treatment, if the situations of citizens are different. In other words, to equal situations should correspond an equal legal treatment and, to the different situations, the legal treatment must be different. In this sense, the doctrine admits the existence of a positive discrimination, regulated even by some constitutional texts, imposing certain social protection measures. The Constitutional Court jurisprudence on the limits of the constitutional principle of equality "varies between a strict equality, sometimes assimilated with the non-discrimination principle, and a relative equality, a treatment equality which accepts the differentiation of the legal regime, according to the objective particularities of the concrete situations[4]."

As a general principle of law, proportionality evokes the idea of correspondence or balance. The comparative logic, which is the essence of the proportionality reasoning, assumes the comparing of some objective situations and the ascertaining of their degree of identity. Should the situations be different, the applicable legal regime must be different. The general principle of proportionality, in this case, expresses the needed appropriation of the legal treatment with the objective situations to which it applies. In this way, the reasoning of proportionality requires an objective and reasonable motivation, in order not to reach to a disproportion between the purpose pursued, through an unequal legal treatment and the means used. Thus, the purpose of the law becomes the criterion according to which the situations are compared and in relation to which, the difference in the legal regime must be established[5].

Therefore, the logic of the egalitarian reasoning, in which the factual situations are so similar that they necessarily require the identity of the legal treatment, is a particular aspect of the reasoning of proportionality, based on different situations comparison and, implicitly, the recognition of a right to difference. It can be said that the principle of equality is a particular case of the principle of proportionality. Therefore, the Romanian constitutional provisions, that consecrate equality as a general principle (Article 16), or the specific equalities, imply also the principle of proportionality.

2. Interference between the principles of equality and proportionality

The uniformity has been consistently rejected by the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence, in relation to the interpretation and application of the principle of equality. The strict equality before the law implies that, in equal situations, the treatment must be equal, without discrimination. If the situations are different, the treatment can only be differentiated, which implies the principle of proportionality. Consequently, a breach of the principle of equality arises when different treatment is applied to similar situations or when the same legal treatment is applied to situations which by their nature are different. Also, the breaching of this principle may also occur in situations where there is no objective and reasonable reasoning for a differentiated treatment of identical situations, or if the unequal legal treatment is not appropriate to the purpose of the law.

The jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court has evolved in this respect, starting from accepting that different situations may be treated differently, up to the recognition of new constitutional principles, namely the right to difference[6]. The Constitutional Court ruled as inadmissible a difference of legal treatment on social criteria or categories of officials, as it would constitute a discrimination[7]. It admitted that there may be situations that allow for particularities, but not every such case justifies a difference in the legal treatment, especially if the different legal treatment would be discriminatory. The Constitutional Court has established as unconstitutional the provisions of the War Veterans Act concerning the conditioning of the war veterans' quality, on the fact of not having fought against the Romanian army. In this case, there is an unjustified discrimination between the Romanian citizens and it is therefore necessary to ensure an "equal treatment for all those who have joined in foreign armies"[8]. These are identical situations, which involve identical treatment. The Constitutional Court also applied the principle of equality in other situations, considering either that the situations are so similar that there is no justification for the legal treatment differentiation or, if it exists, it represents a discrimination related to the criterion used[9].

The rejection of uniformity and the need to differentiate the legal treatment according to different objective situations, without being discriminatory, is

[4] Simina Elena Tănăsescu, quoted works., p. 17

[5] Ibid, quoted works., pg 40

[6] Ioan Muraru, Mihai Constantinescu, Curtea Constituțională a României, Constitutional Court of Romania, Albatros Publishing House, Bucharest, 1997, pp 113-114; Simina Elena Tănăsescu, quoted works., p. 41

[7] Decision nr.6/1993, published in the Official Gazette No. 01/1993

[8] Decision nr.47/1994, published in the Official Gazette No.139/1994

[9] Decision nr.124/1995, published in the Official Gazette No.293/1995; Decision nr.35/1993, published in the Official Gazette No.218/1993; Decision nr.3/1994, published in the Official Gazette No..155/1994; Decision no.114/1994, published in C.D.H. – 1994, pg. 324-328; Decision no.30/1998, published in the Official Gazette No.113/1998

reflected in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court. Referring to the different situation of the students in private education and, on the other hand, of those in state education, the Court found that once they entered the chosen system, they are subjected to the rules of each system. So, in reality, the contested provisions do not discriminate, but offer different solutions for different situations[10]. In other words, the necessary adequacy of legal treatment to the objective situation considered is an application of the principle of proportionality.

This rule is formulated in the jurisprudence of the Court of Justice with a value of principle: "The principle of equality before the law requires establishing an equal treatment for situations which, depending on the purpose pursued, are not different. Consequently, a different treatment cannot be the sole expression of the judge's exclusive appreciation, but must be rationally justified, in respecting the principle of equality of citizens before the law and public authorities[11]."

The recent jurisprudence of our Constitutional Court confirms this interpretation of the principle of equality which refers to the equality of citizens before the law and public authorities and not to the equality of legal treatment applied to a category of citizens compared to another. Since the fundamental rights "represent a constant of the personality of the citizen, an equal chance granted to any individual", art.16, paragraph (1) of the republished Constitution aims the equality of rights between the citizens, and not the identity of legal treatment on the application of some measures, regardless of their nature. In this way, the Constitutional Court justifies not only the constitutionality of administering a different legal regime to certain categories of persons, but also the need for such legal treatment[12].

By applying this reasoning of proportionality, the Constitutional Court has come to the recognition of a fundamental right: the right to difference. "In general, it is appreciated that violation of the principle of equality and non-discrimination exists when a differential treatment is applied to equal cases without objective and reasonable motivation or if there is a disproportion (s.n.) between the aim pursued by unequal treatment and the means used. In other terms, the principle of equality does not prohibit specific rules. That is why the principle of equality leads to emphasize on the existence of a fundamental right, the right to difference (s.n.), and to the extent that equality is not natural, it imposing would mean the establishing of the discrimination[13]."

The applying of the principle of proportionality has as legal consequences the relativizing of equality as a principle[14]. The jurisprudence of the Court confirms that the principle of equality is a particular case of the general principle of proportionality, since the uniqueness of the legal treatment can be justified only in a particular hypothesis, that is, when the situations are the similar or the identical. Starting from the need to differentiate the legal treatment for different situations, the Constitutional Court has consistently considered that a protection measure applied to social or professional categories, in special situations, does not have the meaning of a privilege: "A measure of protection cannot have the meaning neither of a privilege nor of a discrimination and it is intended precisely to ensure, in certain specific situations, the equality of the citizens that would be affected in its absence[15]." In these situations, the principle of proportionality imposes the necessary adequacy of the protection measures to the proposed purpose, namely, the ensuring, in special situations, of the equality of citizens.

Applying the same reasoning, which is based on the principle of proportionality, the Constitutional Court found that a derogatory regime from the common law regarding the execution of tax receivables is justified, by the fact that it foresees non-expiring of the forced execution of these debts (art. 137, paragraph Fiscal procedure). These special procedural rules are appropriate to some special situations, namely that the object of a forced enforcement is to collect the tax receivables that are sources of the state budget, "which is of a general interest[16]."

In accordance with the principle of proportionality, applied in this matter, the difference in legal treatment must have a rational and objective basis. The provisions of Art II from O.U.G. no.22 / 2003[17] are constitutional because, the difference in the legal treatment, in regard to the granting of compensatory payments introduced by criticized text, between the companies exempted category with majority state capital and other companies is justified by a rational and objective criterion, which lies in the existence of different situations, but also in the real possibility of the [10] Decision no.70/1993, published in the Official Gazette No.307/1993. This Decision is invoked constantly in the Constitutional Court Jurisprudence, in matter.

[11] Reason 5 of the Decision of Constitutional Court Plenum no.1/1994, published in the Official Gazette No.69/1994. On the same meaning see Decision no.85/1994, in C.D.H. – 1994, pp 68 - 74

[12] See Decision nr.213/2004, published in the Official Gazette No..519/2004 and Decision nr.240/2004, published in the Official Gazette No.562/2004.

[13] Decision nr.107/1995, published in the Official Gazette No.85/1996. See Decision nr.6/1996, published in the Official Gazette No..23/1996; Decision nr.198/2000, published in the Official Gazette No..702/2000; Decision nr.54/2000, published in the Official Gazette No..310/2000; Decision nr.263/2001, published in the Official Gazette No..762/2001

[14] Simina Elena Tănăsescu, quoted works., pg. 41 - 44

[15] Decision nr.104/1995, published in the Official Gazette No.40/1996

[16] Decision no.432/2004, published in the Official Gazette No.1176/2004.

[17] Published in the Official Gazette No.252/2003

Government to bear such compensatory payments[18]. The different legal treatment, objectively and rationally determined by different situations, cannot create privileges or discriminations. The Constitutional Court rejected the exception of unconstitutionality of the provisions of Article 4, paragraph 2, letter a, Section 12 of Law no.543 / 2002[19], noting that, according to legal provisions criticized all offenders in the same circumstances, benefit or are exempted from the pardoning "related to the nature of the offense and its content, in the legal formulation in force at the offense date." According to the Constitutional Court, the convicts that committed offences at different times, when the criminal law regulated in various drafting the contents of the respective offenses, are in different situations which justify the application of a different legal treatment "according to the legislator's free choice, without instituting of some privileges or discriminations[20]."

In the same sense, the Constitutional Court has ruled that the withdrawal by the issuing authority of the visa, authorization or attestation, which would result in the rightful termination of the individual labor contract, for which concluding the existence of these documents is a mandatory condition, does not constitute a discriminatory legal treatment, but the application of differentiated legal treatment in relation to a different situation in which certain categories of employees are, that choose to exercise certain occupations or trades[21].

Unlike these situations where the principle of proportionality was observed, among others the Constitutional Court found that the difference in legal treatment has no longer a rational and objective justification, which fact results in disproportionate and discriminatory treatment between persons in the same situation.

Thus, our Constitutional Court noticed the unconstitutionality of the provisions of Article 15, paragraph 1 of Law no. 80/1995, on the Status of Military Staff[22], which allows paying the parental leave for bringing up a child up to 2 years only to active military women, and not male military staff[23]. The legislator may establish derogating measures from the common rules, subjected to respecting the following conditions: the existence of different situations; to be a rational and objective justification; the different legal treatment should not create a clear disproportion between different categories of persons; the derogating measures should not be discriminatory. Or, in the present case, the Constitutional Court rightly found that the complete abolition of certain categories of persons from the benefit of a form of insurance prescribed by law for all insured persons violates the constitutional principle of equality, representing discrimination, because the military staff in activity is not different from other categories of insured. Applying the same legal reasoning, the Constitutional Court found the unconstitutionality of art. 362, paragraph 1, letter d of Criminal Procedure[24]. The legal provisions criticized, which stipulate that the injured party may appeal in regard to the criminal aspect of the case, and the civil party only in regard to the civil side, are contrary to the constitutional principle of equality. These two parties of the criminal trial are in an identical situation, namely in the situation of a person wronged in own rights by committing the offense. Therefore, the inequality of treatment in regard to the access to the attack ways is t unjustified, including the proportionality criterion, since the defendant, the injured party, the civil party and the civilly responsible party have the same quality, respectively are parties to the criminal proceedings.

The interference between the principle of equality and the principle of proportionality also exists in case of national minorities' protection.

As stated in the Explanatory Report on the Frame - Convention for the Protection of National Minorities[25], the states may adopt special measures to promote full and effective equality between the national minorities and those belonging to the majority. Such measures must be appropriate to the intended purpose. This requirement expresses the principle of proportionality, which is applied in order to avoid violating the rights of others or discrimination of other persons. The principle of proportionality requires that these safeguards are not to be extended, in time and in the sphere of application, beyond what is necessary to achieve the intended purpose.

The Constitutional Court applied the principle of proportionality by analyzing the constitutionality of some provisions of the Education Law no. 84/1995[26].

---

[18] Decision nr.457/2003, published in the Official Gazette No..49/2004.

[19] Published in the Official Gazette No.726/2002.

[20] Decision nr.546/2004, published in the Official Gazette No..107/2005. See Decision no.200/2004, published in the Official Gazette No..420/2004, also Decision nr.240/2004, previously quoted, through which the Constitutional Court noticed that dispositions of art.81, paragraph.3, art.86[1], paragraph.3 and art.86[7], paragraph.3 Criminal Code are constitutional. The legislator didn't violate the dispositions of art.16 of Constitution, because the different juridical regime is justified by the different situation in which certain categories of persons are.

[21] Decision no.545/2004, published in the Official Gazette No.85/2005.

[22] Published in the Official Gazette No. 155/1995.

[23] Decision nr.90/2005, published in the Official Gazette No..245/2005. Instead the Constitutional Court ascertained the constitutionality of the dispositions art.38, paragraph.4, art.50, paragraph.1[1] and art.194 of Law no.19/2000, because the right of the citizens to pension is regulated both through general laws as through special laws in regard to certain social-professional categories that are found in particular situations. Therefore, the regime instituted through the criticized regulations is reasonable and justified, because the persons to which it refers to are in different situations. (Decision nr.116/2005, published in the Official Gazette No.228/2005).

[24] Decision no. 482/2004, published in Official Gazette 1200/2004.

[25] Adopted by the Ministries Committee of European Council in Strasbourg on 10.11.1994

[26] Published in the Official Gazette No. 167/1995 and republished in the Official Gazette No. 1/1996. See Decision nr.139/1999, published in the Official Gazette No..353/1999

The Romanian village in areas traditionally inhabited or in a substantial number of persons belonging to national minorities, if there is a sufficient demand, should, as far as possible, endeavor to ensure that persons belonging to the national minorities "have adequate learning opportunities for their minority language. The application of these measures shall be without prejudice to the learning of the official language or teaching in that language."

The measures taken by the State for the national minorities' protection must not contravene the requirements of the principle of equality of rights of the citizens and therefore should be "a reasonable ratio of proportionality between demand and possibilities, between demand and the means used or between the means employed and the aim pursued[27].

The principle of equality, applied to the exercise of the right to vote, may also involve proportionality. The material conditions for exercising the right to vote may vary according to the diversity of situations. This involves a differentiated legal treatment, appropriate to every concrete solution, which is a proportionality relationship. It is stated in the doctrine that "the legislator can arrange so many different legal regimes, how many particular situations he encounters, without respecting the strict equality imposed on him with regard to the right to vote[28]."

The constitutional principle of equality has applications in electoral, judicial, fiscal, etc[29]. In all these areas, is applied the principle of proportionality, which assumes the right to differentiation in the equal treatment, if the situations in which are the citizens, are different.

For our research we have chosen to analyze the application of the constitutional principle of proportionality in tax matters for two reasons: the constitutional text (Article 56 paragraph (2)), recalls the general principle of justice and equity, and secondly the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court is richer in this field than in other areas, with regard to the interference between the principle of equality and the principle of proportionality.

The application of the principle of proportionality in the field of taxation arises from the provisions of Article 56, paragraph (2) of the revised Constitution. "The statutory system of taxation must ensure the correct settlement of tax burdens."

The provisions of Article 56, paragraph (2) of the Romanian Constitution have the meaning of a social justice and equity principle. As a principle of social justice, the correct setting of the fiscal burdens corresponds to the social character of the state, taking into account the need to protect the most disadvantaged social strata. As a principle of fairness is not intended to distort the equality of opportunities, that excludes any privilege or discrimination.[30] The Law on Public Finance (Law no. 10/1991), [31] states in Article 5 that at the elaboration and execution of the budget are principles of universality, balance and reality, which is the materialization of the constitutional provisions above.

The provisions of Article 56, paragraph (2) of Constitution imply a necessary adjustment between the contribution of each and his possibilities. This adequacy can be imagined either in the form of a strict equality of everyone's contribution, or in the form of a necessary proportionality between each person's income and own share of burden.[32]

In the literature in specialty was shown that the specificity of the tax, regardless of its form, "exists in the proportionality ratio that is established between the taxable amount and the levying, because in matter of taxation, proportionality is the true image of the principle of equality[33]."

In this case, proportionality is a mathematical ratio, which can realize the idea of social justice, which results in a fair distribution of tax burdens, depending on the possibilities of each taxpayer. The progressivity of the tax is a particular aspect of the principle of proportionality applied in this area in the sense that the fair distribution of tax burdens means: the higher is a person's income, the more his tax contribution increases. Accordingly, proportionality is an expression of material equality, "when the quota increases at the same time with the taxable mass, we find ourselves in the presence of a progressive rate of material equality that seeks to equalize the real income through tax[34].

The Constitutional Court has applied the principle of proportionality as a relationship between the taxation base and the tax. Regarding the provisions of art.7, par. 6 of the Law no. 32/1991, the Court finds that by indexing, the tax grid does not change, but the level of the taxable income is updated, correlated with the increase of the inflation index. "It is true that the tax increases, but only as a result of the increase of the taxation base."[35] In this respect, the doctrine stated: "Also as the taxpayer's criterion for equality before the tax law, the taxable mass is the criterion according to which varies the legal regime of the tax. But the principle of tax justice, imposed by Article 53 (2) of the Constitution (Article 56 (2) of the Revised Constitution

[27] Ibid.
[28] Simina Elena Tănăsescu, quoted works., p. 219
[29] Simina Elena Tănăsescu, quoted works., p.169-253.
[30] Ibid, quoted works., p. 127
[31] Published in the Official Gazette No.23/1991
[32] Simina Elena Tănăsescu, quoted works., p. 194
[33] Ibid, p. 194
[34] Ibid, p. 203
[35] Decision nr.53/1994, published in C.D.H. – 1994, pp. 222 – 225.

n.n.) imposes the uniformity of the legal regime of taxation as soon as the taxable amount is the same[36]."

The Constitutional Court has determined that the tax should not be abusive. Thus, it must correspond to the purpose pursued by the legislator and be appropriate to the taxable mass. As we have seen, the taxable amount is the criterion by which the legal regime of the tax varies. Moreover, "the tax is based on a strict conception of proportionality, which refers exclusively to the notion of an arithmetical proportion[37]." Accordingly, the establishing of a tax without having a taxable amount in the objective sense, that is, an income that cannot be achieved, is abusive. "In order to eliminate any possibility of abusive taxation and taking into account the intention of the legislator ... it follows that the extension of the obligation to pay the tax, in considering some uncultivable lands, is unconstitutional, contravening art.53, paragraph (2) of the Constitution (2) of the revised Constitution n.n.), on which grounds no income tax can be established on an income impossible to achieve[38]."

3. Conclusion

This constant orientation of our constitutional court, regarding the constitutionality of the legal provisions in the matter of tax duties, through the prism of principle of proportionality, is also confirmed by the previous jurisprudence, we would say a historical one, of the Constitutional Court, contrary to the present social and legal realities that refuse to appeal to the great natural principles, coming out immutable from the very nature of human being. Thus, the establishing of a higher tax in charge of individuals that own two or more buildings used as dwellings, does not violate the provisions of Article 16, paragraph (1) of Constitution[39]. To justify this solution, the Constitutional Court applies the principle of proportionality. It is ascertained that there is no discrimination against taxpayers who own several buildings compared to those who own a single building. There is sufficient reason for the introduction of the progressive tax in relation to the number of buildings owned in property, a reason which is expressed by the provisions of Article 56, paragraph (2) of the Constitution and implies a particular form of the principle of proportionality. This is also the opinion of the Court, which considers that the formula "the right settlement of the tax burdens" implies that the legislator must take into account when determining the categories of taxes, both the material situation of taxpayers, but also the increased availability of those who hold more properties to contribute more, through taxes, to public spending.

The current legislation setting a single tax rate irrespective of revenues, we believe is contrary to the principles of social justice, proportionality and equality, but also to the previous jurisprudence of our Constitutional Court, which, in the older jurisprudence, has given effect not only to constitutional texts in the field, but mostly, to the principles of justice and equity, true natural rights of man, superior to the force of the norms established by legal law, which reflects the temporal interests of the governors, and not the essence of the human nature that can be expressed in the realms of social realities only through the natural, immutable, absolute principles of: Justice, Equity (opposed to formal legal equality), Proportionality, Truth, Good and Freedom.

In theological and moral law, these principles can be considered imperatives which derive from the "Commandment of Love" considered by us to be the source of the authenticity and legitimacy of the moral law and juridical law, because it raises them from the narrow and limited sphere of constraint, as a factum exterior to human nature, transfiguring them in the natural dimension of freedom, the man being considered not only as an individual subjected to law enforcement, but as a person benefiting from the law. Freedom cannot characterize the individual who lives in the world of juridical law and even in the moral law, within the limits of reason, but only the man as a person, sovereign on himself, because he is governed by God, not by the world or by the individual "ego".

References

- Andreescu Marius , Andra Nicoleta Puran, Drept constituţional –Teoria general, Constitutional Law – General Theory, Sitech Publishing House, Craiova, 2014
- Andreescu Marius, Principiul proporţionalităţii în dreptul constituţional, Principle of Proportionality in the Constitutional Law, Ch. Beck Publishing House , Bucharest 2007
- Decision no. 482/2004, published in Official Gazette 1200/2004
- Decision no.114/1994, published in C.D.H. – 1994
- Decision no.200/2004, published in the Official Gazette No..420/2004
- Decision no.30/1998, published in the Official Gazette No.113/1998
- Decision no.432/2004, published in the Official Gazette No.1176/2004
- Decision no.545/2004, published in the Official Gazette No.85/2005
- Decision no.70/1993, published in the Official Gazette No.307/1993
- Decision no.85/1994, in C.D.H. – 1994

[36] Simina Elena Tănăsescu, quoted works., p. 205.
[37] Simina Elena Tănăsescu, quoted work., pg. 195.
[38] Decision nr.102/1995, published in C.D.H. 1995 – 1996, pp. 118 – 125.
[39] Decision nr.62/.1999, published in the Official Gazette No.308/1999.

- Decision nr.102/1995, published in C.D.H. 1995 – 1996
- Decision nr.104/1995, published in the Official Gazette No.40/1996
- Decision nr.107/1995, published in the Official Gazette No.85/1996
- Decision nr.116/2005, published in the Official Gazette No.228/2005
- Decision nr.124/1995, published in the Official Gazette No.293/1995
- Decision nr.139/1999, published in the Official Gazette No.353/1999
- Decision nr.198/2000, published in the Official Gazette No.702/2000
- Decision nr.213/2004, published in the Official Gazette No.519/2004
- Decision nr.240/2004, published in the Official Gazette No.562/2004
- Decision nr.263/2001, published in the Official Gazette No.762/2001
- Decision nr.3/1994, published in the Official Gazette No.155/1994
- Decision nr.35/1993, published in the Official Gazette No.218/1993
- Decision nr.457/2003, published in the Official Gazette No.49/2004
- Decision nr.47/1994, published in the Official Gazette No.139/1994
- Decision nr.53/1994, published in C.D.H. – 1994
- Decision nr.54/2000, published in the Official Gazette No.310/2000
- Decision nr.546/2004, published in the Official Gazette No.107/2005
- Decision nr.6/1993, published in the Official Gazette No. 01/1993
- Decision nr.6/1996, published in the Official Gazette No.23/1996
- Decision nr.62/.1999, published in the Official Gazette No.308/1999
- Decision nr.90/2005, published in the Official Gazette No.245/2005
- Education Law no. 84/1995, published in the Official Gazette No. 167/1995 and republished in the Official Gazette No. 1/1996
- Ioan Muraru, Mihai Constantinescu, Curtea Constituţională a României, Constitutional Court of Romania, Albatros Publishing House, Bucharest, 1997
- Ioan Muraru, Simina Elena Tănăsescu, Drept constitutional şi instituţii politice, "Constitutional Law and Political Institutions", Ch Beck Publishing House, Bucharest
- Law no. 80/1995, published in the Official Gazette No. 155/1995
- Reason 5 of the Decision of Constitutional Court Plenum no.1/1994, published in the Official Gazette No.69/1994
- Simina Elena Tănăsescu, Principiul egalităţii în dreptul românesc; "Principle of Equality in Romanian Law", AllBeck Publishing House, Bucharest 1999
- The Law on Public Finance no. 10/1991, published in the Official Gazette No.23/1991
- The provisions of Art II from O.U.G. no.22 / 2003, published in the Official Gazette No.726/2002
- Tudor Drăganu, Tratat elementar de drept constituţional, Constitutional Law - Elementary Treaty, Lumina Lex Publishing House Bucharest ,1998

SUPREMACY OF THE CONSTITUTION THEORETICAL AND PRACTICAL CONSIDERATIONS

Marius ANDREESCU[*]
Claudia ANDREESCU[]

Abstract

Regarding the term of supremacy of the constitution, many authors consider that it is notorious and therefore does not require a special scientific analysis. There are taken under consideration the characteristics of the fundamental law, such as its legal force and normative content, through which it expresses its superordinate position in the normative system of the state. In our analysis, we demonstrate that the supremacy of the constitution is a quality of the fundamental law that has complex, social, political, historical and normative determinations and relates to the role of the constitution in the state social system. The supremacy of constitution can not be reduced only to the formal significance resulting from its legal force. In this context we consider the concept of supremacy as a constitutional obligation with specific legal consequences. There are analyzed the consequences and guarantees of the supremacy of the constitution, the role of the Constitutional Court in fulfilling the main function of guarantor of the supremacy of the Constitution, as well as the competence of the courts, to guarantee through specific procedures this quality of the fundamental law. In this aspect, jurisprudential issues are presented and analyzed.

The relationship between the supremacy of the constitution and the principle of the priority of the European Union law is another aspect of the research carried out in this study.

Keywords: The notion of constitution and the supremacy of the constitution, legality and legitimacy, consequences and guarantees of constitutional supremacy, relationship between stability and constitutional reform, the correspondence between the law and the constitutional principles.

1. Introduction

In order to understand the relation between the two principles, i.e. Constitution's supremacy on the one hand, and primacy of European Union law on the other hand, there are a few considerations that are useful in connection to this quality of the Basic Law of being supreme in the rule of law, internal and social policy.

Constitution's supremacy expresses the upstream position of Basic law both in the system of law, as well as in the entire political and social system of every country. In the narrow sense, constitution supremacy's scientific foundation results from its form and content. Formal supremacy is expressed by the superior legal force, procedures derogating from common law on adopting and amending the constitutional rules, and material supremacy comes from the specificity of regulations, their content, especially from the fact that, by constitution, premises and rules for organization, operation and duties of public authorities are set out.

In that connection, it has been stated in the literature that the principle of Basic law's supremacy "Can be considered a sacred, intangible precept (…) it is at the peak of the pyramid of all legal acts. Nor would it be possible otherwise: Constitution legitimizes power, converting individual or collective will into State will; it gives power to the government, justifying its decisions and ensuring their implementation; it dictates the functions and duties incumbent on public authorities, enshrining the fundamental rights and duties, it has a leading role in relations between citizens, them and public authorities; it indicates the meaning or purpose of State activity, that is to say political, ideological and moral values under which the political system is organized and is functioning; Constitution is the fundamental background and essential guarantee of the rule of law; finally, it is the decisive benchmark for assessing the validity of all legal acts and facts. All these are substantial elements converging toward one and the same conclusion: Constitution's material supremacy. However, Constitution is supreme in a formal sense as well. The adoption procedure for the Constitution externalizes a particular, specific and inaccessible force, attached to its provisions, as such that no other law except a constitutional one may amend or repeal the decisions of the fundamental establishment, provisions relying on themselves, postulating their supremacy"[1].

The concept of Constitution supremacy may not, however, be reduced to a formal and material significance. Professor Ioan Muraru stated that: "Constitution's supremacy is a complex notion in whose content are comprised political and legal elements (values) and features expressing the upstream position of the Constitution not only in the system of law, but in the whole socio-political system of a country"[2]. Thus, Constitution's supremacy is a quality or trait positioning the Basic law at the top of political and juridical institutions in a society organized as a State and expresses its upstream position, both in the system of law and in the social and political system.

[*] Lecturer, PhD, University of Pitesti, Judge-Court of Appeal Pitesti (e-mail: andreescu_marius@yahoo.com).
[] M.A. Diplomacy and negotiations, National University of Political Sciences and Public Administration of Bucharest.
[1] Deleanu I., Instituţii şi proceduri constituţionale - în dreptul roman şi în dreptul comparat , Ed. C. H. Beck, Bucureşti 2006, pp. 221-222

The legal basis for Constitution's supremacy is contained by provisions of Art. 1 paragraph 5) of the Basic law. Constitution supremacy does not have a purely theoretical dimension within the meaning it may be deemed just a political, juridical or, possibly moral concept. Owing to its express enshrining in the Basic law, this principle has a normative value, from a formal standpoint being a constitutional rule. The normative dimension of Constitution's supremacy involves important legal obligations whose failure to comply with may result in legal penalties. In other words, in terms of constitutional principle, enshrined as legislation, supremacy of Basic law is also a constitutional obligation having multiple legal, political, but also value meanings for all components of the social and State system. In this regard, Cristian Ionescu would highlight: "From a strictly formal point of view, the obligation (to respect the primacy of the Basic law n.n,) is addressed to the Romanian citizens. In fact, observance of Constitution, including its supremacy, as well as laws was an entirely general obligation, whose addressees were all subjects of law – individuals and legal entities (national and international) with legal relations, including diplomatic, with the Romanian State"[3].

The general significance of this constitutional obligation relates to compliance of all law to the Constitution's rules. It is understood by "law" not just the legal system's component, but also the complex, institutional activity of interpretation and enforcement of legal rules, beginning with those of the Basic Law. "It was the derived Constituent Parliament's intention in 2003 to mark the decisive importance of the principle of Constitution supremacy over any other normative act. A clear signal was given, particularly as regards the public institution with a governing role to strictly respect the Constitution. Compliance with the Constitution is included in the general concept of lawfulness, and the term of respecting Constitution supremacy requires a pyramid-like hierarchy of normative acts at the top of which is the Basic law"[4].

2. The notion of constitution and the supremacy of the constitution

Among the many social, political and, last but not least, legal issues that the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution has and implies, we analyze in this study two:

a) the relationship between stability and constitutional reform; and b) the correspondence between the law and the constitutional principles applying to Criminal Codes.

A) An important aspect of the principle of the constitution's supremacy is the content of the relationship between stability and constitutional reform

One of the most controversial and important juridical problems is represented by the relationship between the stability and innovation in law. The stability of the juridical norms is undoubtedly a necessity for the predictability of the conduct of the law topics, for the security and good functioning of the economical and juridical relationships and also to give substance to the principles of supremacy of law and constitution.

On the other hand it is necessary to adapt the juridical norm and in general the law to the social and economical phenomenon that succeed with such rapidity. Also the internal juridical norm must answer to the standards imposed by the international juridical norms in a world in which the 'globalization" and "integration" become more conspicuous and with consequences far more important in the juridical plan also. It is necessary that permanently the law maker be concerned to eliminate in everything that it is "obsolete in law", all that do not correspond to the realities.

The report between stability and innovation in law constitutes a complex and difficult problem that needs to be approached with full attention having into consideration a wide range of factors that can determine a position favorable or unfavourable to legislative modification[5].

One of the criterions that help in solving this problem is the principle of proportionality. Between the juridical norm, the work of interpretation and its applying, and on the other hand the social reality in all its phenomenal complexity must be realized with an adequate report, in other words the law must be a factor of stability and dynamism of the state and society, to correspond to the scope to satisfy in the best way the requirements of the public interest but also to allow and guarantee to the individual the possibility of a free and predictable character, to accomplish oneself within the social context. Therefore, the law included in its normative dimension in order to be sustainable and to represent a factor of stability, but also of progress, must be adequate to the social realities and also to the scopes for which a juridical norm is adapted, or according to the case to be interpreted and applied. This is not a new observation. Many centuries ago Solon being asked to elaborate a constitution he asked the leaders of his city the question:" Tell me for how long and for which people" then later, the same wise philosopher asserted

[2] Muraru I., Tănăsescu E.S., Constituţia României - Comentariu pe articole, Ed. C.H.Beck, Bucureşti, 2009, p.18
[3] Ionescu C., Constituţia României. Titlul I. Principii generale art. 1-14. Comentarii şi explicaţii, Ed. C.H.Beck, Bucureşti, 2015, p. 48
[4] Ionescu C., quoted work, p. 48
[5] Victor Duculescu, Georgeta Duculescu, „Constitution's revising" „Revizuirea Constituţiei", Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucureşti, 2002 p. 12

that he didn't give to the city a constitution perfect but rather one that was adequate to the time and place.

The relationship between stability and innovation has a special importance when the question is to keep or to modify a constitution because the constitution is the political and juridical foundation of a state[6] based on which is being structured the state and society's entire structure.

On the essence of a constitution depends its stability in time because only thus will be ensured in a great extent the stability of the entire normative system of a state, the certitude and predictability of the law topics' conduct, but also for ensuring the juridical, political stability of the social system, on the whole[7].

The stability is a prerequisite for the guaranteeing of the principle for the supremacy of constitution and its implications. On this meaning, professor Ioan Muraru asserts that the supremacy of constitution represents not only a strictly juridical category but a political-juridical one revealing that the fundamental law is the result of the economical, political, social and juridical realities. "It marks (defines, outlines) a historical stage in the life of a country, it sanctions the victories and gives expression and political-juridical stability to the realities and perspectives of the historical stages in which it has been adopted" [8].

In order to provide the stability of the constitution, varied technical modalities for guaranteeing a certain degree of rigidity of the fundamental law, have been used, out of which we enumerate: a) the establishing of some special conditions for exercising of an initiative to revise the constitution, such as the limiting of the topics that may have such an initiative, the constitutionality control ex officio upon the initiative for the constitution's revising; b) the interdiction of contitution's revising by the usual legislative assemblies or otherwise said by the recognition of the competence for the constitution's revising only in favour of a Constituent assembly c) the establishing of a special procedure for debating and adopting of the revising initiative; d) the necessity to solve the revising by referendum; e) the establishing of some material limits for the revising, specially by establishing of some constitutional regulations that cannot be subjected to the revising[9].

On the other hand a constitution is not and cannot be eternal or immutable. Yet from the very appearance of the constitutional phenomenon, the fundamental laws were conceived as subjected to the changes imposed inevitably with the passing of time and dynamics of state, economical, political and social realities. This idea was consecrated by the French Constitution on 1971 according to which "A people has always the right to review, to reform and modify its Constitution, and in the contemporary period included the "International Pact with regard to the economical, social and cultural rights" as well as the one regarding the civil and political rights adopted by U.N.O. in 1966 - item 1 - is stipulating:"All nations have the right to dispose of themselves. By virtue of that right they freely determine their legal status.

The renowned professor Constantin G. Rarincescu stated on this meaning:" A constitution yet is meant to regulate in future for a longer or a shorter time period, the political life of a nation, is not destined to be immobile, or perpetuum eternal, but on the other hand a constitution in the passing of time can show its imperfections, and no human work is being perfect, imperfections to whose some modifications are being imposed, on the other side a constitution needs to be in trend with the social necessities and with the new political concepts, that can change more frequently within a state or a society[10]". Underlying the same idea the professor Tudor Drăganu stated: "The constitution cannot be conceived as a perennial monument destined to outstand to the viccisitudes of the centuries, not even to the ones of the decades. Like all other juridical regulations, the constitution reflects the economical, social and political conditions existing in a society at a certain time of history and aims for creating the organizational structures and forms the most adequate to its later development. The human society is in a continuous changing. What it is valid today tomorrow can become superannuated. On the other side, one of the characteristics of the juridical regulations consists in the fact that they prefigure certain routes meant for chanelling the society's development in one or another direction. These directions as well as the modalities to accomplish the targeted scopes may prove to be, in their confronting with the realities, inadequate. Exactly for this very reason, the constitutions as all other regulations, cannot remain immutable but must adapt to the social dynamics[11]".

In the light of those considerents we appreciate that relationship between the stability and the constitutional revising needs to be interpreted and solved by the requirements of principle of proportionality[12]. The fundamental law is viable as long

[6] Ion Deleanu, ","Constitutional Law and Public Institutions", Europa Nova Publishing House, Bucharest, 1996, vol. I, p. 260.

[7] Elena Simina Tănăsescu, în Romania's Constitution , Comments on articles, coordinators I. Muraru, E.S. Tănăsescu, All Bach Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008, pp.1467-1469.

[8] Ioan Muraru, Simina Elena Tănăsescu, "Constitutional Law and the Political Institutions" XI th edition, All Bach Publishing House, Bucharest, 2003, p.80.

[9] For the development see : Ioan Muraru,Simina Tănăsescu, quotted works pp.52-55,Tudor Drăganu,, „Constitutional Law and the Political Institutions. Elementary Treaty" Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest,1998,Vol I,pp. 45-47, Marius Andreescu, Florina Mitrofan, „Constitutional Law. General Theory" Publishing House of Pitești University, 2006,pp. 43-44,Victor Duculescu ,Gergeta Duculescu, quotted works. pp.28-47, Ion Deleanu , quotted works.,pp.275-278.

[10] Constantin G. Rarincescu,, « Constitutional Law Course » Bucharest, 1940, p. 203.

[11] Tudor Drăganu, quotted works pp. 45-47

[12] For development see Marius Andreescu „The Principle of Proportionality in the Constitutional Law" CH Beck Publishing House ,Bucharest,2007.

as it is adequated to the realities of the state and to a certain society at a determined historical time. Much more – states professor Ioan Muraru – "a constitution is viable and efficient if it achieves the balance between the citizens (society) and the public authorities (state) on one side, then between the public authorities and certainly between the citizens. Important is also that the constitutional regulations realize that the public authorities are in the service of citizens, ensuring the individual's protection against the state's arbitrary attacks contrary to one's liberties"[13].In situations in which such a report of proportionality no longer exists, due to the imperfections of the constitution or due to the inadequacy of the constitutional regulations to the new state and social realities, it appears the juridical and political necessity for constitutional revising.

Nevertheless in the relationships between the stability and constitutional revising, unlike the general relationship stability – innovation in law the two terms have the same logical and juridical value. It is about a contrariety relationship (and not a contradiction one) in which the constitution's stability is the dominant term. This situation is justified by the fact that the stability is a requirement essential for the guaranteeing of the principle of constitution supremacy with all its consequences. Only through the primacy of the stability against the constitution's revising initiative one can exercise its role to provide the stability, equilibrium and dynamics of the social system's components, of the stronger and stronger assertion of the principles of the lawful state. The supremacy of the constitution bestowed by its stability represents a guarantee against the arbitrary and discretionary power of the state's authorities, by the pre-established and predictable constitutional rules that regulate the organization, functioning and tasks of the state authorities. That's why before putting the problem of constitution's revising, important is that the state's authorities achieve the interpretation and correct applying of the constitutional normative dispositions in their letter and spirit. The work of interpretation of the constitutional texts done by the constitutional courts of law but also by the other authorities of the state with the respecting of the competences granted by the law, is likely to reveal the meanings and significances of the principles for regulating the Constitution and thus to contribute to the process for the suitability of these norms to the social, political and state reality whose dynamics need not be neglected. The justification of the interpretation is to be found in the necessity to apply a general constitutional text to a situation in fact which in factum is a concrete one"[14].

The decision to trigger the procedure for revising a country's Constitution is undoubtedly a political one, but at the same time it needs to be juridically fundamented and to correspond to a historical need, of the social system stately organized from the perspective of its later evolution. Therefore, the act for revising the fundamental law needs not be subordinated to the political interests of the moment, no matter how nice they will be presented, but in the social general interest, well defined and possible to be juridically expressed. Professor Antonie Iorgovan specifies on full grounds:" in the matter of Constitution's revising, we dare say that where there is a normal political life, proof is given of restraining prudence, the imperfections of the texts when confronting with life, with later realities, are corrected by the interpretations of the Constitutional Courts, respectively throughout the parliamentary usance and customs, for which reason in the Western literature one does not speak only about the Constitution, but about the block of constitutionality"[15].

The answer to the question if in this historical moment is justified the triggering of the political and juridical procedures for the modifying of the fundamental law of Romania can be stressed out in respect with the reasons and purpose targeted. The revising of Constitution cannot have as finality the satisfying of the political interests of the persons holding the power for a moment, in the direction of reinforcing of the discretionary power of the Executive, with the inacceptable consequence of harming certain democratical constitutional values and principles, mainly of the political and institutional pluralism, of the principle of separation of powers in the state, of the principle of legislative supremacy of the Parliament.

On the other hand, such as the two decades lasting history of democratical life in Romania has shown, by the decisions taken for many times, were distorted the constitutional principles and rules by the interpretations contrary to the democratical spirit of the fundamental law, or worse, they didn't observe the constitutional dispositions because of the political purposes and their support in some conjunctural interests. The consequences were and are obvious: the restraining or violation of some fundamental rights and liberties, generating some political tensions, the nonobservance of the constitutional role of the state's institution, in a single word, due to political actions, some dressed in juridical clothes, contrary to the constitutionalism that needs to characterize the lawfull state in Romania. In such conditions, an eventual approach of the revising of the fundamental law should be centered on the need to strengthen and enhance the constitutional guarantees for respecting the requirements and values of the lawfull state, in order to avoid the power excess specific to the politician subordinated exclusively to a group interests, many time conjunctural and contrary to the Romanian people, which in accordance to Constituion item 2 paragraph (1) of the one who is the holder of the national sovereignity.

[13] Ioan Muraru, "The Constitutional Protection of the Liberties for Oppinion" Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 1999, p.17.

[14] Ioan Muraru, Mihai Constantinescu, Simina Tănăsescu, Marian Enache, Gheorghe Iancu, „Interpreting of the Constitution" Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 2002, p.14

[15] Antonie Iorgovan, „The Revising of Constitution and Bicameralism" in the l the Public Law Journal no. 1/2001, p. 23.

In our opinion, the preoccupation of the political class and state's authorities in the current period, in relation to the actual contents of the fundamental law, should be oriented not so for the modification of the Constitution, but especially into the direction of interpreting and correct applying and towards the respecting of the democratical finality of the constitutional institutions. In order to strengthen the lawfull state in Romania, it is necessary that the political formations, mostly those that hold the power, all authorities of the state to act or to exercise its duties within the limits of a loyal constitutional behavior that involve the respecting of the meaning and demoratical significances of the Constitution.

B) Another aspect relates to the relationship between the Constitution and the law, meaning "law" the sphere of inferior normative acts as a legal force to the Basic Law, analyzed in accordance with the requirements and consequences of the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, reveals two dimensions:
- The first concerns the constitutionality of inferior normative acts as a legal force to the Fundamental Law, and in the general sense the constitutionality of the whole law. Essentially, this requirement corresponds to one of the consequences of the supremacy of the Basic Law, namely the compliance of the whole right with constitutional norms. The fulfillment of this constitutional obligation, a direct consequence of the principle of the supremacy of the Basic Law, is mainly an attribute of the infra-constitutional legislator in the elaboration and adoption of normative acts. The fulfillment of the requirement of constitutionality of a normative act presupposes first the formal and material adequacy of the law to the norms, principles, values and reasons of the Constitution. The formal aspect of this report expresses the obligation of the legislator to observe the rules of material jurisdiction and the legislative procedures, which are explicitly derived from the constitutional norms or from other normative acts considered to be the formal sources of constitutional law.

The formal compliance of normative acts with the Basic Law implies a strict adherence of the premiums to the norms and principles of the Constitution, and there is no margin of appreciation or interpretation by the legislator.

The material dimension of this report is more complex and refers to the compliance of the normative content of a law with the principles, values, norms, but also with the constitutional grounds. And this aspect of law compliance with constitutional norms is a constitutional obligation generated by the principle of the supremacy of the Basic Law. The fulfillment of this obligation is a main attribute of the infra-constitutional legislator, who in the act of legislating is called to achieve not only a simple legislative function, but also a legal act, , we would say new, value and scientific, to elaborate and adopt the law according to the rationale, the normative content and the principles of the Constitution. In this way, in order to give effect to the principle of the supremacy of the Basic Law, in the act of legislating the legislator must carry out a complex activity of interpretation of the Constitution, which must not lead to circumvention of the meanings, meanings and especially the concrete content of the constitutional norms . This complex process of adequacy of the normative content of a law to constitutional norms is no longer strictly formal and procedural because it implies a certain margin of appreciation specific to the work of interpretation performed by the legislator and at the same time corresponds to the freedom of law which, Parliament's case, is found in the very legal nature of this institutional forum defined in art. 61 par. 1 of the Basic Law: "The Parliament is the supreme representative body of the Romanian people and the sole legislator of the country". This is the expression of what in the literature is defined as the principle of parliamentary autonomy.

A second aspect of achieving the requirement of constitutionality of the law, which is very important in our opinion, refers to the obligation of the infra-constitutional legislator to transpose and develop in normative acts elaborated and adopted, depending on their specificity, normative content, principles and values constitutional. We can say that in the activity of drafting the normative acts, understood as the main attribution of the Parliament and the Government, after the accession of Romania to the European Union, the preoccupation to concretize principles and constitutional values, which would give individuality to the elaborations normative, especially for the important areas of state activity and social and political life. As demonstrated by legislative practice and unfortunately also happened in the case of the recently adopted Criminal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure, "models" are often sought in the legislation of other states or in the legal system of EU law European. Refusing to give effect to the Romanian legal traditions, but also to the principles and values enshrined in the Basic Law, and last but not least to the concrete social political realities of the state and society, often the legislator, by adopting a complex normative act for important fields of activity, performs an eclectic, formal, activity with significant negative consequences on the interpretation and application of such a normative act, especially in the judicial activity.

We emphasize that observance of the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution can not be limited to formal compliance

In the new Criminal Codes there are many omissions regarding the reception and transposition of the principles and norms of the Constitution of Romania, and especially the inadequacies of the content of certain legal norms with the regulations of the Basic Law, the latter being fully perceived and censored by the Constitutional Court. Undoubtedly, verifying the constitutionality of the law as regards the fulfillment of the requirements of formal and material compliance with the constitutional norms is an exclusive attribute of the Constitutional Court, if the constitutional control is constituted by the laws of the Parliament and the ordinances of the Government. According to the provisions of art. 142 para. 1 of the Basic Law, "the Constitutional Court is the guarantor of the supremacy of the Constitution". However, this fundamental institution of the rule of law is not the only one called to contribute to guaranteeing the supremacy of the Basic Law. For the other categories of normative acts, it is necessary to recognize the competence of the courts to carry out such a constitutionality review in accordance with the rules of competence and the powers laid down by law.

The constitutionalisation of the normative system and generally of law is another reality of the application and observance of the principle of the supremacy of the Basic Law and which, in a narrow sense, can be understood as the complex activity carried out mainly by the Constitutional Court and by the courts, within the limits of the law to interpret the normative act in force, in whole or in part, with reference to the norms, principles, values and reasons of the Constitution. In the procedural sense, the constitutionalisation of law and law is the operation by which the constitutionality of a legal norm below the constitutional norms is invalidated or confirmed, and has the effect of setting or, more correctly, re-establishing the law within the value and normative framework of the Constitution. The constitutionalisation of the law is the result of the constitutional control of the laws in force, carried out by the Constitutional Court of Romania on the path of the unconstitutionality exception, a procedure regulated by the provisions of art. 146 lit. d) of the Constitution, as well as by the subsequent provisions of the Law no. 47/1992, republished, on the organization and functioning of the Constitutional Court.

In a broad sense, the constitutionalisation of law has a complex significance, which is not limited to constitutional control, in fact it is a permanent activity expressing the dynamics of law in relation to the dynamics of the state system and the social system. It is a permanent work of lawfulness to the evolutionary, social and state reality, through a judicious interpretation and valorization of the constitutional reasons within the limits provided by the normative content of the Basic Law. Without this, we emphasize the important role of the courts in the complex work of constitutionalizing the law through their specific attribute, interpreting and applying the law, but also the constitutional norms, with the obligation to respect the normative content, the values and the reasons of the Constitution. In the literature it is argued that, by its role in the constitutionalisation of law, materialized in the procedural attributions specific to the act of the court, the judge from the common law courts becomes, in fact, a constitutional judge.

The constitutionalisation of law and law is an evolutionary process determined not only by legal reasons, but also by social, political and economic factors outside the law. This dialectic process in concrete terms, referring to a certain normative act, lasts as long as the law in question is in force. In some cases, the constitutionalisation of a normative act may continue even after it is abrogated in the case of ultra-activation.

Applying these considerations to the normative reality of the new Criminal Codes, we note that, within a relatively short period of time since their adoption, the Constitutional Court admitted numerous exceptions of unconstitutionality, finding the unconstitutionality of a significant number of norms in the Code and the Criminal Procedure Code, which, in our opinion, raises three issues: The first concerns the constitutionality of Parliament's legislative activity, which resulted in the adoption of the Criminal Codes. The question arises as to how much the legislator respected the principle of the supremacy of the Fundamental Law and its degree of concern in order to ensure the material compliance of the norms of the Criminal Codes with the norms of the Constitution. Given the large number of admissible exceptions of unconstitutionality, we consider that the legislator's concern to respect the principle of the supremacy of the Basic Law in its simplest form, namely the compliance of the norms of the Criminal Code and the Criminal Procedure Code with the Basic Law of the country was not a priority the law-making process in this area; the second issue concerns the concrete process of constitutionalisation of the criminal legislation through the decisions of our constitutional court. We have in mind both the decisions of the Constitutional Court which rejected exceptions of unconstitutionality regarding the norms of the criminal codes and which, through the arguments put forward, contribute to the process of constitutionalisation of the law, but above all the decisions that found the unconstitutionality of some normative provisions. In the latter situation, the legal effect of the decisions of the Constitutional Court, which found the unconstitutionality of provisions of the two Criminal Codes, was raised. For the courts that are called upon to apply the rules of the Criminal Codes, as well as the Constitutional Court's decisions, the aspect raised is very important, especially in the rather frequent situation in which the Parliament or, as the case may be, the Government did not intervene, according to the Basic Law, to agree the normative provisions found to be unconstitutional with the decisions of the Constitutional Court; A third issue concerns the reception of the constitutional normative provisions, the principles and the rationale of the Basic Law, important for the entire coding work in criminal matters, in the drafting of the two Criminal Codes by the infra-legislative legislator.

The legislator did not show any particular interest in enshrining in the Criminal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure general principles of law, especially those whose origin is formed by constitutional norms, which give systemic and explanatory cohesion of the entire normative content of the codes and to which one can report who applies and interprets criminal law.

We consider that the normative expression in the two Criminal Codes of general principles of law, which by their nature are also constitutional principles, would have resulted in a high level of constitutionality for the two normative acts through a better harmonization of the content normative with the norms of the Basic Law. This high level of constitutionality would have resulted in the functional stability of codes by avoiding the unconstitutionality of some important legal norms, as has been the case so far.

The importance of the principles of law for the cohesion and harmony of the entire normative system has been analyzed and emphasized in the literature. The principles of law give value and legitimacy to the norms contained in the law. In this respect, Mircea Djuvara remarked: "All the science of law is not really, for a serious and methodical research, than to release from their multitude of laws their essence, that is, precisely these ultimate principles of justice from which all the other provisions derive. In this way, this entire legislation becomes very clear and what is called the legal spirit. Only in this way is the scientific elaboration of a law ". Equally significant are the words of the great philosopher Immanuel Kant: "It is an old desire, who knows when ?, will happen once: to discover in the place of the infinite variety of civil laws their principles, for only in this can be the secret of simplify, as they say, the legislation. "

From the normative point of view, the source of the principles of any legal branch, and especially of a code, must be primarily the constitutional norms which, by their nature, contain rules of maximum generality, which constitute a basis but also a source of legitimacy for all other legal rules.

Conclusions

The supremacy of the Constitution would remain a mere theoretical issue if there were no adequate safeguards. Undoubtedly, the constitutional justice and its particular form, the constitutional control of the laws, represent the main guarantee of the supremacy of the Constitution, as expressly stipulated in the Romanian Basic Law.

Professor Ion Deleanu appreciated that "constitutional justice can be considered alongside many others a paradigm of this century." The emergence and evolution of constitutional justice is determined by a number of factors to which the doctrine refers, among which we mention: man, as a citizen, becomes a cardinal axiological reference of civil and political society, and fundamental rights and freedoms only represent a simple theoretical discourse, but a normative reality; there is a reconsideration of democracy in the sense that the protection of the minority becomes a major requirement of the rule of law and, at the same time, a counterpart to the principle of majority; "Parliamentary sovereignty" is subject to the rule of law and, in particular, to the Constitution, therefore the law is no longer an infallible act of Parliament, but subject to the norms and values of the Constitution; not least, the reconsideration of the role and place of the constitutions in the sense of their qualification, especially as "fundamental constitutions of the governors and not of the governors, as a dynamic act, further modeling and as an act of society[16]."

The constitutionalisation of law and law is primarily the work of the Constitutional Court and the courts but, in a broader sense, the entire state institutional system according to the rules of competence contributes to the process by interpreting and applying the constitutional norms complex of continuous approximation of the normative content of laws and other categories of normative acts, principles, values and reasons of constitutional norms. It is obvious that the infra-constitutional legislator plays a very important role in the constitutionalisation of law and law, especially by taking into account in the normative acts elaborated and adopted what we call the reasons and values found in the normative content of the Basic Law.

In our opinion, the role of the Constitutional Court as the guarantor of the Fundamental Law must be amplified by new powers in order to limit the excess power of state authorities. We disagree with what has been stated in the literature that a possible improvement of constitutional justice could be achieved by reducing the powers of the constitutional litigation court. It is true that the Constitutional Court has made some controversial decisions regarding the observance of the limits of the exercise of its attributions Constitution, by assuming the role of a positive legislator. . Reducing the powers of the constitutional court for this reason is not a legal solution. Of course, reducing the powers of a state authority has as a consequence the elimination of the risk of misconduct of those attributions. Not in this way it is realized in a state of law the improvement of the activity of a state authority, but by seeking legal solutions to better fulfill the attributions that prove to be necessary for the state and social system.

It is useful in a future revision of the fundamental law that art. 1 of the Constitution to add a new paragraph stipulating that "The exercise of state power must be proportionate and non-discriminatory". This new constitutional regulation would constitute a genuine constitutional obligation for all state authorities to exercise their powers in such a way that the adopted measures fall within the limits of the discretionary power recognized by the law. At the same time it creates the possibility for the Constitutional Court to sanction the excess of power in the activity of the Parliament and the Government by way of the constitutionality control of laws and ordinances, using as a criterion the principle of proportionality.

[16] Deleanu I., Constitutional Justice, Ed. Lumina Lex, Bucharest, 1995, p.5

The Constitutional Court may also include the power to rule on the constitutionality of administrative acts exempt from the legality control of administrative litigation. This category of administrative acts, to which Article 126 paragraph 6 of the Constitution refers and the provisions of Law no. 544/2004 of the contentious-administrative are of great importance for the entire social and state system. Consequently, a constitutional review is necessary because, in its absence, the discretionary power of the issuing administrative authority is unlimited with the consequence of the possibility of an excessive restriction of the exercise of fundamental rights and freedoms or the violation of important constitutional values. For the same reasons, our constitutional court should be able to control the constitutionality and the decrees of the President to establish the referendum procedure.

The High Court of Cassation and Justice has the power to take decisions in the appeal procedure in the interest of the law that are binding on the courts. In the absence of any check of legality or constitutionality, practice has shown that in many situations the supreme court has exceeded its duty to interpret the law, and through such decisions has amended or supplemented normative acts by acting as a true legislator in violation of the principle of separation of powers in the state. In these circumstances, in order to avoid the excess power of the Supreme Court, we consider it necessary to assign to the Constitutional Court the power to rule on the constitutionality of the decisions of the High Court of Cassation and Justice adopted in the appeal procedure in the interest of the law.

References

- Antonie Iorgovan, „The Revising of Constitution and Bicameralism" in the l the Public Law Journal no. 1/2001
- Constantin G. Rarincescu,, « Constitutional Law Course » Bucharest, 1940
- Deleanu I., Constitutional Justice, Ed. Lumina Lex, Bucharest, 1995
- Deleanu I., Instituţii şi proceduri constituţionale în dreptul roman şi în dreptul comparat, Ed. C.H. Beck, Bucureşti 2006
- Elena Simina Tănăsescu, în Romania's Constitution , Comments on articles, coordinators I. Muraru, E.S. Tănăsescu, All Bach Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008
- Ioan Muraru, "The Constitutional Protection of the Liberties for Oppinion", Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 1999
- Ioan Muraru, Mihai Constantinescu, Simina Tănăsescu, Marian Enache, Gheorghe Iancu, „Interpreting of the Constitution", Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 2002
- Ioan Muraru, Simina Elena Tănăsescu, "Constitutional Law and the Political Institutions" XIth edition, All Bach Publishing House, Bucharest, 2003
- Ion Deleanu, "Constitutional Law and Public Institutions", Europa Nova Publishing House, Bucharest, 1996, vol. I.
- Ionescu C., Constituţia României. Titlul I. Principii generale art. 1-14. Comentarii şi explicaţii, Ed. C.H.Beck, Bucureşti, 2015
- Marius Andreescu „The Principle of Proportionality in the Constitutional Law" CH Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2007
- Marius Andreescu, Florina Mitrofan, „Constitutional Law. General Theory" Publishing House of Piteşti University, 2006
- Muraru I., Tănăsescu E.S., Constituţia României - Comentariu pe articole, Ed. C.H.Beck, Bucureşti, 2009
- Tudor Drăganu,, „Constitutional Law and the Political Institutions. Elementary Treaty" Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 1998, Vol I
- Victor Duculescu, Georgeta Duculescu, „Constitution's revising" „Revizuirea Constituţiei", Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucureşti, 2002

WORKPLACE SURVEILLANCE: BIG BROTHER IS WATCHING YOU?

Corneliu BÎRSAN[*]
Laura-Cristiana SPĂTARU-NEGURĂ[]

Abstract

Only recently workplace surveillance has become a real concern of the international community. Very often we hear about employers who monitor and record the actions of their employees, in order to check for any breaches of company policies or procedures, to ensure that appropriate behaviour standards are being met and that company property, confidential information and intellectual property is not being damaged. Surveillance at workplace may include inter alia monitoring of telephone and internet use, opening of personal files stored on a professional computer, video surveillance. But what if this monitoring or recording breaches human rights?

In order to give practical examples for these means, we shall proceed to a chronological analysis of the most relevant cases dealt by the European Court of Human Rights along the time, in which the Strasbourg judges decided that the measures taken by the employers exceed the limits given by Article 8 of the Convention. After providing the most relevant examples from the Court's case-law in this field, we shall analyse the outcome of the recent Grand Chamber Barbulescu v. Romania judgment.

The purpose of this study is to offer to the interested legal professionals and to the domestic authorities of the Member States the information in order to adequately protect the right of each individual to respect for his or her private life and correspondence under the European Convention on Human Rights.

Keywords: ECHR, employee, human rights, workplace surveillance.

1. Introductive Remarks

We all have been in the situation, at one point, of using at work the company resources for personal interest. What did you do? Did you stop before doing it and thought you are not allowed to use them? Did you remember that the internal regulations prohibited the use of company resources by the employees? Or does your company have a policy for employee personal use of business equipment or a code of ethics and business conduct? Did you go to the management and asked for permission? Did you use them and thought that nobody else will find out? What if your employer decided to monitor the employees' communications and you did not even know? What if you knew, and you still have decided to use them anyhow? And if we would tell you that certain workplace surveillance techniques could violate your human rights? Most probably you will ask us: what does surveillance in the workplace have to do with human rights?

Through this study, we propose an analysis to increase the understanding between the protection of human rights under the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (hereinafter the "European Convention on Human Rights" or the "Convention") and one cosmopolite threat: workplace surveillance. The purpose of this study is to strengthen human protection at the national level, having in mind that the European Court for Human Rights (hereinafter the "ECtHR" or the "Court") represents the most developped regional jurisdiction on human rights[1]. To attain this purpose, the present study seeks to provide the most relevant examples from the Court's case-law in which workplace surveillance has been considered to breach the Convention.

It is indisputable that "human rights concern the universal identity of the human being and are underlying on the principle of equality of all human beings"[2], therefore all individuals have the right to complain if the domestic authorities[3], natural or legal persons violate their individual rights under the Convention in certain conditions.

Through time, individuals have filed complaints against the Contracting States of the Convention[4],

---

[*] Professor, PhD., Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: corneliu.birsan@hotmail.com).

[] Assistant Professor, PhD., Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: negura_laura@yahoo.com).

[1] For general information on the European system of human rights protection instituted by the Council of Europe, please see Raluca Miga-Besteliu, Drept international public, 1st volume, 3rd edition, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, p. 184-185, and Bogdan Aurescu, Sistemul jurisdictiilor internationale, 2nd edition, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013, p. 211 and following.

[2] Augustin Fuerea, Introducere in problematica dreptului international al drepturilor omului – note de curs, Editura ERA, Bucuresti, 2000, p. 4.

[3] The domestic authorities can breach individual rights trough juridical acts, material and juridical facts, material and technical operations or political acts; in this respect, please see Marta Claudia Cliza, Drept administrativ, Partea a 2-a, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucuresti, 2011, p. 14 and following, and Marta Claudia Cliza, Revocation of administrative act, in the Proceedings of CKS eBook, 2012, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2012, p. 627.

[4] On the other side, it is important to have in mind also the European Union. For an interesting study on the European Union law infringements that caused damages to individuals, please see Roxana-Mariana Popescu, Case-law aspects concerning the regulation of states obligation to make good the damage caused to individuals, by infringements of European Union law, in the Proceedings of CKS eBook, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2012, p. 999-1008.

arguing that a breach of the Convention rights has resulted from workplace surveillance which can track an employee's every move. As it is easy to imagine, this is possible because each individual has the right to privacy.

Please note that Article 8 (right to respect for private and family life, home and correspondence) of the Convention provides that:

"1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.

2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others"[5].

In order to determine whether the interference by the authorities with the applicants' private life or correspondence was necessary in a democratic society and a fair balance was struck between the different interests involved, the European Court of Human Rights examines whether the interference was in accordance with the law, pursued a legitimate aim or aims and was proportionate to the aim(s) pursued.

According to this article, "the respect for the right to private life, family life, the respect for the domicile of a person and the secrecy of his/her correspondence impose, first of all, negative obligations on the part of the state authorities[6]". Besides these negative obligations, the public authorities have positive obligations, which are necessary for ensuring effective respect for private and family life.

What should we understand by the notion "private life"? Can it be defined precisely or is it blurred? We totally agree that "it is a notion whose content varies depending on the age to which it relates, on the society in which the individual lives, and even on the social group to which it belongs"[7]. As it is stated in the Court's case-law and it is widely recognized in the legal doctrine, the Convention is "a living instrument (…) which must be interpreted in the light of present-day conditions"[8], fact that raises many challenges for its judges.

Even in the Court's opinion, the notion of "private life" is a broad term which is not susceptible to exhaustive definition. Everyone has the right to live privately, away from unwanted attention. In a famous judgment, Niemietz v. Germany[9], the Court also considered that "it would be too restrictive to limit the notion of "private life" to an "inner circle" in which the individual may live his or her own personal life as he or she chooses, thus excluding entirely the outside world not encompassed within that circle"[10].

The notion of "private life" may include professional activities[11] or activities taking place in a public context[12].

2. ECHR's Relevant Case-law on Incompatibility Between Workplace Surveillance and Article 8 of the Convention

According to the experts, nowadays employers use many technologies to monitor their staff at work in order to discover their web-browsing patterns, text messages, screenshots, social media posts, private messaging applications. Are all these technologies compatible with the right to respect for private and family life, home and correspondence?

Surveillance at workplace may include inter alia monitoring of telephone and internet use, opening of personal files stored on a professional computer, video surveillance. In order to give practical examples for these means, we will proceed to a chronological analysis of the most relevant cases dealt by the Court along the time, in which the Strasbourg judges decided that the measures taken by the employers exceeds the limits given by the Article 8 of the Convention.

One interesting case in monitoring of telephone and internet use is Halford v. the United Kingdom[13]. The applicant, Ms Halford, was the highest-ranking female police officer in the United Kingdom (Assistant Chief Constable with the Merseyside police). She decided to bring discrimination proceedings in front of the British courts of law because she had been denied promotion during the years: on eight occasions in seven years, she applied unsuccessfully to be appointed to the rank of Deputy Chief Constable, in response to vacancies arising within Merseyside and other police authorities. One of her allegations before the ECtHR in this respect was that her office and home telephone calls had been intercepted in order to obtain

[5] Please see the European Convention on Human Rights, available at http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/Convention_ENG.pdf, p. 10.

[6] Corneliu Birsan, Conventia europeana a drepturilor omului. Comentariu pe articole, second edition, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010, p. 597.

[7] Idem, p. 602.

[8] Tyrer v. The United Kingdom, application no. 5856/72, judgment dated 25.04.1978, para. 31, available at http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-57587.

[9] Application no. 13710/88, Judgment dated 16 December 1992, available at http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-57887.

[10] Idem, para. 29.

[11] Case of Fernández Martínez v. Spain, application no. 56030/07, judgment dated 12 June 2014, para. 110, available at http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-145068, and case of Oleksandr Volkov v. Ukraine, application no. 21722/11, judgment dated 27 May 2013, paras. 165-66, available at http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-115871.

[12] Case of Von Hannover v. Germany (no. 2), application nos. 40660/08 and 60641/08, judgment dated 7 February 2012, para. 95, available at http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-109029.

[13] Application no. 20605/92, judgment dated 25 June 1997, available online at http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-58039.

information against her in the course of the domestic proceedings.

