Because of her job, Ms Halford was provided with her own office and two telephones (one for private use) which were part of the Merseyside police internal telephone network (i.e. a telecommunications system outside the public network). Since she was frequently "on call", a substantial part of her home telephone costs was paid by the Merseyside police. Unfortunatelly, no restrictions were placed on the use of these telephones and no guidance was given to the applicant.

The Court held that, in this case, there had been a violation of Article 8 of the Convention as regards the interception of telephone calls made on the applicant's office telephones. The Court considered that there was a reasonable likelihood that this interception was made by the police with the primary aim of gathering material against the applicant in the defence of the sex-discrimination proceedings she instituted. The Court noted that this interception made by a public authority represented an interference with the exercise of the applicant's right to respect for her private life and correspondence. Additionally, after analyzing the domestic applicable law, the Court noted that there was no legal provision regulating interception of telephone calls made on internal communications systems operated by public authorities, therefore the respective measure could not have been interpreted as being in accordance with the law.

Aditionally, the Court considered that the United Kingdom violated Article 13 (right to an effective remedy) of the Convention, since the applicant had been unable to seek relief at national level in relation to her complaint concerning her office telephones.

On the other hand, surprisingly, the Court held that there had been no violations of Articles 8 and 13 of the Convention as regards the interception of telephone calls made on the applicant's home telephone, since it did in particular not find it established that there had been interference regarding those communications. The Court observed that the only item of evidence which tended to suggest that the home calls were being intercepted had been the information concerning the discovery of the Merseyside police checking transcripts of conversations. The applicant provided to the Court with more specific details regarding this discovery (i.e. that it was made on a date after she had been suspended from duty), but the Court noted that this information might be unreliable since its source has not been named. Even if it had been assumed to be true, the fact that the police had been discovered checking transcripts of Ms Halford's telephone conversations "on a date after she had been suspended does not necessarily lead to the conclusion that these were transcripts of conversations made from her home"[14].

Judge Russo filed a dissenting opinion to this judgment for the non-violation of Article 13 of the Convention in relation to the applicant's complaint that telephone calls made from her home telephone were intercepted. We also consider that Ms Halford had an arguable claim of a violation of Article 8 in respect of her home telephone and she was entitled to an effective remedy in the United Kingdom in respect to this point.

In another interesting case against the United Kingdom, Copland[15], the applicant, Ms Copland complained that during her employment in a statutory body administered by the state (the Carmarthenshire College), her telephone, e-mail and internet usage had been monitored. She was appointed personal assistant to the College Principal and from the end of 1995 she was required to work closely with the newly appointed Deputy Principal, with whom at one point it was supposed to have an improper relationship. The Deputy Principal ordered that the applicant's telephone, e-mail and Internet usage to be monitored, during her employment (although at the College there was no policy in force regarding the monitoring of telephone, e-mail or Internet usage by employees).

The Court held that there had been a violation of Article 8 of the Convention since the collection and storage of personal information obtained from the telephone calls, e-mails and internet usage, without he knowledge, had amounted to an interference with her right to respect for her private life and correspondence. The applicant had not been given a warning that her calls, e-mails and personal internet usage would be monitored, fact which created a reasonable expectation as to the privacy of her correspondence.

In Antović and Mirković v. Montenegro[16], the Court was asked to decide if an invasion of privacy complaint brought by two university lecturers (University of Montenegro's School of Mathematics) after installing in the university amphiteatres video surveillance, at the dean's decision.

The applicants filed a complained with the Montenegrin Personal Data Protection Agency which upheld their complaint and ordered the removal of the respective cameras, particularly on the grounds that the reasons for the introduction of video surveillance had not been met, since no evidence existed regarding a danger to the safety of people and property and the university's further stated aim of surveillance of teaching was not among the legitimate grounds for video surveillance. The domestic courts overturned this decision in the civil proceedings on the grounds that the university was a public institution, carrying out activities of public interest, including teaching. Therefore, the amphitheatres were a working area, where professors were together with students, and they could not invoke any right to privacy that could be violated because of the video surveillance. It is also implied that the professors could not invoke the fact that the respective data collected with such surveillance cameras be considered personal data.

[14] Idem, para. 59.

[15] Case of Copland v. the United Kingdom, application no. 62617/00, judgment dated 3 April 2007, available at http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-79996.

[16] Case of Antović and Mirković v. Montenegro, application no. 70838/13, judgment dated 28 November 2017, available at http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-178904.

The professors argued that they had no effective control over the information collected through the surveillance system and that the surveillance had been unlawful. Since the cameras had been installed in public areas, the Montenegrin courts of law rejected a compensation claim arguing that the question of private life had not been at issue.

The Court held that there had been a violation of Article 8 (right to respect for private life) of the Convention, considering that the camera surveillance had amounted to an interference with the applicants' right to privacy and that the evidence showed that that surveillance had violated the provisions of domestic law.

In the very recent judgment of López Ribalda and Others v. Spain[17], dated 9 January 2018, the Court held that there had been a violation of Article 8 of the Convention, finding that the Spanish courts had failed to strike a fair balance between the applicants' right to privacy and the employer's property rights. This case concerned the covert video surveillance of a Spanish supermarket chain's (i.e. M.S.A., a Spanish family-owned supermarket chain) employees after suspicions of theft had arisen. After noting some irregularities between the supermarket stock levels (losses in excess of EUR 7,780 in February, EUR 17,971 in March, EUR 13,936 in April, EUR 18,009 in May and EUR 24,614 in June 2009), the employer installed surveillance cameras (visible for customer thefts and hidden for employee thefts – zoomed in on the checkout counters). The employees were informed only about the installation of the visible cameras. After ten days of surveillance, all the employees suspected of theft were called to individual meetings, where the applicants admitted their implication in the thefts. The applicants were dismissed on disciplinary grounds mainly based on the video material, which they alleged had been obtained by breaching their right to privacy.

The Court underlined that under Spanish law the applicants should have been informed that they were under surveillance, but in fact they had not been. The employer's rights could have been safeguarded by other means and it could have provided the applicants at the least with general information about the surveillance.

3. Barbulescu v Romania, the Milestone in the ECHR's Recent Case-Law on Workplace Surveillance

This case concerns the surveillance of Internet usage in the workplace and was brought to the attention of the Court on 15 December 2008[18]. The applicant born in 1979, lived in Bucharest and from 01 August to 06 August 2007 was employed in the Bucharest office of a Romanian private commercial company as a sales engineer. For the purpose of responding to the customers' enquiries, at his employer's request, Mr Barbulescu had to create an instant messaging account using Yahoo Messenger, an online chat service offering real-time text transmission over the internet (while he already had another personal Yahoo Messenger account).

The internal regulations prohibited the use of company resources by the employees, but it did not contain any reference to the possibility for the employer to monitor employees' communications.

From the evidence submitted by the Romanian Government to the Court, it appears that the applicant had been informed of the employer's internal regulations and had signed a copy of those internal regulations, after acquainting himself with their contents.

From the evidence it appears that from 05 to 13 July 2007, the employer recorded the applicant's Yahoo Messenger communications in real time, and on 13 July 2007 (at 4.30 p.m.), the applicant was summoned to give an explanation. The relevant notice was worded as follows: "Please explain why you are using company resources (internet connection, Messenger) for personal purposes during working hours, as shown by the attached charts". The charts attached indicated that his internet activity was greater than that of his colleagues. It is interesting that at that stage, he was not informed whether his communications monitoring activities had also concerned their content.

On that same day, the applicant informed the employer in writing that he had used Yahoo Messenger for work-related purposes only. In the afternoon (at 5.20 p.m.), the employer again summoned him to give an explanation in a notice worded as follows: "Please explain why the entire correspondence you exchanged between 5 to 12 July 2007 using the S. Bucharest [internet] site ID had a private purpose, as shown by the attached forty-five pages". The forty-five pages mentioned in the notice consisted of a transcript of the messages which the applicant had exchanged with his brother and his fiancée during the period when he had been monitored; those messages related to personal matters and some were of an intimate nature. The transcript also included five messages that the applicant had exchanged with his fiancée using his personal Yahoo Messenger account, which did not contain any intimate information.

[17] Cases of Isabel López Ribalda against Spain, María Ángeles Gancedo Giménez and Others against Spain, applications nos. 1874/13 and 8567/13, available at http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-179881.

[18] Case of Barbulescu v Romania, application no. 61496/08, Judgment of the Grand Chamber dated 05 September 2017, available at https://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng#{%22fulltext%22:[%22Barbulescu%22],%22documentcollectionid2%22:[%22GRANDCHAMBER%22,%22CHAMBER%22],%22itemid%22:[%22001-177082%22]}.

Later that same day, the applicant informed the employer in writing that in his view it had committed a criminal offence, namely breaching the secrecy of correspondence.

On 01 August 2007 the employer terminated the applicant's contract of employment.

The applicant challenged his dismissal in an application to the Bucharest County Court, asking to:

1. set aside the dismissal,
2. order his employer to pay him the amounts he was owed in respect of wages and any other entitlements and to reinstate him in his post,
3. order the employer to pay him 100,000 Romanian lei (approx. 30,000 euros) in damages for the harm resulting from the manner of his dismissal,
4. reimburse his costs and expenses.

As to the merits, relying on the case Copland v. the United Kingdom[19], he argued that an employee's telephone and email communications from the workplace were covered by the notions of "private life" and "correspondence", being therefore protected by Article 8 of the Convention. He also underlined that the dismissal decision was unlawful and that his employer had breached the Romanian criminal law, by monitoring his communications and accessing their contents.

The applicant noted the manner of his dismissal and alleged that he had been subjected to harassment by his employer through the monitoring of his communications and the disclosure of their contents "to colleagues who were involved in one way or another in the dismissal procedure"[20]. For this reason, we consider that the highly sensitive messages obtained from the transcripts should have been restricted to the disciplinary proceedings, fact which exposes his employer to the accusal that it went far beyond what was necessary with its interference.

In a judgment of 07 December 2007, the Bucharest County Court rejected the applicant's application and confirmed that his dismissal had been lawful.

The relevant parts of the judgment read as follows:

*"*In the present case, since the employee maintained during the disciplinary investigation that he had not used Yahoo Messenger for personal purposes but in order to advise customers on the products being sold by his employer, the court takes the view that an inspection of the content of the [applicant's] conversations was the only way in which the employer could ascertain the validity of his arguments.

The employer's right to monitor employees in the workplace, [particularly] as regards their use of company computers, forms part of the broader right, governed by the provisions of Article 40 (d) of the Labour Code, to supervise how employees perform their professional tasks.

Given that it has been shown that the employees' attention had been drawn to the fact that, shortly before the applicant's disciplinary sanction, another employee had been dismissed for using the internet, the telephone and the photocopier for personal purposes, and that the employees had been warned that their activities were being monitored (see notice no. 2316 of 3 July 2007, which the applicant had signed [after] acquainting himself with it – see copy on sheet 64), the employer cannot be accused of showing a lack of transparency and of failing to give its employees a clear warning that it was monitoring their computer use.

Internet access in the workplace is above all a tool made available to employees by the employer for professional use, and the employer indisputably has the power, by virtue of its right to supervise its employees' activities, to monitor personal internet use.

Such checks by the employer are made necessary by, for example, the risk that through their internet use, employees might damage the company's IT systems, carry out illegal activities in cyberspace for which the company could incur liability, or disclose the company's trade secrets.

The court considers that the acts committed by the applicant constitute a disciplinary offence within the meaning of Article 263 § 2 of the Labour Code since they amount to a culpable breach of the provisions of Article 50 of S.'s internal regulations ..., which prohibit the use of computers for personal purposes.

The aforementioned acts are deemed by the internal regulations to constitute serious misconduct, the penalty for which, in accordance with Article 73 of the same internal regulations, [is] termination of the contract of employment on disciplinary grounds.

Having regard to the factual and legal arguments set out above, the court considers that the decision complained of is well-founded and lawful, and dismisses the application as unfounded"[21].

As the Bucharest County Court underlined, the employer was obliged to inspect the content of the applicant's conversations since the employee affirmed that he had not used Yahoo Messenger for personal purposes. The Court confirmed that the employer had ther right to monitor employees and the employees had been previously informed about the prohibition of the use of computers for personal purposes.

Unsatisfied by the reasoning of the Bucharest County Court, the applicant then appealed the respective judgment to the Bucharest Court of Appeal, by adding that the court had not struck a fair balance between the interests at stake, unjustly prioritising the employer's interest in enjoying discretion to control its employees' time and resources. He further argued that neither the internal regulations nor the information notice had contained any indication that the employer could monitor employees' communications.

[19] Cited above.
[20] Case of Barbulescu v Romania, application no. 61496/08, Judgment of the Grand Chamber dated 05 September 2017, para. 26.
[21] Idem, para. 28.

The Bucharest Court of Appeal dismissed the applicant's appeal in a judgment of 17 June 2008, by underlying that:

"In conclusion, an employer who has made an investment is entitled, in exercising the rights enshrined in Article 40 § 1 of the Labour Code, to monitor internet use in the workplace, and an employee who breaches the employer's rules on personal internet use is committing a disciplinary offence that may give rise to a sanction, including the most serious one.

There is undoubtedly a conflict between the employer's right to engage in monitoring and the employees' right to protection of their privacy. This conflict has been settled at European Union level through the adoption of Directive no. 95/46/EC, which has laid down a number of principles governing the monitoring of internet and email use in the workplace, including the following in particular. (...)

In view of the fact that the employer has the right and the duty to ensure the smooth running of the company and, to that end, [is entitled] to supervise how its employees perform their professional tasks, and the fact [that it] enjoys disciplinary powers which it may legitimately use and which [authorised it in the present case] to monitor and transcribe the communications on Yahoo Messenger which the employee denied having exchanged for personal purposes, after he and his colleagues had been warned that company resources should not be used for such purposes, it cannot be maintained that this legitimate aim could have been achieved by any other means than by breaching the secrecy of his correspondence, or that a fair balance was not struck between the need to protect [the employee's] privacy and the employer's right to supervise the operation of its business.

Accordingly, having regard to the considerations set out above, the court finds that the decision of the first-instance court is lawful and well-founded and that the appeal is unfounded; it must therefore be dismissed, in accordance with the provisions of Article 312 § 1 of the C[ode of] Civ[il] Pr[ocedure]"[22].

Additionally, on 18 September 2007, the applicant had lodged a criminal complaint against the statutory representatives of the Romanian company, alleging a breach of the secrecy of correspondence (a right enshrined in Article 28 of the Romanian Constitution). On 09 May 2012, the Directorate for Investigating Organised Crime and Terrorism (DIICOT) of the prosecutor's office attached to the Supreme Court of Cassation and Justice of Romania ruled that there was no case to answer, on the grounds that the company was the owner of the computer system and the internet connection and could therefore monitor its employees' internet activity and use the information stored on the server, and in view of the prohibition on personal use of the IT systems, as a result of which the monitoring had been foreseeable. The applicant did not avail himself of the opportunity provided for by the applicable procedural rules to challenge the prosecuting authorities' decision in the domestic courts.

After exhausting all the domestic remedies relevant to the alleged violations, Mr Barbulescu filed an application to the ECtHR, relying on Article 8 of the Convention. The applicant complained, in particular, that his employer's decision to terminate his contract (after discovering that he was using their internet for personal purposes during work hours) had been based on a breach of his right to respect for his private life and correspondence as enshrined in Article 8 of the Convention and that the domestic courts had failed to comply with their obligation to protect his right.

The application was allocated to the Fourth Section of the Court, and on 12 January 2016 a Chamber of that Section unanimously declared the complaint concerning Article 8 of the Convention admissible and the remainder of the application inadmissible.

The Court analysed the relevant domestic law (the Romanian Constitution, the Criminal Code, the Civil Code, the Labour Code, and the Law no. 677/2001 on the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data), as well as the international law and practice (the United Nations standards[23], the Council of Europe standards[24], the European Union law[25], the comparative law[26]).

---

[22] Idem, para. 30.

[23] The Guidelines for the regulation of computerized personal data files, adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on 14 December 1990 in Resolution 45/95 (A/RES/45/95), the Code of Practice on the Protection of Workers' Personal Data issued by the International Labour Office in 1997, the Resolution no. 68/167 on the right to privacy in the digital age, adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on 18 December 2013 (A/RES/68/167).

[24] The Council of Europe Convention for the Protection of Individuals with regard to Automatic Processing of Personal Data, which entered into force on 1 October 1985, the Recommendation CM/Rec(2015)5 of the Committee of Ministers to member States on the processing of personal data in the context of employment, which was adopted on 1 April 2015.

[25] The Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (2007/C 303/01), Directive 95/46/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of the European Union of 24 October 1995 on the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data, the Regulation (EU) 2016/679 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 27 April 2016 on the protection of natural persons with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data, and repealing Directive 95/46/EC published in OJ 2016 L 119/1, entered into force on 24 May 2016 and will repeal Directive 95/46/EC with effect from 25 May 2018.

[26] The Court analysed the legislation of the Council of Europe member States, in particular a study of thirty-four of them, which indicate that all the States concerned recognise in general terms, at constitutional or statutory level, the right to privacy and to secrecy of correspondence. However, only Austria, Finland, Luxembourg, Portugal, Slovakia and the United Kingdom have explicitly regulated the issue of workplace privacy, whether in labour laws or in special legislation. With regard to monitoring powers, thirty-four Council of Europe member States require employers to give employees prior notice of monitoring (e.g. notification of the personal data-protection authorities or of workers'

In its judgment of 12 January 2016, the Chamber held that Article 8 of the Convention was applicable and found that the case differed from Copland v. the United Kingdom[27] and Halford v. the United Kingdom[28]. The significant difference was that the internal regulations in this case strictly prohibited employees from using company computers and resources for personal purposes. Since a transcript of the applicant's communications had been used as evidence in the Romanian court proceedings, the Chamber concluded that his right to respect for his private life and correspondence was involved.

The Chamber also acknowledged that Romania had positive obligations towards Mr Barbulescu because the dismissal decision had been taken by a private-law entity. From this perspective, the Chamber analised if the domestic authorities had struck a fair balance between, on one part, Mr Barbulescu's right to respect for his private life and correspondence and, on the other part, his employer's interests. The Chamber noted that Mr Barbulescu had been able to bring an action before the competent court of law which found that he committed a disciplinary offence.

The Chamber retained the fact that the employer had accessed the contents of the applicant's communications only after Mr Barbulescu had declared that he had used the respective Yahoo Messenger account for work-related purposes.

It then held, by six votes to one, that there had been no violation of Article 8 of the Convention (except for the Portuguese judge Paulo Pinto de Albuquerque, who's partly dissenting opinion was annexed to the Chamber judgment[29]).

On 12 April 2016, the applicant requested the referral of the case to the Grand Chamber[30] and on 06 June 2016 a panel of the Grand Chamber accepted the request. Considering that the respective case presents interest for all the Member States, President Guido Raimondi allowed the French Government[31] and the European Trade Union Confederation[32] to intervene in the written procedure of this case.

A hearing took place in public in the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on 30 November 2016.

By eleven votes to six, the Court held that there had been a violation of Article 8 of the Convention, finding that the domestic authorities had not adequately protected the applicant's right to respect for Mr Barbulescu's correspondence and private life. This violation was due to the failure to strike a fair balance between the interests at stake, i.e. determining if the applicant had received a prior notice from his employer regarding the possibility that his communications might be monitored, or if he had been informed of the nature or the extent of the monitoring, or the degree of the intrusion into his private life and correspondence. Additionally, the Romanian courts of law had failed to determine the reasons justifying such monitoring measures, if the employer could have used certain measures less intruding into his private life and correspondence and if the communications might have been accessed without his knowledge.

The Grand Chamber acknowledged the delicate character of the Barbulescu case which was heightened by the nature of certain of the applicant's messages (referring to the sexual health problems affecting the applicant and his fiancée and to his uneasiness with the hostile working environment), requiring protection under Article 8. The employer incorrectly proceeded when decided to access not only Mr Barbulescu's professional Yahoo Messenger account created by the applicant at his employer's request, but also Mr Barbulescu's own personal account (entitled "Andra loves you" which is obvious that has no relationship with performing the applicant's professional duties).

representatives). The existing legislation in Austria, Estonia, Finland, Greece, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Norway, Poland, Slovakia and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia requires employers to notify employees directly before initiating the monitoring. In, Austria, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Portugal and Sweden, employers may monitor emails marked by employees as "private", without being permitted to access their content. In Luxembourg employers may not open emails that are either marked as "private" or are manifestly of a private nature. The Czech Republic, Italy and Slovenia, as well as the Republic of Moldova to a certain extent, also limit the extent to which employers may monitor their employees' communications, according to whether the communications are professional or personal in nature. In Germany and Portugal, once it has been established that a message is private, the employer must stop reading it.

[27] Cited above.

[28] Cited above.

[29] Please see the Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judge Pinto De Albuquerque, available at https://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng#{%22appno%22:[%2261496/08%22], %22itemid%22:[%22001-159906%22]}. The judge shared the majority's starting point (interference with Article 8 of the Convention), but disagreed with their conclusion, since he considered that Article 8 was violated.

[30] In his observations before the Grand Chamber, Mr Barbulescu complained for the first time about the 2012 rejection of the criminal complaint filed in connection with an alleged breach of the secrecy of correspondence. Since this new complaint was not mentioned in the decision of 12 January 2016 as to admissibility, which establishes the boundaries of the examination of the application, it therefore falls outside the scope of the case as referred to the Grand Chamber, which did not have jurisdiction to deal with it.

[31] The French Government gave a comprehensive overview of the applicable provisions of French civil law, labour law and criminal law in this sphere. The authorities referred to the settled French Court of Cassation's case-law to the effect that any data processed, sent and received by means of the employer's electronic equipment were presumed to be professional in nature unless the employee designated them clearly and precisely as personal.

The French Government argued that the employer could monitor employees' professional data and correspondence to a reasonable degree, provided that a legitimate aim was pursued, and could use the results of the monitoring operation in disciplinary proceedings. However, the employees have to be given advance notice of such monitoring. In addition, where data clearly designated as personal by the employee were involved, the employer could ask the courts to order investigative measures and to instruct a bailiff to access the relevant data and record their content.

[32] The European Trade Union Confederation stated that internet access should be regarded as a human right and that the right to respect for correspondence should be strengthened. At least the employee's prior notification is required, before the employer could process employees' personal data.

We also consider that the employer did not have any proprietary rights over this second account, even though the computer used by the employee for this account belonged to the employer.

Hence judge Pinto de Albuquerque was right! He strongly expressed his disagreement with the majority opinion of the Chamber. He warned that unless companies clearly stipulate their Internet usage policy, "Internet surveillance in the workplace runs the risk of being abused by employers acting as a distrustful Big Brother lurking over the shoulders of their employees, as though the latter had sold not only their labor, but also their personal lives to employers"[33].

The importance of this rulling is not only for Romania, but for all the forty-seven countries which have ratified the European Convention on Human Rights, because the Court's rulings are binding for all of them. Mr Barbulescu is not a solitary case, therefore many employers have had to change their internal policies in order to conform themselves with this recent rulling. The lesson the Court taught the Contracting States with this Grand Chamber judgment was that Internet surveillance in the workplace is not at the employer's discretionary power.

It is obvius that a comprehenive Internet usage policy in a workplace should be put in place, mentioning specific rules on the use of instant messaging, web surfing, social networks, email and blogging. Employees must be informed of their clear rights and obligations, of the rules on using the internet, of the Internet monitoring policy, of the procedure to secure, use and destroy data, as well as of the persons having access to the respective data.

Every employee should be informed of such policy and should consent to it explicitly. It is obvious that breaches of the internal usage policy expose the employer[34] and the employee[35] to sanctions.

3. Concluding Remarks

It is undisputed that the Convention rights and freedoms have a horizontal effect, being directly binding on domestic public authorities and indirectly on private persons or entities. The Contracting States have the obligation to protect the victims of workplace surveillance, otherwise their legal responsibility may be invoked[36]. Employees do not give up to their rights to data protection and privacy every day when coming to the workplace.

Unfortunatelly, work surveillance is a hot topic, arguments and counterarguments could be brought in discussion. For example, companies that sell packages of employee monitoring tools can offer an interesting part for their clients.

Certain restrictions on an individual's professional life, which influence the way that individual constructs his/her identity, may fall under the scope of Article 8 of the Convention.

It is obvious that "enforcing the right to respect for private and family life seeks to defend the individual against any arbitrary interference by the public authorities in the exercise of the prerogatives that provide the very content of this right"[37].

Under the Convention, communications from home or from business premises may be covered by Article 8 of the Conventions, through the notions of "private life" and "correspondence": by mail, by email, by telephone calls, information derived from the monitoring of a person's internet use.

Nowadays, the Internet plays an important role in enhancing the public's access to news and, in general, facilitating the dissemination of information.

In such cases involving Article 8 of the Convention, regard must be had to the fair balance that has to be struck between the competing interests of the individual and of the community as a whole, subject in any event to the margin of appreciation enjoyed by the State.

After the analysis of the Court's case-law we can conclude that, although the Convention does not mention if there is a formal hierarchy of the human rights enshrined in it, it is recognized the fact that "a balance has to be achieved between conflicting interests, usually those of the individual balanced against those of the community, but occasionally the rights of one individual must be balanced against those of another"[38]. As it is stated in the legal doctrine, "the human being is the central area of interest for the lawmaker"[39].

Despite the concerted efforts of the national public authorities[40] with the international organizations, in the following years we will still

---

[33] Please see the Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judge Pinto De Albuquerque, available at https://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng#{%22appno%22:[%2261496/08%22],%22itemid%22:[%22001-159906%22]}, para. 15.

[34] If the employer's Internet monitoring policy breaches the internal data protection policy or the relevant law, it may entitle the employee to terminate the employment agreement and claim constructive dismissal, in addition to pecuniary and non-pecuniary damages.

[35] Depending on the breaches of the internal policy, the employer should start with a verbal warning, and increase gradually to a written reprimand, a financial penalty, demotion and, for serious repeat offenders, termination of the employment agreement.

[36] For general information on the legal responsability of states, please see Raluca Miga-Besteliu, Drept international public, 2nd volume, 3rd edition, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, p. 29-56.

[37] Corneliu Birsan, Conventia europeana a drepturilor omului. Comentariu pe articole, second edition, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010, p. 597.

[38] Robin C.A. White and Clare Ovey, The European Convention on Human Rights, fifth edition, Oxford University Press, 2010, p. 9, Evans v. United Kingdom, application no. 6229/05, judgment dated 10.04.2007, available at http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-80046.

[39] Elena Anghel, The notions of "given" and "constructed" in the field of the law, in the Proceedings of CKS eBook, 2016, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p. 341.

[40] For more details on public authorities, please see Elena Emilia Stefan, Disputed matters on the concept of public authority, in the Proceedings of CKS eBook, 2015, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, p. 535 and following.

encounter many varieties of innacurate or illegal workplace surveillance, and many States that do not act with responsibility[41] towards their nationals or other categories of individuals found on their territory[42].

The importance of the Barbulescu case has been confirmed by the President of the European Court of Human Rights, during the Solemn Hearing of the new judicial year, on 26 January 2018[43]. This was the first case cited by the President during his speech, therefore its value of precedent is undisputed.

We leave you with a conclusion drawn by President Raimondi regarding this case: "[i]t is illustrative of the ubiquitous nature of new technologies, which have pervaded our everyday lives. They regulate our relationships with others. It was thus inevitable that they should permeate our case-law. As was quite rightly observed by Professor Laurence Burgorgue-Larsen: "New technologies have led to an implosion of the age-old customs based on respect for intimacy". What is the point of communicating more easily and more quickly if it means being watched over by a third party or if it entails an intrusion into our private lives? (…) In Barbulescu the Court thus lays down a framework in the form of a list of safeguards that the domestic legal system must provide, such as proportionality, prior notice and procedural guarantees against arbitrariness. This is a kind of "vade mecum" for use by domestic courts"[44].

The public authorities and the companies should understand that, without an accurate and consistent Internet policy in accordance with the principles mentioned in the Barbulescu case, "Internet surveillance in the workplace runs the risk of being abused by employers acting as a distrustful Big Brother lurking over the shoulders of their employees, as though the latter had sold not only their labour, but also their personal lives to employers"[45].

References

- Elena Anghel, The notions of "given" and "constructed" in the field of the law, in the Proceedings of CKS eBook, 2016, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016
- Elena Anghel, The responsibility principle, in the Proceedings of CKS eBook, 2015, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015
- Bogdan Aurescu, Sistemul jurisdictiilor internationale, 2nd edition, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013
- Corneliu Birsan, Conventia europeana a drepturilor omului. Comentariu pe articole, second edition, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010
- Marta Claudia Cliza, Drept administrativ, Partea a 2-a, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucuresti, 2011
- Marta Claudia Cliza, Revocation of administrative act, in the Proceedings of CKS eBook, 2012, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2012
- Augustin Fuerea, Introducere in problematica dreptului international al drepturilor omului – note de curs, Editura ERA, Bucuresti, 2000
- Raluca Miga-Besteliu, Drept international public, 1st volume, 3rd edition, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014
- Raluca Miga-Besteliu, Drept international public, 2nd volume, 3rd edition, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014
- Nicolae Popa coordinator, Elena Anghel, Cornelia Beatrice Gabriela Ene-Dinu, Laura-Cristiana Spataru-Negura, Teoria generala a dreptului. Caiet de seminar, 3rd edition, revised and enlarged, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017
- Roxana-Mariana Popescu, Case-law aspects concerning the regulation of states obligation to make good the damage caused to individuals, by infringements of European Union law, in the Proceedings of CKS eBook, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2012
- Elena Emilia Stefan, Disputed matters on the concept of public authority, in the Proceedings of CKS eBook, 2015, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015
- Elena Emilia Stefan, Raspunderea juridica. Privire speciala asupra raspunderii in Dreptul administrativ, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013
- Robin C.A. White and Clare Ovey, The European Convention on Human Rights, fifth edition, Oxford University Press, 2010
- The European Convention on Human Rights, available at http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/Convention_ENG. pdf
- http://echr.coe.int
- http://hudoc.echr.coe.int

[41] For more details regarding the responsibility principle, please see Elena Anghel, The responsibility principle, in the Proceedings of CKS eBook, 2015, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, p. 364 and following. For more details regarding responsibility in general, please see Elena Emilia Stefan, Raspunderea juridica. Privire speciala asupra raspunderii in Dreptul administrativ, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013, p. 25-39.

[42] Please see Nicolae Popa coordinator, Elena Anghel, Cornelia Beatrice Gabriela Ene-Dinu, Laura-Cristiana Spataru-Negura, Teoria generala a dreptului. Caiet de seminar, 3rd edition, revised and enlarged, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, p. 129-130.

[43] Please see President Guido Raimondi's opening speech available at http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/Speech_ 20180126_Raimondi_ JY_ ENG. pdf.

[44] Idem, p. 5.

[45] Please see the Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judge Pinto De Albuquerque, available at https://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng#{%22appno%22:[%2261496/08%22],%22itemid%22:[%22001-159906%22]}, para. 15.

WHITEHEAD´S IDEAS WITHIN SOME ROMANIAN JURIDICAL THINKERS

Mihai BĂDESCU*

Abstract

Alfred North Whitehead (1861 – 1947) was a mathematician, logician and English philosopher, being the most important representative of the philosophical school of thought known as "process philosophy," which today has found application to a wide variety of disciplines such as: ecology, theology, physics, education, biology, economics, psychology.

The main ideas of Whitehead's thinking can be circumscribed to the following:

-every real-life object can be understood as a series of events and similarly constructed processes;

-if philosophy is successful, it must explain the link between the objective, scientific and logical discourses of the world and the present world of subjective experience;

-all experience is a part of nature;

-a good life is best thought of as an educated and civilized life;

-recognizing that the world is organic rather than materialistic is essential for anyone who wants to develop a complete description of nature and so on.

Regarding Whitehead's work, we appreciate that, even in our country, there have been and are authors whose views, if not overlapping with Whitehead's thinking, at least present a series of common elements.

As far as the present study is concerned, we propose to bring, from this perspective, in the analysis, the conceptions of the most important philosophers of Romanian law: Eugeniu Speranţia and Mircea Djuvara.

Eugeniu Speranţia's philosophical work is characterized by a strong biological, social and metaphysical trait.

Speranţia admits that none of the fundamental philosophical problems can be resolved unless life is taken into account – which is the original principle of existence – and social reality. What seems to stand in the way of the foundation of a single science that deals with both organic and psychic facts is individuality or discontinuity, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the fluid continuity of states of the soul.

What characterizes every living being is unity and its synthesized activity, which assimilates amorphous and disparate elements, thus portraying itself as a continuous process of synthesis in analogous forms (expansion, conquest, construction).

Regarding the philosophy of law, Speranţia maintains – in an obviously Kantian spirit – that it must investigate the a priori or transcendent foundations of law in general. Because a philosophy of law must fit into a broad view of the world, it must be preceded by a philosophy of the Spirit.

The philosophy of law has as an aim the spiritual justification of law which, encompassing science, offers it the opportunity to rise to the principles or the first causes.

Regarding Mircea Djuvara, we agree with the statement that no one up to Mircea Djuvara brought the legal phenomenon under the eyes of the philosophers, and no one offered the practitioners such a broad horizon, the horizon he considers necessary: «the philosophy of law contains one of the indispensable elements of a true culture».

In short, Mircea Djuvara's thinking can be qualified as dialectical idealism; it is not a subjective idealism but obviously an idealism whose epistemological way requires experience, a conception in which matter and spirit are mixed, forming two simple aspects of the experience, the deontological result of which reduces everything to objective relationships. Mircea Djuvara is a strict relationalist: „it is a danger to believe that our lives can work without categories." There is no human consciousness without its own philosophy, the practical attitude towards life, the inherent attitude of every human being. Reason, detached from subjectivity, predominates in every human being; the very law – expression of social relations – has a predominantly rational character: attitude towards life determines in any human consciousness a certain philosophical consciousness, the attitude towards society determines a certain philosophical consciousness, the attitude towards society determines a certain legal consciousness.

Keywords: Whitehead, Djuvara, Speranţia, philosophy, legal thinking, subjective experience, fundamentals of law, spirituality, social reality, organic being.

1. The philosophy of law is the philosophical reflection on the law, which deals with the right in a dual sense: as an objective law (in its sense), as a set of rules, norms that organize social life and as a subjective law (in its sense), respectively as a faculty, as the possibility, the enabling, the prerogative of a subject (of law) to have, to capitalize and to protect themselves against another a certain legally protected interest.

The Romanian philosophers of law have made important contributions - together with other thinkers of the world - to the development and affirmation of the philosophy of law in the world in an attempt to explain and evaluate the principles on which one of the major dimensions of human existence is based, the normative dimension (ethical and legal).For example, in this regard the following can be taken into account, Alexandru Vălimărescu, Traian Ionașcu, Petre Pandrea, Dumitru Drăghicescu, P.P. Negulescu, Gheorghe Băileanu, Șt. Zeletin, Nicolae Titulescu. Out of them, the following have made themselves known through their own conceptions: Eugeniu Speranţia and Mircea Djuvara. In their works are ideas that can be appreciated as being close to Whitehead's thinking, an aspect on which we will settle on in the following passages.

* University professor at The Bucharest University of Economic Studies, Permanent member of the Academy of Romanian Scientists (e-mail: badescu.vmihai@gmail.com)

2. A thinker of the greatest rank and a true encyclopedic spirit, the author of an impressive work in the field of philosophy of law was Eugeniu Speranţia.

Eugeniu Sperantia was born in Bucharest on May 6/18, 1888. He attended the secondary and university education in Bucharest; in 1912 he completed his Ph.D in law with the thesis called: „Pragmatic Apriorism".

He subsequently specialized in Berlin and upon his coming back in the country (1914) he had a position in a department in the secondary education after which he was appointed lecturer (1921) and professor (1923) in the philosophy of law and sociology within the Faculty of Law and the Orthodox Theological Academy, both from Oradea.

Among the most important scientific studies and researches we enumerate: Pragmatic Apriorism (1912), Definition and Prehistory (1912), The Philosophy of Magic (1916), The Beauty as Great Sufferance (1921), The Philosophy of Thinking (1922), The Ideal Factor (1929), Social Phenomenon as Spiritual Process of Education (1929), Course in General Sociology (1930), Problems of Contemporaneous Sociology (1933), The Historic Spiritualism (1933), Judicial Encyclopedia, with an Historic Introduction in the Philosophy of Law (1936), Immanent Lyricism (1938), Introduction in Sociology (1938).

Eugeniu Sperantia was one of the few Romanian thinkers that attended the international congresses of philosophy of the time, collaborating at the same time with foreign magazines of philosophy.

The thinker's philosophical work is characterized by a strong biological, social and metaphysical feature.

None of the fundamental philosophical problems can be solved, according to Sperantia, if social reality and life, which is the original principle of existence, are not taken into consideration. In other words, there is a unique formula with the help of which both biologic phenomena and psychological acts may be expressed, starting with the simplest ones.

What seems to stay in the way of incorporating a single science dealing both with organic and psychical acts, would be the individuality or material discontinuity of organic beings on one hand and the fluid continuity of the moods, on the other hand.

Any living creature is defined by unity and its synthesized activity, whereby it assimilates amorphous and disparate elements, appearing thus as a permanent preservative and expansive process of synthesis. But creating syntheses is one and the same with conquering and creating. The phenomenon of conscience is defined by the same features: the tendency to preserve itself as a process of synthesis, under analogue forms: expansion, conquest, construction.

This resemblance of features leads us to the idea, according to Sperantia, that both at the basis of biological and psychological phenomena lies the same impulse, that psychology could have great advantages by using biology and also that, biology would obtain precious information by using and consulting psychology. Sperantia is strongly convinced that we would reach very interesting knowledge if we decided to consider conscience (despite all vicissitudes of its short existence and in all relationships with its peers) as representing the minimal vital phenomenon and hence, as presenting in itself, in abbreviated form, all essential and distinctive features of life in general.

According to Sperantia, the logical laws are laws that the thinking subject requires alone and which it forces itself to comply with. Having a binding feature, they may be breached but when this is happening the thinking subject feels the need of a reprimand or reprobation, or at least of an apology and seeks to make things right.

If life represents the total acts of thinking and movement, then the world is only the content and virtual aspect of life. A reality can only be conceived for and by a living creature.

Along with philosophy in general, the philosophy of law was also challenged for many times, being often attacked in a fervent way and of course, groundlessly.

Sperantia – who found out that philosophy had been severely discredited in the 19th century, being challenged by the ascension of the scientific spirit, by the ephemeral time of materialism and empiricism – considered, at the time he was teaching his course in Cluj that, a "progressive affirmation" is close to the philosophy of law.

According to Sperantia, the philosophy of law was closely correlated in the last centuries with social and political sciences of those times. The periods of great social and political turmoil, wars or revolutions brought along with them great projects of social reform. At the same time with these projects it appears, however, an interest in the studies related to the justifying bases of the right and state.

Starting from the idea that social organization closely follows the logic of thinking, Sperantia reaches the conclusion that, even if philosophy followed the social and political oscillations to a great extent, it corresponds to a general exigency of the human mind, which it renders the feature of stability.

Sperantia is one of the most fervent supporters of the philosophy of law, being aware of the fact that it is the only one that can contribute to a proper creation of the law. That is why he militates against the exclusion of philosophical problematic from the General Theory of Law. The philosophy of law gains, in his conception, practical connotations, to the meaning that "in all branches of scientific research it is more and more difficult to challenge the truth that between the philosophical conception of the world and the solution to problems of detail there is such an intimate correlation that any insignificant discovery or verisimilar hypothesis may cause a modification of the philosophical trend".

In Kant's spirit, Sperantia argues that the philosophy of law must examine which are the aprioristic or transcendental bases of law in general. Besides these aprioristic bases, the philosophy of law must also take into consideration the influence of external, extrinsic factors which are important in the elaboration of judicial order. Besides these two factors, a third one has a significant role in the functioning of law. It is the finality of the right as technical means of progressive spiritualization of the humankind.

Because a philosophy of law must be framed within a broad vision about world, it must, in Sperantia's opinion, be preceded by a philosophy of the Spirit. The statement is correct and it was applied with success especially by Kant and Hegel. Since the characteristic and primordial function of the spirit is that to create norms, it results that the law has a spiritual foundation, and the spirit-related problematic must be found, specifically, in the problematic of law. The purpose of the philosophy of law conceived by Sperantia is the spiritual substantiation of the law which embedding the science, it offers it the possibility to ascend to principles or to first causes.

Eugeniu Sperantia, known for having a rich culture founded on thorough readings in the field of social sciences and nature, succeeds to carry out a philosophy of the law in connection with all other fields. Without fear of error, one may state that Sperantia is the philosopher that frames the law within an universal vision about the world in general; the law is framed within and is part of an integrated world and the philosophy of law is the one that requires and renders it the endorsement of unity with the great world of ideas that transits to an optically founded reality.

Although it is a part of a unitary whole, the law is, at its turn, a unitary reality, which is different from other realities, which confers it a different feature. To this purpose, Sperantia stated that "the philosophy of law shall consider the right as a unitary whole, in what it has identical with itself always and everywhere – which makes it to be a unitary reality, in what it differentiates it from any other reality and in what it assigns to it an own place and feature inside the whole imaginable and thoughtful world." From this way of raising the question, it results that the law, as a different reality, is part of a much broader world and in which it brings its characteristic way of being.

Starting from the framing of the law within the broad area of social sciences, Sperantia tries to catch, however, its the characteristic elements, its essentiality, that is what it distinguishes it in its idealism and reality itself.

The main distinction made by him is the one between the science of social life (the sociology) and the science of law and, correlatively, between the social philosophy and the philosophy of law. "Sociology – argues Eugeniu Sperantia – ascertains certain phenomena, it seeks for their causal explanation and the regularity of their relationships, while the judicial point of view is not that of causal explanation but of logical justification".

It is very interesting the way in which Sperantia approaches the concept of constraint. He remarks that the sanction or non-sanction doesn't characterize only the norms of law. It is exercised under all aspects of the social life. The society itself is a reality which constrains us and forces us to subordinate ourselves to its way of being. Moral is also, at its turn, an internal constraint. In contradiction with Trade who argued that not only constraint is the engine of the social life but also imitation, Sperantia, will show that in case of imitation, even if we are not in the presence of an outer constraint, it is however the result of an inner, involuntary impulse that in fact, constrains to a certain adaptation to environment. Sperantia states that in fact, constraint is one way of imitation: "through it, the process of unification, hence of imitation, universalizes and smoothens itself."

Starting from the ascertainment that social life is a manifestation of the human spirit, Sperantia requires that the general and imitable laws of thinking should apply also here with all consistency. In fact, according to him, the need for consistency is the most general need of the human spirit.

Approaching the notion of the norm characterized by constraint and identifying the constraint with fundamental logical concepts, such as those of identity and non-contradiction, Sperantia, succeeds in performing a substantiate logic of the norm.

Dealing with the laws of evolution of right, Eugeniu Sperantia, assimilating what other thinkers brought positive in this matter and completing with his own contributions, determines the following laws:

- the law of progressive intentionality: the right evolves through a transition from instinctive and automatic to intentional;
- the law of progressive rationality: the right evolves through a transition from irrational to rational;
- the law of transition from anonymous enactment to enactment by established bodies;
- the law of progressive organization of sanction – which, implying an increasing intervention of intentionality and rationality, represents a corollary of the two laws;
- the law of continuity or of psychological adaptation of the new institutions to the old mentality;
- the law of progressive solidarity of society with the individual;
- the law of evolution from particular to universal (supported by Giorgio del Vecchio);
- the law of transition from a "status" to a "contractus" (or the law of Sumner Maine) which could be also called –Sperantia says – the law of gradual affirmation of human personality (thus appearing as a corollary of law 6);
- the law of transition from psychological inferior grounds to superior grounds;
- the law of gradual simplification of the procedure;
- the law of sweetening and individualization

(extrinsic and intrinsic);

- the law of progressive organization of creation and self-preservation functions of the right;
- the law of functional and adaptive motivation.

All these laws would be reduced, according to Sperantia, to two general laws, that is:

- the right– as one of the social aspects of life – similarly evolves with any vital process;
- the right – as spiritual fact – evolves through the progressive affirmation of human spirituality

The evolution of practical behaviour and of the human spirit is carried out through a permanent and progressive union of means of "intermediation" (as a transition from immediate to mediate).

Despite having an obvious biological conception about the world, Sperantia does not exclude though aprioristic, transcendental factors in establishing the right. On the contrary, he strongly highlights their role. "The law – says Sperantia –appearing always as a spiritual synthetic product aspiring to a maximum of harmony and consistency, a philosophy of law must be preceded by at least one concise introduction in the philosophy of Spirit". The spirit creates itself certain exigencies to which it understands to obey, because they express the life of the Spirit itself and they make it possible. Which are these universal and imperative exigencies without which the spirit itself couldn't exist? They are the following:

- the spirit conceives itself as universal;
- the spirit considers itself as sufficient to itself;
- the spirit is and requires always to be subjected to a universal norm enacted by itself;
- the exigency of universality is the condition of rationality;
- any confinement of the universality of a norm represents for the spirit a defeat of its fundamental and primordial exigency;
- the sensible experience is a series of defeats of aspiration of the spirit to the universal;
- any defeat of the aspiration to the universal represents a negation of identity of the real with the spiritual and the rational;
- the horror of contradiction, the impulse to reject and avoid any contradiction is the defensive attitude of the spirit which tends to preserve its identity with itself and its aspiration to the universal norm;
- the individual spirit ("the ego"), as we know it in subjective conscience, postulates the objective existence of the spirit;
- thanks to the exigencies of universality, "the ego" conceives "the alter" as its own exteriorization;
- "the ego" assigns to each "alter" the same position of purpose in itself and the same requirement to be subjected to a universal norm. The consequences of identity of the subjective spirit and of the application of the same norm are:
  - the exigency of "equality of rights";
  - the exigency of "reciprocity";
  - the exigency of "compensation"

The real "social conflict" is reduced to the subjective, inner conflict, among the affective tendencies and rational norms. Any interdiction that starts from the normal conscience is a form of imperative of non-contradiction, a refusal of our logic, such as any exigency of the moral conscience is in fact still a logical existence.

Naturally, Sperantia is not content only with establishing the judicial imperatives which, as we have seen, they are exigencies of the spirit and they show as systematically the appearance that such imperatives have in the social contingency.

Spiritual life assumes social life, the latter being a constituent of the former: spiritual life is not possible without social life. Two strong tendencies are noticed in social life: on one hand, the tendency to possess material goods and on the other hand, the tendency to possess spiritual goods. While the latter tendency almost animates the humans and intensifies sociality, the former tendency alienates the humans, hence threatening the social cohesion. The explanation for these adverse effects of the two tendencies lies in the fact that while spiritual goods are susceptible of a simultaneous, unlimited affiliation, material goods, being exhaustible, are susceptible only of a limited affiliation. The exigencies of animality on one hand, the limitation of goods on the other hand, threatens not only the social life but also the spiritual one. That is why the spirit can not remain indifferent, but reacts, reducing or limiting the tendency of possession of material goods by certain norms. By doing so, the spirit is not the only one subjected to confinements: Organic life itself is subjected to norms, but to certain norms which are dictated to it from outside. Logical thinking creates alone norms for itself, according to which it develops, without which it wouldn't be a thinking but just a simple incoherent dream.

Social life can not dispense with norms, because it would be fully precarious without norms. This is why the law intervenes and establishes the necessary norms. Of course, besides the proper judicial norms, social life is followed by habits, customs, manners, commons laws, rules of politeness and ceremony, religious rites, etc., such as the individual conscience is normalized, besides the logical laws, by the laws of association. The right though, is not the result of fortuity or of human conscience taken in the amplitude of its formations, but "it is a rational and international creation", resembling to this respect with technical constructions.

The law must accomplish a high function: that of insuring human spirituality by protecting the social life, indispensable to the spirit.

3. Above all Romanian authors who consecrated the life and work of philosophical and legal writings is Mircea Djuvara, the representative figure of Romanian culture, the founder of an original thinking system, of definite theoretical and methodological value[1].

Mircea Djuvara was born in Bucharest on May 18th (30th), 1886, son of Estera (born Paianu), and Traian Djuvara, of a family of Aromanian origin who gave the Romanian society more jurists. With his existence, Mircea Djuvara marked a new opening in the Romanian interwar philosophy. A prominent personality of the time, Djuvara is an important landmark for any current research in the field of legal philosophy.

Mircea Djuvara followed, with very good results, the general education in Bucharest, also graduating from high school, the studies having provoked him "That ferment of ennobling and intellectual creation found in every human consciousness ... when I realize today how complete was the study cycle I have undergone in my childhood and how great was the influence it has exercised in its entire complexity upon my being, I bring through this the highest honor to the high school in which I have studied"-(the "Gheorghe Lazăr" highchool - n.a.)[2].

During high school, which he graduated in 1903 with honors, he was awarded the "Romanian Youth" award, a prestigious pedagogical institution of that time.

He starts his University studies in Bucharest, where he attends the Faculty of Law and the Faculty of Letters and Philosophy. Here he receives the influence, decisive for his scientific orientation, of Titu Maiorescu, a jurist and philosopher himself.

In 1909 he defends his thesis, both at the Faculty of Law and at the Faculty of Letters and Philosophy, the latter educational institution awarding him the mention "magna cum laude". Later, at Sorbonne, Mircea Djuvara gets the title of Doctor in Law with the thesis entitled Le fondement du phénomène juridique. Quelques reflections sur les principes logiques de la connaisance juridique, thesis which he publishes in 1913.

Characteristic for that age in which he begins to publish his studies, are collaborations in the "Facts" section of "Literary Conversations" where he makes himself known through his high level of knowledge, giving preference to the signaling of the interdisciplinary phenomena, revealing the unity of the universe, by the skill, even then, in the nuanced presentation of moral and social problems, with the desire to become a homo universale[3].

In 1920, he started his university career at the Faculty of Law of the University of Bucharest, where he gradually obtained all degrees and where he would carry out most of his teaching activity. He was also a professor at The Hague International Law Academy and lectured as an associate professor at law schools in Rome, Paris, Vienna and Marburg.

His scientific work materialized - including chronographs, reviews, lectures, conferences and interventions - in over 500 titles, of which, apart from his PhD thesis, we take into account the most important: Teoria generală a dreptului (Enciclopedia juridică) (The General Theory of Law (Legal Encyclopedia)), 1930; Drept raţional, izvoare şi drept pozitiv (Rationally, Sources and Positive Law), 1934; Dialectique et experience juridique, 1939, Le fondement de l'ordre juridique positif en droit international, 1939; Precis de filosofie juridical (Tezele fundamentale ale unei filosofii juridice) (Précis of legal philosophy (The Fundamental Theses of a Legal Philosophy)), 1941; Contribuţiile la teoria cunoaşterii juridice/Spiritul filosofiei kantiene şi cunoaşterea juridică (Contributions to Theory of Legal Knowledge / Spirit of Kantian Philosophy and Legal Knowledge), 1942. The entirety of this scientific work was to culminate in a published Legal Philosophy Treaty, practically outlined, at least in part, in three of the aforementioned works: the 1913 thesis, the 1930 printed course and the "Précis" started in 1941.

Along with these basic works, Djuvara's scientific research consisted of numerous studies and works of theory and philosophy of law. As early as 1907, he began publishing articles and philosophical studies in the magazine" Convorbiri literare", then in other magazines and periodicals as well, such as: „ Democraţia" (1919-1932)," Dreptul" (1920-1935), " Revista de filosofie" (1924-1940)," Pandectele române" (1923-1942), " Rivista internationale di filosofia del diritto „(Roma, 1931-1936)," Revue internationale de la théorie du Droit" (1931-1939)," Archives de philo- sophie du droit et de Sociologie juridique"(Paris, 1937)," Annuaire de l'Institut international de philosophie du droit et de sociologie juridique" (1934-1938), „Analele Facultăţii de Drept din Bucureşti"(1938-1942), „Revista cursurilor şi conferenţiarilor (universitare)"," Revue roumaine de Droit privé", „Forme"," Buletinul Academiei de Ştiinţe Morale şi Politice", „Cercetări juridice", as well as in the newspaper" Universul" .

Regarding Mircea Djuvara's entire work, it can be appreciated that it is a broad analysis, in which are included elements of general philosophy or juridical philosophy as well as elements of the theory of law or sociology of law. The great project of Mircea Djuvara, which identifies solid foundations for the entire legal research, is based on a complex series of epistemological and axiological researches, which induce a certain pre-eminence of the philosophical analysis in relation to the whole work. Moreover - as

[1] Above all, Mircea Djuvara, who through the vastness and depth of his attempts must be recognized not only as the greatest Romanian thinker but also one of the greatest contemporary thinkers in the field of Philosophy of Law." (Giorgio del Vecchio, Lecţii de filosofie juridica(Lessons in the phylosophy of Law), Europa Nova Publishing House, f.a.)

[2] M. Djuvara, Confessions of a former student (*Confesiuni ale unui elev de altădată,)*in the "Gheorghe Lazar" High School Monograph in Bucharest, (1860-1935), on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of its foundation, Bucharest, Inst. a.g. Luceafărul, 1935, p. 299 and 301.

[3] B.B. Berceanu, *Universul juristului Mircea Djuvara (The Universe of Lawyer Mircea Djuvara), Academiei Române Publishing House, Bucharest,1995., p. 26.

Nicolae Bagdasar claims - from the investigation of juridical phenomena, Mircea Djuvara always wants to exceed the limits imposed by the strictly determined thematic framework of legal philosophy in order to relate to the much broader horizon of general philosophy: "What characterizes Djuvara's philosophical attitude in general ... is that by examining issues of philosophy of law, he is convinced that they cannot be untied without an overall, epistemological and philosophical conception.. For, according to Djuvara's conception, the problems of the philosophy of law are not isolated from the great philosophical problems, but they are closely related to them, the philosophy of law integrating organically with general philosophy"[4].

Most philosophical concerns of Mircea Djuvara aimed at identifying the ontological and epistemological foundations of law. When inventing the various elements of legal reality, the Romanian philosopher transposes legal analysis in the field of juridical logic, and when the structure of legal appreciation and implicitly the system of juridical values is investigated, research is transposed into the horizon of legal epistemology.

In addition to his scientific and publishing activities, Mircea Djuvara was directly involved in the work of highly reputable scientific institutions and organizations. He was an active member of major institutions: The Association for the Study and Social Reform (later became the Romanian Social Institute on February 13, 1921), the Society for Philosophical Studies (the Romanian Society of Philosophy), the Institute of Administrative Sciences, the Romanian Academy (Correspondent member elected in the Historical Section on May 23, 1936, following the proposal of Andrei Rădulescu, until then the only representative of the law science in that institution), The Institute of Moral and Political Science (which became, on November 20, 1940, the Academy of Moral and Political Science), the International Institute of Philosophy of Law and Legal Sociology in Paris (at whose congress he participated, being also one of its seven vice-presidents and the president of the Romanian Institute of Philosophy of Law, founded by him and affiliated with the previous one),The Academy of Sciences of Boston (Honorary Member), the Society for Legislative Studies (from its establishment until July 1921) and the Romanian Legal Chamber (from its establishment until February 1942, as Vice-President, at whose private international law session he attended)[5].

As a teacher, Mircea Djuvara has been a lecturer since 1920, an aggregate professor since 1931 (August 10) and a permanent professor (June 1, 1932) at the Faculty of Law in Bucharest. As a professor, he held the chair of General Theory of Law with Application to Public Law, a chair transformed on November 1, 1938 into the Department of Encyclopedia and Philosophy of Law. He held, up until the last academic year (1943/1944), lectures on the philosophy of law, and until tenure, lectures of constitutional law as well.

Djuvara also had an important activity as a lawyer in the Ilfov Bar.

„Those who have known him - colleagues of scientific research, chair or bar, organizers or auditors of conference cycles, students - emphasize his vocation as a researcher and teacher, his culture and intelligence, oratory elegance, urbanity and courtesy in disputes, his sense of justice, character and power of work, his modesty, charm, fine humor".

Mircea Djuvara was a legal advisor to the Permanent Delegation of Romania at the Paris Peace Conference (1919), during which he edited a Newsletter and published the most comprehensive legal study on Romania's participation in World War I, preceded by a history of the country, unfortunately, only in French.

After the war, Mircea Djuvara was aware of the importance and problems of the Great Union ("We live in our country in such great times that it would seem that we cannot in any way ascend to their meaning [...] our intellectuals - especially ours - must come to understand, those who have the mission of thinking and not action, that their role today is not in criticizing what is being attempted, but in helping what is being done").

Mircea Djuvara brought legal arguments against the local autonomy tendencies, contrary to the decision of the Great National Assembly in Alba Iulia (December 1, 1918), and stressed the necessity of legislative unification, recalling, after J.E.M. Portalis, that "People who depend on the same sovereignty, without being subject to the same laws, are necessarily strangers to each other"[6] and, aware of the weight of developing massive codes, proposed urgent partial changes.

Mircea Djuvara was a delegate of Romania at the General Assembly of the League of Nations and other international conferences, being also Vice-President of the International Union for the League of Nations and Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Romanian Association for the League of Nations. He was minister from August 29, 1936 to March 31, 1937 (but with the portfolio of Justice only until February 23, unable to stand in the defense of legality to the Carlist junctions). He was the only Minister of Justice - to give a single example of respect for the lawfulness - under which the positions of the State Attorney, a post of that time, was given through n examination, in accordance to a law not respected by those who had promoted[7] it; He has politically militated for barring the fascist ascension[8].

[4] N. Bagdasar, Istoria filosofiei româneşti (The History of Romanian Philosophy), Tipo Moldova Publishing House ,Iaşi,1995, p. 387.

[5] B.B. Berceanu, op. cit., p. 27-28, which cites the Romanian Academy, "Anale", 56, 1935-1936, p.128, "Cercetări juridice", 2, no. 2, 1942, p. 121 and "Curierul Judiciar", 28, 1921, pp. 407-408.c

[6] M. Djuvara, Intelectualii şi necesitatea noii constituţiuni, in the magazine "Revista vremii", 2, no. 24, 10th Dec. 1922, p. 1-2

The dictatorships established under the pressure of Nazi fascism were, for Mircea Djuvara as well, a difficult challenge. He followed his way, continuing to promote, under the new circumstances, the values he believed in. Thus, in 1941, the opposes to the Nazi ideology, the subject of the Romanian Nation as a principle of our law[9] a*nd combats that "nationalism ... which, instead of remaining the representative of one of the holiest sentiments, of justice, foreign subjects to an unfair regime without any legitimate reason or which counts other nations as devoid of any rights"*[10].

He keeps alive the idea of freedom in Nazi Germany - in Berlin, Vienna, and Marburg - and still defends the Romanian view of the nation, underlining the difference between it and the German-Italian conceptions (more precisely the idea of Volksgemeinschaft of the German National Socialists and the Fascist Italian Conception, Which, in relation to the nation-state report, claims that the state creates the nation and not the other way around).

Mircea Djuvara, at the same time, adds that "in international law we cannot also admit the violation of national rights, and we also acknowledge here a supreme justice that is not based on either security or interests", That we tend "to a community of nations as a beginning of a new universal age", that the struggle of every nation throughout history must be carried out "with all sacrifice" but only "for justice, defending itself and rounding itself where Their essential rights are disregarded[11]",An attitude that is a true condemnation of the invasion war of the Third Reich and its general policy[12]. It had previously fought the idea of Grozraum ("great space"), later became the Lebensraum ("vital space"): "It is beyond any doubt that any state, even a small state, possesses spheres of interest that often extend very far, in <large spaces>, because of international solidarity"; but such interests intertwine and their existence "does not imply any right of tutelage or international domination for one another". In no way, therefore, "can there legally exist Great Powers, be they global or European, destined to govern the Little Powers"[13].

He also criticized the Nazi doctrine, which reduces the right to physical and biological phenomena. And still during full Nazi eruption, he dedicates a work to Professor Frantisek Weyr of the occupied Czech Republic, the only time he dedicated a work to a person (except for participation in collective homage). At the death of Henri Bergson (1940), Djuvara published a warm obituary and, from the chair, emphasized the greatness of the one who neglected his life because he understood not to use the regime of favor in relation to the one that was imposed on his Jewish countrymen by the Nazi occupation (whose responsibility for the premature death of the French philosopher was thus underlined)[14].

Also in this last period of life, Mircea Djuvara wanted to inform and warn the Romanian reader about the content of some writings by the Nazi lawyers, emphasizing their removal from the science of law, signaling their misgivings and removing the ambiguity, underlining their lack of scientific quality and Legal, ironizing and defending the idea of law.

Concerning the domestic law, in which the constitutional regime was suspended (1940-1944), Mircea Djuvara observes that such a regime presupposes the existence of principles over which an abusive lawmaker cannot pass; For without a wise interpretation that would lead to an objective and unyielding justice against the legislator himself, "the rule of law can easily be translated, especially to us, in the reign of whim".

In his last year of life, struggling with the illness, he seeks, accompanied and watched by his wife, to continue his courses and even suggests to students, at a time when such initiatives were unthinkable, to take a political attitude ("... and what are you waiting for?"); He organizes seminars with students at home, requests of the members of the institute that he be allowed to chair the meeting while lying on the couch. He thinks and writes until the last day of his life, dying in Bucharest - we could say symbolically - on November 7, 1944[15], at the age at which Immanuel Kant, who influenced his philosophical conception and whose life he had as a model, had just begun working on the Critique of Practical Reason[16].

Mircea Djuvara's main merit - even between 1918 and 1938 - is of having extended the creative effervescence of the time from the literary-artistic field to that of moral, legal and political disciplines. "In this circumstance - writes Prof. Paul Alexandru Georgescu - Mircea Djuvara worked as a multiplier of brightness. He extended the plenary system, integrating a doctrine of the philosophy of law developed on the basis of the

---

[7] see: Arh. St. Buc., Min. Just., Dir. Judiciară, dos. 18, 1936, vol. II, F. 468.

[8] Armand Călinescu, Memorii(Memoir), 25th Oct. 1936, Arh. ISSIP., fond XV, DOS. 65.403

[9] M. Djuvara, Naţiunea română ca principiu al dreptului nostrum (The Romanian Nation as a principle of our Law) („ The Academy of Moral and Political Science", 4th Dec. 1941), , The Academy of Moral and Political Science, Communications, 3," Buletinul", 1941/1942, p. 41-68.

[10] Idem, Precis of philosophy of law (Fundamental theses of a legal philosophy) în" The Annals of the Faculty of Law", no. 34, p. 58.

[11] Idem, Contribuţie la teoria cunoaşterii juridice/Spiritul filosofiei kantiene şi cunoaşterea juridică (Contribution to the theory of legal knowledge / Spirit of Kantian philosophy and legal knowledge), in the " Analele Facultăţii de Drept"("The Annals of the Faculty of Law"), Bucharest, 4, no.1-2, p. 67.

[12] B.B. Berceanu, op. cit. pp. 30.

[13] Carl Schmit, Völkerrechteiche Grossraumordnung mit Interventionsverbot für raumfrem, Deutscher Rechtsvereag Berlin-Wien, 1939, in "Analele Facultăţii de Drept Bucureşti" ("The Annals of the Bucharest Faculty of Law"), 1 no. 2-3 apr.-sep. 1939, p. 382-384

[14] B.B. Berceanu, op. cit., p. 31.

[15] He was incinerated at the "Cenuşa" crematorium on the 9th of November 1944, at 12^{00}.

[16] B.B. Berceanu, op. cit., p. 31.

Kantian concept, but with direct and fertile applications in our country"[17].

The state of philosophy of law in 1936 was simple: neo-kantianism was the dominant center, challenged only by extremes: Marxism and totalitarian nationalism. The differences between these positions being radical and the exacerbated adversities they did not pose the problem of synthesis or integration.

Djuvara's philosophy in the history of doctrines of law philosophy was the third stage of development that brought about the solving of the millenary confrontation between fact and normality, between the world of Sein ("what is") and Sollen ("what is needed"). After the metaphysical postulation of a natural right with the pretense of being eternal and immutable, occupying antiquity, the Middle Ages, the Renaissance and extending with the rational right of the century of Enlightenment, following the unrealistic reaction of the Historical School and the legal positivism which, with the help of sociology, denied values and subdued the right to the brutal facts — interest or force — the critical idealism, supported by Mircea Djuvara, alongside and often beyond prestigious neo-kantians like Stammler and Radbruch, appears as a final solution, as a superior synthesis of the previous thesis and antithesis[18].

Djuvara allies and dialectically articulates the two major components of the legal phenomenon: the rational irradiation of the idea of justice, conceived as an open consistency of logically constrained activities and wills and the concrete social realities that justice and the legal norms inspired by it assume and to whom they apply. In this vision, the State becomes a reporting and attribution center, and the legal experience a network of assessments containing increasing doses of justice, within a legal order that gains a somewhat mathematical structure; This consisted of a continuous series, consisting of acts and act-generated situations, both legally built[19].

In any encyclopedic dictionary, Mircea Djuvara appears as a neo-kantian thinker, a neo-kantian "logico-methodologist (Marburg School), also receiving echoes from the Baden School of Values, but closer to Kant than the two neo-kantian schools ", the result of direct research and self-reflection. Djuvara himself did not conceal his point of departure: "We have started our scientific, legal and philosophical studies in the University, with the premise conviction that empiricism, sensualism and utilitarianism are the truth: strict positivism was our only method. A lesson by Titu Maiorescu about Kant's <transcendental aesthetics> was a true revelation to us and changed our perspective all at once.

Since then, we have continually gone into this new direction: we have sought to deepen the spirit of Kant's philosophy, further enlightening his criticism, detaching from him what remains alive today, and completing it with new scientific and philosophical contributions[20] "His own conception was presented as "a new return to Kant," a Kant "transformed by Fichte and Hegel and adapted to the contemporary scientific themes"2[21].

For Mircea Djuvara, Immanuel Kant was, if not the "deepest thinker that mankind had"[22], he was anyway "the one who, after Plato, was perhaps the greatest philosopher of all time,"[23] who opened Before us an "imperial path", which gave "the only philosophy of the ideal that can be coherent", i.e. a logical idealism contrary to the psychological one, a concept in which <empirical realism> is solved in a "transcendental idealism"; Which put the "theoretical basis of contemporary science and culture"[24]; The one whose philosophy "fits, explains and legitimizes all the advances of contemporary science"[25]; The one to begin with in order to reach W. Wilson's principles of the Peace of 1919, as well as the socialist theories of the era[26].

What is certain is that Mircea Djuvara has treated Kant's work and less that of neo-kantians[27]; Alongside Kant, Djuvara distinguished between knowledge and reality, while emphasizing the connection between them ("between knowledge and its object cannot be an abyss")[28]; Along with Kant he attested to the existence of values, mainly of the ethical idea, first of all of the right-obligation, being at the antipode of positivism and, to the extent that it encompasses it, at the antipod of psychological and intuitionistic trends.

Mircea Djuvara accepted the Kantian distinction between numen and phenomenon. But Kant's assimilation of the former with an incomprehensible "thing in itself", parallel to the relativization of the value of experiential knowledge ("for Kant, experience

[17] P.A. Georgescu, in the Preface to the work of B.B. Berceanu, Universul juristului Mircea Djuvara (The Universe of the Lawyer Mircea Djuvara), op.cit., pp. 13.
[18] Ibidem, pp. 14.
[19] Ibidem.
[20] M. Djuvara, Precis.....op.cit., p. 5-6.
[21] Idem, Contribuţie la teoria cunoşterii juridice (Contributions to the theory of legal knowledge), II. Ideea de justiţie şi cunoaştere juridică (the idea of justice and legal knowledge), op.cit., p. 63.
[22] Idem, Teoria generală a dreptului (Enciclopedia juridică) (general Theory of Law, Legal Encyclopedia), II: Noţiuni preliminare despre drept (Preliminary Notions of law), Bucharest, Librăriei Socec Publishing House, 1930, p. 44.
[23] Idem, Contribuţie la teoria cunoşterii juridice (Contribution to the Theory of Legal Knowledge),I: Ceva despre Kant: Spiritul filosofiei lui (About Kant: the Spirit of his Philosophy), p. 3.
[24] Idem, Teoria general . (General Theory…) III: Realităţile juridice (Legal Realities), p. 158.
[25] Idem, Contribuţie I:Ceva despre Kant, p. 4.
[26] Idem, Teoria general I: Introducere, p. 28, II: Noţiuni preliminare despre drept (preliminary Notions of Law), p. 77-78.
[27] For more, please see Alexandru Boboc, Kant şi neo-kantianismul (kant and Neo-kantianism), Bcharest, Ştiinţifică Publishing House, 1968.
[28] M. Djuvara, Dialectique et expérience juridique, in "Revista de Filosofie" no. 2 (April-June) /1938.

is a combined product of the work itself and of thought"[29)], a thesis considered having the quality of rejecting an absolute idealism (and also an absolute realism) did not prevent Mircea Djuvara from condemning it (“"It is bizarre to see the reason that he reaches a conclusion of his reflection on himself, to his own helplessness"; "a reality in itself, incognoscible, has no significance”[30]); Or to bring <this thing in itself> into the sphere of thought, for "nothing is given, everything is built; And even to consider that it is "a rational formula, which, in its entirety, gives objectivity to knowledge". Still, between the obligatory and the incomprehensible <thing in itself> there is no, as it had been interpreted, the cause of the phenomenon (which can only be a phenomenon as well), but as M. Djuvara interpreted in time - <the act of knowledge>, "If we look at him in his logical nature, in his rational, inherent and necessary tendency towards truth," he is apart from time and space, he will become an object of psychological knowledge, a phenomenon.

Kant and Djuvara's eternal intangible ideal is more than a nuance[31].

"The activity of knowledge gives itself, in accordance with the internal logical necessity which constitutes its law, its own object"[32] For knowledge and its object are correlative, and one cannot think without the other (Aristotelian thought that thinks of oneself).

In another hypostasis, the "thing itself" is, "in a good interpretation of Kant," the freedom.

Concurrently, therefore, Mircea Djuvara defended Kant and at the same time opposed him, the danger in his system was removed, that which stated that the minds oppose themselves, as ourselves - in our aspiration for truth - to hinder ourselves[33].

The characteristics of Djuvara's thinking, which divide both Kant and Comte, consist also in the dual approach to the object of his thought, his conception of the double epistemological approach. It is not just the inductive approach, starting from the individual to the general, attributed to science and the deductive, attributed to philosophy, the expression of two methods compensating each other, but also the psychological and logical approach, the empirical and the transcendental approach, of the development of knowledge and a priori principles.

Thus, Djuvara's philosophical thinking was influenced by his legal knowledge; The idea of a relationship, specific to law, is fully present in its general philosophy.

Djuvara's pro-Kant philosophical attitude did not prevent the former from appreciating the founder of positivism A. Comte and, in general, the French positivists[34], to appreciate institutionalism[35], pragmatism[36] and other trends of thought, and to retain from these thinkers and these trends of thinking to aid in setting up his system, valuable elements[37].

If the history of Romanian law has benefited from broad-minded personalities, with a penetrating legal sense — such as Mihai Eminescu and Nicolae Iorga — if he guided people of legal formation either to the science of history — as BPHasdeu— to the thought of the science of history — As ADXenopol — or directly to the building of history — as Mihail Kogălniceanu — or to generalization and synthesis — like Simion Bărnuţiu, Titu Maiorescu and Dumitru Drăghicescu — we can say that no one up to Mircea Djuvara brought the legal phenomenon under the eyes of the philosophers and no one offered practitioners such a wide horizon, a horizon they considered necessary: "The philosophy of law is one of the indispensable elements of a true culture" [38], he said, addressing both philosophers and lawyers[39].

Mircea Djuvara felt the need to draw attention to the fact that "most lawyers are content to make simple compilations for legal practice or, in public law, they think they are doing science through simple acts of obedience to authority"[40]; But "only the scientific understanding of the idea of justice and rational elaboration can ensure a strong affirmation of cultural legal values, in light of which we must guide the world that is meant to create and apply our positive right", a goal analyzed by the philosophy of law [41]. He devises for this this law "a profound and original analysis" in a work that he — at one point — divided it into four parts: I - philosophy, II - the philosophy of law, III - applications of the philosophy of law, IV - politics. The philosophy of law thus makes the connection between philosophy and positive law, and politics, in the same conception, studies the means of achieving the law. The philosophy of law is a part — a necessary part — of

---

[29] Ibidem, p. 7.

[30] M. Djuvara, Considerations sur la connaissance en géneral et sur la connaissance juridi-que en particulier: la Realite, la Verite et le Droit, in “Annuaire de l’Inst’’ 2, 1935/1936, Paris, Libr. Du Recueil Sirey, 1936, p.83-96”.

[31] B.B. Berceanu, op.cit., p. 38.

[32] M. Djuvara, Contribuţie la teoria, p. 17.

[33] B.B.Berceanu, op. cit., p.39.

[34] Constitutional Law, Part II, Ph.D. and Ph.D. [The Methods of French Positivism in Public Law]1924-1925

[35] Idem, Some observations on the relationship between the philosophy of intuition and today's great tendencies of law, a fragment of the conference "Henri Bergson and the Modern Trends in Law", Universitatea liberă, 22 November 1922, in “Convorbiri literare”, 55, 1923, p. 378-389.

[36] Idem, New trends in philosophy: pragmatism, în “Convorbiri literare*”,* p. 43, 1909, p. 765-775.

[37] B.B. Berceanu, op. cit., p.37.

[38] M. Djuvara, Precis …., nr. 2, p. 6

[39] B.B. Berceanu, op. cit., p. 34 şi urm.

[40] M. DjuvaraReview of Romul Boila's work: The State, vol I:” Consideraţii teoretice”(Theoretical Considerations),(Tipografia Cartea Românească Publishing House, Cluj, p. 246), în “Analele Facultăţii de Drept Bucureşti”, 3, no. 1-2, Jan-Jun 1941, p. 486-489 1018 philosophy, the goal of which is to bring the whole Truth (the right itself has a rational character) and to guide the positive right.

[41] M. Djuvara, Filosofia dreptului şi învăţământului nostru juridic- fragment dintr-un memoriu (The philosophy of law and our legal education - fragment from a memoir), in “Pandectele române” 21, 1942, IV, p.7.

Mircea Djuvara's thinking can be described as dialectical idealism. It is not a subjective idealism, which is rejected by the following: "It is impossible to firmly support idealism in the form of the unique and exclusive existence of my own self, in which the world would only be a representation in the sense of a subjective image. My conscience is, quite contrary to itself, a product of relationships that necessarily and objectively, through their creative dialectics, put forth a plurality of consciousness." But, obviously, an idealism whose epistemological way requires the experience, a conception in which — after C. Rădulescu-Motru's formulation — matter and spirit are confused, forming two simple aspects of the experience[42], whose ontological result "reduces everything to objective relationships "[43].

Mircea Djuvara is a strict rationalist[44]. It is a danger to believe — he says — "that our lives can work without categories"[45]; His confidence in the possibilities of knowing reason is total: Cogito ergo realia sunt, he will say at some point. According to Mircea Djuvara, there is no human consciousness without its own philosophy, the practical attitude towards life, an inherent attitude for each one, which "determines, of course, in any consciousness with reason, a certain philosophical consciousness".[46] It reduces to rational data all other human values. Djuvara believes that reason, detached from subjectivity, predominates in every human being. The very Law — the expression of social relations — has a predominantly rational character, for, according to Djuvara, as attitude towards life determines in a certain human conscience a certain philosophical consciousness, as the attitude towards society determines a certain legal consciousness[47]. Mircea Djuvara's logical idealism did not stop at the possibilities of logic: ".... The whole knowledge, and hence the whole human action, is the product of a sui generis creative activity, the so-called dialectic, this activity proceeds in successive and unceasing differentiations, and the systematic ordering of its products leads to the idea of truth [48]".

References

- Nicolae Bagdasar, Istoria filosofiei româneşti (The History of Romanian Philosophy), Profile Publishing, Bucharest, 2003
- Mihai Bădescu, Filosofia dreptului în România interbelică (Law Philosophy in Interwar Romania), Sitech Publishing House, Craiova, 2015
- Barbu B. Berceanu, Universul juristului Mircea Djuvara (The Universe of the Lawyer Mircea Djuvara), Academiei Române Publishing House, Bucharest, 1995
- Alexandru Boboc, Kant şi neokantianismului (Kant and Neo-kantianism), Stiinţifică Publishign House, Bucharest, 1968
- Mircea Djuvara, Precis de filosofie juridică (Tezele fundamentale ale unei filosofii juridice) (Precis of legal philosophy (the fundamental theses of a legal philosophy)), in „The Annals of the Faculty of Law", no. 34
- Mircea Djuvara, Dialectique et experience juridique, in the „Philosophy magazine" no.2/1938
- Mircea Djuvara, Problema fundamentală a dreptului (The Fundamental Problem of Law), in "Convorbiri Literare" („Literary Conversations"), 50, 1916
- Ion Dogaru, Dan Claudiu Dănişor, Gheorghe Dănişor, Teoria generală a dreptului (General Theory of Law), C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2006
- Eugeniu Speranţia, Locul vieţii psihice în construcţiunea unei biologii generale(The Place of the Mental Life in the Construction of a general Biology), in the „Philosophy magazine", 1934
- Eugeniu Speranţia, Legile şi formele gândirii ca proecţiuni ale proprietăţilor vieţii (The laws and the Forms of thought as Projections of the Properties of Life), in the „Philosophy magazine", 1934
- Eugeniu Speranţia, Principii fundamentale de filosofie juridică (Fundamental Principles of Philosophy of Law), Institutul de Arte Grafice Publishing House, Ardealul, Cluj, 1936
- Eugeniu Speranţia, Lecţiuni de enciclopedie juridică, Cartea Românească Publishing House, Cluj, 1936.

[42] M. Djuvara, Dialectique et expérience juridique, in" Revista de filosofie*"* no. 23, 1938, p. 21.

[43] N. Bagdasar, Mircea Djuvara in "Istoria filosofiei moderne", vol. V, Bucureşti, Societatea Română de Filosofie, 1941, p. 310.

[44] B.B. Berceanu, op. cit., p. 35.

[45] M. Djuvara, review of the work of Mircea Gorunescu: Reinhard Höhn şi disputa în jurul personalităţii juridice a Statului (Reinhard Höhn and the dispute over the legal personality of the State,), in "Cercetări Juridice", year I, no. 2, April 1941, p. 491.

[46] Idem, Câteva reflexiuni asupra laturei filosofice a sufletului reginei Elisabeta (Some reflections on the philosophical side of Queen Elisabeth's soul), in "Convorbiri literare", 50, 1916, p. 361.

[47] M. Djuvara, Dialectica creatoare a cunoaşterii juridice (The Creative Dialectics of Legal Knowledge), lecture, 1935/1936

[48] Idem, Problema fundamentală a dreptului, în "Convorbiri literare", 70, 1937, p. 2.

CONSIDERATIONS REGARDING THE CHOICE, BY THE EUROPEAN INSTITUTIONS, OF THE LEGAL BASIS OF ACTS, DURING THE LEGISLATIVE PROCEDURES OVERVIEW OF THE CASE LAW OF THE COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN UNION

Dragoş – Adrian BANTAŞ*

Abstract

An important moment in the conduct of legislative procedures within the European Union is located right at their onset. Thus, the initiator of an act finds himself in a position to have recourse to its legal basis, since that ground depends on fundamental issues such as the competence of the European Union or its institutions to act, the applicable procedure, etc. However, in practice, this may be rather complicated. For example, depending on the categories of competence of the Union in which each field falls and depending on the desired end, the question arrises about choosing the type of act that is best suited. After that, there is the question of choosing the legal basis of the act, which can be very complicated, since, in the case of some acts, the proper legal basis may not be obvious, in which case the Court of Justice and its case law may provide further clarification. For example, in certain situations, the Union's acts may be susceptible to more than one legal basis. To further complicate the analysis, we can say that these grounds may be compatible or not. If they are not compatible, it is necessary to identify the main legal basis, and there comes the matter of how to determine it. With all these, and not only, we will deal in the present research.

Keywords: European Union, Commission, Parliament, Council, procedure, legislative proposal, legal basis.

1. Introductory considerations.

As the reader knows very well, the action of the European Union in its areas of competence involves, mainly, the adoption of acts, some of which being endowed with binding force and the others not being of this nature. Among the acts endowed with binding force, some are adopted through a legislative procedure, thus becoming legislative acts[1].

In the following, we will focus on choosing the legal basis for their adoption, using, in support of our research, the information provided by the European Union's legislation (mainly primary), the jurisprudence of the Court of Justice of the European Union (henceforth referred to as CJEU) and the doctrine of specialty.

2. Legislative procedures in the European Union. General presentation.

Since, in our presentation, we intend to limit ourselves to the legislative acts of the European Union, we will present, for the begining, some general aspects on their adoption.

Thus, the article 289 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (hereinafter, TFEU) divides the legislative procedures in two categories – the ordinary legislative procedure and the special legislative procedures.

Regarding the ordinary legislative procedure, this, the same article states, "consists in the joint adoption by the European Parliament and the Council of a regulation, directive or decision on a proposal from the Commission[2]."

The successor of the former co-decision procedure, instituted by the Maastricht Treaty, the ordinary legislative procedure is, we could say, one of the most important elements of deepening the European integration and a reference in comparing the Union with a becoming federation.

We say this because, through the specificity of this procedure, the Union fundamentally differs from the classical international organizations in which the most important acts are adopted by a plenary body composed of the representatives of the member states and where each of them generally enjoys a veto right, while, within the mentioned procedure, the acts are adopted by a representative institution of the Member States (the Council), with a qualified majority, and by the institution representing the citizens of the Union, aspects closer to the notion of federation than to that of classical international organizations.

These seem to us, even more valid as the ordinary legislative procedure is used, according to the doctrine of specialty, in most of the situations of adoption of the Union's acts[3], this quantitative dimension

* PhD. Student, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (e-mail: adrian.bantas@gmail.com.)

[1] Art. 289 (3) of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union stipulates the following: "The legal acts adopted by legislative procedure shall constitute legislative acts."

[2] Art. 289 (1) TFEU.

[3] Sean Van Raepenbusch, Institutional law of the European Union, Rosetti publishing house, Bucharest, 2014, p. 233, apud Augustin Fuerea, The Legislative of the European Union - between unicameralism and bicameralism, in the journal Dreptul, no. 7/2017, p.187-200.

complementing the qualitative dimension referred to above.

Apart from the ordinary legislative procedure, as mentioned earlier, the art. 289 TFEU also stipulates the existence of the special legislative procedures.

Therefore, according to the TFEU, "the adoption of a regulation, directive or decision, by the European Parliament with the participation of the Council or by the Council with the participation of the European Parliament constitutes a special legislative procedure[4]."

Of course, the special procedures are not listed or described in that article, for each one's identification, it being necessary to go through those articles that refer to their use and which also provide the description of each procedure used.

Regarding the content of the special legislative procedure, art. 289 TFEU makes reference to the art. 294, which details the concrete aspects on its development (Appendix 1).

However, the dilemma that may arise in this context is related to the choice of the appropriate legal basis for each act, which is the subject of the next section.

To the elucidation of it, the case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union helps us. This, summaring its prerogatives provided by the Treaties, which the reader knows too well, "unitarily interprets EU treaties and legal acts" and "controls the legality of the EU's legal acts[5]".

In addition, the appeal to the Court of Justice's case-law appears to be natural in the present case. In an opinion expressed in the literature of specialty, "the Community system, as defined by TCEE in 1957, had important gaps. (...) Moreover, many of the fundamental provisions of the Treaty were drafted in unavoidable general and abstract terms (eg., the measures with an effect equivalent to the quantitative restrictions), which had to be specified[6]".

However, before analyzing the jurisprudence, we will take a look at the Union's categories of competences and the types of acts that the institutions can adopt in various situations. This is because, in the first phase, the institutions can find themselves in a situation to choose of a certain type of act, out of the available ones, and only then they have to choose the exact legal basis.

Thus, in accordance with art. Article 1 (1) of the Treaty on European Union, „by this Treaty, the High Contracting Parties establish among themselves a European Union (...), on which the Member States confer competences to attain objectives they have in common."[7]

Article 4 of the same treaty completes the division of competences by stating that „competences not conferred upon the Union in the Treaties remain with the Member States[8]"

The same article also enshrines the existence of the principle of sincere cooperation, through the regulation according to which „the Union and the Member States shall, in full mutual respect, assist each other in carrying out tasks which flow from the Treaties[9]."

The competences of the European Union are exercised, however, in accordance with a set of principles. According to Article 5 of the Treaty on European Union, these are the principle of conferral, the principle of subsidiarity and the principle of proportionality[10]. As regards the categories of competences of the Union, they are listed in Articles 3 to 6 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union.

Article 3 of the said Treaty specifies the areas in which the Union's competence is exclusive as follows: „customs union; the establishing of the competition rules necessary for the functioning of the internal market; monetary policy for the Member States whose currency is the euro; the conservation of marine

[4] Art. 289 (1) TFEU.

[5] Augustina Dumitrașcu, Roxana-Mariana Popescu, European Union Law - Syntheses and applications, 2nd edition, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2015, p. 83.

[6] Augustina Dumitrașcu, The role of the jurisprudence of the Court of Justice of the European Communities in the configuration of the community legal order, in the journal "Analele Universității din București – seria Drept", no. III-IV/08, p. 82-95.

[7] The Treaty on European Union, published in the Official Journal of the European Union, C 326/13, 26.10.2012.

[8] Idem, art. 4.

[9] Idem.

[10] Article 5 (ex Article 5 TEC):

1. The limits of Union competences are governed by the principle of conferral. The use of Union competences is governed by the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality.

2. Under the principle of conferral, the Union shall act only within the limits of the competences conferred upon it by the Member States in the Treaties to attain the objectives set out therein. Competences not conferred upon the Union in the Treaties remain with the Member States.

3. Under the principle of subsidiarity, in areas which do not fall within its exclusive competence, the Union shall act only if and in so far as the objectives of the proposed action cannot be sufficiently achieved by the Member States, either at central level or at regional and local level, but can rather, by reason of the scale or effects of the proposed action, be better achieved at Union level.

The institutions of the Union shall apply the principle of subsidiarity as laid down in the Protocol on the application of the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality. National Parliaments ensure compliance with the principle of subsidiarity in accordance with the procedure set out in that Protocol.

4. Under the principle of proportionality, the content and form of Union action shall not exceed what is necessary to achieve the objectives of the Treaties.

The institutions of the Union shall apply the principle of proportionality as laid down in the Protocol on the application of the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality.

biological resources under the common fisheries policy;common commercial policy[11].”

The competence of the Union is shared in a number of areas listed exemplified in Article 4 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union as follows: „internal market; social policy, for the aspects defined in this Treaty; economic, social and territorial cohesion; agriculture and fisheries, excluding the conservation of marine biological resources; environment; consumer protection; transport; trans-European networks; energy; area of freedom, security and justice; common safety concerns in public health matters, for the aspects defined in this Treaty[12].”

To these are added those areas not listed in Articles 3 and 6, but in which the Treaties confer on the Union the competence to act.

A number of areas where the exercise of Union competences is subject to a particular regime enshrined in paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 4 TFEU. Accordingly, „in the areas of research, technological development and space, the Union shall have competence to carry out activities, in particular to define and implement programmes; however, the exercise of that competence shall not result in Member States being prevented from exercising theirs”[13], while „in the areas of development cooperation and humanitarian aid, the Union shall have competence to carry out activities and conduct a common policy; however, the exercise of that competence shall not result in Member States being prevented from exercising theirs[14].”

Article 5 TFEU refers to a series of competences that we can call "coordination competences[15]."

The last category of competences, support, coordination or complement is described in Article 6 TFEU, covering the following areas: „protection and improvement of human health; industry; culture; tourism; education, vocational training, youth and sport; civil protection; administrative cooperation[16].”

As regards the proper way of exercising a competent authority, it is governed by Article 2 TFEU. He mentions that, „when the Treaties confer on the Union exclusive competence in a specific area, only the Union may legislate and adopt legally binding acts, the Member States being able to do so themselves only if so empowered by the Union or for the implementation of Union acts.”[17] As for the shared competences, „when the Treaties confer on the Union a competence shared with the Member States in a specific area, the Union and the Member States may legislate and adopt legally binding acts in that area. The Member States shall exercise their competence to the extent that the Union has not exercised its competence. The Member States shall again exercise their competence to the extent that the Union has decided to cease exercising its competence[18].”

The Union also has the competence to coordinate the economic and employment policies, as well as to support, coordinate and complement the actions of the Member States, with the mention that in the case of the latter, the competence of States in the areas listed in Article 6 is not replaced by that of the Union and the harmonization of the laws and regulations of the Member States is expressly excluded by the same provisions of the TFEU.

Moreover, „the scope of and arrangements for exercising the Union's competences shall be determined by the provisions of the Treaties relating to each area[19].”

However. all of these provisions could not materialize in the absence of certain acts to transpose them into practice. Their legal basis is mainly found in the provisions of Article 288 TFEU.

This article states that the Union can adopt, in the exercise of it’s competences, „regulations, directives, decisions, recommendations and opinions[20].” Detailing the mentioned provisions, article 288 states that „the regulation shall have general application [and] shall be binding in its entirety and directly applicable in all Member States”, while „a directive shall be binding, as to the result to be achieved, upon each Member State to which it is addressed, but shall leave to the national authorities the choice of form and methods.” Moreover, the „decision shall be binding in its entirety [and] a decision which specifies those to whom it is addressed shall be binding only on them”. Meanwhile, the „recommendations and opinions shall have no binding force[21].”

Corroborating the provisions presented in this section, we come to the conclusion, also underlined in the specialized doctrine, that the degree of harmonization through EU legislation, allowed by the Treaties, is maximal in the case of exclusive competences and then decreases, progressively, in the case of shared competences, then of the co-ordination, ultimately reaching a minimum level in the case of [11] Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu, accesed 14.01.2018.

[12] Idem, art. 4.
[13] idem, alin. (3).
[14] Idem, alin. (4).
[15] Article 5 TFEU states as follows: 1. The Member States shall coordinate their economic policies within the Union. To this end, the Council shall adopt measures, in particular broad guidelines for these policies. Specific provisions shall apply to those Member States whose currency is the euro. 2. The Union shall take measures to ensure coordination of the employment policies of the Member States, in particular by defining guidelines for these policies. 3. The Union may take initiatives to ensure coordination of Member States' social policies.
[16] Idem, art. 6.
[17] TFEU, art.2.
[18] Idem.
[19] Idem.
[20] Idem, art. 288.
[21] Idem.

complementary competences (supporting, coordinating and completing the action of the Member States) [22].

Therefore, in the situations where the type of act that can be adopted in a given area is not expressly specified by the Treaties, the institutions will have to assess the specificity of each category of competence and each field in order to choose among the acts listed in Article 288.

For example, in the case of exclusive competencies, only the Union can adopt acts., Not leavind any place for state action, we think that the instrument used must be the regulation. In the case of shared competences, applying the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality, the institutions will have to choose between the regulation and the directive, specifying that, as far as possible, given the particularities of the purpose to be achieved, the latter will be preferred . The narrower applicability of the decision will give it a more limited sphere of application. Regarding the competencies covered by Article 6, the prohibition of harmonization will make recommendations and / or opinions preferable, but this conclusion must be corroborated with the principles of the open method of coordination.

3. Choosing the legal basis of proposals of legal acts. An overview of the Jurisprudence.

In terms of choosing the proper legal basis for the proposals of legislative acts, in our opinion, it can be raised a number of questions drawn from the difficulties encountered in practice, which can be summarized as follows: what features must present the choice of the legal basis of an act of the European Union, how will its own choice be made, what happens if a legislative act corresponds (at least apparently) to different grounds, how can we distinguish the primary legal basis from the secondary ones or what happens if the probable legal bases in a given case involve incompatible procedural issues. We will try to answer to these questions in the next paragraphs.

Thus, as regards the choice of the legal basis for the Union's acts, the case-law of the CJEU states, in one of the most representative cases in the matter, known as the "Titanium dioxide"[23], the fact that at this stage "it must be firstly taken into account, that the organization of powers at Community level supposes that the choice of the legal basis of a measure can not depend solely on an institution's conviction relating to the objective pursued, but must be based on objective factors which are susceptible to judicial control. These factors", the Court also states, "include, mainly, the purpose and the content of the measure" which is envisaged.[24] Otherwise, the Court reiterates, in this judgment, the wording used in Case 45/86, but in most subsequent judgments, it would prefer to cite the judgment from the "Titanium dioxide" case.

This wording will remain a reference to how the Court of Justice examines the issue in question, it being resumed and confirmed in the subsequent case-law.

For example, in case 155/91, the Court reiterates that "in accordance with what is already a consistent jurisprudence, in the context of the organization of the Community's powers, the choice of the legal basis of a measure must be based on objective factors, susceptible to judicial review. These factors include, in particular, the purpose and content of the measure[25]".

Furthermore, in another judgment, the Court provides further clarification, stating that "an earlier Council practice of adopting legislative measures in a given area, based on a dual legal basis, can not derogate from the rules laid down in the Treaties and can not, therefore, create a mandatory precedent for the Community institutions as regards the correct determination of the legal basis[26]."

In addition, in the Court's view, the legal basis of an act can not be determined by similarity to other acts with a similar subject-matter, but must be based on its own characteristics. In the Court's wording, "the determination of the legal basis of an act must be carried out by considering its own purpose and content, and not the legal basis for the adoption of other Union acts having similar characteristics[27]."

This conclusion is complementary and must, in our view, be seen in close connection with the wording of an earlier case, according to which, "if the Treaties contain a more precise provision which may constitute the legal basis of the measure in question, it must be based on this provision[28]."

In other words, we figure out, the legal basis for the acts is provided by the provisions of the Treaties that are closest to the purpose and content of the project. Moreover, the same wording is reiterated in case 533/03, which demonstrates the Court's consistent orientation in the matter.

---

[22] Augustina Dumitrașcu, Roxana Popescu, op.cit., p. 159.

[23] Action initiated by the Commission for the annulment of the Council Directive 89/428/EEC of 21 June 1989 on establishing procedures for the harmonization of the programs for the reduction and the eventual elimination of pollution caused by waste from the titanium dioxide industry, published in OJEC L 201, p. 56 .

[24] Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 11 June 1991 in Case C-300/89, extracted from www.eur-lex.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2017, personal translation.

[25] Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 17 March 1993 in Case C-155/91, extracted from www.eur-lex.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2017, personal translation.

[26] Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 23 February 1988 in Case 131/86, extracted from www.curia.europa.eu, personal translation.

[27] Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 20 May 2008 in Case C-91/05, extracted from www.curia.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2017, personal translation.

[28] Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 29 April 2004 in Case C-338/01, extracted from www.eur-lex.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2017, personal translation..

We also consider it useful to point out that the above aspects are confirmed in a series of additional judgments of the Court, including the judgments in cases C-338/01, C-155/07, C-43/12 or the connexed cases C-317/13 and C-679/13.

Hence, so far, analyzing the case-law of the Court of Justice, we noticed that the choice of the legal basis of an Union's act is not left to the hazard or to the issuing institutions, but must meet some objective criteria on which the Court may rule. In addition, the basis of an act must be the one or those provisions of the Treaties closest to its purpose and content, and it can not be determined by using similarity to other acts having a close content or purpose.

Until now, however, we have considered the relatively simple hypothesis in which the basis of an act can be identified with a certain precision and in the provisions on a single area of action of the Union, but we will continue to try to determine the possible solution of the situation in which an act has a multiple legal basis.

Thus, a first such situation concerns the case where a measure can be based on two legal bases, one of which departs as the principal.

In this case, the case-law of the Court states that if the examination of a Community measure reveals that it pursues a dual purpose or has a dual component, and one of which is identifiable as the main purpose (or component) the other is only incidental, the act will be based on a unique theme, namely the one given by the main purpose or component[29].

The same wording can be identified in the judgments on the cases C-211/01, C-338/01, C-94/03, C-178/03, C-155 / 07, C-43/12 and not only, the conclusions from these being in the sense of confirming what has been said before.

A more complicated situation occurs when it can not be established which basis is the main one and which is secondary or accessory. However, for this case, the Court of Justice gives some clarifications.

More specifically, in one of the cases brought to its judgment, the Court held that "exceptionally, if it is established that the act simultaneously pursues a number of inextricably linked objectives, without one of them being secondary or indirect in relation with another, such an act may be based on the various legal bases related to" its objectives[30].

The same idea is reiterated in the subsequent case-law, which states that "by way of exception, if it can be established that the measure simultaneously pursues several objectives which are inseparably linked, without one of them being secondary or indirect by reference to another, the measure must be based on the appropriate legal bases[31]."

In the same idea, exceptionally, if, on the other hand, "it is determined that an act simultaneously pursues a number of objectives or has a series of components that are inextricably linked, without one of them being secondary or indirect in relation with another, such an act will have to be based on the various appropriate grounds[32]."

This jurisprudential orientation is also confirmed in a number of more recent judgments, such as those in the cases C-178/03, C-155/07, C-43/12 etc.

However, difficulties may also arise in this case. More specifically, we can think of the situation where, given the characteristics of the case, the applicable legal bases are not compatible. And in this situation, the Court of Justice provides the main coordinates needed to find a solution.

Specifically, since the "Titanium dioxide" judgment, it has stated that "the use of a dual legal basis is excluded where the procedures provided for the two legal bases are incompatible[33]."

The conclusions from the "Titanium dioxide" judgement can be found in the subsequent jurisprudence. For example, in a judgment post-2000, the Court reiterates that "a dual legal basis is not possible where the procedures established for each ground are incompatible with each other[34]."

Further details can be found in a more recent judgment. According to it, "as the Court has already established (...), the recourse to a dual legal basis is not possible where the procedures established for each ground are incompatible with each other or where the use of the two legal bases may undermine the rights of the Parliament", as mentioned in the judgments from the cases C-164/97 and C-164/97, C-338/01 etc.[35].

In this case, the position mentioned is reiterated by the Court in subsequent judgments, of which, we specify, as an example, those in the cases C-155/07, C-43/12 or the connexed cases C-317/13 and 679 / 13.

It also seems useful to mention that the same Court has set some rules for the situation where, of two incompatible grounds, one has to be chosen. Thus,

---

[29] Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 30 January 2001 in Case C-36/98 (which refers to the Judgments in Case C-42/97), extracted from www.eur-lex.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2017, personal translation.

[30] Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 19 September 2002 in Case C-336/00, extracted from www.eur-lex.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2018, personal translation.

[31] Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 11 September 2003 in Case C-211/01, extracted from www.eur-lex.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2017, personal translation.

[32] Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 10 January 2006 in Case C-94/03, extracted from www.eur-lex.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2017, personal translation..

[33] Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 6 November 2008 in Case C-155/07, extracted from www.eur-lex.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2017.

[34] Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 29 April 2004 in Case C-338/01, extracted from www.eur-lex.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2017, personal translation.

[35] Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 10 January 2006 in Case C-94/03, extracted from www.eur-lex.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2017, personal translation.

summarizing the conclusions of the case-law, we could state that if, of two incompatible grounds, one involves a more consistent involvement of the European Parliament, and one reserves a less important place for this institution, it will be necessary to choose the basis that gives Parliament a more important role in the decision procedure.

Thus, in a relatively recent judgment, the Court stated the following: "In the present case, it should be stressed that, unlike the situation which led to the judgment for Titanium dioxide (...), the Council decides with a qualified majority both in the procedure laid in the article 179 EC and in the article 181a EC.

It is true that, under the article 179 EC, the European Parliament carries out its legislative function through the codecision procedure together with the Council, while the article 181A EC - the only legal basis used for the adoption of the contested decision - stipulates only the consultation of the European Parliament by the Council. However, the importance of the role of the European Parliament in the Community legislative process must be reminded. As the Court has already stressed, the participation of the European Parliament in this process is the reflection, at a Community level, of a fundamental democratic principle, according to which the peoples participate in the exercise of power through a representative assembly (...)[36].

We appreciate that this Court's approach supports the transition from the elitist institutions (the Council, the Commission) to the institutions that have the most democratic legitimacy (the European Parliament, the European Council), given by the existing rapprochement between the European citizen's vote and the persons who, obviously, make up these institutions (the European parliamentarians, plus the heads of state and / or of government) [37].

However, from the further analysis of that judgment, we conclude that privileging the legal bases which give a more prominent role to the European Parliament can not be done in a way that would prejudice the achievement of the purpose of the act in question.

As the Court further states, "a solution which, given the differences between the procedures known as <<co-decision>> and <<consultation>> provided in the article 179 EC and article 181A EC, would consist in privileging only the legal basis of the article 179 EC as a ground for a greater involvement of the European Parliament, would mean the non-inclusion in a specific way, in the the chosen legal basis of the economic, financial and technical cooperation with non-developing third countries. In such a case, the Council's legislative role would, in any event, be affected in the same way as it would have been affected by the use of a dual legal basis, represented by the articles 179 EC and 181A EC. On the other hand, as shown in the content of the paragraph 47 from this judgment, since the article 181A EC does not have the vocation to constitute the legal basis for some measures which pursue the objectives of the article 177 EC on the cooperation for development for the purpose of the Title XX of the Treaty, the article 179 EC can not, in principle, be the basis of the cooperation measures which do not pursue such objectives[38]."

4. Conclusions.

In conclusion, it can be noticed that the choice of the legal basis of the European Union's acts, a matter not detailed by the Treaties and apparently simple, is susceptible to numerous specific requirements and difficulties. In order to elucidate them, the Court of Justice, with numerous cases brought before it, has, over time, made a constant effort and produced a consistent set of rules, which today form an effective guideline of the subject mentioned.

These judgments mainly arise due to the concern of each applicant institution to safeguard its own prerogatives and, more broadly, its place in the Union's institutional architecture. In this respect, we positively note the energy with which the institutions defend their own role, a reality that confirms Jean Monnet's vision on their role in shaping a European identity.

Summarizing the conclusions of the analyzed jurisprudence, we can say that the choice of the legal basis of the Union's acts shall be based on objective factors and can not depend on mere whim of the issuing institutions, in order to achieve an effective judicial control of it.

Also, the institutions can not derogate from these rules by their own will and must take into account the purpose and content of those acts and not those of some acts with a similar content. The legal basis of an act must consist in that provision that matches the most its content.

In addition, in the case of the existence of several legal bases, if one of them stands as principal, it will regulate the adoption of the act, while, if one can not establish a main and a secondary theme, the act will be based on both grounds, unless they are incompatible. Moreover, the Court of Justice tends to give priority to the role of the European Parliament, given its democratic legitimacy, in the case of some alternative and incompatible legal bases, some of which granting a more important role to the Parliament and others diminishing its participation.

[36] Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 6 November 2008 in Case C-155/07, extracted from www.eur-lex.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2017.

[37] Augustin Fuerea, The Legislative of the European Union - between unicameralism and bicameralism, in the journal Dreptul, no. 7/2017, p.187-200.

[38] Ibidem.

References

- Dumitraşcu, Augustina, The role of the jurisprudence of the Court of Justice of the European Communities in the configuration of the community legal order, in the journal "Analele Universităţii din Bucureşti – seria Drept", no. III-IV/08
- Dumitraşcu, Augustina; Popescu, Roxana-Mariana, European Union Law - Syntheses and applications, 2nd edition, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2015, p. 83
- Fuerea, Augustin, The Legislative of the European Union - between unicameralism and bicameralism, in the journal Dreptul, no. 7/2017, p.187-200
- The Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, extracted from www.eur-lex.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2017
- Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 23 February 1988 in Case 131/86, extracted from www.curia.europa.eu
- Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 11 June 1991 in Case C-300/89, extracted from www.eur-lex.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2017
- Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 17 March 1993 in Case C-155/91, extracted from www.eur-lex.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2017
- Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 30 January 2001 in Case C-36/98, extracted from www.eur-lex.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2017
- Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 19 September 2002 in Case C-336/00, extracted from www.eur-lex.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2018
- Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 11 September 2003 in Case C-211/01, extracted from www.eur-lex.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2017
- Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 29 April 2004 in Case C-338/01, extracted from www.eur-lex.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2017
- Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 10 January 2006 in Case C-94/03, extracted from www.eur-lex.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2017
- Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 20 May 2008 in Case C-91/05, extracted from www.curia.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2017
- Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 6 November 2008 in Case C-155/07, extracted from www.eur-lex.europa.eu, website accessed on 14.01.2017

THE ROLE OF NATIONAL PARLIAMENTS IN VERIFYING THE COMPLIANCE WITH THE PRINCIPLES OF PROPORTIONALITY AND SUBSIDIARITY

Dragoș – Adrian BANTAȘ*

Abstract

The decision-making process of the European Union is a particularly complex one and its democratic legitimacy has almost always been a preoccupation for the citizens involved in European affairs, researchers, practitioners of Union law and, ultimately, political decision-makers. Today, after an evolutionary process that began, we could say, along with the Single European Act and, as the entire union construction, is still underway, this legitimacy is ensured in a multi-level organized system. One of these, alongside the European Parliament, is represented by national parliaments. This role is regulated in detail by the provisions of the Protocols No. 1 and 2. Practically, according to Protocol No. 1, the National Parliaments have the right to receive information about the content and the effects of the institutions issuing the draft normative acts. The obligation to transmit the documents that are necessary for the exercise of their control is a prerequisite for it, since no effective control can be exercised without knowing its exact subject. In Protocol No. 2, on the other hand, the concrete mechanismes of the National Parliaments' control over the compliance with the aforementioned principles are regulated, consisting in the issuing of reasoned opinions and, in extreme cases, in the action before the Court of Justice of the European Union.We will further discuss these matters in the present study.

Keywords: European Union, legislative procedure, Commission, Council, European Parliament, draft, act, legislative, national parliaments, subsidiary, opinion.

1. Introductory considerations.

As we have stated in the previous lines, the democratic legitimacy of the European Union's decision-making process comes from, in our opinion, the existence and the cumulated action of several levels of representation. One of these is, of course, the European Parliament.

In this regard, Article 10 of the Treaty on European Union states that "citizens are directly represented at Union level in the European Parliament"[1], while Article 14 of the same Treaty stipulates that "the European Parliament shall be composed of the representatives of the Union's citizens"[2]

Therefore, as nationally, the Parliaments of the Member States are the representative bodies of the citizens of those states, at the Union level, this role is fulfilled by the European Parliament, without this state of affairs showing any incompatibility with the national level. In practice, we can speak, as in the case of European citizenship, of a complementary representation at another level and not of an exclusion of national representation.

Moreover, this also results from the role played by the sources of primary law of the European Union, and here we refer in particular to Treaties of the national parliaments of the Member States.

Thus, the same Article 10, which we have just referred to, also refers to national Parliaments, recalling that the representatives of the Member States' governments, meeting within the Council, "are democratically accountable either before national parliaments or to their citizens[3]." In fact, this seems natural, given the tradition of parliamentary control over the executive, as embodied by the Romanian Constitution[4].

Moreover, National Parliaments, says art. Article 12 of the TEU, actively contribute to the smooth functioning of the Union, in a variety of ways, among which "by being informed by the Union institutions and by receiving notifications of Union's legislative act drafts in accordance with the Protocol on the role of national parliaments in the European Union, by compliance with the principle of subsidiarity, in accordance with the procedures laid down in the Protocol on the application of the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality, through the participation within the area of freedom, security and justice in the mechanisms for assessing the implementation of Union policies within this area, and by engaging in Europol's political control and in evaluating Eurojust's activities, by participating in the procedures for revising the Treaties, by being informed of applications for membership in the Union, and by participating in inter-parliamentary cooperation between national parliaments and the European

* PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (e-mail: adrian.bantas@gmail.com.)

[1] The Treaty on European Union, consolidated version, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu, accessed 25.01.2018, art. 10.

[2] Idem, art. 14.

[3] Idem, art. 10.

[4] See, in this respect, the provisions of Chapter IV of the Romanian Constitution, entitled Raporturile Parlamentului cu Guvernul and not only.

Parliament, in accordance with the Protocol on the role of national parliaments in the European Union[5]."

Of course, the picture that appears to us today, before our eyes, has not been present since the beginning of the European construction, but is the result of successive reforms, as we have previously said. In this regard, Professor Augustin Fuerea states that "in relation to legislative activity, the European Parliament has evolved over time, from a consultative perspective, but also from the point of view of cooperation with the Council, the co-decision respectively, by the Council. Its evolution is due to the manifested trend, in the sense of the transition from the elitist institutions (the Council, the Commission) to the institutions that have the most democratic legitimacy consistency (European Parliament, European Council), given by the existing rapprochement between the European citizen's vote and those who of course, make up these institutions (European parliamentarians), plus heads of state and / or government)[6]."

Therefore, the above picture depicts the multi-level democratic legitimacy of the European Union's decision-making process. Next, however, we will briefly refer to the principles of proportionality and subsidiarity, with their main characteristics. We will also briefly address the role of national parliaments in controlling the application of these principles without, for the time being, addressing concrete control mechanisms, their analysis being reserved for a subsequent section.

2. Principles of subsidiarity and proportionality. Overview on the role of national parliaments.

Fundamental references to how to exercise the competences of the European Union, the principles of proportionality and subsidiarity introduced in the Treaties on the occasion of the Single European Act and the Maastricht Treaty, have in the meantime benefited from a gradual deepening of their content, in order to better implement and control their observance.

In this regard, Professors Craig and Burca report how in 1992 the Heads of States and Governments, meeting in the European Council at Edingurgh, drafted a series of guidelines on the application of the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality, which in their turn, underpinned the development of an inter-institutional agreement with the same field, so that, on the occasion of the Treaty of Amsterdam, their provisions could be incorporated into primary law by virtue of a Protocol attached to that Treaty. This protocol, without insisting on the definitions of the mentioned principles, details how to apply and diminish the inconsistency between the two principles[7], which can be seen in a close relationship, as will be explained hereinafter.

On the occasion of signing the Treaty of Lisbon, the Protocol I have referred to is being replaced, the same authors report, with a new, shorter Protocol, which focuses rather on the mechanism for controlling their observance, but the Commission further assumes, observance of those contained in the old Protocol, recommending the same to the other institutional actors[8].

Summarizing the content of these principles, we can say, in accordance with the specialty doctrine, that they only recommend legislation when necessary and, when considered as such, instruments with a higher degree of generality will be preferred, to the detriment of concrete ones (directives instead of regulations, framework directives instead of concrete ones).

In conclusion, according to the same Craig and Burca, the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality suggest a departure from hierarchical governance at the level of the European Union, and they also fulfill the broader aim of ensuring that the Union "does not unnecessarily regulate[9]."

In particular, according to Article 5 of the Treaty on European Union, "pursuant to the principle of subsidiarity, in the areas not of its exclusive competence, the Union shall intervene only if and insofar as the objectives of the proposed action cannot be sufficiently achieved by the Member States. neither at central level nor at regional and local level, but due to the dimensions and effects of the envisaged action, can be better achieved at Union level[10]." With regard to the principle of proportionality, according to the same Art. 5 TEU, "Union action, in its content and form, does not go beyond what is necessary to achieve the objectives of the Treaties[11]." In fact, the Treaty which we specifically referred to expressly states that "the institutions of the Union shall apply the principle of subsidiarity in accordance with the Protocol on the application of the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality. National Parliaments shall ensure compliance with the principle of subsidiarity in accordance with the procedure laid down in that Protocol[12]."

The same idea is also reiterated in the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, Article 69 of which insists on the fact that "National Parliaments ensure, with regard to the legislative proposals and

[5] The Treaty on European Union, consolidated version, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu, accessed 25.01.2018, art. 12.
[6] Augustin Fuerea, Legislativul Uniunii Europene – între unicameralism și bicameralism, in the Dreptul magazine, no. 7/2017, pp.187-200.
[7] Paul Craig, Grainne de Burca,. Dreptul Uniunii Europene. Comentarii, jurisprudență și doctrină, Sixth Edition, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, p. 192.
[8] Idem, p. 193.
[9] Craig, de Burca, op.cit, pp.192-193.
[10] The Treaty on European Union, consolidated version, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu, accessed 25.01.2018, art. 5
[11] Idem, art. 5.
[12] Idem, art. 5.

initiatives presented in chapters 4 and 5 (chapters entitled "Judicial cooperation in criminal matter" and "Police cooperation" in Title V - "Area of freedom, security and justice" – s.n.) observance of the principle of subsidiarity, in accordance with the Protocol on the application of the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality[13]."

Therefore, we note, and we find it very important, that even under this title of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, which may require special decision-making procedures (e.g. Article 83 (1), third sentence, Article 83 (2), Article 86, Article 87 (3), Article 89), observance of the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality is considered by the authors of the Treaties as important as in other matters, and the role of National Parliaments is the established one.

Moreover, even in the case of the procedure provided under art. 352 TFEU[14], the Treaty explicitly lays down the obligation on the Commission to "draw national Parliaments' attention to the proposals based on this Article"[15], precisely so that they can exercise their legal prerogatives to control compliance with the principle of subsidiarity.

After these references to the content of the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality, we continue our approach by exposing the proper mechanisms to control compliance, as set out in Protocols no. 1 and 2, attached to the Treaties.

3. Control of compliance with the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality. Contributions of national parliaments.

Moving to the actual analysis of the provisions of Protocols 1 and 2, it seems important to underline the fact that Protocol No. 1 begins by enshrining the obligation for the Commission to transmit to the National Parliaments a series of documents, such as the Commission's consultation documents (green books, white books and communications), the "annual legislative schedule", but also "any other legislative programming or political strategy instrument." As regards the timing of their transmission, for consultation documents, it coincides with their publication, while the documents subsequently listed are transmitted to national Parliaments "simultaneously with their transmission to the European Parliament and the Council"[16].

Furthermore, Protocol No. 1 enshrines, in its Article 2, the obligation to submit to the national parliaments the drafts of "legislative acts addressed to the European Parliament and the Council"[17], also defining the notion of legislative act draft by "proposals of the Commission , initiatives of a group of Member States, initiatives of the European Parliament, requests from the Court of Justice, recommendations of the European Central Bank and requests from the European Investment Bank to adopt a legislative act[18]."

As to the addressee of the obligation to transmit drafts of legislative acts to the national Parliaments, Article 2 distributes this obligation as follows: the Commission is responsible for transmitting the drafts issued by it (at the same time as transmitting it to the European Parliament), the European Parliament is responsible for the transmission to the national Parliaments of the projects emanating from this institution, while the Council is responsible for transmitting to the national Parliaments the projects issued by a "group of Member States, the Court of Justice, the European Central Bank or the European Investment Bank[19]."

Practically, so far, we can see that Protocol no. 1 ensures that important documents that can impact on the process of law-making at the Union level are transmitted to national Parliaments, whatever their nature, and without being limited to drafts of legislative acts.

Further on, the same Protocol anticipates some aspects that will be further detailed in Protocol No. 2. More specifically, Article 3 provides for the possibility for national Parliaments to submit to the President of the European Parliament, the Presidency of the Council and the President of the Commission reasoned opinions "on the conformity of a draft of legislative act with the principle of subsidiarity[20]." In this article we find some important procedural issues. For example, it is stipulated that if the legislator is a group of Member States, the President of the Council shall transmit the

[13] The Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, consolidated version, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu, accessed 25.01.2018, art. 69

[14] Article 352 TFEU reads as follows: 1. Where action by the Union proves necessary in the policies defined in the Treaties in order to achieve one of the objectives set out in the Treaties without their being required to do so, The Council, acting unanimously on a proposal from the Commission and after obtaining the consent of the European Parliament, shall adopt appropriate measures. Where those provisions are adopted by the Council in accordance with a special legislative procedure, it shall act unanimously on a proposal from the Commission and after obtaining the consent of the European Parliament. 2. The Commission, in the framework of the procedure for reviewing the subsidiarity principle referred to in Article 5 (3) of the Treaty on European Union, draws the attention of national parliaments to proposals based on this Article. 3. Measures based on this Article may not entail harmonization of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the Member States where the Treaties exclude such harmonization. 4. This Article may not be used to achieve the objectives of the common foreign and security policy and any act adopted pursuant to this Article shall comply with the limits laid down in the second paragraph of Article 40 of the Treaty on European Union.

[15] The Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, consolidated version, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu, accessed 25.01.2018, art. 352.

[16] Protocol No. 1 on the role of national parliaments in the European Union, published in the Official Journal of the European Union C 326/203, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu, accessed 26.01.2018, art. 1.

[17] Idem, art. 2.

[18] Idem.

[19] Idem.

[20] Idem, art. 3.

reasoned opinion or advice to the governments of the Member States concerned", whereas, if the issuer is the Court of Justice, the European Central Bank, The European Investment Bank, again the President of the Council shall "forward the reasoned opinion or advice to the institution or body concerned[21]."

Therefore, the first way in which national Parliaments can act to verify compliance with the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality is this reasoned opinion.

From a procedural point of view, they have at their disposal, for action, an eight-week period set by Article 4 of Protocol No. 1. The term shall begin to run from the date on which "the draft is made available to the national parliaments in the official languages of the European Union" [22] and, after its passing, the draft is "entered on the Council's provisional agenda for adoption or in order to adopt a position in a legislative procedure[23]."

After the agenda of the Council meetings has been established, and after deliberation within them, the agenda, and the minutes of the meetings, are also sent to the national Parliaments and to the governments of the Member States. Practically, we find that National Parliaments are informed throughout the decision-making process, from the issuance of the project to the adoption of a decision regarding it. They are also informed if the European Council discusses the adoption of decisions to implement qualified majority voting in an area where unanimity is required or the transfer of areas subject to special legislative procedure within the scope of the ordinary legislative procedure. In turn, the Court of Auditors has the obligation to submit its annual report to national Parliaments, once they have been forwarded to the European Parliament and the Council.

Another aspect worthy of mention is that contained in Title II of Protocol no. 1. It establishes inter-parliamentary cooperation, organized by the European Parliament and national Parliaments. The Protocol also encourages national Parliaments to make, when necessary, their Union's specialized bodies' conferences, which may submit its conclusions to the European Parliament, the Council and the Commission, and may also provide a framework for the exchange of good practices. The same Title II of Protocol no. 1 explicitly encourages the Conference of the above-mentioned parliamentary bodies to also discuss matters of Foreign and Common Security Policy, including its Common Security and Defense component. Although they are consultative in nature, such debates may prove useful, especially in the context of the development of the new Consolidated Cooperation in Defense sector.

If, until now, we have seen that, at the general level of the Union decision-making process, national Parliaments are informed of the most important programmatic documents and drafts of legislative acts issued by the Union institutions and that they can issue consultative opinions on observance (or not) of the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality and also that the Member State Parliaments are informed throughout the main course of the projects concerned and are also encouraged to cooperate as effectively as possible in Protocol No . 2, we find out the concrete ways of applying the control of observance of the mentioned principles.

Thus, after, in Article 1, the said Protocol establishes that each institution (of the European Union) is the recipient of the obligation to observe the principles contained in Article 5 TEU, it goes to the concrete procedural provisions.

In particular, according to Article 2 of the said Protocol, the drafts of legislative acts begin with a series of consultations, under the coordination of the Commission, which take into account, in particular, the "regional and local dimension of the actions envisaged."[24] Mentioning these levels appears to us to be natural, as it is precisely the possibility of achieving, under better conditions, the purpose of the action envisaged within them, would make Union intervention no longer necessary. The consultation stage is, in our opinion, mandatory, the mentioned article excluding it only in case of an exceptional urgency and under the condition of motivation.

Further on, Protocol No. 2 maintains the definition given by Protocol no. 1 of the drafts of legislative acts, but also the recipients and the content of the obligation to transmit the projects to the National Parliaments, adding, this time, the obligation of the institutions to also submit to the National Parliaments the drafts of the amended legislative acts. We therefore conclude that a change in the content of a draft of a legislative act entails the obligation to refer it back to the National Parliaments.

Also, Article 4 of Protocol No. 2 also adds the obligation to refer to the national Parliaments the legislative resolutions of the European Parliament and the positions of the Council since their adoption[25].

From Article 5 of Protocol no. 2, the essential provisions regarding the obligation to motivate the compliance of the drafts of the legislative acts with the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality are underlined. This obligation falls under the responsibility of the issuer of the act from the interpretation of this article and is executed, inter alia, by the preparation of a letter, named by the specialists as the Subsidiarity File.

---

[21] Idem.
[22] Idem, art. 4.
[23] Idem.
[24] Protocol No. 2 on the role of national parliaments in the European Union, published in the Official Journal of the European Union C 326/203, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu, accessed 26.01.2018, art. 2.
[25] Idem, art. 4.

It should, according to the mentioned article, "contain elements to allow the assessment of the financial impact of the project in question and, in the case of a directive, the assessment of its implications for the regulations to be implemented by the Member States, including regional legislation, as the case may be."[26] In order to facilitate their control, "the reasons which lead to the conclusion that a Union's objective can be better achieved at Union level are based on qualitative indicators and, whenever possible, on quantitative indicators."[27] Nevertheless, "drafts of legislative acts also take account of the need to ensure that any financial or administrative obligation falling upon the Union, national governments, regional or local authorities, economic operators and citizens is as small as possible and proportionate to the envisaged objective[28]." Therefore, the authors of the treaties seem to have pursued the fact that the subsidiarity file will motivate the observance of this principle as much as possible, and not only in general terms, because the general formulations do not allow effective control, or that is the purpose of this protocol.

Furthermore, Article 6 of Protocol No. 2 repeats the eight-week deadline for national parliaments to send their reasoned opinions on non-compliance with the principle of subsidiarity to the Commission, the Parliament or the Council. Unlike Protocol No. 1, in the case of Protocol No. 2, to the previous provisions are added those regarding the situation in which the national Parliaments have a bicameral structure (each Chamber may issue its own opinion) and the one in which a Member State has a structure in which there are regional Parliaments (these will be consulted by the National Parliaments / Chambers, if applicable).

Further on, Article 7 of Protocol No. 2 provides that the institutions which the draft of legislative act originates from "shall take into account the reasoned opinions of the national parliaments or a chamber of one of these national parliaments"[29], but this must not necessarily entail compliance with the opinion received.

Also, from the same article we find out that each national parliament has, in the procedure that we will describe below, two votes, which are distributed either entirely in the case of the Unicameral Parliaments, or by one vote of each Chamber, in the case of bicameral ones.

From now on, there are more possibilities opening up.

The first of them takes into account the case where "reasoned opinions on non-compliance by a legislative project with the subsidiarity principle represent at least one third of the total votes allocated to national parliaments"[30], in which case the draft of the legislative act should be re-examined. If the project is based on art. 76 of TFEU [31], the threshold shall be one quarter of the total votes available. This stage is called, in the specialized doctrine and in the public references on this subject, as "yellow card". At this time, three possibilities are also open, in which case the issuing institution may decide "either to maintain the project, either to modify it or to withdraw it"[32], motivating the adopted decision.

The second possibility concerns the situation in which the draft of the normative act occurs in one of the areas that are subject to the ordinary legislative procedure. In such a case, "where reasoned opinions on a draft of a legislative act's failure to comply with the principle of subsidiarity represent at least a simple majority of the votes allocated to national parliaments (...), the project must be re-examined".[33] At this point, three possibilities are also opened: the Commission (because it has the legislative initiative under the ordinary legislative procedure) can maintain, amend or withdraw its proposal, provided that the principle of subsidiarity is upheld in the case of maintaining the proposal. This motivation takes the form of a motivated opinion, which will be further important. This stage is also known as the "orange card".

Once the procedure has reached this point, the reasoned opinion, together with the opinions issued by the national Parliaments, are referred to the "Union legislative body" (in Article 7), which the authors of the treaties recognize as being formed by the European Parliament and the Council. This (the legislative body) has, in turn, two possibilities. Thus, only in the first reading, on the basis of the opinions of the Parliaments and of the Commission's opinion, the Parliament and the Council will be able to examine "the compatibility of the legislative proposal with the principle of subsidiarity".[34] The second possibility may take place "where, with a 55% majority of the members of the Council or a majority of the votes cast in the European Parliament, the legislative authority considers that the legislative proposal is incompatible with the principle of subsidiarity"[35], in which case it will no longer be examined.

[26] Idem, art. 5.
[27] Idem.
[28] Idem.
[29] Idem, art. 7.
[30] Idem.
[31] „The acts referred to in Chapters 4 and 5 and the measures referred to in Article 74 which provide for administrative cooperation in the areas referred to in these Chapters shall be adopted: (a) on a proposal from the Commission; or (b) at the initiative of a quarter of the Member States."
[32] Protocol No. 2 on the role of national parliaments in the European Union, published in the Official Journal of the European Union C 326/203, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu, accessed 26.01.2018, art. 7.
[33] Idem.
[34] Idem.
[35] Idem.

Therefore, according to the provisions analyzed so far, the role of the National Parliaments provided for in Protocol No. 2 may be to issue reasoned opinions on non-compliance with the principle of subsidiarity, and if their total reaches the level required by the Protocol for each situation, they are forwarded to the issuing institutions and, ultimately, to the legislative body, acting according to the mechanisms provided by the same Protocol.

Further on, according to art. 8 of Protocol no. 2, National Parliaments may, if they consider it necessary, bring actions (for annulment) before the Court of Justice under the provisions of Article 263 TFEU through the Governments of the Member States.

Finally, Article 9 of Protocol No. 2 enshrines the right of national Parliaments, along with that of the European Council, the Council and the European Parliament, to receive an annual report from the Commission on compliance with Article 5 of the TEU, and so on observance of the principle of subsidiarity.

Further on, it is not without meaning to consider the activity of the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate of Romania regarding the issuance of reasoned opinions on the drafts of legislative acts of the European Union in accordance with the provisions of Protocol No. 2, as previously exposed.

4. Motivated opinions issued by tje Chamber of Deputies and the Senate of Romania in accordance with the procedures estabilished by Protocol No.2

According to the Annual Reports issued by the Commission regarding the observance of the principle of subsidiarity, in 2010, the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate of Romania did not issue reasoned opinions in accordance with the procedure provided by Protocol no. 2.

The report for 2011, however, states that, this time, the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate have each issued a number of two reasoned opinions.

One of them concerned the Proposal for a Council Directive on a Common Consolidated Corporate Tax Base, registered under number COM (2011) 121. Unlike the Chamber of Deputies, however, the Senate considered that this project did not violate the principle of subsidiarity. As a result, the Commission received the reasoned opinion of the Chamber of Deputies, this one representing one vote, in accordance with the provisions of Protocol no. 2.

The other reasoned opinion issued by the Chamber of Deputies in 2011 concerned the initiative on Further Activity and Surveillance of Credit Institutions, Insurance Undertakings and Investment Companies in a Financial Conglomerate, COM (2011) 453.

In the same year, the Senate issued reasoned opinions on initiatives on the Temporary reintroduction of border control at internal borders in exceptional circumstances, COM (2011) 560 and Jurisdiction, applicable law, recognition and enforcement of judgments in registered partnerships, COM 2011) 127[36].

The following year, in 2012, the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate did not issue reasoned opinions [37], but in 2013 the Chamber of Deputies issued such an opinion on the Proposal for a Regulation establishing the European Public Prosecutor's Office (COM (2013) 534), the Proposal for a Directive on the approximation of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the Member States relating to the manufacture, presentation and sale of tobacco and related products (COM (2012) 788), and the Senate on the Proposal for a Regulation on the European Union Railway Agency and repealing Regulation (EC) No 881/2004 (COM (2013) 27), Proposal for a Directive on railway safety (COM (2013) 31) and the Proposal for a Regulation on the promotion of free movement of persons and businesses by simplifying the acceptance of certain official documents in the European Union and amending Regulation (EU) No. 1024/2012 (COM (2013) 228[38]).

In 2014, the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate did not issue reasoned opinions on non-compliance with the principle of subsidiarity, which is in fact the general downward trend in the number of such opinions, 2014 bringing only 22 such documents[39].

A year later, however, the Chamber of Deputies issued a reasoned opinion on the Proposal for a Regulation of the European Parliament and of the Council establishing a transfer mechanism in the event of a crisis and amending Regulation (EU) no 604/2013 establishing the criteria and mechanisms for determining the Member State responsible for examining an application for international protection lodged in one of the Member States by a third-country national or a stateless person (COM (2015) 450), of the total of 8 such opinions issued at Union level[40].

As regards the year 2016, the proposal for a Directive amending Directive 96/71 / EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 16th of December 1996 concerning the posting of workers in

[36] Data extracted from the Commission's Report on Subsidiarity and Proportionality, COM (2012) 373, Brussels, 10.07.2012,

[37] According to the data presented in the Annual Report on Subsidiarity and Proportionality of 2012, COM(2013) 566 final, Brussels, 30.7.2013, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu, accessed 27.01.2018.

[38] According to the data presented in the Annual Report on Subsidiarity and Proportionality of 2013, COM(2014) 506 final, Brussels, 05.08.2014, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu, accessed 27.01.2018.

[39] According to the data presented in the Annual Report on Subsidiarity and Proportionality of 2014, COM(2015) 315 final, Brussels, 02.07.2015, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu, accessed 27.01.2018.

[40] According to the data presented in the Annual Report on Subsidiarity and Proportionality of 2015, COM(2016) 469 final, Brussels, 15.07.2016, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu, accessed 27.01.2018.

the framework of the provision of services (COM (2016) 128) has received one opinion on the Proposal for a Regulation laying down the criteria and mechanisms for determining the Member State responsible for examining an application for international protection lodged in one of the Member States by a Member State and a Senate, Member States by a third-country national or a stateless person (recast) (COM (2016) 270). They also coincided with a substantial increase in the number of reasoned opinions issued, reaching 74[41].

We can consider, in the light of those shown above, that the Romanian legislature understood and assumed the role enshrined in Protocol No. 2, using the mechanisms provided by it whenever it deemed necessary.

5. Conclusions

Although the effectiveness of the mechanisms provided by Protocol No. 2 may be, and has been, in some cases, challenged, certain concrete results have been achieved in the course of the not very long time that has elapsed since the entry into force of its provisions.

Thus, at the end of 2017, a number of three reasoned opinions reached the required number of votes for the review to be necessary. Specifically, the first "yellow card" concerned the proposal for a European Commission regulation on the exercise of the right to take collective action in the context of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services, in which case the national parliaments' votes in the sense of non-compliance with the principle of subsidiarity reached the number of 19 of the total of 54 available. As a result, the Commission withdrew its proposal but did not accept that the principle of subsidiarity had been breached. The second "yellow card" targeted the proposal to set up a European Prosecutor's Office, this time totaling 18 votes. However, the Commission has decided to maintain the proposal, not accepting that the principle of proportionality has been breached. As for the third "yellow card", it targeted the proposal to revise the Posting of Workers Directive, and this time the Commission also not accepting to review its proposal. As regards judicial review, the Court has highlighted the need to comply with the obligation to state reasons for observing the principle of subsidiarity, but acknowledged the broad margin of appreciation enjoyed by the issuing institutions (for example in Cases C-84/94 and C-233/94)[42]. Also, in Case C-547/14, Philipp Morris, the Court insisted on verifying that "if the Union legislator could, on the basis of sound data, assume that the objective of the proposed action could be better achieved at Union level[43]".

Therefore, although it does not grant a right of veto to national parliaments, which, we believe, would be detrimental to the Union's legislative capacity, and although it does not provide for spectacular mechanisms at the fingertips of national parliaments, the treaties and protocols analyzed still co-opt them into the Union's decision-making process, which is likely to strengthen its democratic legitimacy. Moreover, as Professor Augustina Dumitrascu says, "national parliaments must be careful not to engage in a systematic opposition", as "this approach would be contrary to the spirit of the early alert mechanism, which is, on the contrary, to fostering information and their positive association with the construction of a Europe closer to its citizens[44]". However, the effective results of the control on observance of subsidiarity principle as regulated by the provisions under consideration depend very much on the capacity and willingness of Member States' Parliaments to use them, or this remains to be measured in the future.

References

- Craig, Paul; de Burca, Grainne, Dreptul Uniunii Europene. Comentarii, jurisprudență și doctrină, Sixth Edition, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017
- Dumitrascu, Augustina, Dreptul Uniunii Europene și specificitatea acestuia , Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2012
- Fuerea, Augustin, Legislativul Uniunii Europene – între unicameralism și bicameralism, in Dreptul magazine, no. 7/2017
- Protocol No. 1 on the role of national parliaments in the European Union, published in the Official Journal of the European Union C 326/203, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu
- Protocol No. 2 on the role of national parliaments in the European Union, published in the Official Journal of the European Union C 326/203, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu
- Raffaelli, Rosa, Principiul subsidiarității, www.europarl.europa.eu, 10/2017
- Commission report on subsidiarity and proportionality, COM (2012) 373, Brussels, 10.07.2012
- Annual Report on Subsidiarity and Proportionality, 2012, COM(2013) 566 final, Brussels, 30.7.2013, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu

[41] According to the data presented in the Annual Report on Subsidiarity and Proportionality of 2016, COM (2017) 600 final, Brussels, 30.06.2016, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu, accessed 27.01.2018.

[42] Rosa Raffaelli, Subsidiarity principle, www.europarl.europa.eu, 10/2017, accessed 27.01.2018.

[43] Ibidem.

[44] Francois-Xavier Priollaud, David Siritzky, Le traite de Lisbonne.Commentaire, article par article, des nouveaux traites europeens(TUE et TFUE), La Documentation Francaise, Paris, 2008, p.430, apud Augustina Dumitrascu, The Law of the European Union and its Specificity, The Universe Juridic, Bucharest, 2012, p.71.

- Annual Report on Subsidiarity and Proportionality, 2013, COM(2014) 506 final, Brussels, 05.08.2014, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu
- Annual Report on Subsidiarity and Proportionality, 2014, COM(2015) 315 final, Brussels, 02.07.2015, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu
- Annual Report on Subsidiarity and Proportionality, 2015, COM(2016) 469 final, Brussels, 15.07.2016, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu
- Annual Report on Subsidiarity and Proportionality, 2016, COM(2017) 600 final, Brussels, 30.06.2017, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu
- The Treaty on European Union, consolidated version, published in the Official Journal of the European Union C 326/203, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu
- The Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, consolidated version, published in the Official Journal of the European Union C 326/203, available at www.eur-lex.europa.eu

THE REFERENDUM, REFLECTED IN THE ROMANIAN CONSTITUTIONAL COURT'S CASE LAW

Valentina BĂRBĂȚEANU*

Abstract

The referendum is the main instrument of direct democracy, a means of consultation by which the People has the possibility to directly exercise national sovereignty. In Romania, the referendum has to be organized every time the Constitution is subject to a revision, regardless of who has initiated it, and also when the dismissal of Romanian President is at stake. The result of the valid referendum cannot be disregarded in these two cases. So, this kind of referendum is compulsory both in what concerns its organization and its outcome. There is also a so-called consultative referendum, which is organized at the national level at the request of the President of Romania, who may ask the Romanian citizens to express their will as to questions of national interest. This one is optional from both fore-mentioned points of view: its necessity and its result. The Constitutional Court of Romania supervises the observance of the procedure for the organization and carrying out of a referendum, and it confirms its results. The referendum was a pretty controversial issue in Romania in the context of political changes that lead in 2012 to the suspension of the President of Romania and it continues to stir the feelings of the political stage in connexion with further intended amendment of the Basic Law. The present paper aims to depict the importance of the case law of the Constitutional Court concerning the referendum, as a guardian of constitutional democracy that renders compulsory decisions on the compatibility with constitutional principles and the rule of law of actions taken by the Government and the Parliament of Romania in respect of other State institutions. In this regard, it strongly recommended to the State's institutions to engage in a loyal co-operation between themselves.

Keywords: Referendum, Sovereignty, Direct democracy, Constitutional Court, Constitutional review.

Introduction

Meant to be an effective mechanism of the direct democracy, an expression of national sovereignty whose exclusive owner is the people, the referendum is the legal instrument through which citizens have the opportunity to participate actively in shaping the political decision at state level by explicitly expressing their opinion on actual issues regarding the organization and functioning of the State and the structuring and arrangement of political life, in general.

As to its utility and the very reason for its existence, opinions have been divided over time. Thus, some scholars praised their virtues, others warned about its shortcomings and disadvantages[1]. Thus, since the seventeenth century, the theory of democracy, understood as the ruling of the majority, has been divided into two currents of thought. One is represented by the participatory school, according to which the truly democratic means of making public policy decisions is the direct and full participation of all citizens without any interposition.

The mentors of this school of thought are classical scholars like Rousseau, or modern theorists like Benjamin Barber, Lee Ann Osbourne or Carole Pateman. On the opposite side are the partisans of the representative school or of the "responsible elite" whose pioneers were John Stuart Mill and Henry Jones Ford, and, later, the modern theorists Joseph Schumpeter, E.E. Schattschneider and Giovanni Sartori[2]. According to this theory, citizens elect democratically a representative body that, on their behalf, will make political decisions as governors.

Nowadays, the referendum is generally accepted as necessary at certain moments of particular importance to a State, in certain historical or political circumstances, inasmuch as it does not question the effectiveness of Parliament as the representative assembly of the People and does not destabilize its authority, but only reflects the will of the People, giving voice to its choice on punctual issues of particular importance to the State.

The importance of the issue addressed by this study becomes obvious if we consider the impact of referendums that may sometimes be particularly strong, especially in the international geopolitical context. This was, for example, the case with the wave of referendums organized in 2003 in eight Central and Eastern European countries concerning their accession to the European Union (Czech Republic, Hungary, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Slovakia and Slovenia)[3].

The broad resonance that referendums may have is also illustrated by the blocking of the ratification of the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe through the negative vote of the French and Dutch People expressed in the referendums held in their

* Assistant Professor, University "Nicolae Titulescu" of Bucharest, Faculty of Law (e-mail: valentina_barbateanu@yahoo.com.)

[1] Olivier Duhamel, "Le référendum – Introduction", Pouvoir no.77/1996: 5.

[2] Austin Ranney, "Référendum et Démocratie", Pouvoir no.77/1996: 10.

[3] See Jean-Michel De Waele, Referendumurile de aderare la Uniunea Europeană (Iași: Editura Institutul European, 2007).

countries on 29th of May 2005 and 1st of June 2005, respectively. Also, a true political storm was triggered throughout Europe by the surprizing and disturbing outcome of the referendum on the United Kingdom European Union membership, on the 23rd of June 2016. Similarly, the symbolic referendum organized on the 1st of October 2017 for Catalonia's independence from Spain had major echoes at the European level. Last but not least, one can recall the referendum by which Turkey has recently[4] amended the Constitution granting exaggerate presidential powers, with critical consequences for the democratic features of that State.

The particular implications of the political will expressed by the citizens through the referendum were noted in the literature, being analyzed in round tables or conferences on this topic[5]. It is also noted that in France, the prestigious Pouvoirs magazine, dedicated a whole number to this subject, inviting reputable specialists to examine the issue of the referendum.

The present study aims to highlight the situation of Romania, where the referendum contributed to defining the political will of the citizens, with six referendums organized so far. To this end, this study will mainly present the applicable normative framework, namely the provisions of Law no. 3/2000 on the organization and conduct of the referendum, as interpreted by the Constitutional Court in its rich case-law on this matter by the decisions made both in the framework of the ex ante review of constitutionality, by means of constitutional objections formulated with regard to the law which would become Law No. 3/2000 or the subsequent amending and supplementing laws before their entry into force, as well as in ex-post review, by way of exceptions of unconstitutionality raised during a pending trial on the law applicable to the case.

1. Sovereignty and Referendum

The concept of sovereignty has, in the theory of constitutional law, very complex meanings, being analyzed from a triple perspective. Thus, one can speak of state sovereignty, national sovereignty, and the sovereignty of the people. Essentially, state sovereignty expresses the idea of the suprema potestas that is indissolubly attached to the State[6]. National sovereignty, specific to the Nation, as a collective subject, whose will is distinct from that of its members, necessarily implies the delegation of the exercise of this power. That is why national sovereignty usually equals the sovereignty of the Parliament[7]. Finally, popular sovereignty, based primarily on the concept of citizenship as it was set up by Jean Jacques Rousseau in the social contract theory, reflects the ability of all citizens of a State to be equal in the state-level decision-making process[8]. Democracy in its pure form, as a way of leading the State by citizens through their direct participation in political decision-making, is no longer feasible in the manner used by the ancient Greek and Roman civilizations[9]. That is why it was necessary to be adapted to contemporary societies, by its transformation into representative democracy, where the prerogatives of power belong to the People, exercising them sovereignly, but through an limited number of representatives, democraticaly elected[10]. In order to reconcile these two systems, they were combined, so that currently, the referendum - organized in well-defined cases -, together with the parliament as a result of a free electoral process organized periodically and correctly, shape a new form of democracy, known as semi-direct democracy or participatory democracy. This system also provides to the People other means of expression, such as the right of legislative initiative or the public debate of draft laws[11].

In the spirit of this idea outlined in the current context, the Romanian constitutional legislator stated, in 1991, when drafted the democratical Basic Law, detached by teh communist regime, defeated in December 1989, that „National sovereignty belongs to the Romanian people, who shall exercise it through their representative bodies established as a result of free, periodic and fair elections, as well as by means of a referendum. No group or individual may exercise sovereignty in their own name" (Article 2).

Romanian Basic Law regulates three types of national referendum: the consultative referendum, initiated by the President of Romania on matters of national interest, mentioned in Article 90, the referendum on the dismissal of the President of Romania from office, referred to in Article 95(3) and the one approving the revision of the Constitution, regulated by Article 151(3).

The organic law dedicated to this issue details and specifies the legal and technical conditions connected with the organization and conduct of the referendum, namely the Law no.3 of 2000 on the organisation and [4] On the 16th of April 2017.

[5] Like the one recently organized by Le Centre Régional Francophone de Recherches Avancées en Sciences Sociales in colaboration with the Romanian Association of Constitutional Law, on 15-16th of September 2017, with the topic "Prendre la démocratie au sérieux – référendum et société civile dans le contexte contemporain".

[6] Giorgio del Vecchio, Lecții de filosofie juridică (București: Editura Europa Nova, 1997), 278.

[7] Ioan Muraru, Elena Simina Tănăsescu, Constituția României. Comentarii pe articole (București: Editura C. H. Beck, 2008), 23.

[8] Ibidem, 22.

[9] For details on the evolution of the concept of democracy and its application, see, for example, Anthony Arblaster, Democrația (București: Editura DU Style, 1998), Robert A. Dahl, Democrația și criticii ei, (Iași: Institutul European, 2002), Leonardo Morlino, Democrație și democratizări (Iași: Institutul European, 2015).

[10] Ion Deleanu, Instituții și proceduri constituționale – în dreptul roman și comparat, (București: Editura C.H.Beck, 2006), 103-104.

[11] See, in this regard, Valentina Bărbățeanu, "Curtea Constituțională și democrația participativă sau implicarea cetățenilor în procesul legislativ", Buletinul Curții Constituționale nr.1/2016.

holding of the referendum[12], as subsequently amended and supplemented. It specifically mentions the fact that the national referendum is the form and means of direct consultation and expression of the sovereign will of the Romanian People (Article 2 of the law). The regulation of the referendum by a separate law is fully in line with those established by the Venice Commission experts who appreciated that, in order to be truly democratic, referendums – just like the elections - must satisfy certain requirements. One is respect for procedures provided for in law. Others are common to both elections and referendums, and cover respect for the principles inherent in Europe's electoral heritage, which apply mutatis mutandis to referendums[13].

2. Temporal Aspects Regarding the Organization and Holding of the Referendum, from the Constitutional Jurisdiction Perspective

Regarding the moment in time when the referendum can be organized, the Constitutional Court considered that the amendment of Law no. 3 of 2000 by introducing the provision according to which the organization of the referendum cannot take place simultaneously with the holding of the presidential, parliamentary, local elections or of the elections for the European Parliament, or with less then 6 months prior to the date of the said elections is not consistent with Article 90 of the Basic Law, according to which the President of Romania, after consulting the Parliament, may ask the people to express their will on issues of national interest, and with those of Article 95 (3) stipulating that, in the event of approval of the proposal to suspend the President of Romania, within a maximum of 30 days, a referendum shall be held for the dismissal of the President. The Court noticed[14] that, it is clear from the analysis of the two constitutional texts that the referendum can be held at any time during the year if the Parliament has been consulted or if it approved the proposal to suspend the President of Romania. Therefore, according to the Constitution, there is no other condition prohibiting the organization and holding of the referendum simultaneously with the presidential, parliamentary, local or European Parliamentary elections, or at a certain time before or after the said elections. As such, where the law does not distinguish, the interpreter cannot distinguish it, either (Ubi lex non distinguit, nec nos distinguere debemus). Consequently, the Court stated that the conditions set by the legislator for conducting the referendum were suplementing the provisions of the Constitution, which is unacceptable and determines their unconstitutionality. The Court also found that these provisions may result in constitutional blockages, the date of the elections becoming appendant on the date of the referendum[15].

Another interesting issue was raised from the perspective of a supposed contrariety between the provisions of Article 34 of Law no. 3 of 2000, according to which "The ballot will open at 8.00 and end at 20.00", on the one hand and on the other hand, the constitutional and conventional norms guaranteeing freedom of thought, conscience and religion, as well as and the right to vote. The grievance of unconstitutionality concerned the idea of discrimination on the basis of religious affiliation, having regard to the factual and legal situation put forward by the author of the exception, namely the fact that the citizens of religious denominations who have a weekly prayer on Saturday were detered to attend the referendum organized for the dismissal of the President of Romania on Saturday, the 19th of May 2007, between 8.00 and 20.00. The Constitutional Court found that the claims of the author of the exception were unfounded[16]. In this regard, the Court held that guaranteeing the above freedoms requires the State to observe specific obligations, whether negative or positive, the latter being materialized in appropriate measures so as to avoid disturbing the exercise of individual freedom of thought, conscience and of religion. In the discused case, the Court held that the source of the alleged constitutional conflict lies in the impossibility of simultaneous exercise of an electoral right - the right to vote – and of the freedom of religion, manifested by the practice of rituals specific to the cult that declared the day of prayer the seventh day of the week, Saturday. Both the establishment of Saturday as the date of the referendum on the dismissal of the President of Romania on the 19th of May 2007[17] and the hourly interval provided by the legally criticized text prevented the followers of this cult from voting in the organized referendum, having religious obligations to be fulfilled during the entire Saturday from dawn to sunset.

Faced with these claims by the author of the exception, the Court stated that there is no incompatibility between the status of citizen – which implies the right to vote -, and that of practitioner of a religious cult recognized by the Romanian state. The fact that, through the way of organizing and holding the referendum on the dismissal of the President of Romania on the 19th of May 2007, regulated by a law with general applicability for all the citizens of the country, the adherents of a religious minority in [12] Published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 84 of 24 February 2000.

[13] CDL-AD (2005)034, Referendums in Europe – an Analysis of the Legal Rules in European States, Report adopted by the Council for Democratic Elections at its 14th meeting (Venice, 20 October 2005) and the Venice Commission at its 64th plenary session (Venice, 21-22 October 2005).
[14] Decision no. 147 of the 21st of February 2007.
[15] Ibidem.
[16] Decision no. 845 of the 8th of June 2009.
[17] By Article 1 paragraph 3 of the Decision no. 21 of 2007 of the Romanian Parliament.

Romania were unable to exercise their right at the same time, choosing to fulfill the religious obligations and practices specific to the cult in the same timeframe for the elections, cannot be converted into a reason for unconstitutionality of the provisions of art. 34 of Law no. 3/2000, nor into a restriction of either the exercise of the right to vote or the freedom of religion.

The right to vote expresses the essence of the relationship between the State and its citizens, independent of the citizen/church relationship, and, according to Article 2 paragraph 1 of the Constitution, the referendum, together with the elections organized for the constitution of representative bodies of the Romanian people, is the constitutional way of exercising national sovereignty. The Court has held that the importance of a referendum or the election that is taking place at a given moment in a state is clearly superior due to the level of a general interest involved in comparison with the narrow interest, limited to a group or at individuals, that a particular religious minority proclaims. So, the followers of such a cult can not reasonably claim that the organization of the specific operations of a national election should takes place according to the practices of that cult. In electoral matters, espeically, but not exclusively, the legislator considers the general interest of the society and can not legislate according to the religious option of every citizen, without thus being questioned the freedom of conscience safeguards.

At the same time, this legislative policy can not have the meaning of discrimination on the grounds of religious affiliation, as the author of the exception claims. It gives expression to the natural mechanism of a democratic, social state in which the rights and freedoms of citizens are protected so as to achieve a reasonable balance between the general interest of society, on the one hand, and individual rights and freedoms, on the other.

Also related to the date of the referendum, the Constitutional Court recently examined[18] allegations regarding the law amending Law no. 3/2000 that attributed to the Government the power to establish the date of the organization of the referendum for the revision of the Constitution, despite the fact that this is an exclusive right of the Parliament.

Considering the specific powers attributed at constitutional level in what concerns each type of national referendum, Article 15 paragraph 1 of the Law no. 3 of 2000, as it currently stands, specifies the type of normative act that determines the organization of the referendum and its date, as well as the authority which will issue it, depending on its constitutional legitimacy regarding the initiation of the referendum. Thus, the subject and the date of the national referendum are established by law, in the case of a referendum on the revision of the Constitution, by Parliament's decision, in the case of the referendum on the dismissal of the President of Romania and by a decree of the President of Romania, in case of a referendum on issues of national interest.

The differentiation that the text mentioned in Law no. 3 of 2000 makes between the three types of referendum in terms of the normative act which, in the procedure of its organization and deployment, determines the object and the day when it will take place, is justified by the constitutional provisions conferring the competence to initiate a referendum, respectively The President of Romania, by decree, on the referendum on issues of national interest, and by Parliament, by decision, in the situation of the dismissal of the President of Romania, respectively by law, in the case of the revision of the Basic Law. For the consistency of the procedure, it is reasonable that the same authority that initiates the referendum to also be the one setting the date of the referendum. For the hypothesis in question in the examined case, regarding the amendment of the Basic Law, the Court noted that it is the Parliament that adopts the draft or proposal for revision of the Constitution. In order to become final, the review must be approved by referendum, thus gaining full legitimacy through the general will of the people. Therefore, with a view to ensuring a complete procedural mechanism for the amending of the Constitution, including the regulation of its final stage, the Parliament is entitled to establish, by a separate law, the date of the referendum, thus setting the moment when the law it has adopted would be subject to popular approval. Unlike this hypothesis, in the case of the suspension of office of the President, the Parliament sets the date of the referendum by a decision, which is issued in exercising its control function, part of its constitutional attributions. Instead, the revision of the Constitution, as a fundamental law of the state, is made by means of a law amending and / or supplementing it and that is why, consequently, as a matter of course, for the normative act on the organization of the referendum to be also a law, not an administrative act issued by the Governement.

The legislator's concern for the establishment of the date of the referendum continued. Thus, through the Law for amending and completing the Law no. 3 of 2000 it has been stated that "Romanian citizens are called to express their will by voting in the national referendum on the revision of the Constitution, in the last Sunday of the 30-day period provided for in Article 151 (3) of the Constitution of Romania, republished, calculated from the date of the adoption by the Parliament of the draft constitutional law, the Government having the obligation to make public, by means of mass media, its text and the date of the national referendum". The fore-mentioned provision has been subjected to a priori constitutionality review and analyzed by the Constitutional Court by Decision no. 47 of 1 February 2018,

The authors of the objection of unconstitutionality criticized the fact that the date of the referendum is to be established by the very Law no. 3/2000 and not by a separate law, as specified by the Constitutional Court by Decision no. 612 of the 3rd of October 2017. The Court emphasized that what is important, in terms of the conformity of the procedure for organizing and conducting the referendum with the spirit of the Constitution, is the legitimacy and legal force of the act by which it is triggered and where the defining aspects are established, as the date when it is to take place.

[18] Decision no.612 of the 3rd of October 2017.

What is essential is that this act comes from the authority that has the constitutional mandate to initiate each type of referendum, according to its powers, namely the decree of the President of Romania, regarding the referendum on issues of national interest, Parliament's decision, in the situation the dismissal of the President of Romania, and the law, in the case of the revision of the Basic Law. Therefore, the fact that the Parliament established by Law no. 3 of 2000 the date of this last type of referendum is in accordance with the constitutional requirements concerning the Parliament's exclusive competence to decide on this matte. It is, therefore, irrelevant whether it is a separate law adopted on the occasion of the organization of each referendum or the provision is included in the framework law on the organization and conduct of the referendum. And in the new legislative view, the date of organizing this referendum is determined by Law no. 3 of 2000, as the last Sunday of the 30-day period referred to in Article 151 paragraph 3 of the Basic Law.

The Court also held that the Parliament maintained itself within the scope of the constitutional text invoked, establishing by Law no. 3 of 2000 the fixed and unequivocal time stamp in relation to which is calculated the date on which the referndum will take place, but strictly circumscribed to the period of maximum 30 days in which the referendum for the revision of the Constitution must be organized. The Court noticed that the provisions of the Basic Law invoked do not require the full use of that time-limit, but provide for the most remote time to which the citizens may be summoned to the national referendum, so the establishment of its date within that period cannot be considered a disregard of the formentioned constitutional text.

In addition, the Court has held that nothing prevents the Parliament from adopting a law, depending on the circumstances, in order to set a different date for the holding of the referendum - within the said 30-day period - if this is necessary to ensure the proper conditions for citizens to express their will on the revision of the Constitution as a way of exercising national sovereignty.

Also as regards the schedule of the referendum, the Court noted that, although the rule is that the referendum should be held in one day, in exceptional cases, in order to ensure greater participation in the vote, the legislature may also regulate the referendum to take place over several days. In this regard, the Court held[19] that the establishment of a national referendum on the amending of the Constitution in two days instead of one day does not affect the general interest in conducting the referendum in good condition.

The same was the Court's ruling on the extension of the voting time in the referendum, from 12 to 16 hours[20]. Since the time frame of the referendum is one of the elements of the procedure for organizing and holding it, its establishment is subject to the rule established by Article 73 paragraph 3 letter d) of the Constitution, that imposes its regulation by organic law. As a result, its regulation by government decision contravenes the constitutional refered provision. In fact, such a regulation would be likely to cause a state of uncertainty regarding an element of this procedure, contrary to the principle of legal certainty imposed by Article 1 paragraph 5 of the Constitution[21].

3. Participation Quorum, Turnout Quorum and the Returns of the Referendum in the View of the Contitutional Case-Law

Currently, the law stipulates that the referendum is valid if at least 30 percent of the number of people enrolled on the permanent electoral lists participate in it. The condition to be met for the validity of the referendum is the same for all types of referendum, Article 5 Pararagraph 2 of the Law no. 3 of 2000 requiring the meeting of a certain participation threshold in relation to the number of persons on the permanent electoral lists.

The law was deducted from the a priori constitutionality review, and the Court found[22] that it introduced a novelty in terms of the validity of the referendum, stating that "The result of the referendum is validated if the validly expressed options represent at least 25 percent of those enrolled in the lists permanent election ". Thus, besides the conditions established by the law in force, the new regulation makes the validation of the result of the referendum conditional upon the surmounting of a threshold in relation to the number of persons on the permanent electoral lists, according to which the majority of the valid votes is established.

The Court stated that for the validation of the referendum it is necessary to meet these two minimum conditions, which is a way of securing the representativeness of the scrutiny. Besides, the Court noted that a quorum for the participation of most voters is also needed in other states, as well: Poland, Bulgaria, Croatia, Italy, Malta, Lithuania, Slovakia or Russia. In Latvia, the quorum is half the voters who participated

[19] By Ruling no. 1 of the 15th of October 2003.
[20] Decision no. 735 of the 24th of July 2012.
[21] Ibidem.
[22] Decision no. 334 of the 26th of June 2013.

in the last legislative elections. In Portugal, if the participation rate is not more than 50 percent, the referendum has no binding, but only consultative effect.

A quorum of approval of a quarter of the electorate is established in Hungary. In Albania and Armenia, the quorum is one third of the electorate. In Denmark, a constitutional amendment must be approved by 40 percent of the electorate; in other cases, the voted legal provision is rejected not only if the simple majority of voters voted against, but only 30 percent of voters enrolled in the electoral lists - the Netherlands or Denmark.

The Court held that the law does not require citizens to participate in the referendum, but only their right and it is in the will of every citizen to decide freely whether to exercise this right or not. In the Constitutional Court Decision no. 3 of August 2, 2012, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 546 of August 3, 2012), the Court held that the expression of a political option can take place not only by participating in the referendum but also by not participating in it, especially in cases where the relevant legislation imposes a quorum of participation. A majority of the blockage can be created in relation to the number of citizens of a state. This way, those who choose not to exercise their right to vote believe that through passive conduct they can impose their political will. Exercising a constitutional right, citizens see their own beliefs indirectly, by not accepting the contrary. Therefore, the non-participation in the referendum, namely the non-exercise of the right to vote, is also a form of expression of the political will of the citizens and of participation in political life.

Over the time, the legislative instability concerning the referendum, caused by the frecquent amendment of this legislation, especially during periods when Parliament was preparing for a dismissal of the President or when initiating the revision of the Constitution, turned out to be not just a factor of legal uncertainty, but also a source of civic discontempt towards this legislation, oftenly criticized on the occasion of its application. In this context, the Court held that the legislator can change the quorum for participation in the referendum, but the Constitutional Court must ensure that the instrument is not used for contrary purposes than the one that the constituent legislator intended in what concerns the referendum, as an essential legal institution in a state governed by the rule of law and as a form of direct participation of citizens in decision-making process.

The Court has to ensure compliance with the principles of legal stability of the referendum laws and of the loyal consultation of citizens, principles which presuppose the creation of all conditions for the voters to be aware of the issues under scrutiny, the legal consequences of lowering the threshold of participation to vote, as well as the effects of the result of the referendum on the general interests of the community.

However, given that the threshold for participation is a prerequisite condition for the referendum to be able to effectively express the will of the citizens, constituting the premise of an authentic democratic manifestation of sovereignty, the Court stressed trhe fact that its task is to strike a fair balance between the need to protect the right to decide to participate in the referendum of the citizens as a fundamental right and the desire of a parliamentary majority to impose its political will in the State at a given moment.

The preservation of the rule of law and democracy requires the Constitutional Court, as the supreme guardian of the Constitution, to prevent the consequences of the unexpected change of the legal provisions in the field of referendum and to comply with the principles of legal stability (which require clarity, predictability and accessibility) the right to vote, the freedom of choice, and the interpretation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution in good faith, principles which constitute structural elements / valences of the general principle of legal certainty, unanimously accepted within constitutional democracy.

Therefore, the new regulations should not create a state of uncertainty about a defining element of the examined procedure, since the choices of the ordinary legislator regarding the quorum for participation in the referendum can fluctuate according to the will of the political majority in Parliament and the conjunctural interests of its nature and can create a general state of uncertainty regarding an essential element of the referendum, namely the validity of the referendum.

Accordingly, the Court noted that, in order to ensure compliance with the general principle of legal stability in the matter of the referendum, in line with the recommendations of the Code of Good Practices on the Referendum adopted by the Venice Commission, with the First additional Protocol to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and with the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the provisions of the Law for the amendment and completion of the Law no. 3 of 2000 on the organization and conduct of the referendum are constitutional, but they cannot be applied to referendums organized within one year of the enactment of the amending law.

4. The Referendum Regarding the Amending of the Basic Law

Due to the long-term impact of a constitutional change, the Romanian lawmaker has established a procedure for revising the Basic Law that gives it both stability and legitimacy. That is the reason it provided that the organization and conduct of the referendum on the amending of the Constitution, as well as its outcome, are mandatory[23].

According to Article 150 Paragraph 1 of the Basic Law, a revision of the Constitution may be initiated by the President of Romania at the proposal of the Government, by at least one quarter of all Deputies or Senators, as well as by at least 500,000 citizens having the right to vote. Article 151 Paragraph 1 and 3 states that the bill or proposal for revision must have been adopted by the Chamber of Deputies and by the Senate, by a majority of at least two-thirds of the members of each Chamber and revision shall be final after approval by a referendum held within 30 days from enactment of the bill or proposal concerning such revision.

Regarding this kind of issue, the Venice Commission stated that „a national tradition of holding referendums may contribute to the democratic legitimacy of a constitution. In the view of the Commission, in certain circumstances, it may also reduce the risk that political actors could try unilaterally to change the rules of the game. Referendums can also contribute to strengthening the democratic legitimacy of the constitutional protection of human rights" .

Until now, there were seven initiatives of amending the Basic Law of Romania, but only one has achieved its final goal, in 2003. Each time, the Constitutional Court has rendered decisions regarding the complience with the limits of revision enshrined as the "hard-core" of the Constitution, concerning the national, independent, unitary and indivisible character of the Romanian State, the Republican form of government, or territorial integrity, independence of judiciary, political pluralism, the official language and the citizens' fundamental rights and freedoms, or their safeguards [24]. It also confimed the turnout of the national referendum on the 18th-19th of Octomber 2003 and noted that the Law on the Review of the Romanian Constitution, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 669 of the 22nd of September 2003, was approved by referendum. At the time of publication of this decision in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, the Law for the Revision of the Romanian Constitution entered into force.

5. Referendum on the Dismissal of the President of Romania From the Office

The referendum on the dismissal of the President of Romania is compulsory and is determined by a decision of the Parliament, under the conditions stipulated in Article 95 of the Constitution. The dismissal of the President is in fact a popular revocation, Parliament can not dismiss he/she discretionary, as the President was elected by the people and not by the Parliament, that is why he/she does not answer to the Parliament, but to the electoral body who chose him/her by universal suffrage[25]. According to the forementioned constitutional provisions, in case the President of Romania has committed a serious offence in violation of the Constitution, he may be suspended from office by the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, in a joint session, by a majority vote of Deputies and Senators, and after seeking opinion from the Constitutional Court. If the proposal of suspension from office has been approved, a referendum shall be held within 30 days for removing the President from office.

The dismissal of the President of Romania is approved if, following the referendum, the proposal has received the majority of the votes validly cast. This rule is valid only in conjunction with those established by the Constitutional Court by Decision no. 731 of 10th of July 2012, in the sense that the text is constitutional insofar as it ensures the participation in the referendum of at least half plus one of the number of persons on the permanent electoral lists.

Another procedural rule regarding the majority required to dismiss the President was outlined by another decision of the Constitutional Court[26], which was called upon to rule on the provisions of the same art.10 of Law no.3 of 2000, as it was to be amended. It intended to establish that the dismissal of the President of Romania is approved if it has obtained the majority of the votes of the citizens enrolled in the electoral lists, if the President of Romania was elected from the first ballot, and if the President of Romania was elected in the second ballot, his/her dismissal is approved if he/she has obtained the majority of votes validly expressed throughout the country by the citizens that voted.

Analyzing the objection of unconstitutionality, the Court found that, by amending the content of Article 10 of the Law no. 3 of 2000, the legislator wanted to apply, in terms of the votes cast, the principle of legal symmetry when electing the President of Romania in the second ballot and dismissing it as a result of the popular consultation. The Court noticed that, basing its solutions on the principle of symmetry, the legislator did not take into account the fact that the application of this principle in public law is not possible, even more so in constitutional law, especially when the organization and functioning of public authorities is at stake. The principle of symmetry is a principle of private law, and the possibility of its application in public law is excluded. That is why constitutional norms are asymmetrical par excellence. Thus, the Parliament is elected by the people, but ceases its mandate by passing the time or by the dissolution of the President of Romania; the Government is appointed by the President of Romania on the basis of Parliament's vote of confidence, but it is dismissed

[23] Article 6 of the Law no.3 of 2000.
[24] Article 151 (1) and (2) of the Basic Law.
[25] Decision no. 70 of the 5th of May 1999.
[26] Decision no. 147 of the 21st of February 2007.

following a vote of distrust, due to the resignation of the Prime Minister or when he/she loses his/her electoral rights or is in a state of incompatibility, etc .; eligible public functions are held by people who have obtained them in elections and cease by revocation, occurrence of incompatibility, leakage of time, etc.

Similarly, in the case of the President of Romania, the holding of this position is entrusted to the person who won the presidential election and the cessation of the presidential election takes place as a result of a conviction for high treason, the approval of the dismissal by referendum, the incompatibility, etc. Therefore, the requirements set by the Constitution for the election of the President of Romania and those referring to his dismissal following a referendum are not symmetrical, because they are different legal institutions with different roles and purposes, each with distinct legal treatment.

Thus, the election of the President of Romania is governed by a homogeneous group of legal norms, which establish the rules regarding the organization and holding of the presidential election. At the end of this electoral process, according to Article 81 Paragraph 2 of the Constitution, the candidate who has assembled in the first ballot the majority of the voters who have been included in the electoral lists shall be declared elected. It is possible, however, that in the first ballot, none of the candidates obtain the absolute majority of the votes required by Article 81 Paragraph 2 of the Constitution. Under these circumstances, the electoral process must continue in order to get a winner. As such, the second ballot is organized, only with the first two candidates taking part ranged on the number of votes obtained in the first round. The candidate with the highest number of votes will be appointed as President of Romania.

On the other hand, the dismissal by referendum of the President of Romania does not have the significance of such an electoral competition. On the contrary, it is a sanction for committing serious acts by which the President of Romania violates the provisions of the Constitution. The distinctions regarding the dismissal of the President of Romania by referendum, as it results from the provisions of point 2 of the unique article of the criticized law, regard the President of Romania who obtained the mandate in the first round, the President of Romania elected in the second round of elections and also the interim president. Following the legislator's logic, in the first case, the president would be dismissed with the absolute majority of the votes of the electoral body; in the second case, with the relative majority of the votes of the citizens present at the polls, while for the situation provided by art. 99 of the Constitution, on the "Interim President's Liability" that was not elected by vote, there would be no constitutional provision on dismissal. Such an interpretation is contrary to Article 1 Paragraph 3 of the Constitution, according to which Romania is a state governed by the rule of law, such a state opposing the application of the same sanction to the President of Romania, in different way that depend on how he/she obtained this function: in the first round of voting, second ballot or as interim in the exercise of his / her office.

The rational solution of this problem lies in the fact that, in the event of serious acts infringing the provisions of the Constitution, the President of Romania - whoever he/she is and anyway he/she would has become head of state - may be suspended from office by the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, in a joint session, with the vote of the majority of deputies and senators. As such, when the legislator established by law that the results of the referendum on the dismissal of the President of Romania are set differently, depending on the number of the ballot in which he was elected are contrary to the constitutional provisions of Article 81 Paragraph 2. In this respect are also the provisions of Article 96 of the Constitution, which establish a second way for the ceasing of the position of President of Romania, namely the prosecution for high treason. In this case, too, the opening of the road to the end of the presidential term is decided by the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate in a joint session, which may decide the prosecution of the President of Romania - no matter who he/she is, with how many votes he/she won the election or by what way he/she occupies this position. Hence the conclusion that, when the constituent legislator wished to establish a certain majority of votes, he did so by a reference text, whose application to subsidiary situations is understood, except where such a the majority is left to the law.

The constitutional provisions regarding the majority required for the election of the president in the first round are sufficient to allow the determination of the dismissal of the head of state in all cases by analogy and not by the legal symmetry. However, the Court stated that it does not rule out the possibility for the legislator to opt for a majority of relative votes for the dismissal of the President of Romania in all three situations. As a consequence, the Court found that the Law amending and supplementing Law no. 3 of 2000 on the organization and conduct of the referendum which envisages such a legislative solution is unconstitutional[27].

Following the re-examination of the law, the reason for unconstitutionality shown above was removed[28] by a new wording of Article 10, which stipulates, for all situations, a single majority of votes by which the President of Romania can be dismissed, if "the majority of the validly expressed votes at the national level bby the citizens who participated in the referendum" was met. In this way, the text has been put in concordance with the clarifications made by the Constituional Court in the Decision no. 147 of 2007.

[27] Decision no. 147 of the 21st of February 2007.
[28] This fact was noticed by the Constitutional Court by a subsequent decision, namely Decision no. 420 of the 3rd of May 2007.

The question of the percentage of valid votes required for the dismissal of the President came again into the attention of the Court[29] in 2012, after the Article 10 was once again amended, meaning that the dismissal of the President of Romania is approved if, following the referendum, the proposal has met the majority of the votes validly expressed.

Noteing the numerous legislative changes of the criticized provision, the Court recalled that in the Code of Good Practices on the Referendum adopted in 2007, the European Commission for Democracy through Law (the Venice Commission) recommended to States to ensure stability with regard to legislation in electoral and referendum matters.

The Court also found that the outcome of the referendum depends on the cumulative fulfillment of two conditions: one referring to the minimum number of citizens who have to participate in the referendum so it be considered valid and one on the number of validly cast votes that determine the result of the referendum. These conditions are detailed in Article 5 Paragraph 2 and Article 10 of the Law no. 3 of 2000. According to Article 5 Paragraph 2, as it was written at that time, "The referendum is valid if at least half plus one of the number of persons on the permanent electoral lists attended the polls".

The Court observed that the Law for the amendment of Article 10 of the Law no. 3 of 2000 provides a unitary regulation for all types of referendum established by the Constitution, giving expression to the representativeness demand in terms of the turnout of the vote. Thus, the same legislative solution can be found in the referendum on the amending of the Constitution, the referendum on issues of national interest and the local referendum, where the result is determined by the majority of votes validly expressed throughout the country.

Similarly, the Court found that the condition to be met for the validity of the referendum is the same for all types of referendum, Article 5 Paragraph 2 of the Law no. 3 of 2000 requiring the meeting of the absolute majority consisting of half plus one of the number of persons on the permanent electoral lists. The Court held that this is an essential condition for the referendum to be able to effectively express the will of the citizens, constituting the premise of an authentic democratic manifestation of sovereignty through the people, in accordance with the principle stated in Article 2 Paragraph 1 of the Basic Law. The participation of the majority of the citizens in the referendum is an act of civic responsibility, in which the electoral body is to decide whether or not to sanction the President of Romania, having the possibility of dismissal or keeping him in office. As such, it found that the Law for the amendment of Article 10 of the Law no. 3 of 2000 is constitutional insofar as it ensures the participation in the referendum of at least half plus one of the number of persons on the permanent electoral lists.

6. The Referendum on National Interest Issues

According to Article 11 of Law no. 3 of 2000, the President of Romania, after consulting the Parliament, may ask the people to express their will through a referendum on issues of national interest. The issues that are subject to the referendum and the date of the referendum are established by the President of Romania, by decree.

Initially, this law stipulated that the referendum on issues of national interest was organized before the adoption of measures, including legislation. By Decision no. 70 of the 5th of May 1999, the Court found that this legal provision was unconstitutional because it limited the possibility for the President to initiate the referendum only to the situation in which it is held prior to the taking of measures. This wording created the premises of restricting the exercise of a constitutional right of the President and added a non-existent condition in the text of Article 90 of the Constitution, which provides: "The President of Romania, after consulting the Parliament, may ask the people to express their will on issues of national interest by referendum". In the light of these provisions, consultation of Parliament is, in all cases, mandatory. The Constitution does not, however, condition, by reference to a certain period, the initiation by the President of this form of popular consultation on issues of national interest. Thus, the legal provision submited to the constitutional review was seen by the Court as a restriction of the President's right, by obliging him to propose to the Parliament what "other problems" are to constitute the object of the referendum it intends to initiate. In fact, the President is the only one entitled to establish "issues of national interest" on which he/she can ask the people to express their will by referendum.

The Court subsequently developed this theory, through Decision no. 567 of the 11th of July 2006 on the objection of unconstitutionality of the provisions of Article 12 Paragraph (1) of the Law no. 3 of 2000, which lists the problems considered of national interest. The Court found that the referendum procedure initiated by the President on "issues of national interest", involves two phases: the consultation of the Parliament, which is to adopt a decision in the joint session of the two Chambers, with the vote of the majority of the deputies and senators on the referendum initiated by the President of Romania. If the Parliament has not been consulted, the President will not be able to initiate the referendum. The second stage is the consultation of the people, expressing their will on matters of national interest submitted to them by the President.

Article 90 of the Constitution establishes the exclusive competence of the President in determining national issues of interest to the referendum, even if Parliament's consultation is compulsory. Only the President of Romania has the right to decide which are the issues of national interest and, within them, to establish by decree the concrete issue that is subject to the referendum and the date of its implementation. In this regard, the Court found that the limiting list in Article 12 paragraph 1 of the Law no. 3 of 2000 of certain situations considered to be "problems of national interest" is likely to restrict the President's right to consult the people, knowing that, over time, the national interest may differ, whenever new situations may arise, claiming the organization of a referendum. Any listing of situations considered to be of "national interest" at the time when the legislator adopts the regulation may later turn into a constraint, to a limitation that affects the constitutional right of the President to decide on its own problems to consult the people. That is why establishing by law the problems of national interest represents a mixture of Parliament in the exercise of the exclusive powers conferred on it by the Constitution to the President and, as such, a disregard for the principle of separation and balance of power within constitutional democracy.

[29] Decision no. 731 of the 10th of July 2012.

7. The Role of the Constitutional Court in the Procedure of the Referendum

Beside reviewing the constitutionality of legislation, the Constitutional Court is responsible for exercising various powers which undeline its important role in enforcing the supremacy of the Basic Law and the values and principles of democracy. In 1991, when drafted the first genuine democratic Basic Law after the Second World War, the Romanian constituent power stated that the national sovereignty belongs to the Romanian people, who shall exercise it through their representative bodies, namely the Parliament and the President of Romania, established as a result of free, periodic and fair elections. But it also also provided a way of direct involvement of the people in the political decision making process, by means of a referendum. Thus, the referendum becomes the instrument of direct democracy enshrined in the Romanian Constitution.

The Constituional Court keeps in mind those stated by the Venice Commisssion in the Code of Good Practice on Referendums, according to which the principle of the rule of law, which is one of the three pillars of the Council of Europe along with democracy and human rights, applies to referendums just as it does to every other area. The principle of the sovereignty of the people allows the latter to take decisions only in accordance with the law. The use of referendums must be permitted only where it is provided for by the Constitution or a statute in conformity with the latter, and the procedural rules applicable to referendums must be followed[30].

By Decision no. 51 of the 25th of January 2012, the Court pointed out, in relation to the legal force of the provisions of the Code of Good Practice in Electoral Matters, drafted by the European Commission for Democracy through Law, invoked by the authors of the petition, that "its recommendations are the coordinates of a democratic election in which the states - which are characterized as belonging to this type of regime - can manifest their free choice in electoral matters, respecting the fundamental human rights in general and the right to be elected and to choose, in particular ".

In Romania, the referendum has to be organized each time the Constitution is subject to a revision and also when the dismissal of Romanian President is at stake. In both cases, the result of the valid referendum cannot be disregarded. These two variaties of referendum are compulsory both in what concerns their organization and their outcome. On the contrary, the so-called consultative referendum is optional from both fore-mentioned points of view: its necessity and result. It is organized at the national level on the request of the President of Romania, who may ask the People of Romania to express its will as to questions of national interest.

The Constitutional Court supervises the observance of the procedure for the organization and carrying out of a referendum, and it confirms its results. In order to implement the provisions above, the Constitutional Court is entitled to request information from any public authority[31]. Within this power, the Court renders a ruling, which has to be taken by a vote of two-thirds of the judges of the Court. The Constitutional Court publishes the ruling on the outcome of the referendum in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, and in the press. Before publication in the Official Gazette of Romania, the ruling of the Constitutional Court shall be presented to the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, in their common session[32].

As effects of the ruling, the Law for revision of the Constitution or, as the case may be, dismissal from office of the President of Romania comes into force on the day of publication in the Official Gazette of Romania of the Constitutional Court’s ruling confirming the referendum’s results.

There were 5 referendums that have been organised in Romania until now: one referendum on the revision of the Constitution (held between the 18th-19th October 2003). The Romanian Constitution was initially approved by the national referendum of the 8th of December 1991; two referendums on the dismissal of the President of Romania from office (held on the 19th May of 2007 and the 29th of July 2012); two referendums at the initiative of the President of Romania on matters of national interest (held on the 25th of November 2007 and the 22nd of November 2009), regarding the introduction of the first-past-the-post vote for the election of the members of the [30] CDL-AD(2007)008rev, Code of Good Practice on Referendums.

[31] Article 46 of the Law no. 47 of 1992.
[32] Article 47 of the Law no. 47 of 1992.

Romanian Parliament[33] and respectively, the moving to a unicameral parliament and the decrease in the number of members of the Romanian Parliament to a maximum of 300 parliamentarians[34].

The Constitutional Court establishes whether the procedure for the organisation and holding of the referendum and the confirmation of its returns was observed or not16 [Article 146 i) of the Constitution and Article 46 (1) of Law no. 47/1992]; prior to its publication in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, the Constitutional Court's ruling is submitted to the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, in joint session [Article 146 i) of the Constitution and Article 47 (3) of Law no. 47/1992].

Regarding the manner in which this function was exercised, the Court delivered a decision [35] in the a priori review of constitutionality, analyzing the provisions of Article 45 Paragraph 1 of Law No. 3 of 2000, which should have been amended in the sense that "the Constitutional Court shall, at the reasoned request and accompanied by the evidence on which the parties or their alliances are based, cancel the national referendum if the voting and the results have been established through fraud". The authors of the objection argued that it contravenes the constitutional provisions that give the Constitutional Court the right to observe the procedure for organizing and conducting the referendum and to confirm its results. Since none of these constitutional provisions makes the exercise of the Court's powers subject to any referral, it is imperative that the Court would act ex oficio and annul the referendum, if it finds that the procedure for its organization and conduct has been violated.

The Court has held that the claim was well founded. Thus, the Court noted that the Constitution, by means of a general wording, recognizes the Court's right to resolve actions specific to the constitutional litigation and, from that position, to resolve the petitions or complaints relating to possible deviations from the referendum rules and procedures. It is no less true, however, that within the scope of the right conferred by the Constitution on "observing" the observance of the procedures for the organization and holding of the referendum also comes the possibility of the Court to react by itself when it finds out directly or when it has information from citizens, the press, non-governmental organizations, etc. in connection with non-compliance with these rules and procedures. This possibility is indissolubly linked to the exercise of the Court's attributions to "confirm" the results of the referendum. In the case of finding frauds that question the fairness of the turnout of the referendum, the Court does not confirm this result. The significance of nonconfirmation, which is a legal act with serious consequences, is that of finding the national referendum null and void. For this reason, the Court cannot be limited in its action by the necessity of the existence of a request from the parties or their alliances.

Conclusions

The jurisprudence synthesized above, although representing just a part of the issues which the Constitutional Court was called to resolve in conexion with the referendum, reflects the contribution that this authority has had in the clarifying of the normative framework governing the organization and holding of the referendum. The finality pursued by the Romanian jurisdiction of constitutional review has always been to maintain the democratic character of this instrument, through which citizens express their opinion and are able to participate in taking a decision. At the same time, the Court has always took into account the fact that the main feature of the referendum resides in its function of legitimizing power, the popular will validating the acts to be voted. The referendum diminishes the gap between the governors and the governors, and democratically completes the relations resulting from the elections. In other words, the referendum is a means of manifesting the role of the citizen in politics, within the scope of the public debate. On the other hand, the referendum gives the people the opportunity to control the power and the way this is exercised, as well as the possibility to deal with extremely important political issues (such as those related to the dismissal procedure of the President of Romania). The Court also warned that the referendum does not constitute an alternative to the parliamentary democracy and its abusive use can undermine the legitimacy and role of Parliament as a representative body of the people. The same view was expressed in doctrine, where it has been noted that although the referendum can be a powerful instrument to increase the responsiveness of political system, nevetheless, one should not forget that too much responsiveness may not always be a good thing, and that on certain issues it may be worthwhile to protect elite consensus, namely the Parliament, against too much popular pressure[36].

The legislation examined by the Constitutional Court proved to be insufficiently clear and its frequent amendements, sometimes dictated by short-term interests, raised questions about its effectiveness and its ability to provide an effective framework for the [33] The Decree of the President of Romania no. 909 of the 23rd of October 2007 for the organisation of a national referendum on, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 719 of the 24th of October 2007, considered to be unconstitutional, as the object of the referendum was different from that on which the Parliament was consulted, as well as the fact that "it does not set a date, but a delay" for holding the referendum (Ruling no. 7 of 2007)

[34] The Decree of the President of Romania no. 1.507 of 22 October 2009 for the organisation of a national referendum (Ruling no. 33 of 2009)

[35] Decision no. 70 of the 5th of May 1999.

[36] Thomas Poguntke, ”Introduction” in Referendums and Representative Democracy. Responsiveness, accountability and deliberation, ed. Maija Setälä and Theo Schiller (New York: Routledge, 2009), xvi.

referendum to express the political will of the people. In order to maintain the rule of law, it is necessary to address this issue seriously and responsibly so as to respect both the principle of legal certainty and the democraticaly recognized ability of citizens to make their voices heard in matters of national importance.

References

- Jean-Michel De Waele, Referendumurile de aderare la Uniunea Europeană (Iași: Editura Institutul European, 2007)
- Giorgio del Vecchio, Lecții de filosofie juridică (București: Editura Europa Nova, 1997)
- Ion Deleanu, Instituții și proceduri constituționale – în dreptul roman și comparat, (București: Editura C.H.Beck, 2006)
- Olivier Duhamel, "Le référendum – Introduction", Pouvoir no.77/1996
- Ioan Muraru, Elena Simina Tănăsescu, Constituția României. Comentarii pe articole (București: Editura C. H. Beck, 2008)
- Thomas Poguntke, "Introduction" in Referendums and Representative Democracy. Responsiveness, accountability and deliberation, ed. Maija Setälä and Theo Schiller (New York: Routledge, 2009)
- Austin Ranney, "Référendum et Démocratie", Pouvoir no.77/1996
- CDL-AD (2005)034, Referendums in Europe – an Analysis of the Legal Rules in European States, Report adopted by the Council for Democratic Elections at its 14th meeting (Venice, 20 October 2005) and the Venice Commission at its 64th plenary session (Venice, 21-22 October 2005)
- CDL-AD(2007)008rev, Code of Good Practice on Referendums
- Decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania no. 70 of the 5th of May 1999
- Ruling of the Constitutional Court of Romania no. 1 of the 15th of October 2003
- Decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania no. 147 of the 21st of February 2007
- Decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania no. 420 of the 3rd of May 2007
- Decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania no. 845 of the 8th of June 2009
- Decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania no. 731 of the 10th of July 2012
- Decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania no. 735 of the 24th of July 2012
- Decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania no. 334 of the 26th of June 2013
- Decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania no.612 of the 3rd of October 2017

THE EUROPEAN PUBLIC SYSTEM OF HUMAN RESOURCES. PERFORMANCE IN ORGANIZATIONS AND GOOD PRACTICES FOR ROMANIA

Dan-Călin BEŞLIU*

Abstract

Considering the fact that recruitment and selection activities are vital in ensuring the human resources flow in every private or public organization sector, the present paper seeks to elaborate a proposal aimed to modernize the recruiting and selection process within the Romanian public service based on best practices models implemented in other European states.

From the perspective of providing adequate training skills and abilities needed by the qualified personnel, initial training is very poor. Practical training is not on the same level of quality with theoretical one and the current system of examinations in education units, based predominantly on theoretical assessment, do not motivate learners well enough in order to gain practical skills. Continuous training programs organized by the units do not always take into account the needs of the personnel or are not adapted to the job description, the category and level of specialization of the beneficiaries' functions and the degree of novelty and utility of most of the presented theoretical information is usually low.

The costs of selecting one person for the public service are usually very high, including not only the cost of the initial recruiting, but also the long term cost, represented by the continuous training of the employee. Consequently, recruiting human resources is a basic part of both public and private systems.

Keywords: public administration, occupation of vacant public positions, recruitment methods, transparency, equal opportunities.

1. General Aspects of the Recruitment and Selection Process

The staffing process at the organizational level has been defined as a sum of activities indispensable in order to meet individual and organizational goals. Personnel recruitment and selection activities can be considered as the main ways to achieve the staffing process. The more important this process is when we talk about state authorities and institutions.

Personnel recruitment is defined as the process of seeking, locating, identifying and attracting prospective applicants from whom qualified candidates will be elected, who ultimately have the necessary professional characteristics or best fit vacant current and future posts[1]. Recruitment is also the time when a job is searched for by someone seeking a person by an organization to fill in a post. It is concluded by achieving a full concordance between the requirements of the post and the personal and professional characteristics of the person, materializing through the employment offer[2].

At the same time, the selection of personnel is that human resource management activity which consists in selecting, according to certain criteria, the most competitive or the most suitable candidate to fill in a particular post[3]. The main objective of staff selection is to identify those employees who are closest to the desired performance standards and who have the best chances to achieve individual and organizational goals.

In all European Union states, it is said that the administration is at the service of all citizens. The very term of administration comes from the Latin "administer" that translates as "agent", "helper", "servant", and in another sense - "instrument". It is therefore necessary for the recruitment and selection procedures to be finalized by selecting the most qualified persons for the fulfillment of the prerogatives of public power.

A new concept has emerged in recent years, namely the European Administrative Space, which involves a set of legally binding principles, rules and regulations that are respected in a given territorial area[4]. Each state has its own administrative culture and, implicitly, its own rules of public administration. So it can not be a single public administration for all the sovereign states of the European Union, but one can speak of the approximation in certain areas of the legislation, under the guidance of the Community legislation, the legislative activity of the European institutions and the cases of the European Court of Justice. Moreover, states borrow some from other successful experiences and practices in fields that have been the sole object of national sovereignty in the past and have proved to be somewhat permeable to change.

* PhD Candidate, Doctoral School of "Alexandru Ioan Cuza" Police Academy; Member of the Romanian Society of European Law (e-mail: dancalinbesliu@gmail.com)

[1] Aurel Manolescu, Managementul resurselor umane, Economica Publishing House, Bucharest, 2001, p. 26

[2] Cristina Manole, Managementul resurselor umane în administraţia publică, ASE Publishing House, Bucharest, 2006, p. 83

[3] Viorel Lefter, Alexandrina Deaconu, Cristian Marinaş, Eivira Nica, Irinel Marin, Ramona Puia, Managementul resurselor umane. Teorie şi practică, 2nd Edition, Economica Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008, p. 45

[4] Iorgovan Antonie, Introducere. Organizare adminitrativă. Funcţia publică, All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2005, p. 72

Administrative law in general and the public function in particular in Romania was one of these rigid domains. With the need to integrate into the structures of the European Union, the way for the modernization of the public office has been opened. This process had as its starting point the experiences of other European states which have a long democratic tradition[5].

In this paper, I chose to present the practices of France and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland as two representative states for the two systems of the civil service: the "career" system and the "post" system. We also considered that the recruitment and selection systems of these two countries contain fundamental elements in this area, which could represent good practices for Romania. This is the reason why the present paper is based on a comparison of the "career" system and the "post" system, followed by a detailed analysis of the public system of human resources in Romania.

The reform of the public office involved the reform of public recruitment, a process considered opaque and not accessible to the great majority of the population, according to the studies carried out by the European Institute of Romania, but also by the National Agency of Civil Servants.

The modernization of public service recruitment is a constantly evolving process. A first step was the establishment of principles of transparency, equal opportunities and merit, as well as the establishment of the open competition as the main recruitment method[6].

Regarding the similarity between the Romanian public recruitment system and the other European models, it can be said that the Romanian state has traditionally been close to the French one (starting with the first Civil Code adopted under Alexandru Ioan Cuza, following the model of the Napoleonic Code and continuing to the present day), taking from it numerous regulations on public administration. This is also true of the civil service, which also follows a civil servant's career model. Also, the classification of the public service in Romania (state, territorial and local) presents some common points with that in France (state, territorial and hospital). Despite these similarities, there are points that differentiate them and I might recall here the preference of the French Republic towards a competition for access to the state public function organized at national level, rather than one organized by each public authority or institution.

The approximation of French administrative law should not prevent the taking of other examples of good practice from the states that have opted for a post-civil service system. Here, the Nordic states, the Netherlands and, of course, the United Kingdom can be mentioned. It should also be mentioned here that I do not support the adoption of such a system in the case of the Romanian civil service. However, some practices of these states can be adopted and adapted, as we can see in the next analysis.

2. Recruitment to the public position in France

In the French public service, whether state, hospital or territorial, professional life is guided by the career principle. Thus, an official is recruited within a body of officials, who, depending on the position to be assigned, will be able to try out more trades. The continuity of his career is not interrupted neither by the change of employer nor by the change of activity.

A fundamental principle of access to the French civil service is the principle of equal access to public functions. This principle, governed by the statute of the civil service of 13 July 1983, is a general principle of public law and originates in Article 6 of the Declaration of Human Rights of 1789. It is the translation of the principles of democracy into the public function plan[7].

2.1. Organizing the contest for the public function of the state

Established by Article 16 of the Civil Service Statute of 1983, it is considered to be the method which ensures the greatest possible recruitment of well-trained officials from a professional point of view. There are two forms of competition: the open one, for all citizens, and the internal one, organized for existing civil servants. Most contests are annual. Article 19 of Law No. 84-16 of February 11th, 1984 on the public function of the state provides for the possibility of acceding to a public position of the state either by external competition, either by internal competition or by the third competition.

The competition can be organized nationally or deconcentrated. The ministry's competence in organizing the contest may be delegated, by joint order of the ministry with componence in that specific area and the ministry of civil service, following consultations of the technical committees, representatives of the state in the region, the department, the territory or the overseas collectivity.

The contest has several stages:

- The organization of the contest falls under the responsibility of the competent public authority. The Minister is competent to set up examination and competition centers. The publication of the job offer must be sufficient. The presence of a person who is not a jury may result in the cancellation of the contest. The number of available seats differs at each contest. All members of the jury must be established before each contest, their number being editable before the tests start.
- Establishing the list of candidates to participate in the competition. This list approved by the Minister prior to any competition, allows the elimination of candidates who do not meet all the conditions. The examination is carried out by a jury, a collegial body that must be fair and impartial, and have knowledge in the field. The jury has the possibility to draw up the list of candidates admitted, in order of merits, a list that will be forwarded to the competent authority. If deemed necessary, the jury may be in groups of examiners and, at the end of the examination, to ensure equal grading, they will deliberate on the final marks. Within the jury, with the consent of the authority invested with the power to appoint the members of the jury, special examiners may participate on certain issues. They participate in the deliberations of the jury and have a consultative vote.

[5] Cezar Corneliu Manda, Teoria administraţiei publice, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013, p. 88
[6] Abrudan Denisa, Novac Emilia, Resursele umane şi performanţa în organizaţii, Eurostampa Publishing House, Timişoara, 2013, pp. 29-33
[7] Peiser Gustave, Droit de la fonction publique, 13 ed, Dalloz, Paris, 2003, p. 38

Each contest is finalized with a list that ranks by merit candidates nominated by the jury. This jury also establishes a supplementary list to allow candidates to be replaced on the main list if, for any reason, they can not be appointed.

2.2. Recruitment in the territorial public function

The competition is the main rule for recruitment in the territorial public function. It is organized either by the National Center for Territorial Public Functions or by the Departmental or Interdepartmental Centers for the Management of Territorial Public Functions or, in some cases, directly by the collectivities.

The general conditions for access to the public office are common to all three public functions[8]:

- Age at least 16 years of age;
- French nationality or another EU Member State;
- Compliance with national service obligations in France or the state of origin;
- The fullness of the exercise of civic rights;
- Fulfillment of physical fitness conditions;
- Lack of criminal convictions.

And with regard to the condition of studies, the general provisions apply, so that for extarnal competitions applicants must submit:

- For category A: Bachelor's degree or equivalent;
- For category B: baccalaureate diploma or equivalent;
- For category C: no diploma;

There is also the possibility for candidates who do not have a diploma that allows them access to the competition, to apply for the equivalent of another diploma or, in the absence of a full diploma, to apply for the equivalence of their experience in the workplace, either in the public sector or in the private one.

European citizens have access to the territorial public function, except for the municipal police.

As in the case of the state or hospital civil service, there is the possibility of direct access to the job without a contest. Access to the first degree in certain bodies, for category C, can be done through direct recruitment by collectives. Also, people with disabilities can be recruited directly, even without meeting the conditions[9].

3. Recruitment to the public position in the United Kingdom

The documents governing the public office in the United Kingdom are the Civil Service Management Code and the Civil Service Code issued by the Civil Service Tribunal. They are issued under the Constitutional Reform Act of 2010 and come to provide specific instructions on how and when the public office functions.

According to Article 10 of the Constitutional Reform Guidance Act of April 8th, 2010, the selection of a person to hold a public office must be based on merit, based on an open and transparent competition. This rule excludes the following categories of people:

- Selection for appointment to a diplomatic post or head of a diplomatic mission;
- Selection of a special counselor;
- Selections excepted from the recruitment principles.

Special advisers are persons who hold a position in one of the following administrations and whose appointment is governed by Section 15 of the Constitutional Reform Government Act:

- Her Majesty's Government of the United Kingdom, with the following requirements:
  - The person is called to assist a Coronet Minister after being selected for appointment by that minister personally;
  - Appointment is approved by the Prime Minister;
  - The terms of appointment are approved by the Ministry of Civil Service.
- The Scottish Executive:
  - The person is called to assist the Scottish Ministers;
  - Appointment is approved by the Minister of Civil Service.
- The Welsh Government:
  - That person is called upon to assist the Welsh ministers and his appointment is approved by the Ministry of Civil Service.

3.1. Commission of the public function and its role in recruitment

Section 2 of the Governance Act for Constitutional Reform establishes the creation of a Civil Service Commission. Commissioners of the Civil Service, as well as representatives of the Civil Service Commission, lead the selection committees to fill a public position[10]. As a member of a selection committee, the Commissioner's role is to ensure the correctness of the recruitment process. The Commission is made up of commissioners and administrative staff. There are currently 13 civil servants. They are appointed by Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom upon the recommendation of the Minister of Civil Service. They are recruited under the merit system following an open competition. They are guiding their work on the basis of a Code of Conduct approved in November 2010, replacing the old Code of Conduct approved by the 1995 Council Order. Paragraph 4 of this Code sets the following Commissioners:

[8] https://www.fonction-publique.gouv.fr, accessed on January 15th, 2018, 18:40.
[9] Ibidem
[10] https://www.gov.uk/government/organisations/civil-service, accessed on January 27th, 2018, 13:15.

- They will observe the highest standards of integrity, honesty, objectivity and impartiality;
- Will operate in a transparent and open manner, informing citizens about their activities, publishing an annual report, accountability to Parliament when they are interrogated;
- Not to abuse information acquired during the service in order to obtain personal gains;
- Not to be part of any political party;
- Not to publicly support or criticize any political party.

Commissioners of the civil service share a collective responsibility in relation to their activities within the Commission. These functions refer to:

1. Supervising the principles of recruitment of civil servants based on merit, open and fair competition;
2. Creating and publishing recruitment principles;
3. Chairmanship of Selection Committees for senior public functions;
4. Control of public authorities;
5. Solving complaints under the Civil Service Code.

3.2. The recruitment process involving the Civil Service Tribunal

Commissioners for the civil service participate in recruitment procedures only to the extent required by the regulations in force. Thus, a commissioner participates as chairman of the recruitment commission in the following cases:

- For the external recruiting of permanent secretaries and competitions for salary bands 2 and 3 as well as for internal competitions for secretary and salary band 3;
- In internal or external source competitions preceded by an official request from the department concerned and with the Commission's agreement that the direct involvement of the Commissioner is timely.

Steps of the selection procedure:

a) Planning: refers to a good identification of selection criteria and their hierarchy, but also to the level of remuneration and how to publish the ad.
b) Publication of the notice. There must be open and fair advertising of the vacancy notice using appropriate means. The commissioner who chairs the competition must agree on the manner of publication.
c) Longlisting: The committee must make decisions based on the merits of the applicants at each stage of the competition. The decision is collective, and if unanimity can not be obtained, the decision is taken by majority vote.
d) Shortlisting: this stage should be completed by selecting those candidates who will be interviewed (usually 3-5 applicants are selected).
e) Pre-interview used to assist the committee in choosing the right candidate.
f) Interview with the committee and final evaluation: it is the culmination of the competition finalized with the selection of the most suitable candidate for the post. The decision shall be taken unanimously, and if this is not possible, with the agreement of the members of the committee, the decision shall be taken by a majority. If the members of the committee do not agree on the majority vote, the competition may be abandoned. Interviews last between 45 and 50 minutes for each candidate. In the case of external source competitions for a salary band 3, time may be exceeded, and the committee may opt for another way of interviewing by dividing the commission. In the final interviews it is not customary to address the salary theme. It is true that the department has posted a salary in the ad, but may vary depending on the qualifications of the candidates. Thus, the recruiting authority is free to offer a salary different from the one published (but obviously the variation may be within reasonable limits).
g) Post-interview stage: The Commissioner will write a note to the department or the agency reporting the outcome of the competition. The role of this letter is to endorse the Commission's permission to the department or agency to make the appointment. So it is up to the department or the agency to appoint to the public office, in keeping with the Commissioner's recommendations for the public office. Moreover, its department is not obliged to make an appointment unless it comes to an agreement with the candidate nominated by the selection committee. In this case, the post will be given to the candidate with the next score.

4. Modernizing the recruitment of civil servants in Romania

4.1. Recruitment of civil servants in Romania

The statute of civil servants in Romania is regulated by Law No. 188/1999, which defines the civil servant as “the person appointed, according to the law, to a public office” (Article 2, Paragraph 2).

Chapter VI, entitled Career of Civil Servants, deals extensively with the topic of recruitment in public office. Pursuant to Article 54, a person who fulfills the following conditions may hold a public position:

a) is a Romanian citizen;
b) has domicile in Romania;
c) knows Romanian, written and spoken;
d) is at least 18 years old;

e) has full exercise capacity;
f) has a state of health appropriate to the public office for which he/she is a candidate, certified on the basis of specialized medical examination;
g) fulfills the conditions of study provided by the law for the civil service;
h) fulfills the specific conditions for the employment of the public office;
i) has not been convicted of committing an offense against humanity, against the state or against authority or service, which impedes the execution of justice, forgery or acts of corruption or intentional crime, which would render it incompatible with the exercise of public office, except in the case of rehabilitation;
j) has not been dismissed from a public position in the last 7 years;
k) did not conduct political police activity, as defined by law.

Occupation of vacant public positions can be done through promotion, transfer, redistribution and competition (Article 56). The conditions for participation and the procedure for the organization of the contest will be determined under the present law and the contest will be organized and managed accordingly:

a) by a competition commission for senior civil servants;
b) by the National Agency of Civil Servants, for the occupation of vacant pumnmmblic civil service, except for the public office of the head of office and head of department;
c) by the public authorities and institutions in the central and local public administration, for the occupation of the public office of the head of the office and the head of the service, as well as for the filling of the public execution positions and respectively the specific public vacancies with the opinion of the National Agency of Civil Servants.

The competition is based on the principle of open competition, transparency, professional merits and competence, as well as equal access to public functions for every citizen who fulfills the legal conditions. The conditions of the contest will be published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part III, at least 30 days before the date of the contest. The persons participating in the contest must meet the seniority requirements in the civil service specialty provided by the present law. The conditions for the participation and the conduct of the contest, the bibliography and other data necessary for the competition to be displayed, shall be displayed at the headquarters of the public authority organizing the contest and on its website.

The procedure for organizing and conducting competitions is established by a Government decision, at the proposal of the National Agency of Civil Servants, according to the principles and conditions established by the statute[11].

G.D. No. 611/2008[12] on the organization and development of civil servants' career, stipulates that recruitment of civil servants is carried out through a competition organized within the limits of the vacant public positions, provided annually for this purpose through the civil service plan. We observe from this legal regulation that competition is established as a rule, a recruitment method that dominates all national systems and the European civil service system, thus becoming the common law in the recruitment of civil servants[13].

Once the conditions stipulated by the law have been met in order to enter a public office, the candidate wishing to apply has to take part in the competition for the respective civil service. The contest consists of three stages[14]:

I. Selection of registration dossiers;
II. Written test;
III. Interview.

So a first step is to submit a registration dossier. This file is to be reviewed by the contest committee to verify that the conditions for participation are met.

The written test consists of elaborating a synthesis work or solving some grid tests in the presence of the competition committee. The purpose of the test is to verify the degree of speciality knowledge of the candidate, the necessary knowledge in the exercise of public office.

The written test and the interview are scored with points from 1 to 100 each. It is believed that the candidate who has achieved a minimum of 50 points for public execution positions and 70 points for leadership has been promoted. In order to promote the contest, the final score must be at least 100 cumulative points on both samples. Candidates who have passed the two tests are admitted. The interview can only be sustained after the written test has been promoted.

The competition commissions, as well as those for solving the appeals, are constituted by an administrative act of the head of the authority or the public institution organizing the contest. The membership in the contest committee is incompatible with that of the member of the appeal panel. The appointment of the president of the contest committee, respectively the resolution of the contestations, is done by the administrative act for setting up commissions among their members[15].

[11] Ibidem
[12] Government Decision No. 611/2008 (H.G. nr. 611/2008)
[13] Iorgovan Antonie, op. cit., p. 74
[14] Ioan Alexandru*, Dreptul Administrativ în Uniunea Europeană*, Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 2007, p. 93
[15] Marius Profiroiu (coordinator), Tudorel Andrei, Dragoş Dincă, Radu Carp, Study no. 3: Reform of public administration in the context of European integration, European Institute of Romania – Impact studies, pp. 19-23

Members of the competition commission or the appeal panel may not be members of the dignitary, husband, wife, relative, or cobbler (4th degree of kinship) including any of the candidates.

At the request of the interested candidates, the authority or public organizing authority of the contest shall make available to them the documents drawn up by the contest committee, respectively the resolution of appeals, which are information of public interest. Also, the public authority or institution that organized the contest is obliged to ensure that each candidate has access to the individual work written in the written test of the contest upon his request.

4.2. Particularities of recruitment and selection in the three analyzed countries

Table 1: Comparison on recruitment and selection in France, UK and Romania

Criterion	Similarities	Differences
Legislative framework	In all three countries subject to the analysis there are legislative regulations on the recruitment and selection process.	While in France and Romania these processes are governed by clear rules (Law No. 83-634 of 13 July 13th, 1983 on the Rights and Obligations of Officials, Law No. 84-16 of January 11th, 1984 on State Public Function, Law No. 84-53 of January 26th, 1984 for the territorial public function, namely Law No. 188/1999 on the status of civil servants, Government Decision No. 611/2008 on the organization and development of the career of civil servants) in the UK we meet the Civil Service Code and the Civil Service Code.
Access conditions	In France and Romania the conditions of clear access stipulated in the legislative norms regulating this area and mainly concern the following aspects: French or Romanian nationality or a member of the European Economic Area, the exercise of their civil rights, the lack of a criminal record make them incompatible with the exercise of a state function, the fulfillment of psychological skills requirements for the exercise of the position.	In the UK, the public office is governed by the principle of merit. Thus, even the document titled Recruitment Principles states that merit implies the appointment of the most appropriate person for that function. Therefore, certain conditions of general access are not expressly regulated, since the agencies and departments are the only ones able to determine the requirements for each post. However, there are some conditions of professional and senior experience for the senior public and Top 200.
Principles of the civil service	All three states recognize general principles as free access to public office, the transparency of the recruitment process.	It should be noted that while in France and Romania these principles are found in the statutes regulating the activity of public servants, it was considered necessary in the United Kingdom to adopt a distinct document (Principles of Recruitment) in order to make these principles.
Recruitment methods	In all three countries the contest is preponderantly seen as a recruitment method. Apart from the competition, there is also the possibility of being recruited without a competition in the public function of the state for functions in category C. In France, autonomy in the recruitment of agencies and departments is the same.	Although concussion prevails in all three countries, there are some peculiarities. In France, the competition is conducted separately for the public function of the state and for the territorial public function, while there is a distinction between competitions for the categories of functions

		(A, B or C)[1]. In Romania, the contest has a relatively homogeneous character, being regulated in detail by the legislative framework. In the UK, agencies and departments have great autonomy in determining how to conduct the contest.
Running the contest	As a rule, the contest involves passing a written (theoretical) stage as well as an oral phase.	In the United Kingdom, more emphasis is placed on the interview stage.
The organizing institution of the contest		In France: for the public function of the state, ministries and other central or deconcentrated authorities, and for the territorial public function, the National Center for Territorial Public Functions. In Romania: public authorities and institutions in central and local public administration[2]. In the UK: each agency and department, and for some functions, with the participation of the Civil Service Commission.
The institution for the control and coordination of the recruitment process		In France: the Ministry of Public Service at central level and the National Center for Territorial Public Function at local level. In Romania: National Agency for Civil Service. In the UK: The Civil Service Commission through its specialized commissions.
Facilities for young people and disadvantaged categories of people		In France, the PACTE program; in the UK, the fast-track program.

4.3. SWOT analysis of the recruitment process in the public service in Romania

4.3.1. Strenghts

- A well-regulated normative framework by the existence of Law No. 188/1999 on the status of civil servant and G.D. No. 611 of June 4th, 2008 for the approval of the norms regarding the organization and development of the civil servants' career. Moreover, there is an interest in updating the legislation in this area in the sense of modernizing the public function. Thus, Law No. 188/1999 was amended by Law No. 251/2006, but also by various emergency ordinances.
- The National Agency of Civil Servants has the legal and institutional capacity to monitor and evaluate the performance of recruitment and selection activities of public institution staff.
- The predominant application of the contest method for public recruitment. As mentioned above, it is considered to be the most appropriate recruitment method. Also, by organizing the multi-stage contest (submission of files, written exam, interview), a better selection of candidates is ensured.
- Advertising of competitions (on the site of the institution, at its headquarters, on the ANFP (Romanian National Agency of Civil Servants) website, in the Official Journal for certain functions) ensures the access of a good part of the population. Moreover, citizens' access to information on the activity of public institutions is doubled by Law No. 544 of October 12th, 2001 on free access to information of public interest
- Publication of the Agency's recruitment and promotion reports. On a semi-annual basis, the ANFP publishes on its website a report on the situation of recruitment competitions in the public, central, territorial and local level.
- Developing by ANFP guides and manuals aimed at facilitating legal provisions in the field of civil service and civil servants. Regarding recruitment, a Guide on Recruitment and Promotion of Civil Servants has been developed, a guideline available in electronic format, free of charge, on the Agency's website.

[1] https://www.legifrance.gouv.fr, accessed on February 5th, 2018, 11:45.
[2] http://www.anfp.gov.ro/continut/Informatii_de_interes_public, accessed on February 7th, 2018, 15:30.

- Giving autonomy in recruitment to the local public office.

4.3.2. Weaknesses

- In the perception of citizens, but also in the specialized studies carried out, it is considered that the recruitment and selection processes are not fully ensured, that the involved staff is not specialized and that performance indicators are not used in a proper manner.
- There is a strong political influence on the recruitment process. Among the conditions of access to a public office the prohibition to be a member of any party is not mentioned specifically. Moreover, in Ordinance No. 611/2008 it is stated that during the selection interview, it is forbidden for the evaluators to ask questions regarding political affiliation.
- Personnel responsible for human resource management do not always have sufficient knowledge to identify those truly prepared candidates, limiting themselves to using the recruitment and selection tools required by law.
- There are few sources of information available to potential candidates. There is no public recruitment portal. Announcements on recruitment competitions posted on the ANFP website are insufficient and incomplete in the sense that they do not cover all central and local posts and all the information necessary for participation in the competition, being limited to the announcement of the contest and the sending on the organizing institution's website.
- Excessive autonomy of public authorities and institutions in organizing the contest: setting up an evaluation and resolution committee, setting bibliography and contest evidence, as well as specific participation conditions.
- Establishment of seniority conditions for participation in the recruitment competition organized to fill public positions, minimizing professional competence and disfavoring the promotion of young people:

– 1 year in the specialty of the studies necessary for the participation in the recruitment competition organized for the occupation of civil servants in the first grade, 8 months for filling the civil servants of second grade or sixth grade professional for employment of the third grade professional civil servants;

– 5 years in the specialty of the studies necessary for the exercise of the public function for the occupation of the public functions of execution of the main professional degree;

– 9 years in the specialty of the studies necessary for the exercise of the public function for the occupation of the higher professional public execution positions;

– 2 years in the specialty of the studies necessary for the exercise of the public office for occupying the leading positions of the head of office, head of department and secretary of the commune;

– 5 years in the specialty of studies necessary for the exercise of public office for the other public management positions.

- As regards the bibliography required in order to support a contest, great emphasis was placed on memorizing normative acts and less on testing candidates' skills or on case studies and practical exercises.
- Lack of regulations to facilitate the employment of people with disabilities.
- Lack of regulations to promote the employment of young graduates.

4.3.3. Opportunities

- An intense concern of ANFP in the sense of collaboration with international bodies for the exchange of experience for the modernization of the public office:

a) Collaboration of ANFP-OECD-SIGMA (Support for Improvement in Governance and Management) based on ideas that were funded by the European Commission;

– ANFP together with OECD-SIGMA organized as the main partner the Central Unit for Public Administration Reform, the Public Sector Quality Management Seminar – Romania, regional level.

– Making a technical visit to the OECD headquarters in Paris of a team of ANFP representatives to discuss the modernization of the public office.

– Carrying out a case study entitled Development of the Civil Service Career in Romania – Comparative ex-ante and ex-post comparative study.

b) ANFP-Council of Europe: ANFP managed a project with financial assistance from the Council of Europe – Ethical Policies: Mechanisms and Instruments – a project that proposed the pilot use of two innovative tools used by quality management in several Romanian public institutions and authorities (these are scoring cards and peer reviews). The result was the publication of the Manual of Ethical Procedures.

c) The ANFP-EIPA (European Institute for Public Administration) collaboration through EPSA (European Public Sector Award)

d) The ANFP Collaboration and the EUPAN Network, which proves to be a forum for exchange of experience and good practice information, allowing a comparative perspective of the Member States' reforms and modernization measures

- The possibility of absorption of structural funds for the development of human resources both through the Sectoral Operational Program of Development for Human Resources, but also through the Administrative Capacity Development Operational Program.
- Developing partnerships with similar institutions from other countries, such as France, Belgium, UK, for the exchange of know-how.

4.3.4. Threats

- The negative image of the status of civil servants in the opinion of the citizens, which determines a low degree of attractiveness for the young graduates;

- Low payroll level;
- The current economic, social and political crisis;
- The high degree of migration of civil servants to the private sector;
- Excessive bureaucracy;
- Resistance to change;
- Legislative instability;
- Changing parties from the governance process.

4.3.5. Recommendations

1. Establishment and development of well-defined performance indicators for the career development of civil servants.
2. Diminishing the number of public positions that can be filled on political criteria, through political appointments.
3. Diminishing the political interference in the competition for recruitment and selection of civil servants.
4. More specialization of staff responsible for the recruitment and selection of civil servants.
5. Use of sources of information on the availability of a vacancy and the manner of conducting the competition, more accessible to potential candidates.
6. Reduce seniority for public service promotion.
7. The transition from an evaluation (for the purpose of employing public functions) based on memorization to the testing of skills and competences.
8. Introduce specific regulations to help disadvantaged categories of staff (disabled persons).
9. Introduce measures in order to implement equal opportunities policy by encouraging women's promotion.
10. Encourage the attraction of young graduates to public sector activities.

4.4. The results of the analysis undertaken and the elaboration of a model for improving the process of recruitment and selection of civil servants in Romania

Starting from the particularities of the recruitment and selection process in the three countries as well as from the ones identified with the SWOT analysis, several proposals can be made to improve the recruitment and selection in public function in Romania, as follows:

1. In terms of recruitment sources:

a) Establishment of a National Administration Institute (similar to the Ecole Nationale d'Administration), as an autonomous institution, for the initial training of civil servants holding public functions at central and territorial level. The Institute would have its headquarters in Bucharest for the initial training of civil servants from central structures and territorial offices in each region (the eight development regions established by Law No. 151/1998 could be taken as territorial units). Graduation of such an institute allows the automatic occupation of a leading public office or a high public office. By this measure, I believe that the professionalisation of high-level public functions will be ensured.

b) The access to the schooling within this institute is done through a contest, organized under conditions of transparency, equality of opportunity and merit.

c) Local public officials, whether leaders or executives, can join anyone who fulfills the general and specific conditions for a public office.

2. As regards the competition for recruitment:

a) For Central Public Execution Functions, they propose to organize a national competition by ANFP, similar to the competition for a state public office in France. Thus, all eligible citizens can participate in the contest and those declared admitted will be placed on a list with an established validity period (at least two years), a list which will determine their distribution, in order of the score obtained in the competition, in public positions. In this way, the arbitrariness of competitions organized by each public authority or institution can be eliminated.

b) For the public functions in the territory, a competition will be held at the level of each county following that the declared candidates admitted to be assigned to public positions within the county where they held the contest.

c) For the public functions in the territory a competition will be organized at the level of each county, following that the declared candidates admitted to be assigned to public positions within the county where they held the contest.

d) For local public functions, based on the principle of administrative decentralization, a competition is organized by the recruiting authority.

e) The contest has the following stages:

– Verification of fulfillment of the participation conditions by the evaluation committee;

– Written evaluation by a test that includes sections to verify: Candidate's knowledge of the Romanian language (grammar and spelling), logical reasoning of the candidate;

– Oral evaluation to check on one hand the candidate's specialized knowledge and on the other hand the ability to cope with concrete situations from the practice of public servants.

f) The bibliography for the contest should be limited to the normative acts that are essential for the activity within the public authority or institution that recruits.

3. Implementing regulations to encourage youth recruitment:

a) Decreasing the duration of seniority;

b) Developing opportunities for rapid promotion.

4. Regarding the ways in which posts are advertised:

a) Creating a public function portal where all vacant public functions can be traced;

b) The possibility for declared candidates admitted to the national or county competition to apply online to public posts.

5. With regard to monitoring the conduct of competitions, I am proposing the establishment of a Public Service Committee similar to that of the United Kingdom and the Civil Service Commission. It would be made up of personalities recognized as specialists in public administration, and it would be the primary responsibility to oversee the process of recruitment, to ensure that it is carried out in accordance with the principles of transparency, equal opportunities and merit, and to resolve complaints about irregularities reported by candidates, members of the evaluation or appeal commissions or other persons proving a legitimate interest.

5. Conclusions

The paper proposed a comparative view of the process of public recruitment and selection in France and the UK and the identification of those practices that could be taken, implemented and adapted to the factual situation in Romania.

While maintaining the current structure of the public (state, regional and local) civil service, as well as the current civil service career system and starting from the weaknesses identified in public recruitment, I selected some proposals in order to improve the procedures for filling the vacant public positions:

- Re-establishment of a National Institute of Administration to ensure the initial training of a class of prestigious public servants;
- Organizing a national competition for central government positions at the expense of the competition organized by each authority and institution;
- Implementing regulations to encourage the promotion of young people;
- Create a public function portal with up-to-date information on where to keep track of all vacant public functions;
- Establishment of a Civil Service Commission to supervise the conduct of competitions according to the principles of transparency, equal opportunities and merit.

All these measures would have the primary objective of improving the overall image of civil servants and as secondary objectives:

- Limitation of political interference;
- Transforming the body of civil servants into an elite social class;
- Increase the professionalism of civil servants;
- Increase the transparency of the public recruitment and selection process.

Romania has taken important steps towards opening up its public function and its orientation towards the democratic principles of the rule of law, but this process needs to be further developed and improved.

References

- Abrudan Denisa, Novac Emilia, Resursele umane şi performanţa în organizaţii, Eurostampa Publishing House, Timişoara, 2013
- Alexandru Ioan, Dreptul Administrativ în Uniunea Europeană, Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 2007
- Iorgovan Antonie, Introducere. Organizare administrativă. Funcţia publică, All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2005
- Lefter Viorel, Deaconu Alexandrina, Marinaş Cristian, Nica Elvira, Marin Irinel, Puia Ramona, Managementul resurselor umane. Teorie şi practică, 2nd Edition, Economica Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008
- Cezar Corneliu Manda, Teoria administraţiei publice, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013
- Manole Cristina, Managementul resurselor umane în administraţia publică, ASE Publishing House, Bucharest, 2006
- Manolescu Aurel, Managementul resurselor umane, Economica Publishing House, Bucharest, 2001
- Peiser Gustave, Droit de la fonction publique, 13 ed, Dalloz, Paris, 2003
- Profiroiu Marius (coordinator), Andrei Tudorel, Dincă Dragoş, Carp Radu, Study no. 3: Reform of public administration in the context of European integration, European Institute of Romania – Impact Studies
- https://www.gov.uk/government/organisations/civil-service, the official website of UK civil servants
- https://www.fonction-publique.gouv.fr, the official website of French officials
- https://www.legifrance.gouv.fr, the legislative site of the French Republic
- http://www.anfp.gov.ro/continut/Informatii_de_interes_public, the official website of the Romanian National Agency of Civil Servants

THE FREE MOVEMENT OF JUDGMENTS AND JUDICIAL DECISIONS

Gheorghe BOCSAN[*]

Abstract

EU substantive law is based on a system of circulation freedoms which encompasses the idea that the Union, its internal market or other areas of legal rule, such as the area of freedom, security and justice are, above all, spaces of liberty, which rejects the limits represented before by internal borders. So, the essential EU integrative concepts could be formulated as free circulation principles or instruments aiming to such freedoms. The free movement of judgments and judicial decisions represents concomitantly the consequence and the expression formulated through freedom of circulation, which is specific to EU law, of the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions between member states in both civil and criminal matters. This principle is based upon the mutual trust that member states owes to each other. Finally, the study analyses the principle of mutual recognition in EU law as a transplant from the internal market in the judicial cooperation in criminal matters, which produces numerous application instruments, among them the first and most productive is the European Arrest Warrant.

This paper studies also the common standard and paradigm that all instruments based upon the free movement of judgments and judicial decision have, amongst others: the warrant/order typology, direct communication between the competent authorities of Member States, elimination of the recognition procedure, the express mentioning of the mandatory and optional grounds of refusal, the partial removal of double criminality requirement etc.

Keywords: EU substantive law, free circulation of judgments and judicial decisions, area of freedom, security and justice, the principle of mutual recognition, judicial cooperation in criminal matter.

Introduction

The process of integration necessary for the construction and development of the European Union presupposes the coexistence of a horizontal dimension, usually called harmonization, which aims to "remove any frictions that arise between different systems, thereby achieving legal harmony"[1], and of a vertical dimension, represented by the approximation of laws, which is often achieved by setting minimum rules. Separately from these concepts, within the field of judicial cooperation, the free movement of judgments and judicial decisions, the consequence of the application of the principle of mutual recognition, also functions in an integrative way. The latter principle has numerous applications in Union law, its origins being found in the internal market field.

The European Union's substantive law is based on a system of freedoms of movement, which captures the idea that the Union's space, whether regarding the internal market, or other areas of legal regulation, such as the area of freedom, security and justice, is above all an area of freedom that removes the barriers previously represented by the borders between Member States. Thus, the essential integrative concepts of the Union can usually be expressed in a language specific to substantive law, or they can be formulated as freedoms of movement or as instruments having the purpose of such freedoms. From the free movement of goods, persons, services, capital and payments, specific to the definition and development of an internal market, the free movement of official documents issued by Member States (such as driving licenses, study diplomas, attestations and qualifications etc.), and then to the free movement of judgments and judicial decisions, first regarding the civil matters, and after the Amsterdam and Nice Treaties, also regarding criminal matters.

This study shows that the free movement of judgments and judicial decision within the space of liberty, security and justice of the European Union derives from the principle of mutual recognition, which was implemented in that space from the internal market. Part of the doctrine sustains that idea and part of it disagrees, as we will explain bellow.

1. The concept of free movement of judgments and judicial decisions

As previously stated, the free movement of judgments and judicial decisions represents the expression formulated by means of the concept of freedom of movement, specific to the substantive law of the European Union and, at the same time, the consequence of the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions between Member States (both in civil and criminal matters). This principle also relies, in its turn, on the trust that must exist between the legal systems of the Member States.

[*] PhD Candidate "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: gbocsan@gmail.com)

[1] F. Calderoni, Organized Crime Legislation in the European Union – Harmonization and Approximation of Criminal Law, National Legislation and the EU Framework Decision on the Fight Against Organized Crime, Springer Heidelberg, Dordrecht, London, New York, 2010, p. 4.

The fundamental treaties do not define the principle of mutual recognition, neither in terms of its specific aspect regarding the internal market (since the concept has originated and developed in this context), nor in the field of judicial cooperation in civil or criminal matters. As regards the consequence of its application, namely the freedom of movement of judgments and judicial decisions, the Treaties do not even mention this notion. Thus, the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU) merely establishes that the principle of mutual recognition referred to in this study is the basis on which judicial cooperation in civil and criminal matters is built within the Union (Article 81 (1) and Article 82 (1) TFEU). As for the case of judicial cooperation in civil matters, the Treaty extends the field of mutual recognition of judicial also to extrajudicial decisions, while, in the field of judicial cooperation in criminal matters, the principle of mutual recognition remains strictly in the judicial area. The promotion of full application of mutual recognition in the area of freedom, security and justice is underlined by art. 70 of TFEU, which establishes the need for objective periodic evaluations regarding the application of this principle.

Another fundamental idea set out by the two articles mentioned above (Articles 81 and 82 of TFEU) is that the approximation of Member States' laws and regulations is subordinated to the aim of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions (and regarding the case of judicial cooperation in civil matters also of extrajudicial decisions, such as the notary or arbitral ones).

Under these circumstances, it is up to other legal sources, doctrine and jurisprudence to define the concepts.

Thus, the European Commission Information Sheet entitled "Recognition of decisions between EU countries"[2] states that "Mutual recognition of judicial decisions is a process whereby a decision usually adopted by a judicial authority in a Member State of the European Union is recognized and, where necessary, enforced by another State of the Union as if it was a decision taken by the judicial authorities of that latter State".

Further, a distinction is made between traditional judicial cooperation involving an interstate relationship whereby a sovereign state is applying to another sovereign state, the latter having the power to decide whether to respond to the request and the system of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions, which presupposes the automatic recognition by the judicial authorities of a State of "decisions taken by the judicial authorities of another Member State of the Union with a minimum of formalities and with very few exceptions".

The same document clearly underlines the idea that: „A free circulation of persons must correspond to a free circulation of judicial decisions. This is the point where the principle of mutual recognition leads to a real change in the philosophy of judicial cooperation. "

These ideas were synthesized on the basis of other documents, mainly the Presidency Conclusions of the meetings of the European Council, to which we will extensively refer within this study.

We consider this text of the European Commission to be of particular importance because it describes, in a highly concentrated, but at the same time very comprehensive manner, the strong connection between the principle of mutual recognition, its practical consequence, the free movement of judicial decisions and the fundamental freedoms of the Union, which make up its substantive law. Moreover, the free movement of judgments and judicial decisions itself becomes a fundamental freedom of the Union, a freedom that is generated by substantive law, but at the same time it facilitates the realization of the other four fundamental freedoms. Judgments and judicial decisions directly relate to individuals, to their legal status as parties of a litigation or judicial proceedings. Decisions of the judiciary also refer to the legal status of goods, services, capital and payments, depending on the subject matter of the dispute. All these entities enjoy the freedom of movement. It thus appears that those decisions, by means of an etiological effect, having as subjects or object, entities that enjoy the freedom of movement, enjoy themselves the same freedom, the one of being recognized and implemented anywhere within the European Union for the purpose of producing the legal effects for which they were adopted.

The reform regarding the concept of judicial cooperation requires that the freedom of movement of judicial decisions is, in principle, unconditional, with few exceptions and only minimal formalities. The basis of the new philosophy is the principle of mutual trust, according to which the Member States must trust the legal and judicial systems of other Member States. The principle was developed exclusively by jurisprudence, but built relating to a fundamental principle, provided by Article 4 (3) of the Treaty on European Union (hereinafter abbreviated as the TEU), the principle of loyal cooperation, under which "Member States shall respect and assist each other in performing the tasks resulting from the Treaties". These "missions" include the provision for the citizens of the Union, of an "area of freedom, security and justice, without internal borders, under which the free movement of persons is ensured, in conjunction with adequate measures on external border control, asylum, immigration, crime prevention and combating of this phenomenon" (Article 3(2) of the TEU). Combating the phenomenon of crime at the Union`s level and within its area of freedom, security and justice, referred to in the previous article quoted from the TEU, is nothing but the potentiation of police activity, of the law enforcement agencies in criminal matters, of the prosecutors and courts, including the idea of building and developing the capacity of these bodies' decisions to take also effect in other states of the Union, different from those of the forum.

[2] European Commission. Justice. Building a European Area of Justice. "Recognition of decisions between EU countries", only in English language, in electronic format at the address http://ec.europa.eu/justice/criminal/recognition-decision/index_en.htm , accessed on January 18, 2018.

Another important reference to the free movement of judgments and judicial decisions is made in the preamble of the first concrete legal instrument developed by the Council, based on the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions in criminal matters, namely the Framework Decision 2002/584 /JHA[3]. Thus, the third sentence of paragraph 5 from the preamble to the Framework Decision states that: "The classical cooperation relations which have so far dominated the Member States should be replaced by a system of free movement of judicial decisions in criminal matters, both those preceding the conviction and the final sentence, in an area of freedom, security and justice. "

This is the point when we raise the issue of a system of free movement of judgments and judicial decisions in criminal matters, based on the principle of mutual recognition. In the case of the Framework Decision 2002/584 / JHA, the purpose of free movement of judgments and judicial decisions is that of the previous extradition procedure and of the surrender of defendants or convicts, for the purposes of prosecution, trial or execution of sentences in another State of the Union, other than the one in whose territory the defendant or convict is present at that specific moment.

Regarding this context, paragraph 6 of the preamble to the same Framework Decision states that: "The European arrest warrant provided for in this Framework Decision is the first concrete measure in the field of criminal law implementing the principle of mutual recognition which the European Council referred to as the «cornerstone» of judicial cooperation".

In the field of judicial cooperation, a particularly important legislative act of the European Union, namely Regulation (EU) No. 1215/2012 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 12 December 2012, on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters[4], at point 6 of the preamble clearly expresses the idea that the free movement of judgments in the matter of civil and criminal law represents an objective of the Union[5].

In view of the above, we define the free movement of judgments and judicial decisions as the consequence, expressed in the form of a freedom and specific to the substantive law of the European Union, of the application of the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions, representing the basis of judicial cooperation in civil and criminal matters, as instrument for achieving the legal integration at the Union`s level.

The principle of mutual recognition appears as a contemporary basis for judicial cooperation, but the TFEU seeks to approximate the laws and regulations of the Member States, in particular by laying down mandatory minimum standards, as an integration method that can be used to facilitate mutual recognition, or complementary to it (Article 81 (1) and Article 82 (1) TFEU). Thus, mutual recognition is a horizontal method of legal integration, and approximation of laws is the vertical integration method. The former is an application of mutual trust, which must exist between the judicial systems of the Member States, while the latter is an expression of the primacy of the Union law.

2. Historical milestones

As Union law rarely refers to the concept of free movement of judgments and judicial decisions, but it pays attention to the principle of mutual recognition as a precondition, we will continue to focus on the historical evolution of this principle. The origin of the concept of mutual recognition is found in the matter of the internal market of the European Union. The Treaty establishing the European Economic Community (TEEC) did not contain, in its original form, provisions regarding such a principle.

The principle was created by the case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union and was designed to better respond to the desiderate of ensuring the free movement of goods within the common market (later, the Union's internal market).

2.1. The principle of mutual recognition in the matter of the internal market of the Union

In summary, "Mutual recognition ensures market access for products that are not subject to EU harmonisation. It guarantees that any product lawfully sold in one EU country can be sold in another. This is

[3] Framework decision from 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States 2002/584/JAI, OJ L 190/1, in electronic format at http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/HTML/?uri=CELEX:32002F0584&from =EN, accessed on January 18, 2018.

[4] Regulation (EU) no. 1215/2012 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 12 December 2012 on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgements in civil and commercial matters, published in OJ L 351/1 from 20.12.2012, accessed in electronic format at the address, http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/HTML/?uri=CELEX:32012R1215&from=EN on February 10, 2018.

[5] The Regulation quoted at note no. 4, preamble, point (6): "In order to attain the objective of free circulation of judgments in civil and commercial matters, it is necessary and appropriate that the rules governing jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments be governed by a legal instrument of the Union which is binding and directly applicable".

possible even if the product does not fully comply with the technical rules of the other country."[6]

The Treaty establishing the European Economic Community (hereinafter abbreviated TEEC) did not contain, in its original form, provisions relating to such a principle.

The adopting of mutual recognition within the internal market has been achieved because all measures to harmonize / approximate the legislation adopted by the Union through a long standardization of goods have failed to fully ensure their free movement within the internal market. Since the free movement of goods constitutes one of the fundamental freedoms of the Union and is part of its substantive law, the assurance of the full exercise of this freedom is an important objective for the Union legislature.

2.1.1. The jurisprudential basis of the principle of mutual recognition. "Cassis de Dijon".

As we have expressed above, the principle of mutual recognition, as a general principle within the internal market, has been established by jurisprudence, through the so-called "Cassis de Dijon"[7] case. The legal fact that generated the dispute between the Rewe Zentral AG and the Federal Administration of the German Alcohol Monopoly, constituted a prohibition on the marketing of alcoholic beverages on the German market, which did not meet the standards laid down by the domestic law of that State. The applicant, the German company importing "Cassis de Dijon" fruit alcoholic beverage in Germany, argued that the German law in question constituted a "barrier to the free movement of goods between Member States, going beyond the trade rules reserved to them" and being "an effect equivalent to a quantitative restriction on imports, contrary to the Art. 30 of the EEC Treaty[8] "[9].

The Court of Justice ruled exactly according to the idea advocated by the applicant during the main proceedings, when the main questions were raised, but what is really important from the point of view of accrediting a principle of mutual recognition directly related to the free movement of goods, is the wording of point 14, paragraph 4 of the judgment, which states that 'there is therefore no valid reason to prevent alcoholic beverages from being lawfully manufactured and marketed in one of the Member States that may be introduced in any other Member State without the lawful prohibition on the marketing of such beverages having an alcoholic strength below the limit laid down by national legislation."

The direct conclusion of this finding made by the Court of Justice was that any product lawfully marketed in a Member State market may be imported and marketed on the market of another Member State, even if it does not meet the requirements of the national law of that State. This idea is nothing more than the principle of mutual recognition applicable in the internal market of the Union, in a direct and indestructible relationship with the free movement of goods.

2.1.2. Single European Act

A first establishment within the EEC Treaty of the principle of mutual recognition in the matter of the internal market arose with the first regulation of the approximation of laws within the same context.

Thus, the Single European Act[10], by means of art. 18, introduced within EEC Treaty art. 100A, which provided for the possibility of approximating the laws of the Member States in order to facilitate the free movement of goods, persons, services and payments in the common market. At that time, the approximation of legislation, particularly through standardization, has been seen as the most appropriate and effective way to ensure the principles of substantive Community law. However, as a result of the decision of the Court of Justice, regarding" Cassis de Dijon" case and the development of the legal reflection on mutual recognition that followed, almost ten years later, Article 100B (1) (2) notes as follows: "The Council, acting in accordance with the provisions of Article 100A, may decide that the provisions in force in a Member State shall be recognized as equivalent to those applied in another Member State ".

Notwithstanding this highly progressive provision introduced within the EEC Treaty by the Sigle European Act, the community has not developed until late, specific instruments for the principle of mutual recognition in the internal market. The main reason for this situation lies in the excitement at the time with the approximation of laws, especially through standardization, which has been regarded for decades as the most appropriate method for creating and stimulating the internal market.

Thus, a prime example of this attitude is the Council Resolution of 1999 on the role of standardization in Europe[11], which represents a real worship of the idea, miraculous method of solving all problems related to the internal market of the Union.

---

[6] The document" European Commission. Economic growth. Single European Market. Single Goods Market. Free movement in harmonized and non-harmonized sectors. Mutual recognition.", published in English language, in electronic format, at the address http://ec.europa.eu/growth/single-market/goods/free-movement-sectors/mutual-recognition_en , accessed on 19 January 2018.

[7] The decision of the Court of Justice from 20 February 1979 ruled in the case C-120/8, preliminary decision Rewe Zentral AG v. Bundesmonopolverwaltung für Brantwein, ECLI:EU:C:1979:42, in electronic format, at, http://curia.europa.eu/juris/show Pdf.jsf; jsessionid= 9ea7d2dc30dd7f53bdd76175434793478b6be99d05d3.e34KaxiLc3qMb40Rch0SaxyNb3v0?text=&docid=90055&pageIndex=0&doclang= EN&mode=req&dir=&occ=first&part=1&cid=230651 ,accessed on January 19, 2018.

[8] The article interdicts quantitative restrictions on import and measures with an effect equivalent thereto.

[9] Point 4 from the decision of the Court of Justice quoted in note 7 of this study.

[10] Single European Act signed in Luxembourg on 17 February 1986 and effective as of 1 July 1987, published in OJ L 189/1 from 29.6.87.

[11] The Council Resolution from 28 October 1999 on the role of standardization in Europe, published in OJ C 141 from 19.5.2000, p. 0001-0004, in English language, in electronic format at the address http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/HTML/?uri= CELEX:32000Y0519(01)&from=RO, accessed on January 19, 2018.

In the sense of what has been said, we bring as a relevant example the preamble to the Decision 3052/95/EC[12], according to which the approximation of laws gives adequate results in the internal market, so that the principle of mutual recognition is not particularly relevant.

2.1.3. Subsequent to the Single European Act

The above presented vision, which gives an overvalued credit for the harmonization and approximation of internal market legislation, would last for a long time until the signing of the Treaty of Lisbon. Only at that moment, mutual recognition has been used to its true value for the Union's internal market.

Since we have referred to the Decision 3052/95 / EC of the European Parliament and of the Council, which is tributary to the approximation of laws within the common market, we note that it was repealed and that the priority given to harmonization would cease definitively by Regulation (EC) No. 764/2008 of the European Parliament and of the Council[13].

Thus, as the preamble to the regulation clearly states, the principle of mutual recognition within the internal market area, which has been judicially established and then introduced into the EEC Treaty by the Single European Act, was not given due consideration, but the steps initiated by that regulation would totally change this situation.

2.1.4. Mutual recognition of diplomas, certificates and other titles of formal qualifications

Considered as an application of the principle of mutual recognition in the field of freedom of movement of persons, in particular as regards the right of establishment, this type of mutual recognition was first established by the provisions of Article G.13 of the Treaty on European Union[14], which amended the provisions of art. 57 of the EEC Treaty, so that point 1 of the article acquires the following form: "In order to facilitate the access to and the exercise of independent activities, the Council, acting in accordance with the procedure of art.189b, adopts directives on the mutual recognition of the diplomas, certificates and other administrative acts of the Member States which are the subject of a qualification. "

A similar statement is also used by art. 53 par. (1) TFEU as a result of the Treaty of Lisbon [15].

2.1.5. Amsterdam Treaty and Recognition of Judicial and Extrajudicial Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters

Article 2 (15) of the Treaty of Amsterdam[16] introduced within the text of the Treaty establishing the European Community (EC Treaty) Title III. a, entitled "Visas, asylum, immigration and other policies related to the free movement of persons", and the text of art. 73m (a), notes as follows: "Measures in the field of judicial cooperation in civil matters with cross-border implications to be adopted pursuant to Article 73o as long as they are necessary for the proper functioning of the internal market include: (a) improving and simplifying: the cross-border system for the use of judicial and extrajudicial documents; cooperation in the administration of evidence; recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters, including decisions in out-of-court proceedings."

Thus, the Treaty of Amsterdam established the principle of recognition and enforcement of judicial

---

[12] Decision no. 3052/95/CE of the European Parliament and Council from 13 December 1995 establishing a procedure for the exchange of information on national measures derogating from the principle of free movement of goods within the Community (repealed), published in OJ L 321 from 30.12.1995, in electronic format at the address http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/HTML/?uri=CELEX: 32000Y0519 (01)&from=RO , accessed on January 19, 2018. Preamble: "The Commission has, in accordance with Article 100b of the Treaty, drawn up the inventory of national laws, regulations and administrative provisions which fall under Article 100a of the Treaty and which have not been harmonized pursuant to that Article; (...) that inventory has revealed that most of the obstacles to trade in products reported by Member States are dealt with either by measures taken under Article 100a or through proceedings initiated under Article 169 of the Treaty for failure to fulfil obligations under Article 30".

[13] Regulation (EC) no. 764/2008 of the European Parliament and Council dated July 9, 2008 laying down procedures relating to the application of certain national technical rules to products lawfully marked in another Member State and repealing Decision no. 3052/95/CE, published in OJ L 218/21 from 13.8.2008, at the address http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/HTML/?uri=CELEX: 32008R0764&from=EN ,accessed on January 19, 2018. Points (3) and (4) of the Regulation provide the following: „ (3) The principle of mutual recognition, which derives from the case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Communities, is one of the means of ensuring the free movement of goods within the internal market. Mutual recognition applies to products which are not subject to Community harmonisation legislation, or to aspects of products falling outside the scope of such legislation. According to that principle, a Member State may not prohibit the sale on its territory of products which are lawfully marketed in another Member State, even where those products were manufactured in accordance with technical rules different from those to which domestic products are subject. The only exceptions to that principle are restrictions which are justified on the grounds set out in Article 30 of the Treaty, or on the basis of other overriding reasons of public interest and which are proportionate to the aim pursued.

(4) Many problems still exist as regards the correct application of the principle of mutual recognition by the Member States. It is therefore necessary to establish procedures to minimise the possibility of technical rules' creating unlawful obstacles to the free movement of goods between Member States. The absence of such procedures in the Member States creates additional obstacles to the free movement of goods, since it discourages enterprises from selling their products, lawfully marketed in another Member State, on the territory of the Member State applying technical rules. Surveys have shown that many enterprises, in particular small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs), either adapt their products in order to comply with the technical rules of Member States, or refrain from marketing them in those Member States".

[14] Treaty on European Union (Treaty of Maastricht), published in JO C 191 dated 29.07.1992, p. 0001-0110, in English language, in electronic format at the address http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/HTML/?uri=CELEX:11992M/TXT&from=RO , accessed on January 19, 2018.

[15] In the volume "Fundamental Treaties of the European Union", edition coordinated and prefaced by A. Fuerea, updated on 1.06.2017, C. H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, p.54.

[16] The Amsterdam Treaty, in English, in electronic format at the address http://www.europarl.europa.eu/topics/treaty/pdf/amst-en.pdf , accessed on January 19, 2018.

and extrajudicial civil and commercial judgments (e.g. decisions of arbitral tribunals, decisions taken in notary proceeding etc.) in connection with the internal market, but in order to achieve the goals of that part of the pillar III which it has communitarised, directly related to the freedom of movement of persons, as an essential element of the Union's substantive law.

It should not be forgotten that the Treaty of Amsterdam has communitarised the third pillar of the European Community, excepting the part relating to judicial cooperation in criminal matters between Member States.

2.2. The principle of mutual recognition in the field of judicial cooperation in civil and criminal matters

2.2.1. The Cardiff European Council, 15-16 June 1998

This European Council, which took place during the British Presidency of the Union in the first half of 1998, has included on the agenda, among the main issues, the common fight against cross-border criminality, with a particular focus on environmental crime, drug trafficking, as well as racism and xenophobia.

The works of this European Council would also mark the first step in imposing the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions in criminal matters.

Thus, point 39 of the Conclusions of the Presidency of the European Council[17] states as follows: "The European Council underlines the importance of effective judicial cooperation in the fight against cross-border crime. Recognizes the need to strengthen the capacity of legal systems to work together more closely and asks the Council to identify areas for wider mutual recognition of judgments between Member States."

The idea of enhancing the application of the principle of mutual recognition of judgments in criminal matters is directly related to the concerns raised at that time about an unprecedented development of cross-border crime in the European Union and the implicit recognition that the approximation of the criminal laws by establishing common minimum standards did not generate the expected results. This moment is at the very end of the Corpus Juris project, which has, over the last decade of the past century, aimed to achieve a common criminal law of the Union. The project, concluded in 1999 and considered a failure, was definitely forgotten, and the future of criminal law and criminal procedure at the level of the European Union would be definitively redirected towards mutual recognition.

On the occasion of the British Presidency of the European Council "the emphasis on mutual recognition was justified by the UK on the grounds that the differences between Member State's legal systems limit the progress which is possible by other means and render the harmonization of criminal law time consuming, difficult to negotiate and (in full scale) unrealistic ."[18]

Moreover, "according to Jack Straw, then UK Home Secretary, one could be inspired from the way in which the internal market was unblocked in the 1980's, instead of opting for total harmonisation, conceive a situation where each Member State recognises the validity of decision of courts from other Member States in criminal matters with a minimum of procedure and formality"[19] This statement made by the British Home Secretary represents an additional proof of the origin of the free movement of judgments and judicial decisions in criminal matters, coming out of the concept of mutual recognition applicable to the internal market of the Union.

2.2.2. Tampere European Council, 15-16 October 1999

The Presidency Conclusions of this European Council[20] have become famous for the provisions of point 33, which expresses the idea that the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions should become the "cornerstone of judicial cooperation in both civil and criminal matters within the Union ".

The same conclusions expressly and distinctly refer to the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions in civil and criminal matters, as well as to the subordinating relation of the establishment of common minimum standards in procedural matters to their purpose, in the effective realization of mutual recognition.

The recalled point 33 will be the leitmotiv of all judicial instruments subsequently developed by the Union, based on the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions, and the expression "the cornerstone of judicial cooperation", became the preferred metaphor of preambles and programmatic discourses in this field.

We find that phrase, for example, in point 6 of the preamble to Framework Decision 2002/584 / JHA on the European Arrest Warrant and surrender procedures between Member States, the first instrument developed in the area of judicial cooperation in criminal matters, based on the principle of the mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions between Member States, and which also promoted the idea set out in point 35 of the Conclusions of the Presidency of the Tampere European Council, concerning the replacement of the [17] The European Council from Cardiff, 15-16 June 1998, Conclusions of the Presidency, in original, in English language, at the address http://www.europarl.europa.eu/summits/car1_en.htm# , accessed on January 19, 2018.

[18] V. Mitsilegas, EU Criminal Law, Modern Studies in Criminal Law, Hart Publishing Ltd., Oxford and Portland, Oregon, 2009, p. 116, and UK delegation document no. 7090/99, Brussels, 29 March 1999, par. 7-8.

[19] Idem 18, p. 116, taken over by V. Mitsilegas from "Ministère de la Justice, L' espace judiciaire européen. Actes du Colloque d' Avignon", Paris, 2008, p. 89, in his own translation.

[20] Original in English, in electronic format on the webpage http://www.europarl.europa.eu/summits/tam_en.htm , accessed on January 19, 2018.

formal extradition procedure with a simple surrender system between Member States (an idea reiterated in the preamble to the Framework Decision, section (5)).

The measures regarding the fluency character of judicial cooperation in civil and criminal matters, mainly linked to the Union's reorientation from the principle of approximation of laws by establishing common minimum standards to the principle of recognition of judgments and judicial decisions between Member States, were subordinated by the Tampere European Council, to the extension of the freedom of movement, within the Union's justice area.

Thus, paragraph 5 of the Presidency Conclusions states that "Extending freedom requires a genuine area of justice where people can appeal to courts and authorities in any Member State, as easily as in their own state. Criminals should not be able to find ways to exploit the differences between the judicial systems of the Member States. Judgments and judicial decisions must be respected and enforced throughout the Union, while guaranteeing basic legal certainty for individuals and economic operators. Greater compatibility and greater convergence between the judicial systems of the Member States must be achieved. "

2.2.3. Commission`s communication to the Council and to the European Parliament - Mutual Recognition of Final Decisions in Criminal Matters[21]

This Commission`s Communication, created upon the invitation launched by the Tampere European Council, provides a wider perspective on the concept of mutual recognition and approaches a first definition of this term, which refers to the recognition of final foreign judgments.

It is possible to distinguish between the recognition of a foreign judgment or judicial decision per se and the situation of subsequent recognition of a foreign judicial decision for the purpose of establishing a factual or legal situation, in another case which takes place in a jurisdiction of another Member State of the Union. An example of this could be the case of a final decision, regarding a defendant, for committing a serious crime that may be the basis for executing prison sentences in the state of recognition (e.g. by applying the exception to the European Arrest Warrant, when the defendant remains on the territory of the executing State and that State undertakes to impose the prison sentence on its territory) - per se (direct) recognition - as compared with the recognition of a foreign conviction judgment in a sentence for deeds of a certain gravity and committed under certain conditions, provided by the recognition right of the State, in order to establish the existence of recidivism or concurrent offenses during the main proceedings regarding a defendant, for other offenses subsequently committed on the territory of the State of recognition - (indirect)[22].

Within point 3.2., the Commission`s Communication defines the idea of a "final decision", in order to prevent any possible confusion, as long as such a notion has different meanings within the law of the Member States. By the instrumentality of a functional definition, the Commission states that the final decisions are "all those decisions governing the substance of a criminal case and against which ordinary means of redress cannot be exercised, or even if an appeal is still possible, it does not have suspensory effect ".

2.2.4. Program of Measures to Implement the Principle of Mutual Recognition of Judgments in Criminal Matters[23]

The Program provides for the adoption of concrete measures in the following issues of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions in criminal matters. Thus, as regards ne bis in idem principle, the measures must be taken to strengthen legal certainty within the Union in the sense that a final conviction ordered by a court of a Member State is not called into question by another Member State.

In the area of individual sanctions, it is necessary to adopt instruments establishing the principle that a court in a Member State may take into account the final judgments of courts of other Member States for the purpose of assessing the criminal record of the defendant in order to determine the persistence in the criminal behaviour for justify properly the sanction and the way of executing it.

The orders regarding the purpose of obtaining evidence must ensure the admissibility of evidence, prevent the disappearance of evidence, and facilitate the searching procedures, so that the evidence [21] COM/2000/0495 final, in electronic format, in English language, at the address http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/HTML/?uri=CELEX:52000DC0495&from=EN, accessed on January 21, 2018. Point 3.1 of the Communication provides: "Mutual recognition is a principle that is widely understood as being based on the thought that while another state may not deal with a certain matter in the same or even a similar way as one's own state, the results will be such that they are accepted as equivalent to decisions by one's own state. Mutual trust is an important element, not only trust in the adequacy of one's partners rules, but also trust that these rules are correctly applied. Based on this idea of equivalence and the trust it is based on, the results the other state has reached are allowed to take effect in one's own sphere of legal influence. On this basis, a decision taken by an authority in one state could be accepted as such in another state, even though a comparable authority may not even exist in that state, or could not take such decisions, or would have taken an entirely different decision in a comparable case.

Recognising a foreign decision in criminal matters could be understood as giving it effect outside of the state in which it has been rendered, be it by according it the legal effects foreseen for it by the foreign criminal law, or be it by taking it into account in order to make it have the effects foreseen by the criminal law of the recognising state".

[22] The direct/indirect recognition notions are also referred to in the introduction to the Program of measures to implement the principle of mutual recognition of decisions in criminal matters, published in OJ C 012 from 15/01/2001, p. 0010-0022, in electronic format, in English language, at the address http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/HTML/?uri=CELEX:32001Y0115(02)&from=EN , accessed on January 21, 2018.

[23] The Program of measures to implement the principle of mutual recognition of decisions in criminal matters, published in OJ C 012 din 15/01/2001, p. 0010-0022, in electronic format, in English language, at the address http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/HTML/?uri=CELEX:32001Y0115(02)&from=EN , accessed on January 21, 2018.

administered can be obtained as quickly as possible during the criminal case.

Measures for the confiscation of the proceeds of crime and granting of damages for the victims aim to ensure the recognition and enforcement of freezing orders, for the purpose of confiscation and granting for damages for the victims.

Arrest warrants must be progressive, so that they can be implemented throughout the European Union and alternative measures to detention should be assured by cooperation between the competent authorities of the Member States, when a person is subject to supervision during the criminal proceedings.

Taking into account the indictments is intended with a view to avoid jurisdictional conflicts between several Member States.

Other measures concerned the following issues: the immediate recognition and the enforcement of a final decision of a Member State, when extradition is refused by a Member State that has declared that it does not extradite its own citizens; the transfer of persons who have fled from justice after having been finally convicted in a Member State; the transfer of convicted persons in the interest of social reintegration; fines, confiscation, prohibitions and incapacities; follow-up measures to the obligations established by final judgments, following the execution of sentences and the establishment of a peer review mechanism for assessing the progress made by Member States in the area of the recognition of judgments and judicial decisions in criminal matters.

2.2.5. The European Council. The Hague Program: Strengthening Freedom, Security and Justice in the European Union[24]

Paragraph 3) is pointing out the need to intensify the efforts regarding the building of a justice area of the Union, The Hague Program would place particular emphasis on the principle of recognition of judgments and judicial decisions in civil matters and, in particular, in criminal matters.

Thus, point 3.3.1. of The Hague Program refers to mutual recognition in criminal matters, indicating that the measures to be adopted must relate to judicial decisions at all stages of the criminal proceedings or any other decision relating to the gathering and admissibility of evidence, conflicts of jurisdiction and non bis in idem principle, as well as the execution of final convictions to imprisonment or other sanctions; equivalent standards for procedural rights should also be created. Other envisaged activities included adopting of the draft of the Framework Decision on the European Evidence Warrant[25] and the invitation to the Commission to present its proposals on promotion of the exchange of information in national criminal records, related to convictions and forfeits, particularly in the matter of sex offenders, as well as on electronic information exchange system.

2.2.6. The European Council. Stockholm Program - An open and secure Europe serving citizens and protecting their rights[26]

Within point 3 of the Program, the connection between the principle of mutual recognition and mutual trust, which should be strengthened between the Member States' judicial systems, is seen as a situation that will lead to the creation of a common legal culture. Also, the approximation of legislation in criminal matters, in particular by establishing common minimum rules in criminal and procedural criminal law, is entirely subordinated to creating the best conditions for facilitating the application of mutual recognition.

Point 3.1.1.of the Program approaches the issue of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions in criminal matters strictly from the point of view of judicial cooperation, identifying new areas where specific legal instruments can be developed, including the protection of victims of crime and witnesses, a unitary system for the administration of evidence in cases of cross-border crime, given the fact that the one existing until that time was a fragmented one, but which still has the flexibility of judicial assistance in criminal matters (see, for example, the functioning of joint investigation teams, especially when mediated by Eurojust); minimizing the reasons regarding the refusal of execution. Other targeted areas were: the procedures for obtaining information on convictions and sanctions, the rapid procedures for transmitting information from private law legal entities of other States without coercive measures, improving of the framework of the European Arrest Warrant, executing in other states the administrative sanctions applied for contraventions in connection with road traffic etc.

As regarding the civil matters, mutual recognition is approached within point 3.1.2. of the Program, insisting on the elimination of the exequatur procedure, along with the adoption of a series of rules on conflict of laws and procedural measures.

2.2.7 The principle of mutual recognition – a transplant from the internal market of the Union to the judicial cooperation area

Versus the historical developments presented above, we have no doubt that there is an indestructible connection between the four fundamental freedoms of the Union, forming its substantive law and the freedom of movement of judgments and judicial decisions, both

[24] Council. The Hague Programme: Strengthening Freedom, Security and Justice in the European Area, OJ C 53/1 3.3.2005, in original in English language and electronic format on the webpage http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=OJ:C:2005:053:0001:0014:EN:PDF , accessed on January 20, 2018.

[25] EEW = European Evidence Warrant, regulated by Framework Decision 2008/978/JAI of the Council dated 18 December 2008 on the European Evidence Mandate for the purpose of obtaining objects, documents and data for use in the proceedings in criminal matters, published in OJ L 350/72 date 30.12.2008; in civil and criminal matters. As long as the judicial cooperation in civil matters is more closely related to these fundamental freedoms and extends through the application of the principle of mutual recognition to civil and commercial extrajudicial documents and decisions, judicial cooperation in criminal matters, as it depends on public law, relevant to the Member States' sensitivity to possible concerns regarding the integrity of their national sovereignty, has a narrower and a much more carefully defined content. However, the ideological origin of the principle of mutual recognition in this field can also be found in the creative effort of constructing the internal market[27], because everything has begun at that specific point, when trying to structure the concept of integration: horizontal (through harmonization), vertical (by approximating of the legislation and by setting the minimum rules) and transversal (by adopting the principle of mutual recognition).

[26] Published in original in OJ C 115/1 dated 4.5.2010, in electronic format on the webpage http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/HTML/?uri=OJ:C:2010:115:FULL&from=RO , accessed on January 19, 2018.

Every step by which a refinement of a fundamental freedom of the Union was achieved, corresponded to a creative approach of conceiving a new subsidiary and instrumental "freedom of movement". The freedom of movement of judgments and judicial decisions in civil matters was absolutely necessary for the development of the free movement of goods, persons, services and capital, and the freedom of movement of judgments and judicial decisions in criminal matters developed, as a result and in close connection to the freedom of movement of persons and the right to establishment, as an effort to prevent the spreading of cross-border crime and the creation of shelters for offenders in other Member States of the Union, in order to escape from the justice.

However, there are prestigious authors who do not share this opinion, including Valsamis Mitsilegas[28], who insists on the legal difference between the commercial law and the criminal law, the latter considering the state as a subject of the legal relationship and assuming a very scrupulous respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms (the right to liberty, to a fair trial, to defence, the presumption of innocence, etc.). Moreover, the author insists that the essence of the rule of law is represented by the fact that the rules of the criminal law should be publicly debated (as opposed to accepting them based on a presumed mutual trust).

Within the above-mentioned ideas, the author refuses to consider the origin of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions in criminal matters in the principle of mutual recognition in the matter of internal market, but the reasoning he builds is related to the internal constitutional legitimacy, at the level of the Member States, related to applying such a principle. There is no doubt, however, that the empirical vision adopted by the Union regarding this principle, which solves the dilemmas and finds appropriate solutions to the progress regarding the area of freedom, security and justice, which could not be solved by harmonizing or approximating the laws is a British cultural characteristic. It should not be forgotten that the idea of changing the paradigm from harmonization to mutual recognition in criminal matters was launched during the British Presidency of the Union during the first half of 1998. The new paradigm has the legitimacy required by the principle of the primacy of the Union law and this results from the mutual trust between the legal systems of the Member States. Moreover, the desire to respect the constitutional traditions of the Member States is much better achieved by means of the principle of mutual recognition, than by establishing common minimum rules on criminal offenses, punishments and criminal proceedings.

2.2.8. Schengen Agreement and the Convention Implementing the Schengen Agreement (CISA)[29]

As a result of art. (1) of the Protocol integrating the Schengen acquis into the framework of the European Union annexed to the Treaty of Amsterdam, the Council adopted Decision 1999/436 / EC on 20 May 1999 determining, in accordance with the relevant provisions of the EC Treaty and of the EU Treaty, the legal basis for each of the provisions and decisions that make up the Schengen acquis together. The Council thus selected Art. 31 and 34 EU Treaty (consolidated post-Amsterdam and Nice version), which are part of Title VI of the EU Treaty: "Provisions on police and judicial cooperation in criminal matters" as the legal basis for the integration of Art. 54-58 CISA. These latter provisions make up Chapter 3, entitled "Applying ne bis in idem principle", from the Title III "Police and Security" of the CISA.

Article 54 of the CISA refers to the principle ne bis in idem, a principle that implies ipso facto a recognition form of a judgment of another Member State, but aimed at avoiding the duplication of that criminal procedure in another Member State of the Union.

According to art. Article 54 of the CISA: "A person whose trial has been finally disposed of in one Contracting Party may not be prosecuted in another Contracting Party for the same acts provided that, if a penalty has been imposed, it has been enforced, is actually in the process of being enforced or can no longer be enforced under the laws of the sentencing Contracting".

[27] A. Klip, European Criminal Law. An Integrative Approach, 3rd edition, Ius Communitatis Series, Volume 2, Intersentia, Cambridge-Antwerp-Portland, 2016, p. 395: "Mutual recognition is inspired by the principle of the internal market (...)"

[28] V. Mitsilegas, The Constitutional Implications of Mutual Recognition in Criminal Matters in the EU, Common Market Law Review 43, 2006, Kluwer Law International, p. 1280.

[29] The Convention Implementing the Schengen Agreement dated June 14, 1985, concluded among the governments of the States of the Benelux Economic Union, the Federal Republic of Germany and the French Republic on the gradual abolition of checks at their common borders, hereinafter abbreviated CISA.

This wording of ne bis in idem principle implicitly results in a negative recognition of the convicting judgment in another Member State and it is based on the trust that must exist between the judicial systems of the Member States.

One convincing example in that regard is the judgment of the Court of Justice of 11 February 2003 in Joined Cases C-187/01 and C-385/01, concerning the preliminary rulings in criminal proceedings concerning Hüseyin Gözütok and Klaus Brügge[30].

This decision raises the issue regarding the interpretation of art. 54 of the CISA, stipulating that a decision taken by the Prosecutor's Office on the basis of a court settlement concluded between the prosecutor and the defendant in the absence of any form of judicial control, but which produces authority of the national law of the state in which it was adopted, hinders the prosecution criminal proceedings or conviction of the person concerned in criminal proceedings for the same acts in the territory of another Member State.

In order to come to this conclusion, the Court's legal syllogism also made an important point in the finding made in paragraph 33 of the judgment: " In those circumstances, whether the ne bis in idem principle enshrined in Article 54 of the CISA is applied to procedures whereby further prosecution is barred (regardless of whether a court is involved) or to judicial decisions, there is a necessary implication that the Member States have mutual trust in their criminal justice systems and that each of them recognises the criminal law in force in the other Member States even when the outcome would be different if its own national law were applied."

Also, regarding this case, we note the emphasis on the mutual trust that the Member States' criminal justice systems should have expressed by the Court of Justice.

A fact that is not clear regarding the mutual trust in justice, is whether it exists or it should exist. Returning to Mitsilegas argument, presented above within the point II.2.7. of this study, that such a trust is hard to exist in the absence of a public negotiation of criminal law, the conclusion that we might draw is that trust must exist, even if it does not form spontaneously. Along the same lines, see also André Klip's position[31].

3. The principle of mutual recognition in the field of judicial cooperation in criminal matters - concrete legal instruments

3.1. European Arrest Warrant (EAW)

As I pointed out above, within the section I of this study, the European Arrest Warrant was the first concrete legal instrument that relied entirely on the free movement of judgments and criminal judicial decisions.

The Framework Decision 2002/584 / JHA, which governs it, shows within its text the connection that the EAW has with the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions, as seen in the light of the Conclusions of the Tampere European Council Presidency. Thus, points (5) to (7) of the preamble to the Framework Decision refer to the replacement of the classical extradition system between the judicial authorities of the Member States, mainly based on conventions of public international law with a surrender system of the suspects, of the defendants and of the indicted persons.

Thus, point (5) of the Framework Decision provides, inter alia, that: „Traditional cooperation relations which have prevailed up till now between Member States should be replaced by a system of free movement of judicial decisions in criminal matters, covering both pre-sentence and final decisions, within an area of freedom, security and justice."

It is easy to notice that the texts referred to above are directly inspired by paragraphs 33 and 35 of the Presidency Conclusions of the Tampere European Council of 15-16 October 1999 as discussed above under point II 2.2. of this study.

Immediately after entering into force of the Framework Decision 2002/584/JHA, the EAW was questioned before the Court of Justice of the European Union in the context of a request for a preliminary ruling by a Belgian court which specifically concerned the Council's possibility of regulating an arrest and surrender procedure based on the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions in the field of extradition, which was still considered at that time to belong to international public law based on international conventions and treaties.

The problem was settled in favour of EAW by means of the judgment of the Court (Grand Chamber) of 3 May 2007 in Case C-303/05, request for a preliminary ruling made by Arbitragehof (Belgium), regarding the procedure Advocaten voor de Wereld VZW against Leden van Ministerraad [32].

Advocaten voor de Wereld thus argued that Art. 34 par. (2) lit. (b) of the EU Treaty refers only to framework decisions which can be adopted exclusively for the harmonisation of laws and regulations of the Member States.

The applicant in the Belgian internal litigation focused on the list of criminal areas provided by the provisions of Article 2 par. (2) of the Framework Decision as embodied in the Belgian transposing law, stating in respect of that list that it "infringes the principle of equality and non-discrimination in that, for the offences mentioned in that latter provision, in the event of enforcement of a European arrest warrant, there is a derogation, without objective and reasonable justification, from the requirement of double criminality, whereas that requirement is maintained for other offences."(point 12 of the judgment). Concerning the same list, another criticism of the complainant was that "it lists, not offences having a sufficiently clear and precise legal content, but only vague categories of undesirable behaviour" (paragraph 13).

[30] ECLI:EU:C:2003:87, in electronic format, in the English language, on the webpage http://curia.europa.eu/juris/document /document.jsf?text=&docid=48044&pageIndex=0&doclang=EN&mode=lst&dir=&occ=first&part=1&cid=446188 ,accessed on 19 January 2018.

[31] Idem point 27, p. 400: "The Rule is that there "should" be mutual trust among the member states."

[32] ECLI:EU:C: 2007:261, , in electronic format on the webpage http://curia.europa.eu/juris/document/document.jsf?text= &docid=61470&pageIndex=0&doclang=EN&mode=lst&dir=&occ=first&part=1&cid=422244 , accessed on January 19, 2018.

All these criticisms were brought by the Advocaten voor de Wereld before the Arbitragehof, referring to the Belgian law transposing the framework decision on the EAW, but the court found that the criticisms in fact refer to the Framework Decision itself (point 14 of the judgment).

The Court of Justice, analyzing the issues, essentially points out that judicial cooperation in criminal matters should be favoured in order to contribute to the achievement of the Union's objectives (Article 34 (2) EU Treaty), in which the Council, pursuant to Article 34 (2) (a) to (d) EU Treaty, has the possibility of adopting both framework decisions, but also to initiate conventions, and no order of priority has been established between these instruments. The quintessence of the Court's interpretation is exposed, however, in paragraphs 28-32 of the judgment.

Thus, with regard to the first question referred, the Court of Justice has concluded that the Framework Decision was not adopted in breach of the provisions of Art. 34 par. (2) (b) of the EU Treaty, the Council being empowered to regulate the issue of the surrender of persons sought by Member States in others for the purposes of prosecution, judgment or execution of a sentence by a framework decision, and not necessarily by an extradition convention in the classical sense of the concept.

With regard to the possible violation of the principle of legality of criminalisation and punishment, in the context of the list of criminal areas exempt from double criminality, in paragraph 53 of the judgment, the Court states that "the definition of those offences and of the penalties applicable continue to be matters determined by the law of the issuing Member State, which, as is, moreover, stated in Article 1(3) of the Framework Decision, must respect fundamental rights and fundamental legal principles as enshrined in Article 6 EU, and, consequently, the principle of the legality of criminal offences and penalties".

The Court's conclusion is that, in the light of the arguments put forward by Advocaten voor de Wereld, there is no breach of the principle of legality.

The latter aspect examined by the Court was intended to determine whether the exclusion of the requirement of double criminality for a part of the offenses, namely those listed in Art. 2 par. (2) of the Framework Decision, combined with the maintenance of this requirement in respect of other offenses, violates the principle of equality and non-discrimination.

The legal syllogism of the Court has been built on the idea that equality and non-discrimination require "comparable situations not to be treated differently and different situations not to be treated in the same way unless such treatment is objectively justified"(point 56 of the judgment). Next, in paragraph 57, the Court points out that the establishment of the list of criminal areas for which there is no need to verify the condition of double criminality corresponds to an objective criterion: the gravity of the affectation of public order and security through those offenses.

The conclusion was that the different legal regime regarding the list of criminal fields for which double-criminality is not required and all other offenses is justified on the basis of the objective criterion of their gravity, assessed in abstracto.

Finally, the Court of Justice found that none of the arguments put forward by Advokaten voor de Wereld against Framework Decision 2002/584 / JHA is valid. We believe that this judgment of the Court of Justice is highly important, because it carries out a substantive examination of the Council's empowerment to use the Framework Decision as an act that regulates the surrender procedures of suspects, defendants and of the convicts who escape criminal prosecution, judgment or the execution of punishment on the territory of other Member States of the European Union, procedures based on the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions, that is a completely different legal paradigm than the classic one, represented by the international conventions on extradition.

EAW was not only the first legal instrument based entirely on the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions, but was and still is the most widely used, the most prolific and most effective instrument. The fulminating success it had in the field of criminal judicial cooperation between the Member States of the European Union, made the principle of mutual recognition affirm and acquire the trust of many sceptics.

Starting from the success of the EAW, a plethora of other legal instruments based on mutual recognition in criminal matters have emerged and proved to be effective in the context of judicial cooperation in criminal matters.

3.2. Other legal instruments based on the mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions in criminal matters

In chronological order, the second instrument that used the freedom of movement of judgments and judicial decisions in criminal matters was the freezing order of goods and evidence. It was governed by the Council Framework Decision 2003/577 / JHA[33]. Very similar in many respects to the Framework Decision 2002/584 / JHA, the preamble this Framework Decision also invokes the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions in the perspective of the Tampere European Council. Along with the situation of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant, this Framework Decision contains, in Article 3 (2), the same list of criminal areas which exempt the implementation of the freezing order or evidence from verifying the condition of double criminality.

[33] Framework decision 2003/577/JAI from July 22, 2003 on the execution within the European Union of the freezing property or evidence orders, published in JO L 196/03 dated 2.8. 2003, in electronic format, at the address: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=OJ:L:2003:196:0045:0055:en:PDF , accessed on January 21, 2018.

Generalizing, we find that there is a common structure for all of these Council Framework Decisions that govern the application instruments of the principle of mutual recognition in criminal matters, which encompasses the following regulatory chapters: the preamble (inspired by the Conclusions of the Presidency of the Tampere European Council), definitions, offenses for which double-criminality does not need to be verified, other offenses to which the instrument applies, the procedure for issuing, transmitting and enforcing the instrument, grounds for non-recognition of the order, postponement of execution, refusal to execute, judicial review and remedies, certificates or other documents to be filled in and transmitted with the enforcement order.

The principles underlying the concrete instruments for achieving mutual recognition in criminal matters are as follows:

a) the typology of those instruments: warrants and orders - these are not requests from the judicial authorities to the equivalent of other Member States, but imperative requests, true orders, the execution of which is mandatory;
b) direct communication between the competent judicial authorities of the issuing State and of the executing State, respectively; this involves directing the warrant/ order directly by the issuing authority to the competent judicial authority to execute it;
c) the complete elimination of the recognition of the warrant/order so that it becomes effective at the time of issue, except for the restrictive and express cases set out in the Union's legislative act governing it;
d) the express mention of the mandatory and optional grounds for refusal of execution;
e) the partial removal of the double criminality verification requirement - as we have seen in the Framework Decision 2002/584/JHA, but also in the Framework Decision 2003/577/JHA, or other legislative acts of the same type, there is a list of offenses that, due to their seriousness assessed in abstracto, are exempted from verifying the double criminality as a precondition for the execution of the warrant /order;
f) the elimination of the condition of reciprocity, which makes no sense any longer, while the Member States are however legally obliged to ensure the same treatment, considering the nature of the implementing instrument, based on mutual recognition;
g) the principle of specialty - according to which the judicial authorities of the issuing state can use the execution of the warrant /order only in direct connection with the material crimes in respect of which it was issued; extending the purpose of the warrant/order may be achieved only with the express consent of the executing authority or on the basis of the consent of the person to whom the warrant or order refers;
h) respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms in criminal proceedings, both those relating to the suspect, defendant or convicted person, as well as those concerning the legal situation of the other participants in the criminal proceeding: victims, injured or civilians, witnesses, experts and so on; these rights include: the right of respecting the presumption of innocence, the right to freedom, the right to a fair trial, the right to defence, the right to translation and interpretation, the right of access to the case file and all the evidence administered, the right to be judged in attendance, the right to execute custodial sentences in conditions that ensure the dignity and safety of the person; some of these rights have been diachronically subject to measures establishing minimum standards for criminal proceedings.

On the basis of the same principles and structure, many legal instruments have been elaborated in a diachronically, which enhance the value of the free movement of judgments and judicial decisions in criminal matters.

4. Conclusions

The free movement of judgments and judicial decisions in civil and criminal matters is a method of achieving the legal integration of the European Union and the consequence of the principle of mutual recognition, being also the expression of the substantive law of the Union. The free movement of persons and the right of establishment have given rise to the freedom of movement of judgments and judicial decisions in criminal matters, while the four fundamental freedoms have caused the free movement of judgments, judicial and extrajudicial decisions in civil and commercial matters.

The source of this legal paradigm lies in the effort to build the internal market of the Union, a field from which it was transplanted into the area of freedom, security and justice, together with its creation and operationalization in the era of the Treaty of Amsterdam and the forthcoming times.

As a fundamental principle in civil and commercial matters, the free movement of judgments essentially means abandoning the necessity of an exequatur to produce the effects of the judgments within a Member State, other than the one of the judicial authorities which has ruled them.

In criminal matters, this principle has given rise to a large number of distinct legal instruments, among which the first and the most important is the European arrest warrant, but very important are also: the European order for the freezing of property and evidence, the European Investigation Order (that partially replaces the precedent order, but also the European Evidence Warrant), the European Protection Order (of victims and witnesses) etc.

From the point of view of what judicial cooperation in criminal matters means, the emergence and application of these legal instruments based on the free movement of judgments and judicial decisions has truly constituted a "cornerstone" (as the Tampere European Council names it within the Presidential Conclusions) and has greatly replaced the previous instruments of judicial assistance in criminal matters (such as, for example, the practice of joint investigation teams - JIT).

If up to present, among all these instruments, the most prolific and most effective has proved to be the European arrest warrant, we believe that in the future, the place it will occupy will be equal to, if not even beyond, the European Investigation Order, an instrument that has recently entered into force (2017) and practically replacing almost all the previous instruments of judicial assistance in criminal matters between the Member States of the European Union.

References

- Calderoni, Francesco, 2010, Organized Crime Legislation in the European Union – Harmonization and Approximation of Criminal Law, National Legislation and the EU Framework Decision on the Fight Against Organized Crime, Springer Heidelberg, Dordrecht, London, New York
- Klip, André, 2016, European Criminal Law. An Integrative Approach, 3rd edition, Ius Communitatis Series, Volume 2, Intersentia, Cambridge-Antwerp-Portland
- Mitsilegas, Valsamis, 2009, EU Criminal Law, Modern Studies in Criminal Law, Hart Publishing Ltd., Oxford and Portland, Oregon
- Mitsilegas, Valsamis, 2006The Constitutional Implications of Mutual Recognition in Criminal Matters in the EU, Common Market Law Review 43, Kluwer Law International
- "Fundamental Treaties of the European Union", 2017, edition coordinated and prefaced by A. Fuerea, updated on 1.06.2017, C. H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest
- Regulation (EU) no. 1215/2012 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 12 December 2012 on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgements in civil and commercial matters, published in OJ L 351/1 from 20.12.2012
- The European Council. Stockholm Program - An open and secure Europe serving citizens and protecting their rights, published in original in OJ C 115/1 date 4.5.2010
- Regulation (EC) no. 764/2008 of the European Parliament and Council dated July 9, 2008 laying down procedures relating to the application of certain national technical rules to products lawfully marked in another Member State and repealing Decision no. 3052/95/CE, published in OJ L 218/21 from 13.8.2008
- Framework Decision 2008/978/JAI of the Council dated 18 December 2008 on the European Evidence Warrant for the purpose of obtaining objects, documents and data for use in the proceedings in criminal matters, published in OJ L 350/72 date 30.12.2008
- Court (Grand Chamber) judgment of 3 May 2007 in Case C-303/05, preliminary ruling made by Arbitragehof (Belgium), regarding the procedure Advocaten voor de Wereld VZW against Leden van Ministerraad, ECLI:EU:C: 2007:261
- Council. The Hague Programme: Strengthening Freedom, Security and Justice in the European Area, OJ C 53/1 3.3.2005
- Framework decision 2003/577/JAI from July 22, 2003 on the execution within the European Union of the freezing property or evidence orders, published in OJ L 196/03 date 2.8. 2003
- Court of Justice judgment of 11 February 2003 in Joined Cases C-187/01 and C-385/01, concerning the preliminary rulings in criminal proceedings concerning Hüseyin Gözütok and Klaus Brügge, ECLI:EU:C:2003:87
- Council Framework Decision 2002/584/JHA of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States, published in OJ L 190/02 date 18.7.2002;
- Program of measures to implement the principle of mutual recognition of decisions in criminal matters, published in OJ C 012 from 15/01/2001
- Commission`s communication to the Council and to the European Parliament - Mutual Recognition of Final Decisions in Criminal Matters, COM/2000/0495 final
- The Council Resolution from 28 October 1999 on the role of standardization in Europe, published in OJ C 141 from 19.5.2000
- The Cardiff European Council, 15-16 June 1998, Conclusions of the Presidency
- European Commission. Justice. Building a European Area of Justice." Recognition of decisions between EU countries"
- The document" European Commission. Economic growth. Single European Market. Single Goods Market. Free movement in harmonized and non-harmonized sectors. Mutual recognition."

- Decision no. 3052/95/CE of the European Parliament and Council from 13 December 1995 establishing a procedure for the exchange of information on national measures derogating from the principle of free movement of goods within the Community (repealed), published in OJ L 321 from 30.12.1995
- Treaty on European Union (Treaty of Maastricht), published in OJ C 191 dated 29.07.1992
- Single European Act signed in Luxembourg on 17 February 1986 and effective as of 1 July 1987, published in OJ L 189/1 from 29.6.87
- The Convention Implementing the Schengen Agreement dated June 14, 1985, concluded among the governments of the States of the Benelux Economic Union, the Federal Republic of Germany and the French Republic on the gradual abolition of checks at their common borders
- Court of Justice judgment from 20 February 1979 ruled in the case C-120/8, preliminary decision Rewe Zentral AG v. Bundesmonopolverwaltung für Brantwein, ECLI:EU:C:1979:42

VARIOUS HISTORICAL CONNOTATIONS OF THE CONCEPT OF SOVEREIGNTY

Emilian CIONGARU*

Abstract

Sovereignty as a feature of state power, shall be expressed in terms of organizing and exercising, determining and resolving internal and external problems, freely and according to its will, without any interference, respecting the sovereignty of other states, as well as European and international law norms. The sovereignty of the people may remain a mere fiction, in the conditions in which the people, as a whole, does not become or is not aware of its complete and complex role as the sole sovereign owner of state power. The people assuming and exercising this role implies not only that it has the right to participate in government, which is in fact an essential aspect of democracy, but also the fundamental duty to achieve social, economic prosperity accompanied by cultural development to ensure the freedom it needs in order to fulfil its civic obligations and duties. From this point of view, the state has the aim of realizing the social expectations of the people, the requirements laid down by various groups or social categories in decisions for the exercise of state power. Rather controversial, the concept of sovereignty, from the perspective of its historical imposition and configuration, involves at least two connotations likely to cause an active and permanent controversy in specialized literature - a simple statement and a political and legal concept.

Keywords: sovereignty; rule of law; power of state; concept of law.

1. Introductory elements regarding the concept of sovereignty

The very controversial concept[1] of sovereignty involves, from the perspective of its historical imposition and configuration, at least two positions likely to cause and active and permanent controversy in literature.

So, from a first perspective, the concept of sovereignty, coinciding with the State itself, as a concept, exists as such, in itself, sovereignty being understood as an attribute of the State for the first time, establishing this positive predicate, according to the precept by which words would exist before things, existential states.

2. General considerations regarding the historical evolution of the concept of sovereignty

In such an opinion[2], being a majority one, there are, on the one hand, a logical-semantic reduction of sovereignty, as a concept, to the state, but, at the same time, on the other hand, sovereignty is only the result of a statement on a note, on a predicate that can be said about the state as meaning, at the same time, its external independence in relation to other entities of political organization[3] in statal form of communities of the same rank, as well as an internal supremacy. Therefore, any member must be characterized, at least historically, as both independent as an actor on the international scene, and as holding an internal supremacy by exercising certain royal rights[4].

From the second political-theoretical perspective, sovereignty is a concept existing, pragmatically, before Bodin. [5] Building - from a certain ideological motivation, wanting, in fact, to impose a theory of the Christian republic - the principle of sovereignty and the theory of a sovereign republic, but the result being the elimination of the Christian fundamentals of authority, Bodin argues that sovereignty, in itself, in its very concept, is nothing more than the power to make laws, or, in other words, the will of the sovereign, an ordering power, from a normative point of view, of the Republic. In this sense, sovereignty is therefore "the principle of the profane foundation of power". As a matter of fact, the concept of sovereignty, associated with that of the state, emerges from the legal doctrine of Bodin, therefore, starting with the 16th century, taking into account that the concept of state is a modern epistemological creation, with anthropologists noting that certain societies, which did not know the functional differentiation of power in accordance with the classic check and balance formula, highlighted by

* Asociate Professor, PhD. – Faculty of Law – University "Bioterra" of Bucharest; Asoc.Researcher - Romanian Academy – Institute of Legal Research "Acad. Andrei Radulescu" (e-mail: emilian.ciongaru@yahoo.com).

[1] Hans Kelsen, Les rapports de système entre le droit interne et le droit international public, (Paris, Hachette, 1927), 35-41.

[2] Jean Bodin, Les Six Livres de la République (éd. Gérard Mairet), (col. "Le Livre de Poche. Classiques de la philosophie", nr.4619), (Paris, Gallimard 1993).

[3] Constantin Dissescu, Constitutional Law, ("Soce & Co" Publishing House, Bucharest, 1915), 315.

[4] Alexandru Bolintineanu, Mircea Malita, Carta ONU, (Politica Publishing House, Bucharest, 1970), 13-15.

[5] Olivier Beaud, La puissance de l'État, (Presses Universitaires de France, Pars, 1994), 35-36.

Montesquieu[6] and John Locke, did not know the state, being, in a modern formula, non-statal societies[7].

Even if, as regards the concept of sovereignty, it has been the object of debate ever since the Middle Ages, without, however, the use of the concept of sovereignty[8], during this period, having the same political and legal significance of what the medieval people understood by the statal sense of the concept.

Carré de Malberg[9] noted, moreover, that in the medieval period, the term of sovereignty rather designated, used comparatively, a certain level of Power.

In the 13th century, the term of sovereignty acquires and is enriched with a legal-technical meaning, expressing not only a relationship of power, but a certain supreme attribution, a single authority, namely to settle, as a last resort, a legal conflict. A second and richer meaning in relation with the somewhat constrained sense of the 12th century, so that another customary law, the Usages d'Orlenois from the middle of the 13th century, governing the distribution of jurisdictional attributes between the monarch and his barons, states that the royal justice remains as a last judgment (in the sense of a decision which can no longer be attacked in front of another power, either vertically and, as such, understanding it as superior, or by conceiving it horizontally, the concept of sovereign reflecting, therefore, the recognized faculty of the monarch[10] to resolve a judicial conflict by a non-appealable decision, since " le roi est souverains, si doit être ça cora souverain[11]".

Thus, for the political-legal mentality and the appropriate language, sovereignty alludes to the sovereign who can, either as baron or king, within his sphere of given and recognized dominance, decide independently of another person. A mentality on sovereignty somewhat opposed to the modern meaning we give to the concept, beginning especially with Rousseau, the opposition being between the judicial conception of sovereignty and the modern, legislative, one, the idea of a unique and effective public power with exclusive competence - namely, legislative power - being foreign to the medieval conception, which will later make Kelsen[12] state that the constitutional order of the Middle Ages and in general was established as a decentralized legal order but without a precisely located center, i.e. the unifying power which sovereignty is for the modern state.

For the Middle Ages, in European political practice, sovereignty shows only the concepts of double power and judicial power relationships, and which generates, in the era, the content of the expression of rights of sovereignty as an unlimited and general attribute of the monarch, not infrequently a result of limitation by military force of the sovereignty of its barons. In this way, by the Treaty of Brétigny (1360), Charlemagne assumes in the content of his sovereignty a series of royal prerogatives which are considered today, in the doctrine of public law, as pertaining to the essence of sovereignty: ius belli, ius iudicii et al., however, all of these rather representing attempts of introducing the decisive concepts of Imperial Roman law, but without their full reception.

Therefore, the thesis according to which the concept of sovereignty was present before Bodin of course, the French legalists of the first half of the 16th century, such as Grassaille, Seyssel, or Chasseneuz, have certain merits in substantiating modern public law on the principle of sovereignty, but that which was the object of their theses was the justification of the supremacy of the monarch within the state, based on the theory of divine law as basis of his prerogatives. Thus, the great jurist Charles Dumoulin[13] admitted the absolute character of sovereignty, substantiating royal power on divine investiture, thus identifying, the same as his predecessors, sovereignty with royalist absolutism, identification which has, as such, consecrated the medieval adage, as quoted in the work of the medieval public law works, that persons governed by public law, that Rex Franciae est in regno suo tanquam quidam corporalis Deo - "the King of France, in his kingdom, is God embodied". It's true, a logical identification, that does not exclude, however, the at least formal recognition of a certain constitutional legal limit of such an absolutism of power, the limits being the oaths and the principle of consent of statuses.

Bodin managed to achieve the great leap toward the modern concept of sovereignty by understanding, however, that sovereignty is not the principle of the authority within the state, but the principle of the State from which all powers[14] originate, for Bodin the sovereign and the sovereignty which he exercises, either directly or indirectly - only operates in order to found and preserve a Republic - the state, because sovereignty is the principle of the state itself. For Bodin, sovereignty is based on law[15], which implicitly

[6] Montesquieu Charles., Despre spiritul legilor, vol. 1. ("Stiintifica" Publishing House, Bucharest, 1964), 11.
[7] Charles Loyseau, Le prince, (Gallimard, Paris, 1952), 290.
[8] Paul Negulescu, Curs de drept constituțional român, (Alex Th. Doicescu Publishing House, Bucharest, 1927), 94-95.
[9] Carré de Malberg, Contribution à la théorie générale de l'État, tome I, (Sirey 1, Paris, 1920), 74.
[10] Genoveva Vrabie, Organizarea politico-etatica a Romaniei. Drept Constitutional si institutii politice. Vol. 2. (Cugetarea Publishing House, Iasi, 1999), 74.
[11] Paul Viollet (éd.), Les Établissements de saint Louis accompagnés des textes primitifs et de textes dérivés, avec une introduction et des notes, 4 tomes, (Société de l'histoire de France, librairie Renouard, Paris, 188), 515-517.
[12] Hans Kelsen, Das Problem der Souveränität und die Theorie des Vökerrechts (2.Ausg.), (Aalen, Scientia Verlag, 1981), 55.
[13] Jean-Louis Thireau, Charles Dumolin, 1500-1566. (Droz, Geneva, 1980), 28.
[14] Gérard Mairet, Le principe de souveraineté. Histoire et fondements du pouvoir moderne, (Gallimard, Paris, 1997), 34.
[15] Jean Bodin, Les Six Livres de la République, 58.

makes the sovereign state a state governed by the rule of law - in Bodin's terminology, "an État de justice".

Jean Bodin marks, in the history of the concept of sovereignty, the principle of individualizing historical peoples, of building the poitical territoriality of the states, of political modernity in general, a process which continues with Thommas Hobbes, with his Philosophical Rudiments of Government and Politics, repeating the exposure of the conceptual system of sovereignty through Principes fondamentaux de la philosophie de l'État and Du citoyen, a work through which Hobbes inaugurates, for the modern era, the philosophy of the state.

For Hobbes[16], by following Bodin, positive law, the law in force, is an expression of the will of the sovereign who uses his power in this way. As an immanent form of civil human existence (i.e., within the Roman sense of civis), with its determining factor and political significance, the law is a condition of civilization, the law "playing", in order to achieve such a purpose, a double function: moral and pragmatic, is in the service of (social) justice and peace. Therefore, law summarizes and expresses the essence of the state, namely the union of individuals within the same political body and their subordination to the same rules.

What is interesting in Hobbes is the fact that law as an expression of sovereign power is only meant to repress, to penalize guilt, without, however, aiming to carry out justice. The law does not express fairness. Fairness, as a value, constitutes only a procedure of sovereignty, in the sense that law constitutes what the sovereign wishes and what the sovereign wants constitutes law. Hobbes, by supporting the thesis that the State is a profane state, gives up, as a landmark, any divine norm, and, as such, the divine norms and values are no longer the landmarks of fairness, but the will of the sovereign is, the law having a deeply profane nature. The sovereign must be the only one able to determine what is and what is not fair: the law being a lexicon, a code, the sovereign is the one who lays down such a code, imposing the current and official definition of language terms.

As a matter of fact, for a long time, the concept of sovereignty was treated as a function of the state, as an essential and specific element of the state, the view of an anthropomorphic theory of legal scholastic which built law through a scientific technique of legal fictions being later abandoned.

From such a perspective, the concept of sovereignty, referring to the alliance between property and will, had been based on the political and legal trinity of:

a) personality;
b) the hierarchy of wills;
c) patrimony.

Although, in the modern classic conception, the holder of the right to property is the king and then the nation, the French Revolution of 1789, following in the footsteps of Locke's theory, transfers the subjective right to property from the king to the nation, not noticing, however, that the holder of the right to property of the national heritage was not the king, but that the property belonged to the institution of the Crown. The revolutionary theory which laid the foundation for 1789, and in particular the legal ideology of Rousseau, conceived sovereignty as an expression of three basic elements[17]:

a) indivisibility;
b) imprescriptibility;
c) inalienability.

However, these three determinants of the sovereignty of the nation are nothing more than the consequences of the theory of the sovereignty of the crown.

For the classic doctrine, distinctions must be made between the German School - Gerber, Jhering, Laband and Jellinek - and the French School - Rousseau and A. Esmein, the latter also being the author of the theory of the assignment of national sovereignty, therefore, between the German positivist theory and the French positivist theory, both approaches having features in common, namely legal positivism and judicial voluntarism - both opposing almost equally the English School of public law, by rejecting the theory of national sovereignty, the English substituting the analysis of the concept of sovereignty with the theory of the sovereignty of Parliament. Coming back to the distinctions between the German and French schools in the discussion on sovereignty, it should be noted that, for the German thinkers, the State is a legal person, his being an a priori assumption. As such, law arises out of the will of the State, sovereignty belonging to the state as a person[18]. Whereas for the French, the State, as the nation's legal expression, is a posteriori assumption, the Nation existing before the State, the State and Law arising out of the Nation; therefore, sovereignty belongs to the Nation - according to the theory of nation-people. Such a theory of the State generates two principles, namely:

1. the principle of national sovereignty;
2. the principle of the assignment of sovereignty.

However, Kelsen and Krabbe cause a change of paradigm. It is true, Krabbe[19] stops at an opposition between the sovereignty of law and state sovereignty. However, by analyzing the concept of sovereignty as a notion of itself and in itself, Kelsen triggers a breakthrough in deepening the theory and the notion of sovereignty, by studying the legal logic of the concept, by issuing a new hypothesis on sovereignty, by releasing the own function of the concept of

[16] Thomas Hobbes, Du citoyen (De cive), Principes fondamentaux de la philosophie de l'État (éd. Gérard Mairet), (col. ,,Le Livre de Poche. Classiques de la philosophie"), (Paris, Gallimard 1996), 270.
[17] Tudor Draganu, Drept constitutional si institutii politice. Tratat elementar, vol.1, (Lumina Lex Publishing House, Cluj-Napoca, 2000), 208-212.
[18] Bertrand de Jouvenel, Du pouvoir, Histoire naturelle de la croissance, (Hachette, Paris, 1972), 23.
[19] Francis Jaeger, Le problème de la souveraineté dans la doctrine de Kelsen (Exposé et critique), (E. de Boccard édit., Paris, 1932), 2-4

sovereignty in the theory of law. For Kelsen, sovereignty is no longer and can no longer be seen as an exclusive attribute of the state, but sovereignty is and becomes an attribute of international law - droit des gens, by exceeding the limits classically imposed by positive law and statal law. Already, with Kelsen, the problem of sovereignty becomes and is established as the issue of the unity of legal order, of the scientific systematization of law.

Conclusions

Sovereignty, is an element of logic, which gives a part of positive law priority over the other subsystems of positive law. As such, it is logical that sovereignty must be assigned, as a predicate, to internal public law - internal public order - rather than to the State, in order to arrive at a single source of the norms of jurisdiction, sovereignty being, in conclusion, a criterium, a synthetic principle in establishing the hierarchy of the different systems/orders of positive law, for the introduction of the logical-theoretical unity of law, through a common value.

References

- Alexandru Bolintineanu, Mircea Malita, Carta ONU, (Politica Publishing House, Bucharest, 1970)
- Bertrand de Jouvenel, Du pouvoir, Histoire naturelle de la croissance, (Hachette, Paris, 1972)
- Carré de Malberg, Contribution à la théorie générale de l'État, tome I, (Sirey 1, Paris, 1920)
- Charles Loyseau, Le prince, (Gallimard, Paris, 1952)
- Constantin Dissescu, Constitutional Law, ("Soce & Co" Publishing House, Bucharest, 1915)
- Francis Jaeger, Le problème de la souveraineté dans la doctrine de Kelsen (Exposé et critique), (E. de Boccard édit., Paris, 1932)
- Genoveva Vrabie, Organizarea politico-etatica a Romaniei. Drept Constitutional si institutii politice. Vol. 2. (Cugetarea Publishing House, Iasi, 1999)
- Gérard Mairet, Le principe de souveraineté. Histoire et fondements du pouvoir moderne, (Gallimard, Paris, 1997)
- Hans Kelsen, Das Problem der Souveränität und die Theorie des Vökerrechts (2.Ausg.), (Scientia Verlag, Aalen, 1981)
- Hans Kelsen, Les rapports de système entre le droit interne et le droit international public, (Hachette, Paris, 1927)
- Jean Bodin, Les Six Livres de la République (éd. Gérard Mairet), (col. "Le Livre de Poche. Classiques de la philosophie", nr.4619), (Paris, Gallimard 1993)
- Jean-Louis Thireau, Charles Dumolin, 1500-1566. (Droz, Geneva, 1980)
- Montesquieu Charles, Despre spiritul legilor, vol. 1. ("Stiintifica" Publishing House, Bucharest, 1964)
- Olivier Beaud, La puissance de l'État, (Presses Universitaires de France, Pars, 1994)
- Paul Negulescu, Curs de drept constituţional român, (Alex Th. Doicescu Publishing House, Bucharest, 1927)
- Paul Viollet (éd.), Les Établissements de saint Louis accompagnés des textes primitifs et de textes dérivés, avec une introduction et des notes, 4 tomes, (Société de l'histoire de France, librairie Renouard, Paris, 188)
- Thomas Hobbes, Du citoyen (De cive), Principes fondamentaux de la philosophie de l'État (éd. Gérard Mairet), (col. „Le Livre de Poche. Classiques de la philosophie"), (Paris, Gallimard 1996)
- Tudor Draganu, Drept constitutional si institutii politice. Tratat elementar, vol.1, (Lumina Lex Publishing House, Cluj-Napoca, 2000)

WHAT MEANS DISCRIMINATION IN A NORMAL SOCIETY WITH CLEAR RULES?

Marta-Claudia CLIZA*

Abstract

The concept of discrimination is relatively new which has already issued various interpretations and approaches. Discrimination manifests itself on various criteria such as gender, religion, race and others. We arrived in such a point that the idea of indirect discrimination was pointed out provided that certain act or deeds affect the person who may be discriminated. The present study intends to analyse the concept of discrimination, the persons affected by this kind of behaviour and how the legislation tries to correct the human conduct in order not to affect the dignity of individuals. All concepts from legislation are analysed under the precedent of the Romanian authority empowered to sanction the discrimination deeds. Also, we analyzed the issue of discrimination from the point of view of the Council for Combating Discrimination, the sole authority competent to pronounce on first instance if we face of an act or deed of discrimination nature which could affect human values that characterize an individual. The study starts from the presentation of general concepts as they are taken into account by the legislation, but also by the case-law of the National Council for Combating Discrimination or of the domestic or international courts. Starting from this general concept, we finally reached the particularization of certain specific situations of discrimination. Despite this, the analysis was always performed in relation to concepts clearly established, as we have shown, by the legislation or by the case-law.

Keywords: discrimination, rules of law, applicable legislation, CNCD, discriminated person.

1. Introduction - Presentation of Discrimination Concept

1.1. The defining elements of the concept of discrimination. Notion. Definition

Ab initio, we believe that we need to perform a brief analysis in terms of the terminology of word "discrimination", for a better understanding of the situations it comprises.

In this respect, we hereby point out that, in accordance with the Explanatory dictionary of the Romanian language[1], "to discriminate" means, inter alia:

- "to make a difference";
- "to separate";
- "to make a distinction";
- "to pursue a policy by which a category of citizens of a state are deprived of certain rights on racial, ethnic origin, sexual grounds, etc.".

Furthermore, the same source defines the term of "discrimination" as being:

- "the action of discrimination and its result";
- "net difference, distinction made between several objects, ideas, etc.";
- "policy by means of which a state or a category of citizens of a state are deprived of certain rights on the basis of illegitimate considerations".

Therefore, given this first aspect, it can be concluded that the notion of "discrimination" implies unequal treatment, materialized in a distinction, differentiation between certain categories of objects/persons, a distinction which is performed based on specific criteria.

In what concerns second aspect, in terms of the normative definition of "discrimination", we hereby state that both the national law maker[2], and the community law maker[3] defined "discrimination" as

---

* Associate professor PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (e-mail: cliza_claudia@yahoo.ro)

[1] See in this respect, https://dexonline.ro/intrare/discrimina/17069, site accessed on 10.02.2018.

[2] See in this respect the provisions of art. 2 para. (1) of Government Ordinance no. 137/2000 on the prevention and sanctioning of all forms of discrimination, republished in Official Journal, Part I no. 166 of March 7th, 2014 (hereinafter referred to as "G.O. no. 137/2000"), according to which: "[…] any distinction, exclusion, restriction or preference on the grounds of race, nationality, ethnicity, language, religion, social category, beliefs, gender, sexual orientation, age, disability, non-contagious chronic disease, HIV, infection, affiliation to a disadvantaged category, as well as any other criteria of which scope or effect is the restriction, removing, recognition, use or performance, on an equal footing, of human rights and fundamental freedoms or of the rights recognized by the law, in the political, economic, social and cultural field or in other fields of public life";

[3] See in this respect the provisions of art. 2 para. (1) and (2) of Council Directive 2000/43/EC of June 29th, 2000 implementing the principle of equal treatment between persons irrespective of racial or ethnic origin, published in Official Journal of European Union no. 180 of July 19th, 2000 (hereinafter referred to as "Directive no. 43/2000"), according to which:

(1) The purpose of this Directive is to lay down a framework for combating discrimination on the grounds of racial or ethnic origin, with a view to putting into effect in the Member States the principle of equal treatment.

(2) For the purpose of para. (1):

(a) direct discrimination: shall be taken to occur where one person is treated less favorably than another is, has been or would be treated in a comparable situation, on grounds of race or ethnic origin;

representing "different treatment applied to individuals in a comparable situation". In other words, to discriminate means to make a *difference or distinction, to distinguish, reject or apply arbitrary or unequal treatment, in unjustified way, between two persons or situations in comparable positions. Furthermore, differences, restrictions, exclusions or preferences related to an individual's characteristics are discriminatory if their purpose or effect is the reduction or exclusion of rights, opportunities or freedoms.

In what concerns third aspect, any criterion according to which a person is treated differently may represent a criterion of discrimination; there can be discrimination when two or more persons are treated identically, despite the fact they are in different situations. These persons are treated identically due to the fact a specific characteristic that differentiate them from other category is not taken into account.

From this perspective, if the differential treatment or the identical treatment has an objective justification does not represent discrimination, in which respect the national and community case-law appreciated unanimously that differential treatment becomes discriminatory when distinctions are made between analogous and comparable situations without being based on a reasonable and objective justification, as we are to detail below.

2. Content

2.1. National and International Case-Law Matters

The following were established in the judicial practice of the contentious constitutional court:

"the violation of the principle of equality and non-discrimination occurs when different treatment is applied to equal cases, without any objective and reasonable grounds or if there is a disproportion between the scope aimed by means of the unequal treatment and the used means"[4].

Therefore, the discrimination is not only an action or a conduct, but also the intention to promote social inequalities, by being a form of marginalization, therefore discrimination is related to different categories of persons who are marginalized, isolated or unprivileged based on prohibited criteria.

In this respect, the following were stated in the case law of the European Court of Justice[5]: "the principle of equal treatment prohibits comparable situations to be treated differently and different situations to be treated identically".

Furthermore, it was stated that „the right to non-discrimination prohibits situations in which persons or groups of persons in a similar situation are treated differently, as well as situations in which persons or group of persons in different situations are treated identically"[6].

In the case law of the European Committee of Social Rights, the notion of discrimination was defined as representing: "the differential treatment applied to persons in comparable situations, difference which does not have a legitimate purpose and/or is not based on objective and reasonable grounds".

Furthermore, the non-discrimination principle is provided both by the provisions of art. 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights, and by Additional Protocol no. 12 which sanctions all forms of discrimination.

In this respect, the High Court of Cassation and Justice established the following in its constant judicial practice:

"The principle of non-discrimination is provided by all international treaties and documents on human rights protection. This principle entails the application of an equal treatment to all individuals who have equal rights. Drawn up this way, non-discrimination

(b) indirect discrimination: shall be taken to occur where an apparently neutral provision, criterion or practice would put persons having a particular religion or belief, a particular disability, a particular age, or a particular sexual orientation at a particular disadvantage compared to other persons, unless the respective provision, criterion or practice is objectively justified, by a legitimate purpose and the means for reaching the respective purpose are appropriate and necessary.

Furthermore, see the provisions of art. 2 para. (1) and (2) of Council Directive of November 27th, 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation (2000/78/EC), published in Official Journal of the European Union no. 303 of December 2nd, 2000 (hereinafter referred to as "Directive no. 78/2000"), according to which:

(1) For the purposes of this Directive, the "principle of equal treatment" shall mean that there shall be no direct or indirect discrimination whatsoever on any of the grounds referred to in Article 1.

(2) For the purposes of paragraph (1):

(a) direct discrimination shall be taken to occur where one person is treated less favorably than another is, has been or would be treated in a comparable situation, on any of the grounds referred to in Article 1;

(b) indirect discrimination shall be taken to occur where an apparently neutral provision, criterion or practice would put persons having a particular religion or belief, a particular disability, a particular age, or a particular sexual orientation at a particular disadvantage compared with other persons unless:

(i) that provision, criterion or practice is objectively justified by a legitimate aim and the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary, or

(ii) as regards persons with a particular disability, the employer or any person or organization to whom this Directive applies, is obliged, under national legislation, to take appropriate measures in line with the principles contained in Article 5 in order to eliminate disadvantages entailed by such provision, criterion or practice; principle appears as a modern and improved form of the principle regarding the equality of all individuals before the law. Furthermore, art. 7 of the Universal Declaration provides that all individuals are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law.

[4] See in this respect, Constitutional Court, Decision no. 82 of February 7th, 2012, published in Official Journal of Romania no. 250 of April 13th, 2012, available on http://legislatie.just.ro/Public/DetaliiDocument/137137, site accessed on 10.02.2018.

[5] See in this respect, Case C-106/83, Sermide SpA c. Cassa Conguaglio Zuccero and others, available on: http://curia.europa.eu/juris/celex.jsf?celex=61983CJ0106&lang1=en&lang2=RO&type=TXT&ancre, site accessed on 10.02.2018.

[6] See in this respect, the Decision of the European Court of Human Rights, Hoogendijk/the Netherlands (dec.) (58641/00), January 6th, 2005;

As a legal matter, the right to non-discrimination, provided for by art. 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights, is a substantially subjective right. The text in question lists 13 non-discrimination grounds, but this list is not limited. In other words, any form of discrimination shall be prohibited, regardless the criterion it is based on.

The right to non-discrimination provided for by art. 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights does not have an independent existence in the system of European protection of the fundamental rights and freedoms established by the Convention, due to the fact it can only be claimed in connection to them. It can also emerge autonomously, meaning that, it may be violated in a given situation without a violation of the rights in connection to which it was found being ascertained. The ascertainment of a violation of these provisions can only be performed in connection with another right protected by the Convention and/or its additional protocols, and, as of April 1st, 2005, when Protocol no. 12 to the Convention on the general interdiction of any form of discrimination entered into force, in connection with any other right recognized in the national legislation of any contracting state.

By making a specific interpretation of the provisions of the Convention, its bodies concluded that to distinguish does not mean to discriminate, by noting the existence of situations the peculiarities of which require to be treated differently.

The difference in treatment becomes discrimination, under art. 14 of the Convention if state authorities introduce distinctions between analogous and comparable situations, without being based on a reasonable and objective justification"[7].

Therefore, discrimination does not operate in any situation, but entails the existence of a criterion of those provided by the law, therefore differentiation does not represent discrimination if there is an objective justification for this differentiation.

In the same respect, the Court of Appeal Bucharest noted in its constant judicial practice the following:

„Not any differential treatment means discrimination; in order for unfair differential treatment to be ascertained, it is required to establish that persons in analogous or comparable situations benefit from a preferential treatment*, and if such distinction between analogous or comparable situations occurs,* it must not find any objective or reasonable justification"[8].

Therefore, in order to find ourselves in a situation of discrimination, the differentiation, exclusion, restriction or preference has to be based on one of the prohibited criteria provided by the law, to be arbitrary. Furthermore, it is required that all the aforementioned refer to persons in comparable situations and their scope or effect is the restriction or removal of a right granted by the law.

Furthermore, the relevant doctrine in the field provided the following:

„The differential treatment shall be deemed discriminatory if the operated distinction is objective and reasonable. The distinction is admissible if it has a legitimate purpose, by following, at the same time, the reasonable report of proportionality between the means used and the achieved aim. To say that differentiation is objective means that it does not have to be subjective and arbitrary. Reasonable nature of the differentiation is subject to the same logics and concerns to avoid arbitrary: this has to occur in certain limits, so that the operated differentiation cannot violate principle of equality by protecting the interests of the group in question. This is the application of the proportionality principle".[9]

Therefore, any time there is a reasonable and objective justification of the differential treatment, we cannot talk about a discrimination action.

In this respect, we hereby mention that the provisions of art. 2 para. (3) of Government Ordinance no. 137/2000 expressly establish that there is no discrimination if there is an objective justification of a certain behavior: [...] „unless these provisions, criteria or practices are objectively justified by a legitimate purpose, and the methods of reaching the respective purpose are appropriate and necessary".

In connection to the notion of differential treatment, the High Court of Cassation and Justice noted the following:

„[...] the criterion based on which the differential treatment apply must be the determinant factor in the application of the differential treatment, meaning that this element is the cause of the discrimination deed.

In case of discrimination, the differential treatment is determined by the existence of a criterion, which entails a causality relation between claimed differential treatment and the criterion claimed in case of the person who considers himself/herself discriminated, and the scope or effect of the differential treatment must be the restriction or removal of the admission, use or exercise, under equality terms, of human fundamental rights and freedoms, or of the rights admitted by the law, in the political, economic, social and cultural area or in any other areas of public life[10]."

[7] See in this respect, Decision no. 2808/2015, pronounced by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, Division of Contentious Administrative and Fiscal. The whole material can be accessed by using site: https://lege5.ro/App/Document/gi3diojrgq3q/decizia-nr-2808-2015-anulare-act-administrativ?d=18.09.2015&pid=250376975#p-250376975, site accessed on 10.02.2018.

[8] See in this respect, the Court of Appeal Bucharest, Division VIII civ. and mun. asig, Decision no. 562R/2010, quoted by Loredana-Manuela Muscalu, Discriminarea în relațiile de muncă, Hamagiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, p. 4;

[9] See in this respect, J.-F. Renucci, Tratat de drept european al drepturilor omului, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2009, pp. 153-154, quoted by Loredana-Manuela Muscalu, Discriminarea, op. cit., p. 7;

Therefore, objective justification includes the existence of a legitimate purpose reached by appropriate and mandatory methods. In other words, objective and reasonable justification must follow a legitimate purpose, and the applied measures must be proportional to the purpose.

If differential treatment is on grounds of race, color or ethnic origin, the notion of objective and reasonable justification must be construed as strictly as possible. Therefore, in case D.H. and others against Czech Republic, the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as "ECtHR") established the following:

"The court was not convinced that the difference in treatment between Roma and non-Roma children was based on objective and reasonable justification and that there is a reasonable proportionality between the means used and the aim to be achieved. Therefore, the application of the relevant Czech legislation had, in fact, at that time, disproportionate prejudicial effects on the Roma community, and the plaintiffs, by being members of the respective community suffered the same discriminatory treatment" [11].

The national courts ruled in the same matter in their constant judicial practice, namely: "the legal differential treatment is admissible for different situations, when it is rationally and objectively justified"[12].

In conclusion, according to the national and community judicial practice, discrimination can operate only if it is determined by the existence of unjustified criterion/criteria, of those forbidden by the legislation, and not if there is a simple difference in treatment which is reasonably and objectively justified, at the same time requiring the existence of analogous and comparable situations in relation to which the differential treatment is to be assessed.

2.2. Features of the notion of discrimination. Classification of the forms of discrimination

2.2.1. Discrimination features

First of all, we consider necessary to carry out a brief analysis of the main features of the concept of discrimination, in order to show the absence of any discrimination action in the present case.

Therefore, the supreme court, by means of the interpretation of the provisions of Government Ordinance no. 137/2000, noted the following:

„[...] in order for an action to be qualified as a discrimination action, it must meet the following conditions at the same time*:*

- the existence of a differential treatment expressed by difference, exclusion, restriction or preference (the existence of persons or situations in comparable situations);
- the existence of a discrimination criterion according to art. 2 para. (1) of G.O. no. 137/2000 republished, differential treatment is not objectively justified by a legitimate aim, and the means of achieving that aim are not appropriate and necessary;
- the aim or effect of the differential treatment is the restriction, removal of the acknowledgment, use or exercise, under equality terms, of a right established by the law.

In other words, in order for a certain conduct to be considered discrimination, it is required to fulfill the following conditions:

a) the difference in treatment of two or more persons in identical or comparable situations or the failure to treat differently certain different situations;
b) the lack of objective and reasonable justification for differential treatment;
c) the scope or the result of the differential treatment is the restriction or illegal refusal of the exercise of certain rights.

Therefore, as the Court of Appeal Bucharest noted, not any difference in treatment means discrimination, taking into account that, in order for unfair differential treatment to be ascertained, it is required to establish that persons in analogous or comparable situations benefit from a preferential treatment, and if such distinction between analogous or comparable situations occurs, it does not find any objective or reasonable justification[13].

In the same respect, opinions were expressed in legal specialized literature[14], meaning that an action can be qualified as discrimination if it fulfills certain conditions at the same time, namely:

- the existence of a differential treatment applied to certain analogous situations or the omission to treat differently certain different, not comparable situations;
- differential treatment is expressed by exclusion, difference, restriction or preference;
- the existence of a discrimination criterion

[10] See in this respect, Decision no. 2808/2015, pronounced by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, Division of Contentious Administrative and Fiscal. The whole material can be accessed by using site: https://lege5.ro/App/Document/gi3diojrgq3q/decizia-nr-2808-2015-anulare-act-administrativ?d=18.09.2015&pid=250376975#p-250376975, site accessed on 10.02.2018.

[11] See in this respect, Decision ECtHR, D.H. and others against Czech Republic, November 13th, 2007 (Case no. 57325/00), available on: https://jurisprudentacedo.com/D.H.-c.-Republicii-Cehe-Plasamentul-copiilor-romi-in-scoli-speciale-incalcare.html. In the same respect, see Decision ECtHR, Sampanis and others against Greece, June 5th, 2008, site accessed on 10.02.2018.

[12] See in this respect, Constitutional Court, Decision no. 168 of December 10th, 1998, published in Official Journal of Romania no. 77 of 22 02 1999, quoated by Loredana-Manuela Muscalu, Discriminarea, op. cit., p. 7; provided by the law;

[13] See in this respect, Court of Appeal Bucharest, Division VIII civ. and mun. asig, Decision no. 4463/R/2009, Dec. No. 2295R/2009, Dec. No. 1715R/2009, Dec. No. 4204R/2009 and Dec. No. 2020R/2009, quoted by Loredana-Manuela Muscalu, Discriminarea, op. cit., p. 4;

[14] See in this respect, Loredana-Manuela Muscalu, Discriminarea, op. cit., pp. 4-5;

- the scope or effect of the differential treatment has to be the restriction, removal of the acknowledgment, use or exercise, under equality terms, of a right provided by the law (exempli gratia: the violation of the right to work);
- differential treatment is not objectively justified by a legitimate purpose, and the means of reaching that aim are not appropriate and necessary.

Therefore, we hereby reaffirm that in order to ascertain the existence of an action of discrimination, the claimed actions must result in the restriction or removal of a right provided by the law. Not any abuse or violation of human fundamental rights and freedoms or of the rights provided by the law fall under the scope of the notion of discrimination.

2.2.2. Discrimination categories

From another point of view, we hereby state that, both from the perspective of the European Convention on Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as "ECHR"), and in what concerns the relevant European case law, several categories of discrimination are identified, namely: direct discrimination and indirect discrimination, harassment and incitement to discrimination.

- In this respect, ECtHR uses the formulation that there must be "a difference in the treatment of persons in analogous or relevantly similar situations", which is "based on an identifiable characteristic" [15].

Therefore, "direct discrimination" occurs when[16]:

- a person is applied unfavorable treatment – this can be relatively easy to identify compared with indirect discrimination. Actual examples of unfavorable treatment expressing direct discrimination are, inter alia, the following:
  - refusal of entry to a restaurant or shop;
  - receiving a smaller pension or lower pay;
  - having a higher or lower retirement age;
  - being barred from a particular profession;
  - not being able to claim inheritance rights;
  - being excluded from the mainstream education system;
  - being deported;
  - not being permitted to wear religious symbols;
  - being refused social security payments or having them revoked;
- unfavorable treatment is relevant by comparison with how other persons in a similar situation were or would be treated – this criterion is of the essence of a direct discrimination action, which is why it is inconceivable to retain discrimination in the absence of the fulfillment of such requirement. Therefore, providing a comparator is often a controversial issue, and sometimes neither the parties to the dispute nor the court explicitly discuss the comparator[17]. Despite this, it has been held that there is a clear exception to the rule of finding an appropriate "comparator", in the context of the European Union law regarding employment, meaning that there is discrimination if the person concerned is treated differently because the respective person is pregnant. In such cases, it will be considered that there is direct discrimination on grounds of sex and that there is no need to have a comparator[18];
- the ground of this treatment is represented by an actual feature of them, which falls under the scope of the "protected ground" category – in detail, the "protected grounds" are exhaustive, representing the factor that practically leads to a different behavior towards a person in relation to other persons in similar situations, id est: sex, sexual orientation, disability, age, race, ethnic origin, national origin and religion or belief. We have to keep in mind that in order to talk about discrimination, it is required to exist a causality connection between less favorable treatment and "protected ground"[19].

By summing up the above, it can be noted that direct discrimination is characterized by differential treatment, meaning that the following must be shown*: alleged victim has been treated less favorably based on the possession of a characteristic falling under a "protected ground" and Less favorable treatment is*

[15] See in this respect, European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights, European Council, Handbook on European non-discrimination law, Imprimerie Centrale, 2010, p. 24;

[16] Ibidem;

[17] See in this respect, Decision of the European Court of Justice, Allonby/Accrington & Rossendale College and others, case C-256/01 [2004] RJ I-873, January 13th, 2004. In this case, the complaint, who worked for a college as a lecturer, did not have her contract renewed by the college. She then went to work for a company that supplied lecturers to educational establishments.

This company sent the complainant to work at her old college, performing the same duties as before, but paid her less than her college had done. She alleged discrimination on the basis of sex, saying that male lecturers working for the college were paid more. The ECJ held that male lecturers employed by the college were not in a comparable situation. This was because the college was not responsible for determining the level of pay for both the male lecturer who it employed directly and the complainant who was employed by an external company. They were therefore not in a sufficiently similar situation. In the same respect, see: Decision ECtHR, Moustaquim/Belgium (12313/86), February 18th, 1991; Decision ECtHR, Luczak/Poland (77782/01), November 27th, 2007; Decision ECtHR, Gaygusuz/Austria (17371/90), September 16th, 1996, quoted by the European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights, European Council Handbook on European non-discrimination law, op. cit., p. 26; determined through a comparison between the alleged victim and (iii) another person in a similar situation who does not possess the protected characteristic[20].

[18] See in this respect, Decision of the European Court of Justice, Dekker/Stichting Vormingscentrum voor Jong Volwassenen (VJV-Centrum) Plus, case C-177/88 [1990] RJ I-3941, November 8th, 1990; Decision of the European Court of Justice, Webb/EMO Air Cargo (UK) Ltd, case C-32/93 [1994] RJ I-3567, July 14th, 1994, quoted by the European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights, European Council Handbook on European non-discrimination law, op. cit., p. 28;

[19] See in this respect, Decision of the European Court of Justice, Maruko/Versorgungsanstalt der deutschen Bühnen, case C-267/06 [2008] RJ I-1757, April 1st, 2008. See in this respect Decision ECtHR, Aziz/Cipru (69949/01), June 22nd, 2004;

- In what concerns the second category of discrimination, the European legislation and case law note that discrimination can result not only from the application of different treatment to persons in similar situations, but also from the application of the same treatment to persons in different situations, the latter hypothesis being known as "indirect discrimination".

Unlike direct discrimination, in case of indirect discrimination, the treatment is not the one that differs, but its effects, which will be felt differently by people with different characteristics. In this respect, Directive no. 43/2000 provides expressis verbis, in the content of art. 2 para. (2) letter (b) the following:

"Indirect discrimination shall be taken to occur where an apparently neutral provision, criterion or practice would put persons of a racial or ethnic origin at a particular disadvantage compared with other persons*, unless that provision, criterion or practice is objectively justified by a legitimate aim and the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary".*

From the interpretation of the normative text quoted above, the conditions in which indirect discrimination occur are evident, namely:

- the existence of a neutral provision/criterion/practice – the particularity of this criterion is given by the fact that the neutral provision/criterion/practice applies to all, not only to those subject to unequal treatment. Exempli gratia, in case Schönheit, the pensions of part-time employees were calculated using a different rate to that of full-time employees. This different rate was not based on the differences of the time spent in work. Thus, part-time employees received a smaller pension than full-time employees, even taking into account the different lengths of service, effectively meaning that part-time workers were being paid less. Despite the fact that this neutral rule on the calculation of pensions applied equally to all part-time workers, taking into account that around 88% of part-time workers were women, the effect of the rule was disproportionately negative for women as compared to men [21].
- neutral provision/criterion/practice places a "protected group at a particular disadvantage" – this is defining by the fact that when considering statistical evidence that the protected group is disproportionately effected in a negative way by comparison to those in a similar situation, evidence is sought that a particularly large proportion of those negatively affected is made up of that "protected groups"[22]. Exempli gratia, Advocate General Léger, on the discrimination on grounds of sex in case Nolte[23], referred to a number of previous cases, considering that: "in order to be discriminatory, the measure must affect «a far greater number of women than men»"[24] or "a considerably lower percentage of men than women"[25] or "far more women than men[26]".
- the existence of a comparator – other groups in a similar situation – similar to direct discrimination, the existence of a "comparator" is mandatory in order to determine whether the effect of the particular rule, criterion or practice is significantly more negative than those experienced by other individuals in a similar situation.

Given all the above, proving indirect discrimination requires an individual to provide evidence that, as group, those sharing their protected characteristic are subject to differential effects or impact, by comparison to those without this characteristic[27].

- In what concerns the third form of discrimination, we hereby state that harassment, while treated separately under EU law, is a particular manifestation of direct discrimination [28]. This is contemplated by a detailed analysis performed in the next chapter of this study, in relation to the de facto situation claimed by petitioner Nicoleta Crenguța Ciocea.
- In what concerns instigation to discrimination, this is expressly provided both in the content

[20] See in this respect, the European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights, European Council Handbook on European non-discrimination law, op. cit., p. 46;

[21] See in this respect, the European Court of Justice, Hilde Schönheit/Stadt Frankfurt am Main şi Silvia Becker/Land Hessen, related cases C-4/02 and C-5/02 [2003] RJ I-12575, October 23rd, 2003. Furthermore, see Decision ECtHR, D.H. and others/Czech Republic [GC] (57325/00), November 13th, 2007, item 79;

[22] See in this respect, the European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights, European Council Handbook on European non-discrimination law, op. cit., p. 33;

[23] See in this respect, the Opinion of Attorney general Léger of May 31st, 1995, items 57 and 58 in the Decision of the European Court of Justice, Nolte/Landesversicherungsanstalt Hannover, case C-317/93 [1995] RJ I-4625, December 14th, 1995;

[24] See in this respect, Decision of the European Court of Justice, Rinner-Kühn/FWW Spezial-Gebäudereinigung, case 171/88 [1989] RJ 2743, July 13th, 1989;

[25] See in this respect, Decision of the European Court of Justice, Kowalska/Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg, case C-33/89 [1990] RJ I-2591, June 27th, 1990;

[26] See in this respect, Decision of the European Court of Justice, De Weerd, fostă Roks, şi alţii/Bestuur van de Bedrijfsvereniging voor de Gezondheid, Geestelijke en Maatschappelijke Belangen and others, case C-343/92 [1994] RJ I-571, February 24th, 1994; of Directive no. 78/2000[29], and by the provisions of art. 2 para. (4) of Directive no. 43/2000[30].

[27] See in this respect, the European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights, European Council Handbook on European non-discrimination law, op. cit., p. 47;

[28] Ibidem;

3. Conclusions

Given all the aspects detailed in this section, especially with regard to the first two forms of discrimination, it is obvious that, regardless if the discrimination is direct or indirect, discrimination entails the fulfillment, at the same time, of several mandatory conditions, namely:

- differential treatment;
- the person subject to differential treatment or in relation to which the differential effect of a general treatment is materialized is part of a "protected group" and, last but not least,
- the absence of an objective justification or legitimate aim for different treatment/effect of a particular treatment;
- the existence of a comparator, therefore, we cannot speak about discrimination in the absence of any of the aforementioned requirements.

References

- Loredana-Manuela Muscalu, Discriminarea în relațiile de muncă, Hamagiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015
- J.-F. Renucci, Tratat de drept european al drepturilor omului, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2009
- The European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights, European Council, Handbook on European non-discrimination law, Imprimerie Centrale, 2010
- Allonby/Accrington & Colegiul Rossendale and others, case C-256/01 [2004] RJ I-873, January 13th, 2004
- De Weerd, ex Roks, and others/Bestuur van de Bedrijfsvereniging voor de Gezondheid, Geestelijke en Maatschappelijke Belangen and others, case C-343/92 [1994] RJ I-571, February 24th, 1994
- Dekker/Stichting Vormingscentrum voor Jong Volwassenen (VJV-Centrum) Plus, case C-177/88 [1990] RJ I-3941, November 8th, 1990
- Hilde Schönheit/Stadt Frankfurt am Main and Silvia Becker/Land Hessen, related cases C-4/02 and C-5/02 [2003] RJ I-12575, October 23rd, 2003
- Kowalska/Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg, case C-33/89 [1990] RJ I-2591, June 27th, 1990
- Maruko/Versorgungsanstalt der deutschen Bühnen, case C-267/06 [2008] RJ I-1757, 1.05.2008
- Nolte/Landesversicherungsanstalt Hannover, case C-317/93 [1995] RJ I-4625, 14.12.1995
- Rinner-Kühn/FWW Spezial-Gebäudereinigung, case 171/88 [1989] RJ 2743, July 13th, 1989
- Webb/EMO Air Cargo (UK) Ltd, case C-32/93 [1994] RJ I-3567, July 14th, 1994
- Case C-106/83, Sermide SpA c. Cassa Conguaglio Zuccero and others
- Sampanis and other against Greece, June 5th, 2008
- Aziz/Cyprus (69949/01), June 22nd, 2004
- Moustaquim/Belgium (12313/86), February 18th, 1991
- Hoogendijk/the Netherlands (dec.) (58641/00), January 6th, 2005
- Luczak/Poland (77782/01), November 27th, 2007
- Gaygusuz/Austria (17371/90), September 16th, 1996
- D.H. and others/Czech Republic [GC] (57325/00), November 13th, 2007
- Decision no. 82 of February 7th, 2012
- Decision no. 168 of December 10th, 1998
- Decision no. 562R/2010
- Decision no. 4463/R/2009
- Decision no. 2295R/2009
- Decision no. 1715R/2009
- Decision no. 4204R/2009
- Decision no. 2020R/2009
- Government Ordinance no. 137/2000 on the prevention and sanctioning of all forms of discrimination
- Council Directive 2000/43/CE of June 29th, 2000
- Council Directive 2000/78/CE of November 27th, 2000
- https://dexonline.ro
- http://legislatie.just.ro
- http://curia.europa.eu
- https://lege5.ro/
- https://jurisprudentacedo.com/

[29] See in this respect, the provisions of art. 2 para. (4) of Directive no. 78/2000, according to which: "Any conduct which consists in ordering someone to practice a discrimination against certain individuals for any of the grounds referred to in art. 1 is deemed discrimination under para. (1)";

[30] See in this respect, the provisions of art. 2 para. (4) of Directive no. 78/2000, according to which: „The instigation to discrimination against persons based on grounds of race or nationality is deemed discrimination for the purpose of first paragraph";

VIDEO SURVEILLANCE: STANDPOINT OF THE EU AND NATIONAL LEGISLATION ON DATA PROTECTION

Claudia CLIZA[*]
Sandra OLANESCU[]
Alexandru OLANESCU[]

Abstract

Regulation (EU) 2016/679 of the European Parliament and of the Council of April 27th, 2016 on the protection of natural persons with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data and repealing Directive 95/46/EC ("GDPR") entails a series of major changes in the field personal data protection.

The new developments mainly concern the introduction of data protection controller, of specific rights of data subject, such as: the right to be forgotten and the right to data portability, as well as special provisions on minors.

Notwithstanding, certain items seem at first sight to be left untreated by G.D.P.R., which is not true! GDPR applies to all data processing operations, even if not all of these are expressly regulated. One of these personal data modalities is represented by the video surveillance. Despite not expressly regulated by G.DP.R., this is one of the most commonly used means of personal data processing.

The particular importance of this subject is given by the potential issues that may occur when the captured images clearly disclose the identity of a person, so that they lead to the unique identification of the data subject. In this case, the issue that arises is whether the processed data would somehow fall under the scope of special data, such as biometric data.

Keywords: data protection, data subjects, video surveillance, identity, special categories of data.

1. Introduction

1.1. Data Protection Legislation

Changing the legislation regarding the personal data protection emerged as a necessity taking into consideration the exchange of personal data determined by day by day technology evolution.

The current possibility that every individual has I what concerns the publishing of personal data information imposed a framework regulation within the Member States to protect as much as possible the interest of the individual.

At European Union (the "EU") level, the personal data protection was governed by Directive 95/46/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of October 14th, 1995 on the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data and the free movement of such data.

Taking into consideration the increase in cross-border flows of personal data, at EU level the adoption of Regulation (EU) 2016/679 of the European Parliament and of the Council of April 27th, 2016 on the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data and the free movement of such data, and repealing Directive 95/46/EC (General Data Protection Regulation).

1.2. What is the G.D.P.R.?

G.D.P.R. means Regulation (EU) 2016/679 of the European Parliament and of the Council of April 27th, 2016 on the protection of natural persons with regard to the processing of personal data and the free movement of such data, and repealing Directive 95/46/EC (General Data Protection Regulation).

G.D.P.R. was adopted on April 27th, 2016, being published on May 4th, 2016. G.D.P.R. entered into force on May 24th, 2016 and it shall become applicable for all Member States as of May 25th 2018.

G.D.P.R. is a legally binding act. It shall apply directly, in its entirety, in all Member States.

1.3. Who does the G.D.P.R. affect?

The G.D.P.R. applies to both organisations/entities located within the European Union (the "E,U.") and organisations/entities located outside of the EU if they offer goods or services to, or monitor the behaviour of, EU data subjects[1].

Moreover, the G.D.P.R. applies to all companies processing and holding the personal data of data subjects residing in the E.U., regardless of the location of the company.

[*] Lecturer, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (e-mail: claudia@cliza.ro);

[] Master's Degree in International and EU Law, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (e-mail: sandra.olanescu@cliza.ro);

[] Master's Degree in International and EU Law, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (e-mail: alexandru.olanescu@cliza.ro);

[1] See https://www.eugdpr.org/gdpr-faqs.html;

1.3. National Legislation

In Romania, the applicable legal provisions on Data Protection are comprised in Law no. 677/2001 on for protection of persons with regard to the processing of personal dataa and the free movement of such data ("Law No. 677/2001").

As of May 25th, 2018, the provisions of such national legislation shall be repealed and the G.D.P.R. shall fully apply in all E.U. Member States, including Romania.

Nonetheless, it may be held that the current national legal provisions on data protection may also apply after the G.D.P.R. becomes applicable, but only as a recommendation and only to the extent that the GDPR does not provide for such a situation or does not provide a provision contrary to the repealed national legislation.

2. Video Surveillance from G.D.P.R.'s perspective

2.1.Short considerations from the perspective of the ECHR

As regards the recent case law of the European Court of Human Rights (the "ECHR"), there are several key-cases that enable us to determine how the Court assesses the breach of human rights via video surveillance, as well as the requirements that have to be met in order to value one's legitimate interest more than the protection of the right to privacy (Art. 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights - Right to respect for private and family life).

Hence, the following cases shall be deemed as eloquent:

- Case Köpke v. Germany – October 5th, 2010 (decision as to the admissibility)
  - The applicant – cashier in a supermarket was dismissed without notice for theft;
  - A private detective agency carried out covert video surveillance whereby the theft was found;
  - The dismissal decision was unsuccessfully contested before the competent domestic courts;
  - The European Court of Human Rights (the "Court") dismissed the applicant's claim as inadmissible under article 8 of the Convention, given the following:

a) the domestic authorities achieved a fair balance between the employee's right to respect for her private life, the employer's interest in the protection of its property rights and the public interest in the proper administration of justice;
b) the contested measure was limited in time (two weeks) and covered only the area around the cash desk– this area being accessible to the public.
c) the visual data obtained were processed by a limited number of persons working for the detective agency and by staff members of the applicant's employer. The data was used only for the purposes of the termination of the employment relationships, including the proceedings the applicant brought in this respect in the labor courts;

The Court: the overlap with the applicant's private life was limited to what was necessary to achieve the scope pursued by the video surveillance. Notwithstanding, the Court noted that, in this case, the competing interests concerned might well be given a different weight in the future, having regard to the extent to which intrusions into private life are made possible by new, more and more sophisticated technologies".

- Case Antović & Mirković v. Muntenegru – November 28th, 2017
  - The applicants – two professors of the School of Mathematics of the University of Montenegro, after video surveillance had been installed in areas where they taught;
  - They stated that they had had no effective control over the information collected and that the surveillance had been unlawful;
  - The domestic courts rejected the compensation claim, finding that the question of private life had not been at issue as the auditoriums where they taught were public areas;
  - The Court found that there had been a violation of Article 8 of the Convention, the video surveillance in this case being unlawful on the following grounds:

a) the Court noted that it had previously found that private life might include professional activities, as in case of the applicants;
b) the evidence showed that surveillance had violated the provisions of domestic law – the domestic courts had never even considered any legal justification for the surveillance because they had decided from the outset that there had been no invasion of privacy.

The Court: private life might include professional activities, as in case of the applicants. The video surveillance of the classroom represented an interference with the applicants' right to private life".

- Case López Ribalda & others v. Spain – January 9th, 2018
  - Applicants: employees of a Spanish supermarket chain, suspected of theft;
  - Contested video materials – the ground of the applicants' dismissal;
  - The domestic courts accepted the video materials as evidence and confirmed the dismissal decisions;
  - The Court found that there had been a violation of article 8 of the Convention, given that:

a) the domestic courts failed to strike a fair balance between the rights available in this case, respectively the applicants' right to private life and the employer's property right;
b) under Spanish data protection legislation, the applicants should have been informed that they were under surveillance, but they had not been;
c) the employer's rights could have been safeguarded by other means and it could have provided the applicants at the least with general information on the surveillance;

d) Notwithstanding, the Court found that there had been no violation of article 6 § 1 (the right to a fair trial) of the Convention. The Court found that the proceedings as whole had been fair because the video material was not the only evidence the domestic courts had relied on when upholding the dismissal decisions and the applicants had been able to challenge the recordings in court.

The Court: there was not a fair balance between the rights available in this case (the employees' right to private life/the employer's property right); the applicants should have been informed that they were under surveillance; the employer's rights could have been safeguarded by other means".

To conclude with, the Court determines whether the video surveillance of employees violates their right to privacy, according to the following criteria:

1. Prior notification of supervised employees;
2. Grounds justifying the application of the surveillance measure (scope);
3. Proportionality between the measure adopted and the aim pursued;
4. Level of intrusion and use of data obtained through surveillance (e.g., data retention time).

2.2. G.DP.R. – how does it apply on Video Surveillance

Apparently, the GDPR does not contain an express regulation on video surveillance. However, this is a false representation, as the G.D.P.R. does not expressly regulate every circumstance or situation governed by its provisions.

In order ti understand its scope, it is necessary to define the key-elements that the G.D.P.R. sets forth. Some of these are the following (G.D.P.R., Art. 4):

1. "personal data" = any information relating to an identified or identifiable natural person ("data subject");

- any information = subjective or objective information; information in term of its content; information format; regardless the modality of capture, storage or presentation (i.e. including images, audio or video recordings, etc, etc.);
- identified natural person = a person who differentiates himself into a particular group of persons from the other members of the group;
- identifiable natural person* = a person who can be identified, directly or indirectly, in particular by reference to an identifier (i.e. a name, an identification number, location data, an online identifier or to one or more factors specific to the physical, physiological, genetic, mental, economic, cultural or social identity of the natural person);

2. "controller" = means the natural or legal person, public authority, agency or other body which, alone or jointly with others, determines the purposes and means of the processing of personal data;

- (!) he / she shall be held liable for the following: (a) how the processor is chosen; (b) to ensure the CONTROL on the processing operations performed by the processor (as a general rule, by inserting minimum clauses in the contract);

3. "processor" = means a natural or legal person, public authority, agency or other body which processes personal data on behalf of the controller;

- (!) he/she shall be held liable for the following: (a) THE FAILURE TO MEET THE OBLIGATIONS incumbent on him/her under GDPR; (b) THE FAILURE TO MEET THE INSTRUCTIONS of the controller.

The controller and the processor shall be held JOINTLY liable before the data subject!

2.2.1. Principles relating to processing of personal data (G.D.P.R., Art. 5)

1. Lawfulness, fairness and transparency (the existence of the GROUND of the processing and the NOTIFICATION[2] made available to data subject);
2. Limitations as to the scope (establishing the purpose BEFORE the processing);
3. Data minimization (i.e. only NECESSARY data is processed);
4. Accuracy (in relation to processed data – it has to be UPDATED and ACCURATE);
5. Storage limitations (the data is erased when it is no longer NECESSARY);
6. Integrity and confidentiality (LIMITATION AND SECURITY OF THE ACCESS to processed data);
7. Accountability (existence and storage of justifying DOCUMENTS on conformity).

2.2.2. The main elements to be established/identified in relation to every processing

For every type of data processing, there has to be a scope well established by the personal data processing. G.D.P.R. does not limit this scope, the controller is the one who exclusively establishes it.

The scope of the processing must be found in the relationship between the controller and the data subject.

Another main element provided and established by G.D.P.R.. as opposed to the scope, the ground is expressly and restrictively provided by GDPR, in Art. 6). This may be one or more of the following:

1. Legal obligation;
2. Execution of an agreement (the stages of the execution of an agreement – negotiation, conclusion, execution, etc.);
3. Legitimate interest – the performance of an assessment is required (it is not expressly indicated, but can be derived from art. 6(1) letter f)

[2] The information must, in order to be valid, present the following features: (i) be made in a concise, transparent, intelligible and easily accessible form; (2) using clear and simple language, especially for any information specifically addressed to a child; (iii) free of charge; and para. 47 - preamble) – Legitimate Interest Assessment;(„LIA"). This assessment can entail the answer to the following questions:

- Is there any legitimate interest in the processing? The answer to this question can be given by taking into account the following elements: it complies with lato sensu law; it is sufficiently specific/specified; it is real and present.
- Is the processing required? (i.e. is there another way to reach the identified interest?). the so-called "Balancing Test" is used in this respect – the assessment of the opportunity to establish the legitimate interest as the ground for such processing. The conclusion of this test shall be the importance and nature of the identified legitimate interest > fundamental rights and freedoms of the data subjects (otherwise, there is NO LEGITIMACY for processing)

The peculiarity of the legitimate interest as the ground of processing is that it entails the right of opposition of the data subject and the information must mention this (GDPR, art. 21).

1. Consent (when there is a legal obligation[3]; when NO other ground can be used[4]);
2. The protection of vital interests of data subject/other natural persons;
3. The performance of a task that is in the public interest or which results from the exercise of the public authority by the controller.

Another essential element, the importance of which is crucial in establishing a violation of G.D.P.R., from the perspective of the national supervisory authority, is the storage period. This must be predetermined/identifiable and limited to what required. A processing longer than necessary and unjustified is a violation of G.D.P.R.

2.2.3. GDPR and video surveillance – what is the connection?

Why is it important for surveillance camera users to acknowledge the GDPR impact? The answer is a natural one: surveillance cameras capture data!

In this respect, it is particularly important to know data classification (according to WP29[5]). Therefore, data is classified as follows:

I. Data provided directly by the data subject;
II. Observed data;
III. Derived data.

Given the aforementioned classification and the type of data processing by video surveillance means, the data obtained by video surveillance is observed data.

Further on, we have to identify the capacity of the person performing the processing by video surveillance means and/or equipment. Therefore, the supervision can be performed by the controller, if he/she is the one who effectively processes the data (i.e. video recordings); or by the processor, if the controller entrusts the processing to the processor (i.e. the conclusion of an agreement with a security service provider).

As in case of any type of personal data processing, the processing by video surveillance equipment requires the assessment of its main elements, therefore:

1. in terms of the ground, the following can be identified as potential grounds of personal data processing:

a) legitimate interest – the analysis of the legitimacy of the identified interest is required;
b) legal obligation – Law no. 333/2003: art. 2 and the Methodological regulations for the application thereof (!) video surveillance is mandatory in the following cases: public units and institutions; credit institutions which fall in the category of banks; trading companies the scope of business of which is the foreign exchange; pawn shops, metal or gemstone jewelry shops or weapons and ammunition shops; mail service providers; fuel marketing stations; commercial properties with areas larger than 500 sq.m., gambling facilities; the cashiers of utility suppliers; cash dispensers; cash processing centers.
c) execution of an agreement (in case of the processor – security service provider).

2. from the perspective of the person performing the processing, the assessment of the processing operation must be viewed and analyzed distinctly, depending on the controller and processor. Therefore, from the perspective:

of the CONTROLLER

The scope can be defined as the security of persons and goods.

The ground can be either a legal obligation or the legitimate interest.

Storage term: as a general rule, 30 days/the deadline established by the law.

of the PROCESSOR

The scope can be defined as the security of persons and goods.

The ground is, as a general rule, the execution of an agreement.

The storage term is the deadline established in the agreement by the controller/deadline established by the law (as a general rule, 30 days).

[3] E.g. GDPR – art. 8, 9, 22 (1) – the processing of sensitive data regarding children; fully automated decisions with significant effect; Law no. 504/2006 (the storage of information on terminal – cookies); Law no. 356/2004 (marketing by phone and e-mail, except the existent customers);

[4] Especially if the assessment of the legitimate interest shows that the interest of the data subject prevails;

[5] Article 29 Working Party on Data Protection (WP29) - Handbook on the Right to Data Portability, p. 10, available on: https://iapp.org/media/pdf/resource_center/WP29-2017-04-data-portability-guidance.pdf. A se vedea și: Avizul nr. 4/2007 privind conceptul de date cu caracter personal, disponibil pe: https://www.google.ro/url?sa=t&rct=j&q=&esrc=s&source=web&cd=1&ved=0ahUKEwirhvOSxPbZAhVSI1AKHTExDxgQFggoMAA&url=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.dataprotection.ro%2Fservlet%2FViewDocument%3Fid%3D288&usg=AOvVaw3hbKD20dAykEhu6bjHoXnu;

(!) The processor is bound to appoint a Data Protection Officer ("DPO")[6], on the following grounds:

- his/her main activities consist in processing operations which,
- by their nature, scopes and/or purposes, require periodic and systematic monitoring of data subjects on a large scale.

3. The approach of video surveillance performed by the Member States from the GDPR perspective

For a better understanding of the way the Member States approached the issue of the implementation of the regulations of G.D.P.R. which leaves at their discretion the regulation of certain areas, it is important to analyze various measures and perspectives that some of them have already applied.

1. Bavaria – Germany

– June 6th, 2016 – The Data Protection Authority of Bavaria ("Bavarian DPA") issued a short guide on the conformity of video surveillance with GDPR.

"GDPR does not contain guidelines on regulatory requirements for video surveillance. The legitimacy of video surveillance measures falls under the scope of art. 6 paragraph (1) letter (f) of GDPR, according to which the processing is lawful if «the processing is necessary for the purposes of the legitimate interests pursued by the controller or by a third party, except where such interests are overridden by the interests or fundamental rights and freedoms of the data subject which require protection of personal data, in particular where the data subject is a child»".

The Bavarian DPA identified the following criteria for the compliance with GDPR, namely:

- Study of impact on private life – the controller performs a study of impact before the processing, especially in what concerns the area accessible to the public – GDPR, preamble 91, art. 35;
- Documentation of the study of impact – the controller shall keep the required documentation in order to prove the conformity with the legal requirements on the performance of the study of impact - GDPR, art. 5 para. (2);
- The storage of sufficient evidence on the processing operations – GDPR, art. 30 GDPR. According to Bavarian DPA, this includes especially the obligation to indicate every camera, the scope, reason for which the surveillance system is necessary and proportionate, any risk for the data subjects and the measures envisaged/taken in order to approach risks.
- Consultation before processing – the consultation of the authority is necessary before the processing, if the study of impact indicates that the processing would result in a high risk in the absence of the measures adopted by the controller in order to mitigate the risk – GDPR, art. 36[7].

2. Belgium

– March 8th, 2018 – a draft amendment to "Surveillance camera law" of March 21st, 2007 was adopted, which is to become effective as of May 25th, 2018.

This draft provides mainly the following:

- Surveillance cameras located on public roads: security agencies will be able to watch real-time images of these cameras, installed in open spaces;
- Surveillance camera located in closed and publicly accessible spaces (i.e. a store), can be accompanied by a public display where the images can be watched, located near the camera to reinforce its preventive effect;
- Surveillance cameras used to monitor compliance with municipal parking regulations and tolls: the compliance with all municipal regulations falling within its scope shall be checked;
- The use of mobile surveillance cameras (portable cameras, mobile phones, drones, etc.) shall be authorized in a closed space in three cases exclusively:
- the use by police officers of their competencies under the private security law (article 142 of private security law);
- in closed spaces or parts thereof, where nobody should be present (unoccupied place, industrial place at night, shop outside the working hours, etc.);
- the use by a natural person for personal and household purposes in a closed place that is not accessible to public (owner of a large private property).
- The use of "smart surveillance cameras": they are classified as follows:
- cameras which are not connected to personal data files (cameras that detect sounds, movements, etc.): such cameras shall be authorized;
- cameras connected to personal data files (recognition of number plates, faces, etc.) – only ANPR cameras (with number plate recognition capabilities) and the personal data file is required to be processed according to the legislation regarding the respect for private life;
- The obligation to inform the authorities: two amendments occur:
- the use of surveillance cameras shall be notified only to the police, as well as to the Data Protection Authority. This statement must be updated, a new online notification application is to be implemented;
- the persons liable for the processing of this type of data shall keep a register of image processing activities (in electronic format or not) which entails information established by the royal decree and shall be made available to the Data Protection Authority and police departments, upon request. On the other hand, the citizen who wants to install a surveillance camera

[6] GDPR, art. 37 (1) - the designation of the DPO is also mandatory for public authorities / bodies (except courts) and where the principal activities of the operator / proxy are to process large-scale special categories of data; within his/her house for personal and internal purposes shall not be bound to make a statement, to fill in a register or to use a pictogram (which does not mean that he/she can film people without their consent). Furthermore, when a person installs a surveillance camera in accordance with surveillance camera law, but also uses this camera for other purposes which are regulated by other laws, the legislation on video surveillance shall prevail if different provisions which are not compatible apply[8].

[7] Source: https://www.lda.bayern.de/media/dsk_kpnr_15_videoueberwachung.pdf

3. Great Britain

- March 14th, 2018 – The Commissioner for video surveillance announced the adoption of a national strategy on video surveillance for England and Wales.

Scope of the Strategy: the provision of guidelines in the field of surveillance cameras in order to enable system controllers to understand good and best practices and their legal obligations (such as those provided by Freedoms Protection Law, Data Protection Law and Private Security Industry Law).

Vision of the Strategy: "to make sure that the public is confident that any use of camera surveillance systems in a public place helps in protecting them and keeping them safe, while complying with the individual right to private life".

- to exist proportionality with a legitimate purpose and transparency proving the fulfillment of good and best practices and relevant legal obligations.

Object of the Strategy: The sector of surveillance cameras includes CCTV, body worn video, automatic recognition of number plates, vehicle borne cameras and unmanned aerial vehicles (i.e. drones). Indicative estimates of the number of CCTV cameras are available (closed-circuit video surveillance), yet these only cover part of surveillance camera coverage and capability.

Compliance with the security legislation: The strategy complies with the obligations to keep Great Britain safe from the threat of terrorism and to mitigate and prevent crime and to make sure that people feel safe in their homes and communities.

Challenges: cyber security incidents,

Strategic goals:

1. Enable certification against a range of recognisable standards for the whole spectrum of the industry (manufacturers, installers, designers, system controllers) in delivering surveillance camera solutions;
2. Establish an early warning system to horizon scan for technological developments with implications for the scope and capability of surveillance cameras;
3. Make information freely available to the public about the operation of surveillance camera systems;
4. The police pro-actively share relevant information about their own operation of surveillance camera systems and use of data;
5. Local authorities pro-actively share information about their operation of surveillance cameras and use of data;
6. Enablers and incentives are in place to encourage the voluntary adoption of the Surveillance Camera Code;
7. Surveillance camera systems associated with protection of critical national infrastructure are operated in compliance with the SC Code;
8. Organisations involved in the manufacture, planning, design, installation, maintenance and monitoring of surveillance camera systems are able to demonstrate that they understand and follow good and best practice and legal obligations;
9. Make information freely available about training requirements and provision for all those who operate, or support the operation of, surveillance camera systems and those who use the data for crime prevention/detection or public safety purposes;
10. Establish and make greater synergies between regulators and those with audit and oversight responsibilities in connection with surveillance cameras;
11. Develop a well-publicised digital portal housing information about surveillance camera regulation, how to achieve compliance and what individual's rights are[9].

4. Conclusions

Video Surveillance is one of the most popular type of personal data processing methods when it comes to ensuring protection of individuals and property.

Thus, it is paramount that controllers and processors comply with the provisions of the G.D.P.R. when using such data processing method, as this might be one of the key-issues with which national authorities shall begin when investigating possible breaches of the legislation on data protection.

On the other hand, it is as much as important that data processing subjects are well informed on their right to refuse this type of personal data processing before any recording is made, as well as eventual actions that they may take against an illegal processing of video or images exposing their person.

To conclude with, video surveillance as a data processing method should be assessed very carefully by any company/entity /institution or organization that has the capacity of controller or processor, in order to be fully compliant with the provisions of the G.D.P.R.

[8] Source: http://www.lachambre.be/flwb/pdf/54/2855/54K2855001.pdf;

[9] Source: https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/608818/NSCS_Strategy_post_consultation.pdf.

References

- Regulation (EU) 2016/679 Of The European Parliament And of the Council of 27 April 2016 on the protection of natural persons with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data, and repealing Directive 95/46/EC (General Data Protection Regulation) – the G.D.P.R. - available on: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/PDF/?uri=CELEX:32016R0679&from=EN
- Follow-up Report to the 2010 EDPS Video-Surveillance Guidelines, available on: https://edps.europa.eu/sites/edp/files/publication/12-02-13_report_cctv_en.pdf
- European Data Protection Supervisor Guidelines, available on: https://edps.europa.eu/data-protection/our-work/our-work-by-type/guidelines_en

THE PLACE OF TRANSILVANIA WITHIN THE POLITICAL AND ETHNIC FRAMEWORK OF THE ROMANIAN STATE[1]

"Our sun rises from Bucharest"

Ioan CHIȘ*

Abstract

The First World War bought unimaginable suffering to the Romanian people, tragic consequences for thousands of families who saw their sons lives squandered on the fields of defense of the territory as well as the riches and wealth of the country destroyed and stolen for the benefit of looters who considered that the exploatation of the Romanian territories was a right of the winner. The payment for the sufferings has never been done for the families of the Romanians, but the history of Transylvania and the Romanian lands has the mercy to place all Romanians in their place next to the ethnic homeland, as it was written in the eternal and fascinating fate of Dacia Felix.

Now, 100 years after the union, the sun of the Romanians, from Bucharest, pale and hidden among the clouds of neighboring intterests, like then, tries to shine through the eyes and souls of the three brothers: the Vallachian, the Moldavian and the Transilvanian.

1. Preparing the robbery and exploitation of the country by occupants during the war

The Romanian regiments were sent to the slaughter of the First World War, headed by the tricolor and under the motto of the anthem "Deșteaptă-te, române!", which reminded of the ordeal of the forced union of Transylvania with Hungary within the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy. For the Romanians called at arms from Transylvania, called at arms by Austro-Hungary, it was a whole tragedy, as Romanians, to fight against their own people, especially since after Romania's declaration of neutrality, Budapest in the words of Count Tisza, said as reply to a Romanian deputy: "I know that Romania wants Transylvania. They will have it, perhaps, but without Romanians." The Romanian regiments were sent to the most dangerous places, so as the Romanians would fight among themselves as assault regiments, the result being 100,000 dead soldiers, yet there would be the millions of families who benefited the result of their sons' sacrifice. As their sons were fighting on the front, families at home were subjected to a relentless program of denationalization, they suffered mistreatment and a chauvinist policy.

In the first part of the war, in the conditions of a better equipped, armed and supranumeric army, as well as by the exit from the war of Russia, Romania had to fight Germany, Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria and Turkey, so most of the territory was occupied by enemies, the surface of the enemy military administration being in an area of 65064 sqkm, half of the area of the old kingdom of Romania. The occupation included the counties: Mehedinti, Gorj, Dolj, Râmnicu-Vâlcea, Prahova, Ilfov and Ialomita. Here there was an odious economic exploitation by the "Major Economic State", which was already established since 1916, the territory to be occupied being allocated for economic expulsion in favor of the armies and "the homesteads"[1], for the food and feed necessary for the troops on the front, the raw materials being sent to the enemy countries, according to a predetermined algorithm.

The guiding idea was not the occupation of Romania to take it out of the war, but the occupation for exploitation, the supreme Commandamnet being of the opinion that the military governor is obliged to "take great care as to rise from Romania all that can be lifted up." All products, materials will serve the economies of the conquering countries, to support the arms of the front, the distribution being made with the requisited means of transport. Wagons loaded with products or materials had a direct stop-free line to Germany, Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, Turkey, returning immediately to recharge. The Transport Office organized the shipments from the requisites by attaching transport bulletins, the value of the materials, the weight, the name of the consignee and the owner, the destination station. The distribution ratio was established weekly. The major economic state initially had its headquarters at Drobeta Turnu Severin, after the occupation of Bucharest the headquarters moved to the capital, the economic exploitation being organized quickly, this being explained by the fact that the plan was drawn up before the war, the circumstances being favorable to its realization.

---

[1] This Communication was drawn up on the basis of data and information resulting from two papers:

a) The work published within the General Statistics Department – The service of classification of documents left by the enemy, Romania under the enemy occupation, fascicle II - Economic exploitation of the country - author Ilie I. GEORGIANU, Tipografia Publishing House "Culture of the Romanian Nation" 1020;

b) Transylvania in the light of the geopolitical, historical and statistical data - author Dr. Stefan PASCU, head of the Institute of National History from Cluj-Sibiu, Lumina Publishing House - Miron Rosu, Blaj, 1944;

* Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: profioanchis@gmail.com).

[1] Governor was the German general Tulff von Tscherppe und Weidenbach, and empowered by the attacking countries were General V.Sandler for Austro-Hungary, General Osman Nizami Pasa for Turkey and General Tantiloff from Bulgaria (n.a.)

In the first part of the war there were 10 economic exploitation sections as follows:

1. The geography of the country;
2. Finance;
3. Food and feed;
4. Raw materials;
5. Fatty materials and mineral oils;
6. Agriculture;
7. Wood;
8. Workers;
9. Expedition;
10. Use of machines.

The exploitation areas have increased with the occupation of Romania, as follows:

1. Bucharest Command Area, with the Ilfov area on the northern side;
2. Pitesti area with counties Vâlcea, Romanați, Argeș, Olt and Teleorman;
3. Craiova area, of which Mehedinți, Gorj and Dolj counties also belonged;
4. Ploiești area with the counties Muscel, Dâmbovița, Prahova and Vlașca;
5. Călărași area, where the southern part of the Ilfov county and the Ialomița county also enter.

Nr. Crt.	County	Commandment	Nr. Crt.	County	Commandment
1	Mehedinți	German	8	Teleorman	German
2	Gorj	German	9	Muscel	German
3	Dolj	German	10	Târgoviţte	Austrian
4	Vâlcea	Austrian	11	Vlașca	German
5	Romanați	Austrian	12	Prahova	German
6	Argeș	German	13	Ilfov	German
7	Olt	German	14	Ialomița	German

In its last organization, the enemy Command of Economic Operation had 17 sections because the huge riches found in Romania exceeded by far their most optimistic hopes. Thus, since 1917, during full occupation there were the following sections:

1. Procurement of food and feed with subdivisions: export, exploitation of mills, oils and fatty materials, egg collection, tobacco and other state monopolies, wine, gathering of fruits and vegetables of all kinds;
2. Agriculture with its subdivisions: field work, animals, administration of state and crown domains, agricultural industries, agricultural machinery, dairies;
3. Expeditions - transport with subsections: wagon procurement, shipment of goods on the Danube and railway to the border, preparation of transport documents, centralization of data regarding the transports carried out;
4. Raw materials and manufactures for war, with subdivisions: textile materials, raw and manufactured hides, skins and furs of all kinds, metals, chemicals and raw materials, unspecified in group A and C, forwarding and transport;
5. Statistics and distribution with: the distribution stations of the major economic state of T. Severin, Vârciorova, R. Vadului, Predeal, Giurgiu, the distribution of products between the central authorities, the export statistics on the Danube and on land;
6. Mineral oils, with: exploitation of factories and oil refineries, oilfield headquarters;
7. Wood industry: operation of saws and timber factories, timber shipment;
8. Forestry and hunting, with: exploitation of State and Crown forests, forestry and hunting police, log cuts, firewood, luxury essences, wood charcoal, other forest derivatives;
9. Electrotechnics, with the following subsections: technical issues, procurement of electrical materials and cables for the plant and branches in Câmpina and Craiova;
10. Use of machines with the following subsections: procurement of machinery, machine installation, transmission belt assembly;
11. Fishing with the following subsections: Administration of State Fisheries, Purchase and Maintenance of Equipment, Distribution, Sale and Conservation of Fish;
12. Mines with subsections: mining of coal and salt, exploitation of other minerals, mining of state mines;
13. Industrial enterprises for war;
14. Economic Issues: Safeguarding Creditors, Forced Administrations;
15. Financial matters: settlement, issuance of general bank tickets
16. Proceedings;
17. Labor matters and the compensation office.

On April 28, 1917, the "Mixed Economic Commission in Romania" was set up with the purpose of the Confidential Circular of 3 May 1917 to intensify the efforts of the enemy administration to send to the "countries" the necessary cereals so long as they still existed in the country, through " volunteering "of the population to the requisites. Practically, the requisition orders could be handed over by a Romanian organ so as the inhabitants should understand the orders of the military administration more quickly. In determining the quantities to be requisitioned, it was not taken into account the domestic consumption needs of the civilian population, so that the entire cereal stock had to be exported. Another monstrous task of this committee was to evaluate the next year's harvest as the cereals were harvested 6 weeks before the harvest in Germany and Austria, so that the Romanian production was to be shipped during that time in the occupying countries. For this, the commission was to review the quantities, establish rationalized consumption, protect crops, work with the agricultural population. In each commune people of "trust" were recruited, subordinated to the economic offices, that had to work together with the mayor, the notary, the priest and the teacher to convince the population about the obligation to give the crops.

We exemplify below the quantities of grain, fodder, and other food exported by the enemy from 1 December 1916 to 31 October 1918[1]:

Product name	DESTINATION COUNTRY				TOTAL
	GERMANY	AUSTRO-HUNGARY	TURKEY	BULGARIA
	TONS
Wheat	483002	643957	140273	5950	1273182
Corn	224613	242089	22921	5747	485370
Other Cereals and beans	43716	45770	553	4574	94613
Other food and feed	195540	62879	3702	471	262592
Oleaginous	24239	11843	60	6	36148
TOTAL	971110	1006538	167509	16784	2161905

The exploitation of the occupied territory, apart from the requisites for the states mentioned above, was also made individually by the soldiers who were on leave or on vacation and who simply took large quantities of products from the citizens of the area where they were housed, food up to a weight of 25 kg personally or sending parcels of 10 kg /pack as much as they wanted. Based on Order no. 172 of the Superior Commander v.Mackensen from March 3rd, 1917, it was permissible for the departure of soldiers in the permits or holidays to be supplied from Romania with foodstuffs, so that they were dispatched to the "homeland" only in August 1917, 322 wagons with goods. In total, 1002 wagons with parcels were dispatched during this plunder, of which 970 in Germany and 32 wagons in Austro-Hungary[1].

An unimaginable operation of "lifting" animals and birds from the courtyards of disobedient inhabitants has been carried out during the war, according to official data, that were often forged in minus, they exported to the enemy countries 25,870 birds, 86,292 horned cattle, 97,563 sheep and goats, 106,331 pigs, as follows:

Name	Destination countries					TOTAL
	Germany	Austro-Hungary	Turkey	Second stage	Dobrogea
Poultry	15881	9995	-	-	-	25870
Horned cattle	7217	55436	76	23563	-	86292
Sheep and goats	1900	9579	135	85424	326	97563

[1] Export statistics from Romania during December 1, 1916 - October 31, 1918, made on 4 November 1918 by the Romanian Railways Commander.

[1] On a simple calculation, assuming 6,000 kg in a wagon, it is estimated that the total expedition from Romania until the end of August 1917 was 6,000,000 kg. various items mostly food belonging to the military of the German and Austro-Hungarian military formations. At the time of the official export report, the number of military "beneficiaries" was 480,000 people. (N/A.)

Pigs	29323	72535	-	4491	-	106351
Other	100	-	-	-	-	100

From the calculations of the Austro-Hungarian foresight service, the food and fodder requisitioned in Romania in the harvest of 1917, would have arrived to feed 53.5 million inhabitants of Austro-Hungary for 26 days on wheat, and 37 days on wheat and corn, considering the ratio of 280 gramms per resident. Excepting the food, the occupation army took from the country raw materials and other products, during December 1 - October 31, 1918, as follows:

Name	Destination Countries				TOTAL
	Germany	Austro-Hungary	Tukey	Bulgaria
	Quantities in tons
Raw and manufactured skins	9017	5348	12	302	14679
Wood	80792	92035	6292	22034	201153
Salt	2403	7654	-	8388	93945
Machines, tools, iron and metals	6351	36284	8312	6528	57475
Chemicals	629	1042	130	258	2059
Alcohol, spirits, tobacco, tobacco products	5916	2686	85	-	8687
Various goods	20965	9998	783	2662	34408
TOTAL	131441	159666	15623	115704	422434

The plundering of natural wealth meant 42,243 wagons of raw materials, of which on the first was wood with 201153 tons, salt from which 93945 tons were exported, but also all the metals, the division between the occupying countries being made in the extent that they were needed in country which did not had such products for the needs of the army or the population.

The most exported products, which lacked the central powers, especially Germany, which were usually imported from Romania, were the pertrolifer products that constituted a first-rate target for the enemy, the febrile setting up of the facilities being done in the shortest amount of time. Austro-Hungary received crude oil, which they transferred to Galicia for refining, while gasoline and diesel oil were shipped to Germany for the supply of war machines. From 1 December 1916 to 31 October 1918 1,140,809 tonnes of oil products were exported to the occupying countries, as follows:

Name	Destination countries				TOTAL
	Germany	Austro-Hungary	Turkey	Bulgaria
	Quantities in tons
Gas	127127	227	710	770	128834
Light gasoline	102158	229	1315	125	103827
Unrefined gasoline	101858	3983	8094	1686	115621
Diesel	206610	112	-	-	206722

Crude oil	1371	226172	4	9	227556
Other oil products	60566	406	159	164	61295
TOTAL	889944	231176	13825	5864	1140809

The entire maintenance of the occupying troops was based on requisitions from the population of Romania, so the rations of the military were generously increased, as Romanians had to survive with a minimum of food[1].

Monthly occupation troops consumed an amount of 19290 tons of hay, 4280 tons of wheat, 4448 tons of flour, 259 tons of semolina, 35 tons of pasta, 3140 tons of bran, 10175 tons of barley, oats including corn, 940 tons of corn meal, 550 tons of barley and coffee surrogate, 1628 tons of vegetables, a total of 4474 food and feed wagons. From the report of the head of the Austro-Hungarian Economic Committee of Section I, in eight months, 40,000 pigs were consumed for the needs of the army. The occupying army consisted of 480,000 people and 140,000 horses, these numbers being taken into account in all calculations with food and feed needs, in 23 months, as follows:

Cereals and feed / tons	Quantity	Observations
Wheat	98440
Flour	102304
Semolina	5957
Pasta	805
Corn meal	21620
Vegetables	37329
Oats, barley and corn	234025
Barley and coffee surrogate	12650
Bran	72920
Hay	443670
TOTAL	4029029

Between December 1916 and November 1918, the maintenance of the occupying troops consumed more than 100,000 food and feed wagons.

2. Procurement of goods and merchandise during occupation

The goods and merchandise necessary for the enemy were categorized into two large groups, the first being the ones intended to support the occupation army, the second being needed for the internal consumption of the enemy[1].

Both categories were "procured" in Romania by three methods:

a) Requisitions for the acquisition of the goods, the goods being taken from the owners and becoming property of the army[2];
b) Usage requisitions, the owners retaining their right to property on the goods but losing the right of use throughout the period of their use by the army[3];
c) Goods held by the owner, the purpose being to be lifted when the army needs them[4];

There were also so-called small requisites, that were simply taken from several owners at once. The requisitions were made without the owners agreeing, the property takeover was done by announcing the inhabitants through "Ordinances", by terrorizing the population, applying harsh punishments, fines, imprisonment or executions by shooting. For example, on May 8, 1917, in Văleni, the following order was issued to the population:

"The Command will buy supplies of lard and bacon. Prices will be settled afterwards. Mayors will immediately start collecting items in their communes. Let it be known that if enough quantities of lard and bacon are not to be handed over, forced requisitions will be made in this case, of course, without any payment."

In Cîmpina with "Order no. 8 of 30 November 1917" the Economic Command communicates:

"Due to the limited harvest of potatoes and beans in Prahova County, the Command sees itself obliged to

[1] For a soldier the following food grade was allocated: 500 gr / bread, 200 gr / meat, 20 gr / lard, 25 gr / sugar, 2 cl.rom, 100 gr / marmalade, 250 gr / vegetables, 125 gr / millet, 200 gr / pea flour, 60gr / dried vegetables, 750 gr / potatoes, 200 gr / pasta, 450gr / cabbage, 1200 gr / fresh vegetables, 30 gr / tobacco. These quantities were modified by adding extras from May 1, 1918. Ten thousand men were distributed 10 candles, 100 packs of matches, 125 grams of clothing soap, 50 grams of soap for individual washing, ½ liter of wine, ¾ liter of beer, 1/10 liter of alcohol, ½ liter of milk. The officers had extra rations, and the animals like horses and service dogs had special rations.

[1] Feldrequisitionsguter - goods and merchandise needed by the army of occupation
Wirtschaftsgüter - products and merchandise for export to the countries of occupation (n.a.)

[2] Aneigungsbeschlagnanmes or Entneigung (n.a)

[3] Gebrauchsbeschlagmahme (n.a)

[4] Sicherungssbeschlagnahme (n.a.)

seize all potatoes and beans supplies. Whoever sells from these foods will be fined up to 3000 lei or imprisonment up to 6 months, by election, or with both punishments at once and the products will be seized free of charge."

For requisitioned products, the owners received a "requisition letter" or "receipt". On the basis of these, indemnities were given, the bills being drawn up in duplicate (white and red), the white ones being received by the owner and the other by the town hall. The price or value was never listed on the white papers, but only on those that were retained by the town hall, so that the owner did not know upon requisition what price he would receive for the goods he was taken. For the property let in custody at the owner no receipt were received, but they were requisitioned in the extent in which the goods were owned by the state (not paid), the owners (the owner lost the right of use) or if the articles were clandestinely brought to the market they were confiscated.

3. Settlement of requisitioned goods

In a meeting held on October 29th 1916 at the Berlin War Minister, attended by the allies: Germans, Austro-Hungarians, Turks (arrived after the debates), a protocol was drawn up on the means of payment for the purchase of products which will be raised from Romania. In order not to jeopardize the finances of Germany and its allies, it was decided to grant the Romanian General Bank, contrary to the existing laws of the occupied country, the right to issue banknotes - new lei - with a forced course for all the inhabitants. " The central purchasing society in Berlin" took these banknote issues with which they bought the Romanian goods, practically the occupation forces did not pay for the requisitioned goods, in fact theese being taken free of charge. The Ministry of War was part of these financial operations through "forced agreement", the General Bank of Romania making this issue of new banknotes in the Bank of the German Empire, but could not make any financial operation, had no right over loans and deposits open into the account of the issue section. The Romanian Genaral Bank received "once and for all", a benefit of 1/8 of the value of banknotes issued by the new lei issue section. The banknotes were used according to the provisions of the German Ministry of War to cover the expenses in the occupied territory for the payment of the goods "purchased" by the economic major state, as well as for covering the expenses of the administration of the occupied territory.

At the War Ministry meeting of October 28th, 1916, it was shown the purpose of the issue of new lei regarding the covering of war expenses. Until the "settleing of peace" the central powers had no expense account obligation, the 50 million marks placed on the settlement accounts had to remain intact, and at the conclusion of the meeting it was stated that: "The payment of the issued banknotes will be made at the end of peace talks, when the Romanian government will be forced to pay the entire issue. Thus the deposits covered by the Bank of the Empire will be returned to the parties, and the allies of the central powers will have received free of charge the goods procured from Romania. " It was also shown in this meeting that after the conclusion of the peace, for a period of 6 months, the Romanian General Bank will be obliged to pay out of its own funds a new issue of tickets, for theese ones lose their validity after they will be covered. As a result of this state fraud, it was proceeded to the issue of new Lei in divisions of 1000, 100, 20, 1 lei, 50 and 25 bani, that were used to pay in the occupied territory. Later, divisive bundles of 5 and 2 lei were also introduced. By May 8th, 1918, banknotes worth of 1.6 billion lei were issued, all of which were used to undergo productive and directly exporting operations, productive but non-exportable operations and unproductive operations. Basically, with the money made in Romania, which later could not be used anymore, financed all production, transport and pay-for-service operations. After the war, debts to Romania resulting from the looting of the country through this system were never paid.

In the autumn of 1917, right after Russia came out of the war, the Central Powers, not having the guarantee of the peace signed with Romania, in the chancelleries of the German and especially the Austro-Hungarian war ministries, raised the issue of the economic exploitation of Moldova, that was to be occupied, so that in September 1917 a plan for the occupation of Moldova was made. The Austro-Hungary was not pleased that Germany took the lion's share of Romania's occupied part, so it announced on September 23rd a circular stating that "the experience gained with the occupation and exploitation of Wallachia and Oltenia by the armies of the central powers determines the idea of taking early measures to conclude a convention on the exploitation of Moldova, in case this territory will also have to be occupied[5]".

This odious plan concretizes the exploitation intentions by dividing the territory, by a petroleum convention, an economic convention, a navigation convention on the Danube. Historical events, Romania's strong return to war for the liberation of the occupied territory, the resounding victories over the enemy through the unparalleled bravery of the Romanian soldiers in the struggles on all fronts led the liberation of the entire territory, and even to the special retaliation against the Hungarian army that wanted to act after the theoretical termination of the war until the liberation of Budapest and the defeat of the communist factions allied with Soviet Russia.

[5] The Confidential Report of 31/8/1917 of General V.Sandler specified the need to establish a ratio on the division of territory between occupants for exploitation regarding the railways, the formation of requisition Commands, the exploitation of goods, incomes and resources under the conditions of occupying the territory up to Siret or up to the Prut.

4. The World War and Transylvania

The war found Transylvania in an intense process of denationalization of the Romanian population. The politics of feudal features of the Hungarians who do not recognize any rights for the majority population, neither political, nor religious, nor economic, materialized in the permanent offensive to denationalize the Romanians, to change the Romanian-speaking population with traditions, culture and religion, led after1848.

The beginning of the war in 1914 finds exceptional measures in Transylvania where the assembly is forbidden, the integrity of the churches is violated, the freedom of the press is abolished, the autonomy of the Romanians' religion is suppressed, the population is threatened with trial in the "Martial Court", and the Romanians who sympathize with their brothers across the border are considered "homeland traitors" and confiscated their possessions.

Romanian intellectuals are constantly watched, arrested, confined in concentration camps and prison rooms. Officials, Romanian teachers, priests were deported, and more than 50% of Romanian schools are closed. The prisons of Brasov, Fagaras, Cluj, Seghedin were full of "traitors", especially after Romania declared war on Austro-Hungary. The statements of Prime Minister I.C.Brătianu showed the state of the Romanians which Hungary held in social and national exploitation. It should be noted that in 1915 the Hungarian government prepared a colonization project for the Romanian population from Transylvania, in the counties of the Hungarian denture, a Hungarian population being supposed to be brought in their place. A so-called protection area is being designed not to allow the Romanians to settle less than 10 km from the border. All Romanian newspapers and magazines were to be banned or drastically censored. The greatest blow was on church life. Through infiltrated agents, instead of metropolitan Metianu who was deceased, they assigned the renegade metropolitan Vasile Mangra who signed a document unfavorable to the Romanian people, the priests refused to sign, and thus were thrown into dungeons where they found their end. A special blow was given to Romanians in 1917 when at the proposition of Count Appony the Hungarian government approved the closure of the Romanian schools and the Romanian Church until new provisions, so that the confessional schools in Sibiu, Arad, Caransebes, Blaj, Oradea and Gherla were closed motivated by the fact that Romanians have an "antipatriotic" attitude due to school education.

I will not approach in this paper the entire epic of struggles for the recapture of the Romanian positions in front of the enemy troops, nor the struggles led with a bravery worthy of the ancient heroes for our country to be reunited. This was a work that can not be described in a few pages. However, I have to mention that after the dismantling of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, on October 7, 1918, in the request for truce made by the Hungarian President to the President of the United States, on October 12th, 1918, in a statement made by Vasile Goldiş, it was affirmed the right of the Romanian people to represent themselves, the Hungarian government losing that right. The Romanian national guards in Transylvania were trying to defend the population against a terror unleashed by the Hungarian forces. The talks with Jászi Oscar, the minister of nationalities, failed mainly in the aftermath of the mass murder of Romanians by Urmánczy in Beliș[6]. As a result, the National Assembly in Alba Iulia

[6] Cicerone Ioniţoiu foaienationala.ro / romani-arşi-pe-rug.html, accessed on 03.02.2018:

"Octavian Goga's 19th of April 1915 predictions were true:

In such circumstances, it is imperative for any true thinker that Austro-Hungarian populations need to be desorbed so that they can also be introduced into the serene world of the ideal; that is why the crushing of the Habsburg kingdom, the cleansing of this moral cancer from the body of Europe is a deep duty of international sanitation. At this gloom, we owe to assist. We, the Romanian people, are called to throw the first ball of dust on this guilty coffin.

We, because we have a greater war of suffering, and we present ourselves to this burial with the greatest pain in the soul ... The Romanian people in Transhilvania served with gold, served with blood a millenary ingratitude, a thousand years of lying." He was a correspondent member of the Romanian Academy since May 29th, 1914 and a member of the Romanian Academy since June 4th, 1919. He was vice-president of the Romanian Academy from 1st of June 1929 to 30th of May 1932. From this prediction, much blood was to be spilled out by the poor Romanian serf. In the wake of the struggle, some were thrown into prison, others executed, others fought on the fronts to defend the cape that was not theirs, while the children and wives worked as slaves on the ancestral lands stolen by the groves, counts, magnates. As the end of the bloody reign was approaching, the oppression was even worse. The lack of arms made the petty Hungarians to bring Italian, Serb and Russian war prisoners to work. In the land of moats, 35 km south of Huedin, near the Izvorul Somesului Cald, a Hungarian magnate in Belis, Ioan Urmanczy had made a field of 28,000 yugur, on which he built a monumental castle and a fir processing industry. In order not to cease work and lose profits, especially because of the Romanian serfs on the fronts, hundreds of war prisoners had been brought. The news of the imperial chaos was borne by the quarter-million Imperial soldiers, deserters, who roamed the land of the former monarchy. That's how it got into the heart of the mountains. And when the dismemberment had led to the outbreak of the Revolution in Budapest from November 1st, fear encompassed those who did not know themselves as masters on their land, but only oppressive enemies. Then, on November 4th, 1918, the Hungarian gendarmes with about 60 Romanian peasants from Giurcuţa de Jos, Mărişel and Beliş led Ioan Urmanczy to Călăţele, where he left for Budapest where he had a brother deputy in the Hungarian parliament. Prisoners of war worked hard under the burden of beatings and died of hunger. The most tortured were the Serbs. After the master's flight, the prisoners revolted leaving work and asked the administration to give them food to go home. Being refused they broke the storehouses, they killed the storekeeper, they took everything they could and went in different directions. Fearful, the Hungarian gendarmes fled to Huedin and announced Budapest. John URMANCZY formed a detachment of 65 people, whom he had armed with the help of the war ministry, putting in their arms weapons, bulky cartridges and machine guns. Under the command of Captain Antal Dietric they were sent with a special train to restore order to Belis. In Bologa, a group of peasants who went to the woods to cut their logs for the winter stopped by curiosity of seeing a train of soldiers and the train stopped as well. The Hungarian soldiers jumped out and with the bayonet on the weapon they surrounded them. Some managed to escape. Others were forced to board the train. Among them, Ioan Molnar, Teodor Crisan, Ion Potra, Ignat Potra and Teodor Potra al Tifri. The train then crossed in front of the Morlaca stone quarry was convened, under the chairmanship of the octogenarian Gheorghe Pop of Băseşti and with a number of 1228 delegates, with the presence of over 100,000 people, it was decreed "The union with Romania of all Romanians from Transylvania, Banat and the Hungarian Country and of all the territories inhabited by them".

5. A few years after the Union, the interwar period

Romanians will never forget the sufferings of their ancestors in Transylvania, the suffering caused by a xenophobic, chauvinist, irrational policy directed at the destruction of the national being in long periods of time, and if this could not be accomplished due to the vitality of our people, culture and the belief in God, the hope that an astral moment of the union of all Romanians will emerge, they tried to magnetize the

in the valley of Călăţele stream, where another group of Romanian peasants was also looking out of curiosity. The train stopped and the same Hungarians turned the machine guns and reaped the crowd. Numerous Romanian peasants have died, among them being recognized Jacob LUCACI, Maria BOCA, ... and the train continued its way to Huedin, where the Hungarian soldiers were welcomed with music and chorus. Captain Antal Ditrich ordered the detachment to shoot the peasants from Bologa. At the intervention of a Hungarian lawyer in Huedin, after much talk, their lives were spared, but they were badly beaten and disfigured. All bloody, barely able to stand on their feet, they were let go. Apart from the young Teodor Potra who was taken as a guide because he knew the Hungarian language. Of those from Bologa that had been "released", two peasants died because of the terrible beating, namely, old Ion POTRA of Tifri and Ion MOLNAR. The train of horror continued its way to Călăţele and, on the way, the detachment thickened the number of Hungarians employed in the communes of Hungarian Mănăştur, Sâncrai, Huedin, Horlacea, which besides the equipment were offered 300 crowns a day. From Călăţele the detachment walked down the direction of the Belis castle, stopped Mitrea TRIFON and Maria TRIF, whom they shot at the entrance to Beliş village, the injured woman managing to escape by throwing herself in river. On November 7th, 1917, near noon, the detachment settled in the castle and the soldiers went to the hunting of the Romanian peasants. Eleven men and a woman were brought in and after they tortured them, they were shot. In the village there were also many peasants shot. The houses were robbed, the cattle raised and brought to the castle where the pigs were killed and the lard sent to Budapest by train. On the day of St. Michael and Gabriel, on November 8th, 1918, dozens of moons were killed. During this day, Nicholas Neagu, a former caretaker at the castle, took the carriage and lifted the dead from the village and the roads. He was terrified to find people slayed with the bayonet and their guts on the ground, others leaning on pillars, with an empty bottle in his mouth, in mockery. After the peasants were robbed after they were killed, they were thrown into the fire. On Todea Gheorghe Dodu, after repairing the telephone threads, under threat of death, they forced him to throw the dead in the fire. Over 25 corpses in the first line. They then continued to burn them. More than 40 died in the flames. The number of deaths was yet much higher. In the spring through the woods they would uncovered dead bodies, perhaps even of the wounded or fugitive peasants. In fact, the moons have been hiding for weeks in the mountains out of fear, naked and without food. When the commission from Cluj arrived, on November 12th, it was astounding. Captain Advocate Valentin Poroutiu said: "... the most frightening scene of the revolution appeared to us. The potato store of the factory was burned to the ground. Only the cellar remained untouched. There's a pile of bodies in this cellar. On top there was a gypsy woman with clenched fists and a young military man aged 18-19. We were horrified and ran to Cluj in our cars. "This was during the negotiations in Arad when the Hungarians were still trying to obtain the Romanian goodwill for the continuation of cohabitation. The massacre at Belis led to: TOTAL DISSOLUTION. Here is a part of the reenactment made with those martyred on November 8th, 1918 in Belis, a commune located at the connection of the Hot Somes with the Belis brook.

BOLOGA Commune: Ion Potra of Trifi and Ioan Molnar

MORLACA Commune: Maria BOCA of Petri Halamului, Iacob LUCACIU, wife of Teodor FORT

BELIŞ Commune: Ioan BÂLC for 36 years burned at the stake, after him a child and his wife; Nicolae BÂLC of Luchi, 24 years old, burned at the stake, remaining helpless mother; Gheorghe MIHUŢ of Vili, 35 years old, burned, reamining wife and three children: Pascu, Măria and Laura; Şimion MIHUŢ, the postmaster, burned at the stake, 60 years; Varvara POP, born FORT, 44 years old burned at the stake, the remaining husband Vasile POP and three children Teodor, Ilie and Justina; Maria MATIS, shot and burned at the stake; Pascu POPA of Focuţ, shot at 24 years; Alexandru PUICA, 49 years old, blacksmith, shot; Alexandru Puica, the 41-year-old wife shot dead; Dumitru TRIPON, 26 years old, burned, remaining Ana Tripon (wife) and one child.

VĂLENI Commune (Cluj): Ion VLAIC of Cotreşti, of 35 years burned at the stake, widowed wife Caterina and a son: Traian Vlaic.

TUFENI Commune (Cluj): Gavril DREVE, 54 years old shot on Dambul Negri, remaining the daughter Floarea; Ion DREVE, 22 years old shot with his father, remaining the widow Anuţa Dreve, wife.

MÂNASTIRENI Commune: Peter CALO, 38-year-old blacksmith shot, left a son: Peter; Ioan GOIA; Ion NISTOR; Peter GIURGIU, shot at 54, remained a son: Ion; Ion MICHILIE, shot at age 18; Ioan MORAR, butcher, shot at 57, there are two sons; Gavril VASĂR, shot at 6, left two children.

MARISEL Commune (Cluj): Avram COSTEA, burnt on the stake. His wife died shortly. Their little girl Maria remained orphaned on the roads; Dumitru Giurgiu, burned at the stake, dead wife, children on the roads; Ion LAZAR; Francisc MULLER; Gheorghe MARIŞ, burned at the stake, left Silvia and two orphaned children: Vasile and Avram.

ARADA Commune (Cluj): Ioan NEAGU, burned at the stake, remaining wife Rafila and three children: Ion, Vasile and Ana; Peter TODEA, burned at the bridle, his wife widowed with daughter Rafila; Nicolae RADAC burned at the stake, left Anuţa and the child Gheorghe; NEAG SAVU, burned at the stake, left Ana and the children Nicolae, Iosif, Mariuta; Sântioana STAN; Jujiu's Gheorghe NEAG; Ana LAZAR; Dumitru LAZAR; Gavril NEAG of Luchia; Rafila ONET; Dumitru NICOLA; Ana TODEA.

Crimes against Romanians are generalizing. While the desire for liberation under the Hungarian yoke was manifested openly, upon the Romanians broke most extreme oppression. The Hungarian gendarmes were lurking in the flesh on the "white shirt", on November 5th, when the horror train advanced to Belis, and the Hungarian gendarmes acted by killing more peasants in Sanmartin.

In Mihalţ, the descendants of "St. Stefan" killed 10 peasants, and injured another 28. The priestess and the notary in Filea de Jos returned with 25 Hungarian gendarmes in order to secure a field he exploited, met near the village of Filea de Sus Romanian soldiers returning from the front. He opened fire on them and shot nine men. In the same period and in the same region of the motians, other Hungarian peasants were shot by the Hungarian gendarmes: Cherelus (6 deaths), Covasinti (3 deaths), Tăuţi other three, Mandruloc others ... everywhere.

Another act of barbarity by the Hungarian detachment that had acted in Belis was at the Poieni railway station near Ciucea. In retreat, after the massacre at Urmanczy Castle, they captured the Romanian sub-lieutenant Tamas in the Poieni station and after beating him terribly, they cut off his ears, forced him to dig a pit at 10 meters from the railroad and after they took out his eyes, they killed him and buried him there. In their bloodshed in the village of Sohodol they killed two priests, Leucutia and Popescu. In those days of horror for the Transylvanian peasants, Iuliu MANIU could not make a wiser decision than: TOTAL DISSOLUTION. And we should not let our forgetfulness drop over the sufferings of our ancestors cause it would be an unforgivable crime."

population by granting privileges, by changing religion, by administrative, legal measures or even by force.

Romanians are not from the same mold, they are hospitable to strangers, they are friendly and refuse hatred and revenge. In 1934, in the Chamber of Deputies sitting, the great poet Octavian Goga showed: "Our people are not xenophobic; the psychology of the Romanian people refuses the hatred on racial and confessional cryteria. Our entire past is a proof of tolerance that inspired this people ... Every thread of grass was talking about the secular sufferings of the Romanian people ... Or, there is no movement against the aliens. There was no bloodshed as in 1848, and this people, with their painful memories, with this agitation in their hearts, was of a magnificent generosity in its behavior towards strangers .... This people seemed to take part - after one thousand years - at the great banquet of its freedom, desiring the good of the whole world, and stretching his arms in a broad reception."

First of all, the Romanians through its legislative bodies have laid down the humanitarian principles of their existence:

- Full freedom for all congregational peoples;
- Equal rights and full confessional autonomy to all religions of the state;
- Every people should be trained, administered, judged in their own language by people elected from their keen;
- Every nation has the right to be represented in the legislative bodies and in the government of the country in proportion to its number.

The 1923 Constitution consented to the provisions of the "Peace Treaty" by granting equal, civil and political rights, irrespective of race, religion or language. All the political parties that ruled after 1918 had in their programs the guarantee of the rights established by the Transylvania Conducting Council, so that Hungarians, as well as other nationalities, enjoyed their status as state-protected minorities. Contrary to Hungary's political doctrines that did not grant the right of existence to non-Magyar nationalities, the issue of nationalities in Romania was definitively and fully resolved.

For a share of 7.7% of the country's population, the Hungarians had in all post-EU legislatures, from 6 to 26 representatives in Parliament. Unlike Hungary, which in the mandate after 1918, for 3 million and a half Romanians only had 5 representatives out of the 256 members of the Hungarian Parliament.

The liberation of the people from social and national oppression has led to the development of the business initiative and the country's economy: increased production of goods from 34% to 50% in metallurgy and chemistry, with 100% growth in textile production. If in 1919 there were 1161 industrial enterprises with a production of 4,446,411,000 lei, with a capital of 1,048,468,000 lei with a work occupation of 8,158 workers, in 1937, after the restoration of the country, the number of enterprises reached 1619, with a capital of 16,683,148,000 lei and a number of 129,603 workers.

For example, we show below a table of comparative achievements between 1919 and 1940:

INDUSTRY	The industry founded under the Union with Romania 1919 - 1940
	Number of enterprises	Capital	Workers	Production value mil. lei	Number of enterprises	Capital	Workers	Production value mil. lei
Food	165	1833	6877	2345	181	1400	5520	2812
Chemicals	34	1551	3695	1089	89	855	8035	1990
Metallurgy	52	5472	32569	5261	110	8679	26723	7730
Textile	47	1121	10626	2499	196	1598	15094	3046
Wood	105	336	7725	639	280	640	10904	1491
Leather	25	307	4810	1281	38	137	3028	635
Paper	18	11920	2704	752	42	138	1953	279
Building materials	81	23789	5417	690	55	468	3498	366
Glassware	2	117	365	23	16	474	3525	403
Electronics	-	-	-	-	20	47	730	187
Ceramics	5	18	190	14	12	84	933	67
T O T A L	534	12429	74978	14593	1039	14520	79943	18966
The growth achieved by the industry of Transylvania					+66%	+54%	+52%	+57%

Extractive industry grew after World War I in Transylvania, coal production, methane, silver doubled in the first seven years, and gold extraction tripled. Absolutely all sectors have doubled or tripled their activities, demonstrating the possibilities of a nation unleashed from national exploitation, which for hundreds of years has been defeated and defamed only to be held in control and humiliation. This lesson is equally valid nowadays when other masters pretend to use the riches and vital force of our people.

For the economic development of Romania, of state bank capital and capital of industrial, commercial, insurance and other companies, after the war, a total capital of 10,441,995,953 lei was used, of which 4,314,329. 880 lei for investments.

Romania's promise, made by its king, accomplished through the agrarian reform, was an act of social justice for those innocents who bore the difficulties of the war or sacrificed themselves for the country, so that the ideal of union would be accomplished.

If, prior to the war in Transylvania, 3,306,345 Romanians possessed 3,448,602 yokes of land, that is to say barely one yoke per person, a year after the war, in 1919 the situation was as follows:

- property from 0 to 10 yokes, from 4,407,889, after reform 7,289,953;
- property from 10 to 100 yokes, from 3,741,700, after the reform 3,741,300;
- property over 100 yokes, from 4,980,985, after the reform 1,889,916.

The expropriation of the great foreign landowners and the ownership of the peasants with the ancestral land was not only an act of historic reparation, but also a mechanism of agricultural production growth, that in a few years reached a share of 35% of the Gross Domestic Product of Transylvania.

2269 km of railway tracks were rebuilt and 1,069 km of new railway were built and the roads were restored, 5182 bridges destroyed by retreating enemies were rebuilt and 2348 new bridges were built in the next 15 years.

Particular achievements in the interwar period can be seen in Transylvania in the health and medical field. It is a breakthrough because there were 1 physician at 5183 inhabitants in cities and 1 doctor at 6770 people in the villages in 1938, compared to 8375 and 11599 in 1919. It was the time when there were 185 doctors in Timișoara and 748 doctors in Brasov. 69 general hospitals and 372 dispensaries were built, and in Cluj there were built the Clinics of the University with all the necessary sections, clinics that over time have gained an international fame. However, in rural areas health care was almost abandoned in the Austro-Hungarian regime, and after the war a number of deficiencies were reported on the sanitary hygiene level. Still, we can see an improvement in health status, a decrease in morbidity from 26% (1904-1914) to 18% (1935-1940) is a significant index.

On a religious level, the freedom of confessions being guaranteed, the Romanian state sealed a "Concordat" through its government with the Holy Seige in 1927, granting it a wide autonomy. Roman Catholic, Reformed, and Unitarian bishops sworn oath to King Ferdinand and, as a result, received tremendous benefits, the so-called sacrum heritage, privileges that did not even exist in Hungary. All representatives of minorities found that under the Ministries of Goga, Banu, Lapedatu, Goldiș the state's support for minority beliefs and their culture was continuous and progressive. If the Romanian Orthodox parishes were able to support themselves financially in proportion of 2.5%, the other cults could sustain themselves financially up to 5% Greek-Catholic, 21% Unitarian, 53% Roman Catholic, 83% Lutheran. However, in 1920, minority churches received a budget 20 times the one of the Orthodox Church. In the interwar period 718 churches were built in Transylvania, many of which were cathedrals, and over 987 churches were repaired. Unfortunately, the Romanians remaining within the border of Hungary, for a population of 80,000 people, had only 34 parishes and 9 priests, the Hungarian state did not give any assistance to the Romanian church and its servants.

If in 1907 in Transylvania there were no primary schools with teaching in Romanian, the purpose being that of forced magyarization of the Romanian population, since 1919 in communal, confessional, private schools, the language of teaching was established as that of those who administrated the school. The primary state school would have as language of teaching Romanian, secondary state schools the language of teaching would be the language of the majority of the population, and in the higher education the language of the majority of the inhabitants of the region was to be used.

The situation of education in the interwar period was the following:

School situation in 1918
Primary state schools	Primary Hungarian schools	Saxon primary schools	Romanian civil schools	Hungarian civil schools	Saxon vicil schools
2392	2588	207	3	109	5

Minorities schools in 1918 - 1930
Primary state and confesional Hungarian schools	Secondary state and confesional Hungarian schools	Saxon primary schools	Saxon secondary schools	Swabian primary schools	Swabian secondary schools
1362	57	517	43	136	20

In terms of Romanian education in Transylvania in the interwar period, 2,553 new school places were built, 8,962 teachers were enrolled, so 14,455 posts were filled. In Higher Education, a University with 4 faculties was established, an Academy of High Commercial and Industrial Studies, a Music Academy, a Theater Academy, two Theological Academies in Cluj. In Oradea a Law Academy was established, merging in 1934 with the one in Cluj, a Polytechnic School in Timisoara, and seven other Theological Academies (3 united and 4 Orthodox) in the main metropolitan cities. Famous professors were teaching in these faculties, of the 83 university professors, 68 were diplomats who had studied in the most advanced foreign universities. In these faculties there were conducted 3,329 studies in Romanian, 1,837 in foreign languages, and 46 publications. In Cluj, they began elaborating the great Dictionary of the Romanian language, from which four volumes appeared, the Romanian linguistic Atlas with two volumes, and the history and archeology professors were trained at the National History Institute and the History Museum of Transylvania. There was a new science, caving.

All these benefits made in the Kingdom of Romania, in which Transylvania was the heart of this country returned to international life through remarkable achievements, was "rewarded" by the barbarian hordes in 1940, when Transylvania was "stabbed" to death when hatred and chauvinism without the edges exploded. The indescribable cruelties made in Transylvania, where the killings among priests, teachers and intellectuals or even the peasantry related to the land they did not want to leave, materialized in the villages of Ip and Trăsnea where the members of the families of priests Traian Costea and Moldovans were killed mercilessly after the collective murder of all people, 155 in the first and 280 in the second village. The same happened in the commune of Marcu - Sălaj, in the town of Huedin where the deacon Aurel Munteanu and the policeman Gheorghe Nicola were killed in the most terrible tortures. As a punishment, the 6 criminals judged by the Hungarian authorities were applied sentences of 2 months in prison, and for the 7th the was maximum ruthlessness - 3 months imprisonment. The explanations of the crimes and such sentences are frightening madness. "The intention of killing was not found but only the provocation of curable injuries within 20 days," the perpetrators (killers) "were in a state of mood suitable to explain ... the strong emotion they were ruled and which could cause excesses from the part full of the happiness of liberation and enthusiastic patriotic feelings. " My comment is one: well, it did not hold too much "patriotic happiness and feelings" that it would have killed all the Romanian priests, teachers and intellectuals trapped in the enthusiastic operations.

Transylvania is linked to Muntenia and Moldova as in the biblical example of brick made of earth, water and fire. Transylvania is inseparable, even though the hostility of its fate has made it disputed, writhing, negotiated, sold, betrayed, treated with indifference, or with the passivity of those who say: what do the Transylvanians still need?, confusing them with the whole of Transylvania. Even nowadays we are not doing much better, because Transylvanian patriotism is considered to be nationalism, a feudal atavism in a Europe with barriers of the new migrants.

The history of Transylvania in the First World War and after the war can be characterized as being properly understood by the political leaders of the country, who believed evil is to be paid with good, that the Romanians only have to suffer and they can enjoy only when they are allowed. The foreign heel from the necks of Romanians has never risen, and the revanchists in their madness want a new Ip and Tranznea. Watch out, good Romanians! while you still have the country as a whole. I tell you this as a son who had his parents banished from Cluj at the cession of northern Transylvania, whose grandparents were imprisoned by other unscrupulous Romanians because they were supporters of Maniu, the maker of Great Romania, whose names were changed in civil status registers and on the crosses in the cemetery. Careful!

References:

- ILIE I. GEORGIANU - România sub ocupație dusmană, fascicola II – Exploatarea economică a țării, Editura Tipografia ”Cultura neamului Românesc ” Bucuresti, 1020;
- ȘTEFAN PASCU - Transilvania în lumina datelor geopolitice, istorice și statistice, Institutul de Istorie Națională din Cluj – Sibiu, Editura ”Lumina” – Miron Roșu, Blaj, 1944
- D. DRĂGHICESCO – La Transylvanie – Esquisse historique, geografique, etnographique et statistique, Paris, librairie Felix Alcan, 1918
- UNIVERSITE ROUMAINE DE CLUJ – Centre d,Etudes et de recherches relatives a la Transilvanie – LA TRANSYLVANIE, BOINVILE ET comp Editeurs, rue Palatine – Paris, 1946
- ION MUREȘANU – ARDEALUL, scriere premiată de ”Cartea Românească” , ed. Caretea Românească – București, 1919

CASE LAW OF THE COURT OF JUSTICE OF EUROPEAN UNION: A VISIT TO THE WINE CELLAR

Alina Mihaela CONEA*

Abstract

`It must be observed that a quality wine is a very specific product. Its particular qualities and characteristics, which result from a combination of natural and human factors, are linked to its geographical area of origin and vigilance must be exercised and efforts made in order for them to be maintained. (Court of Justice of European Union, Rioja Wine Judgement)`[1]

The present paper will consider some of the most relevant judgements of the Court of Justice of European Union regarding wine. Coincidentally or not many of this cases are also landmark decisions of the European Union law.

The purpose of this paper is to present the variety of European Union law areas enriched through the Court wine judgments: intellectual property, free movement of goods, fiscal barrier to trade, EU legal order, fundamental rights, public health and external relations.

Surveying the wine jurisprudence of the Court of Justice of European Union resembles a wine testing. One can sense the savours rich bouquet that the case law express, on strong cultural choices, policies, lifestyle or identity at national and European level.

Keywords: wine, Court of Justice of European Union, intellectual property, international agreement, taxation.

1. Introduction

The European Union is the world leading producer of wine[1]. Almost half of the world's vineyards are in the European Union (EU) and the EU produces and consumes around 60% of the world's wine[2].

Therefore, wine is a complex and vivid area of EU law. A simple search of word `wine` on EUR-Lex shows 19066 results. When refined, EUR-Lex displays 2466 results on Legislation and wine subject, of which 2120 regulations and 12 directives. If the search is refined by author (Council of the European Union) and regarding only regulations the result is 547[3]. When search for the subject matter `wine` in the EU case law, in the form of Judgments, the number of results is 120. This paper is, accordingly, only a survey of the case law, based on an ample specialized literature.

The present paper will consider only some of the most relevant judgements of the Court of Justice of European Union regarding wine. Coincidentally or not many of this cases are also landmark decisions, shaping the EU law. What we find remarkable is the relevance and impact of the wine cases over different fields of EU law.

The purpose of this paper is to present this variety of EU law areas enriched through the Court wine judgments: intellectual property (Capitol 2), fundamental rights (Capitol 3), EU legal order (Capitol 4), external relations (Capitol 5), fiscal barrier to trade (Capitol 6) and public health (Capitol 7).

2. Intellectual property

2.1. Protection of protected designations of origin

The EU legislation for quality wine consists of two types of classification: Protected Denomination of Origin (PDO) regarding "quality wines produced in a specified region" and Protected Geographical Indication (PGI) regarding "quality wines with geographical indication". In the specific case of the wine industry, protection by origin plays an imperative role, since it is not only a 'labeling' issue, as wine quality is strongly linked to the place where the grape is harvested in terms of the terroir of the vineyard[4].

The Court had occasion to define the concepts related to protected designations of origin in many cases.

* Assistant Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: alinaconea@gmail.com).

[1] Judgment of the Court of 16 May 2000, Kingdom of Belgium v Kingdom of Spain (Rioja wine), Case C-388/95, ECLI:EU:C:2000:244, p.57.

[1] According to European Commision, it accounts for 45% of world wine-growing areas, 65% of production, 57% of global consumption and 70% of exports in global terms, https://ec.europa.eu/agriculture/wine_en.

[2] Meloni, Giulia and Swinnen, Johan F. M., The Political Economy of European Wine Regulations (October 17, 2012). Available at SSRN: https://ssrn.com/abstract=2279338 or http://dx.doi.org/10.2139/ssrn.2279338.

[3] The basic two regulations are: Regulation (EU) No 1308/2013 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 17 December, establishing a common organisation of the markets in agricultural products and repealing Council Regulations (EEC) No 922/72, (EEC) No 234/79, (EC) No 1037/2001 and (EC) No 1234/2007 (CMO Regulation) : and Regulation (EU) No 1306/2013 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 17 December 2013 on the financing, management and monitoring of the common agricultural policy and repealing Council Regulations (EEC) No 352/78, (EC) No 165/94, (EC) No 2799/98, (EC) No 814/2000, (EC) No 1290/2005 and (EC) No 485/2008.

[4] Jazmín Muñoz and Sofía Boza, Protection by origin in Chile and the European markets: the case of the wine sector, SECO/WTI Academic Cooperation Project, Working Paper No. 14/2017, https://www.wti.org/media/filer_public/8d/23/8d234fa5-d456-483f-8def-79ea8009392d/munozbozasecowp.pdf.

In a recent judgement of 20th December 2017, Champagner Sorbet[5], the Court held that a sorbet may be sold under the name 'Champagner Sorbet' if it has, as one of its essential characteristics, a taste attributable primarily to champagne. If that is the case, that product name does not take undue advantage of the protected designation of origin 'Champagne'.

At the end of 2012, Aldi, a company distributing, inter alia, foodstuffs, began to sell a frozen product, distributed under the name 'Champagner Sorbet' and contained, among its ingredients, 12% champagne. Taking the view that the distribution of that product under that name constituted an infringement of the PDO 'Champagne', the Comité Interprofessionnel du Vin de Champagne, an association of champagne producers, brought proceedings before the Landgericht München.

In this respect, the CJEU, first of all, rejected the position of the Comité that the protection granted under these provisions was absolute. The Court stated that the use of a protected designation of origin as part of the name under which is sold a foodstuff that does not correspond to the product specifications for that designation but contains an ingredient which does correspond to those specifications cannot be regarded, in itself, as an unfair use and, therefore, as a use against which protected designations of origin are protected in all circumstances by virtue of the applicable provisions of EU law[6]. It is true that the use of the name 'Champagner Sorbet' to refer to a sorbet containing champagne is liable to extend to that product the reputation of the PDO 'Champagne', which conveys an image of quality and prestige, and therefore to take advantage of that reputation. However, such use of the name 'Champagner Sorbet' does not take undue advantage (and therefore does not exploit the reputation) of the PDO 'Champagne' if the product concerned has, as one of its essential characteristics, a taste that is primarily attributable to champagne.

The decision Port Charlotte*[7], in Case C-56/16 P, provides guidance in situations which give rise to exploitation of the reputation regarding a protected designation of origin. The Scottish company Bruichladdich Distillery Co. Ltd. Filed, a trade mark application for "Port Charlotte, for whisky. Instituto dos Vinhos e do Porto filed an application with the European Union Intellectual Property Office (EUIPO) for a declaration that the mark was invalid.

The Court held that national law on PGIs cannot be used to provide supplementary protection above and beyond that provided under EU law. It was also settle that a PGI for "port" cannot be used to prevent registration of other trademarks containing the word "port", if the use is legitimate and without confusion with the PGI.

The Court has turned its attention to the labelling of wine in many cases, interpreting the use of terms 'méthode champenoise', `cremant` and `chateu[8]`.

The case Méthode champenoise[9] concerns a dispute between SMW Winzersekt GmbH ('Winzersekt') and the Land Rheinland-Pfalz on the use after 31 August 1994 of the term 'Flaschengärung im Champagnerverfahren' ('bottle-fermented by the champagne method') to describe certain quality sparkling wines produced in a specified region ('quality sparkling wines PSR'). Winzersekt is an association of wine-growers who produce sparkling wine from wines of the Mosel-Saar-Ruwer region using a process referred to as 'méthode champenoise', which means in particular that fermentation takes place in the bottle and the cuvée is separated from the lees by disgorging.

The Court held that a wine producer cannot be authorized to use, in descriptions relating to the method of production of his products, geographical indications which do not correspond to the actual provenance of the wine.

In Case C-309/89, Codorníu[10] successfully challenged the validity of a regulation which allowed the use of the word "Crémant" only in respect of sparkling wines from France or Luxembourg and thus forbad its use in respect of wines emanating from Spain.

The Court held in Codorníu that the reservation of the term "crémant" to wines produced in two Member States cannot validly be justified either on the basis of traditional use, since it disregards the traditional use of that mark in the third State for wines of the same kind, or by the indication of origin associated with the mark in question, since it is in essence attributed on the basis of the method of manufacture of the product and not its origin. It follows that the different treatment has not been objectively justified and the said provision must therefore be declared void.

On the other hand, the Court clearly ruled out in case Tocai friulano*[11] that the Italian name Tocai friulano' and its synonym Tocai italico are not a protected geographical indication within the meaning of the EC-Hungary Agreement.

---

[5] Judgment of 20 December 2017, Vin de Champagne v Aldi Süd, Case C-393/16, ECLI:EU:C:2017:991.

[66] https://www.bardehle.com/ip-news-knowledge/ip-news/news-detail/court-of-justice-of-the-european-union-champagne-sorbet-does-not-infringe-champagne-if-the-sorb.html.

[7] Judgment of the Court of 14 September 2017, European Union Intellectual Property Office (EUIPO) v Instituto dos Vinhos do Douro e do Porto, IP (Port Charlotte), Case C-56/16 P, ECLI:EU:C:2017:693.

[8] Judgment of the Court of 29 June 1994, Claire Lafforgue, née Baux and François Baux v Château de Calce SCI and Coopérative de Calce (Château de Calce), Case C-403/92, ECLI:EU:C:1994:269.

[9] Judgment of the Court of 13 December 1994, SMW Winzersekt GmbH v Land Rheinland-Pfalz, Case C-306/93, ECLI:EU:C:1994:407,

[10] Judgment of the Court of 18 May 1994, Codorníu SA v Council of the European Union, Case C-309/89, ECLI:EU:C:1994:197.

[11] Judgment of the Court of 12 May 2005, Regione autonoma Friuli-Venezia Giulia and Agenzia regionale per lo sviluppo rurale (ERSA) v Ministero delle Politiche Agricole e Forestali (Tocai friulano) Case C-347/03, ECLI:EU:C:2005:285.

'Tocai friulano' or 'Tocai italico' is a vine variety traditionally grown in the region of Friuli-Venezia Giulia (Italy) and used in the production of white wines marketed inter alia under geographical indications such as 'Collio' or 'Collio goriziano'. In 1993, the European Community and the Republic of Hungary concluded an agreement on the reciprocal protection and control of wine names. In order to protect the Hungarian geographical indication 'Tokaj', the agreement prohibited the use of the term 'Tocai' to describe the abovementioned Italian wines at the end of a transitional period expiring on 31 March 2007. In 2002, the autonomous region of Friuli-Venezia Giulia and the regional agency for rural development asked the Tribunal amministrativo regionale del Lazio to annul the national legislation implementing the prohibition provided for by the agreement. In that context, the Italian court made a reference to the CJEU.

The Court clearly ruled out that as the Italian name Tocai friulano' and Tocai italico' are not a protected geographical indication and the Hungarian name Tokaj' is, the EC-Hungary Agreement do not apply.

In case Kingdom of Belgium v Kingdom of Spain (Rioja wine)[12] the Court turned its attention to the Spanish rules govern the bottling of wines bearing the designation of origin "Rioja".

Belgium considered that those rules which, in particular, require the wine to be bottled in cellars in the region of production in order to qualify for the "controlled designation of origin" (denominación de origen calificada) were detrimental to the free movement of goods.

The Court finds that national rules applicable to wines bearing a designation of origin which make the use of the name of the production region conditional upon bottling in that region constitute a measure having an effect equivalent to quantitative restrictions on exports.

However, the requirement of bottling in the region of production, whose aim is to preserve the considerable reputation of the wine bearing the designation of origin by strengthening control over its particular characteristics and its quality, is justified as a measure protecting the designation of origin which may be used by all the wine producers in that region and is of decisive importance to them, and it must be regarded as being in conformity with Community law despite its restrictive effects on trade, since it constitutes a necessary and proportionate means of attaining the objective pursued in that there are no less restrictive alternative measures capable of attaining it[13].

In the case Abadía Retuerta- Cuvée Palomar[14], the applicant, Abadía Retuerta SA, filed a Community trade mark application at the Office for Harmonisation in the Internal Market (OHIM), pursuant to Regulation No 40/94. The trade mark for which registration was sought is the word sign Cuvée Palomar for wines.

OHIM takes the view that the mark applied for was inadmissible. The reason was an obligation to interpret the Community trade-mark legislation, as far as possible, in the light of the wording and purpose of TRIPs Agreement, which lays down a specific prohibition on registration of geographical indications identifying wines and spirits.

Under Spanish law the area of production protected by the registered designation of origin 'Valencia' consists of, inter alia, the sub-region Clariano, which includes, inter alia, a local administrative area with the name el Palomar. The name el Palomar thus constitutes a geographical indication for a quality wine produced in specified regions (psr). Under Spanish law and, accordingly, under Article 52 of Regulation No 1493/1999 on the common organisation of the market in wine, which provides that, if a Member State uses the name of a specified region, including the name of a local administrative area, to designate a quality wine psr, that name may not be used to designate products of the wine sector not produced in that region and/or products not designated by the name in accordance with the provisions of the relevant Community and national rules[15].

2.2. Distinctive character of trademarks

In case Freixenet[16], the Spanish sparkling wine producing company seeks to set aside the judgments of the General Court of the European Union concerning applications for registration of signs representing a frosted white bottle and a frosted black matt bottle as Community trademarks. Freixenet's trademark application for the both bottles provided the following disclaimer: "The applicant states that through the mark now being applied for he does not want to obtain restrictive and exclusive protection for the shape of the packaging but for the specific appearance of its surface",

It rarely happens that the Court of Justice annuls a decision of the General Court, and, thus, the decision is per se remarkable. It becomes even more remarkable when considering that the decision appears to broaden the scope of signs that are protectable under the category of "other" marks[17]. The Court held that when assessing protectability of the surface of a product as a

[12] Judgment of the Court of 16 May 2000, Kingdom of Belgium v Kingdom of Spain (Rioja wine), Case C-388/95, ECLI:EU:C:2000:244

[13] Judgment of the Court of 16 May 2000, Rioja wine, Case C-388/95.

[14] Judgment of the General Court of 11 May 2010, Abadía Retuerta, SA v Office for Harmonisation in the Internal Market (Trade Marks and Designs) (Abadía Retuerta), Case T-237/08, ECLI:EU:T:2010:185.

[15] Judgment of the General Court of 11 May 2010, Abadía Retuerta, Case T-237/08, , P. 82, 86-88, 110-112.

[16] Judgment of the Court of 20 October 2011, Freixenet, SA v Office for Harmonisation in the Internal Market (Trade Marks and Designs) (OHIM)(Freixenet). Joined cases C-344/10 P and C-345/10 P., ECLI:EU:C:2011:680.

[17] Philipe Kutschke, Court of Justice of the European Union on the protectability of the shading of a bottle as a trademark (decision of October 20, 2011 Joined Cases C-344/10 P and C-345/10 P – Freixenet v OHIM), BARDEHLE PAGENBERG IP Report 2011/V.

trademark, a significant departure from the norm or customs in the sector concerned is sufficient to confer distinctiveness on the mark.

It was commented[18] that as well as the visual aspect, the matt finish bottle could be regarded as a tactile sign.

3. Fundamental rights

It would appear useful to mention a series of judgments Liselotte Hauer, Méthode champenoise* (*Winzersekt), Tokai firuliano, in which the Court, while affirming its concern to fundamental right protection, noted the limits imposed to the right to property or to the freedom to pursue a trade or profession

3.1. Right to property

Liselotte Hauer*[19] was the owner of a plot of land forming part of the administrative district of Bad Dürkheim. Mrs. Hauer applied for authorization to undertake the new planting of vines on the land which she owns. The Land Rheinland-Pfalz refused to grant her that authorization. While the application was pending, the European Commission issued an order prohibiting the planting of that type of vine for three years.

The Court declare that fundamental rights form an integral part of the general principles of the law, the observance of which is ensured by the court. In safeguarding those rights, the latter is bound to draw inspiration from constitutional traditions common to the member states, so that measures which are incompatible with the fundamental rights recognized by the constitutions of those states are unacceptable in the Community. International treaties for the protection of human rights on which the Member States have collaborated or of which they are signatories, can also supply guidelines which should be followed within the framework of community law.

The scope of that right should be measured in relation to its social function; the substance and enjoyment of property rights are subject to restrictions which must be accepted by each owner on the basis of the superior general interest and the general good.

The Court clearly ruled out that the measure in question does not adversely affect the "substance" of the right to property: it does not restrict the owner's power to make use of his land except in one of the numerous imaginable ways and is of limited duration.

In the case Méthode champenoise* (*Winzersekt)[20] the designation 'méthode champenoise' is a term which, prior to the adoption of the regulation, all producers of sparkling wines were entitled to use. The prohibition of the use of that designation cannot be regarded as an infringement of an alleged property right vested in Winzersekt. The use of terms relating to a production method may refer to the name of a geographical unit only where the wine in question is entitled to use that geographical indication.

In Tocai friulano[21] the Court holds that, since it does not exclude any reasonable method of marketing the Italian wines concerned, the prohibition does not constitute deprivation of possessions for the purposes of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).

Consequently, the lack of compensation for the winegrowers concerned is not in itself a circumstance demonstrating incompatibility between the prohibition and the right to property. In addition, even if that prohibition constitutes control of the use of property as referred to in the ECHR, the interference which it involves may be justified.

In that regard, the Court observes that the objective of the prohibition is to reconcile the need to provide consumers with clear and accurate information on products with the need to protect producers on their territory against distortions of competition. The prohibition therefore pursues a legitimate aim of general interest.

The Court rules that the prohibition is also proportionate to that aim, given, inter alia, that a transitional period of thirteen years was provided for and that alternative terms are available to replace the names 'Tocai friulano' and 'Tocai italico'[22].

3.2. Freedom to pursue a trade or profession

In the same way as the right to property, in Liselotte Hauer*[23]*, the right of freedom to pursue trade or professional activities, far from constituting an unfettered prerogative, must be viewed in the light of the social function of the activities protected thereunder.

To the extent to which it affects the second aspect, the prohibition on planting in question does not constitute an unacceptable interference with the fundamental right freely to pursue economic activity; the latter is not an absolute individual right, excluding any restriction; it must be seen in a social context.

So far as concerns the impairment of the freedom to pursue a trade or profession, the Court held in Méthode champenoise* (Winzersekt)[24]*, that the EU legislation do not impair the very substance of the right freely to exercise a trade or profession relied on by Winzersekt since those provisions affect only the arrangements governing the exercise of that right and

[18] Graeme B. Dinwoodie, Mark D. Janis, Trademark Law and Theory: A Handbook of Contemporary Research, Edward Elgar Publishing, 2008, p. 521.

[19] Judgment of the Court of 13 December 1979, Liselotte Hauer v Land Rheinland-Pfalz, Case 44/79, ECLI:EU:C:1979:290.

[20] Judgment of the Court of 13 December 1994, Méthode champenoise (Winzersekt), Case C-306/93.

[21] Judgment of the Court of 12 May 2005, Tocai friulano, Case C-347/03.

[22] CJE/05/42 12 May 2005, Press Release No 42/05, 12 May 2005.

[23] Judgment of the Court of 13 December 1979, Liselotte Hauer, Case 44/79.

[24] Judgment of the Court of 13 December 1994, Méthode champenoise (Winzersekt), Case C-306/93.

do not jeopardize its very existence. It is for that reason necessary to determine whether those provisions pursue objectives of general interest, do not affect the position of producers such as Winzersekt in a disproportionate manner and, consequently, whether the Council exceeded the limits of its

4. EU legal order

4.1. Supremacy

Liselotte Hauer[25] addresses the question of supremacy of EU law regarding constitutional law of member states. The Court declare that: `the question of a possible infringement of fundamental rights by a measure of the community institutions can only be judged in the light of community law itself. The introduction of special criteria for assessment stemming from the legislation or constitutional law of a particular member state would, by damaging the substantive unity and efficacy of community law, lead inevitably to the destruction of the unity of the common market and the jeopardizing of the cohesion of the community`[26].

4.2. Direct application of a regulation

The Court had the occasion to rule on the direct application of a regulation in Bureau national interprofessionnel du Cognac[27]. In that regard, the Court affirms that in order to ensure observance of the principles of legal certainty and the protection of legitimate expectations, the substantive rules of EU law must be interpreted as applying to situations existing before their entry into force only in so far as it clearly follows from their terms, objectives or general scheme that such effect must be given to them[28].

In that connection, it should be recalled that the direct application of a regulation means that its entry into force and its application in favour of or against those subject to it are independent of any measure of reception into national law, strict compliance with that obligation being an indispensable condition for the simultaneous and uniform application of regulations throughout the European Union.

4.3. The notion of 'individual concern'

Codorniu[29] sought to challenge a Regulation reserving the word "cremant" for high-quality sparkling wines from specific regions in France and Luxembourg.

Codorniu is a Spanish company manufacturing and marketing quality sparkling wines psr. It is the holder of the Spanish graphic trade mark "Gran Cremant de Codorniu", which it has been using since 1924 to designate one of its quality sparkling wines. Codorniu is the main Community producer of quality sparkling wines, the designation of which includes the term "crémant". Other producers established in Spain also use the term "Gran Cremant" to designate their quality sparkling wines.

The Court held, departing from the previous case law[30], that the applicant was individually concerned because the reservation to producers in France and Luxembourg interfered with Codorniu's intellectual property rights[31].

Although it is true that according to the criteria in the second paragraph of Article 263 of TFUE the contested provision is, by nature and by virtue of its sphere of application, of a legislative nature in that it applies to the traders concerned in general, that does not prevent it from being of individual concern to some of them[32].

Natural or legal persons may claim that a contested provision is of individual concern to them only if it affects them by reason of certain attributes which are peculiar to them or by reason of circumstances in which they are differentiated from all other persons. By reserving the right to use the term "crémant" to French and Luxembourg producers, the contested provision prevents Codorniu from using its graphic trade mark. It follows that Codorniu has established the existence of a situation which from the point of view of the contested provision differentiates it from all other traders[33].

4.4. Non-contractual liability of the Community

The case Cantina sociale di Dolianova[34] involved wine cooperatives which were producers of wine in Sardinia (Italy). Following a series of disputes concerning the payment of Community subsidies between wine producing cooperatives, the distiller and the Italian authorities responsible for the management of such subsidies, those cooperatives – since there were unable to obtain the full amount of the payments required before the national courts after the distiller went bankrupt – had brought an action before the Court of First Instance for a declaration that the Commission

[25] Judgment of the Court of 13 December 1979, Liselotte Hauer, Case 44/79.
[26] Ibid..
[27] Judgment of the Court of 14 July 2011, Bureau national interprofessionnel du Cognac, Joined cases C-4/10 and C-27/10, ECLI:EU:C:2011:484.
[28] Ibid., p.26.
[29] Judgment of the Court of 18 May 1994, Codorníu, Case C-309/89, ECLI:EU:C:1994:197.
[30] Paul Craig, Gráinne de Búrca, EU Law, Text, Cases, and Materials, Oxford University Press, 2015, p. 497.
[31] http://www.eulaws.eu/?p=171.
[32] Judgment of the Court of 18 May 1994, Codorníu, p.19.
[33] Ibid., p.22.
[34] Judgment of the Court (Fourth Chamber) of 17 July 2008., Commission of the European Communities v Cantina sociale di Dolianova Soc. coop. arl and Others, (Cantina sociale di Dolianova) Case C-51/05 P, ECLI:EU:C:2008:409.

was non-contractually liable and for the Commission therefore to pay for the damage which they had suffered[35].

In the case Cantina sociale di Dolianova the Court of Justice set aside the Court of First Instance`s ruling which had taken a subjective approach according to which the damage caused by an unlawful legislative act could not be regarded as certain as long as the allegedly injured party did not perceive it as such[36].

The court underline that the rules on limitation periods which govern actions for damages must be based only on strictly objectives criteria. If it were otherwise, there would be a risk of undermine the principle of legal certainty on which the rules on limitations periods specifically rely and the point in time at which those proceedings become time-barred varies according to the individual perception[37].

4.5. Preliminary ruling

The court declined jurisdiction

Foglia v. Novello[38] is the only case to date where the court declined jurisdiction in a preliminary ruling case on account of the spurious nature of the main proceedings[39]. The questions concerned the legality under Union law of an import duty imposed by the French on the import of wine from Italy[40].

Mr. Foglia, having his place of business at Santa Vittoria D ' Alba, in the province of Cuneo, Piedmont, Italy, made a contract to sell Italian liqueur wines to the defendant, Mrs. Novello. The contract provided that the parties would not be liable for any taxes levied by French or Italian authorities which were contrary to EC law. The parties to the contract were, in fact, concerned to obtain a ruling that a tax system in one Member State was invalid by expedient the proceedings before a court in another member state. The court decline its jurisdiction.

The Court states that it does not have jurisdiction to reply to questions of interpretation which are submitted to it within the framework of procedural devices arranged by the parties in order to induce the Court to give its views on certain problems of Community law which do not correspond to an objective requirement inherent in the resolution of a dispute. The duty assigned to the Court by is not that of delivering advisory opinions on general or hypothetical questions but of assisting in the administration of justice in the Member States.

Consequences of an earlier judgment giving a preliminary ruling

In case Kingdom of Belgium v Kingdom of Spain (Rioja wine)[41], the most interesting issue however arises not from the interpretation of the Treaty free movement provisions but from the unclear relationship between the Delhaize ruling[42] and the case at issue; from a first reading it seems that the Court, without saying it, overruled itself: however a more careful reading of the two judgments does not seem to support this view[43].

Both in the Delhaize case and in the Rioja one, the Court found the Spanish legislation to constitute a measure having equivalent effect to a restriction on exports. As far as the issue of justification is concerned, in the Delhaize case the Court clearly stated that it had not been shown that the Spanish legislation was justified. The Court points out that in the Rioja proceedings, the Spanish, Italian and Portuguese Governments and the Commission have produced new information to demonstrate that the reasons underlying the contested requirement are capable of justifying it. It is necessary to examine this case in the light of that information[44].

Use of art. 259 TFEU: State vs. State

The Rioja case is also interesting for the use of art. 259 TFEU which enables a Member State to bring an action against another Member State.

In the history of European integration only six times a Member State has directly brought an action for failure to fulfil the obligations before the CJEU against another State[45]. Of the sixth cases, only four proceeded to judgment, the other two were settled amicably[46].

5. External relations

5.1. Principles of international law relating to treaties

The Court held in Tocai friulano[47] that the European Agreement establishing an association between the European Communities and their Member States, of the one part, and the Republic of Hungary, of the other part, is not the legal basis of Decision 93/724

[35] European Commision, Summary of important judgements, http://ec.europa.eu/dgs/legal_service/arrets/05c051_en.pdf
[36] Koen Lenaerts, Ignace Maselis, Kathleen Gutman, EU Procedural Law, OUP Oxford, 2014, p.546.
[37] Judgment of the Court of 17 July 2008., Cantina sociale di Dolianova, Case C-51/05 P, p 59-60.
[38] Judgment of the Court of 11 March 1980, Pasquale Foglia v Mariella Novello, Case 104/79, ECLI:EU:C:1980:73.
[39] Koen Lenaerts, Ignace Maselis, Kathleen Gutman, EU Procedural Law, OUP Oxford, 2014, p. 93.
[40] Lorna Woods, Philippa Watson, Steiner & Woods EU Law, Oxford University Press, 2014, p. 231.
[41] Judgment of the Court of 16 May 2000, Kingdom of Belgium v Kingdom of Spain (Rioja wine), Case C-388/95, ECLI:EU:C:2000:244
[42] Judgment of the Court of 9 June 1992. Établissements Delhaize frères and Compagnie Le Lion SA v Promalvin SA and AGE Bodegas Unidas SA (Delhaize), Case C-47/90, ECLI:EU:C:1992:250.
[43] Eleanor Spaventa, 'Case C-388/95, Belgium v. Spain', 38 Common Market Law Review, Issue 1, 2001, pp. 211–219.
[44] Judgment of the Court of 16 May 2000, Rioja wine, Case C-388/95, p.52.
[45] Case 141/78, France v United Kingdom, Case C-388/95, Belgium v Spain, Case C-145/04, Spain v United Kingdom, Case C-364/10, Hungary v Slovakia, Case 58/77, Ireland v France, Case C-349/92, Spain v United Kingdom.
[46] Dimitriu, Ioana Mihaela , State versus state: who applies better EU law?, Challenges of the Knowledge Society, Volume 5, Number 1, 2015, pp. 404-410(7).
[47] Judgment of the Court of 12 May 2005, Tocai friulano, Case C-347/03.

concerning the conclusion of the Agreement between the European Community and the Republic of Hungary on the reciprocal protection and control of wine names.

The appropriate legal basis for the conclusion by the Community alone of the latter agreement is Article 133 EC, an article which confers on the Community competence in the field of the common commercial policy. That agreement is part on the common organisation of the market in wine and its principal objective is to promote trade between the Contracting Parties

The Court then points out that in the case of homonymity between a geographical indication of a third country and a name incorporating the name of a vine variety used for the description and presentation of certain Community wines, the provisions on homonyms contained in the Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property (the TRIPs Agreement) do not require that the name of a vine variety used for the description of Community wines be allowed to continue to be used in the future[48].

5.2. Direct effect of TRIPS Agreement

The Court upholds in Abadía Retuerta[49] that although the provisions of the Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPs) do not have direct effect, it is nevertheless true that the trade−mark legislation, must, as far as possible, be interpreted in the light of the wording and purpose of that agreement.[50]

5.3. International agreement to which the European Union is not a party

The case International Organisation for Vine and Wine (OIV)[51] is notable from several perspectives: the emergence and proliferation of informal means of co-operation challenging the monopoly of traditional forms of international law-making and, secondly, the competence of EU to act externally.

In OIV case the Court was confronted with the question of the legal character and effects of an informal act issued by an international organisation to which the EU is not a member.

The OIV is an intergovernmental organisation of technical and scientific nature. It allows for discussions and eventually adopts non-binding recommendations on vine, wine marketing and wine production standards. The EU is not a member of the OIV, and only 21 of its Member States are. Issues dealt with in the OIV fall within the area of agriculture, a shared competence. The Member Statesand the Commission initially coordinated OIV positions informally prior to OIV meetings. Later, the procedure was formalised and the Council started adopting common positions on recommendations by the Commission through art. 218(9) TFEU, a Treaty provision concerning procedures on international agreements.49 In other words, EU institutions and Member States found ways to cooperate to assure unity of representation in the OIV, thereby fulfilling the duty of art. 4(3) TEU.

Germany, challenged this practice by arguing that the legal basis of art. 218(9) TFEU could not be used when the international organisation does adopt legally binding acts and the EU is not a member[52].

The case the discussion focuses on the scope and interpretation of the sole Article 218(9) TFEU because, as Germany points out, no other substantive legal basis was indicated in the contested decision. This case raises crucial issues not only for the European Union (EU) and its Member States, but also for the proper functioning of the international organisations in which they operate[53].

First, this case may be seen as one of the exponents of the vivid academic debate over norm creation that occurs outside the classic international law framework[54].

Overall, the declining importance of form and formalities, treaty-fatigue, and the proliferation of new actors, outputs and processes have accentuated the phenomenon of informal international law-making, and thus, the problem of distinguishing between law and non-law. Also, recent years have also witnessed the proliferation of informal instruments issued by private actors. The trend towards privatisation manifests itself through the increased engagement of private actors with autonomous self-regulation, the emergence of mixed public-private acts (coregulation) and the proliferation of standard-setting instruments[55]

The OIV case is also relevant for the debates on the autonomy[56] of EU law.

---

[48] CJE/05/42 12 May 2005, Press Release No 42/05, 12 May 2005.

[49] Judgment of the General Court of 11 May 2010, Abadía Retuerta, , Case T-237/08,.

[50] Ibid., p 67-72.

[51] Judgment of the Court (Grand Chamber), 7 October 2014, Federal Republic of Germany v Council of the European Union (OIV), Case C 399/12, ECLI:EU:C:2014:2258.

[52] Johan Bjerkem, Member States as 'Trustees' of the Union? The European Union and the Arctic Council, College of Europe, EU Diplomacy Papers, 12/2017, (http://aei.pitt.edu/92758/1/edp-12-2017_bjerkem.pdf).

[53] Govaere, Inge. 2014. "Novel Issues Pertaining to EU Member States Membership of Other International Organisations: The OIV Case." In The European Union in the World : Essays in Honour of M. Maresceau, ed. Inge Govaere, Erwoan Lannon, Peter Van Elsuwege, and Stanislas Adam, 225–243. Leiden, The Netherlands: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers.

[54] Eva Kassoti, The EU and the Challenge of Informal International Law-Making: The CJEU's Contribution to the Doctrine of International Law-Making, Geneva Jean Monnet Working Paper 06/2017, https://www.ceje.ch/files/3615/1748/7746/kassoti_6-2017.pdf .

[55] Ibid.

[56] R.A. Wessel and S. Blockmans (Eds.), Between Autonomy and Dependence: The EU Legal Order Under the Influence of International Organisations, The Hague: T.M.C. Asser Press/Springer, 2013, pp. 1-9; Konstadinides, Theodore, In the Union of Wine: Loose Ends in the Relationship between the European Union and the Member States in the Field of External Representation (2015). 21 (4) European Public Law (Forthcoming). Available at SSRN: https://ssrn.com/abstract=2584995.

Also, the Court made it plain that a clear distinction must be drawn between the existence (and qualification) of a competence on the one hand, and its exercise on the other. The fact that, given these circumstances, the Union cannot exercise its competence on the international forum through its own external actors[57], in particular the Commission or the High Representative, has no implications whatsoever for the issue of the existence of a competence (or even its qualification as being exclusive or not), which the Court had no difficulty accepting in this case. As the Court recalls: `in such circumstances the Union must act via its Member States, members of that organization, acting jointly in the interest of the Union`.

6. Taxation

The CJEU decisions on duties and taxation made a significant contribution to the realization of a single market. The Court interpreted the relevant Treaty articles in the manner best designed to ensure the Treaty objectives are achieved. In relation to taxation the issues are more complex. The original Rome Treaty left a considerable degree of autonomy to Member States in the fiscal field, albeit subject to constraints imposed by Articles 30 and 110 TFEU[58].

In this area, as in many others, there is a link between judicial doctrine and legislative initiatives. The very fact that a challenged national tax policy will, according to Court decision in French Sweet Wines case[59], be upheld if the court deems it to be compatible with the Treaty can lead to paradoxical results. The absence of harmonization has led to the ironic result that the Commission, abetted by the CJEU, has managed to wield perhaps more influence over Member States` tax policies, and their economic and social policies, than would be the case if the Council had agreed a uniform tax regime.

`Article 110 TFEU purpose is to prevent Member States to introduce new taxes which had the purpose or effect of discouraging the sale of imported products in favour of the sale of similar products available on the domestic market and, in this way, to circumvent the prohibitions in Articles 28 TFEU, 30 TFEU and 34 TFEU`[60].

The prohibition laid down in article 110(1) applies if two cumulative conditions are met: first, relevant imported product and the relevant domestic product must be similar and, secondly, there must be discrimination[61].

Article 110(2) TFEU applies if two cumulative conditions are met: first, the imported product and the domestic product must be in competition, and, secondly, the tax must protect the domestic product[62].

In some cases, the Spirits cases[63], the Court follows a `holistic` approach[64], which does not distinguish between the two paragraphs of article 110 TFEU.

6.1. Similar products - Art. 110 (1) TFEU

The Court has turned its attention to the concept of similarity between wine and other alcoholic beverages in several cases. It was underline[65] that in terms of production conditions and characteristics, whilst wine is an agricultural product, with an elevated cost of production and subject to climate vicissitudes, beer is an industrial product.

The Court endorsed a broad interpretation of the concept of similarity in its judgment of 27 February 1980, in Case 168/78[66], Commission v French Republic.

The Court stated that `it is therefore necessary to interpret the concept of "similar products" with sufficient flexibility. It is necessary to consider as similar products which have similar characteristics and meet the same needs from the point of view of consumers. It is therefore necessary to determine the scope of the first paragraph of Article 110 on the basis not of the criterion of the strictly identical nature of the products but on that of their similar and comparable use`.

The court interpreted the meaning of similar products in case Johnny Walker [67], where it was able to assess the compatibility with the provision of a system of differential taxation applied under Danish tax legislation to Scotch whisky and fruit wine of the liqueur type. Consequently, the Court held that in order to determine whether products are similar `it is necessary first to consider certain objective characteristics of both categories of beverages, such as their origin, the method of manufacture and their [57] Roxana-Mariana Popescu, Place of international agreements to which the European Union is part within the EU legal order, Challenges of the Knowledge Society, Volume 5, Number 1, 2015, pp. 489-494(6).

[58] Paul Craig, Gráinne de Búrca, EU Law, Text, Cases, and Materials, Oxford University Press, 2015, p. 636.
[59] Judgment of the Court of 7 April 1987, Commission v French Republic (French sweet wines), Case 196/85, ECLI:EU:C:1987:182.
[60] Judgment of the Court of 7 April 2011, Ioan Tatu v Statul român prin Ministerul Finanţelor şi Economiei and Others, Case C-402/09, p.53.
[61] Catherine Barnard and Steve Peers, European Union Law , Oxford, Oxford University Press, 2014,p. 348.
[62] Ibid.,p. 350.
[63] Judgment of the Court of 27 February 1980, Commission v French Republic, Case 168/78, ECLI:EU:C:1980:51; Judgment of the Court of 27 February 1980, Commission v Ireland, Case 55/79, ECLI:EU:C:1980:56; Judgment of the Court of 12 July 1983, Case 170/78, ECLI:EU:C:1983:202; Judgment of the Court of 27 February 1980, Commission v Kingdom of Denmark, Case 171/78, ECLI:EU:C:1980:54; Judgment of the Court of 27 February 1980, Commission v Italian Republic, Case 169/78, ECLI:EU:C:1980:52.
[64] Catherine Barnard and Steve Peers, European Union Law , Oxford, Oxford University Press, 2014,p. 348.
[65] Theodore Georgopoulos, Taxation of alcohol and consumer attitude is the ECJ sober?, American Association of Wine Economists Working Paper, No. 37, June 2009, http://www.wine-economics.org/aawe/wp-content/uploads/2012/10/AAWE_WP37.pdf.
[66] Judgment of the Court of 27 February 1980, Commission v French Republic, Case 168/78, ECLI:EU:C:1980:51.
[67] Judgment of the Court of 4 March 1986, John Walker & Sons Ltd v Ministeriet for Skatter og Afgifter, Case 243/84. ECLI:EU:C:1986:100

organoleptic properties, in particular taste and alcohol content, and secondly to consider whether or not both categories of beverages are capable of meeting the same needs from the point of view of consumers`[68].

In case Commission v Kingdom of Denmark (Fruit wine) the court asses weather Denmark infringe the treaty imposing a higher rate of duty on wine made from grapes than on wine made from other fruit.

`As the concept of similarity must be given a broad interpretation, the similarity of products must be assessed not according to whether they are strictly identical but according to whether their use is similar and comparable`[69].

The court takes a dynamic interpretation concluded that the point of view of consumers must be assessed on the basis not of existing consumer habits but of the prospective development of those habits.

The concept of indirect discrimination was applied by the Court in Marsala case[70], without mentioning it expressly[71]. In the context of identical rates applied to manufacture of nationally and foreign produced wine alcohol, a reduction was granted by the Italian legislation to alcohol distilled from wine and used in the production of liqueur wines which qualify for the designation `Marsala`, a beverage made in western Sicily. The Court observed that no imported liqueur wine can ever qualify for the preferential treatment accorded to Marsala and that imported liqueur wines accordingly suffer discrimination.

6.2. Goods not similar but in competition – Art. 110(2) TFEU

In the case Commission v French Republic, Case 168/78, the court held `that the function of the second paragraph of Article 110 TFEU is to cover all forms of indirect tax protection in the case of products which, without being similar within the meaning of the first paragraph, are nevertheless in competition, even partial, indirect or potential, with certain products of the importing country. For the purposes of the application of that provision it is sufficient for the imported product to be in competition with the protected domestic production by reason of one or several economic uses to which it may be put, even though the condition of similarity for the purposes of the first paragraph of Article 95 is not fulfilled[72]`.

The case Wine and Beer[73] concerns the great difference between the rate of excise duty on still light wine produced in other Member States and the rate of excise duty on beer produced in the United Kingdom that, according to the Commission, afforded indirect protection to beer and was contrary to the second paragraph of Article 110 of the Treaty.

The Court emphasized that `the second paragraph of Article 110 applied to the treatment for, tax purposes of products which, without fulfilling the criterion of similarity, were nevertheless in competition, either partially or potentially, with certain products of the importing country`.

As regards the question of competition between wine and beer, the Court considered that, to a certain extent at least, the two beverages in question were capable of meeting identical needs, so that it had to be acknowledged that there was a degree of substitution for one another[74]. In view of the substantial differences in the quality and, therefore, in the price of wines, the decisive competitive relationship between beer, a popular and widely consumed beverage, and wine must be established by reference to those wines which are the most accessible to the public at large, that is to say, generally speaking, the lightest and cheapest varieties[75].

The Court concluded that the United Kingdom's tax system has the effect of subjecting wine imported from other Member States to an additional tax burden so as to afford protection to domestic beer production. Since such protection is most marked in the case of the most popular wines, the effect of the United Kingdom tax system is to stamp wine with the hallmarks of a luxury product which, in view of the tax burden which it bears, can scarcely constitute in the eyes of the consumer a genuine alternative to the typical domestically produced beverage[76]. So, the emphasis is on the considerably higher tax burden applied to the wines.

In a more recent case, Commission v Kingdom of Sweden[77], the Court was once again called to give answers to the question of taxation of wine and beer in the light of Article 110 TFEU. The Court took a different view, considering that the Swedish measure was compatible with EU law. This can reflect the accent on the possibility of the measure to have protectionist effect[78].

In this case the major issue was the consumer's attitude towards selling prices of alcoholic beverages.

The Court applied the method of relationship of final selling prices between a litter of strong beer and a litter of wine in competition and compared this

[68] Ibid., p.11.
[69] Judgment of the Court of 4 March 1986, Commission v Kingdom of Denmark (Fruit wine), Case 106/84, ECLI:EU:C:1986:99.
[70] Judgment of the Court of 3 July 1985, Commission v Italian Republic (Marsala), Case 277/83, ECLI:EU:C:1985:285.
[71] Christa Tobler, Indirect Discrimination: A Case Study Into the Development of the Legal Concept of Indirect Discrimination Under EC Law, Intersentia nv, 2005, p. 127.
[72] Judgment of the Court of 27 February 1980, Commission v French Republic, Case 168/78, ECLI:EU:C:1980:51.
[73] Judgment of the Court of 12 July 1983, Commission v United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland (Wine and Beer), Case 170/78, ECLI:EU:C:1983:202.
[74] Ibid., p.8.
[75] Judgment of the Court of 12 July 1983, Wine and Beer, Case 170/78, ECLI:EU:C:1983:202, p.12.
[76] ibid, p.27.
[77] Judgment of the Court (Grand Chamber) of 8 April 2008, Commission v Kingdom of Sweden, Case C-167/05, ECLI:EU:C:2008:202
[78] Friedl Weiss, Clemens Kaupa, European Union Internal Market Law, Cambridge University Press, 2014, p.91.

relationship with the one that would apply if tax rates of beer were applied to wine. Thus, the Court found that the relationship between final selling prices of beer and wine would be 1: 2.1 instead of the actual 1: 2 .3. In this sense, the CJEU considered that the impact of higher taxation on wine would be "virtually the same". According to the Court's reasoning, given the important difference of the final selling prices the fluctuation of the ratio is not likely to change the consumer's attitude[79].

6.3. Exceptions

In French sweet wines case[80], the Court accepted France was not in violation of the community law treating sweet wine production more favourably under the domestic taxation regime on account of being a need to sustain the production in areas of country where growing conditions were poor and unpredictable[81].

The Court held that Community law does not restrict the freedom of each Member State to lay down tax arrangements which differentiate between certain products, even products which are similar on the basis of objective criteria, such as the nature of the raw materials used or the production processes employed. `Such differentiation is compatible with Community law if it pursues objectives of economic policy which are themselves compatible with the requirements of the Treaty and its secondary legislation, and if the detailed rules are such as to avoid any form of discrimination, direct or indirect, in regard to imports from other Member States or any form of protection of competing domestic products`.

The aim of offsetting the more severe conditions under which certain products are produced, in order to sustain the output of quality products which are of particular economic importance for certain regions of the Community must be regarded as compatible with the requirements of Community law[82]

The Joustra[83] case offers the Court the occasion to rule on interpretation of Directive 92/12/EEC on the general arrangements for products subject to excise duty.

Mr. Joustra is a Dutch national and together with some 70 other private individuals formed a group called the 'Circle des Amis du Vin'.

Each year, on behalf of the circle, Mr. Joustra orders wine in France for his own use and that of the other members of the group. On his instructions, that wine is then collected by a Netherlands transport company which transports it to the Netherlands and delivers it to Mr. Joustra's home. The wine is stored there for a few days before being delivered to the other members of the circle on the basis of their respective shares of the quantity purchased. Mr. Joustra pays for the wine and the transport and each member of the group then reimburses him for the cost of the quantity of wine delivered to that member and a share of the transport costs calculated in proportion to that quantity. It is common ground that Mr. Joustra does not engage in that activity on a commercial basis or with a view to making a profit[84].

The Dutch tax authorities nevertheless charged excise duty on the wine and Mr. Joustra submitted an appeal against this decision.

In the course of the ensuing proceedings, the Hoge Raad der Nederlanden (Supreme Court of the Netherlands) raised questions concerning the interpretation of Directive 92/12/EEC on the general arrangements for products subject to excise duty and on the holding, movement and monitoring of such products.

Joustra is interesting for the literal interpretation method applied by the Court. The court held that only products acquired on a person's own behalf fall within the application of Article 8, while those purchased for other individuals do not. Furthermore, transportation must be effected personally by the purchaser.

The Court expressly mention that it is for the Community legislature to remedy the legal lacuna, if necessary, by adopting the measures required in order to amend that provision[85].

7. Public health

The EU's main competencies are in creating a single European market rather than making health policy. We may therefore expect that alcohol policy has seen the dominance of economic over health interests. However this might be a simplistic picture[86].

The case Commission v French Republic[87] regarded a French law which interdict the advertising of grain-based spirits (mainly foreign) while allowing advertising of wine based spirits (mainly French).

National legislation restricting the advertising of some alcoholic drinks it constitutes arbitrary discrimination in trade between Member States where it authorises advertising in respect of certain national products whilst advertising in respect of products bearing comparable characteristics but originating in other Member States is restricted. Legislation restricting advertising in respect of alcoholic drinks

[79] Theodore Georgopoulos, Taxation of Alcohol and Consumer Attitude: Is The ECJ Sober?, AAWE WORKING PAPER, no.37, 2009., p.2-6.
[80] Judgment of the Court of 7 April 1987, Commission v French Republic (French sweet wines), Case 196/85, ECLI:EU:C:1987:182.
[81] Dermot Cahill, Vincent Power, Niamh Connery, European Law, OUP Oxford, 2011, p. 64.
[82] Robert Schütze, An Introduction to European Law, Cambridge University Press, 2015,p.230.
[83] Judgment of the Court of 23 November 2006, Staatssecretaris van Financiën v B. F. Joustra (Joustra), Case C-5/05, ECLI:EU:C:2006:733
[84] Ibid., p.17.
[85] Judgment of the Court of 23 November 2006, Joustra, Case C-5/05, ECLI:EU:C:2006:733, 46.
[86] Ben Baumberg, Peter Anderson, Health, alcohol and EU law: understanding the impact of European single market law on alcohol policies, Oxford University Press, European Journal of Public Health, Vol. 18, No. 4, 392–398.
[87] Judgment of the Court of 10 July 1980, Commission v French Republic, Case 152/78, ECLI:EU:C:1980:187.

complies with the requirements of Article 30 EEC only if it applies in identical manner to all the relevant drinks whatever their origin.

The Court held that by subjecting advertising in respect of alcoholic beverages to discriminatory rules and thereby maintaining obstacles to the freedom of intra-Community trade, the French Republic had failed to fulfil its obligations under Article 30 EEC. The Court recognize in Commission v French Republic[88] that national legislation restricting the advertising of some alcoholic drinks may in principle be justified by concern relating to the protection of public health.

In case Deutsches Weintor[89] the court examined the definition of health claims. In this case the reference to the Court has been made in proceedings between Deutsches Weintor, a German winegrowers' cooperative, and the department responsible for supervising the marketing of alcoholic beverages in the Land of Rhineland-Palatinate concerning the description of a wine as 'easily digestible' ('bekömmlich'), indicating reduced acidity levels. The German authority objected to the use of the description 'easily digestible' on the ground that it is a 'health claim', which, pursuant to the regulation 1924/2006, is not permitted for alcoholic beverages.

The court specifies that the concept of a 'health claim' is deemed to refer not only to the effects of the consumption – in a specific instance – of a precise quantity of a food which is likely, normally, to have only temporary or fleeting effects, but also to those of the repeated, regular, even frequent consumption of such a food, the effects of which are, by contrast, not necessarily only temporary and fleeting[90]. On the other hand, the concept of a 'health claim' must cover not only a relationship implying an improvement in health as a result of the consumption of a food, but also any relationship which implies the absence or reduction of effects that are adverse or harmful to health and which would otherwise accompany or follow such consumption, and, therefore, the mere preservation of a good state of health despite that potentially harmful consumption[91].

8. Conclusion

Defending wines shaped landmark decisions of EU law.

The Court declare, in Liselotte Hauer, that `fundamental rights form an integral part of the general principles of the law, the observance of which is ensured by the court`. Furthermore, the Court affirms the supremacy of EU law vis-à-vis constitutional law of Member states.

In the field of EU procedural law, in Codorníu, the Court recognize, for the first time, the individual concern of the applicant in the action for annulment of a legislative act. `

Foglia v. Novello is the only case to date where the Court declined jurisdiction in a preliminary ruling case on account of the spurious nature of the main proceedings[92].

The Rioja Wine case is one of the six cases in the history of European integration when a state use the art. 259 TFEU and directly brought an action for failure to fulfil the obligations before the CJEU against another State.

In the case of an informal act issued by an international organisation to which the EU is not a member, the Union must act via its Member States, members of that organization, acting jointly in the interest of the Union (International Organisation for Vine and Wine).

A long series of decisions, such as Spirits cases, Wine and Beer, Johnny Walker or French Sweet Wines case, on duties and taxation made a substantial contribution to the realization of the single market

We may say wine is one of the key ingredients that creates law and, thus, defines who the EU is. Indeed, no efforts were saved or vigilance rest in protecting the Europe`s wine cellar.

In any case… in vino veritas.

References

- Barnard, Catherine and Steve Peers, European Union Law , Oxford, Oxford University Press, 2014
- Baumberg, Ben, Peter Anderson, Health, alcohol and EU law: understanding the impact of European single market law on alcohol policies, Oxford University Press, European Journal of Public Health, Vol. 18, No. 4, 392–398
- Berlottier , Luc, Laurent Mercier, Protected Designations of Origin and Protected Geographical Indications,
- Bjerkem, Johan, Member States as 'Trustees' of the Union? The European Union and the Arctic Council, College of Europe, EU Diplomacy Papers, 12/2017, http://aei.pitt.edu/92758/1/edp-12-2017_bjerkem.pdf
- Blakeney, Michael, The Protection of Geographical Indications: Law and Practice, Edward Elgar Publishing, 2014
- Cahill, Dermot , Vincent Power, Niamh Connery, European Law, OUP Oxford, 2011

[88] Ibid.
[89] Judgment of 6 September 2012, Deutsches Weintor, Case C–544/10, ECLI:EU:C:2012:526.
[90] Ibid., para. 36.
[91] Ibid, para. 35.
[92] Koen Lenaerts, Ignace Maselis, Kathleen Gutman, EU Procedural Law, OUP Oxford, 2014, p. 93.

- Cini, Michelle, and Nieves Pérez-Solórzano Borragán. 2016. European Union Politics. Oxford University Press
- CJE/05/42 12 May 2005, Press Release No 42/05, 12 May 2005
- Craig, Paul, Gráinne de Búrca, EU Law, Text, Cases, and Materials, Oxford University Press, 2015
- Dimitriu, Ioana Mihaela , State versus state: who applies better EU law?, Challenges of the Knowledge Society, Volume 5, Number 1, 2015, pp. 404-410(7)
- Dinwoodie, Graeme B., Mark D. Janis, Trademark Law and Theory: A Handbook of Contemporary Research, Edward Elgar Publishing, 2008
- Erlbacher, Friedrich, Recent Case Law on External Competences of the European Union: How Member States Can Embrace Their Own Treaty (2017). CLEER Paper Series, 2017/2, T.M.C. Asser Institute for International & European Law 2017-2. Available at SSRN: https://ssrn.com/abstract=3120550
- Fuerea, Augustin, Dreptul Uniunii Europene. Principii, actiuni, libertati- Universul Juridic, Bucuresti, 2016
- Georgopoulos, Theodore, Taxation of Alcohol and Consumer Attitude: Is The ECJ Sober?, AAWE WORKING PAPER, no.37, 2009
- Georgopoulos, Theodore, Taxation of alcohol and consumer attitude is the ECJ sober?, American Association of Wine Economists Working Paper, No. 37, June 2009, http://www.wine-economics.org/aawe/wp-content/uploads/2012/10/AAWE_WP37.pdf
- Govaere, Inge. 2014. "Novel Issues Pertaining to EU Member States Membership of Other International Organisations: The OIV Case." In The European Union in the World : Essays in Honour of M. Maresceau, ed. Inge Govaere, Erwoan Lannon, Peter Van Elsuwege, and Stanislas Adam, 225–243. Leiden, The Netherlands: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers
- Kassoti, Eva, The EU and the Challenge of Informal International Law-Making: The CJEU's Contribution to the Doctrine of International Law-Making, Geneva Jean Monnet Working Paper 06/2017, https://www.ceje.ch/files/3615/1748/7746/kassoti_6-2017.pdf
- Konstadinides, Theodore, In the Union of Wine: Loose Ends in the Relationship between the European Union and the Member States in the Field of External Representation (2015). 21 (4) European Public Law (Forthcoming). Available at SSRN: https://ssrn.com/abstract=2584995
- Kutschke, Philipe, Court of Justice of the European Union on the protectability of the shading of a bottle as a trademark (decision of October 20, 2011 – Joined Cases C-344/10 P and C-345/10 P – Freixenet v OHIM), Bardehle Pagenberg IP Report 2011/V
- Lenaerts, Koen, Ignace Maselis, Kathleen Gutman, EU Procedural Law, OUP Oxford, 2014
- Meloni, Giulia and Swinnen, Johan F. M., The Political Economy of European Wine Regulations (October 17, 2012). Available at SSRN: https://ssrn.com/abstract=2279338 or http://dx.doi.org/10.2139/ssrn.2279338
- Muñoz, Jazmín and Sofía Boza, Protection by origin in Chile and the European markets: the case of the wine sector, SECO/WTI Academic Cooperation Project , Working Paper No. 14/2017, https://www.wti.org/media/filer_public/8d/23/8d234fa5-d456-483f-8def-79ea8009392d/munozbozasecowp.pdf
- O'Connor , Bernard, The Law of Geographical Indications, Cameron May, London, 2004
- Ortino, Federico , Basic Legal Instruments for the Liberalisation of Trade Comparative Analysis of EC and WTO Law Bloomsbury Publishing, 30 ian. 2004
- Popescu, Roxana-Mariana, Place of international agreements to which the European Union is part within the EU legal order, Challenges of the Knowledge Society, Volume 5, Number 1, 2015, pp. 489-494(6)
- Rodriguez Iglesias, Gil Carlos, Drinks in Luxembourg: Alcoholic Beverages and the Case Law of the European Court of Justice (22 March 1999); in Judicial Review in European Union Law: Essays in Honour of Lord Slynn, Kluwer Law International, 2000
- Schütze, Robert , An Introduction to European Law, Cambridge University Press, 2015
- Spaventa, Eleanor, 'Case C-388/95, Belgium v. Spain', 38 Common Market Law Review, Issue 1, 2001, pp. 211–219
- Steier, Gabriela, Kiran K. Patel, International Food Law and Policy, Springer, 2017
- Tobler, Christa, Indirect Discrimination: A Case Study into the Development of the Legal Concept of Indirect Discrimination under EC Law, Intersentia nv, 2005
- Weatherill, Stephen, Cases & Materials on EU Law, Oxford University Press, 2016
- Weiss, Friedl, Clemens Kaupa, European Union Internal Market Law, Cambridge University Press, 2014
- Wessel, R.A. and S. Blockmans (Eds.), Between Autonomy and Dependence: The EU Legal Order Under the Influence of International Organisations, The Hague: T.M.C. Asser Press/Springer, 2013, pp. 1-9
- Woods, Lorna, Philippa Watson, Steiner & Woods EU Law, Oxford University Press, 2014
- Regulation (EU) No 1308/2013 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 17 December, establishing a common organisation of the markets in agricultural products and repealing Council Regulations (EEC) No 922/72, (EEC) No 234/79, (EC) No 1037/2001 and (EC) No 1234/2007 (CMO Regulation)
- Regulation (EU) No 1306/2013 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 17 December 2013 on the financing, management and monitoring of the common agricultural policy and repealing Council Regulations (EEC) No 352/78, (EC) No 165/94, (EC) No 2799/98, (EC) No 814/2000, (EC) No 1290/2005 and (EC) No 485/2008
- Judgment of 20 December 2017, Vin de Champagne v Aldi Süd, Case C-393/16, ECLI:EU:C:2017:991

- Judgment of the Court of 14 July 2011, Bureau national interprofessionnel du Cognac, Joined cases C-4/10 and C-27/10, ECLI:EU:C:2011:484
- Judgment of the Court of 14 September 2017, European Union Intellectual Property Office (EUIPO) v Instituto dos Vinhos do Douro e do Porto, IP (Port Charlotte), Case C-56/16 P, ECLI:EU:C:2017:693
- Judgment of the Court of 13 December 1994, SMW Winzersekt GmbH v Land Rheinland-Pfalz, Case C-306/93, ECLI:EU:C:1994:407
- Judgment of the Court of 13 December 1979, Liselotte Hauer v Land Rheinland-Pfalz, Case 44/79, ECLI:EU:C:1979:290
- Judgment of the Court of 18 May 1994, Codorníu SA v Council of the European Union, Case C-309/89, ECLI:EU:C:1994:197
- Judgment of the Court of 24 February 1987, Deutz und Geldermann, Sektkellerei Breisach (Baden) GmbH v Council of the European Communities, Case 26/86 ECLI:EU:C:1987:102
- Judgment of the Court of 12 May 2005, Regione autonoma Friuli-Venezia Giulia and Agenzia regionale per lo sviluppo rurale (ERSA) v Ministero delle Politiche Agricole e Forestali, Case C-347/03, ECLI:EU:C:2005:285
- Judgment of the Court of 7 April 2011, Ioan Tatu v Statul român prin Ministerul Finanţelor şi Economiei and Others, Case C-402/09
- Judgment of the Court of 4 March 1986, John Walker & Sons Ltd v Ministeriet for Skatter og Afgifter, Case 243/84. ECLI:EU:C:1986:100
- Judgment of the Court of 27 February 1980, Commission v French Republic, Case 168/78, ECLI:EU:C:1980:51
- Judgment of the Court of 10 July 1980, Commission v French Republic, Case 152/78, ECLI:EU:C:1980:187
- Judgment of the Court of 25 July 1991, Aragonesa v Departamento de Sanidad y Seguridad Social de la Generalitat de Cataluña (Aragonesa), Joined cases C-1/90 and C-176/90, ECLI:EU:C:1991:327
- Judgment of the Court of 8 March 2001, Konsumentombudsmannen (KO) v Gourmet International Products AB (GIP) (Gourmet), Case C-405/98, ECLI:EU:C:2001:135
- Judgment of the Court of 12 July 1983, Commission v United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland (Wine and Beer), Case 170/78, ECLI:EU:C:1983:202
- Judgment of the Court (Grand Chamber) of 8 April 2008, Commission v Kingdom of Sweden, Case C-167/05, ECLI:EU:C:2008:202
- Judgment of the Court of 27 February 1980, Commission v Ireland, Case 55/79, ECLI:EU:C:1980:56
- Judgment of the Court of 27 February 1980, Commission v Kingdom of Denmark, Case 171/78, ECLI:EU:C:1980:54
- Judgment of the Court of 27 February 1980, Commission v Italian Republic, Case 169/78, ECLI:EU:C:1980:52
- Judgment of the Court of 3 July 1985, Commission v Italian Republic (Marsala), Case 277/83, ECLI:EU:C:1985:285
- Judgment of the Court of 7 April 1987, Commission v French Republic (French sweet wines), Case 196/85, ECLI:EU:C:1987:182
- Judgment of the Court of 4 March 1986, Commission v Kingdom of Denmark (Fruit wine), Case 106/84, ECLI:EU:C:1986:99
- Judgment of the Court of 11 March 1980, Pasquale Foglia v Mariella Novello, Case 104/79, ECLI:EU:C:1980:73
- Judgment of the Court of 16 December 1981, Pasquale Foglia v Mariella Novello, Case 244/80, ECLI:EU:C:1981:302
- Judgment of the Court of 23 November 2006, Staatssecretaris van Financiën v B. F. Joustra (Joustra), Case C-5/05, ECLI:EU:C:2006:733
- Judgment of the General Court (Third Chamber) of 11 May 2010, Abadía Retuerta, SA v Office for Harmonisation in the Internal Market (Trade Marks and Designs) (Abadía Retuerta), Case T-237/08, ECLI:EU:T:2010:185
- Judgment of the Court (Grand Chamber), 7 October 2014, Federal Republic of Germany v Council of the European Union, Case C 399/12, ECLI:EU:C:2014:2258
- Judgment of the Court of 16 May 2000, Kingdom of Belgium v Kingdom of Spain (Rioja wine), Case C-388/95, ECLI:EU:C:2000:244
- Judgment of the Court of 9 June 1992. Établissements Delhaize frères and Compagnie Le Lion SA v Promalvin SA and AGE Bodegas Unidas SA (Delhaize), Case C-47/90, ECLI:EU:C:1992:250
- Judgment of 6 September 2012, Deutsches Weintor, Case C–544/10, ECLI:EU:C:2012:526
- Judgment of the Court (Fourth Chamber) of 17 July 2008., Commission of the European Communities v Cantina sociale di Dolianova Soc. coop. arl and Others, (Cantina sociale di Dolianova) Case C-51/05 P, ECLI:EU:C:2008:409
- Judgment of the Court of 20 October 2011, Freixenet, SA v Office for Harmonisation in the Internal Market (Trade Marks and Designs) (OHIM)(Freixenet). Joined cases C-344/10 P and C-345/10 P., ECLI:EU:C:2011:680
- Judgment of the Court of 29 June 1994, Claire Lafforgue, née Baux and François Baux v Château de Calce SCI and Coopérative de Calce (Château de Calce), Case C-403/92, ECLI:EU:C:1994:269

PERSPECTIVES ON THE RULE OF LAW IN A MODERN DEMOCRACY

Adrian-Gabriel DINESCU[*]

Abstract

The nurturing presence of law within a state is, in a modern society, not open for debate. In fact, the absence of law or the lack of its enforcement has been considered as the main symptom of failed states. But the concept of "rule of law" has evolved along with society, along with the principles that drive it. Thus, this concept hasn't always been the same and will not be the same in the future. Whilst in the time before the French Revolution, the "rule of law" meant the rule of an absolute head of state anointed by the divine, the people simply abiding by his will, after the French Revolution the concept changed, the state remained powerful, but under a collective rule. The road had been opened for the modern democracies. As the 19th century grew to a close, the modern state had been born in the Western democracies, a modern state which still held a tight grip on the individual. After the devastating effects of the First and the Second World Wars, the state was once again reformed, in a more subtle manner: its strength was reduced in favor of the individual who considered the collective interests of society to be inferior to his personal interests and needs: post-modernism was born, a thought-current which has had influence on all fields of human life, including the concept of "rule of law".

Keywords: rule of law, democracy, separation of powers, French Revolution, post-modernism.

1. The dawn of "law"

First of all, we need to define "law" as being mandatory guidelines within society set forth by a ruling body.

Secondly, the ruling body that mandates these laws can take many forms in accordance with the development of each society. Thus, looking in our distant or not too distant past, we can identify many ways in which a society and the leaders of that society impose their will on the majority of the population.

Most of history, the ruling classes, governments, leaders have not been elected by the majority, but have either been hereditary (absolute monarchy etc.), theocratic (any form of rule in which the domineering classes are considered to be instated by divinity), dictatorial etc.

In any case, most of human history has seen a manner of leadership or rule that has been absolute, totalitarian. We must not come to the conclusion that single rulers have imposed their will with iron fists and the rest of society was more or less composed of slaves, but we must acknowledge that be it one ruler, a council of rulers or a body of leaders, the ruling minority imposed its will upon the subservient minority.

This subservient minority along with its unopposed ruling elites (be it the supreme leader, or some form of intermediate aristocrats, nobles, businessmen etc.) generally formed society, formed proto-states or, later, states.

The gradual evolution of human thought, human desires, and human needs brought forth, through the ages, gradual changes in the perception of people of their own society and brought into question the legitimacy of those in power.

The power of these people was called into question and, through violent revolutions, these systems came crumbling down along with the political edifices which brought them to power.

This paper does not and cannot make a summary of human political and social history, but it does want to shine a light on certain events that have permitted the rise of democracy, the rise of the rule of law and the possibility of the current layout of society.

Thus we consider essential to mention the 18th century simply because it is the century in which a great event unfolded which even today has repercussions and will have for centuries to come: the French Revolution.

2. The birth of the modern state and of modern democracy: The French Revolution

Through the Middle Ages humanity has seen a slow evolution, both in terms of technology, as well as in terms of social and political thought.

Of course, the reader will have realized by now, that we are referring, in general, to European society, and in a lesser degree to African or Asian cultures. In that respect, we can assert that in 16-18th centuries Europe has dominated the entire world with its empires, mainly, through the use of its weapons and political intrigue.

In European society political discussion was frozen as whole nations were being controlled by authoritarian hereditary rulers who imposed their will, along with the church, upon the vast majority of the population.

Law, in this effect, was imposed by the ruling elite, which had little incentive to change anything of the status-quo which greatly favored their own interests. And the people, in general, having only basic knowledge of life, was not inclined to bring forth any type of meaningful changes, preferring stability.

[*] PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: dinescu.adrian.gabriel@gmail.com)

Through the centuries, however, through western philosophy and thought, the certain aberrations and major disadvantages of such a system became more and more evident[1].

The harsh and unequal enforcement of law, undemocratically elected kings or parliaments meant that all social reform or all new ideas were stifled by a rigid and unwavering class system.

For this reason western thinkers became all too aware of these factors which held back the huge potential of mankind, the creativity of most members of society being channeled only towards the benefit of a few individuals.

Thus philosophers like Voltaire[2] proposed through their writings that this system must be destroyed and a new form of human governance must come into effect.

His writings along with the writing of many others created the premise which was necessary for a sudden and much needed revolution.

This revolution came to be in 1789-1799 A.D., the entire French populations revolting against the aristocratic rule (which was viewed as corrupt, unwilling to listen to the needs of the people and unwilling to change), Church rule (which was also seen to be serving its own interest) and, in general, against the make up the system.

Of course, the majority of the members of this revolution had no idea what to put in place of the current system, had no idea of the concepts of rule of law or of democracy, but, as history sometimes creates, certain elements coalesced to produce the sudden spark of revolution.

We cannot place this spark on the usual perpetrators, as people usually do: the extravagance of the court of Marie Antoinette, the high cost of the royal court, the oppressive general regime of land owners.

The spark came from a certain buildup of tension, of ideas, of needs and from the unwavering evolution of humanity.

The revolution is well known for its violence. Indeed many tens of thousands of people found their death in the first years of the revolution.

The revolution is also known for its initial tyranny, bringing forth the Reign of Terror (later used again with "great" results by Lenin) in which thousands of people were put to death without a trial[3].

The revolution is also known to have sparked the ascension of power-hungry individuals such as Napoleon, causing further suffering upon all of Europe.

But, as has been the case often in human history, the revolutions, through 20 years of struggle, produced a new concept of state: one in which the ruling class is not imposed by the will of few, but by the desires of the many.

The revolution also produced equality not between all members of society, but between all ages and both sexes (the revolutions being the instance in which women fought for equal rights) [4].

Moreover, and concerning our topic, the French Revolution produced, after years of intense struggle, the modern concept of "separation of powers", a state in which the rule of law prevailed, law which has been decreed by of the will of the people through a democratically elected legislative body and in which the executive branch is kept in check by a judiciary branch which is also under the control of law.

Like all brilliant ideas, this notion spread throughout Europe and the world, and today most of European society is dominated by the notion of "the rule of law" and "the separation of powers within the state".

3. Democracy and the rule of law

The concept of "rule of law" is vague and is hard to grasp fully even by the most notable scholars.

This vague ideal, thus has been hard to achieve and the road towards it can be fraught with many perils.

This is exactly what we must extract from the 20th century, a century "of the self", in which the individual awoke, giving birth to modernity, in which the individual said "no" to the rule of elites, in which the individual said no to the overbearing force of the state, he himself becoming the "center of the universe", and thus creating the premises for post-modernism.

The 20th century represented a century of human suffering as well as human liberation, a century fraught by two world wars in which hundreds of millions of people suffered or died and in which the classical state knew many reforms.

In its stride for democracy, in its stride to achieve equilibrium, humanity more than once slipped into the clutches of dictatorship only to come out reinvigorated, able to restart in a better position and, more or less, with lessons learned.

The rule of law, thus, particularly after the fall of the Soviet Union, became a goal for most countries in the world, realizing that only through the separation of powers within the state, can the individual come to flourish.

---

[1] See also for more references : S. Bullen, "A Critical Examination of the Role of Political Thought in the French Revolution", http://www.e-ir.info/2011/10/12/a-critical-examination-of-the-role-of-political-thought-in-the-french-revolution/

[2] For more ideas on the influence of Voltaire see also I. Birchall, "1989: Voltaire and the French Revolution", http://grimanddim.org/historical-writings/1989-voltaire-and-the-french-revolution/

[3] See also M. Carey, "Violence and terror in the Russian Revolution" , https://www.bl.uk/russian-revolution/articles/violence-and-terror-in-the-russian-revolution

[4] For more on this topic, J. Abray, "Feminism in the French Revolution" available at https://www.jstor.org/stable/1859051 ?seq=1#page_scan_tab_contents

But, as we mentioned, there are many perspectives of the concept of "rule of law", "separation of powers" and "democracy".

First, we must note that the "rule of law" system entails that the state has legitimacy in the eyes of the majority, thus the state ensures the rule of law and the rule of law ensures its legitimacy – interdependency of the two concepts.

Secondly, the law becomes a vector of state power, the modern state being formed along the following principles: the ruling body is subservient to the law of the land, free and guaranteed access to a court of law against any administrative, legislative or judiciary abuses, the prevalence of the rule of law against the state itself, means for the state to impose the rule of law and the rule of law to impose itself against the state.[5]

Thirdly, we must define democracy as a system of state organization in which the rule of law is ensured by specific means and in which all aspects of political and social life are dictated by the rule of the majority, through legal institutions.

Finally, fourthly, the concept of "separation of powers" must the defined as the system in which three state powers : the legislative, the executive and the judiciary are in a balance dictated by law and enforced through legal means, in which each branch of the state has the duty and right to oversee the enforcement of the law.

We must emphasize that, as can clearly be seen, the rule of law is as the core of the modern democratic system, in which none of the powers of the state has the upper hand and in which each of the powers balances the "weight" of the other.

Also, it would seem that all the power of the state is under the rule and guidance of society which expresses itself through the direct elective processes, in which the majority of the population dictates the direction of society.

This is the crux of the issue, as some events have shown, the democratic electoral systems having its major inconveniences.

First of all, having the majority of people dictate the direction of society by electing members to establish law has some drawbacks.

Recent events such as Brexit and the election of far-right of far-left governments even within well-established democracies proved that, under certain conditions, the general population is inclined to choose paths which are not necessarily the best from a "rule of law" perspective. Sometimes choices appeared to be wholly unreasonable and against the concept of democracy itself. The classical example of this is the coming to power of the Nazi Party in the 1930s in Germany. The Nazis, an extreme right worker's party came to power through democratic means because of the dire economic situation in Germany between the two World Wars, a situation in which the population's savings were wiped out by galloping inflation and in which war reparations brought financial despair to most households.

Because of this situation we conclude that the population, willingly voted democracy out of the state, voted for a centralized, authoritarian regime which ended by bringing destruction upon Germany and Europe.

This is not by far the only example of democracy which, through the careful manipulation of politicians in certain periods of despair, has renounced its self, and the people, in a struggle to achieve security and stability, lost not only democracy, but the security and stability which they sought.

Another more recent example would the Brexit: a situation in which, by creating fear and in the context of economic downturn, certain politicians have managed to convince the majority of the British people that parting from the European Union is the only method in which they can regain their economic prowess. After a stormy referendum, the majority of the population now, polls show, regrets this decision.

But, as was the case of Germany in the 1930s, the rule of law dictates that the effects of the popular referendum be respected by all the branches of the state, being the direct will of the people.

Thus we move further in our analyses: can the democratic system outvote itself? Can democracy make choices that are undemocratic? Can any of the branches of the state dismiss certain popular choices of the people?

First of all, the checks and balances inherent in a democratic system, theoretically do not permit the people to vote out democracy, as there are certain core values which cannot be changed even by direct vote of all of the members of society. For example, in our own national Constitution it states that Romania is a sovereign Republic, in which the rule of law is of constitutional value and in which all people are equal.

These are values which cannot be altered by any popular vote.

The "forefathers of the Constitution" enshrined these values so that future generations cannot alter them in any way.

However, as history has shown, even withholding these values, a society can slip into an authoritarian system.

Second of all, all laws that can have harmful effects on society must be passed through a legislative process in which politicians who have been elected vote the respective laws into effect. The executive branch is held responsible for enforcing the laws. The judicial branch, which in most states is the only branch of the state who is not elected directly, must overview the way in which the laws are passed and in which the executive branch enforces them.

[5] M. Voicu, „Accesul liber la Justiție", Revista Dreptul nr. 4/1997, Bucharest, pg. 2.

4. Rule of law in the classical view, modernism and post-modernism

Now we arrive at the crux of the issue: can the judicial branch rescind popular laws passed by the legislative branch or enforcements by the executive branch.

As an example of a situation in which this has occurred, we present the following.

During the 1970s a big debate over abortion was held in the United States, the significant majority of the population being against abortion (except for certain medical reasons) and thus was in favor of passing legislation which banned all abortions (with certain limited exceptions)[6].

The congress of the United States passed the bill and declared abortions illegal.

Following this, this Supreme Court of the United States was petitioned in regard to the Constitutionality and legality of the respective bill, which had been highly appreciated by the general public.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in a historical decision established that the bill was unconstitutional as it was against the rights of the mother enshrined in the Constitution of the United States. The Supreme Court considered that by limiting abortions in such a major way, the legislative branch breached its Constitutional prerogatives.

In hindsight, we can easily observe that the "rule of law" and "separation of powers" within the American state is the so called "classical" one, in which the rule of law is imposed upon all walks of life, the judicial branch having the power to enforce even the most unpopular of rulings.

Also, it must also be noted that the American people accepted willingly this ruling, even though it was unpopular, as a consequence of its democratic system and a consequence of the independence of the judiciary.

Thus certain observers have stated that this type of "rule of law" that overrules even the majority will is a type of "dictatorship of the rule of law" in which the separation of the branches in the state is so absolute, that the judiciary can rescind a popular law passed lawfully by the legislative body.

This dictatorship of the rule of law has been the approach of the classic democracies of the 19th and early 20th century when the state, though democratically elected governments, was dominated by certain fundamental principals who were applied in practice in accordance with the view of the judicial branch (in general, Supreme Courts). Since the judges of the Supreme Courts were few in number and not democratically elected, it thus became evident that certain decisions by the majority would be rescinded by a small group of individuals who were not elected.

This system, however imperfect it may seem, was seen as acceptable as the ruling elites still had significant power and acted paternalistic in their belief that society, as a whole, is incapable of addressing important matters and thus a ruling body, the judiciary, should be able to "press the brake pedal" when democracy is threatened even by democratic actions.

However this classic approach towards democracy could not be long lived as the 20th century rolled on, with its many wars and with its many social and political upheavals.

As the two World Wars concluded and as the Cold War ended, the western world no longer trusted the institutions that were put in place to limit the aspirations of the individual.

The old paradigm which asserted the rational man, which asserted that the elites had to rule in a benevolent, but paternalistic manner over the ruled was put into question and eventually abandoned. A new social and political reality was put in its place, postmodernism, in which the individual was supreme, in which the desires of the majority would be passed into law that could not be rescinded by any branch of the state. Indeed, the will of the people would rule supreme in this new form of "rule of law".

Francis Fukuyama, a great historian and thinker of the 20th century concluded in discussing the future of the state that "the state that emerges at the end of history is liberal insofar as it recognizes and protects through a system of law man's universal right to freedom, and democratic insofar as it exists only with the consent of the governed"[7].

Thus the future state envisaged by Fukuyama insured that the liberal state of tomorrow would be democratic insofar as the consent of the governed would be offered. In other worlds, no branch of the state would be able to contradict the direct will of the people, thus the modern (or post-modern) concept of the state, the concept of "rule of law" comes into being.

Although this short essay cannot begin to analyze the complex meanings of such concepts as modernism or post-modernism, the critical difference between human (especially western civilization) society of the early 20th century and of the early 21st century is that the latter is more individually-driven and centered. The individual in the 21st century is centered not on fulfilling his role in society but he sees society and indeed the state and the rule of law only as a prerequisite for his own personal fulfillment. The individual now reigns supreme and does not accept other entities to openly defy his will.

Thus the state has become subservient to the individual and not the other way round.

This has, of course, had dire consequences upon the concept of rule of law and upon the separation of the powers of the state.

---

[6] For details on the case, see also Pew Research Center; http://www.pewforum.org/2013/01/16/a-history-of-key-abortion-rulings-of-the-us-supreme-court/

[7] F. Fukuyama, „The End of History?", 1989, https://www.embl.de/aboutus/science_society/discu ssion/discussion_2006/ref1-22june06.pdf

None of the branches of state, in the post-modernist mentality, can rescind the decision of the majority however in disregard to the wellbeing of the state, of society in general, it really is.

Thus, the situation of Brexit can be explained in terms of a majority which has dictated the course of action which is clearly detrimental to the wellbeing of the nation, but cannot be contested through the judicial system, as it was passed through a direct referendum.

This can have serious repercussions, especially concerning decisions whose consequences shall be felt not in the near future, but in the distant one.

For example, the struggle to implement legislation on a global level for the protection of the environment and, of course, the long term protection of the entire world. In recent years, very little has been done in limiting the extensive damage which has befallen the environment because of emissions, deforestations etc., exactly because popular opinion is not for curtailing this phenomenon, and the population of the world, in general, is indifferent to the destruction of the environment as long as its needs are met in the short term.

5. Conclusion

Living in our post-modern world, in which the notion of "rule of law" has been redefined to better suit the needs of the individual and less the needs of the state and the general society, has produced several imbalances which will have to dealt with in the coming future.

The new "rule of law" concept gives new force to the individual which can dictate the policy of the state, in disregard of the general interest of society.

A balance between the needs of the individual and the needs of the many must always be the goal, but if the balance is extremely difficult, if not impossible to achieve, then we would prefer the needs of the many to prevail over the individual. Otherwise, our whole civilization would be in jeopardy in light of the egotistical desires of the individual.

References

- J. Abray, "Feminism in the French Revolution"
- https://www.jstor.org/stable/1859051?seq=1#page_scan_tab_contents
- I. Birchall, "1989: Voltaire and the French Revolution"
- http://grimanddim.org/historical-writings/1989-voltaire-and-the-french-revolution
- S. Bullen, „A Critical Examination of the Role of Political Thought in the French Revolution", http://www.e-ir.info/2011/10/12/a-critical-examination-of-the-role-of-political-thought-in-the-french-revolution
- M. Carey, "Violence and terror in the Russian Revolution"
- https://www.bl.uk/russian-revolution/articles/violence-and-terror-in-the-russian-revolution
- F. Fukuyama, „The End of History?", 1989
- https://www.embl.de/aboutus/science_society/discu ssion/discussion_2006/ref1-22june06.pdf
- M. Voicu, „Accesul liber la Justitie", Revista Dreptul nr. 4/1997, Bucharest, pg. 2
- Pew Research Center
- http://www.pewforum.org/2013/01/16/a-history-of-key-abortion-rulings-of-the-us-supreme-court/

PROCEDURES FOR THE PROCUREMENT OF PUBLIC PROPERTY RIGHTS. THE LEGAL NATURE OF PUBLIC WORKS CONTRACTS

Doina CUCU*

Abstract

Public property belongs to the state or to an administrative-territorial unit and is made up of goods for public use or public interest declared as such either by their nature or by law. The goods constituting the public domain are defined on the one hand by the Constitution of Romania (Article 136, paragraph 3), on the other hand, by the Annex to Law 213 of November 17, 1998 on public property and its legal status, and last but not least by the Civil Code (Article 554). Procurement of the right to public property is performed in several ways provided by law, as we shall see below, and we shall pay particular attention to the public procurement contract. From the analysis of the procurement methods of the right of public ownership, we find that the legislation is not harmonized and does not clarify all the aspects related to the legal status applicable to the public domain, thus reaching complicated and controversial situations.

Keywords: public property, public goods, contract, public works,, settling appeals.

1. Public Property

Public goods and services in our country appear in the Organic Regulations, these being considered the first legal acts.

An important moment in the development of the public domain is the adoption in 1864 under the reign of Alexandru Ioan Cuza of the Law for the Establishment of the County Councils, the Law for the Regulation of Rural Property and the Law for Expropriation for the Public Purpose.

Along with them, the notion of public domain is certified and at the same time "the goods belonging to the county public domain, apart from those belonging to the township public domain, as well as the juridical regime of the expropriation for public purpose[1]".

According to the republished Constitution of Romania, Article 136, paragraph 3, " The mineral resources of public interest, the air, the waters with energy potential that can be used for national interests, the beaches, the territorial sea, the natural resources of the economic zone and the continental shelf, as well as other possessions established by the organic law, shall be public property exclusively".

Article 136, paragraph 2 defines the holders of public property rights. Thus, public property "can only belong to the state (public property of national interest) or administrative-territorial units (the public property of county, municipal, town or locality interest) [2]".

According to the new Civil Code[3], Titlul VI, Capitolul I, articolul 858 " Public property is ownership that belongs to the state law or an administrative - territorial unit over the goods which, by their nature or by the declaration of law, are of public interest or use, provided that they acquired by one of the ways stipulated by law".

Law No. 213 of November 17, 1998 in Article 9 regulates the way in which a good is transferred from the public domain of the state to the public domain of an administrative-territorial unit and vice versa from the public domain of the county to the public domain of an administrative-territorial unit within the jurisdiction of the respective county and vice versa, from the public domain of an administrative-territorial unit in the public domain of another administrative-territorial unit within the juridiction of the respective county and from the public domain of a county to the public domain of another county at the request of the county council, the latter considering only the pursuit of investment objectives, following the closing of the property to return to its original owner.

Acquisition of the right to public property is governed by the New Civil Code by Article 863, which partly restates the content of Article 7 of Law 213 of November 17, 1998 on public property and its legal status.

2. Acquisition of Public Property Rights

Article 7 of Law 213 of November 17, 1998 indicates the following ways of acquiring the right to public ownership: naturally "(subsoil, deposits, inland, coastal and seaside waterways, etc., subjected to a dynamic natural development processes which makes possible the extension and restriction of the initial surface)", through public procurement in compliance with (at present Law 98 / 19.05.2016), by the expropriation for public utility purposes (for public

* PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: doina_cucu@yahoo.com)

[1] Verginia Vedinaș, Drept administrativ, Ediția a X – a, revăzută și actualizată, editura Universul Juridic, București, 2017, p. 473

[2] Antonie Iorgovan, Tratat de drept administrativ, volumul II, ediția 4, Editura All Beck, București, 2005, p. 166

[3] Law No. 287 of July 17, 2009 as republished and subsequently amended on the Civil Code published in the Official Gazette no. 505 of July 15, 2011.

utility purposes, for works of national interest or local interest), by the donation or related acts accepted by the Government, the county council or the local council, as the case may be (provided that the property becomes of public use or interest) through the passage of property from the private domain of state or administrative-territorial units in their public domain, based on public utility reasons and by any other ways provided by the law.

After the repeal of Article 7 of Law 213/1998 by Law No 71 of June 3, 2011, Article 89, paragraph 2, and in accordance with the new Civil Code, Title VI, Chapter I, Article 863, the right to property is acquired in one of the following ways:

- by public procurement, in compliance with the law and here "it is only referred to the goods of public use or of public interest"[4];
- by expropriation for reasons of public utility reasons, in compliance with the law. The current laws governing expropriation for public utility purposes are Law No 33 of May 27, 1994 on expropriation for public utility purposes and Law no. 255 of December 14, 2010 on the expropriation for public utility purposes necessary for the achievement of objectives of national, county and local interest. As a consequence of the multiple disputes which might arise regarding the implementation of Law 33/1994, Law 255/2010 was adopted in order to reduce the time dedicated to the expropriation procedure and at the same time to simplify it. By way of illustration, if Law 33/1994 provides that under the final and irrevocable judgement and decree on the expropriation (once the obligations imposed by it have been fulfilled), the property becomes the unencumbered property of the expropriator, Law 255/2010 provides that the property is trasnferred to the property of the expropriator at the date of the issuance of the Expropriation Decision, this being an enforceable title. Another comparable situation would be that Law 33/1994 provides that the payment of claims in the absence of an agreement between the parties, it shall be determined by court both in regard to the amount and the term (which shall be no more than 30 days from the date the final court decision), Law 255/2010 provides that the payment of claims in case of disputes shall be recorded on the name of the holder and shall be issued only at his written request (and the payment term shall be no more than 90 days from the date issue of the expropriator's decision);
- by donation or bequest, if accepted (for those made in the name of the state with the approval of the Government and for those made in the name of the administrative-territorial units according to Law 215 of April 13, 2001, Article 121, paragraph 3 with the approval of the local / county councils) under the condition to become of public use or of interest, by its nature or by the will of the possessor;
- by onerous agreement, provided that it is of public use or of interest, by its nature or by the will of the acquirer. This paragraph comes to complement the previously existing gap and opens new perspectives;
- through the transfer of a good from the private domain of the state into its public domain or from the private domain of an administrative-territorial unit to its public domain, in compliance with the conditions of the law. The transfer of the property from the private domain to the public domain can be performed with a governmental, county council or local council decision, as the case may be;
- through other ways established by law.

3. Public Procurement Contract

3.1. Definitions

The way the public procurement process, the organization of public procurement award procedures and the organization of solutions contests are carried out, the use of specific tools and techniques to be implemented for the award of public procurement contracts, and various specific aspects related to the execution of public procurement contracts are governed by Law No 98[5] of May 19, 2016 on public procurement.

These are based on principles such as: non-discrimination; equal treatment; mutual recognition; transparency; proportionality and accountability.

The public procurement contract is defined in Chapter I, Section 2, Article 3, paragraph 1, point 1, as "the onerous contract, assimilated by law to the administrative act, concluded in writing between one or more economic operators and one or more awarding entities, having as object the execution of works, the supply of goods or the provision of services".

Awaring entities within as described in this law are central or local public authorities and institutions, including their subordinate structures acting as credit release authorities and public procurement officers, bodies governed by public law and / or associations formed by one or more awarding entities of the foregoing.

3.2. Award procedures and value thresholds

"Award procedures are the steps to be taken by the awarding entitity and by the tenderers / candidates in order for the agreement of the parties to engage in the public contract to be considered valid"[6].

[4] Ibidem, p. 289

[5] Law No. 98 of May 19, 2016 on public works Published in the Official Gazette no. 390 of May 23, 2016, amended and supplemented by: Emergency Ordinance no. 80 of November 16, 2016 for the establishment of measures in the field of central public administration for the extension of the term stipulated in art. 136 of the Law no. 304/2004 on judicial organization and for the amendment and supplementation of some normative acts, Law no. 80 of April 27, 2017 regarding the approval of Government Emergency Ordinance no. 80/2016 for the establishment of measures in the field of central public administration, for the extension of the term stipulated in art. 136 of the Law no. 304/2004 on judicial organization and for the amendment and supplementation of some normative acts and the Emergency Ordinance No. 107 of 20 December 2017 for the amendment and supplementation of some normative acts with impact in the field of public works.

The procedures for the award of a public procurement contract are:

1. Direct purchase, in the case of the purchase of goods or services if the estimated value of the purchase, excluding VAT, is less than 132.519 lei, ie works, if the estimated value of the acqusition, excluding VAT, is inferior to 441.730 lei;
2. Simplified procedure where the thresholds estimated value, exluding VAT of the public procurement contract is inferior to:

a) 23.227.215 lei, for public procurement contracts / framework agreements for works;
b) 600.129 lei, for public procurement contracts / framework agreements for products and services;
b^1[7]. 929.089 lei, for public contracts / framework agreements for products and services awarded by local awarding entities;
c) 3.334.050 lei, for public service contracts / framework agreements for services which have as their object social services and other specific services.

3. The tender may be open, restricted, for competitive negotiation or competitive dialogue, negotiation without prior publication and solution contest, the award procedure applicable to social services and other specific services in the case of the award of public procurement / framework agreements with an estimated value, exluding VAT, of equal or higher than the thresholds specified above.

These thresholds are set and reviewed by the European Commission in accordance with the appropriate rules and procedures set out in Art. 6 of Directive 2014/24 / EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of February 26, 2014 on public procurement and repealing Directive 2004/18 / EC[8] and are published by the National Agency for Public Procurement on its website

Estimates for purchases are considered to be:

- For the contest of solutions in a procedure for the award of a public service contract, the estimated value excluding VAT of the public service contract, including the value of the prizes or other payments made to the participants;
- For solution contests treated as a distinct procedure, including prizes or payments to participants, this value is calculated by reference to the total amount of prizes or payments made to the participants and shall include the estimated value net of VAT of the public service contract which may be concluded in accordance with the provisions of Article 104 (7)[9], if the awarding entity expresses its intention to award that contract in the contest notice;
- For the framework agreement or for the dynamic purchasing system, the estimated acquisition value shall include the estimated maximum value, net of VAT, reflecting all the subsequent public procurement contracts expected to be awarded under the framework agreement or using the dynamic purchasing system;
- For the innovation partnership, the estimated acquisition value, net of VAT, shall be the estimated maximum value, including all research and development activities to be achieved during the partnership stages, the products, services or works to be performed and purchased at the end of the partnership;
- For public works contracts, this shall include, on the one hand, the cost of the works and, on the other, the estimated total value of the goods and services that the awarding entity shall make available to the contractor for the execution of the works;
- For public procurement contracts on separate lots, this shall include the total value resulting from the summing of all lots, net of VAT, and if the total amount of the lots is equal to or greater than the corresponding value thresholds, the award procedures shall apply to the award of each lot, indifferent of its estimated value (except where the estimated value net of VAT of the respective lot is below the threshold of 355,632 lei for the purchase of goods or services or is below the threshold of 4,445,400 lei for the purchase of works and the total amount of lots which are or have been assigned is registered below 20% of the total value of all lots, procurement of similar products or services and where the contracting authority may use the simplified procedure or direct purchase);
- For the procurement of similar products attributed to separate lots, the estimated value shall include the estimated total value of all lots and the public procurement procedures for the value threshold shall be applied.
- For the procurement of regular products or services, this is the actual total amount of all the contracts awarded within the last 12 months (or within the previous budget year) or the estimated cumulative amount of all successive contracts awarded over a 12-month period;
- For the procurement of products by payment (in installments), rental or leasing (with or without a purchase option), the estimate is based on the duration of the contract;
- For the procurement of insurance services, the estimated acquisition value shall include insurance

[6] Vasilica Negruț, Dreptul administrativ al bunurilor, Editura Universitară Danubius, 2017, Galați, p. 27

[7] Paragraph 1 of Article 7 (a) Section 4, Chapter I was supplemented by Point 4, Article I of Emergency Ordinance No 107 of December 20, 2017, published in the Official Gazette No 1022 of December 22, 2017.

[8] Directive 2004/18 / EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts.

[9] The awarding entity has the right to apply the negotiated procedure without prior publication of a contract notice for the award of public service contracts where, following a solution bid, the public service contract is to be awarded according to the rules established for the respective solution bid, to the winning competitor or to one of the winning competitors of the respective bid; in the latter case, the awarding entity has the obligation to send invitations to negotiation to all winning competitors.

premiums and any other forms of payment related to these services;

- For the procurement of banking services, the value shall be estimated based on the fees, commissions, interests and any other forms of remuneration related to these services;
- For the procurement of design services, the value shall be estimated based on the fees, commissions and any other forms of remuneration related to these services;
- For the procurement of services for which a total price is not provided, the estimated value of the purchase is based on the duration of the contract (for contracts concluded for a fixed period of less than or equal to 48 months, the value is the whole contract expressed for the entire period of time and for contracts concluded for a determined period of more than 48 months the value shall be given by the monthly value multiplied by 48).

3.3. Framework agreement

The framework agreement has a duration of up to 4 years (except in duly justified cases) and may be concluded between the awarding entity and one or more economic operators established by applying criteria such as qualification, selection, award and evaluation, provided in the procurement documentation.

For the framework agreement that shall only be concluded with an operator, its content must include the minimum obligations of the economic operator (assumed within the bid) and the unit price of the offer included in the bid (based on which the price of each subsequent contract is be determined).

For the framework agreement with several economic operators, it is executed:

a) Without resuming the competition, if the framework agreement defines, on the one hand, all the terms and conditions governing the subject of the contract (the execution of works, the provision of services and the supply of products) and, on the other, the objective conditions based on which the economic operator is established in the framework agreement) that shall execute the contract (by performing the works, provisioning of services or supplying of products;
b) With resumption of competition where the framework agreement does not cover all the terms and conditions attached to it (execution of works, provision of services and supply of products);
c) partially without resumption and partly with restarting the competition only if during the procedure for awarding the framework agreement were forseen both the terms and conditions governing its subject matter (execution of works, provision of services and supply of products).

4. Settling appeals

In accordance with Law 101[10] of May 19, 2016, Article 2, paragraph 1, "Any person who considers himself or herself aggrieved regarding to a right or interest consequently to an act of the awarding entity or to the failure to resolve within the legal term a request, may seek the annulment of the act, may oblige on the awarding entity to issue an act or to take remedial action, to recognize the alleged right or legitimate interest, by administrative or administrative means within the jurisdiction or judicial means ".

In this respect, the aggrieved party can address the National Council for Solving Complaints by administrative proceedings within the jurisdiction or the court by judicial means.

The National Council for Solving Complaints is an independent body with administrative-judicial activity, with legal personality, which operates under Law 101 of May 19, 2016 and is not subordinated to any public authority or institution.

Following the examination the lawfulness and merits of the contested act, the National Council for Solving Complaints may:

a) issue a resolution annulling in whole or in part the contested act [11];
b) oblige the contractor (the awarding entity) to issue a document in order to remedy the situation;[12]
c) dispose of other measures (with the exception of those set out above) in order to remedy the acts that affected the award procedure [13].

If the awarding entity cannot take remedial action, it is bound to cancel the award procedure.

If during the settlement of the complaint the National Council for Solving Complaints identifies other violations (compared to those brought before by the appellant) of the legal provisions the National Agency for Public Procurement, the Romanian Audit Office, the awarding entity and in this respect shall transmit all the data and / or documents relevant in support of the complaint.

The awarding entity and / or the aggrieved party may appeal the decisions of the National Council for [10] Law No. 101 of May 19, 2016 on the remedies and means of appeal in connection with the award of public works contracts, sectoral contracts and with works and services concession contracts, as well as on the organization and functioning of the National Council for Solving Complaints published in the Official Gazette no. 393 of May 23, 2016.

[11] Decision No. 290/C8/191, 194, 197 of 07.02.2017 of the National Council for Solving Complaints regarding the annulment of the minutes 2220/09.01.2017 and the subsequent acts, regarding the rejection of the claimants.

[12] Decision no. 2876/C2/3428, 3436, 3454 of 01.11.2017 of the National Council for Solving Complaints regarding the obligation of the contracting authority within 15 days from receiving the decision to reanalyze the offers submitted by: DIALFA SECURITY SRL for lots 2, 3, 4, 6.7; ROMOLD SRL for lots 2, 4, 5, 6; INTEGRA PROFESIONAL SECURITY SRL for lots 3, 5, observing the legal provisions and those mentioned in the motivation.

[13] Decision No. 395/C11/353 of the 22.02.2017 of the National Council for Solving Complaints regarding the Council's motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction, invoked ex officio and declines the competence to settle the appeal filed by ALFARO SECURITY SRL, in favor of the Galati Country Court - Contentious Administrative and Tax Matters.

Solving Complaints with a complaint to the competent court according to Law No. 554 of December 2, 2004, both on grounds of its unfounded and ellegal character, within 10 days from the communication of the decision.

The court may, on the one hand, reject the substantive complaint or admit a defence used in litigation and, on the other, grant the complaint.

If the complaint is admitted, the court shall order the partial or total annulment of the act of the awarding entity or shall oblige the awarding entity to issue the act, shall oblige the awarding entity to fulfill an obligation until the elimination of any specifications (technical, economic or financial) that are considered discriminatory both from the contract notice and the awarding documentation, as well as from any other issued documents related to the award procedure. At the same time, the court may order any other measures considered necessary to remedy the violation of the legal procurement provisions (public, sectoral or regarding the concession).

5. The Legal Status of the Administrative Contract

The legal status of the administrative contract is becoming more and more precise. In French law, "it was the jurisprudence that had to do everything in its power to solve the problem of determining the administrative or private law character of a contract and to define the criteria of administrative contracts by their nature"[14]

Thus, three elements were identified: "the parts of the contract, the subject of the contract and the terms of the contract".

"The following main features of the administrative contract can currently be identified[15]":

- it represents an agreement between the parties, one of which is the authority of the administration;
- its object is the performance of works or the provision of services;
- its clauses are of regulatory nature;
- the public administration can only transfer the rights, obligations or interests to another authority;
- the public authority may modify or terminate the contract unilaterally;
- the contract is governed by public law;
- disputes may be settled in administrative courts.

Thus, "the administrative contract represents an agreeement between a public authority in a position of legal superiority on the one hand and other subjects of law on the other (natural persons, legal persons or other state bodies subordinated to the other party) pursuing the satisfaction of a general interest by the provision of a public service, the performance of a public works or the use of public goods, mainly, to a public power regime[16]"

6. Conclusions

Analyzing procurement methods of public domain by comparing the new Civil Code and Law 213 of November 17, 1998 on public property, we identify a major difference already since the first method of acquiring the right of public ownership, namely the attrition.

In the new Civil Code this form of acquisition no longer exists, although the Civil Code "always makes reference to the fact that it is related to goods" [17] that are of public use or interest

In the case of expropriations, Article 7 included in the new Civil Code was enriched with "under the law" which becomes "expropriation for a public utility purpose, under the law".

Considering that, it is the only form of expropriation, in order to ensure uniformity between the specific legislation and the new Civil Code, Article 863 (b) also includes the principle that expropriation is performed after the payment of compensation.

The introduction of a new method of acquiring public property by onerous agreement, thus opening up the way to civil contracts, is beneficial.

As regards to the public procurement, it is found to be an active body, in continuous movement and transformation. In 2016, the Ordinance No. 34[18] of April 19, 2006 on the award of public procurement contracts, public works concession contracts and services concession contracts was repealed by Law 98/2016. Since the issuance of the Law 98, a number of modifications and completions have been made by various acts which are expected to continue also in the future.

References

- Antonie Iorgovan, Tratat de drept administrativ, volumul II, ediția 4, Editura All Beck, București, 2005
- Dana Apostol Tofan, Drept administrativ, Volumul II, ediția 4, editura C. H. Beck, București, 2017
- Oliviu Puie, Contractele administrative în contextul noului Cod Civil și al noului Cod de procedură civilă, editura Universul Juridic, București, 2014
- Vasilica Negruț, Dreptul administrativ al bunurilor, Editura Universitară Danubius, 2017, Galați

[14] Oliviu Puie, Contractele administrative în contextul noului Cod Civil și al noului Cod de procedură civilă, editura Universul Juridic, București, 2014, p. 10

[15] Dana Apostol Tofan, Drept administrativ, Volumul II, ediția 4, editura C. H. Beck, București, 2017, p. 104.

[16] Verginia Vedinaș, Drept administrativ,Ediția a X – a, revăzută și actualizată, editura Universul Juridic, București, 2017, p. 374.

[17] Dana Apostol Tofan, Drept administrativ, Volumul II, ediția 4, editura C. H. Beck, București, 2017, p.492

[18] Repealed by Article 238 of Law No 98 of May 19, 2016 on public procurement.

- Verginia Vedinaș, Drept administrativ,Ediția a X – a, revăzută și actualizată, editura Universul Juridic, București, 2017
- Law No. 287 of July 17, 2009 as republished and subsequently amended on the Civil Code published in the Official Gazette no. 505 of July 15, 2011
- Law No. 71 of June 3, 2011, published in the Official Gazette no. 409 of June, 10 2011
- Law No. 98 of May 19, 2016 on public works Published in the Official Gazette no. 390 of May 23, 2016, amended and supplemented by: Emergency Ordinance no. 80 of November 16, 2016 for the establishment of measures in the field of central public administration for the extension of the term stipulated in art. 136 of the Law no. 304/2004 on judicial organization and for the amendment and supplementation of some normative acts, Law no. 80 of April 27, 2017 regarding the approval of Government Emergency Ordinance no. 80/2016 for the establishment of measures in the field of central public administration, for the extension of the term stipulated in art. 136 of the Law no. 304/2004 on judicial organization and for the amendment and supplementation of some normative acts and the Emergency Ordinance No. 107 of 20 December 2017 for the amendment and supplementation of some normative acts with impact in the field of public works
- Law No. 101 of May 19, 2016 on the remedies and means of appeal in connection with the award of public works contracts, sectoral contracts and with works and services concession contracts, as well as on the organization and functioning of the National Council for Solving Complaints published in the Official Gazette no. 393 of May 23, 2016
- Law No. 554 of December 2, 2004 of the administrative contentious published in the Official Gazette no. 1154 of December 7, 2004
- Emergency Ordinance No. 107 of 20 December 2017, published in the Official Gazette, issue 1022 of December 22, 2017
- Directive 2004/18 / EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts
- Decision No. 290/C8/191, 194, 197 of 07.02.2017 of the National Council for Solving Complaints regarding the annulment of the minutes 2220/09.01.2017 and the subsequent acts, regarding the rejection of the claimants
- Decision no. 2876/C2/3428, 3436, 3454 of 01.11.2017 of the National Council for Solving Complaints regarding the obligation of the contracting authority within 15 days from receiving the decision to reanalyze the offers submitted by: DIALFA SECURITY SRL for lots 2, 3, 4, 6.7; ROMOLD SRL for lots 2, 4, 5, 6; INTEGRA PROFESIONAL SECURITY SRL for lots 3, 5, observing the legal provisions and those mentioned in the motivation
- Decision No. 395/C11/353 of the 22.02.2017 of the National Council for Solving Complaints regarding the Council's motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction, invoked ex officio and declines the competence to settle the appeal filed by ALFARO SECURITY SRL, in favor of the Galati Country Court - Contentious Administrative and Tax Matters

MULTILINGUALISM IN THE EUROPEAN UNION: UNITY (AND CHALLENGE) IN DIVERSITY

Mihaela Augustina DUMITRAȘCU*

Abstract

While being part of the European Union's commitment to preserve its linguistic and cultural diversity, the multilingualism of this supranational organization also poses some challenges due to the unprecedented number of the official languages recognized.

After a quick historical overview on the evolution from 4 to 24 languages today, and a short comparison with other international organizations' approach regarding the languages, we will present the current relevant legal provisions, after the Treaty of Lisbon, regulating the linguistic regime of the EU, followed by an overview of the way the EU institutions (for example, the Council, the European Parliament, the Commission, the European Court of Justice) use language in their activities.

The purpose of this paper is to identify the right, pragmatic balance between, on one side, the need to give equal legal status to all the Member States' official languages, as a manifestation of a general principle of equality between the EU citizens, and, on the other side, the 'costs' of this linguistic pluralism, in terms of accuracy and uniformity of interpretation of legal texts and case law, efficiency, time frame, transparency, financial costs, inevitable complications and difficulties.

We will also see how language could be seen and used as a bridge to unity within the EU, through communication between individuals, between the EU institutions and EU citizens, within the EU institutions, rather than a barrier, while at the same time aiming to also preserve an important element, namely the practical efficiency of the functioning of the European process in its entire complexity.

Keywords: language, diversity, multilingualism, EU institutions, EU law, equality principle.

1. Introduction

Motto: "The harmonious co-existence of many languages in Europe is a powerful symbol of the EU's aspiration to be united in diversity, one of the cornerstones of the European project".[1]

The multilingualism which is present in and chosen by the European Union is a horizontal aspect of its functioning, having tremendous consequences on a variety of activities, domains, interactions and approaches within this international organization. The commitment to the language diversity is one of the main values of the European Union, and it has influences on many directions: from legislation's adoption to institutional activity, from interaction with the EU citizens to their participation in EU's life, from the need for uniform legal interpretation across the Union to the freedom of movement of products and persons.

These are all reasons for which studying the impact of the multilingualism on EU's complex functioning is not only really important, but also very interesting. We cannot ignore the importance and the consequences of the multilingualism on the efficiency of this integration organization, with its very ambitious goals, and at the same time trying hard to blend the idealistic values with the practicalities of the daily duties and the urge for efficiency in terms of legislation response and ever evolving and challenging economy.

So, our objective is, on one hand, to identify the status quo of the EU legislation on this matter and, more importantly, the reality and practice of using multiple languages in EU institutions and in relation with the citizens, and, on the other hand, the realistic balance between this idealistic value of multilingualism and the costs, the difficulties, the practical approaches and the compromises that can be observed through the Union's activity and legislation.

The paper will start by presenting the history and general aspects of EU's linguistic diversity, and continue by analyzing its regulation on the matter: the treaties, the secondary legislation and some of the most important case law. A very important hint about the reality of putting into practice the multilinguistic approach is by studying how the institutions use different languages in their activities.

After analyzing all the above-mentioned aspects, we will conclude as to the concrete compromise the EU is making towards this very costly and most of the time delaying process of applying the multilinguistic principle, and also market oriented approach the EU uses as means to deal with this linguistic diversity within its borders.

As the references prove, this theme is of much interest for many researchers, and their perspectives on the matter are rather diverse, from technical to ideological. There are many studies, books, articles, working papers, study guides aiming at catching the theory, but also the reality of how a multilinguistic international organization succeeds to put together in a functional manner such complex aspects and consequences of a complicated, bold and beautiful, yet challenging choice - language diversity.

* Lecturer PhD., Faculty of Law, University of Bucharest (e-mail: mihaela-augustina.dumitrascu@drept.unibuc.ro).

[1] European Commission's website: http://ec.europa.eu/education/policy/multilingualism/linguistic-diversity_en, accessed 01.03.2018.

'Languages define personal identities, but are also part of a shared inheritance. They can serve as a bridge to other people and open access to other countries and cultures, promoting mutual understanding. A successful multilingualism policy can strengthen the life chances of citizens: it may increase their employability, facilitate access to services and rights, and contribute to solidarity through enhanced intercultural dialogue and social cohesion[2].'

According, to EU official website, 'every year on the European Day of Languages, 26 September, the EU joins forces with the Council of Europe, the European Centre for Modern Languages, language institutions and citizens around Europe to promote linguistic diversity and language learning through events and happenings'.[3]

'Increasingly, it has become important to the EU to promote and protect those many diverse cultures and encourage its citizens to expand their linguistic knowledge. Travelling across state borders would become easier; businesses would flourish; people would develop a better understanding of the many diverse cultures that surround them in the EU. Multilingualism has the potential to enhance integration within the EU through this heightened appreciation.'[4]

2. Short history of multilingualism in the European Union

The motto of this integration international organization, the European Union, is: "united in diversity". Diversity is celebrated, it is where EU's strength is coming from, according to its officials, and it is also its challenge. This motto was adopted in 2000 'to express the common goal of the European project, which is to "achieve unity of purpose through peace and prosperity in Europe, while acknowledging and fostering the wealth of its different cultures, traditions, and languages"; (...) Languages occupy a central element in Europe's diversity[5]'.

As Richard L. Creech says in his book, "In no way is the EU more diverse than in terms of language"[6] - 28 member states, 500 million citizens, 3 alphabets, and 24 official languages. According to Richard L. Creech, the Union's approach to language must be seen from two perspectives: "the EU's territorial growth, with the concomitant rise in the level of its linguistic and cultural diversity (the so-called 'widening' of the EU), and its evolution from something that was little more than an engine of economic integration into an organization that embodies a serious commitment to human rights principles (the so-called 'deepening')'[7].

In their search to find ways to prevent a new World War to happen, and to 'overcome the destructive potential of their differences, linguistic or otherwise'[8], the Europeans created the European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC), in 1951, and, in 1957, the Atomic Energy Community (Euratom) and the European Economic Community (EEC), with the clear intent to make the member states so deeply interlinked and interdependent economically, to a such extent that war would no longer be an option for them, as Schuman Declaration proclaims.

The initial founding member states were six, namely: France, Germany, Italy, Belgium, Luxembourg and Netherlands. Consequently, the first 4 official languages (meaning 'equally authentic') of the organizations were: French, German, Italian and Dutch.

With the first enlargement, the United Kingdom, Ireland and Denmark joined in 1973, so English and Danish became too official languages. According to Richard L. Creech, adding English, which was also the language of the USA, the 'superpower', 'was to have profound consequences'[9]. Irish, on the other hand, had a semi-official status, becoming only a Treaty language, but not a secondary legislation language.

In 1981, Greece became part of the Communities, bringing along Greek as an official language (with a difficult alphabet, because it was different from the Roman script).

Then, Portuguese and Spanish were added in 1986; after that, Finnish (the first non-Indo-European language in EU) and Swedish joined the list (for Austria, German was already there) in 1995. In 2004, nine new languages were brought in EU, along with 10 new member states from Eastern Europe and Mediterranean Islands[10]. For Cyprus, Greek was already provided from the time Greece joined the EC. Romanian and Bulgarian were also introduced in 2007, and Croatian in 2013.

We can see the great linguistic diversity, and, as author Richard L. Creech states, 'the EU has not defined

[2] http://ec.europa.eu/education/policy/multilingualism/linguistic-diversity_en

[3] http://ec.europa.eu/education/policy/multilingualism/linguistic-diversity_en

[4] Shannon Hall, Protection and Promotion of Multilingualism in the EU, May 15 2013, available at http://www.e-ir.info/2013/05/15/protection-and-promotion-of-multilingualism-in-the-eu/, accessed 26.01.2018, p.1.

[5] Vicent Climent - Ferrando, Linguistic neoliberalism in the European Union. Politics and policies of the EU's approach to multilingualism, Journal of Language and Law, no. 66, 2016, p. 3.

[6] Richard L. Creech, Law and Language in the European Union. The Paradox of a Babel 'United in Diversity', Europa Law Publishing, Groningen, 2005, p. 3.

[7] Richard L. Creech, op. cit, p. 5.

[8] Richard L. Creech, op. cit, p. 12.

[9] Richard L. Creech, op. cit, p. 16.

[10] Czech, Estonian, Hungarian, Latvian, Lithuanian, Maltese, Polish, Slovak, Slovenian.

any geographical limit on enlargement - beyond the vague requirement that members must be 'European States' - and the room for linguistic expansion is therefore also open-ended'[11]. There is indeed a large number, but, as author Theo van Els, says, 'it is exceeded considerably by the number of languages which have no place in the institutions of the EU'[12], meaning the (around 60-80)[13] minority or regional languages within the member states (spoken by approx. 40 million people, according to EU's official website).

3. Quick comparison with other international organizations' approach of the matter

The multilingualism of the EU is unprecedented comparing to other major international organizations, such as United Nations, NATO or the Council of Europe. As Athanassiou Phoebus puts it, 'the concept of multilingualism stands out as one of the most prominent symbols of European historical, political, and cultural diversity and has gradually assumed, in addition to its inherently symbolic dimension, the mandatory nature of a legal imperative and the significance of a political necessity'[14].

An analysis regarding the use of language in international courts is made by Olga Lachacz & Rafal Manko, in their study[15]. Thus, after the Latin of the Roman Empire dominated the diplomatic relations, it was replaced by French during the 18th century, followed in the 19th century by English, being recognized as second language of the League of Nations and of the Permanent Court of International Justice. The principle of equality and the right to a fair trial were very important in adopting the multilingualism principle in international organizations and their courts.

For example, the International Court of Justice and International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea operate in two working languages (English and French). On the other hand, according to the above-mentioned authors, 'in international criminal courts broader linguistic solutions have been adopted', offering the defendants the choice to receive the documents in their native language, that could be other than the official language of the respective court (International Military Tribunal, International Criminal Court). Finally, according to the authors, the European Court of Human Rights has the rule that the applicants have the right to communicate in their own language, respecting at the same time the rule providing that English and French are the official languages of the Court.

As we notice, the European Union and its institutions, including the European Court of Justice, are not at all unique in the choice of the linguistic diversity.

However, according to Athanassiou Phoebus[16], 'a key feature that differentiates the EU from an ordinary international organization and justifies its consistent adherence to multilingualism is its distinct legal nature, and in particular, the direct effect of primary and secondary Community legislation. (...) Absent a fully multilingual legal regime, neither the principle of direct effect nor the doctrine of the supremacy of Community law could effectively operate'. So, we agree with the author Athanassiou Phoebus when he says that 'multilingualism is a necessary corollary to the principle of direct effect and, ultimately, to the doctrine of supremacy (...).'

We shall therefore analyze further how the EU regulates multilingualism and then how it deals with its challenges.

4. How the language diversity is regulated within the European Union

The legal base for the multilingualism is represented by the following texts (primary law): art. 2, art. 3(3), 55 TEU; 20, 24, 342, 165 (1) of TFUE; art. 22 and 21 of the Charter of fundamental rights of the EU; Declaration no.16 annexed to the Treaties (which is not obligatory text, but has political value).

There is also secondary law, namely: Regulation no. 1 determining the languages to be used by the European Economic Community[17], as amended with each new accession to the EU.

Articles 2 and 3 TEU set the general context for the multilingualism to exist in the EU. We will render their content below.

Article 2 TEU says that 'The Union is founded on the values of respect for human dignity, freedom, democracy, equality, the rule of law and respect for human rights, including the rights of persons belonging to minorities. These values are common to the Member States in a society in which pluralism, non-discrimination, tolerance, justice, solidarity and equality between women and men prevail.'

---

[11] Richard L. Creech, op. cit, p. 23.

[12] Theo van Els, Multilingualism in the European Union, International Journal of Applied Linguistic, vol. 15, no.3, Blackwell Publishing Ltd., 2005, p. 269.

[13] Vicent Climent - Ferrando, op. cit., p.3.

[14] Cf. Wagner, Ema, Bech, Svend and Martinez M. Jesus, 2002, Translating for the European Union Institutions, St. Jerome Publishing, pp.1 to 7, cited by Phoebus Athanassiou, Working paper: The application of multilingualism in the EU context, ECB Legal Working Paper series, no.2, 2006, available at http://hdl.handle.net/10419/154656 (www.econstor.eu), accessed 26.01.2018, p.1.

[15] Olga Lachacz, Rafal Manko, Multilingualism at the Court of Justice of the European Union: theoretical and practical aspects, Studies in logic, grammar and rhetoric 34 (47), Versita, 2013, p. 76-78.

[16] Athanassiou Phoebus, op. cit., p. 6.

[17] http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/HTML/?uri=CELEX:01958R0001-20130701&from=EN

Furthermore, article 3 TEU para. 3 provides that 'The Union shall establish an internal market. It shall work for the sustainable development of Europe based on balanced economic growth and price stability, a highly competitive social market economy, aiming at full employment and social progress, and a high level of protection and improvement of the quality of the environment. It shall promote scientific and technological advance.'

Article 55 TEU talks about the official languages of the EU, as follows:

1. This Treaty, drawn up in a single original in the Bulgarian, Czech, Danish, Dutch, English, Estonian, Finnish, French, German, Greek, Hungarian, Irish, Italian, Latvian, Lithuanian, Maltese, Polish, Portuguese, Romanian, Slovak, Slovenian, Spanish and Swedish languages, the texts in each of these languages being equally authentic, shall be deposited in the archives of the Government of the Italian Republic, which will transmit a certified copy to each of the governments of the other signatory States.
2. This Treaty may also be translated into any other languages as determined by Member States among those which, in accordance with their constitutional order, enjoy official status in all or part of their territory. A certified copy of such translations shall be provided by the Member States concerned to be deposited in the archives of the Council.'

Important relevant provisions we can also find in the Charter, namely article 21 - Non-discrimination:

1. Any discrimination based on any ground such as sex, race, color, ethnic or social origin, genetic features, language, religion or belief, political or any other opinion, membership of a national minority, property, birth, disability, age or sexual orientation shall be prohibited.
2. Within the scope of application of the Treaty establishing the European Community and of the Treaty on European Union, and without prejudice to the special provisions of those Treaties, any discrimination on grounds of nationality shall be prohibited.', and article 22 - Cultural, religious and linguistic diversity: 'The Union shall respect cultural, religious and linguistic diversity.'

Regarding the use of languages by the European citizens, article 20 TFEU provides: '(d) the right to petition the European Parliament, to apply to the European Ombudsman, and to address the institutions and advisory bodies of the Union in any of the Treaty languages and to obtain a reply in the same language.'; article 24 TFEU: 'Every citizen of the Union may write to any of the institutions or bodies referred to in this Article or in Article 13 of the Treaty on European Union in one of the languages mentioned in Article 55(1) of the Treaty on European Union and have an answer in the same language.'

An important provision regarding the linguistic diversity is to be found in article 165 TFEU, which states that: '1. The Union shall contribute to the development of quality education by encouraging cooperation between Member States and, if necessary, by supporting and supplementing their action, while fully respecting the responsibility of the Member States for the content of teaching and the organisation of education systems and their cultural and linguistic diversity (...). 2. Union action shall be aimed at:

developing the European dimension in education, particularly through the teaching and dissemination of the languages of the Member States (...)'.

Article 342 TFEU provides that 'The rules governing the languages of the institutions of the Union shall, without prejudice to the provisions contained in the Statute of the Court of Justice of the European Union, be determined by the Council, acting unanimously by means of regulations.' This provision is the basis for the Council Regulation on languages, updated after the last EU enlargement in 2013, saying that:

Article 1

The official languages and the working languages of the institutions of the Union shall be Bulgarian, Croatian, Czech, Danish, Dutch, English, Estonian, Finnish, French, German, Greek, Hungarian, Irish, Italian, Latvian, Lithuanian, Maltese, Polish, Portuguese, Romanian, Slovak, Slovenian, Spanish and Swedish.

Article 2

Documents which a Member State or a person subject to the jurisdiction of a Member State sends to institutions of the Community may be drafted in any one of the official languages selected by the sender. The reply shall be drafted in the same language.

Article 3

Documents which an institution of the Community sends to a Member State or to a person subject to the jurisdiction of a Member State shall be drafted in the language of such State.

Article 4

Regulations and other documents of general application shall be drafted in the official languages.

Article 5

The Official Journal of the European Union shall be published in the official languages.

Article 6

The institutions of the Community may stipulate in their rules of procedure which of the languages are to be used in specific cases.

Article 7

The languages to be used in the proceedings of the Court of Justice shall be laid down in its rules of procedure.

Article 8

If a Member State has more than one official language, the language to be used shall, at the request of such State, be governed by the general rules of its law.

This Regulation shall be binding in its entirety and directly applicable in all Member States.'

The last of the relevant acts on the use of languages in the EU we are going to mention is Declaration no. 16 on Article 55(2) of the Treaty on European Union, a political act, annexed to the Treaties. The Declaration says:

'The Conference considers that the possibility of producing translations of the Treaties in the languages mentioned in Article 55(2) contributes to fulfilling the objective of respecting the Union's rich cultural and linguistic diversity as set forth in the fourth subparagraph of Article 3(3). In this context, the Conference confirms the attachment of the Union to the cultural diversity of Europe and the special attention it will continue to pay to these and other languages. (...)'

If we are to synthesize the above-mentioned provisions, we could say that, basically[18], 'the EU's multilingualism policy has two facets:

- striving to protect Europe's rich linguistic diversity, and
- promoting language learning.'

There are currently 24 official languages: Bulgarian, Croatian, Czech, Danish, Dutch, English, Estonian, Finnish, French, German, Greek, Hungarian, Irish, Italian, Latvian, Lithuanian, Maltese, Polish, Portuguese, Romanian, Slovak, Slovene, Spanish and Swedish.

As EU citizens, we have the right to use any of these languages in correspondence with the EU institutions, which have to reply in the same language. EU regulations and other legislative texts are published in all official languages except Irish (only regulations adopted by both the EU Council and the European Parliament are currently translated into Irish).

One of the EU's multilingualism goals is for every European to speak 2 languages in addition to their mother tongue. The best way to achieve this would be to introduce children to 2 foreign languages from an early age. Evidence suggests this may speed up language learning - and boost mother tongue skills too.'

The EU supports language learning, according to Commission's website, because[19]:

- better language skills enable more people to study and/or work abroad, and improve their job prospects;
- speaking other languages helps people from different cultures understand one another - essential in a multilingual, multicultural Europe;
- to trade effectively across Europe, businesses need multilingual staff;
- the language industry – translation and interpretation, language teaching, language technologies, etc. – is among the fastest growing areas of the economy.

Also, as the Commission says, EU citizens should be able to get information about what the EU is doing, have access to EU law in a language they can understand, be able to participate in the law-making process of the EU, because Europeans have a right to know what is being done in their name. They must also be able to play an active part without having to learn other languages. Using as many national languages as possible makes the EU and its institutions more open and effective.

If we were to comment on the Regulation of languages in the EU, we could cite author Athanassiou Phoebus[20] with whom we agree, and who mentions the acknowledgement by the Regulation of national languages only, thereby excluding form its scope of application regional languages, and also not clearly distinguishing between official languages, and the working ones. At the same time, the author notices the fact that only the written form of the use of the languages are considered (translation), and there is no mention about their utilization in verbal communication, in interpreting.

5. The EU institutional practice regarding the multilingualism (official vs. working language; equal vs. ranked)

First, we have to mention that the above-mentioned Regulation allows the institutions a certain degree of freedom in selecting their language regime (working languages), provided that it is explained in their internal rules regulation.

The non-discrimination rule on the basis of language (enshrined in the Charter, art. 21) was considered in the Kik v. OHIM case (T-120/99, C-361/01 P) by the ECJ as not being a general principle to which no limitation is allowed; consequently, there is no absolute principle of equality of languages, so the institutions are free to establish which official languages they use as they see fit, in specific cases. Nevertheless, the limitations must be objective, appropriate and proportionate, limited and justified, with no unjustified differences of treatment, and not undermining the essence of linguistic diversity (for these concepts, the Opinion of Advocated General Maduro, in case C-160/03, Spain v. Eurojust, is relevant).

Therefore, for practical reasons, the institutions choose not to adapt the full multilingualism, but to use instead some working languages. We also notice there is also ranking as regards which official languages are used as working one within the institutions, which may in fact contradict the principle of equality. The preoccupation arises as to find the right balance between linguistic diversity and efficiency.

We are going to present below the choice of some institutions for the use of languages in their activities and in relation with the EU citizens.

---

[18] https://europa.eu/european-union/topics/multilingualism_en, accessed 28 February 2018.

[19] https://ec.europa.eu/info/about-european-commission/service-standards-and-principles/use-languages_en, accessed 28 February 2018.

[20] Athanassiou Phoebus, op. cit., p.10.

5.1. Multilingualism in the European Parliament[21]

In the European Parliament, all official languages are equally important: all parliamentary documents are published in all the official languages of the European Union (EU) and all Members of the European Parliament (MEP) have the right to speak in the official language of their choice. It also ensures everyone is able to follow and access the Parliament's work.

The European Parliament differs from the other EU institutions in its obligation to ensure the highest possible degree of multilingualism. Every European citizen has the right to stand for election to the European Parliament. It would be unreasonable to require MEPs to have a perfect command of one of the more frequently used languages, such as French or English. The right of each Member to read and write parliamentary documents, follow debates and speak in his or her own language is expressly recognized in Parliament's Rules of Procedure.

All EU citizens must be able to read legislation affecting them in the language of their own country. As a co-legislator, the European Parliament also has a duty to ensure that the linguistic quality of all laws it adopts is flawless in all official languages.

Europeans are entitled to follow the Parliament's work, ask questions and receive replies in their own language, under European legislation[22].

The 24 official languages make a total of 552 possible combinations, since each language can be translated into 23 others. In order to meet this challenge, the European Parliament has set up highly efficient interpreting, translation and legal text verification services. Very strict rules have been put in place to ensure that these services function smoothly and that the costs remain reasonable.

The legislation adopted by the European Parliament affects over 500 million people in 28 countries and 24 official languages: it must be identical and as clear as possible in all the languages. Verifying the linguistic and legislative quality of the texts is the job of Parliament's lawyer-linguists.

As a conclusion, we can surely notice the strong commitment of the Parliament for multilingualism, as a sine qua non condition for legitimacy and democracy, as the European Parliament is the only EU institution with democratic legitimacy, being elected directly by the European citizens.

5.2. Multilingualism in the Council

First we must say that in the Council the members represent the interests of the member states (and not the general interest of the EU, as the Commission must do). After the Treaty of Lisbon, the Council is part of the decision making, together with the Parliament adopting the EU legislation on equal footing.

In this context, it is normal that the full multilingualism principle is adopted by this institution. So the draft legislation must be translated in all the official languages of the EU.

5.3. Multilingualism in the Commission

Studying the way the activities of the Commission are carried, it is obvious that this institution uses, de facto, only three working languages: English, French, and sometimes German, too. The reason for this situation is the imperatives for speed and efficiency[23].

5.4. Multilingualism in European Court of Justice (ECJ)

In order to provide an equal and real access to justice, the ECJ respects the principle of linguistic equality, in order to ensure the effective protection of the rights of citizens under the EU law. Therefore, the language of the case may be any of the 24 official languages, fact usually decided by the applicant.

At the same time, internally, the ECJ deliberates in French, and also the draft judgment is in French, and then translated into the other official languages. The choice for French has also historical reasons, but also provides for the crucial aspect of legal certainty when deliberating and drafting the judgment, given the paramount importance of uniformity of interpretation and then application of EU law by all its addresses within this integration and supranational organization.

6. The delicate balance between different factors of multilingualism

Studying the EU treaties, the legislation, the case law and also the institutional practical approach regarding multilingualism, we cannot help noticing the different factors that must be taken into consideration while acknowledging the EU's commitment towards the linguistic diversity as a political value: the equality principle applied to EU official languages vs. ranking of the working languages, the market/economic oriented approach to multilingualism, and the various types of costs of a multilingual European Union.

Translation and interpretation within this organization are a 'mammoth task', each institution having its own translation department, besides a unique organism for all the institutions - the Joint Interpreting and Conference Center[24].

According to European Commission, multilingualism costs each European citizen only two euros per year, comparing this price with that of a cup

[21] Source for this subtitle: http://www.europarl.europa.eu/aboutparliament/en/20150201PVL00013/Multilingualism, accessed on 27.02.2018.

[22] Rules of Procedure of the EP: Rule 158 relating to multilingualism; The EP Code of Conduct on Multilingualism.

[23] Athanassiou Phoebus, op. cit., p.20.

[24] Richard L. Creech, op. cit., p.26.

of coffee. At the same time, in order to cut the costs, a lot of materials remained un-translated or only summarized. Also, the institutions use only a limited number of working languages to make the process more speedy and efficient, trading off the equality principle to the need of productivity.

Although the financial costs do not seem high, there is another type of 'costs' that are pretty important in regard to translation of written texts: the institutional inefficiencies, the delays, the translation errors, the lost productivity, the differences between the translated texts which are hard to avoid, time pressure, inconsistencies, the risks for uniform interpretation of EU legislation across the member states. At the same time, in order to have really accurate translations, according to author Richard L. Creech, 'a good legal translator must therefore also be an expert in comparative law'. Actually, in order to find out the real intent and aim of the legislator it is necessary to read the text in at least 2-3 other official languages; even the ECJ recommends to the national judges to do this compared reading before considering addressing a preliminary question to the Court, in order to get more clarification on the text[25].

As regards the interpreting, the situation is even more complicated, as, besides meeting lasting a long time and becoming tiring, a lot of the information and the sometimes crucial non-verbal message are lost, including the jokes, for example, which are at times skipped, or heard later by the persons who listen to the interpreter and not the speaker. So the listener is not only disconnected by the speaker, but also cannot fully grasp the message in its complexity, verbal and non-verbal.

According to Richard L. Creech, 'the EU's programs do not acknowledge the economic and political integration is in fact inherently antagonistic to linguistic diversity'.[26] Actually, the working languages are 2 + 1, and it is easy to notice that out of these three, English has become a true lingua franca[27]. As Bruno de Witte says[28], ' form the point of view of market integration, linguistic diversity is not so much a cultural asset, as an obstacle to efficient communication.' Richard L. Creech concludes, consequently, that 'the EU's approach to language use has up to now been largely an economic affair[29].

As Vicent Climent - Ferrando[30] puts it, 'while the idea of promotion, protection and respect of linguistic diversity remains in the current EU political rhetoric on languages, the actual policies adopt a market-oriented approach, which considers languages as mere commodities for economic growth, mobility and jobs'. Indeed, as the above-mentioned author proves in his paper, we can also see 'the functional importance of language skills to increase competitiveness, reinvigorate the economy and to boost people's employability and mobility through (majority) language learning[31].

It results a kind of utilitarian and market-oriented approach to multilingualism in the European Union, which puts in a different perspective the idealistic political principles of linguistic diversity and equality of the EU's official languages, which represents the 'sentimental' dimension, associated, as Vicent Climent - Ferrando says, with 'notions of culture, identity, respect, intercultural dialogue and EU values, but does not translate into concrete policy intiatives'[32].

7. Conclusions

'The European Union has always seen its great diversity of cultures and languages as an asset. Firmly rooted in the European treaties, multilingualism is the reflection of this cultural and linguistic diversity. It also makes the European institutions more accessible and transparent for all citizens of the Union, which is essential for the success of the EU's democratic system[33].

'The European Union's aspiration to be united in diversity underpins the whole European project. The harmonious co-existence of many languages in Europe embodies this. Languages can build bridges between people, giving us access to other countries and cultures, and enabling us to understand each other better. Foreign language skills play an increasingly important role in making young people more employable and equipping them for working abroad. They are also a factor in competitiveness; poor language skills cause many companies to lose contracts and hamper workers

[25] http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/PDF/?uri=OJ:C:2016:439:FULL

[26] Richard L. Creech, op. cit., p. 51.

[27] Lingua franca = any language that is used by different speakers to communicate when they do not share a common language/whose native languages are different - www.oxforddictionaries.com. In the past we had Latin and Greek, and now English. Other linguas francas are: Arabic, Chinese, French, Portuguese, Russian, Spanish, in different continents and regions of the world.

"I speak Spanish with God, Italian with women, French to men, and German to my horse" (Emperor Charles V), cited by Ineta Dabasinskiene, Laura Cubajevaite, Multilingualism in Europe - Study Guide. A resource Book for Students, Kaunas, Vytautas Magnus University, Faculty of Humanities, Department of Lithuanian Languages, 2013, pg. 12.

[28] Bruno de Witte, Surviving in Babel? Language rights and European integration, in 'The protection of minorities and human rights', Y. Dinstein & M. Tabory eds., 1992, p. 277, 295, cited by Richard L. Creech., op. cit., p.103.

[29] Richard L. Creech., op. cit., p.157.

[30] Vicent Climent - Ferrando, op. cit., p.1.

[31] Vicent Climent - Ferrando, op. cit., p.6.

[32] Vicent Climent - Ferrando, op. cit., p.10.

[33] Source for this subtitle: http://www.europarl.europa.eu/aboutparliament/en/20150201PVL00013/Multilingualism, accessed on 27.02.2018.

who might want to seek employment in countries other than their own[34].

The objective set up in Lisbon 2000 was for the EU to become the most dynamic knowledge-based economy in the world, with good growth, employment and social cohesion. Of course, language, meaning effective communication, plays an important role with regard to internal market, professional mobility, skills improvement etc. Languages, therefore, is a fundamental asset in free movement of goods, labour, capitals, services, facilitating, at the same time, opportunities and fostering competitiveness.

'The EU's remarkable linguistic pluralism and its respect for linguistic diversity are intimately related to its unique nature as a sui generis, treaty - based organization bringing together [28] European countries with distinct, yet closely linked cultural and historical traditions'. As the author affirms, examining the language regime reveals that multilingualism is not an absolute imperative, but rather a value that may need to be balanced against other equally important considerations, like speed, efficiency, which are objective and operational needs[35].

Indeed, the multilingualism, the linguistic diversity, the equality of all official languages, all these are important, idealistic values, with which the EU resonates deeply as concepts. At the same time, we cannot ignore or forget that this is an economic integration organization, with ambitious goals, an internal market to manage, in a nutshell, a very complex and demanding project that needs to be successful for everyone involved. That is why concepts as efficiency, speediness, practicality must also me considered and addressed. There is also the issue of the EU legislation, with its special characteristics: direct effect and applicability, primacy, which makes it even more complicated in terms of uniform interpretation and application of EU law by the member state, uniformity being an essential component of integration.

The success on all levels of this unique integration organization will eventually depend on the way it manages to balance all these factors, most of them even contradictory, in a way that is smart and ingenious, similar in approach with Jean Monnet's courageous and ingenious idea in 1950.

The languages, as expression of national identity and cultural diversity, can therefore be used as a link or bridge between people, rather than an obstacle to the market integration. Let's not forget that the EU was, is and should be first of all about its peoples, and not mere economics, and let's not forget the words of this primus inter pares among Europe's founding fathers, this man of great beginnings, Jean Monnet, who said: 'Nous ne coalisons pas des États, nous unissons des hommes.' So, we consider that it is in our mission today, as inheritance, to try to continuously re-connect with this initial spirit, which ignited the European Communities and keep it alive, even in the multilingualism approach, through all difficulties, ambitious economic objectives and competitiveness at all levels.

References

- Richard L. Creech, Law and Language in the European Union. The Paradox of a Babel 'United in Diversity', Europa Law Publishing, Groningen, 2005
- Nikos Vogiatzis, The linguistic policy of the EU institutions and political participation post-Lisbon, European Law Review, 2016
- Theo van Els, Multilingualism in the European Union, International Journal of Applied Linguistic, vol. 15, no.3, Blackwell Publishing Ltd., 2005
- Olga Lachacz, Rafal Manko, Multilingualism at the Court of Justice of the European Union: theoretical and practical aspects, Studies in logic, grammar and rhetoric 34 (47), Versita, 2013
- Mattias Derlen, Multilingual interpretation of CJEU case law: rule and reality; European Law Review, 2014
- Vicent Climent - Ferrando, Linguistic neoliberalism in the European Union. Politics and policies of the EU's approach to multilingualism, Journal of Language and Law, no. 66, 2016
- Ineta Dabasinskiene, Laura Cubajevaite, Multilingualism in Europe - Study Guide. A resource Book for Students, Kaunas, Vytautas Magnus University, Faculty of Humanities, Department of Lithuanian Languages, 2013
- European Union's official websites: http://ec.europa.eu/education/policy/multilingualism_en, https://europa.eu/european-union/topics/multilingualism_en, http://ec.europa.eu/education/policy/ multilingualism/ linguistic-diversity_en, http://www.europarl.europa.eu/aboutparliament/en/2015020 1PVL00013/Multilingualism, accessed 26.01.2018
- Shannon Hall, Protection and Promotion of Multilingualism in the EU, May 15 2013, available at http://www.e-ir.info/2013/05/15/protection-and-promotion-of-multilingualism-in-the-eu/, accessed 26.01.2018
- Phoebus Athanassiou, Working paper: The application of multilingualism in the EU context, ECB Legal Working Paper series, no.2, 2006, available at http://hdl.handle.net/10419/154656 (www.econstor.eu), accessed 26.01.2018
- European Commission's website: http://ec.europa.eu/education/policy/multilingualism/linguistic-diversity_en, accessed 01.03.2018
- Treaty on European Union, Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, the Charter of Fundamental Right of the European Union (in English, French, and Romanian)

[34] http://ec.europa.eu/education/policy/multilingualism_en

[35] Athanassiou Phoebus, op. cit., p.23.

THE LEGAL REGIME FOR CUSTOMS DUTIES AND TAXES HAVING EQUIVALENT EFFECT IN THE EUROPEAN UNION

Augustin FUEREA*

Abstract

One of the consequences that generates direct, short, medium and long-term effects, determined by the accession of the states to the European Union, is that of valorizing also the free movement of goods. More precisely, it is about the correct knowledge (in a society of knowledge), understanding and application of the principles and rules that govern the goods, but also the appropriation, respectively the engagement in a series of complex mechanisms, which can determine the activation of exceptions, limitations, restrictions or exemptions from the freedoms concerned. For these reasons precisely, the emphasis on freedom has to fall on the norm, rule, knowledge, understanding, and above all on compliance, application. Why? Because, in the European space too, the freedom is regarded as representing what philosophers call "understood necessity", not chaos, not hazard, not disorder. Freedom is for all, not only for some, under conditions of equal chances, but also of engaging in valorization through the assimilation of a large amount of information, in a time, why not admit, relatively brief and last but not least, in terms of competence, professionalism and competition, specific conditions of a market economy, an economy in which we already find ourselves. The free movement of goods is the legal regime under which goods are not confronted at frontiers with any restrictions regulated by a State, both in the case of imports and exports. Therefore, the freedom results equally in the prohibition between the EU Member States of customs duties and charges having equivalent effect to customs duties, plus the prohibition imposed on the Member States of the Union to establish quantitative restrictions or to adopt measures having equivalent effect.

Keywords: legal regime; customs duties; charges having equivalent effect to customs duties; the European Union; institutional treaties; amending treaties; case law of the CJEU).

1. Historical and conceptual references

The choice of the wording of this introductory part for the analysis to which we shall proceed is based in particular, on the paradox of each of the three notions, namely: "references," "history," and "concepts". As a consequence, the choice was not a random one, but rather the opposite. Each above-mentioned notion presents the paradox of cumulation of two dimensions. On the one hand, we are talking about the precision given to us by the "references" to which we relate our existence, temporally speaking, and on the other hand, about the flexibility given by the relative character of their stability (the continuous movement of the universe, the existential space we find ourselves in, and so on). The same goes for "history" (seen and rendered subjectively, obviously in a different manner from one person to another), and also in the case of "concepts" understood, defined and accepted differently. Each concept (to which we also refer) revolves around invariable constants that are difficult or even impossible to challenge. At such constants, we shall try to refer in this approach, since the objective view is now more necessary than ever, given the extent, complexity and implications of the information that is covered by such an area of concern.

Our research starts from the time factor. When exactly do we encounter preoccupations incident to common rules referring to a uniform conduct? Who highlights such concerns? Where do they manifest and through what are they materialized, consecrated from the point of view of the headquarters of the matter? These are questions to which we shall try to find answers.

By concentrating our interest on the European Union, the undeniable temptation would be to artificially overlap the concerns in matter, as origins, over the origins of the idea of unity at European level. Nor would we mistake much in terms of the time position of these origins. With the arguments that both historians and jurists have identified, we might end up either in antiquity or in different stages of the evolution of the European continent, or in the first half of the twentieth century, essentially marked by the two world wars.

Why are we going so far in history? It is simple. Because "for a long time, Europe's idea of union was confused with the organization of the world; it is thus related to Europe, if not the known world, at least the useful world"[1], a world that harmoniously has proposed to bring equally together both dimensions: the political one (peace, security) and the economical one, from the legal point of view.

Economists confirm such assumptions, appreciating that "the history of the union of territories (including for economic reasons), and later of European states, is found in remote periods, with reference to the expansion of the Roman Empire, to Great Carol's empire and to the Napoleonic conquests, to the establishment of the League of Nations in the interwar period"[2].

* Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: augustinfuerea@yahoo.com).

[1] Charles Zorgbibe, Construcția europeană. Trecut, prezent, viitor, Trei Publishing House, Bucharest, 1998, p. 5.

Everything is done in the context of the globalization trend of international relations, including from an economical and financial perspective, because "globalization is the process of internationally interdependent expansion of international economic flows. Current globalization is a new way of life for the international community (...). Globalization is not new. It has been observed from the beginning of the 16th century, recognized until the end of the 19th century and characteristic of the 20th century"[3]. Among the entities identified as being involved in this process, the World Trade Organization, for example, occupies an important place. Europe has assumed, through a process of integration very well thought and followed, a special role as an actor with global responsibilities, including from an economic perspective. The Common Market is an enlightening example for the above finding.

"The Community objective of the founding members of the [European Economic Community] was (...) a Community market, which subsequently became an internal market, namely an economic and monetary Union"[4].

Briefly, the historical references to such developments point to the following institutional and amending Treaties: the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community; the Treaty establishing the Atomic Energy (as institutional treaties), namely the Single European Act, the Maastricht Treaty, the Treaty of Nice and the Treaty of Lisbon (as amending Treaties).

In art. 3 par. (1) of the Treaty establishing the European Community (ECT), in its consolidated form of 1992[5], it is stated that "in order to achieve the objectives set out in art. 2[6], the activities of the Community shall include, subject to and in accordance with the deadlines laid down in (...) the Treaty: (a) the prohibition between Member States of customs duties and quantitative restrictions on imports and exports of goods and all other measures having equivalent effect; (b) a common commercial policy; (c) an internal market characterized by the elimination, between Member States, of obstacles to the free movement of goods, persons, services and capital".

The provisions of art. 14 par. (2) TEC, the consolidated version of 1997, according to which "The internal market comprises an area without internal frontiers in which the free movement of goods, persons, services and capital is ensured", are edifying.

Impressive is the speech by former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher (The Bruges Speech[7]), which, in its debut, shows: "You have invited me to talk about the UK and Europe. I should congratulate you for your courage. If you believe certain things that are being told or written about my view of Europe, it's almost like inviting Genghis Khan to talk about the virtues of peaceful coexistence!". However, the same person, within the framework of the Third Idea-Force ("A Europe open to entrepreneurship") insists on appreciating that "the goal of a Europe open to the entrepreneurial spirit was the driving force behind the creation of the Single European Market until 1992. By deploying barriers and enabling businesses to operate on a European scale, we shall be able to better compete with the United States, Japan and other economic powers that are emerging in Asia or elsewhere". This is the essence of Britain's concerns, including now under the Brexit conditions. Worthy to add, it is also the statement made by the same British Prime Minister on the occasion of her speech, namely: "The UK has provided an example by opening its markets to the others. The city of London has for a long time been home to financial institutions around the world. This is why, it is the biggest financial centre in Europe and the one that has prospered the best". There are assertions that currently stimulate the deepest reflections in the context of an important stage of the EU-UK negotiations that the Brexit has generated.

Article 131 TEC has a particular consistency in terms of building the common commercial policy, stating that "by establishing a customs union among themselves, the Member States understand to contribute, for the common interest, to the harmonious development of world trade, to the progressive elimination of restrictions on international trade and to the reduction of customs barriers. The common commercial policy (being within the exclusive competence of the European Community / EU) takes into account the favourable effect that the elimination of duties between Member States can entail in increasing the competitive power of enterprises in these States". This is the reason why, gradually, a genuine customs duty of the European Community / European Union has emerged and developed. Next, following the

[2] Maria Bârsan, Integrarea economică europeană, vol. I – Introducere în teorie și practică, Carpatica Publishing House, Cluj-Napoca, 1995, p. 7.

[3] Petre Tănăsie, România, globalizarea și cerințele regândirii guvernării globale. Oportunități și vulnerabilitate, in Studii Juridices, "N. Titulescu" University of Bucharest, Economic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2001, p. 155.

[4] Andrei Popescu, Reglementări ale relațiilor de muncă – practică europeană, under the aegis of the Legislative Council, Tribuna Economică Publishing House, Bucharest, 1998, p. 104.

[5] The Treaty was signed in Rome on 25 March 1957 and entered into force on 1 January 1958. Subsequently, the Treaty has been amended several times.

[6] Article 2 TEC, consolidated form of 1992: "The Community's task is to establish a common market and economic and monetary union and to implement the common policies and actions referred to in Art. 3 and 4, to promote throughout the Community a harmonious, balanced and sustainable development of economic activities, a high level of employment and social protection, equality between men and women, sustainable and non-inflationary growth, a high degree of convergence of economic performance, a high level of protection and improvement of the quality of the environment, raising the standard of living and quality of life, economic and social cohesion and solidarity between Member States".

[7] Charles Zorgbibe, op. cit., pp. 336-342.

same logical thread, art. 135 TEC states that "within the scope of [the Treaty], the Council (...) shall take steps to intensify customs cooperation between the Member States and between them and the Commission".

Even though sometimes the regulations subsequent to the Maastricht Treaty have helped not directly, but only implicitly, to enshrine the principle of the free movement of goods, including through the prohibition of customs duties and charges having equivalent effect between Member States. The Treaties of Amsterdam and Nice have maintained a constant evolutionary nature of the matter, however, emphasized by the Treaty of Lisbon.

2. Grounds for the appearance of the Common Market)

The common market "is essentially a customs union which, in addition to the freedom of trade in goods and services, also implies the freedom of movement of the main factors of production (capital and labour force) among the member countries"[8]. Customs Union "is an even closer form of economic integration. In such a union, [the Member States] are obliged to use common tariffs and rules on imports [and exports] from [to] non-member States"[9]. Moreover, the same authors add that the economic union "involves all the features of a common market"[10].

Our concern is precisely the first component, namely that of import and export customs duties and charges having equivalent effect, at the level of Member States of the European Community, respectively of the European Union, later.

From the point of view of stages crossed, within the framework of the economic integration, "the European Economic Community started with a customs union"[11]. This is because the ECSC [similar CEEA] is a special case of sectoral integration for coal and steel" as it is the "1965 US-Canada Automobile Agreement"[12]. Because "for developed countries [as in the case above], these sectoral initiatives require a so-called removal of obligations, i.e. a derogation from the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade"[13].

"Like the World Trade Organization, the European Union apparently seeks to establish free trade among nations. As in the case of the World Trade Organization, this requires not only the elimination of taxes, but also the criticism of any attempt by a government or national authority[14] to place its own producers unfairly to those in other states"[15]. In other words, what it is not allowed to be practiced in the relations between the Member States in terms of customs duties and charges having equivalent effect, that should also be the case in the relations between these States and third States, with reference to the Lisbon Agenda 2000, according to which the EU wanted to become the most dynamic and performing knowledge-based economy in the world by 2010, an objective which has subsequently been carried forward.

From a conceptual point of view, there are substantial differences between the "internal market" and the "common market", as stated in the doctrine, as follows: "the transition from the "common market" to "the internal market" is not a mere terminological change. As it also results from the Commission White Paper of 1985, it was an ambitious objective, the completion of which involved the adoption of 310 directives to approximate the laws of [the Member States]"[16]. Regulatory developments have been so conspicuous that, over time, a genuine European Union customs law has emerged, which is based on the 1993 Community Customs Code, which has produced legal effects, in terms of rights and obligations, from January 1st, 1994 as a generally accepted rule for the entire customs territory of the European Union.

3. Current grounds for the prohibition of customs duties and charges having equivalent effect, between Member States

The primary and fundamental element of the matter is art. 28-37 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU)[17].

From the very beginning, art. 28 par. (1) TFEU states that the Union, this time as subject of international law, on the basis of the legal personality acquired under Art. 47 of the Treaty on European Union (TEU), "is made up of a customs union which regulates the entire trade of goods and which involves a prohibition between Member States of customs duties on imports and exports and any charges having equivalent effect, such as the adoption of a common customs tariff in relations with third countries".

Par. (2) of the same art. 28 TFEU states that "the provisions (...) shall apply to products originating in the Member States as well as to products coming from third countries which are in free circulation in the Member States".

---

[8] Dan Drosu Şaguna, Mihail Romeo Nicolescu, Societăţi Comerciale Europene, Oscar Print Publishing House, Bucharest, 1995, p. 15.
[9] Idem.
[10] Idem.
[11] Jacques Pelkmars, Integrare europeană. Metode şi analiză economică, second edition, IER, R.A. Official Gazette, Bucharest, 2003, p. 7.
[12] Idem.
[13] Idem.
[14] Concerning the concept of public authority into national law, see Elena-Emilia Ştefan, Disputed matters on the concept of public authority, LESIJ no.1/2015, pp. 132-139.
[15] Steven P. McGiffen, Uniunea Europeană. Ghid critic, New Edition, R.A. Monitorul Oficial Publishing House, Bucharest, 2007, p. 76-77.
[16] Sergiu Deleanu, Drept comunitar al afacerilor, Servo-Sat Publishing House, Arad, 2002, p. 9.
[17] For more information on the legal basis, see Mihaela-Augustina Dumitraşcu (coord.), Legislaţia privind libertăţile de circulaţie în Uniunea Europeană, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, in particular Fişă sintetică, pag. 1-8.

With value of interpreting the provisions of art. 28 par. (2) of the TFEU, the following article (Article 29 TFEU) is added: "Products originating in third countries for which import formalities have been completed are considered to be in free circulation in a Member State and for which the customs duties and charges having equivalent effect which were due and which did not benefit from a full or partial refund of those taxes and charges were levied in that Member State".

The European Union legislature expresses unequivocally, in Art. 30 TFEU which provides that "customs duties on imports and exports or charges having equivalent effect shall be prohibited between Member States". The article invoked "concerns any kind of customs duties or charges having equivalent effect, irrespective of whether they relate to imports or exports, without making any distinction according to the time when those taxes are levied"[18]. According to the doctrine[19], the prohibition referring to customs duties on imports and exports or on charges having equivalent effect "also applies to customs duties of fiscal nature".

By analyzing, conceptually, from the fund perspective, we find the fact that customs duties and charges having equivalent effect are "the most often used ways to obstruct the free movement of goods. These forms of protectionism are reflected in the increase in prices of imported goods compared to domestic similar products, thus favouring domestic products. The removal of such taxes is particularly important for the idea of a customs union and the single market, as the European Commission emphasizes in its policy on customs strategy[20]: the Customs Union is at the heart of the European Union and is an essential element in the functioning of the Single Market, a market which can only function normally when properly applying common rules at its external borders. This implies that the 28 customs administrations of the European Union must act[21] as if they were one"[22].

For a proper understanding, we distinguish in our research, between customs duties, charges which do not involve too much documentation, unlike charges having equivalent effect, which make it necessary to resort to the case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union[23] (CJEU). Thus, customs duties, in the strict sense of the word, "are one of the oldest forms of protection of national trade, until it has had a deterrent effect on trade. It was estimated that around the 18th century there were about 1,800 customs frontiers on the territory of today's Germany. Merchants who wanted to transport goods along the Rhine, from Strasbourg to the Dutch border, had to pay 30 charges"[24].

The legislator of the European Economic Community directly banned customs duties by sanctioning the violation of such permissive conduct for the development of trade by banning barriers to it, tax barriers[25] and not only. From a conceptual point of view, customs duties are indirect taxes which the State levies on goods when they cross the frontier of a country for import, export or transit[26]. In other words, customs duties are financial burdens affecting goods crossing a border. At European Union level, this type of tax applies to goods coming from third countries and not to exports or imports between Member States of the Union.

"The concept of charges having equivalent effect comprises all pecuniary taxes other than customs duties in the strict sense, imposed on goods which are in free circulation in the Community, by crossing borders between States and which are not permitted under the specific rules of the Treaty"[27]. This is the definition established in the doctrine of the field, with references to the jurisprudence of the matter[28], in the 1962s. Later in 1976, another case, Bauhuis[29], is likely to complete the above definition of charges having equivalent effect. In this case, "the Court has held that any monetary charge, whatever the destination and manner of its application, unilaterally imposed on goods on the ground that they cross a border (but not crossing the border) and which are not customs duties, strictly speaking, constitutes a charge having equivalent effect in the case where it is not linked to a general system of systematic internal taxation applied according to the same criteria and the same stages in the marketing of [18] Paul Craig, Grainne de Búrca, Dreptul Uniunii Europene. Comentarii, jurisprudență și doctrină, 6th edition, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, p. 715.

[19] Idem.

[20] http://ec.europa.eu/taxation_customs/customs/policy_issues/customs_strategy/index_fr.htm.

[21] Idem.

[22] Roxana-Mariana Popescu, Influența jurisprudenței Curții de Justiție de la Luxemburg asupra dreptului Uniunii Europene – studiu de caz: noțiunea de „taxă cu efect echivalent taxelor vamale, Public Law Review, no. 4/2013, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, p. 73.

[23] On the role of the EU Court of Justice jurisprudence in the development of EU law, see Mihaela-Augustina Dumitrașcu, Dreptul Uniunii Europene și specificitatea acestuia, second edition, revised and enlarged, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, pp. 182- 188; Laura-Cristiana Spătaru-Negura, Dreptul Uniunii Europene – o nouă tipologie juridic, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, pp. 156-165; Roxana-Mariana Popescu, Introducere în dreptul Uniunii Europene, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011, pp. 96-98.

[24] Walter Cains, Introducere în legislația Uniunii Europene, Universal Dalsi Publishing House, Bucharest, 2001, p. 163.

[25] "In tax matters, the unanimity rule of decision-making prevented the harmonisation of the laws inthe Member States of the European Union, the States not being willing to cede their sovereignty in this matter" –Viorel Roș, Drept financiar și fiscal, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p. 57.

[26] Aurel Teodor Moldovan, Drept vamal, C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2006, p. 118.

[27] Walter Cairs, op.cit., p. 166.

[28] Judgment Commission of the European Economic Community v. the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg and the Kingdom of Belgium, Joined cases 2-3 / 62, ECLI:EU:C:1962:45.

[29] Judgment in W.J.G. Bauhuis v. The Netherlands, 46/76, ECLI:EU:C:1977:6.

similar domestic products"[30]. There has been a very rich jurisprudence in the field, according to the doctrine of the field[31], even since the 1990s[32].

Of particular importance are also the problems concerning the avoidance of confusion between taxes with equivalent effect (forbidden) and other (permitted) taxes, such as the following types of taxes: internal taxes; the fees charged for services rendered to economic agents and the fees charged under provisions of European Union law.

What happens if these fees have been collected in breach of the provisions of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union? Naturally, there is a sanction that, in terms of finality, leads to their recovery and return to those from whom they have been unlawfully received, including through the initiation and conduct of an infringement proceeding against States that are guilty of breaches of the European Union law, in the light of their obligations.

4. Conclusions

Concluding, we appreciate that the regime of customs duties and charges having equivalent effect in the European Union is of particular interest, recording significant developments that are likely to strengthen relations between Member States as subjects of international law, but also between individuals (individuals and legal entities) as genuine beneficiaries of all the freedoms of movement, taken as a whole.

References

- Bârsan, Maria, Integrarea economică europeană, vol. I – Introducere în teorie și practică, Carpatica Publishing House, Cluj-Napoca, 1995
- Cains, Walter, Introducere în legislația Uniunii Europene, Universal Dalsi Publishing House, Bucharest, 2001
- Craig, Paul; de Búrca, Grainne, Dreptul Uniunii Europene. Comentarii, jurisprudență și doctrină, 6th edition, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017
- Deleanu, Sergiu, Drept comunitar al afacerilor, Servo-Sat Publishing House, Arad, 2002
- Dumitrașcu, Mihaela-Augustina, Dreptul Uniunii Europene și specificitatea acestuia, second edition, revised and enlarged, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015
- Dumitrașcu, Mihaela-Augustina (coord.), Legislația privind libertățile de circulație în Uniunea Europeană, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015
- Fuerea, Augustin, Dreptul Uniunii Europene – principii, acțiuni, libertăți, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016
- Jacques Pelkmars, Integrare europeană. Metode și analiză economică, second edition, IER, R.A. Official Gazette, Bucharest, 2003
- McGiffen, Steven P., Uniunea Europeană. Ghid critic, New Edition, R.A. Monitorul Oficial Publishing House, Bucharest, 2007
- Moldovan, Aurel Teodor, Drept vamal, C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2006
- Popescu, Andrei, Reglementări ale relațiilor de muncă – practică europeană, under the aegis of the Legislative Council, Tribuna Economică Publishing House, Bucharest, 1998
- Popescu, Roxana-Mariana, Influența jurisprudenței Curții de Justiție de la Luxemburg asupra dreptului Uniunii Europene – studiu de caz: noțiunea de „taxă cu efect echivalent taxelor vamale, Public Law Review, no. 4/2013, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest
- Popescu, Roxana-Mariana, Introducere în dreptul Uniunii Europene, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011
- Roș, Viorel, Drept financiar și fiscal, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016
- Spătaru-Negură, Laura-Cristiana, Dreptul Uniunii Europene – o nouă tipologie juridic, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016
- Șaguna, Dan Drosu; Nicolescu, Mihail Romeo, Societăți Comerciale Europene, Oscar Print Publishing House, Bucharest, 1995
- Ștefan, Elena-Emilia, Disputed matters on the concept of public authority, LESIJ no.1/2015
- Tănăsie, Petre, România, globalizarea și cerințele regândirii guvernării globale. Oportunități și vulnerabilitate, in Studii Juridices, "N. Titulescu" University of Bucharest, Economic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2001;
- Zorgbibe, Charles, Construcția europeană. Trecut, prezent, viitor, Trei Publishing House, Bucharest, 1998;
- Judgement Kapniki Michaïlidis AE v. Idryma Koinonikon Asfaliseon (IKA), Joined Cases C-441 and 442/98, ECLI:EU:C:2000:479
- Judgment in W.J.G. Bauhuis v. The Netherlands, 46/76, ECLI:EU:C:1977:6
- Judgment of the Commission of the European Economic Community against the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg and the Kingdom of Belgium, Joined cases 2-3/62, ECLI:EU:C:1962:45
- http://ec.europa.eu/taxation_customs/customs/policy_issues/customs_strategy/index_fr.htm

[30] Walter Cairs, op.cit., p. 166.
[31] Augustin Fuerea, Dreptul Uniunii Europene – principii, acțiuni, libertăți, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, pp. 161-170.
[32] Judgement Kapniki Michaïlidis AE v. Idryma Koinonikon Asfaliseon (IKA), Joined Cases C-441 and 442/98, ECLI:EU:C:2000:479.

THE LEGAL, SOCIAL AND RELIGIOUS DIMENSION OF THE CONCEPT OF EUTHANASIA

Maria-Irina GRIGORE-RĂDULESCU[*]
Corina Florenţa POPESCU[]

Abstract

If the right to life of the human being is consecrated, guaranteed, promoted and unanimously recognized as a subjective right of a general nature, the right to assisted death can be understood by reference to the individual seeking support for the application of certain euthanasia procedures, resulting in his physics disappearance. Considering the legal challenge to the regulation of euthanasia and its social and, above all, religious implications, we consider it relevant to analyze the arguments specific to each direction of approach in order to converge the adopted solutions. Taking into account the definition of euthanasia accepted unanimously and covering the relevant cases, we consider necessary the distinction between euthanasia and the like, in order to determine the limits of the euthanasia cases, a criterion for their identification and the correctness of the use of such criterion. The supporters of euthanasia invoke Cicero's argument that a good death is the ideal way to respect the law of nature, leaving the world in peace and dignity, and the opponents base their argumentation on religious and ethical principles regarding the sacredness of life, and find that the legalization of euthanasia contributes to hurry the deaths of some people, sometimes even against their will.

Keywords: euthanasia, right to life, dignity, the right to assisted death.

1. The historical evolution of the concept of euthanasia

In the ancient Greek language, „eu" means „good, harmonious", and „thanatos" means „death", so, as shown by Francis Bacon, the word „euthanasia" signifies „a good, peaceful, happy death".

In ancient Rome, the Law of the XII Tables[1] regulated the killing of children born with malformations right after their birth, and in Sparta, according to the notes of the Greek historian Plutarch in his work „Parallel Lives", „children that were not healthy and vigorous, crooked children" were thrown off a cliff of Taiget mountain.

Euthanasia was also used by the Roman emperor Publius Aelius Hadrianus (76-138 A.D.), who asked the physician Hermogenes to end his suffering by quickening his death, but the doctor „found the way to remain true to his professional oath, without refusing him"[2].

Although determined by the religious influences and by the limited medical knowledge of the time, ancient medicine, by its representatives, tried to defeat the disease, but the ill person in terminal stage was left to die, adopting an attitude of resignation before death and of recognition of the higher force of destiny. Hippocrates himself (460-377 B.C.), believed to be the greatest doctor of the Antiquity, mentioned, in his book called „About Art", that medicine „means to relieve the pain of the ill person, reduce the violence of his disease and refuse to care for those enslaved by their disease, understanding that, in such cases, medicine is powerless", but his oath forbade to terminate a life by the wording „I will not give poison to anyone, even if he asks for it, and I will not encourage him to take such substances".

The Middle Ages bring a new approach to life, and, implicitly, to the concept of euthanasia. The sacredness of life, claimed by the Christian, Judaic and Islamic religions, which believe that human life has divine origins, condemned euthanasia of any kind, although death received a new symbolic significance, representing the transition to a new world.

Attempts of legal regulation of euthanasia appear in the beginning of the XX century, when the first great controversies related to this subject appear in Germany, England and USA; but euthanasia practiced in the Nazi Germany has been and still is condemned throughout the world and under all aspects, respectively moral, legal, medical, theological and philosophical.

In the Declaration on Euthanasia of the Congregation for the Doctrine of Faith of 1980, there was a firm and categorical insistence on the fact that „nothing and no one may authorize the killing of an innocent human being, be it a fetus, embryo, child or adult, old, suffering from an incurable illness or in agony. Moreover, no one can demand this homicide gesture for himself or for another person that he is responsible for, nor can he consent to this explicitly or implicitly. No authority is able to order it legitimately, nor allow it. As this is a violation of the divine law, an

[*] Lecturer PhD, Faculty of Law, Ecologic University of Bucharest (e-mail: radulescuirinaro@yahoo.com);
[] Lecturer PhD, Faculty of Law, Ecologic University of Bucharest (e-mail: coripopescu@yahoo.com);
[1] Andreea Rîpeanu, Roman Law, (Bucharest: Cermaprint Publishing House, 2017), 24-26.
[2] Almoş Bela Trif, Vasile Astărăstoae, Liviu Cocora, Euthanasia, Assisted Suicide, Eugenia, Pro Verus Contra, Great Dilemmas of Humanity, (Bucharest: InfoMedica Publishing House, 2002), 3.

offense against the dignity of the human person, a crime against life, an attack against humanity". However, the declaration contains a sentence that is favorable to the use of painkillers to relieve pain and to the right to refuse the extraordinary measures of life support.

Similar to the position of the Catholic Church, the Orthodox Church was also against euthanasia, claiming both theological arguments, and medical arguments. Thus, euthanasia interrupts the ascending evolution from face to resemblance, symbolizing the effort of the human being, who receives the face of God by the act of creation, to achieve the resemblance to God, as „Love bears all things, believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things."[3]. The acceptance of the suffering that precedes death, of the cross before death is redeeming, and patience is a virtue that brings salvation in the latest hour, as „he who endures to the end shall be saved"[4]. The medical bioethics itself is against euthanasia, considering it contrary to the medical ethics, because the doctor has the moral and professional duty to fight for the patients' life, not to end it[5], invoking the legal interpretations of human rights against euthanasia, according to which „the right to life does not imply the right to death[6]."

The medically assisted suicide is legal in Belgium, Luxemburg, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Spain, Japan, Australia, Cambodia, Columbia, Canada, as well as in five American states – California, Montana, Oregon, Washington and Vermont. In Romania, according to art. 190 – The homicide committed on the victim's request, mentioned in the Criminal Code, „The homicide committed on the explicit, serious, conscious and repeated request of the victim suffering from an incurable disease or from a serious impairment, medically certified, causing permanent suffering that is difficult to bear, is punished by imprisonment from 1 to 5 years". At the same time, in article 22 of the Medical Deontology Code of the College of Physicians, euthanasia is believed to be one of the acts that are contrary to the fundamental principles of practicing the profession of doctor.

2. Conceptual clarifications and delimitations

A unanimously accepted definition of euthanasia is impossible, since the precise basis of these definitions consists in strong moral convictions, however contradictory; if those who are for euthanasia see it as a release or aid granted to persons to be able to die with dignity, those who oppose euthanasia qualify it as murder or as suppression of life.

The explicative dictionary of Romanian language proposes two definitions for euthanasia, respectively „painless death" and „method to cause an early, painless death, by doctors, to a person suffering from an incurable illness, to put an end to his hard or extended suffering".

In one definition, euthanasia is believed to be an action or a lack of action by which a health professional or a person close to the individual suffering from an incurable illness, deliberately causes the patient's death, out of the wish to put an end to his life marked by suffering[7].

According to another definition, euthanasia would represent a totality of medical actions or lack of actions with ethical-legal support and in a patient's interest, shortening the suffering of an ill person who is currently not benefiting from an etiological treatment, in terms of medical science, on the contrary, for whom the prognosis is a close and unavoidable end"[8]. In other words, euthanasia is an act of assisting in the suppression of one person's life in circumstances that are medically justified[9].

Essentially, euthanasia consists in the action of painless suppression of the life of a person whose hard and extended suffering is believed to be irretrievable, willingly prejudicing the right to life[10].

Considering the fact that euthanasia has benefited from various classifications, in order to systemize the types of euthanasia, two criteria are important, respectively the personal will of the sick person[11] and the doctor's action[12], however, regardless of the type of euthanasia, one must avoid creating confusion between rights and liberties, namely that, from the philosophical-spiritual point of view, the human being

[3] I. Cor. 13:7.

[4] Mt. 10:22.

[5] For these purposes, Pavel Chirilă, „Bioethics and Human Rights", in Nicolae Răzvan Stan (editor), The Orthodox Church and Human Rights (Bucharest: Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2010), 269.

[6] Jean-Francois Renucci, Treaty of Human Right European Law, (Bucharest: Hamangiu Publishing House, 2009)111; Victor Duculescu, Legal Protection of Human Rights, (Bucharest: Hamangiu Publishing House, 2008), 315.

[7] Laura Macarovschi, Oana Mihaela Vișan, International Protection of Civil and Political Rights, (Bucharest: Sintech Publishing House, 2014), 108.

[8] Almoș Bela Trif, Vasile Astărăstoae, Liviu Cocora, Euthanasia, Assisted Suicide, Eugenia, Pro Verus Contra, Great Dilemmas of Humanity, 73.

[9] Alexandru Boroi, Crimes Against Life, (Bucharest: Naţional Publishing House, 1996), 39.

[10] Nicolae Purdă, Nicoleta Diaconu, Legal Protection of Human Rights, Edition II, reviewed and completed, (Bucharest: Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2011), 185.

[11] In relation to the personal will of the ill person, euthanasia may be volitional (when the patient, fully aware, decides to terminate his life), involuntary (when the patient has not been consulted in relation to the termination of his life, although he has the capacity to decide, or if he previously declared that he refuses euthanasia) and non-volitional (when the life of an ill person is terminated, because said person can no longer decide for himself whether to live or die, because of his mental or physical condition).

[12] In relation to the doctor's action, euthanasia may be active (when death occurs deliberately and actively, by positive means) and passive (when death is caused deliberately by abstention from or interruption of current measures of treatment or of feeding).

is free to end his life when he deems fit, but the right to proceed accordingly does not exist legally, ethically or socially.

By reference to freedom, one of the greatest fundamental values of mankind, marking its historical course and evolution and placing our analysis in a philosophical frame, the man's choice of life or of death is the expression of manifestation of his own freedom of thinking and the result of an individual decision, or, as the German philosopher, Martin Heidegger, appreciated, as representative of the existentialist conception, in mid-20th century, the decision of the human being to end his life is an act of supreme freedom. From this point of view, of the abstract man and of freedom as general value, one may begin to agree with the social, institutionalized acceptance of assisted death.

From another point of view, of the Dutch philosopher Baruch Spinoza, who defined freedom as an „understood necessity", man is a free being not when he does what he wants or what he desires, but when he understands and becomes aware of the major objective needs of his social environment and of the environment of the era when he lives, proving himself responsible. Consequently, the acceptance of the decision to die is grounded on a strictly personal responsibility and may be made by any human being, without however calling upon other persons to bear witness to his disappearance.

3. Legal and case-law framework in terms of euthanasia

Moving on to the legal frame, most states of the world establish, defend and guarantee by law the right to life, and reject, implicitly, the recognition of the right to assisted death.

At international level, in article 3 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights[13], it is stipulated that „Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person", and in article 6(1) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights[14], it is stipulated that „ Every human being has the inherent right to life. This right shall be protected by law. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his life".

In articles 2, 3, 7 and 8 of the European Convention of Human Rights, are regulated: the people's right to life, the right to health, the prohibition of torture and of inhuman or degrading treatments, as well as the respect for private life.

Considering the requests filed to the European Court of Human Rights by citizens of certain states, by which they requested support to enable their own death, as the law of their country prohibited euthanasia[15], the Council of Europe adopted the Recommendation no. 1419/1999, arguing its position against euthanasia by the fact that the right to life is guaranteed on the grounds of article 2 of the European Convention of Human Rights, and the states have the obligation to protect their own citizens, to refuse their intentional death, „regardless of their reasons and of the desire to die, expressed by an incurable sick person or by a dying person, this is no legal justification for actions destined to cause death and does not constitute a legal ground to cause the death of another person".

In support of its position, the European Court of Human Rights has held the fact that the text of article 2 is not capable to create a right to self-determination, based on which one may have the possibility to choose between life and death, and it does not give the individual the right to ask the state to allow him or to facilitate his death[16].

Art. 2 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union regulates the right to life: „ Everyone has the right to life. No one shall be condemned to the death penalty, or executed", appreciating that, as long as individuals that represent a serious social danger are not and cannot be convicted by the national law of the states to physical suppression, even more so the persons wishing to die cannot be granted the wish to commit suicide.

The European Convention for the protection of human rights and of dignity of the human being with regard to the application of biology and medicine[17] aims at protecting the human being and guarantees to any person, without discrimination, the respect of its integrity and of the other fundamental rights and freedoms with regard to the application of biology and medicine by the parties to this convention. In art. 1 para. (2) of the Convention, it is shown that every signing State adopts in its domestic legislation the necessary measures to give effect to the provisions of the Convention, and art. 27 stipulates that none of the provisions of this Convention "shall be interpreted as limiting or otherwise affecting the possibility for a Party to grant a wider measure of protection with regard to the application of biology and medicine than is stipulated in this Convention".

In Chapter II of the Constitution of Romania, the fundamental Rights and Freedoms are provided, and, according to art. 22 para. (1): „The right to life, as well as the right to physical and mental integrity of person

[13] Corina Florenţa Popescu, Maria-Irina Grigore-Rădulescu, Legal Protection of Human Rights, (Bucharest: Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2014), 54-55.

[14] Raluca Miga-Beşteliu, Catrinel Brumar, International Protection of Human Rights, Lecture Notes, V edition, (Bucharest: Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2010), 43; Corina Florenţa Popescu, Maria-Irina Grigore-Rădulescu, Legal Protection of Human Rights, 56.

[15] Cristina Otovescu-Frăsie, Andreea Băndoi, „Respect of the right to life versus euthanasia", The Romanian Magazine of Bioethics, Vol. 7, No. 2, (April – June 2009): 13.

[16] By decision Prettyc. United Kingdom of April 29, 2002, CEDO believed that the prohibition of euthanasia did not constitute a violation of the right to life, refusing to acknowledge the person's right to die.

[17] Corina Florenţa Popescu, Maria-Irina Grigore-Rădulescu, Legal Protection of Human Rights, 66.

are guaranteed". In developing the constitutional provisions, the New Criminal Code, in its special part, regulates crimes against persons, as well as crimes against life, body integrity and health.

As previously shown, in the category of crimes against life, art. 190 of the Criminal Code incriminates the homicide on the victim's request, a crime that does not exist in the Criminal Code of 1969. Although, according to art. 26 para. (2) of the Constitution of Romania, reviewed, „any natural person has the right to freely dispose of himself", the homicide on the victim's request or the active euthanasia has been incriminated, because the right to dispose of another person's life does not exist, even though said person may demand such a solution explicitly, seriously, consciously and repeatedly, due to his suffering. Art. 190 of the Criminal Code considers the case of a person suffering from an incurable disease or from a serious impairment, who asks for the termination of his life in order to put an end to unbearable sufferings that he must endure and who no longer hopes in the possibility to get better or to heal his impairment[18].

The existence of union legal regulations and of the case-law of ECHR have not prevented the differentiated reflection of euthanasia in the frame of national laws of the European States, a fact determined by the different legal thinking and by the manifested religious influences.

In those States where euthanasia is forbidden by legal regulations, the ill persons and their families addressed the justice to end their suffering or the suffering of family members.

Thus, in France, president Jacques Chirac rejected, in 2003, the euthanasia request filed by Mrs. Marie Humbert's son, Vincent Humbert, aged 21, but the mother gave her son a lethal dose of barbiturates.

In 2008, Remy Salvat, aged 26, suffering from a very rare degenerative malady, addressed the French president, Nicolas Sarkozy, the request to allow him to die with dignity, but, following the president's refusal, the young man committed suicide in August.

In UK, the supreme court, in 1993, made a favorable decision and admitted the petition filed by the parents of Anthony Bland, aged 17, allowing the doctors from NHS hospital to unplug his machines, because, in 1989, following the collapse of a tribune of the Sheffield stadium, Anthony had suffered serious cerebral lesions.

Also in UK, the justice was on the side of young Hannah Jones, aged 13, suffering from a serious heart disease for more than eight years, because of which she had spent very much time in hospitals and had been submitted to multiple surgical interventions. Thus, scheduled for a heart transplant, the little girls refused, stating that she could no longer endure new surgeries and pain and claiming that she no longer wished to stay in hospital and be consulted by doctors.

In Romania as well, Eugen Constantin Anghel, aged 28, suffering from cirrhosis, esophageal varices, umbilical and inguinal hernia and hepatic encephalopathy, asked president Traian Băsescu, by a letter addressed to him, to be allowed to undergo euthanasia, but the answer was negative.

4. Conclusions

The moral convictions, the medical and legal arguments, the theological and religious points of view represent enough reasons to make it impossible to establish the uniformity of legal solutions concerning euthanasia, as no regulation, no matter how comprehensive it is, is able to provide an answer to the multitude and variety of human and clinical situations. However, the remarkable evolution of medical technologies and techniques, doubled by a change of the individual and collective vision of death and agony, contributes to a new reflection of euthanasia in the system of values and of social institutions.

References

- Boroi Alexandru, Crimes Against Life, Bucharest: Național Publishing House, 1996
- Chirilă Pavel, „Bioethics and Human Rights", in Nicolae Răzvan Stan (editor), The Orthodox Church and Human Rights, Bucharest: Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2010
- Duculescu Victor, Legal Protection and Human Rights, Bucharest: Lumina Lex Publishing House, 2008
- Macarovschi Laura, Vișan Oana Mihaela, International Protection of Civil and Political Rights, Craiova: Sintech Publishing House, 2014
- Miga-Beșliu Raluca, Brumar Catrinel, International Protection of Human Rights, Lecture Notes, edition V, Bucharest: Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2010
- Otovescu-Frăsie Cristina, Băndoiu Andreea, „Respect of the right to life versus euthanasia", Romanian Magazine of Bioethics, Vol. 7, No. 2 (April – June 2009)
- Popescu Corina Florența, Grigore-Rădulescu Maria-Irina, Legal Protection of Human Rights, Academic Lecture, Bucharest: Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2014
- Renucci Jean-Francois, Human Right European Law Treaty, Bucharest: Hamangiu Publishing House, 2009
- Rîpeanu Andreea, Roman Law, Bucharest: Cermaprint Publishing House, 2017
- Toader Tudorel and others, New Criminal Code, Bucharest: Hamangiu Publishing House, 2014

[18] Tudorel Toder and others, New Criminal Code, (Bucharest: Hamangiu Publishing House, 2014).

SHANG YANG 商鞅 AND LEGALIST 法家 REFORM IN THE ANCIENT CHINESE STATE OF QIN 秦

Daniel HAITAS*

Abstract

Legalism has played a major role in the history of the Chinese legal and governmental tradition. One of the major exponents and formulators of this school of thought in ancient times was Shang Yang, an official in the state of Qin. Shang Yang oversaw a program of law reform in Qin in such areas as criminal law and the economic life of the country which aimed to strengthen the power of the state. This can be said to have had long term consequences for both Chinese and world history, in that the strengthening and reorganization of Qin along the lines of Legalist principles helped lead to its gaining preeminence amongst the other states vying for influence in the Warring States period, ultimately leading to the unification of China under the rule of the Qin dynasty.

Keywords: Shang Yang, Legalism, law reform, Qin state, criminal law, economic regulation.

1. Introduction

Throughout much of the history of the Chinese legal and governmental tradition, two different schools of thought have been portrayed as competing and coexisting at the same time; these are the Legalists 法家 and the Confucians 儒家[1]. Both sought to maintain social order, yet differed in the primary methods through which they sought to achieve this end[2]. The Legalists generally believed in increasing the power of the ruler through written laws that would strengthen the power of the state[3], while the Confucians, whose beliefs are seen as a manifestation of feudal and traditional Chinese values[4], placed more emphasis upon the idea that the ruler had to support and adhere to a certain moralistic order, which involved following proper rules of proprietary and behaviour.[5] An important member of the Legalist school was Shang Yang, an official in the state of Qin during the fourth century B.C.[6] Two areas in which he had a particularly strong influence were criminal law and in regulation of the economic life of the state. These shall be examined in this study, as well the general legal and governmental philosophy which inspired Shang Yang's reform program. As shall be seen, Shang Yang advocated a system of strong centralized rule and the promulgation of written laws that would be known among the general population, which included a system of strict punishments to be applied equally to all. Additionally, he implemented reforms that favoured agriculture at the expense of commerce.

This study particularly draws on the Book of Lord Shang 商君書, the earliest surviving and foundational text of the Legalist school whose authorship is attributed to Shang Yang[7]. It has been noted that very few studies on the Book of Lord Shang have been done in European languages, and indeed, the only complete English translation of the book was made by Jan J.L Duyvendak in 1928[8]. Thus, it is hoped that the present work may contribute to increasing knowledge of this vital part of the Chinese legal and governmental history. Indeed, this is a topic that goes beyond the interest of just antiquarians; the issue of Legalist and Confucian thinking, and their respective places in Chinese society, are still being debated even today in modern China.[9] As a result, an accurate study and assessment of the past may furnish insights and instruction for issues being faced today. Such a study is also of interest more broadly, offering insights into the nature of law generally, its origins, uses, and purpose.

* Lecturer, PhD candidate, Faculty of Law, University of Debrecen (e-mail: danielhaitas@gmail.com)

[1] Xin Ren: Tradition of the Law and the Law of the Tradition: Law, State, and Social Control in China, Greenwood Press, Conneticut, 1997, 19.

[2] T'ung-Tsu Chu: Law and Society in Traditional China, Mouton, Paris, 1961, 226.

[3] Yongping Liu:, Origins of Chinese Law: Penal and Administrative Law in its Early Development, Oxford University Press, Oxford, 1998, 173.

[4] Zhengyuan Fu: Autocratic Tradition and Chinese Politics, Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1993 30.

[5] Ren op. cit. 19.

[6] Herrlee G. Creel: Chinese Though from Confucius to Mao Tse-tung, 1953, 141.

[7] There is scholarly debate about the actual authorship of this book; however, the work is accepted by most scholars as containing the basic ideas of Shang Yang's thinking (see Liu op. cit. 175) and as containing parts composed either by himself or his immediate followers, and thus the work has been described as expressing his "intellectual current" (see Yuri Pines: Legalism in Chinese Philosophy. In Edward N. Zalta (ed.): The Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy, Winter 2014 edition, https://plato.stanford.edu/archives/win2014/entries/chinese-legalism/) and so, the work shall be used as if expressing his thoughts and opinions.

[8] Yuri Pines and Carine Defoort: Chinese Academic Views on Shang Yang Since the Open-Up-and-Reform Era, Contemporary Chinese Thought, Vol. 47, No. 2, 2016, 59.

[9] See, for example, Ren op. cit. 32.

2. Shang Yang's Background and Philosophy

Shang Yang, who lived during the fourth century B.C., had originally served as an official in the state of Wei 魏.[10] We are told that "In his youth, he was fond of the study of criminal law."[11] He had heard that Duke Xiao of Qin 秦孝公 was seeking capable men to help him strengthen his state and increase his military power[12]. Shang Yang went to Qin, and soon found favour with the duke[13], eventually being appointed to the office of Minister in 357 B.C.[14] As a result of the work that he undertook in Qin, Shang Yang has come to be intimately connected with the rise of the Qin state in the Chinese political landscape[15].

The Zhou dynasty 周朝, which nominally ruled China at the time of Shang Yang, had established itself in 1122 B.C.[16] The nature of Zhou rule in China was essentially feudal, with various vassals and lords being nominally under the jurisdiction of the Zhou king; in time, especially during the Eastern Zhou period (771-249 B.C), these vassals came to gain a great deal of independence in their respective regions, even coming to challenge the authority of the Zhou king, which eventually led to a decline in the strength of the central authority.[17] This led to the Warring States period, which has been described as a 'war against all' amongst the various strong states of China, who sought to spread their influence and territory at the expense of one another.[18] One of these was the state of Qin, located in China's West[19].

In order to properly comprehend the significance and meaning of Shang Yang's Legalist philosophy and his criminal law reforms, it is important to understand something of the traditional values that underlined the political and social structure of Zhou China. It was during the Zhou period that various important developments in Chinese civilisation took place; this included the development of the feudal system, and the various beliefs and customs that were connected to this system[20]. One of the most important concepts that developed during this period was that of li 禮[21]. Li, which was believed to be the most important factor in governing society, was a body of approved behaviour patterns governing the interaction between individuals in society[22]. It can be said to have captured the spirit of the feudal era, containing within it the relational and hierarchic quality that existed within the political and social structure of feudal China under the Zhou dynasty[23].

Central to the concept of li was social interaction and relationships; these rules governing relations between members of society were strongly connected to one's social status, and varied according to the status of the individual and the specific dynamics and nature of the relationship[24]. In addition to this, family relationships were considered to be the foundation of human society[25]; Confucius 孔子 himself had said, 'When a gentleman feels profound affection for his parents, the common people will be stirred to benevolence. When he does not forget friends of long standing, the common people will not shirk their obligations to other people[26].'

The Zhou king was bound to uphold the traditional li, with all its rules of proprietary and right behaviour, having to maintain and honour the immemorial customs that had been handed down from ancient times[27]. The empire was to be ruled by natural law, which was a standard held to be sufficient for all public and private activity; moral virtue, which was considered to be inherent within man, was supposed to be the ultimate basis of conduct in every aspect of society[28]. This social and political system, led by the king, the Son of Heaven, was bound to follow the law of Heaven[29]. Confucian thought always emphasised the importance of li and considered it to be the primary regulations or 'rules' in governing a society[30]. Confucius had said, 'For giving security to superiors and good government of the people, there is nothing

[10] Creel op. cit. 141.
[11] The Biography of the Lord of Shang in the Shih-Chi. In: The Book of Lord Shang: A Classic of The Chinese School of Law, Arthur Probsthain, London, 1928 8.
[12] Creel op. cit. 142.
[13] Ibid.
[14] Liu op. cit. 175.
[15] J.J.L Duyvendak, Introduction. In: The Book of Lord Shang: A Classic of The Chinese School of Law, Arthur Probsthain, London, 1928, 1.
[16] Fu op. cit. 17.
[17] Ibid 17-18.
[18] Ibid 18.
[19] Robin D. S Yates: The Rise of Qin and the Military Conquest of the Warring States. In Jane Portal (ed.), The First Emperor: China's Terracota Army, London, British Museum Press, 2007, 30.
[20] N. & V. Rajendra - C. Lower: A History of Asia, Melbourne, Longman Cheshire, 1992, 121.
[21] Roberto Mangabeira Unger: Law in Modern Society: Toward a Criticism of Social Theory, Free Press, 1976 93.
[22] Chu op. cit. 230-1.
[23] Unger op. cit. 93.
[24] Chu op. cit. 231.
[25] Ibid 244.
[26] Confucius: The Analects, trans. D.C. Lau, Penguin Classics, London, 1979, Book VIII:2 92.
[27] J.J.L Duyvendak op. cit. 77.
[28] Ibid 78.
[29] Ibid 78.
[30] Chu op. cit. 239-40.

more excellent than the rules of propriety [li] [31].' Shu-hsiang said '[Li] are the King's great canons[32].'

These abovementioned beliefs differ markedly from Shang Yang's legal philosophy. In order to properly understand the basic tenets of his beliefs, and the reforms that he subsequently implemented in the Qin state, his concept of the origin and nature of law must be examined. The Legalist school that Shang Yang belonged to can be said to have come into being during the time of the Spring and Autumn period, and coincided with the development of ideas that sought to elevate the position of the ruler[33]. Its central tenets began to develop more fully, however, during the Warring States period, which spanned the fourth and third centuries B.C[34]. One of these was the idea that the ruler should centralise all state power in his own hands, create written codes of law with which to govern the country fa 法, and rule the population through a bureaucratic system of government, making use of various officials in the handling of affairs[35].

The actual practice and development of Legalism took place mainly in the state of Qin, which was situated on the western frontier of Chinese civilisation[36]. It would appear from a survey of the history of the Qin state that it was an area conductive to the development of Legalist thinking and reform[37]. For example, in 513 B.C. tripods bearing various penal regulations were cast in Qin, which shows that by the Spring and Autumn periods the practice of relying on written laws had already come to exist in Qin[38]. It must also be said that the Qin state, due to its frontier location, had never been as saturated with Chou feudal customs as other parts of Qin[39]. For example the Confucian scholar Hsun Tzu said that Qin 'were less observant of the proper conduct between father and son and husband and wife than were the people of certain other parts of China, because they failed to follow the traditional rules of etiquette and the proper relationships[40].'

In order to understand properly the basic tenets of Lord Shang's philosophy, and as a result, the reforms that were subsequently implemented according to the spirit of his thinking, his concept of the origin of law must be examined, for it could be said to form the root from which all his other concepts grow.

In the Book of Lord Shang, Shang Yang states that:

Of old, in the times of the Great and Illustrious Ruler, people found their livelihood by cutting trees and slaying animals; the population was sparse and trees and animals numerous ... In the times of Shen-nung, men ploughed to obtain food, and men wove to obtain food, and women wove to obtain clothing. Without the application of punishments or governmental measures, order prevailed; ... After Shen-nung had died, the weak were conquered by force and the few oppressed the many. Therefore Huang-ti created the ideas of prince and minister, of superior and inferior, the rites between father and son, ... At home he applied sword and saw, and abroad he used mailed soldiers; this was because the times had changed ... Shen-nung is not higher than Huang-ti, but the reason that his name was honoured was because he suited his time.[41]

Here we see that Shang Yang held that during an earlier period of time society functioned without the need for any serious administrative measures; it could be said that society functioned almost naturally, without the need for complex laws. Yet in time, as society developed, and oppression increased, the need finally arose for a more interventionist form of government.

In one instance, when Duke Xiao was discussing policy with his three Great Officers, Kan Lung had warned the Duke against changing the law and customs of the Qin state, saying that 'I am afraid that the empire will criticise Your Highness and I wish that You would reflect maturity[42].' In response to this, Shang Yang said 'a wise man creates laws, but a foolish man is controlled by them; a man of talent reforms rites, but a worthless man is enslaved by them[43].' During this same audience, Tu Chih had said 'I have heard it said, that in taking antiquity as an example, one makes no mistakes, and in following established rites one commits no offence. Let Your Highness aim at that[44].' In response, Shang Yang stated that:

Former generations did not follow the same doctrines, so what antiquity should one imitate ... Wen-wang and Wu-wang both established laws in accordance with what was opportune and regulated laws in accordance with what was opportune and [31] Confucius, The Li Ki. In James Legge: The Texts of Confucianism, V, Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1885, 258, quoted in Ch'u op. cit. 239.

[32] Shu-hsiang: The Ch'un Ts'ew with the Tso Chuen. In James Legge (ed.): The Chinese Classics, V, Pt. II , Hong Kong, 1872, 660, quoted in Ch'u op. cit. 239.
[33] Kung-chuan Hsiao: A History of Chinese Political Thought: From the Beginnings to the Sixth Century A.D., Vol. I, Princeton University Press, 376.
[34] Liu op. cit. 173.
[35] Ibid.
[36] Creel op. cit. 138.
[37] Hsiao op. cit. 45.
[38] Ibid.
[39] Hucker op. cit. 41.
[40] Quoted in Leonard Cottrell: The Tiger of Ch'in: The Dramatic Emergence of China as a Nation, Rinehart and Winston, Holt, 1962, 116.
[41] Shang Yang: Translation of the Book of Lord Shang, trans. J.J. L Duyvendak, Arthur Probsthain, London, 1928, 284-5.
[42] Ibid 170.
[43] Ibid 171.
[44] Ibid 172.

regulated rites according to practical requirements … There is more than one way to govern the world and there is no necessity to imitate antiquity, in order to take appropriate measures for the state.[45]

Shang Yang clearly challenges the traditional Zhou notions with regard to custom and historical precedent, expounding a doctrine that would free a ruler from what some might be seen as the 'shackles of the past', giving them the ability to respond to the needs of the times.

As to Shang Yang's attitude with regards to the importance of written law and the administration of a society, he said 'Law is the authoritative force of the people, and the key to governing … Rule by law is fundamental to governing[46].' Elsewhere he said:

Of old, the one who could regulate the empire was he, who regarded as his first task the regulating of his own people … For the way, in which the conquering of the people is based upon the regulating of the people, is like the effect of smelting in regard to metal or the work of the potter in regard to clay; if the basis is not solid, then people are like flying birds or like animals. Who can regulate these? The basis of the people is the law. Therefore, a good ruler obstructed the people by the means of the law, and so his reputation and his territory flourished[47].

Here, Shang Yang's attitude differs from more feudal and Confucian notions of the importance of rule by certain moral standards that one exemplifies; instead, the ruler's authority is based upon the enforcement of regulations within a community. This idea of the ruler's authority being based on his power to create and enforce law must be borne in mind when looking at the reforms Shang Yang implemented in the Qin state.

3. Shang Yang and Criminal Law in Qin

Shang Yang implemented a range of reforms in Qin, which were known as a 'change of law' (bianfa) [48]. This process essentially aimed at increasing the power of the state, which involved the weakening of the feudal structure[49]. Shang Yang was aided in this endeavor by the Fa Jing ("Canon of Laws") 法經[50], which was a legal code put together around 400 B.C by Li Kui, which was made up of six parts[51].

An area that Shang Yang paid special attention to was criminal law, particularly the system of punishments. Shang Yang said that "nothing is more basic than for putting an end to crimes than the imposition of heavy penalties". Shang Yang espoused what appears to have been a novel concept at the time, which was that in the course of a criminal procedure, there was to be no distinction on the application of the law based upon social position[52]. He stated that:

What I mean by the unification of punishments is that punishments should know no degree or grade, but that from ministers of state and generals down to great officers and ordinary folk, whosoever does not obey the king's commands, violates the interdicts of the state, or rebels against statutes fixed by the ruler, should be guilty and not be pardoned. Merit acquired in the past should not cause a decrease in the punishment for demerit later, … If loyal ministers and filial sons do wrong, they should be judged according to the full measure of their guilt[53].

This is a concept very different from traditional feudal Chinese concepts, which considered such things as family relationship, individual merit, friendship, and social status in relation to the administration of justice and the way in which crimes were dealt with.[54] In fact, there had been a Confucian idea that "rules of ceremony do not go down to the common people. The penal statutes do not go up to great officers."[55] One of the aims of this equal application of the law to all levels of society was to maintain the general population's trust in the system of rule[56].

Shang Yang also believed that the laws should be understood and known by the entire population. One measure that was taken in order to achieve this was the placing of laws in prominent places on pillars in order to make them known amongst the whole population[57]. He is cited in the Book of Lord Shang as making the following statement:

---

[45] Ibid 172-3.

[46] Shang Jun Shu, quoted in Ren op. cit. 20.

[47] Shang Yang op. cit. 285-6.

[48] Fu op. cit., 40. It should be noted that as far as the author is aware, there are no real primary examples of actual, preserved legal statutes implemented by Lord Shang; knowledge of Shang Yang's legal reforms come from various historical accounts instead, and these shall be relied upon, either directly or indirectly.

[49] Ibid 22.

[50] Attila Kormany: „To Enter a Court is to Enter a Tiger's Mouth" The Role of Law in China, 50 Annales U. Sci. Budapestinensis Rolando Eotvos Nominatae, 349 (2009), 359.

[51] Jinfan Zhang: The Tradition and Modern Transition of Chinese Law, Springer, Berlin Heidelberg 2014, 271.

[52] A.F. P Hulsewé: Remnants of Ch'in Law: An Annotated Translation of the Ch'in Legal and administrative rules of the 3rd century B.C. discovered in Yün-meng Prefecture, Hu-pei Province, in 1975, E.J. Brill, Leiden, 1985, 7.

[53] Ibid 278-9.

[54] Hsiao op. cit. 402.

[55] The Book of Rites (Li Ji): English-Chinese Version, trans. by James Legge, Intercultural Press, Washington, Intercultural Press, 2013, par. 68, quoted in Christine Abigail L. Tan: The Cultured Man as the Noble Man: Jun zi as a Man of Li in Lun yu, Kritike, 2015/9/2, 186.

[56] Gray L. Dorsey: Jurisculture: China, Transaction Publishers, New Brunswick and London, 1993, 129. However, this must be qualified by what appears to have been the fact that hierarchy still played a role in the handing down of punishments, with those of aristocratic rank receiving lighter punishments than commoners. See Hulsewé op. cit. 50.

[57] Dorsey op. cit. 127.

For, indeed, one should not make laws so that only the intelligent can understand them, for the people are not all intelligent ; and one should not make laws so that only the men of talent can understand them, for the people are not all talented. Therefore did the sages, in creating laws, make them clear and easy to understand, and the terminology correct , so that stupid and wise without exception could understand them ; and by setting up law officers, and officers presiding over the law, to be authoritative in the empire, prevented the people from falling into dangerous pitfalls[58].

Another reform that can be seen as a manifestation of Shang Yang's philosophy is the harshness of punishments that he developed in Qin; in fact, it can be said such strictness was his avowed policy in implementing his legal program[59]. It was believed that by threatening harsh punishment, the state could increase its exercise of power.[60] He is quoted as saying that:

In applying punishments, light offenses should be punished heavily; if light offenses do not appear, heavy offenses will not come. This is said to be abolishing penalties by means of penalties, and if penalties are abolished, affairs will succeed. If crimes are serious and penalties light, penalties will appear and trouble will arise. This is said to be bring about penalties by means of penalties, and such a state will surely be dismembered[61].

One striking example of the operation of the criminal law regime instituted by Shang Yang is the case when the Crown Prince of Qin broke the law, and Shang Yang required that the infringement be punished; as the heir to the Qin throne could not be subject to such action, his tutor was punished and his teacher branded instead.[62] We are told that after the Crown Prince's tutor and teacher were punished harshly on their master's behalf, and that, subsequently, the population of Qin 'hastened into (the path of) the law[63].'

An area of importance that Shang Yang legislated for was in the area of family relations, which was also affected by his program of criminal law reform. He implemented a system that involved the organisation of the population into groups of ten and five families[64]. This form of organisation was known as the shiwu system; the reason why this form of familial organisation was put into placed by Shang Yang in Qin was in order to allow the state to increase its ability to manage what was at the time a relatively mobile population[65]. A particular component of the shiwu system was the principle of mutual responsibility[66], which involved the denunciation of crime and joint responsibility in the case of offences[67]. Those who were members of the group of five or ten families would end up sharing in the responsibility for the crime of another member of the family unit[68]. Part of this involved a system of denunciation;[69] one was subject to punishment if the individual failed to denounce the crimes of a member of a fellow shiwu[70]. Shang Yang's purpose in instituting these reforms was in order to prevent the growth of powerful units in society that may have resisted the expansion of state power[71]. As to the success of the shiwu system implemented by Shang Yang, Han Fei 韓非 wrote that 'the sovereign thereby became glorious and secure and the state thereby became rich and strong[72].'

4. Economic Reforms

One important area in which Shang Yang implemented legal reforms was in the economic sphere[73]. The major thrust of these reforms that private industry and commerce should be strictly controlled and regulated by the state, which he saw as being of lesser importance than agriculture, which was understood as being absolutely fundamental and of the highest importance to the state[74].

One of Shang Yang's most significant reforms was his completely abolishing the ching system, which was then replaced by a system of individual property[75]. According to the former system, peasants were bound

[58] Shang Yang op. cit. 334.
[59] Derk Bodde: China's First Unifier: A Study of the Ch'in Dynasty as seen in the Life of Li Ssu, 280?-208 B.C., Hong Kong University Press, Hong Kong, 1967, 167-8.
[60] Creel op. cit. 136.
[61] Shang Yang op. cit. 203.
[62] The Biography of the Lord of Shang in the Shih-Chi, op. cit. 16.
[63] Ibid 16.
[64] Han Fei Tzu: Eight Villainies. In: The Complete Works of Han Fei Tzu: A Classic of Chinese Political Science, Vol. I , W.K. Liao, Arthur Probsthain, 1939, 115.
[65] Liu op. cit. 187.
[66] Han Fei Tzu: On Assumers. In: The Complete Works of Han Fei Tzu, Vol II, trans. W.K. Liao, Arthur Probsthain, London, 1939, 213.
[67] Han Fei Tzu: Eight Villanies, op. cit. , 115.
[68] Han Fei Tzu: On Assumers, op. cit. 187.
[69] Ibid.
[70] Liu op. cit. 188.
[71] Brian E. McKnight: Law and Order in Sung China, Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1992, 123.
[72] Han Fei Tzu, Eight Villanies, op. cit. 115.
[73] Bodde op. cit. 170.
[74] Li Yuyie: Legalism emphasized role in agriculture, military, Chinese Social Sciences Today, 2 February 2016, http://www.csstoday.com/Item/3128.aspx.
[75] Duyvendak op. cit. 44.

to the land of their overlords as virtual chattels[76]. Lord Shang's likely purpose in implementing this reform was to break up the feudal system that existed in the area of land ownership[77]. He also probably had the desire to attract settlers from neighbouring states with the prospect of becoming free landholders[78].

Shang Yang also implemented reforms that aimed at repressing commerce in favour of the development of agriculture[79]. Agriculture was seen as something absolutely fundamental and the ultimate source of the state's wealth, while commerce was seen as being somewhat unproductive[80]; he said 'the means, whereby a country is made prosperous, are agriculture and war[81]', and 'Insignificant individuals will occupy themselves with trade and will practise arts and crafts, all in order to avoid agriculture and war, thus preparing a dangerous condition for the state …such a country will be dismembered[82].'

Shang Yang said in regard to the focus on agriculture that by limiting the people's skills and opportunities by prohibiting certain kinds of activity, the population's capacity would be limited; in addition to this, he believed that by focusing on farming, the people would remain 'simple', being content with where they are, and would not have a desire to leave the territory[83]. During Shang Yang's time, the Qin state had a vast territory, but a sparse population[84]. As the human resource was the main factor in agriculture, it was necessary for the aims Shang Yang and the power of the Qin state that the population be kept within the territory of the state[85].

Another area in which Shang Yang ventured into with regards to family organisation was taxation; a family that had two or more males had to pay double taxes[86]. The reason for this was once again related to extending state influence; this taxation policy would prevent the creation of strong family units that had caused difficulties for the authorities during the Spring and Autumn period; it also allowed for the development of more independent units of production so that the population would increase at a faster rate, which in turn would lead the cultivation of wasteland into productive farmland[87].

From the words and actions of Shang Yang in relation to agriculture and trade, several aspects of his philosophy can be seen. First, law is used in order to strengthen the state. Laws implemented in this instance are practical and utilitarian, and he felt free to discard older systems that seem to inhibit the prosperity of the state. His reason for encouraging agriculture and discouraging or controlling trade was because he believed it would strengthen Qin, while commerce was not seen as having the same utility. So, in this instance we see Shang Yang bringing about legal reforms primarily with reference to state power and with a utilitarian eye.

Due to his various reforms, Shang Yang had made many enemies among members of the aristocracy, and after the death of Duke Xiao and his son Huiwen 秦惠文王 ascending to the throne, he was accused of plotting against Qin's new sovereign[88]. So effective had his reforms been that when he fled as a result of the accusations against him, he was unable to find accommodation as no innkeeper dared to receive a traveller not in possession of an internal passport, a law that had been established by Shang Yang himself.[89] Duke Huiwen had his body torn to pieces by chariots,[90] a penalty which Shang Yang had instituted[91].

5. Conclusion

After Shang Yang's death his ideas continued to be influential, with his system of criminal law continuing to form the basis of the Qin penal code[92]. Most importantly, his reform program led to the strengthening of the Qin state, which aided Qin Duke Ying Zhen 嬴政 in defeating the rival states in China, and in 221 B.C proclaiming himself as the 'First Emperor' or Qin Shi Huang 秦始皇, thus establishing a unified Chinese empire for the first time in history[93]. Later, the Han dynasty 漢朝, upon its ascension to China's imperial throne, continued to take Shang Yang's code as the basis of its own system of criminal

[76] Bodde op. cit. 170.
[77] Ibid.
[78] Ibid 52.
[79] Bodde, op. cit. 171.
[80] Ibid.
[81] Shang Yang op. cit. 185.
[82] Ibid 186.
[83] Ibid 222.
[84] Liu op. cit. 186.
[85] Ibid.
[86] 'The Biography of the Lord of Shang in the Shih-chi' in Duyvendak op. cit. 15.
[87] Liu op. cit. 187.
[88] Zhengyuan Fu: China's Legalists: The Earliest Totalitarians and Their Art of Ruling, M.E Sharpe, London and New York, 1996, 18.
[89] Ibid.
[90] 'The Record of Shang Yang in the Ch'in-ts'e'. In Duyvendak op. cit. 32.
[91] Fu op. cit. 18.
[92] Yates op. cit. 30.
[93] Christian D. Von Dehsen, Shang Yang, In: Christian D. Von Dehsen: Lives and Legacies: An Encyclopedia of of People Who Changed the World, Philosophers and Religious Leadesr, Oryx Press, 1999, Phoenix, Yates, 30.

law[94], and which retained the Qin's central administration apparatus in order to aid it in consolidating its rule over the territory that it came to possess[95]. Thus, Shang Yang's worldview and legal and governmental reforms which strengthened the Qin state may be said to have contributed to the ultimate unification of China and the formation of its imperial state tradition. China's ability to assert itself in the international arena as an independent international actor is ultimately rooted in the country's unification in ancient times, which saw disparate and warring kingdoms come together to form a unified state. This event has determined the ultimate destiny of China and to an extent the wider world, and has allowed that country to project itself further afield, from ancient times up until the present day.

The chaotic Warring States period of ancient Chinese history in which Shang Yang lived caused him to seek to bring about a higher degree of order to the political and social life of those times[96]. As has been seen, Shang Yang implemented a program of reforms in such areas as criminal law and economic relations in Qin which utilized written law as a primary tool in strengthening the state, with his measures focusing upon the maintenance and strengthening of the ruler's authority. Despite what has been written about the differences in the Legalist and Confucian schools of thought, it can be argued that they ultimately had the same ends in mind, while essentially differing as to the way in which this was to be achieved. As the Chinese scholar Zeng Zhenyu put it, "There are certain commonalities between Confucius and Shang Yang. They differ just in the means they advocate for the advancement of an ideal society based on morality. For Confucius, the means are ethical education and consequent transformation of the populace. Shang Yang, in distinction, believes that only after reliance on heavy punishments will humans be able to advance on to the new stage of a society ruled by morality[97]." Indeed, there are examples from Chinese history where an actual synthesis between the two took place, a development particularly noteworthy during the Han dynasty period[98]. This is a subject worthy of further research, which reflects the diversity of the intellectual tradition of Chinese civilization, and its ability to utilize and synthesize a myriad of differing currents of thought.

References

- William P. Alford: The Inscrutable Occidental? Implications of Roberto Unger's Uses and Abuses of the Chinese Past, Texas Law Review, 1986/64
- Roger T Ames: The Art of Rulership: A Study of Ancient Chinese Political Thought, State University of New York Press, Albany, 1994
- Derk Bodde: China's First Unifier: A Study of the Ch'in Dynasty as seen in the Life of Li Ssu (280?-208 B.C.), Hong Kong University Press, Hong Kong, 1967
- The Book of Rites (Li Ji): English-Chinese Version, trans. by James Legge, Intercultural Press, Washington, Intercultural Press, 2013, quoted in Christine Abigail L. Tan: The Cultured Man as the Noble Man: Jun zi as a Man of Li in Lun yu, Kritike, 2015/9/2
- Confucius: The Analects, trans. D.C Lau, Penguin Classics, London, 1979
- Confucius, The Li Ki. In James Legge: The Texts of Confucianism, V, Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1885
- Leonard Cottrell: The Tiger of Ch'in: The Dramatic Emergence of China as a Nation, Rinehart and Winston, Holt, 1962
- Herrlee G. Creel: Chinese Though from Confucius to Mao Tse-tung, 1953
- Tung-Tsu Chu: Law and Society in Traditional China, Mouton, Paris, 1961
- Gray L. Dorsey: Jurisculture: China, Transaction Publishers, New Brunswick and London, 1993
- J.J.L Duyvendak, Introduction. In: The Book of Lord Shang: A Classic of The Chinese School of Law, Arthur Probsthain, London, 1928
- Zhengyuan Fu: Autocratic Tradition and Chinese Politics, Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1993
- Zhengyuan Fu: China's Legalists: The Earliest Totalitarians and Their Art of Ruling, M.E Sharpe, London and New York, 1996
- Han Fei Tzu: Eight Villainies. In: The Complete Works of Han Fei Tzu: A Classic of Chinese Political Science, Vol. I, trans. W.K. Liao, Arthur Probsthain, 1939
- Han Fei Tzu: On Assumers. In: The Complete Works of Han Fei Tzu, Vol II, trans. W.K. Liao, Arthur Probsthain, London, 1939
- Kung-chuan Hsiao: A History of Chinese Political Thought: From the Beginnings to the Sixth Century A.D., Vol. I, Princeton University Press

[94] Roger T Ames: The Art of Rulership: A Study of Ancient Chinese Political Thought, State University of New York Press, Albany, 1994, 109.

[95] Wei Wu: Cultural Relativism and Universal Fair Interrogation Standards in Europe and China. In Marc Cools, et. al (eds.): European Criminal Justice and Policy, Maklu, Antwerpen, Apeldoorn, Portland, 2012, 155

[96] William P. Alford: The Inscrutable Occidental? Implications of Roberto Unger's Uses and Abuses of the Chinese Past, Texas Law Review, 1986/64, 9.

[97] Quoted in Yuri Pines and Carine Defoort: Chinese Academic Views on Shang Yang Since the Open-Up-and-Reform Era, Contemporary Chinese Thought, 2016/47/2, https://www.tandfonline.com/doi/full/10.1080/10971467.2016.1227112.

[98] Derk Bodde and Clarence Morris: Law in Imperial China: Exemplified by 190 Ch'ing Dynasty Cases with Historical, Social, and Juridical Commentaries, Harvard University Press, Cambridge, 1967, 27-8.

- A.F. P Hulsewé: Remnants of Ch'in Law: An Annotated Translation of the Ch'in Legal and administrative rules of the 3rd century B.C. discovered in Yün-meng Prefecture, Hu-pei Province, in 1975, E.J. Brill, Leiden, 1985
- Attila Kormany: „To Enter a Court is to Enter a Tiger's Mouth" The Role of Law in China, 50 Annales U. Sci. Budapestinensis Rolando Eotvos Nominatae, 349 (2009);
- Yongping Liu:, Origins of Chinese Law: Penal and Administrative Law in its Early Development, Oxford University Press, Oxford, 1998;
- Brian E. McKnight: Law and Order in Sung China, Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1992;
- Yuri Pines: Legalism in Chinese Philosophy. In Edward N. Zalta (ed.): The Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy, Winter 2014 edition, https://plato.stanford.edu/archives/win2014/entries/chinese-legalism/;
- Yuri Pines and Carine Defoort: Chinese Academic Views on Shang Yang Since the Open-Up-and-Reform Era, Contemporary Chinese Thought, 2016/47/2, https://www.tandfonline.com/doi/full/10.1080/10971467.2016.1227112;
- N. & V. Rajendra - C. Lower: A History of Asia, Melbourne, Longman Cheshire, 1992;
- Xin Ren: Tradition of the Law and the Law of the Tradition: Law, State, and Social Control in China, Greenwood Press, Conneticut, 1997;
- Roberto Mangabeira Unger: Law in Modern Society: Toward a Criticism of Social Theory, Free Press, 1976;
- Robin D. S Yates: The Rise of Qin and the Military Conquest of the Warring States. In Jane Portal (ed.), The First Emperor: China's Terracota Army, London, British Museum Press, 2007;
- Li Yuyie: Legalism emphasized role in agriculture, military, Chinese Social Sciences Today, 2 February 2016, http://www.csstoday.com/Item/3128.aspx;
- Shang Yang: Translation of the Book of Lord Shang, trans. J.J. L Duyvendak, Arthur Probsthain, London, 1928;
- Shu-hsiang: The Ch'un Ts'ew with the Tso Chuen. In James Legge (ed.): The Chinese Classics, V, Pt. II, Hong Kong, 1872;
- Christian D. Von Dehsen, Shang Yang, In: Christian D. Von Dehsen: Lives and Legacies: An Encyclopedia of of People Who Changed the World, Philosophers and Religious Leaders, Oryx Press, 1999, Phoenix, Yates;
- Wei Wu: Cultural Relativism and Universal Fair Interrogation Standards in Europe and China. In Marc Cools, et. al (eds.): European Criminal Justice and Policy, Maklu, Antwerpen, Apeldoorn, Portland, 2012;
- Jinfan Zhang: The Tradition and Modern Transition of Chinese Law, Springer, Berlin Heidelberg 2014.

THE DECIMATION OF THE INTRA EU BITS

Beatrice Onica JARKA*

Abstract

The article concentrates on the process which led to the decimation of the intra-EU Bilateral Investment Treaties, due the affirmation of the public policy of European Union which takes precedence over the international obligations arisen for states from Bilateral Investments Treaties (BITs) and other multilateral investment treaties. In a last update on the situation, the Court of Justice of the European Union found on 6th of March 2018 for a first time, by way of providing answers to a preliminary question addressed by German Federal Court of Justice, that the arbitration clause in intra EU BITs is incompatible with the European Law as it provides a mechanism for settling investment disputes which is not capable of ensuring the proper application and full effectiveness of EU law, having an adverse effect on the autonomy of EU law.

The effects of the Court of Justice of the European Union decision on 6th of March 2018 are going to be various at national, european and international level from the transformation of the still existing intra EU BITs or multilateral investments treaties, in useless international instruments to changing entirely the investment law system of guarantees and perhaps to engaging the state or EU responsibility for internationally wrongful acts.

Keywords: Intra – EU BITs, arbitration clause, EU law, investor –state dispute.

1. Introduction

The story of the intra EU BITS reached on March 6, 2018, its climax. By the judgment in Slovak Republic v. Achmea BV[1], the Court of Justice of the European Union (EU) found that investor-State arbitration under the Bilateral Investment Treaty between the Netherlands and Slovakia is incompatible with EU law.

Bilateral Investment Treaties (BITs) are agreements which extablish the terms and conditions for private investment by nationals and companies of one state in another state.

BITs insure for the investments made by an investor of one Contracting State in the territory of another Contracting State several guarantees referring inter alia to fair and equitable treatment, the most favoured nation principle, the national treatment principle, direct or indirect compensation in the event of expropriation.

The specificity of many BITs is that such legal instruments provide for an alternative dispute resolution mechanism, under which an investor whose rights under the BIT have been violated could recourse directly to international arbitration, either under the auspices of the ICSID (International Center for the Settlement of Investment Disputes[2]), or under other international treaties, instead of suing the host State in its own courts. Such process is known as the Investor State Dispute Settlement (ISDS).

The first BIT ever signed was between Pakistan and Germany in 1959[3]. Since then, more than 2000 BITs had been signed, many of them between the EU countries, out of which most of them, at least for one party, before such countries become EU members. For a long time, BITs and the alternative dispute resolution system provided under BITs functioned quite well. ICSID and other arbitration institutions dealing with investor states settlement have been succesfull in passing enforceable awards subject to the limited review of the national tribunals of enforcement and cancelation under New York 1958 Convention.

The growing number of investor state disputes based on BITs between member states had trigger EU attention and reaction which finally materialised in declaring by the Court of Justice of EU of the incompatibility of BITs with the EU law. The position of EU institutions has passed through several phasis with the reach of such strong final outcome, which, as

* Associate Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest Avocat – Partener la Cunescu, Balaciu & Asociatii (www.cunescu.ro), arbitru la WIPO, Arbitration Forum și Czech Court of Arbitration în disputele referitoare la nume de domenii, Vice – Președinte al Curtii de Arbitraj Ilfov din București (www. caib-biac.ro), Vicepreședinte al Institutului Arbitral Român (e-mail: beatrice.onicajarka@cunescu.ro)

[1] The judgement of the European Court of Justice in case C-284/16, dated March 6, 2018, makes reference to a request for a preliminary ruling regarding a Bilateral investment treaty concluded in 1991 between the Kingdom of the Netherlands and the Czech and Slovak Federative Republic and still applicable between the Kingdom of the Netherlands and the Slovak Republic and its provision enabling an investor from one Contracting Party to bring proceedings before an arbitral tribunal in the event of a dispute with the other Contracting Party and the Compatibility with Articles 18, 267 and 344 TFEU — Concept of 'court or tribunal' — Autonomy of EU law. Information are available at: doclang=EN&mode=req&dir=&occ=first&part=1&cid=404057.

[2] ICSID is the International Center for Settlement of Investment Disputes established under ICSID Convention, entered into force on October 1966, and which has been ratifed by 153 Contracting States, in 2018. More information about ICSID could be found at https://icsid.worldbank.org.

[3] The Treaty for the Promotion and Protection of Investments Germany and Pakistan was adopted on 25 November 1959, 457 U.N.T.S. 24 and entered into force on 28 November 1962.This document is available on the United Nations Treaty Collection website at: http://treaties.un.org/Pages/showDetails.aspx?objid=0800000280132bef we shall demonstrate is consolidating the European public policy within the autonomy of the EU law and establishes an imposed supremacy of the EU law over the international obligations predating EU law.

This paper shall consider, the rise of the ISDS disputes under intra EU BITs, the evolution of the EU institutions positions on the matter and finnaly the effect of the EU Court of Justice procedures at least on the intra – EU BITs and perhaps on the entire existing system of ISDS.

2. Content

2.1. Short history of Intra EU –BITs

In the 1990s, most EU Member States from Western Europe countries signed BITs with Central and Eastern European nations. Among these contries were the Czech Republic, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Slovakia, Slovenia, Romania and Bulgaria.

While the 12 new Central and European states became EU members the BITs between them and EU countries became BITs between EU Member States, or intra-EU BITs.

The specific of the situation in the new EU member states, as newly democracy and free economies, led to the conclusions of privatisations agreements with investors which contained advantages or state subsidies of significant proportions for such investors in order to be attracted to invest in these regions. Joining the EU implied also that these agreements needed to comply with EU law, which most of them did not, as they were failing sometimes to comply with EU state aid policy. This led to a series of withdrawals of such advantages finally, ending in investor state dispute settlementsunder the arbitration clause provided by BITs.

Until 2014, based on the UNCTAD data, which was considered in an European Commission report on Investor-to-State Dispute Settlement.[4], there has been a total of 608 known ISDS claims (out of which 356 cases were concluded). Investors from the EU Member State are the largest users of ISDS. In the same report[5], it appears that cases brought by investors from the European Union were in total 327, thus accounting for more than 50 % of ISDS cases initiated and that investors from almost all EU Member States have brought ISDS cases (except Estonia, Slovakia, Romania, Bulgaria, Malta and Ireland). Combined, investors from the Netherlands, the UK, Germany, France, Spain and Italy have launched all together 236 cases, representing 72 % of all EU based[6].

2.2. Raise of the EU position

In its 2006 report[7] to the Council of European Union, the Economic and Finance Committee (EFC) takes note that there were currently around 150 Bilateral Investment Treaties (BIT) still in force between the EU Member States (200, according to EU Commission[8]), while part of their content has been superseded by Community law upon accession. In order to avoid legal uncertainties and unnecessary risks for EU Member States in the unclear situation, Member States (MS) were invited to review the need for such BITs agreements; and inform the Commission about the actions taken in this context so that progress can be reviewed by the EFC by the end of 2007.

In 2015, The Directorate General for Internal Policies remarks in its Study for the Juri Committee titled Legal Instruments and Practice of Arbitration in the EU[9] that the underlying problem of intra-EU BITs is the relationship between public international law (and, in particular, international investment law) on one hand and EU law on the other hand. According to the same report[10], investment deals, to a great extent, with subject matters, which are also covered by the EU law, such as the free movement of capitals. The Directorate General for Internal Policies further concludes that investment law and EU law potentially enter into conflict and the existence of intra-EU BITs could amount, from the point of view of EU law, to discrimination between EU citizens and therefore run contrary to Article 18 TFEU, as they afford foreign investors standards of protection which are not necessarily the same as the ones included in EU law.

2.3. Sketching of the EU position in regards of the arbitral awards based on intra – EU BITS

Although the position of the EU institutions was general, there were two cases in particular in which enforcement of arbitral awards grounded on BITs infringements was at stake, and the Commission and recently the European Court of Justice by the decision dated March 6, 2018, took a clear stand on the incompatibility of intra EU BITs with EU law.

These cases were: Micula v. Romania[11] (based on a BIT between Sweden and Romania) and Achmea v.

[4] The report of the European Comission on facts and figures on Investor –to – State Dispute Settlement is available at http://trade.ec.europa.eu/doclib/docs/2015/january/tradoc_153046.pdf,

[5] Ibidem.

[6] Ibidem.

[7] The 2006 report of the Economic and Financial Committee to the Commission and the Council on the Movement of Capital and the Freedom of Payments is available at http://register.consilium.europa.eu/doc/srv?l=EN&f=ST%205044%202007%20INIT

[8] ibid, infra note iv.

[9] Legal instruments and practice in the EU – Study for the Committee Jury is available at http://www.europarl.europa.eu/RegData/etudes/STUD/2015/509988/IPOL_STU(2015)509988_EN.pdf

[10] Ibidem.

[11] IOAN MICULA, VIOREL MICULA, S.C. EUROPEAN FOOD S.A., S.C. STARMILL S.R.L. AND S.C. MULTIPACK S.R.L. CLAIMANTS v. ROMANIA RESPONDENT ICSID Case No. ARB/05/20, dated 11 December 2013 is avalable at https://www.italaw.com/sites/default/files/case-documents/italaw3036.pdf.

Slovakia[12] (based on a BIT between Netherlands and Slovakia).

2.3.1. Micula v. Romania

In the Micula v. Romania, the issue of the incompatibility of the EU law with BIT arbitration awards had been the EU State aid rules. On this issues the EU Commission ruled on 30 March 2015. The case arose from certain exemptions from Romanian customs duties, enacted before Romania joined the EU. When Romania began accession talks with the EU, the disputed incentives were repealed in order to comply with the EU State aid rules. Such repealment was the source of the dispute that Micula brothers, investors in Romania, brought before an arbitration tribunal under the Romanian-Swedish bilateral investment treaty (BIT). The Commission intervened in the proceedings as amicus curiae, pointing out that the disputed incentives breached the state aid rules, and that any reinstatement of those incentives, as a result of the arbitration, would itself also amount to unlawful state aid. Nonetheless, in the Award of 11 December 2013[13], the Arbitral Tribunal found that by revoking the incentives allowed to the Claimants, Romania "violated the Claimants" legitimate expectations with respect to the availability of the such incentives until 1 April 2009. The Arbitral Tribunal further concluded[14] that, with the exception of maintaining the investors' obligations under the existing law after revocation of the relevant incentives, "Romania's repeal of the incentives was a reasonable action in pursuit of a rational policy." However, the Tribunal went on to state[15] that: "[T]his conclusion does not detract from the Tribunal's holding […] above that Romania undermined the Claimants" legitimate expectations with respect to the continued availability of the incentives until 1 April 2009. As a result, Romania's actions, although for the most part appropriately and narrowly tailored in pursuit of a rational policy, were unfair or inequitable agreements.

Following the proceedings initiated in the Romanian Courts for the enforcement of the damages awards in the Romanian courts, the Commission intervened once again[16]. Ignoring the Commission position, the Romanian courts ordered the execution of the arbitration awards, followed by executor actions to seize the accounts of Romania's Ministry of Finance in order to make payment.

While Romania funds were being seized tin the processs of enforcement of the arbitration award, the EU Commission initiated an investigation[17] on the grounds that payment of the damages awarded by the arbitration tribunal appeared to constitute State aid. In its decision dated March 30, 2015[18], the EU Commission confirmed among others that its State aid analysis was not precluded by the fact that the aid arose through the payment of compensation awarded by an arbitral tribunal.

Indeed, the Commission affirmed that "In the case of intra-EU BITs, the Commission takes the view that such agreements are contrary to Union law, incompatible with provisions of the Union Treaties and should therefore be considered invalid." (para 128) Furthermore, the Commision helds: "Where giving effect to an intra-EU treaty by a Member State would frustrate the application of Union law, that Member State must uphold Union law since Union primary law, such as Articles 107 and 108 of the Treaty, takes precedence over that Member State's international obligations." In this sense, the EU Commission found that the payment (however resulted from the forced enforcement) of the compensation awarded by the arbitration tribunal to the Micula brothers and their associated companies amounted to the granting of an incompatible State aid, and the Commission ordered Romania to recover it.

The Micula brothers, and their companies, have appealed the decision to the General Court in Case T-646/14, which ended, according to the request of the applicants lodged at the Court Registry on 2 December 2015 to discontinue proceedings, with the President Order[19] dated February 29, 2016, who ordered the removal of the case from the General Court Register.

In Micula v. Romania arbitral award, the European Commission had its last word in declaring that EU law in state aid is breached by the ICSID award and that in the ierarchy between the Union primary law, such as Articles 107 and 108 of the Treaty, and international obligations, the first takes precedence over that Member State's international obligations.

[12] The final award in PCA Case No. 2008-13 in the matter of an arbitration before a tribunal constituted in accordance with the agreement on encouragement and reciprocal protection of investments between the Kingdom of the Netherlands and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic, signed on 29 april 1991, entered into force on 1 october 1992 ("treaty") –and the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law Arbitration Rules ("UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules") -Betweenachmea B.V. (formerly known as "Eureko B.V.") ("Claimant") –and the Slovak Republic ("Respondent," and together with Claimant, the "parties") is available at https://www.italaw.com/sites/default/files/case-documents/italaw3206.pdf

[13] Ibid. infra note 11

[14] Ibidem.

[15] Ibidem.

[16] COMMISSION DECISION (EU) 2015/1470 of 30 March 2015 on State aid SA.38517 (2014/C) (ex 2014/NN) implemented by Romania — Arbitral award Micula v Romania of 11 December 2013(notified under document C(2015) 2112 available at: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=CELEX%3A32015D1470

[17] Ibidem.

[18] bidem.

[19]ORDER OF THE PRESIDENTOF THE FOURTH CHAMBER OF THE GENERAL COURT dated 29 February 2016 in Case T – 646/14 is available at: http://curia.europa.eu/juris/document/document.jsf;jsessionid=9ea7d0f130deb00bb5867733494c9075dcf1954e1eb4e34KaxiLc3eQc40LaxqMbN4Pb34Ke0?text=&docid=174864&pageIndex=0&doclang=en&mode=lst&dir=&occ=first&part=1&cid=270324

2.3.2. Slovak Republic v. Achmea B.V.

In comparision the Micula v Romania, in the Slovak Republic v. Achmea B.V.[20], EU Court of Justice had finally the chance to deliver its word on the compatibility of the EU law with the intra EU BITs, going to essence of such incompatibility.

The case refers to a dispute between Dutch insurer Achmea B.V. (formerly known as Eureko B.V.) and Slovakia. In 2006, Slovakia partly reversed the previous liberalisation of its health insurance market, and vis-à-vis the Claimants, it prohibited the distribution of profits generated by Achmea's Slovak insurance activities.

In 2008, Achmea brought arbitration proceedings against Slovakia under the BIT on the grounds of violation of substantive treaty standards. The dispute was solved by an ad-hoc arbitral tribunal constituted under the UNCITRAL Rules, seated in Frankfurt[21] , which found in its 2012 award that, Slovakia had violated the existing BIT and ordered it to pay approximately EUR 22.1 million of damages to Achmea.

Slovakia challenged the arbitral award on jurisdiction before the German court[22], arguing that the arbitral tribunal lacked jurisdiction to hear the claims because the arbitration clause embedded in Article 8 of the BIT was incompatible with EU law, especially in relationship with articles 18, 267 and 344 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU).

In these proceedings, the Higher Regional Court of Frankfurt decision of 18 December 2014 – Case 26 Sch 3/13[23] rejected Slovakia's arguments, finding that the BIT was not incompatible with the aforementioned provisions of the TFEU. Further, the German Federal Court of Justice decision of 3 March 2016 – Case I ZB 2/15, in hearing the appeal, referred questions on the compatibility with EU law of the BIT's arbitration clause to the Court of Justice of the EU for a preliminary ruling, stating nevertheless that in its view the arbitration clause was not contrary to the provisions of the TFEU.

In its Opinion[24] delivered on 19 September 2017, the Advocate General (AG) of the Court WATHELET concluded in principle that the specific BIT under analysis is not incompatible with EU law and the specific three articles from TFUE. In delivering its opinion, AG noted that for a long time, the argument of the EU institutions, including the Commission, was that BITs were instruments necessary for the accession to the EU and EU actually encouraged the countries of Central and Eastern Europe to sign them. The AG noted that these treaties did not contain any provisions within them that said they ceased to apply once the relevant country joined the EU, which normally if considered ab initio incompatible with EU law should have had happened. In addition, all Member States and the EU itself had ratified the Energy Charter Treaty[25] (ECT) which is a multilateral investment treaty and no Member State sought an opinion from the Court of Justice on the compatibility of the ECT with EU law.

By the Decision on 6th of March 2018, the Grand Chamber of Court of Justice of EU found departing from AG opinion and the position taken by the German Courts that the BIT in question is not compatible with EU law. Although the Court analysed the BIT between Austria and Slovakia, the rationale of the Court goes to the essence of the incompatibility between intra - EU BITs and European law.

The main argument used by the Court of Justice of the European Union in its resoning is the principle of autonomy of EU law[26]. According to this principle, EU law is characterised by the fact that it stems from an independent source of law, the EU Treaties, and by its primacy over the law of the EU Member States. Based on this principle, in the opinion of the Court, the EU treaties "have given rise to a structured network of principles, rules and mutually interdependent legal relations binding the EU and its Member States reciprocally…"[27] and to the obligations of the EU Member States to insure its uniform and consistent territorial application by mean of the preliminary question as indicated in Article 267 TFEU.

Continuing its line of reasoning, the Court found[28] that the arbitral tribunal constituted under the BIT must rule on the basis of the law in force of the contracting state involved in the dispute as well as other (international) agreements between the contracting parties, which includes EU law and because of this characteristic may be called to use the preliminary question procedures. Nevertheless, the Court considered that the arbitral tribunal constituted under Article 8 of the BIT cannot be regarded as a court or tribunal of a Member State and has no power to make a reference to the Court of Justice of the European Union for a preliminary ruling. Taking notice of the fact that the arbitral award rendered by the tribunal under the BIT is, in principle, final and – by virtue of the applicable procedural law which is determined by the tribunal itself through the choice of the arbitral seat – subject only to limited judicial review by the competent

[20] Ibid. infra note 1

[21] Ibid. infra note 12.

[22] Ibidem.

[23] The Higher Regional Court of Frankfurt decision of 18 December 2014 – Case 26 Sch 3/13 is available at: https://www.italaw.com/sites/default/files/case-documents/italaw7079.pdf

[24] OPINION OF ADVOCATE GENERAL WATHELET delivered on 19 September 2017 (1) Case C-284/16 Slowakische Republik v Achmea BV is available at: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=CELEX:62016CC0284

[25] Ibidem.

[26] Ibid. infra note 1.

[27] Ibidem.

[28] Ibidem.

national courts, the Court concluded that investor-state arbitration derives from a treaty by which MS agree to remove disputes concerning the application or interpretation of EU law from the jurisdiction of their own courts, and hence from the system of judicial remedies which the TFEU requires them to establish on questions of EU law. By this particular kind of agreement included in the BIT, the Netherlands and Slovakia established, in the opinion of the Court, a mechanism for settling investment disputes which is not capable of ensuring the proper application and full effectiveness of EU law. For all the considerations above, the Court concluded[29] concluded that the arbitration clause contained in the said BIT is incompatible with certain key principles of EU law and that it has an adverse effect on the autonomy of EU law.

2.4. Pro- action of EU Commission in decimation of intra-EU BITs.

The European Commission has not been restricted to manifest its poistion in particular cases of arbitral awards grounded on intra-EU BITs., but rather took defintive stand in decimating these bilateral agreement. In 2015, the European Commission has initiated infringement proceedin[30] against five Member States requesting them to terminate intra-EU bilateral investment treaties between them.

While the BITs were thus aimed at strengthening investor protection, for example by means of compensation for expropriation and arbitration procedures for the settlement of investment disputes, since enlargement, such 'extra' reassurances should not be necessary, as all Member States are subject to the same EU rules in the single market, including those on cross-border investments (in particular the freedom of establishment and the free movement of capital). In the opinion of the Commission[31], EU investors also benefit from the same protection due to the EU rules (e.g. non-discrimination on grounds of nationality), while intra-EU BITs confer rights on a bilateral basis to investors from some Member States only, which amounts to discrimination based on nationality which incompatible with EU law.

Such line of reasoning has supported the Commission decision to request five Member States Austria, the Netherlands, Romania, Slovakia and Sweden to bring the intra-EU BITs between them to an end. Due to the fact that most Member States have taken no action, the Commission felt obliged in 2015 to launch the first stage of infringement procedures against the five Member States.

At the same time, the Commission requsted information from and initiating an administrative dialogue with the remaining 21 Member States who still have intra-EU BITs in place and noted with satisfaction that two Member States – Ireland and Italy – have already ended all their intra-EU BITs in 2012 and 2013 respectively.

It is worth noting the position of Jonathan Hill, EU Commissioner for Financial Services, Financial Stability and Capital Markets Union which said: "Intra-EU bilateral investment treaties are outdated and as Italy and Ireland have shown by already terminating their intra-EU BITs, no longer necessary in a single market of 28 Member States. We must all act together to make sure that the regulatory framework for cross-border investment in the single market works effectively. In that context, the Commission is ready to explore the possibility of a mechanism for the quick and efficient mediation of investment disputes."

The infringments procedure were put on hold during the Couurt of Justice of the European Union proceedings in Achmea v. Slovakia.

On 27 February 2017, the Romanian Parliament adopted Law 18/2017 on the termination of Bilateral Investment Treaties concluded between Romania and European Union Member States (Law). The Law has been published in the Official Gazette no. 198 of 21 March 2017 and will enter into force on 24 March 2017. Law 18/2007 approves the mutual and unilateral termination of all the 22 intra-EU BITs concluded by Romania and which are currently still in force.

2.5. EU law taking precedence over the International obligations

Achmea v. Slovakia marks certainly the decimation of the intra EU BITs, although it is only the climax in a long standing of the affirmation of the European public policy and its precedence over the public international law obligations of states. BITs, intra EU and general had been seen as one of the strongest instruments aimed at providing legal certainty and protecting foreign investors against the risks of policy changes and the possible lack of neutrality and impartiality of judges and domestic courts of the host State. As mentioned above, the countries from the Central and Eastern European were actually encouraged before accesion to EU to conclude BITs with the existing then EU MS.

In comparison with international arbitration, to which ISDS reseambles, the resolution of the dispute grounded on BIT infringement rests on an international treaty governed by public international law and it is based on principles aimed at protecting the investor, such as the principle of fair and equitable treatment or the principles of national treatment, most favored nation or full protection and security[32]. BITs are preferred by the foreign investors as they provide a

[29] Ibidem

[30] The press release of the Commission dated June 18, 2015 mentions the Commission s position in the initiation of infringements at http://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_IP-15-5198_en.htm

[31] Ibidem

[32] See Ana M. López-Rodríguez, PhD* INVESTOR-STATE DISPUTE SETTLEMENT IN THE EU: CERTAINTIES AND UNCERTAINTIES in Jouston Journal of International Law vol 40/1, 2.21.2018. at: http://www.hjil.org/wp-content/uploads/Rodriguez-Lopez-FINAL1.pdf

level playing field where States shed their privileges and litigate on an equal basis with private companies[33].

This brings within ISDS based on BITs intra EU or general. private level interests and the general interest on the same level. ISDS under BITs applies a commercial arbitration procedure to disputes which deal with the conformity of the exercise of the regulatory and administrative authority of the host State under the perspective of international law, which places such agreements at the level of public international order.

Moreover the force of the arbitration clauses is drawn and interpreted according to international public law which rules the BITs and give within national laws rayfing the BITs or orther multilateral investments treaties the superseeding status international public law has in the national public order of the national states.

The mere existance of an arbitral tribunal under BITs dealing with matters coming within EU Law and public policy, made EU to feel compelled to have a strong position against intra EU BITs and further against BITs with countries outside EU. With many occasions EU through the Commission and the Court of Justice declared, undoubtly the incompatibility with EU law of any judicial body or international tribunal that jeopardizes the principles of autonomy and primacy of EU law and the exclusive competence of the Court of Justice in its interpretation and application[34].

The main reasons provided by the Court in its opinions[35] referred to the need to respect the primacy and autonomy of EU law and the exclusive competence of the Court to interpret and apply EU law; to the need to preserve the exclusive competence of the Court in any dispute between the Member States concerning the interpretation or application of the Treaties, enshrined in art. 344 TFEU; to the need to guarantee the exclusive competence of the Court to rule on the distribution of responsibility for breach of an international agreement between the EU and its Member States and on the proper respondent in a proceeding; to the need to avoid further reviews of EU law, including secondary law, by the any other International Tribunal.

It is not surprinsing that the same kind of reasoning was actually used by the Court in its judgment in Achmea v. Slovakia delivered on 6th of March 2018. It is of interest that the judgement was delivered in relationship with an award rendered under intra-EU BITs by arbitral tribunals seated within the EU and in this regards, the effects of such judgement on ISDS before tribunals seated outside the EU, as well as intra-EU disputes under the Energy Charter Treaty, may be less definitive. It nevertheless rounds the general superior position which EU law and its own judicial system took in international law relationship which will undoubtly lead to the consolidation of this position in eliminating any judicial application and interpretation of EU law through other international tribunals. It is to be seen how investment arbitral tribunals will further react and if and how future ISDS if any shall suvive in Europe.

3. Conclusion

The ISDS days based on intra-EU BITs are numbered, as there will be no ISDS if the effects of the ISDS awards based on intra- EU BITs would not be recognised in the EU member states. The position of the European Commission requesting the termination of intra EU BITs addressed to five states under infringement procedure opening shows the determination in the decimation of the intra EU BITs, which will likely dissapear or shall not be further used for ISDS. It is obvious that EU order is tending to eliminate any extra legal system which would infringe primacy and autonomy of EU law and the exclusive competence of the Court to interpret and apply EU law and if it takes the ISDS in general so be it. There is nothing to fear herein except for a possible judicial review of such primacy over international public law obligations solved at the level of the International Court of Justice (ICJ) based on a infringements of BITs.

How would ICJ consider the issue? Is Court of Justice of the EU the only one to interpret and apply EU law? What about international public law to which actually ISDS belongs?

References

- COMMISSION DECISION (EU) 2015/1470 of 30 March 2015 on State aid SA.38517 (2014/C) (ex 2014/NN) implemented by Romania — Arbitral award Micula v Romania of 11 December 2013(notified under document C(2015) 2112 available at: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=CELEX%3A32015D1470, accessed on March 10th, 2018
- Ana M. López-Rodríguez, PhD* INVESTOR-STATE DISPUTE SETTLEMENT IN THE EU: CERTAINTIES AND UNCERTAINTIES in Jouston Journal of International Law vol 40/1, 2.21.2018. at: http://www.hjil.org/wp-content/uploads/Rodriguez-Lopez-FINAL1.pdf, accessed on March 10th, 2018
- OPINION OF ADVOCATE GENERAL WATHELET delivered on 19 September 2017 (1) Case C-284/16 Slowakische Republik v Achmea BV is available at: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=CELEX:62016CC0284, accessed on March 7th, 2018

[33] Ibidem.
[34] Ibidem.
[35] Ibidem.

- The Higher Regional Court of Frankfurt decision of 18 December 2014 – Case 26 Sch 3/13 is available at: https://www.italaw.com/sites/default/files/case-documents/italaw7079.pdf accessed on March 10th, 2018.
- The report of the European Comission on facts and figures on Investor –to – State Dispute Settlement is available at http://trade.ec.europa.eu/doclib/docs/2015/january/tradoc_153046.pdf, accessed on March 10th, 2018
- The 2006 report of the Economic and Financial Committee to the Commission and the Council on the Movement of Capital and the Freedom of Payments is available at http://register.consilium.europa.eu/doc/srv?l=EN&f=ST%205044%202007%20INIT, accessed on March 9th, 2018

PROTECTING EU VALUES. A JURIDICAL LOOK AT ARTICLE 7 TEU

Iuliana-Mădălina LARION*

Abstract

Every European state that wishes to become a member of the European Union (EU) must adhere to the values enshrined in Article 2 of the Treaty on European Union (TEU). After accession, it is assumed that all Member States are further bound by these same values, such as the rule of law. However, the successful enlargement of the EU, especially towards the new democracies of Eastern Europe, gave rise to the need for a means to balance this somewhat utopian view of irreversible common ground. Thus, in 1999, in preparation for the wave of accession of 2004, the Treaty of Amsterdam introduced Article 7 in TEU as a means of protecting EU values in the Member States. The study makes a juridical analysis of this text, focusing on its content, its possible legal effects, its pluses and minuses in representing an efficient means of dissuasion in relation to the Member States that have raised concerns of serious breaches of the rule of law in the last few years. The main goal is to identify the vulnerabilities of this legal mechanism in order to find solutions for its improvement and to suggest complementary measures which might aid obtaining positive results. The way this matter is addressed shall shape the future of the EU.

Keywords: European Union; values; rule of law; illiberalism; Article 7 TEU.

1. EU values in peril

In the last few years the EU's institutions, especially the European Commission and the European Parliament, have shown an increasing focus on protecting the values enumerated in Article 2 TEU[1]. These values are meant to represent the very basis for the Member States' agreement to work together within this original integration organisation, since Article 49 TEU states that respecting and promoting them is a condition for accession to the EU[2].

For the most part of the EU's existence, neither the EU, nor the Member States, had any cause for concern about the solidity of this common ground. However, at the end of the 1990s and the beginning of the years 2000, the European Union's institutions were preparing to implement the expansion policy towards Eastern Europe and were negotiating with 12 states aspiring to membership status[3], some of them still undergoing a complex reform process to consolidate their newly found democracy. The number of Member States was expected to grow from 15 to 27. In this context, the Treaty of Amsterdam[4] inserted a new text in TEU, former Article F.1[5], which was supposed to act as a preventive measure by empowering the EU to determine the existence of a serious and persistent breach by a Member State of EU values and, eventually, to "suspend certain of the rights deriving from the application of this Treaty to the Member State in question, including the voting rights of the representative of the government of that Member State in the Council."[6] The Treaty of Nice[7] amended this Article, to allow a public warning that there is a clear risk of a serious breach of EU values by a Member State, further emphasizing that the objective is to have the Member State reconsider its position, rather than act when the damage is already done.

The study shall make a legal analysis of Article 7 TEU, in correlation to Article 2 TEU, then it shall present the steps taken so far by EU institutions in applying this text in response to concerns about serious breaches of the rule of law by some Member States, especially in the last three years.

The matter is not only recent and in development, as it is the first time Article 7 TEU might be applied, but it is also of the utmost importance for the future of the EU, giving rise to a fiery debate about the efficiency of the means to protect EU values at the disposal of EU institutions and about complementary solutions that

* PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, Judge at the Bucharest County Court (e-mail: madalinalarion@gmail.com).

[1] Article 2 TEU reads: "The Union is founded on the values of respect for human dignity, freedom, democracy, equality, the rule of law and respect for human rights, including the rights of persons belonging to minorities. These values are common to the Member States in a society in which pluralism, non-discrimination, tolerance, justice, solidarity and equality between women and men prevail." The Treaty on European Union was signed at Maastricht on 7 February 1992 and is in force since 1 November 1993. For the consolidated version of TEU see: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/collection/eu-law/treaties/treaties-force.html, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[2] Article 49 TEU first thesis of the first paragraph: "Any European State which respects the values referred to in Article 2 and is committed to promoting them may apply to become a member of the Union."

[3] In 2004 the EU welcomed: Czech Republic, Cyprus, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Malta, Poland, Slovakia, Slovenia and in 2007 Bulgaria and Romania.

[4] Signed on 2 October 1997. It entered into force on 1 May 1999.

[5] Currently Article 7 of the consolidated version of TEU.

[6] Article 1 point 9 of the Treaty of Amsterdam, available at: https://europa.eu/european-union/sites/europaeu/files/docs/ body/treaty_of _amsterdam_en.pdf, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[7] Signed on 26 February 2001. It entered into force on 1 February 2003.

might be adopted, such as infringement actions or the multi-speed EU or the differential allocation of funds.

The study aims to identify the weaknesses of Article 7 TEU and give suggestions on how it could be improved, to present the actions taken so far by EU institutions on its basis and to assess their efficiency, in an effort to see the limits of the current mechanisms and to find complementary ones that would favor constructive solutions.

Given the great interest the subject matter stirs up in legal literature, there are quite a few doctrinal works that have taken up the topic. The study intends to offer a more technical approach, focused on the legal texts and on the juridical aspects of the problems being debated.

2. The legal mechanism for protecting EU values

2.1 The creation and development of Article 7 TEU

The 1993 Copenhagen European Council took the view "that post-communist central and eastern European countries had a vocation to become members of the Union"[8]. One of the three criteria the European Council set out for the candidate country aspiring to membership was achieving the "stability of institutions guaranteeing democracy, the rule of law, human rights and respect for and protection of minorities"[9]. This led to a development of the normative basis for enlargement, which included amending Article 49 TEU by the Treaty of Amsterdam in the sense of expressly providing the cadidate's obligation to respect the principles the Union is founded on: liberty, democracy, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the rule of law[10].

A complementary legal measure, designed to ensure this criterion is met also post-accession, was the introduction in TEU of current Article 7. The initial text established the competence and described the procedure which allowed the Council to determine the existence of a serious and persistent breach by a Member State of the principles mentioned above and to apply the sanction of suspending certain rights of that state deriving from membership status, such as the right to vote in the Council.

Further, the Treaty of Nice added a first paragraph that permitted the Council to determine even just the existence of a clear risk of a serious breach of the principles and to address appropriate recommendations to that state[11]. This leaves the necessary room for a diplomatic solution before the fait accompli. The Commission expressed the view that: "By giving the Union the capacity to act preventively in the event of a clear threat of a serious breach of the common values, Nice greatly enhanced the operational character of the means already available under the Amsterdam Treaty, which allowed only remedial action after the serious breach had already occurred[12]."

The last amending treaty that reformed EU constitutional law, the Treaty of Lisbon, inserted current Article 2 in TEU and modified Articles 7 and 49 TEU accordingly, replacing the reference to the principles set out in former Article 6 paragraph 1 TEU with the reference to the values EU is founded on[13].

It also replaced the words 'The Council, meeting in the composition of the Heads of State or Government and acting by unanimity' with 'The European Council, acting by unanimity', in order to differentiate between the Council and the European Council. The latter was officially included among EU's institutions by the Treaty of Lisbon[14]. It is composed of the heads of state or government of the Member States, together with its President and the President of the Commission. The High Representative of the Union for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy takes part in its work. It has a political role, providing the EU with the necessary impetus for its development and defining the general political directions and priorities. It does not exercise legislative functions[15]. The Council, on the other hand, is the traditional legislative of the EU and it consists of a representative of each Member State at ministerial level [16].

The other adaptations the Treaty of Lisbon made to Article 7 TEU are of a technical nature[17] and they do not represent fundamental changes to the procedure.

---

[8] Hillion, "EU Enlargement", 193.

[9] Conclusions of the Presidency of the European Council in Copenhagen, 21-22 June 1993, page 13, available at http://www.consilium.europa.eu/en/european-council/conclusions/1993-2003/, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[10] Article 1 points 8 and 15 of the Treaty of Amsterdam, available at: https://europa.eu/european-union/sites/europaeu/files /docs/body/treaty_of_amsterdam_en.pdf, last accessed on 10 March 2018. See also Fuerea, Manualul…, 2011, 67.

[11] Article 1 point 1 of the Treaty of Nice, available at: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=CELEX:12001C/TXT, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[12] Communication from the Commission to the Council and the European Parliament on Article 7 of the Treaty on European Union. Respect for and promotion of the values on which the Union is based, Brussels, 15.10.2003, COM(2003) 606 final, available at: http://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2003/EN/1-2003-606-EN-F1-1.Pdf, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[13] Article 1 points 3, 9 and 48 of the Treaty of Lisbon, available at: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/HTML/?uri=OJ:C:2007:306:FULL&from=EN, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[14] For the legal recognition and role of the European Council prior to this treaty, see Craig and de Búrca, 2009, 68-72.

[15] Article 15 paragraphs 1 and 2 TEU.

[16] Article 16 paragraphs 1 and 2 TEU. For a comparison between the Council and the European Council, see Fuerea, 2011, Manualul…, 102-103.

[17] For a concurrent opinion, see Gâlea, 2012, 28.

2.2. Article 7 TEU's content[18]

Since respecting and promoting the common EU values by all Member States represents the foundation of the EU and the basis for the application of the principle of mutual trust, the scope of Article 7 TEU is not confined to areas covered by EU law but extends to areas where the Member States can act autonomously. As recent history proved, it is more often in the fields where there is no obligation to have harmonized legislation that national measures are more likely to be questionable.

Also, Article 7 TEU is not designed as a remedy for individual breaches in specific situations. It is a solution of last-resort, a concerted action for systematic problems, that raise to a certain threshold of seriousness and persistence.

As presented above, Article 7 TEU offers two possibilities for protecting EU values, each with its own procedure:

a) for the Council to determine the existence of a clear risk of a serious breach of EU's values by a Member State;
b) for the European Council to determine the existence of a serious and persistent breach of EU's values by a Member State.

In the first case, the first paragraph of Article 7 TEU provides that the Council can act on the basis of a reasoned proposal by one third of the Member States, by the European Parliament or by the European Commission and only after hearing the Member State in question and obtaining the consent of the European Parliament. The Council may decide, by a majority of four fifths of its members, either to make recommendations, or to declare that there is a clear risk of a serious breach by a Member State of the values referred to in Article 2 TEU.

Thus, the Council has the discretion to appreciate on the grounds of the matter: whether there is a risk, whether that risk is clear and what values are in peril by the national measures the state in question has taken or is about to take; whether the materialisation of the risk would amount to a serious breach. The threat is potential, but it must be clear, obvious, unequivocal.

From a procedural point of view, the discretion is reduced to the nature of its decision: wether it is enough to just make recommendations or to directly declare the existence of the risk. The other procedural conditions are quite restrictive: just three subjects are allowed to start the procedure; the Council cannot start it ex officio; the Council has to obtain first the consent of the European Parliament, given with an absolute majority of two thirds of its component members[19]; it has to hear the Member State in question; it has to verify regularly if the grounds on which it detetermined the existence of the clear risk subsist.

It is not clear who has the primary responsibility for starting the procedure and assessing the situation. As 'Guardian of the Treaties', it would seem that the institution with the executive role, the European Commission, is responsible with following the facts and making its findings known to the other institutions. This is confirmed by the Commissions actions in recent years, as it shall be shown in subsection 2.4.

Since there isn't an express interdiction, the Council may follow the procedure and decide to give recommendations and, if those recommendations are not fully observed, it may follow it again and declare the existence of a clear risk.

The second case has two stages, in a logical succession in the sense that sanctions may be applied only after the existence of a serious and persistent breach of EU's values by a Member State is determined.

The second paragraph of Article 7 TEU is dedicated to the first stage. This time the European Council has the discretion to assess the grounds of the matter: whether there is a breach of one or more values; if that breach is serious enough; if it is persistent.

The Commission explained that, in order to determine the seriousness of the breach a veriety of criteria will have to be taken into account, including the purpose and the result of the breach", like the fact that vulnerable social classes are affected and that several values are breached simultaneously. Further, the Commission noted that persistence can be expressed in a veriety of manners, like: adopting legislation or [18] Article 7 TEU reads: "1. On a reasoned proposal by one third of the Member States, by the European Parliament or by the European Commission, the Council, acting by a majority of four fifths of its members after obtaining the consent of the European Parliament, may determine that there is a clear risk of a serious breach by a Member State of the values referred to in Article 2. Before making such a determination, the Council shall hear the Member State in question and may address recommendations to it, acting in accordance with the same procedure.

The Council shall regularly verify that the grounds on which such a determination was made continue to apply.

2.The European Council, acting by unanimity on a proposal by one third of the Member States or by the Commission and after obtaining the consent of the European Parliament, may determine the existence of a serious and persistent breach by a Member State of the values referred to in Article 2, after inviting the Member State in question to submit its observations.

3. Where a determination under paragraph 2 has been made, the Council, acting by a qualified majority, may decide to suspend certain of the rights deriving from the application of the Treaties to the Member State in question, including the voting rights of the representative of the government of that Member State in the Council. In doing so, the Council shall take into account the possible consequences of such a suspension on the rights and obligations of natural and legal persons.

The obligations of the Member State in question under the Treaties shall in any case continue to be binding on that State.

4.The Council, acting by a qualified majority, may decide subsequently to vary or revoke measures taken under paragraph 3 in response to changes in the situation which led to their being imposed.

5.The voting arrangements applying to the European Parliament, the European Council and the Council for the purposes of this Article are laid down in Article 354 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union." Text available at: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=CELEX:12016M/TXT, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[19] Article 354 paragraph 4 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU).

administrative instruments or mere administrative or political practices of the authorities of the Member State that already form the object of complaints or court actions; systematic repetition of individual breaches; repeated condemnations for the same type of breach over a period of time by an international court such as the European Court of Human Rights and not demonstrating the intention to take practical remedial action[20].

The procedure in paragraph 2 of Article 7 TEU is even more restrictive than in paragraph 1. Now there are only two subjects that can start the procedure, a third of the Member States or the European Commission; the prior approval of the European Parliament is still required and the European Council must decide unanimously. However, the vote of the representative of the state in question and the abstentions are not taken into account for achieving unanimity[21].

The third paragraph of Article 7 TEU sets forth the sanctions. This second stage is a possibility for the Council, not an obligation, as deduced from a grammatical interpretation of the text which contains the verb 'may'. Thus, the Council may decide to suspend certain of the rights of the Member State in question, including the right to vote in the Council, although the state shall still be bound by all the correlative obligations.

The Council must act by a qualified majority and must take into account the possible consequences of such a suspension on the rights and obligations of natural and legal persons.

The fourth paragraph of Article 7 TEU allows the Council to modify or to revoke these sanctions, also with a qualified majority, if the situation that determined the European Council to declare the breach changes. The principle of symmetry is applied in part, only with respect to the Council's power to apply and modify or revoke the sanction. But, by doing so, the Council makes an implicit decision on the persistence of a serious breach although it does not have the power to declare its existence.

The fifth paragraph of Article 7 TEU sends to the provisions of Article 354 TFEU for the voting arrangements applying to the institutions involved in the two procedures.

One observation that can be made after reading Article 7 TEU is that there is no obligation to follow first the procedure in paragraph 1 of Article 7 in order to be able to start the procedure in paragraphs 2-4 against the same Member State. There is nothing in the text to limit direct recourse to paragraph 2 if the facts of the matter call for a more ferm position from the EU, as there is nothing to limit using them in a succesive manner if the facts of the case allow it.

Also, one can even imagine a simultaneous application of both procedures, the first for some national measures that present risk to one or more EU values and the second for other national measures that amount to breaches of other EU values, with regard to the same Member State. However, such an approach might not be practical. It is probably more efficient to treat the matter as a whole and to take the firmer action.

Another observation is that there aren't any legal elements to facilitate the assessment of the risk or of the breach. The Council and the European Council have the discretionary power to qualify the factual elements presented to them about the measures implemented or about to be implemented by a Member State as representing a clear risk for one or more of EU's values or as amounting to a serious and persistent breach of one or more EU values.

Furthermore, many legal notions do not have a definition in the Treaties. The values in Article 2 TEU, such as democracy, the rule of law, respect for human rights, pluralism or tolerance, do not have a predefined content. They are abstract notions and it is not always easy to say if a certain measure poses a risk to or represents a breach of one of them.

Of course, a systematic interpretation of these notions is possible to some extent, as for some, like gender equality, there is subsequent EU legislation.

Sometimes the interpretation of the content of these values can be deduced from the Court of Justice of the European Union's jurisprudence, or from that of other international courts, such as the Court of Human Rights or from other international agreements EU Member States are parties to.

Doctrinal works may also offer pertinent arguments and explanations to aid interpretation.

A detailed analysis of the values the EU is founded on would far exceed the scope of this study, as each of them is a vast subject in itself.

However, it is useful to mention a few details about the rule of law. The notion is complex and there isn't consensus on all of its definitional elements. The interpretation of this term also depends on "specific national historical diversities of a political, institutional, legal"[22] and philosophical nature.

Still, there is a rather general agreement that the rule of law has two constituent elements: the formal one, regarding the authority of the lawmaker and the quality of the law (the law should be adopted by a freely and fairly elected majority; the law should be clear, predictable, stable, not retroactive) and the substantive one, concerned with obeying and correctly applying the law (no one is above the law; an independent judiciary; access to justice and judicial review; proportionality; equality and non-discrimination; transparency) [23].

[20] Communication from the Commission to the Council and the European Parliament on Article 7 of the Treaty on European Union. Respect for and promotion of the values on which the Union is based, Brussels, 15.10.2003, COM(2003) 606 final, page 8, available at: http://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2003/EN/1-2003-606-EN-F1-1.Pdf, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[21] Article 354 paragraph 1 TFEU.

[22] Bárd, Carrera, Guild and Kochenov, 2016, 53.

Having considered the broad view of the rule of law, two authors defined "rule of law backsliding as the process through which elected public authorities deliberately implement governmental blueprints which aim to systematically weaken, annihilate or capture internal cheks on power with the view of dismantling the liberal democratic state and entrenching the long-term rule of the dominant party"[24].

2.3. Legal effects

Article 7 TEU produces, first of all, declaratory effects. The consequence of applying the procedures described in the first two of its paragraphs is, basically, a warning signal from the other Member States for the Member State in question. As we have seen above, only if the Member State has already breached one or more of EU's values in a persistent and serious manner, concrete sanctions can be imposed, consisting in a suspension of certain rights provided by the Treaties, such as the right to vote in the Council.

The text does not specify what are the rights that may be suspended and offers just the example of the right to vote in the Council. Thus, it is for the institution enabled to apply the sanction, the Council, to choose from the rights established for the Member States by the Treaties that represent EU's constitutional law. The only obligation of the Council is to choose the sanction taking into account the possible consequences of such a suspension on the rights and obligations of natural and legal persons.

If this is the only limit for the Council's discretion, one can wonder if the Council could suspend, for example, the distribution of funds to that state or its right to vote in all the other institutions.

Even if such measures could be imposed it is difficult to get to this point because of the large majorities required for a legal vote and especially because the European Council must decide in unanimity. It is true that the state in question cannot vote (nemo iudex in causa sua) and that abstentions are not taken into account, but recent developments have shown that two or more Member States may be in similar situations and express support for each other. The consequence is that the Member States in question could veto the European Council's decision and avoid being sanctioned by the Council.

Since Article 7 TEU uses the singular when referring to a member state, there is nothing in the text to suggest the European Council could do anything else than deal with the situation in each state separately. This conclusion is supported by the principle that responsibility is personal.

On the other hand, there is also the argument that if Article 7 TEU is to be interpreted in the light of the effet utile principle, then the two or more Member States should lose their veto of sanctions against the other in case Article 7 TEU is triggered against all of them[25].

The Member State in question could have resorted to using the annulment action established by Article 263-264 TFEU[26] against the Council's decision and against the European Council's decision. The legal requirements regarding what acts can be challenged, by whom and against whom would have been met. The state would have had to observe the time limit of 2 months and to present the factual and legal aspects as to amount to one of the reasons for annulment: lack of competence, infringement of an essential procedural requirement, infringement of the Treaties or of any rule of law relating to their application, or misuse of powers[27].

However, such a possibility was precluded by the Treaty of Lisbon, which inserted new Article 269 in the TFEU. This text gives the Court of Justice[28] jurisdiction to decide on the legality of an act adopted by the European Council or by the Council pursuant to Article 7 TUE. The action may be filed only by the Member State concerned by a determination of the European Council or of the Council and in respect solely of the procedural stipulations contained in Article 7 TEU. There is a time-limit of one month from the date of such determination and the Court is obliged to rule within one month from the date of the request.

This legal remedy appears as a special type of annulment action, with a specific object: the acts adopted by the Council and the European Council on the basis of Article 7 TEU. The parties may only be the Member State in question and the institution that adopted the act. The reasons for annulment are confined to procedural aspects. For example, an infringement of a procedural requirement would be if the Council decides without the consent of the European Parliament.

The Court does not have jurisdiction to substitute itself to the Council or the European Council and decide otherwise on the grounds of the matter, nor can it apply other, lesser or harsher, sanctions.

The procedure is rapid, but, in our opinion, there is nothing to prevent the Member State from asking the suspension of application of the act until the Court gives its judgment[29].

---

[23] See also Kochenov and van Wolferen, 2018, 4-5, Bárd, Carrera, Guild and Kochenov, 2016, 53-56, Leal-Arcas, 2014 and Tamanaha, 2007.
[24] Pech and Scheppele, 2017, 7.
[25] See Pech and Scheppele, 2017,24.
[26] About the annulment action, see Schütze, 2012, 260-273 and Fuerea, 2016, Dreptul…, 65-74.
[27] Article 263 paragraph 2 TFEU.
[28] The former Court of Justice of the European Communities. Different from the General Court and the former Civil Service Tribunal, but part of the Court of Justice of the European Union.
[29] See Article 278 TFEU and Article 39 of Protocol No. 3 to TFEU on the Statute of the Court of Justice of the European Union.

2.4 The first attempts to apply Article 7 TEU

Hungary is the first EU Member State that took national measures which raised concerns about the state's commitment to EU values, especially the rule of law. As early as 2011, the President of the Commission adressed the issue of a new Hungarian law that put all media under the control of a media council which contained only members of the governing party[30]. With a comfortable majority in parliament, the governing party made a constitutional reform and then passed a number of other laws crticised by EU officials for non-compliance with the rule of law, such as the one that would affect the independence of the Central Bank or the one lowering the retirement age for judges, prosecutors and public notaries. The Commission started infringement procedures[31].

The Hungarian Prime Minister in office since 2010 explained in multiple speeches that his government has adopted a new approach, illiberalism, which does not reject the fundamental principles of liberalism, but adds a special, national approach[32].

By 2013 the idea of a systemic problem started taking shape and the President of the Comission stated that: "Safeguarding its values, such as the rule of law, is what the European Union was made to do, from its inception to the latest chapters in enlargement.

In last year's State of the Union speech, at a moment of challenges to the rule of law in our own member states, I addressed the need to make a bridge between political persuasion and targeted infringement procedures on the one hand, and what I call the nuclear option of Article 7 of the Treaty, namely suspension of a member states' rights.

Experience has confirmed the usefulness of the Commission role as an independent and objective referee. We should consolidate this experience through a more general framework. It should be based on the principle of equality between member states, activated only in situations where there is a serious, systemic risk to the rule of law, and triggered by pre-defined benchmarks.

The Commission will come forward with a communication on this. I believe it is a debate that is key to our idea of Europe[33]."

This new instrument was to be a soft law one, not legally binding, called the Rule of Law Framework[34]. It was adopted in March 2014 and it is meant to be an early warning tool, a pre-Article 7 TEU procedure. Esentially, it allows the Commission to assess the situation, to issue an opinion about the existence of a systemic threat to the rule of law, to make recommendations and to monitor their implementation[35].

We share the opinion that "Article 7(1) TEU implicitly empowers the Commission to investigate any potential risk of a serious breach of EU values by giving it the competence to submit a reasoned proposal to the Council should the Commission be of the view that Article 7 TEU ought to be triggered on this basis. […] The Rule of Law Framework merely makes more transparent how the communication between the Commission and the potentially offending government shall proceed"[36].

Though it was clearly designed for Hungary, this instrument was to be used first in relation to Poland. After the legislative elections in October 2015, the governing party won an absolute majority and started taking a series of controversial measures. The first was to nullify the election of constitutional judges by the prior parliament and to elect new ones. The Constitutional Tribunal declared the election of the new judges unconstitutional, but the government refused to publish or acknowledge this ruling. This determined the European Commission to follow the Rule of Law Framework and to adopt a Recommendation on 27 July 2016[37], but the results were not positive. Poland refused to comply and even threatened to formulate an annulment action[38] against the Rule of Law Framework, even if it cannot be the object of such an action, since it is not legally binding.

Poland continued on this path, adopting even more concerning measures, like the Act of 22 July 2016, considered a final act of constitutional capture that strongly limited the independence of the [30] Statement by President of the European Commission José Manuel Durão Barroso at the press conference held after the meeting of the Commission with the Hungarian Presidency of the Council, 7 January 2011, Speech/11/4, available at: http://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_SPEECH-11-4_en.htm, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[31] See, for example, the judgment of the Court of Justice in case C-286/12, available at: http://curia.europa.eu/juris/ document/ document.jsf?text=&docid=129324&pageIndex=0&doclang=EN&mode=lst&dir=&occ=first&part=1&cid=1032099, last accessed on 10 March 2018. The Court declared that by adopting a national scheme requiring compulsory retirement of judges, prosecutors and notaries when they reach the age of 62 – which gives rise to a difference in treatment on grounds of age which is not proportionate as regards the objectives pursued – Hungary has failed to fulfil its obligations under Articles 2 and 6(1) of Council Directive 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation.

[32] See, for example, Prime Minister Viktor Orbán's Speech at the 25th Bálványos Summer Free University and Student Camp, 26 July 2014, Tusnádfürdő (Băile Tuşnad), Romania, available at: http://www.kormany.hu/en/the-prime-minister/the-prime-minister-s-speeches/prime-minister-viktor-orban-s-speech-at-the-25th-balvanyos-summer-free-university-and-student-camp, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[33] See State of the Union address 2013, 11 September 2013, http://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_SPEECH-13-684_en.htm, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[34] European Commission presents a framework to safeguard the rule of law in the European Union, Strasbourg, 11 March 2014, press release available at: http://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_IP-14-237_en.htm, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[35] For more details, see Kochenov and Pech, 2016 and von Bogdandy, Antpöhler and Ioannidis, 2016.

[36] Pech and Scheppele, 2017, 12.

[37] Available at: http://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_IP-16-2643_en.htm, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[38] See Articles 263-264 TFEU.

Constitutional Tribunal[39], and the three justice laws that allowed the governing party to appoint the president of the Constitutional Tribunal and to reenact a law that had been declared unconstitutional. Also, four new acts were passed in one month, that allowed the government to fire all judges of the Supreme Court and replace the leadership of the lower courts.

In response, the Commission chose to adopt a second Recommendation on 21 December 2016 and a third one on 26 July 2017 and initiated infringement proceedings arguing that the independence of judges is undermined by the introduction of a different retirement age for female and male judges and by giving the Minister of Justice the discretionary power to prolong the mandate of judges who have reached the retirement age, as well as to dismiss and appoint court presidents, even if independence is required by Article 19 paragraph 1 TEU and Article 47 of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights[40]. The course of this infringement procedure has only reached the Reasoned Opinion[41].

The European Parliament has supported the Commission's concerns and adopted three Resolutions: of 13 April 2016, 14 September 2016 and 15 November 2017, calling on the Polish Government to comply with all provisions relating to the rule of law and fundamental rights enshrined in the Treaties, the Charter of Fundamental Rights, the European Convention on Human Rights and international human rights standards, and to engage directly in dialogue with the Commission[42].

The Council, on the other hand, was silent for the most part. It discussed the issue in the General Affairs Council on 16 May 2017 and told the Commission to continue dialogue with Poland, despite criticising Poland for lack of cooperation.

Finally, after two years of unfruitful dialogue with Poland, the Commission decided to activate Article 7 paragraph 1 TEU and to make the formal proposal to the Council. The Commission explained: "It is up to Poland to identify its own model for its justice system, but it should do so in a way that respects the rule of law; this requires it to safeguard the independence of the judiciary, separation of powers and legal certainty.

A breach of the rule of law in one Member State has an effect on all Member States and the Union as a whole. First, because the independence of the judiciary – free from undue political interference – is a value that reflects the concept of European democracy we have built up together, heeding the lessons of the past. Second, because when the rule of law in any Member State is put into question, the functioning of the Union as a whole, in particular with regard to Justice and Home Affairs cooperation and the functioning of the Internal Market, is put into question too[43]."

On 1 March 2018, the Parliament gave its consent for the Commission's proposal to trigger Article 7 paragraph 1 TEU and to ask Poland to address the risk[44]. The procedure is ongoing and, even if the majorities required by Article 7 paragraph 1 TEU are reached, it is doubtful that new recommendations will be observed by Poland. As to sanctions, Hungary has already declared it shall support Poland and implied it will veto an eventual European Council decision in this respect[45]. We shall have to see if the doctrinal view that the two states could not veto each other's sanctions because that would take away the effet utile of Article 7 TEU shall prevail or not.

In Hungary's case the Commission did not activate the Rule of Law Framework, despite multiple resolutions adopted by the European Parliament[46] and despite continuing to criticise some of the measures adopted by the government, like the laws that allowed political control over the appointment of judges and their individual career and even case asignment to specific judges, or the ones that targeted the Central European University and foreign funded non-governmental organisations. The Commission took the view that, unlike Poland, Hungary never refused dialogue and has made some progress[47].

In legal literature, the explanations found are of a more practical nature and focus either on the support Hungary receives in the European Parliament as a member of the largest political group, the European People's Party, whereas Poland is part of a much smaller political group or on the gravity of the situation in the sense that Hungary passed these laws after legally modifying its Constitution by virtue of its large majority in parliament, whereas Poland did it after [39] See Śledzińska-Simon and Ziółkowski, 2017, pages 18-21.

[40] European Commission launches infringement against Poland over measures affecting the judiciary, Brussels, 29 July 2017, press release available at: http://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_IP-17-2205_en.htm, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[41] Independence of the judiciary: European Commission takes second step in infringement procedure against Poland, Strasbourg, 12 September 2017, press release available at: http://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_IP-17-3186_en.htm, last accessed on 10 March 2018. For more details on the infringement procedure, see Fuerea, 2016, Dreptul…, 112-123.

[42] See, for example, Resolution of 15 November 2017, available at: http://www.europarl.europa.eu/sides/getDoc.do? type= TA&language=EN&reference=P8-TA-2017-0442, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[43] Rule of Law: European Commission acts to defend judicial independence in Poland, Brussels, 20 December 2017, press release available at: http://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_IP-17-5367_en.htm, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[44] Press release available at: http://www.europarl.europa.eu/news/en/press-room/20180226IPR98615/rule-of-law-in-poland-parliament-supports-eu-action, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[45] Viktor Orbán's speech at the 28th Bálványos Summer Open University and Student Camp, 22 July 2017, Tusnádfürdő (Băile Tuşnad), Romania, available at: http://www.kormany.hu/en/the-prime-minister/the-prime-minister-s-speeches/viktor-orban-s-speech-at-the-28th-balvanyos-summer-open-university-and-student-camp, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[46] For example, the Resolutions of 10 June 2015, 16 December 2015, 25 October 2016 and 17 May 2017.

[47] Pech and Scheppele, 2017, 19.

infringing the decision of its Constitutional Tribunal, which it refused to publish and observe. Poland continued with measures to undermine the independence and legitimacy of the constitutional court. Thus, constitutionality of national legislation can no longer be guaranteed, which in turn affects the principle of mutual trust between Member States[48].

Finally, the European Parliament was the one that took the stand and adopted a Resolution on 17 May 2017 in which it stated its belief that the current situation in Hungary represents a clear risk of a serious breach of the values referred to in Article 2 of the TEU and warrants the launch of the Article 7 paragraph 1 TEU procedure, then instructed its Committee on Civil Liberties, Justice and Home Affairs to initiate the proceedings and draw up a specific report with a view to holding a plenary vote on a reasoned proposal calling on the Council to act pursuant to Article 7 paragraph 1 of the TEU[49]. The resolution is still being prepared and nothing has been made public yet.

Some concerns have been expressed about certain deficiencies in other Member States, such as Bulgaria, Greece, Italy, Romania and Slovakia[50], but the EU institutions have not indicated that starting the mechanism for the protection of EU values is imminent. Also, Bulgaria and Romania are still under the Verification and Cooperation Mechanism.

2.5. Solutions for increasing efficiency

As deduced from the presentation above, there is a quest for solutions to improve the efficiency of the mechanism that Article 7 TEU represents and/or for complementary measures.

The text of Article 7 TEU could be improved, for example, by reducing the majorities for a legal vote in the EU institutions involved, by forbidding Member States that are in similar situations to veto each other's decisions in the European Council or by introducing new types of sanctions[51]. Still, this might prove to be very difficult because it would mean amending the founding Treaties, a procedure which requires each and all of the Members States to ratify the amending treaty[52]. Of course, the Member State or States in question would refuse to act against their own interest. In such a case, Article 48 paragraph 5 TEU provides the matter shall be referred to the European Council and no other legal consequence. Thus, a legal vicious circle, which only leaves the possibility of a political solution.

As we have seen, a complementary measure of the Commission was to start infringement proceedings on multiple specific matters. This has the advantage of the intervention of the Court of Justice and the possibility to apply pecuniary sanctions. The disadvantage is having to fit into the frame of Articles 258-260 TFEU, as interpreted so far by the Court of Justice and not being able to tackle the systemic issue, the situation as a whole. In principle, the Commission or another Member State has to argue that specific obligations provided for the Members States by the Treaties have been disrespected.

However, it was suggested that the Commission could adopt a more ambitious interpretation of its infringement powers and adjust them to deal with Member States that systematically challenge the rule of law by bringing together a set of distinct complaints into a single action and by insisting on reversing the damage caused to the uniform application of EU law across the Union or even by arguing a violation of Article 2 directly[53].

While we find pertinent the first two doctrinal proposals, the last of them seems to create a parallel system with Article 7 TEU. It would appear that the general rule, that violations of EU law can be the subject of an infringement procedure, would be applied in parallel with the special norm, that provides for specific sanctions for the violation of Article 2 TEU.

Furthermore, as we have seen above, the exact content of the concepts behind the values is difficult to identify and some of the criticised measures are often taken in areas of national jurisdiction, where the Court of Justice of the European Union does not have competence[54]. So, relying direcly on Article 2 TEU might mean, at least in part, to subject such measures to the judicial review of the Court of Justice. It is doubtful the Court would agree to take the view of such an extensive interpretation of its powers.

Another complementary measure could be reforming other areas of EU competence in a sense that would affect the rogue state's interests and stimulate it to comply with EU values. A few proposals have been made:

a) a multi-speed EU[55] or a two-tiered EU[56] with a stronger integration for those in the euro group,

[48] See Pech and Scheppele, 2017, 23.

[49] Resolution available at: http://www.europarl.europa.eu/sides/getDoc.do?type=TA&language=EN&reference=P8-TA-2017-0216, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[50] See von Bogdandy, Antpöhler and Ioannidis, 2016, page 1. See also Halmai, 2017. For an opinion on the causes that make central and eastern European countries more vulnerable to facing a crisis of constitutional democracy, see Bugarič and Ginsburg, 2016.

[51] For introducing gradated sanctions, culminating with expelling, see Bugarič, 2016, 14-15.

[52] See Article 48 TEU. For a commentary on this Article, including the problem of what would happen if a Member State does not proceed with the ratification of the amending treaty, see Hartley, 2010, 88-92.

[53] Pech and Scheppele, 2017, 32. In support of this opinion, see Bárd, Carrera, Guild and Kochenov, 2016, 30.

[54] For a concurrent opinion, see Bugarič, 2016, 13.

[55] See the White paper on the future of Europe – Reflection and scenarios for the EU27 by 2015, COM(2017)2015, 1 March 2017, page 20, available at: https://ec.europa.eu/commission/sites/beta-political/files/white_paper_on_the_future_of_europe_en.pdf, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[56] Reflection paper on the deepening of the Economic and Monetary Union, COM(2017) 291 final, Brussels, 31 May 2017, available at: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=CELEX:52017DC0291, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

since some of the central and eastern European countries, including Hungary and Poland, are not in the Eurozone;

b) withholding or suspending the allocation of EU funds or more strict criteria for funding. Both Hungary and Poland have benefited from important regional and cohesion EU funds;

c) reform of citizens' initiative and political party funding, in order to increase democratic legitimacy[57].

Some of these measures could still be blocked because they would require an amending treaty.

The proposal regarding the different levels of integration[58] offers Member States more choices but might have the effect of discouraging trust in the European project in the countries outside the hard core of integration.

As far as funding is concerned, this would put pressure on the governments of the Member States involved but would affect primarily their inhabitants and the development of those regions of the internal market, diminishing, on the long run, the chances for the state to ever reach the common standards, against the very purpose of the EU funding.

Increasing public participation to decisionmaking and transparency of funding of the parties could have a positive effect on preserving liberal democracy and increasing public trust in the EU, but its results will probably show in some time. It does not provide an answer for the current challenges the rule of law faces in some Member States.

If diplomatic solutions fail, the crisis has the potential to persist for quite a long period of time. The Member State or Member States in question could refuse to observe the Council's recommendations, they could ignore or dismiss the declarations under paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 7 TEU, they might veto the European Council's decision for another state in a similar situation, they might use their right to file actions on the basis of Article 269 TFEU and even refuse to make any progress after being sanctioned. They could even choose to ignore the Court of Justice's judgement in infringement procedures, just as the Polish government "publicly indicated its intention to ignore the Court of Justice's interim injunction to suspend all logging"[59] in a protected forest.

If a state truly no longer shares all of EU's values and the differences are irreconcilable, an amiable separation might be in the best interest of all parties. If they agree, an international convention and/or an amending treaty could be drafted to decide the terms of the split (mutuus consensus, mutuus dissensus).

Also, the Member State could unilaterally decide to leave, using Article 50 TEU, just like the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland did.

But what if the other Member States decide expelling is the only solution? This would pose problems because, unlike other international agreements[60], the Treaties of the EU do not provide for a procedure of expelling, nor the grounds for it. The EU would have to resort to the rules of public international law[61]. For example, perhaps it may suspend or terminate the operation of the Treaties in relation to the rogue state on the basis of the violation of a provision essential to the accomplishment of the object or purpose of the Treaties[62], as Article 2 TEU can be considered such a provision.

It seems unlikely extreme events would take place. However, the loss of mutual trust and the dissolution of common values and standards could have other serious, unforseen consequences. For example, it was even noted that if the independence of the judiciary in Poland is structurally undermined, this might raise the issue whether Polish courts still constitute 'courts' within the meaning of Article 267 TFEU and can still be permitted access to the preliminary rulings procedure[63].

This is why it is important for all the parties to understand the gravity of these circumstances and to get actively involved in finding the proper combination of legal and political solutions, within a reasonable timeframe, to prevent the deterioration of the situation and irreparable damage to the EU's unity and strength.

---

[57] State of the Union 2017 - Democracy Package: Reform of Citizens' Initiative and Political Party Funding, Brussels, 15 September 2017, press release available at: http://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_IP-17-3187_en.htm, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

[58] For more about the concept of integration, see Dumitrașcu, 2012, 17-25.

[59] Pech and Scheppele, 2017, 16.

[60] Article 6 of the United Nations Charter reads: "A Member of the United Nations which has persistently violated the Principles contained in the present Charter may be expelled from the Organization by the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Security Council." Text available at: http://www.un.org/en/sections/un-charter/chapter-ii/index.html, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

Article 8 of the Statute of the Council of Europe reads: "Any member of the Council of Europe which has seriously violated Article 3 may be suspended from its rights of representation and requested by the Committee of Ministers to withdraw under Article 7. If such member does not comply with this request, the Committee may decide that it has ceased to be a member of the Council as from such date as the Committee may determine." Article 3 reads: "Every member of the Council of Europe must accept the principles of the rule of law and of the enjoyment by all persons within its jurisdiction of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and collaborate sincerely and effectively in the realisation of the aim of the Council as specified in Chapter I." Text available at: https://www.coe.int/en/web/conventions/full-list/-/conventions/rms/0900001680306052, last accessed on 1 March 2018.

For an overview of UN and Council of Europe's monitoring instruments, see Bárd, Carrera, Guild and Kochenov, 2016, 15-26.

[61] See Miga-Beșteliu, 2010, 104-107.

[62] Article 60 paragraph 3 letter b) of the Vienna Convention on the law of treaties, concluded on 23 May 1969, available at: https://treaties.un.org/doc/publication/unts/volume%201155/volume-1155-i-18232-english.pdf, last accessed on 10 March 2018. All of the EU's Member States, except France and Romania, are parties to this convention, as results from the status at 10 March 2018: https://treaties.un.org/pages/ViewDetailsIII.aspx?src=TREATY&mtdsg_no=XXIII-1&chapter=23&Temp=mtdsg3&clang=_en.

[63] Pech and Scheppele, 2017, 35. For more details about the preliminary rulings procedure, see Broberg and Fenger, 2010.

3. Conclusions

The developments in some Member States in the last few years, especially the rise of illiberalism in Hungary and Poland, have been interpreted by the European Union's institutions as posing a clear risk of a serious breach of EU values and especially of the rule of law. This brought into the spotlight Article 7 TEU, the mechanism for protecting EU values in the Member States, introduced in the EU's constitutional legislation in 1999 and amended in 2003, in order to prepare for the biggest wave of accession in the EU's history and to welcome central and eastern European fresh democracies.

An overview of Article 7 TEU's content and its possible legal effects is necessary now that the EU's institutions are preparing to apply it for the first time. The study has taken a juridical look at the text's strengths and weaknesses, in an effort to assess its efficiency in being a deterrent, as well as a sanctioning means and has presented the steps taken so far by the EU's institutions involved in the procedure in order to trigger Article 7 paragraph 1 TEU against Poland and Hungary. The last part was dedicated to an inventory of solutions for improving the protection mechanism, including complementary measures that might help in convincing rogue Member States to reevaluate their interests and their position and to choose a future in the EU.

The main objective of the research was to add to the legal debate and to the doctrinal works which draw attention to the importance and to the gravity of the subject matter in the hope of more involvement from both EU institutions and Member States in using and improving the existing mechanisms for the protection of the common values, values which define EU's identity and which have been so hard to win in the course of our history.

Related topics for further research could be a detailed analysis of each of the values enumerated in Article 2 TEU, in order to determine their definition and their content and a closer look at the proposals for the EU's reformation in the context of the many economic and political challenges it faces, including the first ever exercise by a Member State of its right to withdraw from the Union.

References

- Bárd, Petra, Carrera, Sergio, Guild, Elspeth and Kochenov, Dimitry, 21 April, 2016, An EU Mechanism on Democracy, the Rule of Law and Fundamental Rights, CEPS (Centre for European Policy Studies) Paper in Liberty and Security in Europe No. 91/April 2016. Available at: https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/ papers. cfm?abstract_id=2782340, last accessed on 10 March 2018
- Bugarič, Bojan, 8 May 2016, Protecting Democracy Inside the EU: On Article 7 TEU and the Hungarian Turn to Authoritarianism, in CLOSA, Reinforcing Rule of Law Oversight in the European Union, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, Forthcoming. Available at: https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=2777179
- Bugarič, Bojan and Ginsburg, Tom, 26 May 2016, Courts vs. Autocrats in Post - Communist Europe, to be published in Journal of Democracy, July 2016. Available at: https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers .cfm?abstract_id=2784806, last accessed on 10 March 2018
- Broberg, Morten, Fenger, Niels, 2010, Procedura trimiterii preliminare la Curtea Europeană de Justiţie, translated by Constantin Mihai Banu, Bucharest: Wolters Kluwer Romania Press
- Craig, Paul, and de Búrca, Gráinne, 2009, Dreptul Uniunii Europene. Comentarii, jurisprudenţă, doctrină., Fourth Edition, Hamangiu Press
- Dumitraşcu, Mihaela Augustina, 2012, Dreptul Uniunii Europene şi specificitatea acestuia, Bucharest: Universul Juridic Press
- Fuerea, Augustin, 2011, Manualul Uniunii Europene, Bucharest: Universul Juridic Press
- Fuerea, Augustin, 2016, Dreptul Uniunii Europene – principii, acţiuni, libertăţi –, Bucharest: Universul Juridic Press
- Gâlea, Ion, 2012, Tratatele Uniunii Europene. Comentarii şi explicaţii, Bucharest: CH Beck Press
- Halmai, Gábor, 3 May 2017, Second-Grade Constitutionalism? The Cases of Hungary and Poland, CSF-SSSUP Working Paper Series 1/2017, Eleven International Publishing. Available at: https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=2962292, last accessed on 10 March 2018
- Hartley, TC, 2010, The Foundations of European Union Law, New York: Oxford University Press Inc.
- Hillion, Cristophe, 2011, EU Enlargement in The Evolution of EU Law, Second Edition, edited by Paul Craig and Gráinne de Búrca, 187-216, New York: Oxford University Press Inc.
- Kochenov, Dimitry and Pech, Laurent, 29 February 2016, Better Late than Never? On the Commission's Rule of Law Framework and Its First Activation, 54 Journal of Common Market Studies 2016, pages 1062-1074, University of Groningen Faculty of Law Research Paper 2016-08. Available at: https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=2739893, last accessed on 10 March 2018
- Kochenov, Dimitry and van Wolferen, Matthijs, 17 January 2018, Dialogical Rule of Law and the Breakdown of Dialogue in the EU, European University Institute Department of Law Research Paper No. 2018/01. Available at: https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=3104282, last accessed on 10 March 2018
- Leal-Arcas, Rafael, 20 August 2014, Essential Elements of the Rule of Law Concept in the EU, Queen Mary School of Law Legal Studies Research Paper No. 180/2014. Available at: https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=2483749, last accessed on 10 March 2018.

- Miga-Beşteliu, Raluca, 2010, Drept internaţional public, Volume I, Second Edition, Bucharest: C.H. Beck Press
- Pech, Laurent and Scheppele, Kim Lane, 23 August 2017, Illiberalism Within: Rule of Law Backsliding in the EU, to be published in Cambridge Yearbook of European Legal Studies. Available at: https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=3009280, last accessed on 10 March 2018
- Schütze, Robert, 2012, Dreptul constituţional al Uniunii Europene, Bucharest: Universitară Press
- Sledzinska-Simon, Anna and Ziółkowski, Michał, 5 July 2017, Constitutional Identity of Poland: Is the Emperor Putting on the Old Clothes of Sovereignty?. Available at SSRN: https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=2997407, last accessed on 10 March 2018
- Tamanaha, Brian Z., 13 September 2007, A Concise Guide to the Rule of Law, Florence Workshop on the Rule of Law, Neil Walker, Gianluigi Palombella, eds., Hart Publishing Company, 2007, St. John's Legal Studies Research Paper No. 07-0082. Available at: https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=1012051, last accessed on 10 March 2018
- von Bogdandy, Armin, Antpöhler, Carlino and Ioannidis, Michael, 23 March 2016, Protecting EU Values - Reverse Solange and the Rule of Law Framework, Max Planck Institute for Comparative Public Law & International Law Research Paper No. 2016-04. Available at: https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=2771311, last accessed on 10 March 2018

FROM COVENANTS WITH GOD TO SOCIAL CONTRACT

Horaţiu MARGOI*

Abstract

Even the earliest societies have felt the need to adopt sets of laws to allow their own government. Although we start from an era in which not only the number of literate persons was reduced and even the material means of recording the legislation was even more limited, history has recorded numerous legislative codes since the antiquity. It is difficult to imagine a culture, anywhere on the planet, which has not known, since ancient times, various forms of understanding even though it has recorded different modes of normative expression. The indisputable necessity and applicability of such covenants and treaties also resides in their widespread, from Antiquity, from the political level to the level of relations between just two persons. Most of the covenants were not recorded on a support, the transcription of some by carving in stone, gave the chance of preserving them. It did not take long until man's ability to regulate social, economic, and political forms of organization has gone beyond conventional boundaries and man has received a covenant with divinity. The individual's agreement with society was just one step that, at least retrospectively, seems to be normalized. In time, the Humanity learned that any form of external constraint, be it religious or political-social, can only lead to diminishing, until suppression, of fundamental freedoms.

Keywords: covenants, treaties, codes of laws, Antiquity, legal systems, Age of Enlightenment, Social Contract.

1. Introduction

Covenants and treaties have been, since the period of the earliest forms of social organization, foundations for cohabitation and development of almost all groups of people. By establishing a set of rules, known and agreed, it was created a favorable framework to more harmonious relationships, based on a common and immutable value, consisting in the predictability of the other's behavior.

The indisputable necessity and applicability of such covenants and treaties also resides in their widespread, from Antiquity, from the political level to the level of relations between just two persons.

Recent studies identify a considerable number of documents, with covenant value, dated between 2500 - 46 BCE[1], coming even since the Near East, as an important source not only for the history of the area or only for this science.

Although the essential features of a covenant that complies with current normative requirements are also found in the content of those documents, there are significant features distinct from the present understanding of the notion of covenant. Of course, terms such as treaty, pact, contract, covenant, from the linguistic point of view, appear as neologisms, related to the temporary distance of the moment of conception of the documents referred to.

The legal construction under which the two convergent wills were met was, naturally, indissolubly linked to the real and symbolic perception of the related times.

It is necessary a special and temporal framing of the concept that fulfills the formal and substantive conditions of a covenant, which can not, in any way, ignore the etymological interpretation of the notion.

2. Content

Reported to the Semitic language family, the akkadian term birītu, designates „the area jointly owned by neighbors [...] but also a lock connecting the ends of a chain ..."[2] while the Hebrew term bĕrit, equivalent to the concept of covenant, was used, in laic sense, with the intention of describing association relationships between individuals or between larger groups or even nations.

The reasons for such associations were different and could be deduced, including from the quality of the parties or from the nature of the relationship between them. Thus, the covenants could be concluded, for example, between a powerful, expansionistic nation, as an alternative to the conquest of a nation in its path. Or, the covenants could be concluded between tribes, of similar or different force, in order to keep peace between them or to protect themselves from the attacks of rival tribes. At the same time, there were also covenants made from commercial or civil interests.

Although most of the covenants were not recorded on a support, the transcription of some by carving in stone, gave the chance of preserving them, not being neglected the number of such artifacts that are nowadays found in the world's important museums.

* PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: margoi.horatiu@gmail.com)

[1] KA Kitchen and PJN Lawrence, eds., Treaty, Law and Convention in the Ancient Near East, Wiesbaden: Harrassowity, 2012, ap. S. Greengus, Covenant and Treaty in the Hebrew Bible and Ancient Near East, in Ancient Israel's History, edited by BT Arnold and RS Hess, Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2014, p. 91

[2] see HALOT 1: 157 (s.v. bĕrit); CAD B 252-55. For brt, bryt in Egyptian documents, v. K. A. Kitchen, P. J. N. Lawrence, The Fall and Rise of the Covenant, Law, and Treaty, TynBul 40 (1989): 122-23. v. and id, Egypt, Ugarit, Qatna, and Covenant, UF 11 (1979): 453-64, by S. Greengus, Covenant and Treaty in the Hebrew Bible and in Ancient Near East, in Ancient Israel's History, edited by BT Arnold and RS Hess, Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2014, p. 91

Correlated with the object of the covenant and, implicitly, with its importance in the subjective appreciation of the connecting parties, the time of the conclusion was associated with various rituals, whose significance referred to the sanctions that the party who violated that convention could expect.

According to the conceptualization of the notion of solemnity, age related, the symbolic representation of the gravity of the violation of covenant conditions, whether concluded between individuals, families, tribes, or between nations, was the blood with which it was sealed. Otherwise, this form of sealing the bond grants the title of Blood Covenant and played an important role in respecting the alliances that ensured a peaceful cohabitation.

The covenants, in the translation and interpretation of the terms used in the documents containing them, were cut, in the sense that, upon their conclusion, animals of considerable size, predominantly sheep or cattle were sacrificed in a specific manner, then the contracting parties going through certain stages who amplified the solemnity of the moment.

A concrete and meaningful example is illustrated by two treatises dating from the Neo-Assyrian period around 750 BC, concluded by king Mat'ilu of Arpad, a kingdom from Syria, in which the first is written in Akkadian, with the Assyrian King, the other, written in Aramaic, with a regional ally[3].

The historical context was related to the difficult and ingrained situation of the Arpad state, constrained by imminent invasions, to decide between an alliance with Urartu or Assyria, either of which being a serious but indispensable compromise, given the pressure exerted by the two forces to make Arpad a buffer zone[4].

The exceptional situation that made these documents survive the time gives us the privilege of being able to study also the form and substantive of a treaty in that era.

The treaty concluded between King Mat'ilu of Arpad and Ashurnirari had as purpose the permission conferred by the Assyrian king to keep his throne, under humiliating conditions, concurrently agreed with slaughtering an animal.

Of the characteristics of a Blood Covenant, the most relevant is that of the effects expanded their validity throughout the existence of a line of descent of each of the parties, the obligations and rights established by those who concluded the covenant being perfectly valid for an unlimited number of subsequent generations[5].

Even in the presence of a descendant that breaks the Covenant, he does not lose, on the merits, its validity, and the sanction of its violation is reflected only to the person who violates it. Following the punishment or the death of the guilty of non-compliance, the initial effects of the Covenant continue to occur, these being considered as only suspended[6].

It is not the case of the Treaty between Mat'ilu and Ashurnirari, being obvious that the acceptance of such conditions represented an ephemeral state, of opportunity, which led to the disruption of the treaty by the disadvantaged and the conclusion of a new covenant with a neighbor ally, as shown.

What is relevant, however, is how more or less subtle symbols were integrated into the covenant closing ceremony, which was a common element of the covenants of that period.

It is difficult to imagine a culture, anywhere on the planet, which has not known, since ancient times, various forms of understanding even though it has recorded different modes of normative expression.

From a historical perspective, the covenant was created to enforce a binding agreement, stronger than an ordinary covenant, even having elements of sacredness and eternal life.

Blood was considered vital by most societies, and being inseparable from life, it also involved sacredness. By default, the bloodshed as an irreversible process was sacred, this trace also reflecting on the human actions that were connected with it.

One of the rituals involves two superficial cuts, on the arm or wrist of each contracting party, which were gathered together on top of a vessel of wine, following that the blood dropped to be mixed with the wine by an official priest and given to be drunk to each participant, that they get one blood, one identity. In Antiquity, it was believed that the blood of each part of the covenant entered into the other's body, therefore, their life became unique[7].

The Cutting of the Covenant is a symbolic representation of the Covenant's ending action, also seen from the perspective of the actual cutting of the prepared and killed animal for the Covenant's partners, as a complete and indispensable sacrifice. The offering of the sacrificial animal is the responsibility of King Vassal, as is his life that has been spared, the superior king deciding what kind of animal must be used in the sacrifice to be done by his Priest[8].

From a practical point of view, the cutting technique involves splitting the animal into two equal parts, on the spinal cord, the Priest exposing internal organs to the air. The two kings stood between the halves of the sacrifice and continued walking around each half of the animal, in opposite directions,

[3] S. Greengus, op. cit., p. 110
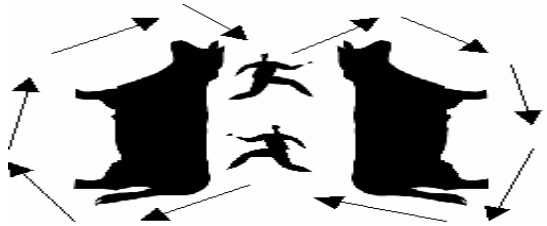
[4] E. G. H. Kraeling, Aram and Israel or The Aramaeans in Syria and Mesopotamia, New York: Columbia University Press, 1918, p.10
[5] D. Plant, The Blood Covenant of God, Macquarie Fields: Smashwords, 2010, p. 14.
[6] Idem, p. 17
[7] Idem, p. 180
[8] Ibidem, p. 182

following a strict rule, according to the following scheme[9]:



As they meet between the parts of the sacrifice, they addressed, initially, blessings to each other and enumerated their possessions as an inventory of what they intended to become a common heritage. This inventory could include, from case to case, personal property, land, people, towns and villages.

Then they continued to go to the other half of the sacrifice, uttering mutual curses, to divert over the one who violates the Covenant, its descendants or its people[10].

As they meet between the two sides of the sacrificed animal, this ceremony is completed with the command It will be done for you (or for me) as it was for this animal if we break the covenant[11].

Subsequent to this part of the ceremony was invoked, through the Priest, the Divinity who was going to be a witness. An important element lies in the fact that it was established, also in this respect, the rule, the gods of the suzerain king having priority over the gods of the vassal king, if covenants were concluded between tribes or peoples[12].

The cut-off animal was also a threat, attached to a solemn oath called 'ālâ in Hebrew, which includes a curse, addressed the one who did not respect his word[13].

However, the syntax of cutting a covenant becomes, with the passing of time, an idiom from time to time, being used in simpler contexts, even if the concluded covenant was not accompanied by the slaughter of an animal[14].

However, the image of the parts of a covenant that goes together among the pieces of sacrificed animal is the incontestable source of expressions used to describe the making of a covenant, among them enumerating enter a covenant, pass a covenant, or stay a covenant[15].

It is also possible to notice in the current language, in different cultures, the derivations of the respective phrases, examples being the expression in American English cut a deal but also the Romanian a tăia un pariu. Also, the expression going into business, or the frequent handshake at the end of a convention.

Returning to the historical aspects revealed by the great number of covenants, conventions, pacts and treaties from the Near Eastern and inventoried by Kitchen and Lawrence, in the quoted work, we find that the majority are written in Sumerian, Akkadian (Babylonian and Assyrian) and Hittite languages[16]. A significant part of these documents comes from the old Babylonian period (2000-1600 BCE) and concerns the territories and rulers of the current states Iraq and Syria[17].

Documents on diplomatic relations between Hittite kings and their neighbors in Anatolia and Syria form the next large set of documents, written in Akkadian and dating back to about 1400-1000 BCE, while the last important set of documents was around the year 900 -625 BCE, dealing with the relations between Assyria and the kings of the smaller kingdoms in Syria. They were also written in Akkadian and, in some cases, with Aramaic duplicates[18].

Another example of an old covenant of blood is the covenant between Egypt's Ramses II and Hattusilis III of the Hittite Empire, representing, in turn, a true image of the ancient ceremonial rituals for the blood covenant, very close to the Blood Covenant of God in the Hebrew Bible.

Specific to this covenant and distinct from the Safire covenants, it is the archetype of covenant between the equal partners in force, power and wealth, concluded with the purpose of determining and formalizing the relationship between them, caused by a war that had no winner[19].

The Covenant decided the boundaries, establishing the conditions of aid in wartime, regulated the treatment of fugitive slaves, trade and various beneficial laws for both Ramses II and Hattusilis III. The main purpose of their covenant was to help formalize and maintain the relationship between the two kings and their countries[20].

The vassal covenant is the covenant alternative, being the most common form of covenant. Usually, this occurred as a result of the conquest of a king by a stronger king, under the circumstances in which the conqueror saw an advantage in sparing the defeated.

A vassal covenant could also be the result of the respect for a greater king manifested by a inferior king in order to conclude a protective alliance. If the covenant was the result of a friendly relationship or

[9] Ibidem, p. 183-184
[10] Ibidem, p.183-184
[11] Idem, 184
[12] Loc. Cit.
[13] S. Greengus, op. cit., p. 94
[14] Loc. Cit
[15] Idem, p. 95
[16] Ibidem, p. 96
[17] Loc. cit.
[18] S.M. Arab, The Pharaoh Who Made Peace With His Enemies And The First Peace Treaty in History, www.touregypt.ne, accessed on February 1st 2018, URL:http://www.touregypt.net/featurestories/treaty. html based on mutual respect, but a king was significantly stronger or richer than the other, then the relationship would be marked by correlated terms such as the Father and the Son[21].
[19] Idem
[20] D. Plant, The Blood Covenant of God, Macquarie Fields: Smashwords, 2010, p. 18.

If a king was conquering the king of a smaller kingdom, the conquering king will be called the Lord, and the younger king will be called the servant. The proper name for the servant was vassal, hence the name of vassal Covenant. Examples of these laws are found in the Treaties of Amarna. They are also reported as the Tell El Amarna Style dating back to the second millennium BCE. They were part of the old culture of the Middle East, involving the Philistine, Hittite and Egyptian cultures[22].

The content of the covenant, with the predominant rights of the suzerain, and the majority of obligations of the vassal, after a preamble in which the first was presented, with all its titles and attributes followed by a historical prologue, in which the relationship between the two and their ancestors was highlighted, followed by an often exaggerated expression of the suzerain's benevolence towards the vassal and his country, included as the main provision that the Great King could have many vassal royalties, while One Vassal can only have a Great King, fact which can be considered as a source of inspiration for monotheistic rules.

Prohibition of any formal relationship between the vassal and any other king outside the suzerain sphere and the fact that the vassal does not have to listen or believe defamation of the Great King, and must immediately report any slander, also presents identifiable similarities, making an easy analogy of the covenants with God in the Hebrew Bible.

Concerning the biblical covenants, the theory according to which they can be classified into two types, major and minor, depending on God's involvement in the covenant conclusion has been highlighted[23].

In the category of the most important covenants are included[24]:

- The covenant with Noah
- The covenant with Abraham
- The covenant with Moses
- The covenant with David

All other covenants are of inferior importance, including covenants between two persons, between individuals and groups of people or between nations[25].

The novelty element, even if it takes from the form and substantive of covenants conceived by people, consists, regarding the important covenants of the Hebrew Bible, in the participation of God, as part of the covenant, not as simple witness.

What is kept in the Hebrew Bible, referring to the usual covenants and treaties in the Ancient Near East, is primarily the structure of the convention.

Thus, the preamble of each of the four covenants is formulated as a statement of God, similar to that of the suzerain, the people being informed by His will.

As far as the Noah Covenant is concerned, it is noteworthy that, from a legal point of view, it can be framed in the unilateral legal acts category, in the sense that God is the only one who makes a promise, a novel fact in texts with legal implications in the period. It is unique that the upper part of the covenant, almighty in this context, should assume obligations without claiming correlative rights.

The covenant with Abraham presents, beyond the distinctive elements of each of the most important biblical covenants, many features common to the treaties concluded between the nations found in the area. We have, when taking vows, the sacrificial animal with all the ritual, along with the reference to the eternity of the effects that will benefit or will show off over all of Abraham's descendants.

However, the content of the Covenant with Abraham also rise some problems of interpretation of its nature, meaning that the obligations assumed by God depend or not on the fulfillment of some conditions by the other party. Opinions are shared, and argumentation for each makes it even more difficult the strictly classification of the covenant into one of the legal categories.

The covenant with Moses, also called the Sinai Covenant, has also a raised controversy that starts from the question of conditional fulfillment of God's promises to the behavior of the other contractual party. Even if we admit that it is not a conditional covenant, although God is the initiator, the covenant is not one among the equals.

The covenant with David fits, along with the covenant promise category, in the sense that God does not require it to fulfill certain conditions.

The idea that comes out is that we are in the presence of two types of conventions in the Hebrew Bible, God's Covenant, for the fulfillment of which a series of conditions binds, and the covenant of God through which promises without asking anything in return[1].

Distinct from these covenants with God, we also mark the presence of a pseudo-covenant, namely the one who designates the relationship of God with Adam. We appreciate that this relationship does not present the elements required to fit into the category of Covenants.

---

[21] Idem

[22] C. F. Lincoln, in the article The Biblical Covenants, published in the Bibliotheca Sacra diary, April 1943, pp. 313-314, www.galaxie.com, URL: <http://www.galaxie.com/article/bsac100 -398-10>, visited on February 3rd , 2018.

[23] Idem

[24] ibidem

[25] M. Weinfeld, The Covenant of Grant in the Old Testament and in Ancient Near East, article published in Journal of the American Oriental Society, Vol. 90, No. 2 (Apr. - Jun., 1970), p. 184, ww.wisdomintorah.s3.amazonaws.com,URL:<https://wisdomintorah .s3.amazonaws.com /medialibrary/Grants-and-covenant.pdf>, visited February 1th , 2018

But another covenant made by God, according to the Hebrew Bible, of an importance not to ignore, is the covenant with Israel, preferred to be mentioned in the final part of the work, precisely because of the strong correlation with the formal and substantive of Esarhaddon's famous Treaty of Succession.

This is a recurring theme in the technical literature, which even created the terminology of paralleling in search of all the similarities between covenants, the existing treaties in the ancient culture of the Near East, and the biblical covenants[26].

However, no reasonable researcher can ignore the resemblance, almost overlapping, between the text of the Treaty and the Deuteronomy 28.

The curse section of Deuteronomy correlates many curses with suggestive images. These images, as many researchers have observed, are identical to those of the Esarhaddon Neo-Assyrian Succession Treaty[27]. Moreover, some passages are quasi-identifiable.

It should not keep track that we are in the presence of civilizations from the Near East cultural region, whose level of legal concept development was considerable, both at the practical and theoretical level. We cannot ignore the numerous but especially well-drafted legislative codes existing in this region. It is easy to understand that the influence of a culture so developed in the geographical proximity is not only impossible to block but also to lack rational justification.

Legislative collections in the Near East space offer a useful point of comparison with biblical law materials, many theories about legal discourse that can be interpreted in different ways being issued. Three approaches to the interpretation of law collections of the ancient Near East are collected[28].

By studying in parallel the nature, forms and, especially, the substantives of the Hebrew Bible covenants with those found in the representative covenants of the ancient Near East, the conclusion that can be drawn is that of a cultural community that is not limited to legal issues. On the contrary, it extends to socio-political areas, having impact over collective consciousness, especially in the presence of a solid set of common values.

Thus, for the first time, we have an absolutely special quality of a co-contracting party, although the convention itself is not a particular legal category. It is the contract with the Divinity, having different objects, but also invariably stipulating obligations from its part.

It would lack objectivity not to observe that there rules a special character of these conventions that resides in that no penalties are stipulated for disrespecting the Divinity commitments, but this does not diminish the novelty of this type of approach at the level of a contractual relationship circumscribed to a religion.

What emerges more obtrusive from this convention is the awareness of the interdependence between the parties concluding it, coming out the premises of another type of contract difficult to conceptualize, to a certain extent, given the disproportion, at least apparent, between the mere individual, citizen and state authority.

That is why, in a somewhat natural logic, that inglorious believer, with an immeasurable apprehension to God, dared to claim something from this, other than the usual way of a praying.

The mere individual realizes that no argument is viable and cannot resist if he ignores the importance of his quality in relation to even a powerful and ineffable Creator, as is in the culture that conceived this kind of convention.

This kind of contract is a good foundation for a normal citizen to claim obligations correlated with the rights assigned to an authority with a disproportionately high power, and much more concrete, in this case.

The reference is to what the theory has known as the Social Contract, and among its promoters is the one who took over and carried forward the concepts of Francis Bacon, the 17th century philosopher, Thomas Hobbes.

The model of conception of this construction of a legal nature, but with wide socio-political effects, was outlined on the basis of two conventions, one among citizens, with the aim to cede the common rights to a single sovereign and the second convention, under the form of an authorization granted by all of them to a single person[29]. We are in the presence of a double contract[30] with a strong and relevant connection, without one being the principal and the other additional, them having only a certain temporal and logical succession.

The premise is the one in which, the individual, in his primordial condition, natural, pre-juridical state without having the consciousness of a superior authority, outside the divinity, motivated mainly by the need to live in peace, gives up his natural state and causes a political configuration characterized by artificialism, individualism and a representative system[31].

Once outlined, the Social Contract theory takes root, attracting other distinguished thinking personalities, among them standing out the English philosopher John Locke and Jean Jacques Rousseau.

Although he stands out from Hobbes' vision also by identifying an essential problem in setting up a rule-based civilization, not authorizing the exercise of power, Locke asserts that the citizen does not gives up

[26] W. S. Morrow, An introduction to biblical law, Grand Rapids : Eerdmans Publishing Co., 2017, p. 67
[27] S. Parpola şi K. Watanabe, Neo-Assyrian Treaties, 28–58, apud S. Greengus, op. cit., p. 116
[28] W. S. Morrow, op. cit., p. 69
[29] T. Hobbes, Leviatanul, Bucharest: Herald Publishing House, 2017, p.203 - 205
[30] N. Popa, a.o., Filosofia Dreptului. Marile Curente, Bucharest: C.H.Beck Publishing House, 2010, p.155
[31] Idem, p.156 - 158

his part of sovereignty, and if the power that he, along with the others who compose the people, entrusted it, is confiscated to the detriment of the true belonging, they can also run force to replace those who govern[32].

Without being necessarily divergent but bringing consolidations and, above all, superposing to the edifice conceived by Hobbes and Locke, Rousseau consecrate the theory of freedom - autonomy on which the constitutional theory of human rights and fundamental freedoms is based, as well as the theory of limiting the power by consolidating them[33].

Remarkable is what Rousseau states when establishing the individual's priority with the state, contrary to the Aristotelian philosophy, affirming, in an age still tributary to some concepts that were not individual-based, that the state is a creation of it and, in the absence of a free will of the individual, the state cannot exist, society being itself a legal act[34].

At the same time, the French thinker states that freedom can only exist between peers, referring to an abstract legal freedom, and even the least inequality affects the freedom of one party[35], the notion defining the social contract, from the quorum's perspective, being the one's man will.

One of Rousseau's essential grievance is to create a harmony between what law permits with what interests dictate, so that justice and utility not to be in conflict[36].

Conclusion

What emerges as one of the conclusions is the idea of evolution, not so much of the courage to express the deep will of individual, taken rather in its individuality, but especially of the form of expression of the concepts of justice and freedom that define this as a human being.

Any form of external constraint, be it religious or political-social, can only lead to diminishing, until suppression, of fundamental freedoms. The mere awareness of the relationship of mutual dependence between individual and authority gives rise to a mutual duty of respect to the most sensitive and finer fibers.

From the moment that Individual dared to approach his relationship with God under equal conditions of contract, and the Creator himself allowed this, without feeling offended or by considering it a blasphemy, it is inadmissible that an Individual's creation, even of a major complexity, such as the State, to be claimed superior to any citizen.

It is not by accident that these manifestations of higher thought have as instruments legal institutions, the right being, certainly, the best buckler of humanity, both for relations between individuals and between them and entities of different and superior dimensions.

References

- Arab, S. M., The Pharaoh Who Made Peace with his Enemies And the First Peace Treaty in History, http://www.touregypt.net/featurestories/treaty.html , reached at February 1st 2018
- Arnold, B. T. and Hess, R. S., Ancient Israel's History, collective volume, Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2014
- Greengus, S., Covenant and Treaty in the Hebrew Bible and in the Ancient Near East, in the collective volume Ancient Israel's History, Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2014
- Hobbes, T., Leviatanul, Bucharest: Herald Publishing House, 2017
- Kitchen, K. A. and Lawrence, P. J. N., The Fall and Rise of Covenant, Law, and Treaty, Cambridge: Tyndale Bulletin, nr. 40, 1989
- Kitchen, K. A. and Lawrence, P. J. N., Treaty, Law and Convenant in the Ancient Near East, Wiesbaden: Harrassowity, 2012
- Kraeling, E. G. H., Aram and Israel or The Aramaeans in Syria and Mesopotamia, New York: Columbia University Press, 1918
- Lincoln, C. F., The Biblical Covenants, Bibliotheca Sacra, April 1943
- Parpola, S. and Watanabe, K., Neo-Assyrian Treaties, Helsinki: Helsinki University Press, 1988
- Plant, D., The Blood Covenant of God, Macquarie Fields: Smashwords, 2010
- Popa, N. a.o., Filosofia Dreptului. Marile Curente, Bucharest: C.H.Beck Publishing House, 2010
- Rousseau, J.J., Contractul Social, Bucureşti: Stiinţifică Publishing House, 1957
- Weinfeld, M. The Covenant of Grant in the Old Testament and in the Ancient near East, Michigan: Journal of the American Oriental Society, nr.2, 1970

[32] Idem, p.165
[33] Ibidem, p.173
[34] Ibidem, p.175
[35] Ibidem, p.177
[36] J.J. Rousseau, Contractul Social, Bucureşti: Editura Stiinţifică, 1957, p.81

INVENTORY OF PUBLIC GOODS. CURRENT REGULATION AND NORMATIVE PERSPECTIVES

Dan Constantin MÂȚĂ*

Abstract

The Romanian Constitution of 1991, revised in 2003, does not explicitly regulate the notion of a public domain. The core of the regulation of this notion is found in several normative acts regarding the land fund, the local public administration or the public property. Public goods have a derogatory legal regime from common law based on the general public interest that the administration has the mission to accomplish. Generally, Article 860 paragraphs (1) - (2) of the Civil Code provides that the public goods belong to the national, county or, where appropriate, local public domain, and the appropriate delimitation is made under the law.

The public administration authorities have the obligation to draw up and update the inventory of goods in the public domain in accordance with the provisions of Articles 20-21 of Law no. 213/1998 on public property. The inventory procedure differs depending on the category of the public domain and the authority that centralizes the inventory. In the case of the inventory of goods in the public domain of the administrative-territorial units, it is also necessary to adopt a Government decision certifying the belongingness of the goods to the county or local public domain. The draft of the Administrative Code brings important changes in the procedure for inventorying the goods in the public domain of the administrative-territorial units by eliminating the requirement of attestation by a Government decision.

The article analyzes the current regulation of the inventory procedure for public goods and the impact of the changes envisaged by the adoption of the Administrative Code of Romania draft.

Keywords: public domain, inventory, attestation, Administrative Code.

1. Introduction

The 1991 Constitution of Romania does not explicitly regulate the notion of a public domain, but regulates the dualist regime of ownership right: private property and public property.

According to Article 136 paragraph (3) of the Constitution, the following categories of property are the sole object of public property: "Subsoil public riches, airspace, waters with potentially valuable energy, of national interest, beaches, territorial sea, natural resources of the economic area and of the continental plateau, as well as other assets established by means of the organic law, are the sole object of public property [1]."

The constitutional text has been amended several times along with the revision of the fundamental law by Law no. 429/2003 on the revision of the Romanian Constitution[2]. Compared to the original text on property, provided by Article 135 of the Constitution adopted in 1991, by the provisions of Article 1 section 69 of the Law no. 429/2003 provided the following:

a) from the listing of the assets that are the sole object of public property, communication channels have disappeared because some of them (gas or oil pipelines, electricity lines) may also form the object of the private property right;
b) the wording "riches of any kind in the subsoil" has been replaced by "riches of public interest of the subsoil";
c) the requirement that the water with potentially energetic potential be "of national interest" was added;
d) it has been established that any other assets which may be the sole object of public property, other than those provided for in the constitutional text, shall be determined by an "organic" law[3].

From the current form of Article 136 paragraph (2) of the Constitution, two criteria may be identified for the classification of public property: the criterion of the destination of the assets (the public interest or the national interest) and the criterion of the law declaration (and other assets established by organic law) [4].

The notions of public use and public interest are not defined in the legislation, falling into the category of indeterminate legal concepts, which allow a wide margin of appreciation from the central or local public administration authorities with attributions in the administration of the public domain[5]. In the case law of the European Court of Justice, notions of "public * Lecturer, PhD, Faculty of Law, „Alexandru Ioan Cuza" University of Iași (e-mail: danmata@uaic.ro).

[1] In the same sense see the provisions of Article 859 paragraph (1) of the Law no. 287/2009 on the Civil Code (republished in the "Official Gazette of Romania", Part I, No. 505 of July 15, 2011), as subsequently amended and supplemented.

[2] Published in „The Official Gazette of Romania" Part I, no. 758 of October 29, 2003.

[3] Alexandru-Sorin Ciobanu, Drept administrativ, Activitatea administrației publice, Domeniul public (Bucharest, Editura Universul Juridic, 2015), 157.

[4] Dana Apostol Tofan, Drept administrativ, volumul II, 3rd edition (Bucharest, Editura C.H. Beck, 2015), 261.

[5] Apostol Tofan, Drept administrativ, 286.

utility" and "public interest" are considered "blind concepts" that "have an elusive nature, being vague principles that are issued and redefined by court or other public authorities, in particular cases"[6].

In the Romanian doctrine, the assets for public use are considered to be those assets accessible to all, because by their nature they are of general use: streets, public roads, public squares, public beaches, bridges. Public assets are assets which by their nature are intended to be used in a public service in order to carry out activities of interest to the community without being directly used by any person: schools, hospitals, theaters, museums, libraries, railroads[7].

The normative origin of the notion of the public domain is found in several normative acts regarding the land fund, the local public administration or the public property.

The need to regulate the public domain by special rules, derogations from the rules of common law, is related to the purpose of ensuring the general public interest by public administration authorities[8].

In a post-communist doctrine reference, the public domain was defined as "those goods, whether public or private, which, by nature or express provision of the law, must be preserved and transmitted to future generations, representing values intended to be used in the public interest, either directly or through a public service, and subject to an administrative regime or a mixed regime in which the regime of power is determined, being owned or, where appropriate, guarded by legal persons of public law" [9].

This definition bases the theory of the public domain lato sensu in the doctrine of administrative law in the post-communist period by including in this notion some private property assets, due to their special importance in national patrimony, are governed by a regime of public law, of "guard and protection" of the public interest or, where appropriate, public use"[10].

In another perspective, to which we agree, the public domain was defined as "all movable or immovable assets belonging to the state or administrative-territorial units, which by law or by their nature are of use or of public interest, used directly by the public or dedicated to a public service and subject to the administrative legal regime"[11].

The notion of a public domain should not be mistaken for the notion of an administrative domain, the latter comprising all the movable or immovable assets belonging to the State and the territorial administrative units, irrespective of whether they belong to the public domain or to the private domain[12]. The administrative domain has a narrower content than the patrimony of the state and of the administrative-territorial units, comprising both the active side, consisting of patrimonial rights, as well as the passive side, consisting of the patrimonial obligations[13].

The public domain assets are subject to a derogatory legal regime from the common law based on the public interest that the administration has the task of performing. Generally, Article 860 paragraphs (1) - (2) of the Civil Code provides that the public property belongs to the national, county or, where appropriate, local public domain, and the appropriate delimitation is made under the law.

In the doctrine, the following conditions for inclusion of assets in the public domain were highlighted[14]:

a) the asset belongs to a community (state or administrative-territorial unit) being acquired in one of the ways provided by law;
b) the asset is assigned to a general interest destination, through direct public use or through a public service.

2. Inventory of public assets

The public domain may be of national interest, when the ownership belongs to the state, or of local interest, when the ownership belongs to communes, towns, municipalities or counties[15].

Law no. 213/1998 on the public property assets[16], with the subsequent amendments and completions, stipulates in Article 3 paragraphs (2) - (4) the composition of the public domain categories:

a) the public domain of the state is composed of the assets provided in Article 136 paragraph (3) of the Constitution, from those stipulated in section I of the annex to the Law no. 213/1998, as well as other assets of public national use or interest, declared as such by law;
b) the public domain of the counties consists of the assets referred to in section II of the annex to the Law no. 213/1998 and other assets of national public use or interest, declared as such by a decision of the county council, unless there are declared by law assets of national public use or interest;

[6] Cătălin-Silviu Săraru, Drept administrativ, Probleme fundamentale ale dreptului public (Bucharest, Editura C.H. Beck, 2016), 335.
[7] Emil Bălan, Dreptul administrativ al bunurilor (București, Editura C.H. Beck, 2007), 51.
[8] Bălan, Dreptul administrativ al bunurilor, 4.
[9] Antonie Iorgovan, Tratat de drept administrativ, vol. II, Forme de realizare a administrației publice. Domeniul public și serviciul public. Răspunderea în dreptul administrativ. Contenciosul administrativ (Bucharest, Editura All Beck, 2005), 173.
[10] Iorgovan, Tratat de drept administrativ, p. 173.
[11] Rodica Narcisa Petrescu, Drept administrativ (Bucharest, Editura Hamangiu, 2009), 263; Emilia Lucia Cătană, Drept administrativ (Bucharest, Editura C.H. Beck, 2017), 223.
[12] Ciobanu, Drept administrativ, 176.
[13] Bălan, Dreptul administrativ al bunurilor, 40; Săraru, Drept administrativ, 327.
[14] Cătană, Drept administrativ, 223.
[15] Anton Trăilescu, Drept administrativ, 3rd edition (Bucharest, Editura C.H. Beck, 2008), 90.
[16] Published in „The Official Gazette of Romania" Part I, no. 448 of November 24,1998.

c) the public domain of communes, towns and municipalities is made up of the assets referred to in section III of the annex to the Law no. 213/1998 and other assets of local public use or interest, declared as such by a decision of the local council, if they are not declared by law assets of national or county public use or interest.

The belongingness of an asset to the public domain and the public interest to which it corresponds is done through a procedural operation called domain classification. This operation differs from the actual recording of an asset in a public domain of a holder, referred in the doctrine as domain incorporation, and which always follows the domain classification[17].

According to the provisions of Article 23 of Law no. 213/1998 disputes regarding the demarcation of the public domain of the state, counties, communes, cities or municipalities are of the competence of the administrative courts.

Law no. 213/1998 regulates the possibility of transferring an asset from the public domain of the state or of the administrative-territorial units to another category of public domain[18]. According to Article 9 paragraphs (1) - (6) these are:

a) the transfer of an asset from the public domain of the state to the public domain of an administrative-territorial unit shall be made at the request of the county council, respectively of the General Council of the Bucharest Municipality or of the local council, as the case may be, by a decision of the Government, being truned from asset of national public interest into an asset of local or county public interest;
b) the transfer of an asset from the public domain of an administrative-territorial unit to the public domain of the state is made at the request of the Government, by a decision of the county council, respectively of the General Council of Bucharest Municipality or of the local council, being truned from asset of county or local public interest into an asset of national public interest;
c) the transfer of an asset from the public domain of the county to the public domain of an administrative-territorial unit within the territorial district of the respective county is made at the request of the local council, by a decision of the county council, being turned from asset of county public interest into an asset of local public interest;
d) the transfer of an asset from the public domain of an administrative-territorial unit from the territorial district of a county to the public domain of the respective county shall be made at the request of the county council, by a decision of the local council, being turned from asset of local public interest into an asset of county public interest;
e) the transfer of a good from the public domain of an administrative-territorial unit to the public domain of another territorial-administrative unit within the county is made at the request of the local council, by decision of the local council of the commune, town or municipality which owns the asset and by decision of the local council of the commune, town or municipality to the ownership of which it is transmitted;
f) the transfer of an asset from the public domain of a county to the public domain of another limitrophe county is done at the request of the county council, by a decision of the county council of the county in the ownership of which the asset is and by decision of the county council of the county in the ownership of which it is transmitted;
g) the transfer of an asset from the public domain of Bucharest Municipality to the public domain of Ilfov County is made at the request of the county council, by a decision of the General Council of Bucharest Municipality and by a decision of the county council of Ilfov County[19].

The public administration authorities have the obligation to draw up and update the inventory of public assets in accordance with the provisions of Articles 20-21 of Law no. 213/1998.

The state inventory of public assets is drawn up and amended, as the case may be, by the ministries, by the other specialized bodies of the central public administration, as well as by the local public administration authorities that manage such assets. The centralization of the inventory is carried out by the Ministry of Finance and is subject to approval by the Government[20].

The inventory of assets in the public domain of the administrative-territorial units shall be drafted and amended, as the case may be, by special commissions, chaired by the presidents of the county councils, by the mayor of Bucharest Municipality, by the mayors of the administrative-territorial units, as well as by the persons delegated by them[21].

[17] Bălan, Dreptul administrativ al bunurilor, 52.

[18] In accordance with the provisions of Article 860 paragraph (2) of the Civil Code "the assets which form the exclusive object of the public property of the state or of the administrative-territorial units according to an organic law cannot be transferred from the public domain of the state to the public domain of the administrative-territorial unit or vice versa after the amendment of the organic law".

[19] The last three modalities are strictly carried out in order to develop certain fixed-term investment objectives, stipulated in the decision of the local council, the county council, respectively the Bucharest Municipality [Article 9 paragraph (8) of the Law no. 213/1998].

[20] See: Government Decision no. 1705/2006 for the approval of the centralized inventory of assets in the public domain of the state, published in the "Official Gazette of Romania", Part I, no. 1020 of December 21, 2006, as subsequently amended and supplemented; Order of the Minister of Public Finance for approval of the Statements regarding the drawing up and updating of the centralized inventory of public domain assets of the state no. 1718/2011, published in the "Official Gazette of Romania", Part I, no. 186 of March 17, 2011.

[21] The composition of the special commissions for drawing up the inventory of assets that make up the public domain of communes, towns, municipalities and counties is provided in Article II of the Technical Norms for the drawing up of the inventory of assets that make up the

After drafting, the inventories are appropriated by the decision of the local public administration authorities and are centralized by the county council, respectively by the General Council of Bucharest Municipality. Subsequently, the inventories are sent to the Government in order to declare the belongingness of the assets to the county or local public domain

In the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court, the decisions of the local public administration authorities by which the inventory lists are acquired were considered to be the preparatory acts of the Government's decision to prove the belonging of the assets to the county or local public domain, without producing legal effects themselves and consequently, they cannot be the subject of a separate action in an administrative court[22].

In the doctrine, this interpretation has been criticized by the main argument that regardless of the subject matter of a regulation "a Council decision can only be an administrative act, an act of authority which, by definition, produces certain legal effects, even if they rather have procedural impact"[23].

Regarding the Government's decision to certify the belongingness of the assets to the county or local public domain, also the jurisprudence of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, emphasized that "it has no constitutive ownership effect in favour of the administrative-territorial units" and "the legal effect of the document issued by the central authority is only an attestation of the legal regime of public property differentiated by the legal regime of private property, which belongs to the territorial-administrative unit"[24].

3. Regulating the inventory of public assets in the draft of the Administrative Code of Romania

The draft of the Administrative Code of Romania, in the form registered with the Romanian Senate on December 12, 2017[25], regulates the legal regime of the public domain in Title I of Part Five, entitled Exercise of the public property right of the state or of the administrative-territorial units.

Regarding the inventory of assets in the public domain of the state Article 292 paragraph (1) of the draft introduces the rule that it is drawn up and amended exclusively by the ministries or by the other specialized bodies of the central public administration, "both for the assets administered by them and for the assets administered by the units under the subordination, coordination or under their authority and is approved by Government Decision".

Therefore, in the forthcoming regulation, the possibility of drawing up and amending the inventory on public assets in the state's public domain and by the local public administration authorities administering such assets is eliminated. On the other hand, the Administrative Code draft stipulates that "holders of the right of administration, concessionaires and public utility institutions exercising a real right over the public property of the state are obliged to include these real rights in the integrated cadastre and land registry system" [Article 292 paragraph (3)][26] .

Significant changes are envisaged in the regulation of the inventory of assets in the public domain of the administrative-territorial units.

Generally, Article 293 paragraph (1) of the draft provides that "all assets belonging to the administrative-territorial units shall be subject to annual inventory. The deliberative authority shall be provided annually by the executive authority with a report on the status of asset management."

Similarly to the current regulation, the inventory of the assets that make up the public domain of the administrative-territorial unit is drawn up and updated by a special commission, chaired by the mayor, respectively by the county council president or a person empowered by them. Once the inventory has been drawn up, it is approved by decision of the local council, respectively, by a decision of the county council.

Each decision shall be accompanied by two categories of documents: "a) Proof of ownership, accompanied by land book excerpts which shows the registration of the right of ownership in the land book and the fact that the property in question is not burdened; b) "statement on one's own responsibility of the secretary of the administrative-territorial unit that the property in question is not subject to disputes at the time of the decision" (Article 293 paragraph (6)].

The novelty is the fact that these decisions are no longer centralized by the county council, respectively the General Council of Bucharest Municipality, with a view to sending them to the Government. Also, the requirement for the Government to adopt a decision stating the belongingness of the assets to the county or local field disappears.

In the draft of the Administrative Code, however, it is stipulated that, after adoption, the decision of the deliberative authority of the territorial-administrative unit shall be communicated to the prefect and the ministry with attributions in the field of public public domain of communes, towns, municipalities and counties, approved by GD no. 548/1999, published in the "Official Gazette of Romania", Part I, no. 334 of July 15, 1999.

[22] Ciobanu, Drept administrativ, 180.

[23] Ciobanu, Drept administrativ, 180-181.

[24] Apud Cătană, Drept administrativ, 250-251.

[25] https://www.senat.ro/legis/lista.aspx?nr_cls=L132&an_cls=2018

[26] Regarding this article, we mention that the Government of Romania expressed its point of view in replacing the phrase "public utility institutions" with the phrase "the holder of the right to use free of charge". See:
https://www.senat.ro/legis/lista.aspx?nr_cls=L132&an_cls=2018

administration, together with the documents stipulated in Article 293 paragraph (6) of the project. The deadline for communication is no more than 10 working days after the date of the decision.

The communication is not made for the purpose of issuing or adopting an administrative act certifying the belongingness of the assets to the public domain of the administrative-territorial units, but for informing and drawing up a point of view on the decision and the accompanying documents. This point of view is issued by the ministry with attributions in the field of public administration within maximum 60 days from the registration of the communication of the decision. During this period, the Ministry may request information from the competent authorities and institutions, which are obliged to respond within 30 days of registration of the request.

Following the communication of the point of view by the ministry with attributions in the field of public administration, two options are possible: a) amendment of the decision of the deliberative authority of the administrative-territorial unit in order to ensure compliance with the legal norms, if the ministry has notified matters that are contrary to these norms; b) adoption of a decision of the deliberative authority of the territorial-administrative unit, which certifies the inventory of the public domain assets of the administrative-territorial unit, if the ministry did not notify matters that are contrary to the legal norms.

On the basis of the decision which certified the inventory of public domain assets of the administrative-territorial unit, the mayor and the chairman of the county council request the final registration of the goods in the land register.

A positive aspect of the Administrative Code draft is the express mention of the legal nature and effects of the decisions of the deliberative authorities of the administrative-territorial units: "the decision regarding the approval of the inventory of the assets that make up the public domain of the administrative-territorial unit and the decision confirming the inventory of the asset / assets in the public domain of the administrative-territorial unit are of an individual character, becoming mandatory and producing effects from the date of communication by the secretary of the administrative-territorial unit to the executive authority" (Article 293 paragraph (6)] [27].

3. Conclusions

Regulating the legal regime of the public domain is one of the constants of public law. The doctrine of administrative law in Romania has "recovered" the past two decades this traditional institution of administrative law by formulating critical remarks and lex ferenda proposals.

Regarding the inventory of public assets in the administrative-territorial units, several criticisms have been expressed regarding the legal nature of the decisions of the local public administration authorities, by which inventory lists (administrative act or preparatory act to the Government's decision to certify) are acquired. The matter has acquired practical relevance in the circumstances in which the supreme court practice has decided on the character of preparatory act of such a decision.

From this perspective, a beneficial aspect of the future regulation of the legal regime of public assets is the clarification of the legal nature and of the effects of the decisions of the local public administration authorities on the inventory of assets in the public domain of the administrative-territorial units.

References

- Dana Apostol Tofan, Drept administrativ, volumul II, ediția a 3-a (București, Editura C.H. Beck, 2015)
- Emil Bălan, Dreptul administrativ al bunurilor (București, Editura C.H. Beck, 2007)
- Dumitru Brezoianu, Drept administrativ român (București, Editura All Beck, 2004)
- Emilia Lucia Cătană, Drept administrativ (București, Editura C.H. Beck, 2017)
- Eugen Chelaru, Administrarea domeniului public și a domeniului privat, Ediția a 2-a revăzută și completată, (București, Ed. C.H. Beck, 2008)
- Alexandru-Sorin Ciobanu, Drept administrativ, Activitatea administrației publice, Domeniul public (București, Edditura Universul Juridic, 2015)
- George N. Coca, Dreptul administrativ al bunurilor (București, Editura Universul Juridic, 2011)
- Antonie Iorgovan, Tratat de drept administrativ, vol. II, Forme de realizare a administrației publice. Domeniul public și serviciul public. Răspunderea în dreptul administrativ. Contenciosul administrativ (București, Editura All Beck, 2005)
- Corneliu Manda, Drept administrativ, Tratat elementar, Ediția a V-a (București, Editura Universul Juridic, 2008)
- Anton P. Parlagi, Dicționar de administrație publică, Ediția a 3-a (București, Editura C.H. Beck, 2011)
- Rodica Narcisa Petrescu, Drept administrativ (București, Editura Hamangiu, 2009)
- Ovidiu Podaru, Drept administrativ, vol. II, Dreptul administrativ al bunurilor (București, Editura Hamangiu) 2011

[27] Note that in section 61 of the Opinion of the Legislative Council regarding the legislative proposal on the Administrative Code of Romania the necessity to replace the phrase "are of an individual character" with the expression "have an individual character" was pointed out.
See https://www.senat.ro/legis/lista.aspx?nr_cls=L132&an_cls=2018

- Cătălin-Silviu Săraru, Drept administrativ, Probleme fundamentale ale dreptului public (București, Editura C.H. Beck, 2016)
- Elena Emilia Ștefan, Drept administrativ, Partea a II-a (București, Editura Universul Juridic, 2013)
- Anton Trăilescu, Drept administrativ, Ediția a 3-a (București, Editura C.H. Beck, 2008)
- Verginia Vedinaș, Drept administrativ, Ediția a IX-a (București, Editura Universul Juridic, 2015)

TRANSFER OF PROPERTY ASSETS

Vasilica NEGRUȚ*

Abstract

Starting from the current jurisprudence on the transfer of property assets, in this article, using logical interpretation and also comparative analysis, we intend to investigate the conditions under which an asset from the private domain of the state can be transferred to its public or private domain of an administrative-territorial unit in its public domain, according to the law (article 863 letter d) of the Civil Code). Also, the analysis also concerns the transfer of an asset from the public domain to the private domain, under the conditions established by Law no. 213/1998 on publicly owned property. The recent amendments to this legislative act were also determined by the complex cases brought before the courts regarding the transfer of property assets.

In conclusion, if the asset belongs (according to its purpose, to the national or local public use or interest) to the national or local public domain, then the transfer is carried out according to the procedure established by art. 9 of the Law no. 213/1998, respectively by an administrative act of an individual character, a decision of the Government or a local council. If the object is the exclusive object of public property of the state, according to an organic law, it is also possible by law to transfer the public domain of the state to that of an administrative - territorial unit. It is about the organic laws of modifying the organic law by which the assets have been declared the exclusive object of public property of the state.

Keywords: public property; transfer; public domain; private domain; government.

1. Introduction

The notion of a public domain reverts to a current notion after 1989, especially after the adoption of Law no. 18/1991, which establishes the categories of land belonging to the public domain, exempted from the rule of the reconstruction of private property right[1].

The notion of public domineering is the result of sustained research by doctrines, authors of public law and private law[2].

The well-known Professor Victor Prudhon, in his paper Tratatul domeniului public/ The Treaty of Public Domain, advocated the need to allow an exorbitant legal regime from civil law for certain public assets.[3] Prudhon has the merit of highlighting the relativity of the principle of the inalienability of the public domain, considering that it applies as long as it lasts the public service to which the asset of the public domain in question is assigned[4].

The theory of domineering is an essential change brought to property in civil law[5].

As the well-known professor Jean Vermeulen points out, "the discussions that arise around the notion of a public domain are not only of a theoretical, doctrinal interest, but of a practical interest, the public domain being subjected to a special legal regime that removes it not only from the legal regime of individual property, but also from the legal regime of the private domain of the state subject to the provisions of common law."[6]

Professor Ion Filipescu considered that all property subject to public property law are "domineering assets" and make up the "administrative" domain, within which some public property assets are of "public domain", while others are of "private domain"[7].

Professor Ion Filipescu's thesis takes into account the French legislation according to which public property designates all the assets belonging to public authorities or institutions[8].

In the specialized literature, it is appreciated that the notion of the public domain must be applied to "the

* Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, Danubius University of Galati, Romania & Associate Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: vasilicanegrut@univ-danubius.ro)

[1] According to art. 5, par. (1) of the Law no. 18/1991, with subsequent modifications and additions, "it belongs to public domain the land on which there are buildings of public interest, markets, roads, street networks and public parks, ports and airports, forest land, river and river beds, the lakes of public interest, the bottom of the inland sea and the territorial sea, Black Sea shores, including beaches, lands for nature reserves and national parks, archaeological and historical monuments, ensembles and sites, nature monuments, lands for defense needs or other uses which, according to the law, are in the public domain or which by their nature are of public use or interest".

[2] Liviu Giurgiu, Domeniul public, Seria "Repere Juridice"/Public Domain, The series "Legal landmarks", Editura Tehnică, Bucharest, 1997, p. 12.

[3] Emil Bălan, Dreptul administrativ al bunurilor/ Administrative law of assets, Editura C. H. Beck, Bucharest, 2007, p. 8.

[4] Antonie Iorgovan, Tratat de drept administrative/Treaty of administrative law, vol. II, 4 Ed., Editura All Beck, Bucharest, 2005, p. 136.

[5] Liviu Giurgiu, op. cit., 1997, p. 12.

[6] Jean Vermeulen, Curs de drept administrative/Course of administrative law, Bucharest, 1947, p. 181.

[7] Ion Filipescu, Domeniul public și privat al statului și al unităților administrativ-teritoriale/ The public and private domain of the state and of the administrative-territorial units, in Dreptul/The law no. 5-6/1994, pp. 75-76.

[8] Alexandru-Sorin Ciobanu, Drept administrativ. Activitatea administrației publice. Domeniul public/ Administrative law. Public administration activity. Public domain. Editura Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2015, p. 170.

whole of the assets used or exploited by or for the human collectivities[9]".

The distinction between the public domain and the private domain was made on the basis of the provisions of art. 476 of the old Civil Code, considering that the public domain consists of the assets affected by the general and unsuspected use of being private property[10].

According to this article, "the highways, small roads and streets that are in charge of the state, rivers and floating or floating rivers, shores, shore additions and seaports, natural or artificial ports, shores where the ships can be in general, all parts of Romania's land, which are not private property, are considered as being part of public domain."

After 1989, Law no. 18/1991 classifies lands in public domain lands and private domain lands.

The opinions expressed after 1990 on the notions of "public property" and "public domain" are found in several relevant theses: a) the thesis that the two notions are equivalent, supported both by authors of administrative law and by authors of civil law (Mircea Preda, Valentin Prisăcaru, Eugen Chelaru[11]); b) the thesis according to which the public domain is the exclusive object of the public property right (Corneliu Bîrsan, Valeriu Stoica, Marian Nicolae); c) the thesis which establishes the existence of a report from the whole, the notion of domain being wider than the notion of public property (Antonie Iorgovan)[12]; the identification of a broad and a narrow meaning of the notion of a public domain (Liviu Pop) [13].

In contemporary doctrine, the phrase "public domain" has a broader meaning[14], which includes not only public property assets, as listed in Law no. 213/1998, but also the categories of assets of private property which present a significance and importance that go beyond the interests of their holders, leading to the coexistence of two different regimes applicable to them, namely the common law (as it is about a right of private property) and an exorbitant regime that includes public power rules[15].

Therefore, the notion of a public domain is not limited only to assets belonging to the public property, but in some aspects it belongs to the public domain also the assets (mobile or immovable) which are private property[16]. These assets, which are subject to a mixed regime (private and public law) and which can be found in the property of any subject of law, are included in the national cultural patrimony, "being national values to be passed on from generation to generation" have always been the subject of special protection[17].

In André de Laubadère's view, all these special rules as a whole, derogations from common law are the "regime of domineering[18]".

In conclusion, the idea of domineering concerns, on the one hand, the assets of public property and, on the other hand, some assets of private property that are subject to special protection and security.

1.1. Definition of Public Property

The implementation of Law no. 287/2009 on the Civil Code (through Law No. 71/2011) imposed a new view of the matter, as by this normative act an important part of the Law no. 213/1998, which, until that date, was considered to be the main regulation, derogating from the common law, was designed for the legal regime applicable to public property.

In this respect, it was questioned the regulation of public property by the New Civil Code, which, in art. 2, par. (1) establishes the object of regulation of this normative act: "The provisions of this Code regulate the patrimonial and non-patrimonial relations between persons, as subjects of civil law"[19].

---

[9] Mihai T. Oroveanu, Tratat de drept administrative/Treaty of administrative law, Editura Universitatea Creştină „Dimitrie Cantemir", Bucharest, 1994, p. 417.

[10] Idem.

[11] Eugen Chelaru, Administrarea domeniului public şi a domeniului privat/Administration of the Public Domain and the Private Domain, 2 Ed, CH Beck, Bucharest, 2008, p. 42. The author considers that "the notions of public domain and public property are equivalent, the first not doing anything other than determining the assets that are subject of public property law", concluding that ordinary laws could not use public and private terms in a meaning other than that given by the Constitution.

[12] Professor Corneliu Birsan denies the existence of a public domain in a broad sense. The author considers that the incorporation in the public domain of the assets comprising the "national forest fund", the "national archive fund", the "national cultural patrimony" and so on are not justified, even if they are subject to a special legal regime regarding their preservation, conservation, management and administration, regardless of the owner of the property right (Corneliu Bîrsan, Drept civil. Drepturile reale principale/Civil Law, Main Real Rights, All Beck, Bucharest, 2001, p. 97).

[13] Dana Apostol Tofan, Drept administrative/Administrative Law, vol. II, 4 Ed, C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2017, p. 283.

[14] Professor Antonie Iorgovan defines the public domain as "those public or private assets which, by nature or express provision of the law, must be preserved and passed on to future generations, representing values intended to be used in the public interest, either directly or through a public service subject to an administrative regime or a mixed regime in which the regime of power is decisive, being owned or, as the case may be, guarded by the legal persons of public law" (Antonie Iorgovan, Tratat de drept administrative/Treaty of Administrative Law, vol. II, 4 Ed., All Beck, Bucharest, 2005, p. 173).

[15] Verginia Vedinaş, Alexandru Ciobanu, Reguli de protecţie domenială aplicabile unor bunuri proprietate private/Domain protection rules applicable to private property, Lumina Lex, Bucharest, 2001, p. 74.

[16] Antonie Iorgovan, Drept administrativ - tratat elementar/ Administrative law - elementary treaty, vol. III, Proarcadia, Bucharest, 1993, p. 47.

[17] Antonie Iorgovan, op. cit., 2005, p.173.

[18] André de Laubadère, Yves de Gaudermett & Charles Venezia, Manuel de droit administrative/Course of administrative law, Paris, 1988, p. 336.

[19] The controversies in the doctrine, as well as the "parallelisms, the inconsistencies and the contradictions between the different normative acts in the field of property" have led to the inclusion in the Government Decision no. 196/2016 for the approval of the preliminary theses of the draft Administrative Code, of the chapter on the exercise of the public and private property right of the State and of the administrative-territorial units. We present some of the "dysfunctions" mentioned in the Government Decision no. 196/2016:

According to art. 858 of the Civil Code, "public property is the right of ownership belonging to the state or an administrative-territorial unit on assets which, by their nature or by the declaration of law, are of public use or interest, provided that they are acquired through one of the modes provided by law".

Under another wording, art. 554, par. (1) of the Civil Code has an almost similar content: "The property of the state and of the administrative-territorial units which, by their nature or by the law, are of public use or interest form the subject of public property, but only if they were legally acquired by them".

As it can be seen, the definition of public property, inspired by civilian doctrine, sets out two elements specific to the legal regime applicable to it[20]: the subjects of public property law (state and administrative-territorial units); the scope of public property, delimited on the basis of the criteria of domineering.

1.2. The Scope of Public Property

Law no. 213/1998, by the provisions of art. 3 generically governs the scope of public property. Thus, the public domain is made up of the assets provided in art. 136, par. (3) of the Constitution, as set out in the Annex, which is an integral part of Law no. 213/1998 and any other assets which, according to the law or by their nature, are of public use or interest and are acquired by the state or by the administrative-territorial units in the ways provided by the law.

According to art. 859, par. (1) of the Civil Code, the exclusive object of public property is the public beneficial interest of the subsoil, the airspace, the water with potentially energetic potential, the national interest, the beaches, the territorial sea, the natural resources of the economic zone and the continental shelf, other goods established by organic law. According to par. (2), the other assets belonging to the state or to the administrative-territorial units are, as the case may be, belonging to the public domain or their private domain, but only if they were also acquired in one of the ways provided by the law.

2. Transfer of Domineering Assets

As it results from the provisions of art. 136, par. (2) of the Constitution, the subjects of the public property law are the state or administrative-territorial units.

According to art. 8 of the Law no. 213/1998, which remained unchanged after the entry into force of the new Civil Code, the transfer of assets from the private domain of the state or of the administrative-territorial units in their public domain, shall be achieved, as the case may be, by a decision of the Government, of the county council, respectively the General Council of Bucharest or the local council. The law further specifies that the decision to transfer property may be appealed to the competent administrative court in whose territory the property is located (art. 8, par. (2) of Law No 213/1998).

It is worth mentioning that the transfer to the public domain of assets belonging to the patrimony of commercial companies, to which the state or an administrative-territorial unit is a shareholder, can be achieved only by payment and with the consent of the general meeting of the shareholders of the respective commercial company. In the absence of such agreement, the assets of the respective company may be transferred to the public domain only by the expropriation procedure for a public utility cause and after a fair and preliminary compensation (article 8, paragraph (3) of Law No. 213/1998).

The Civil Code, in Art. 860 par. (3) states that assets which form the exclusive public property of a state or administrative-territorial units under an organic law cannot be transferred from the public domain of the state to the public domain of the administrative-territorial unit or vice versa, only as a result of the modification of the organic law. In other cases, passing an asset from the public domain of the state into the public domain of the administrative-territorial unit and vice versa is done under the law.

It raises the question of what is the meaning of the expression under the terms of the law to which the text of the Civil Code refers. The doctrine states that the answer is found in article 9 of Law no. 213/1998, as amended by Law no 224/2016[21].

Clarifications are also brought by the Constitutional Court of Appeal, which stated that "the normative acts that can be used to pass the assets from the public domain of the state into the public domain of the administrative-territorial units are either the organic laws amending the organic law through which the assets have been declared the exclusive object of public property of the state, or the decisions of the Government, when the assets are not an exclusive object of the public property of the state" (Decision of

1. parallelisms on: holders of public property rights; the characters of public property assets; listing the types of assets included in the public domain;

2. contradictions regarding: the owners of the public property right (incorrectly including in this category the sectors of the Bucharest municipality, the local councils, the county councils or the mayors); inappropriate use of "inalienable" expression; persons who can use public property for free use; the right to represent administrative-territorial units in court in disputes concerning the right of public ownership;

3. incomplete regulation on some aspects regarding the legal regime of public and private property of the state and of the administrative-territorial units created the conditions for the proliferation of a non-unitary administrative and sometimes contradictory practice, while at the same time it deprived the private persons of a firm and unequivocal legal reference in their relations with the public administration.

[20] Dana Apostol Tofan, op. cit., 2015, p. 266.

[21] Verginia Vedinaș, Drept administrative/Administrative Law, X Ed., revised and updated, Ed. Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2017, p. 487.

the Constitutional Court of Romania No. 406/2016)[22]. In fact, the Constitutional Court notes, as early as 2014, that "as far as the legal mechanism for passing an asset from the public property of the state into the public property of the administrative-territorial units, or vice versa, it must be distinguished, depending on the nature of the asset is passed between the mechanism of passing through the declaration of law or the mechanism of passing through individual acts. Thus, if the property belongs to the public domain according to a declaration of the law, it is also possible by law to make the inter-domain transfer, respectively between the public domain of the state and that of an administrative-territorial unit. However, if the asset belongs according to its purpose, namely the national or local public use or interest, to the national or local public domain, then the transfer is made according to the procedure established by art. 9 of the Law no. 213/1998, namely by means of an individual act, a decision of the Government or a local council, depending on the meaning of the transfer[23]".

Art. 9, par. (1) of the Law no. 213/1998 states that the transfer of an asset from the public domain of the state into the public domain of an administrative-territorial unit is made at the request of the county council, respectively of the General Council of Bucharest Municipality or of the local council, as the case may be, being declared to be an asset of national public interest turned into an asset of local or county public interest.

By decision of the county council, respectively of the General Council of the Bucharest Municipality or the local council, the transfer of an asset from the public domain of an administrative-territorial unit in the public domain of the state can be made at the request of the Government, being declared for an asset of local or county public interest turned into an asset of national public interest (art. 9, par. (2) of Law no. 213/1998).

Regarding the transfer of an asset from the public domain of the county to the public domain of an administrative-territorial unit within the territorial district of the respective county, this transfer is achieved at the request of the local council, by a decision of the county council, declaring an asset from county public interest into an asset of local public interest (art. 9, par. (2) of Law No. 213/1998).

The legislator also envisaged the transfer of an asset from the public domain of an administrative-territorial unit of a county in the public domain of the respective county, that being achieved at the request of the county council, by decision of the local council, declaring from local public interest asset into county public interest (art. 9, par. (4) of Law No. 213/1998).

The transfer of an asset from the public domain of an administrative-territorial unit to the public domain of another administrative-territorial unit within the county is achieved at the request of the local council, by a decision of the local council of the commune, town or municipality in whose ownership there is the asset and by decision of the local council of the commune, city or municipality in whose ownership it is transmitted.

Law no. 213/1998, as amended, contains regulations regarding the transfer of an asset from the public domain of a county to the public domain of another neighboring county. This passage is done at the request of the county council, by a decision of the county council of the county in whose property the asset is and by decision of the county council of the county in whose ownership it is transmitted.

The law expressly stipulates that the aforementioned passages are achieved only for a definite period, strictly for the purpose of carrying out investment objectives, stipulated in the decision of the local council, the county council, respectively the municipality of Bucharest.

We should mention that the amendment to art. 9 of the Law no. 213/1998 of art. 1, par. 1 of Law no 224/2016 was determined by the multitude and diversity of the issues raised before the administrative litigation courts in this domain.

Various interpretations have been given, both by theoreticians and by the courts, to Article 10 of Law no. 213/1998, which led to the declaration of an appeal in the interest of the law[24].

---

[22] In the Decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania no. 406/2016 of June 15, 2016, published in the Official Monitor no. 533 dated July 15, 2016, it was stated that "according to art. 136, par. (3) the final thesis of the Basic Law, referring to art. 860, par. (3) the first thesis of the Civil Code, when the asset is the exclusive object of the public property of the state or of the administrative-territorial unit, under an organic law, the transition from the public domain of the state to the public domain of the administrative-territorial units or vice-versa only operates through a change in the organic law. At the same time, according to art. 136, par. (2) of the Constitution related to art. 860, par. (3) second thesis of the Civil Code, in other cases, namely when the asset may belong, either to the public domain of the state or to the public domain of the administrative-territorial units, the transition from the public domain of the state to that of the administrative-territorial units or vice versa may be achieved, according to the law, respectively under the conditions of art. 9 of the Law no. 213/1998 regarding the public property, with the subsequent modifications and completions, namely at the request of the county council, respectively of the General Council of the Bucharest Municipality or of the local council, as the case may be, by decision of the Government or, symmetrically, at the request of the Government, by decision of the county council, respectively of the General Council of the Bucharest Municipality or of the local council".

[23] Decision of the Constitutional Court no. 1 of 10 January 2014, published in the Official Monitor of Romania, Part I, no. 123 of 19 February 2014.

[24] Decision no. 23 of 17 October 2011 on the examination of the appeal in the interest of the law declared by the Prosecutor General of the Prosecutor's Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice regarding the interpretation and application of the provisions of art. 10 par. (2) of the Law no. 1/2000 and art. 10 par. (2) of the Law no. 213/1998 referring to the provisions of art. 55 par. (5) of the Law no. 45/2009 on the transfer of the lands under the administration of the institutions provided by art. 9 par. (1) and art. 9 par. (11) of the Law no. 1/2000 in the public domain of the state in the private domain of the administrative-territorial unit, by decisions of the county commissions for the establishment of the land ownership right, with the purpose of reconstructing the ownership right on the old sites in favor of the former owners or their heirs.

If, in the original form, this article concerned the termination of the right of ownership by the property's destruction or its transfer to the private domain after the entry into force of the New Civil Code, art. 10 of the Law no. 213/1998 regulates the transition from the public domain to the private domain, which is achieved, as the case may be, by a decision of the Government, of the county council, respectively of the General Council of Bucharest Municipality or of the local council, unless otherwise stipulated by the Constitution or by law.

In this case, the passing decision may be appealed, under the law, to the competent administrative court in whose territory the property is located (art. 8, par. (2) of Law No. 213/1998).

We emphasize that in French law various texts provide for real transfers of property belonging to the public domain from a public person to the benefit of another, by way of derogation from the principle of the inalienability of the public domain (for example, article L3113-1 of the General Code of Public Property or Law of Museums of France No 2002-5 of 4 January 2002) [25].

According to art. L.1 of the General Code of private Property, the holders of the property right are the "classical" public persons, respectively the state, the territorial collectivities and their forms of association, as well as the public institutions. The public domain of a public person referred to in article L.1 consists of goods which are affected for the direct use of the public or a public service, provided that in the latter case they are subject to essential (indispensable) development for the execution of the missions of this public service (art. L2111-1).

3. Conclusions

In conclusion, if the object is the exclusive object of public property of the state, according to an organic law, it is also possible by law to transfer the public domain of the state to that of an administrative - territorial unit. It is about the organic laws of modifying the organic law by which the assets have been declared the exclusive object of public property of the state.

If the asset belongs (according to its purpose, to the national or local public use or interest) to the national or local public domain, then the transfer is carried out according to the procedure established by art. 9 of the Law no. 213/1998, respectively by an administrative act of an individual character, a decision of the Government or a local council.

References

- André de Laubadère, Yves de Gaudermett & Charles Venezia, Manuel de droit administrative/Course of administrative law, Paris, 1988
- Antonie Iorgovan, Tratat de drept administrativ/Treaty of administrative law, vol. II, 4 Ed., All Beck, Bucharest, 2005
- Antonie Iorgovan, Drept administrativ - tratat elementar/ Administrative law - elementary treaty, vol. III, Proarcadia, Bucharest
- Alexandru-Sorin Ciobanu, Drept administrativ. Activitatea administrației publice. Domeniul public/ Administrative law. Public administration activity. Public domain, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2015
- Corneliu Bîrsan, Drept civil. Drepturile reale principale/Civil Law, Main Real Rights, All Beck, Bucharest, 2001
- Dana Apostol Tofan, Drept administrativ/Administrative Law, vol. II, 4 Ed, C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2017
- Emil Bălan, Dreptul administrativ al bunurilor/ Administrative law of assets, C. H. Beck, Bucharest, 2007
- Eugen Chelaru, Administrarea domeniului public și a domeniului privat/Administration of the Public Domain and the Private Domain, 2 Ed, CH Beck, Bucharest, 2008
- Ion Filipescu, Domeniul public şi privat al statului şi al unităţilor administrativ-teritoriale/ The public and private domain of the state and of the administrative-territorial units, in Dreptul/The law no. 5-6/1994, pp. 74-76
- Jean Vermeulen, Curs de drept administrative/Course of administrative law, Bucharest, 1947
- Liviu Giurgiu, Domeniul public, Seria "Repere Juridice"/Public Domain, The series "Legal landmarks", Editura Tehnică, Bucharest, 1997
- Mihai T. Oroveanu, Tratat de drept administrative/Treaty of administrative law, Editura Universitatea Creştină „Dimitrie Cantemir", Bucharest, 1994
- Odile de David Beauregard-Berthier, Droit administratif des biens/Administrative law of goods, 5e édition, Gualiano éditeur, EJA, Paris, 2007
- Verginia Vedinaş, Alexandru Ciobanu, Reguli de protecţie domenială aplicabile unor bunuri proprietate private/ Domain protection rules applicable to private property, Lumina Lex, Bucharest, 2001
- Verginia Vedinaş, Drept administrativ/Administrative Law, X Ed., revised and updated, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2017

[25] Odile de David Beauregard-Berthier, Droit administratif des biens/Administrative law of goods, 5e édition, Gualiano éditeur, EJA, Paris, 2007, p. 97.

THE REASON AND FIELD OF APPLICATION REGARDING ART. 118 PARA. (3) OF EMERGENCY ORDINANCE NO. 195/2002

Beatrice-Ștefania NICULAE*

Abstract

This article aims to establish the correct interpretation of the obligation to send to the police unit that detected the contravention a copy of the complaint in relation to the performing of appropriate entries in the driving record. It also deals with the consequences that can be reached unjustifiably in the situation when the police unit does not proceed to perform the appropriate entries in the driving record, although they have become aware of the existence of the complaint, being a legal party cited in a pending trial.

Therefore, if the police body does not make the entries in the driving record as soon as it is notified on the existence and content of a complaint of violation, we can find ourselves under the scope of the provisions of art. 335 para. (2) of the Criminal Code, namely driving a vehicle without driving license. It is an unfair situation, due to the fact the law itself provides that the complaint has a suspensive effect as of the time of the registration, namely when it is filed with the registry of the court, there also being available the possibility of obtaining a court clerk certificate.

This document can prove that the complaint exists, so that, if the potential offender was pulled over for a routine check, the offender would have available all the legal means to prove the existence of the complaint and, by default, of the suspension of the effects of the sanction applied to the offender.

Keywords: complaint, contravention, driving record, pending trial, art. 118 para. (3) of E.O. no. 195/2002, consequences.

1. Introduction

This study aims to perform a short review of the obligation provided for by art. 118 para. (3) of G.E.O. no. 195/2002[1] on public road traffic, namely the communication by the offender of a counterpart of the complaint of violation filed with the dockets of the court competent to settle it, in order to make the necessary entries in the diving record.

The legal provisions in question may be subject to different interpretations made both by the offence finding authorities, and in what concerns the practice of the courts of law.

Due to these reasons, we hereby draw the attention on the fact that it is possible to reach non-unitary solutions in relation to the cases of litigants, although, from our point of view, there is only one fair and equitable way to construe the obligation established on the offender, as we will show below.

2.1. The history of the regulation of art. 118 of the Ordinance.

In 2007, art. 118 para. (1) of G.E.O. no. 195/2002 read as follows: "A complaint can be filed against the record of findings within 15 days as of the communication, to the traffic police department in the jurisdiction of which the deed was found".

This legal provision was declared unconstitutional by Decision no. 347 of April 3rd, 2007[2], pronounced by the Constitutional Court of Romania.

Therefore, the Court noted that "the existence of any administrative hindrance, which has no objective or rational justification and which could ultimately deny the free access to justice of the individual, violates the provisions of art. 21 para. (1)-(3) of the Constitution. Therefore, the obligation to file the complaint with the body of the official examiner, as a condition of access to justice, cannot be objectively and reasonably justified by the fact that, after receiving the complaint, the administrative bodies would be aware of it and would not proceed with the enforcement of the applied fine. Furthermore, such a legislative solution could lead to abuses committed by the official examiners of the administrative bodies, which, ultimately, would lead to their criminal and disciplinary liability, would hinder or deny the right of the claimant to free access to justice".

The arguments of the Court on the unconstitutionality of the challenged provisions can be applied in what concerns the obligation to file the complaint with the police body.

Of course, we do not consider the arguments on the violation of the free access to justice, but rather the thesis on the possibility granted to the police bodies to construe the legal texts in such a manner to commit unjustified, unlawful and also discriminatory abuses.

* PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: beatricestefania.niculae@gmail.com).

[1] Hereinafter referred to as the Ordinance, normative act republished in Official Journal of Romania no. 670 of August 3rd, 2006, as further amended and supplemented.

[2] in what concerns the constitutional challenge of the provisions of art. 118 para. (1), (2) and (5) of G.E.O. no. 195/2002 on public road traffic, decision published in Official Journal of Romania no. 307 of May 9th, 2007.

2.2. Current regulation, rationality and applicability.

Currently, art. 118 para. (3) of the Ordinance provides that "the evidence of the registration of the complaint filed with the court within the deadline referred to in para. (1) is delivered by the offender to the police unit of the official examiner, which will make the entries in the records and return the driving license".

Para. (3) of the same normative act shall have to be correlated with para. (2) of art. 118, which provides that "the complaint suspends the enforcement of the fines and additional sanctions as of the date of its registration until the date of the judgment".

Given that the complaint of violation can suspend the enforcement, the consequence is that "the measure on the suspension of the driving right should have been suspended. In the administrative practice, this aspect is shown by the issuance of the "temporary traffic permit" – a certificate issued in case the driving permit was withdrawn in order to be suspended and a complaint of violation was filed with the authority of the official examiner[3]".

Notwithstanding, by analyzing the regulation of para. (3) of the Ordinance, we note that, although the sanctions are suspended as of the registration of the complaint with the court, it can be deemed that the police body will not make the entries unless the complaint is communicated to it by the offender.

It is very normal that the police body is not aware of the existence of the complaint until the receipt of the document in question, but it cannot be considered that it has no obligation to make the appropriate entries in the driving record of the offender, from the moment the complaint is communicated to it by the court of law.

If we admitted that the police inspectorate is able to claim that it was unaware of the registration of the offender's complaint following the communication thereof by the registry of the court, we can imagine that we would reach the application of unjustified and disproportionate solutions, with potential consequences of criminal nature.

As a consequence, we believe that the nature and reason for establishing such a provision has indeed a justification, but strictly as to the period between the filing of the complaint with the competent court of law and the moment when the complaint will actually be communicated by means of the registry of the court to the police inspectorate, in order to file a statement of defense, in connection with the criticisms and arguments found and substantiated in the complaint of violation.

2.3. The failure to perform the appropriate entries in the driving record of the offender and the potential consequences that can occur in the criminal field.

If the police body does not make the entries in the driving record as soon as it is notified on the existence and content of a complaint of violation, we can find ourselves under the scope of the provisions of art. 335 para. (2) of the Criminal Code[4], namely driving a vehicle without driving license.

Therefore, in accordance with the provisions of art. 335 para. (2) of the Criminal Code, we note that the wording of the incident legal text does not leave much room for interpretation:

"Driving a vehicle without driving license:

(2) Driving, on public roads, a vehicle for which a driving license is required by law, by an individual who owns a driving license which was issued for a different category or subcategory than the one in which the vehicle is included, or whose license has been withdrawn or rescinded or who is not entitled to drive vehicles in Romania shall be punished by imprisonment from 6 months to 3 years or by fine".

By analyzing the text above, it can be noted that the opening of a criminal file is very possible and unfortunately, very probable, only because the corresponding information has not been recorded by the police body, the offender having a complaint of violation already filed on the dockets of the courts of law whereby he/she challenged the lawfulness and validity of the record of findings and subsequent penalties.

It is an unfair situation, due to the fact the law itself provides that the complaint has a suspensive effect as of the time of the registration, namely when it is filed with the registry of the court, there also being available the possibility of obtaining a court clerk certificate. This document can prove that the complaint exists, so that, if the potential offender was pulled over for a routine check, the offender would have available all the legal means to prove the existence of the complaint and, by default, of the suspension of the effects of the sanction applied to the offender.

There is also the possibility that the official examiner checks in the database and finds that there is no entry on the complaint, so that, overly zealous, proceeds with the opening of a criminal file, even if the potential offender holds the court clerk certificate.

Therefore, although the offender appealed the record of findings and subsequent penalties, and the police body was notified in this respect by the court of law, the potential risk on the opening of a criminal file substantiated on art. 335 para. (2) of the Criminal Code is not excluded, on grounds that the complaint is not available in the records of the police body.

[3] See in this respect, Ovidiu Podaru, Radu Chiriță, Regimul juridic al contravențiilor: O.G. nr. 2/2001 comentată, edition 2, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011, p. 289.

[4] See in this respect, Law no. 286/2009 on the Criminal Code, published in Official Journal no. 510 of July 24th, 2009, as further amended and supplemented.

Both the doctrine and the practice of the courts of law note that, in case of driving on public road a vehicle without holding a driving license, the immediate consequence "consists in damaging social relations concerning public roads safety and creating a state of danger because of the existence on public roads of vehicles driven by persons who did not acquire theoretic knowledge and practical abilities for obtaining driving license[5]".

Furthermore, in what concerns the nature of the application of the measure on the suspension of the driving right, it was noted that "the suspension of the driving right has not a punitive nature, but a preventive one, as it concerns the protection of public interest against the potential risk posed by a driver suspected of serious breach of road traffic rules and especially against the danger represented by the breach of the traffic rules for traffic participants[6]".

Notwithstanding, we can talk about the immediate consequence of the offence provided for by art. 335 para. (2) of the Criminal Code and the preventive nature of the measure on the suspension of the right to drive vehicles on public roads if the sanction remained definitive, namely: either by not challenging the record of findings and subsequent penalties, or by the complaint being definitively dismissed by a court of law.

We hereby mention that we agree with the above-mentioned author in what concerns the reason of the establishment, the nature of the measure and what it is intended to be protected by applying the measure on the suspension of public roads driving right, but we believe that we should not ignore the presumption of innocence.

As a consequence, if the record of findings and subsequent penalties is not appealed within the legal deadline before a competent court of law, the respective administrative act shall remain definitive and shall produce effects.

Notwithstanding, in consideration of the fact that the sanctioned person filed a complaint of violation, the record of findings and subsequent penalties cannot be effective unless a final decision is ruled which maintains the appealed administrative act.

It is obvious that, if the final decision finds that the cancellation of the record of findings and subsequent penalties is required (either due to non-compliance with absolute nullity conditions or non-compliance with the application of relative nullity, provided that the offender was injured), there is no reason or logics to talk about its potential effects, because it will be considered retroactively that it had not existed. Therefore, any sanction applied by means of the respective record shall be deregistered with the driving record of the offender, upon the request of the offender, accompanied at least by the copy of the final decision, in accordance with the legal provisions in force.

We are considering the situation where the sanction on the suspension of the right of driving on public roads had already been suspended by means of the simple registration of the complaint of violation. The fact that the police body can use the legal text of art. 118 para. (3) of the Ordinance to neglect making the appropriate entries in the driving record of the offender or to commit abuses, certainly should not be able to justify the basis for opening a criminal file, otherwise opened without a legal ground.

Given that contraventions also fall under the scope of criminal charges, as it is already well-known, therefore a "dispute must grant the procedural guarantees acknowledged and guaranteed by art. 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights [which is an integral part of the domestic law under art. 11 of the Constitution of Romania and has priority under art. 20 para. (2) of the fundamental law][7]".

According to the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights, the court must examine in every case to what extent the deed committed by the individual who was sanctioned in the field of contraventions represents a "criminal charge", under art. 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights. This analysis shall be performed under three alternative criteria, as follows: the nature of the deed, criminal nature of the legal text defining the contravention, according to domestic legislation, and, last but not least, the nature and severity level of the applied sanction.

Therefore, we believe that the application of non bis in idem principle is required, and also under art. 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights and art. 4 of Protocol no. 7 to the European Convention on Human Rights whereby the same principle in the criminal field is established.

Therefore, as the doctrine[8] stated, in what concerns criminal liability that can be applied for the commission of the offence of driving on public roads a vehicle by a person whose driving right is suspended, this "cannot be undertaken as long as the offender was not officially made aware that the competent bodies

[5] See in this respect, Decision no. 667/A of August 5th, 2014, pronounced by the Court of Appeal of Cluj, criminal and minors division, available on site www.curteadeapelcluj.ro, accessed on 20.12.2017.

[6] See in this respect, Civil sentence no. 3001 of June 29th, 2012, definitive, not published, pronounced by Bucharest Tribunal, division IX of the contentious administrative and fiscal, available in Cristina Titirișcă, Contencios administrativ: suspendarea actului administrativ: practică judiciară recentă, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p. 167.

[7] See in this respect, Andrei Pap, Drept contravențional. Culegere de hotărâri judecătorești 2007-2014. Vol. I. Reflectarea jurisprudenței CEDO în procedura contravențională națională, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, p. 24.

[8] See in this respect, Vasile Dobrinoiu (coordinator), Ilie Pascu, Mihai Adrian Hotca, Ioan Chiș, Mirela Gorunescu, Costică Păun, Norel Neagu, Maxim Dobrinoiu, Mircea Constantin Sinescu, Noul Cod penal comentat. Partea specială, Vol. II, Edition II revised and supplemented, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, p. 716; The comment of February 28th, 2014 is also available on https://idrept.ro/, site accessed on 08.12.2017.

ordered the suspension of the driving right[9] (...) The solution is similar in case the persons against whom the suspension of the driving right had been established filed a complaint of violation whereby requested the annulment of the record of findings and subsequent penalties and this had not yet been definitively settled [10] ".

In the substantiation of our arguments, we hereby show that, by Civil Decision no. 8458/2014, pronounced by the Court of Appeal of Cluj, the division of the contentious administrative and fiscal[11], in what concerns the text of art. 118 para. (3) the following were noted: "The text refers to the situation where the driving license was withdrawn upon the draw up of the record (…) In the situation of the plaintiff, there is nothing to prevent the entry in the driving record to be performed based on the findings of the finding authority, party to the contravention trial".

Furthermore, in another case[12] which concerned the suspension of the administrative act, the court considered that, "although the plaintiff was returned the driving license only on 20.12.2014, as resulting from the evidence of f. 29, the analysis of the provisions of art. 118 para. (2) and (3) of G.E.O. no. 195/2002 the case claimed by the plaintiff cannot be retained as incident, namely that the suspensive effect of the formulation of the complaint of violation would be conditioned by the filing of the proof of registration of the complaint with the police unit the official examiner is part of. Following the analysis of art. (2) of the aforementioned article, within the limits of the investigation of the appearance of the rights claimed by the plaintiff, the suspensive effect is produced de jure (ope legis), by the registration of the complaint with the court of law within the deadline provided for by para. (1), the law recognizing the benefit of safeguarding the driving right throughout the judgment of the complaint of violation. The lack of diligence in the restitution of the driving license, whether or not by fault, cannot represent a precondition of the subsequent claiming of a negative fact, namely those of the failure to exercise a right".

3. Conclusion

In view of the arguments set out in the present study, we conclude that the police bodies should pay more attention and show promptness, professionalism and, last but not least, good-faith, in what concerns the effective registration of the appropriate entries in the driving record of the sanctioned offender.

As we have already noted, by means of the failure to apply and implement these entries in due time, there is a real possibility that a criminal file is opened against the sanctioned person, the consequences being at least questionable, even in case of file closing.

Furthermore, not only the police bodies, but also the courts of law should grant more attention to incident regulations, taking into account the reason for which the measure of the complaint of violation communication to the police body was established, respectively the suspension of the applied sanctions by means of the filing of the complaint with the competent court of law.

In conclusion, in our opinion, the only reason for the establishment of the obligation of the claimant on the communication to the police department of a counterpart of the complaint of violation, takes into account the term between the registration of the complaint of violation and the communication of a counterpart by the registry of the court, in order for the police body to be able to exercise its defense right, by drawing up and formulating a statement of defense.

We believe that this obligation cannot be construed in such a way that it could justify the lack of proper entries recorded in claimant's driving record, especially since the police body becomes party to the litigation contemplating the annulment of the record of findings and subsequent penalties.

References

- M. Andreescu, R.S. Şimonescu-Diaconu, „Infracţiuni rutiere", C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2012

[9] See in this respect, Criminal decision no. 1051/2011, pronounced by the Court of Appeal of Galaţi, available in M. Andreescu, R.S. Şimonescu-Diaconu, Infracţiuni rutiere, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2012, p. 128. [apud Vasile Dobrinoiu (coordinator), op. cit., 2014, p. 716].

[10] See in this respect, M.A. Hotca (coordinator), Maxim Dobrinoiu, Mirela Gorunescu, Norel Neagu, Radu-Florin Geamănu, Infracţiuni prevăzute în legi speciale, edition 3, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013, p. 316 [apud Vasile Dobrinoiu (coordinator), op. cit., 2014, p. 716].

[11] The quoted decision can be accessed by idrept platform, on the following websie: https://idrept.ro/DocumentView.aspx?DocumentId=77852050&Info=RG9jSWQ9NDU0OTcmSW5kZXg9RCUzYSUyZiU1ZmNhYmluZXQlMmZwamV4dCUyZmluZGV4Jkhpd ENvdW50PTYwJmhpdHM9MWYxKzFmMisxZjMrMWY5KzFmYSsyMDkrMzY1KzM2NiszNjcrMzZkKzM2ZSs1NzkrNTdhKzU4Yis1OGMrNTkxKzU5Mis2ZjMrNmY0KzZmNSs2ZjkrNmZhKzZmZSs2ZmYrNzAwKzcwMys3MDQrNzEzKzhjZis4ZDArOGQzKzhkNys4ZDgrOWE4KzlhOSs5YjErOWIyKzliOCs5YjkrYWU2K2FlNythZjcrYWY4K2FmZCthZmUrYmM1K2JjNitiYzcrYmNiK2JjYytiZGErYzQyK2M0MytjNDQrYzQ4K2M0OStkZDkrZGRhK2RkYitlMTIr, site accessed on 20.02.2018.

[12] See in this respect, Ruling no. 8484/2014, pronounced by Bucharest Tribunal, division of contentious administrative and fiscal, available by means of idrept platform, on the following website: https://idrept.ro/DocumentView.aspx?DocumentId=78081703&Info=RG9jSWQ9Mjc0MTk2JkluZGV4PUQlM2ElMmYlNWZjYWJpbmV0JTJmcGpleHQlMmZpbmRleCZIaXRDb3VudD0zNCZoaXRzPTJiOCsyYzMrMmM0KzJjNSsyY2IrMmNjKzJlZCsyZWUrMmVmKzJmNSsyZjYrYWQ1K2FkNithZGMrYWRkK2FmMythZjQrYWZiK2FmYytiODUrYjg2K2I4OStiOGYrYjkwK2RhZitkYjMrZGI0K2RiZCtkYmUrZGM2KzExZDQrMTFkNSsxMWQ2KzEyMGUr, site accessed on 20.02.2018.

- Vasile Dobrinoiu (coordinator), Ilie Pascu, Mihai Adrian Hotca, Ioan Chiș, Mirela Gorunescu, Costică Păun, Norel Neagu, Maxim Dobrinoiu, Mircea Constantin Sinescu, „Noul Cod penal comentat. Partea specială", Vol. II, Edition II revised and supplemented, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014
- Andrei Pap, „Drept contravențional. Culegere de hotărâri judecătorești 2007-2014. Vol. I. Reflectarea jurisprudenței CEDO în procedura contravențională națională", Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015
- Ovidiu Podaru, Radu Chiriță, „Regimul juridic al contravențiilor: O.G. nr. 2/2001 comentată", edition 2, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011
- Cristina Titirișcă, „Contencios administrativ: suspendarea actului administrativ: practică judiciară recentă", Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016
- Decision no. 347 of April 3rd, 2007 of the Constitutional Court of Romania
- Decision no. 667/A of August 5th, 2014, pronounced by the Court of Appeal of Cluj
- Criminal Decision no. 1051/2011, pronounced by the Court of Appeal of Galați
- Civil Ruling no. 3001 of June 29th, 2012 pronounced by Bucharest Tribunal, division IX of the contentious administrative and fiscal
- Government Ordinance no. 195/2002 on public road traffic
- Law no. 286/2009 on the Criminal Code
- www.idrept.ro
- www.curteadeapelcluj.ro

THE MORALITY OF LAW IN THE ERA OF GLOBALIZATION

Oana Andra NIȚĂ*

Abstract

The principles of law are an area of an interdisciplinary interest. The axiological, praxiological and teleological axes of law involve approaches from the perspective of philosophy and the philosophy of law in particular. The principles of law determine the existence of material legal reality in their capacity, as premises of the positive legal order. The principles of law affirmatively state its presence in the legal framework, precisely in the processes of law development and realization. In the conditions of the globalization of the positive law, with the overwhelming multiplication of the systemic components (norms, institutions, branches etc.), the recipient of the law risks losing its orientation in the normative-legal space. Therefore, the path of the recipient of the law, irrespective of his position, the legislator, the applicant, or the ordinary recipient of the positive right, is illuminated by the principles of law.

Globalization, as a socio-political phenomenon, also has effects on the legal system: there are increasingly visible signs of a legal monialization, the creation of a right world. The national process will adapt to it, precisely because the international courts have grounded the principles of the universal fair trial. Interconditioning between legality and moral principles is the essential part of the socialization of human life, of its potentiation, realizing itself as being necessary to remove a maximum of harm.

The strong manifestation of the effects of globalization has generated anxiety among broad categories of people, states, and civil society organizations. This is because globalization describes a complex and diffuse reality: financial crises, culture standardization, emerging transnational actors (such as international organizations, multinational companies) and increased interdependence of economies.

The article shows how moral principles are compatible with the current trend of globalization and how thinking about globalization and greater international interdependence would benefit from greater attention.

Keywords: globalization, moral principles, legality, society, economy.

1. Introduction

The present paper reaches aspects about the phenomenon of globalization and how it challenges many of the traditional hypothesis about International law, its relationship to national law, the ways in which it is created and the methods of its enforcement. We will try to make a brief study of the normative, moral and institutional implications of globalization and of its theoretical and practical branches in a variety of fields ranging from the regulation of trade and investments, the protection of human rights and the international criminal responsibility of corporations or/and states, security and environmental governance and the safeguarding of the diversity of cultural heritage.

Globalization affects us all directly, even if we are individualized. What is important is the evaluation of the opportunities and risks that globalization entails, distancing us from the current tendencies of demonization, or, on the contrary, the exaggeration of the consequences of this phenomenon. The dynamics of globalization is controlled by economic forces, yet its most important consequences are in the political field. Global issues such as the greenhouse effect can not be solved at the level of a single state because they are neither the consequences of the actions of a single state, nor can local problems be solved within the educational system, for example.

The objectives proposed in the study are the following: defining and realizing a transdisciplinary analyze of the concept of globalization, identifying the role and functions of law in the age of globalization, emphasizing the importance of morality in contemporary culture and civilization, proposing a set of normative regulations in the field of globalization. We will try reaching this objectives by using quantitative methods, as well as demonstrative methods.

According to Kant, the moral obligation of the individual to discover and capitalize on the principle of universal law is inherent to our conscience. Herbert Lionel Hart[1] states that justice demands that globalization is to be carried out justly; that is, fairly without any violation of moral rights and justice, different from legality.

In clear and concise terms, Robert Went[2] demythologises globalization. He refutes the myth that globalization is an entirely new phenomenon and that it is an unavoidable process. While recognising that it poses serious strategic challenges to the Left, he argues that these challenges are not insurmountable and that there is hope for advocating real change. Went puts globalization into its historical context. He shows that there is no option of returning to the postwar mode of expansion, but that the current trend must be updated. If not, he warns of greater social inequality, levelling of wages, retrogressing the working conditions, life-threatening ecological deterioration and a widespread dictatorship of the market.

* PhD Candidate, The Bucharest University of Economic Studies (e-mail: oana.nita2000@gmail.com)

[1] Hart Herbert Lionel Adolphus, The Concept of Law, (Oxford: The Clarendon Press, 1978), 160

[2] Robert Went, Globalization. Neoliberal Challenge, Radical Responses (London & Stirling Virginia: Pluto Press, 2000), 2-4

2. Interpretation of justice through modern philosophy

The idea of justice will start the individual's morality and will confront his legal feeling by marking human conduct; in other words, the moral law of each person is the determinant of righteous (right) or unfair (unjust) legal laws, in which external conduct is built. Laws of morality and laws of law act in two interrelated dimensions (subjective and objective), based on the same concept and ideal paradigm of justice. The thoughtful subject finds within itself the beginning of the justice, beyond the metaphysical ascension. The moral obligation of the individual is to discover and capitalize on the principle of universal law which, after Kant, is indigenous to our conscience.

Responsibility is trained when man's will is not constrained by internal or external factors and he is "ruled" only by freedom. According to Kant, this is the principle of the autonomy of the will to administer the rational activity of man. Absolutely good will would be the only universal law that any rational being would impose. This Kantian ideal would lead to universal accountability. Good will can be cultivated as a process of liberation from the action of internal factors (thoughts, desires) and external strangers of the proposed desideratum. A person is autonomous to the extent that he succeeds in breaking down his dictated senses, that is, he has rational behavior outside of any constraining way. It is only in this situation that he becomes legally and morally responsible.

According to del Vecchio[3], this duty can also be considered as a principle of law, a perpetual and inviolable prerogative of the person, balanced by the correlative obligation of each one to reflect that limit, beyond which the opposition of the other party would be justified and legitimate. Therefore, the right has its principle in the nature or essence of man, distinguishing itself from morality through the objectivity of the report. All social relations must be measured and constituted according to this principle or the limitation of a universal right to the person inherent in it. This deontological demand remains intangible, keeping its value and meaning untouched, because it is metaphysical, even if the empirical reality does not always conform to the principles of natural law.

Responsibility can be examined from the perspective of morality and law. The morale, which directs the universe of thoughts, desires and human feelings, is the field of responsibility for the escape of the inner (psychic) world of the subject. The positive right, which governs human conduct or deeds in action or inaction, is the area of external responsibility, legal responsibility.

T. Mînzală[4] points out that when an individual does not adhere to the system of official norms, especially legal ones, considering them foreign of his appropiation, these rules are imposed on him, however, and he is required to respect them; they impose an accountability to him. In such a situation, the individual is accountable, not responsible in relation to the norms he disagrees with, but he complies with the obligation. If moral responsibility is implemented, as a rule in relation to oneself implying moral coercive measure, then legal liability is a legal relationship of coercion of the perpetrator, by the competent body, to enforce legal sanctions.

Contemporary doctrines contain a plurality of interpretations of justice. Thus, F. Geny[5] defines justice as an order, a balance established on the basis of an idea of harmony, moral in its substance, externally in its manifestations. J. Dabin[6] sees the matter of justice in suum cuique tribuere and considers that the respect of the physical and moral faculties of man and of the goods acquired through this faculty falls within the notion of justice. Le Fur[7] also sees justice in the respect of human personality, to which he adds that of social groups. Ch. Perelman defines the concept of justice through equality as a principle of action after which members of the same essential category must be treated equally.

Given the fact that justice implies equity, we should track their connections. According to Romanian Encyclopaedic Dictionary, equity is not interpreted as justice, but as impartiality, honesty, humanity. Though, justice is fairness. The equitable word comes from the Latin aequitas which means: match, justice, temperance. According to Plato[8], equity is the state of the one who is ready to yield from his rights and benefits: moderation in business relations; the right attitude of the rational soul to what is beautiful or ugly (good or bad). For the romans, aequitas meaning gets close to the meaning of law. After Cicero, aequitas is confused with civil justice. According to Celsus, law is the art of good and equity (jus est ars boni et aequi). Generally speaking, to the Roman jurisconsultum, aequitas appears as the goal and ideal of law.

N. Popa[9], for example, portrays equity in unison with justice as a whole director. Gh. Mihai and R.

[3] Dicţionar enciclopedic român, Vol. III. K-P. (Bucureşti: Editura politică, 1965), 128-129
[4] Traian Mînzală. Studiu asupra principiilor dreptului (Constanţa: Editura Muntenia, 1996), 48
[5] Dicţionar enciclopedic român, Vol. III. K-P. (Bucureşti: Editura politică, 1965), 218
[6] Dicţionar enciclopedic român, Vol. III. K-P. (Bucureşti: Editura politică, 1965), 200
[7] Dicţionar enciclopedic român, Vol. III. K-P. (Bucureşti: Editura politică, 1965), 75
[8] https://plato.stanford.edu/entries/moral-character/ (accessed 24.02.2018)
[9] Dicţionar enciclopedic român, Vol. III. K-P. (Bucureşti: Editura politică, 1965), 125-127

Motica [10] argue that the principle of justice is dimensioned in legality, equality, equity and good faith, a priori, but have characterized justice as "unmistakable in good faith and equity". To avoid suspicion regarding the statements of the authors Gh. Mihai and R. Motica, we find the rigorous explanations in the same source. Equity is proving to be just one of the three components of justice in the sense of principle that bases any system of law. The other two complementary elements of equity are duty and direction. The principle of equity is no other principle than justice, but justice itself is in consensus with good morals. It blunts formal legal equality, a humanization introducing into the legal systems in force the categories of natural morals, from which the justification is also an intimate and in-freedom doing.

M. Djuvara[11] points out that the logical elements of the idea of justice are: bilaterality, parity (initial equality), reciprocity (initial equivalence), exchange and remuneration. So, justice would involve two elements: the ideal one and the other of practical nature. The ideal criterion is good will. Good will, as a universal and spiritual order, is the greatest virtue, according to M. Djuvara. The universal order is transformed into the human consciousness in the form of a principle of morality that directs everything. The virtuous man is the one who conceives the good intention and, implicitly, the justice, therefore, will conform to the universal order, it will fit into the universal harmony. The practical criterion of justice is equity itself that promotes ideas of balance, proportion, safety and order or, what M. Djuvara called the logical elements of justice. Applying the law is centered on the principle of equity, aiming at diminishing the gap between "what is" and "what must be," pushing the real to the ideal. Equity would be the golden means that reconciles the demands of absolute justice with the imperfections of positive justice. The point is that where justice is done, equity is required. Positive regulations, even if the area of coverage, revelation, and attachment do not cope with perfect ideal justice, yet equity is not ignored in the positive law. It must therefore be that justice, without leaving the ideal, seek in fact, in the light of the historical circumstances, the means best suited to perfect society. But as society is far from perfection, this achievement is always a compromise, in which the ideal principle appears to be reduced.

According to I. Dogaru, D.C. Dănișor and Gh. Dănișor[12], the legislative policy is a part of the legal policy that establishes the techniques, methods and principles of normalization in order to achieve the legal system finality. The purpose of the legislative policy and the general legal ideal of the legislator is the common good, respectively, there are no real laws than those which suspect the public good of the state. From the point of view of the legal conscience of the legislator, the purpose of the legislative policy can be transformed. Thus, the rise of the goal is determined by the approximation of legislative policy to high morality. Any better lawmaker proposes to his laws a unique purpose - the supreme virtue, that is perfect righteousness. However, the legislator will take all the trouble to investigate and establish measures to pursue purely the morals of a state. Conversely, diminishing the scope of legislative policy is dependent on minimizing the morality of the legislator. If the laws whose sole purpose is the interest of some individuals and not the state, it means that justice is nothing but a word. To avoid extremes in setting the finalities of legislative policy and to sensitize the legislator's conscience, the great Plato[13] recommends the legislator to ask himself often: "Where do I want to go now?" And "if such a mood occurs, am I not mistaking the purpose?" So, the legislator's activity is three-dimensional: cognitive, axiotheleological and praxeodeonic.

The issue of justice has been debated in philosophy for millennia and it has remained an elusive concept to define, while putative definitions have proven to be divisive. Michael Boylan, following Rawls, describes justice as fairness. Fairness includes sometimes treating people in the same way and sometimes differently. He gives the example that if everyone in a family loves chocolate cake equally and, other things being equal, the impartial way to divide a chocolate cake in the family is to give each member an equal share[14]. Judith J. Thomson[15] and R. Simon[16] have discussed the issue of preferential hiring as something that could be demanded by justice. Here the argument was whether or not it is fair to hire people on the basis of certain criteria, such as gender (in the case of women), or race (in the case of blacks), because it would be like giving back to them what they have lost on account of the treatment they got because of their statuses in previous social dispensations. Justice is balancing the scales, where each person has access to what they have the right to without impediment.

For Plato, justice is at two levels – in the individual and in society. An individual is in a state of equilibrium when the different parts of their humanity are in harmony with each other, working together for

[10] Dicționar enciclopedic român, Vol. III. K-P. (București: Editura politică, 1965), 131

[11] Mircea Djuvara, Teoria generală a dreptului (enciclopedia juridică): Drept rațional, izvoare și drept pozitiv (București: Editura All,1995), 401

[12] Dicționar enciclopedic român, Vol. III. K-P. (București: Editura politică, 1965), 84

[13] Platon. Legile (București: Editura IRI, 1995), 400

[14] Michael Boylan, The Future of Affirmative Actio (Upper Saddle River, New Jersey: Business Ethics. Prentice-Hall, 2001), 264

[15] Judith Jarvis Thomson, Preferential Hiring in M. Boylan (Upper Saddle River, New Jersey: Business Ethics. Prentice-Hall, 2001), 247-252

[16] Robert Simon, Preferential Hiring: A Reply to Judith Jarvis Thomson in M. Boylan (Upper Saddle River, New Jersey: Business Ethics. Prentice-Hall, 2001), 253- 255

the benefit of the person.[17] This is possible when the different parts of the human being do their individual duties, without getting into the way of the others. For example, as a rational animal, a human being must act when reason has deliberated and influenced the will to be drawn towards the reasonable thing and the emotions have also come along as per the dictates of reason. A person who acts from emotions and reasons afterwards, is usually in trouble because he is not behaving qua rational, but qua emotional, which is not their nature, hence misbalance/disequilibrium that he calls injustice.

Likewise, in society every person has a role to play, for the benefit of themselves and society at large. Disequilibrium will result when the different members of society get in each others way; when leaders steal and rule based on their selfish whims and workers abandon their posts in pursuit of pleasure, and when they value and reward behaviours that have no value to society there would be chaos, which leads to unfair treatment of other members of society and indeed, everybody. Justice is when rulers do what is good for the state and lead the country to a life of fair livelihood.

The theme of justice is also found in Immanuel Kant, who starts by cautioning the question "what is justice?"

Can be just as perplexing for a jurist as the well-known question ―What is truth? - is for a logician, assuming, that is, that he does not want to lapse into a mere tautology or to refer us to the laws of a particular country at a particular time. A jurist can, of course, tell us what the actual Law of the land is (quid sit juris), that is, what the laws say or have said at a certain time and at a certain place. But whether what these laws prescribe is also just and the universal criterion that will in general enable us to recognise what is just or unjust (justum et injustum) – the answer to such questions will remain hidden unless, for a while, empirical principles and searches for the sources of these judgments in pure reason are abandoned[18].

He goes on to explain that, in relation to obligations, justice is about the relationship of people's actions as they affect each other; people's wills in relation to each other and lastly, the relationship of the two wills as autonomous and accommodative of each other in accordance with a universal law. He concludes that justice is therefore the aggregate of those conditions under which the will of one person can be conjoined with the will of another in accordance with a universal law of freedom. Justice is a universal principle, according to him. Every action, he argues, is just [right] that in itself or in its maxim is such that the freedom of the will of each can coexist together with the freedom of everyone in accordance with a universal law. What he means is that every individual has the freedom to act in their own interest and they should be willing to grant that all other free beings like them have the same right. Every person has an equal right to free will. I am free to bind you to what you can bind me to and vice versa. What we are each bound to, can and should never be something we are unable to attain.

3. The phenomenon of globalization

In the last years two phenomena, constitutionalism and globalization, have considerably contributed to changing the appearance of our legal systems. The two are of relatively opposing natures: constitutionalism represents the submission of political power to law, and its scope is that of state; globalization, in contrast, represents the submission of political power to economic power and, as its name suggests, has a scope which goes beyond state borders.

Similarly, with regard to globalization, a distinction between the phenomenon and its legal conceptualization needs to be drawn, that is to say, between the legal changes which arise with globalization and the way these changes are translated into theoretical terms. The notion of globalization is relatively imprecise. As a starting point, one could use a very broad notion, such as Steger´s: "a multidimensional series of social processes which creates, multiplies, gives rise to and intensifies social interchange and interdependence on a global level, while, at the same time it gives rise to an ever growing sense of connection between the local and the distant"[19]. This is, approximately, the notion which many social scientists take as a starting point when they hold that globalization can be described as "the tendency towards a growing interconnection and interdependence between all countries and societies in the world"[20]. It is a process whose engine is international trade and capital flows and which also incorporates aspects "of a social, cultural and, of course, technological nature". If one takes this approach, law can be seen as a recipient of those great changes; not in the scope of causes, but in that of the effects of globalization and, thus, it is claimed, "this dynamic is so strong that it may be provoking a certain degree of obsolescence in legal and political institutions"[21].

Moral justice is important in making philosophy relevant to globalization. In short there should not be any globalization if there is no justice. Justice demands that globalization be carried out justly; that is, fairly without any violation of moral rights. Justice is different from legality, even though the latter

[17] https://philosophynow.org/issues/90/Platos_Just_State (accessed 24.02.2018)
[18] Immanuel Kant, Critica rațiunii pure (București: Editura Univers Enciclopedic Gold, 2009), 33-35
[19] Manfred B. Steger, Globalization: A Very Short Introduction (Oxford: University Press, 2003), 13
[20] ibidem
[21] ibidem

sometimes is necessary for the former to take root[22]. However, it is clear that laws at local, regional and global levels can be used to circumvent justice as well as to promote it. The major problem with globalization is the possibility of those who are powerful to enact laws that favour them. They would then do things that are legal and yet unjust. The United Nations Organization, for example, can be used by powerful members to do things that are not good for some communities even though they are legal under the organization's regulations and laws. This is very clear in the case of trade. Financial globalization increased the flow of funds across countries, thereby creating linkages that go to capital markets of the world. This would potentially be good for the people, as they may have access to funds, including additional international funds for their countries. Governments of the third world countries are not able to operate, because they are under restrictions exerted by the IMF, World Bank, WTO, OECD and the G8[23].

It is demanded that they globalize; technologize; drive competitors out of business (monopolize) or face the same; liberalise the national market. Any government that does not obey these directives faces dire consequences, such as paying high interest rates on their loans and being denied access to capital. When nation states try to protect their fledgling companies they face international sanctions and the multinational companies can simply decide to pull their investments out of the said countries.

Increased concentration of capital has put excessive, in fact uncontrollable power in the hands of a small group. A few hundred of the world's largest industrial firms control trillions of dollars worth of productive activity. These companies' veto can be enough to hold up all sorts of important political decisions. Financial markets have become the world economy's judge, jury and policeman. National governments themselves have become paralyzed and they can take measures that are not palatable for their citizens in order to honor the requirements of some agreement with an international body, such as the Maastricht Treaty. Globalization becomes, in this way, an alibi for lack of political imagination, abhorrence, social breakdown and antisocial policies.

4. Adapting law to globalization

In relation to obligations, justice is about the relationship of people's actions as they affect each other; people's wills in relation to each other and lastly, the relationship of the two wills as autonomous and accommodative of each other in accordance with a universal law. Justice is therefore the aggregate of those conditions under which the will of one person can be conjoined with the will of another in accordance with a universal law of freedom. Justice is a universal principle. Every action is just [right] that in itself or in its maxim is such that the freedom of the will of each can coexist together with the freedom of everyone in accordance with a universal law. Individuals have the freedom to act in their own interest and they should be willing to grant that all other free beings like them have the same right.

The idea probably underlying the above approach is that the globalization process moves at different speeds in different spheres of society (and, as a result, the awareness of the phenomenon differs depending on the sphere in which it operates within the social reality). In this way, for example, Laporta[24] states that with respect to ownership law and to criminal law "no or hardly any legal globalization exists (...). Financial capital can fly over borders, but legal entitlement to the property of this capital remains under the wing of domestic law (...) crucial aspects of social life and the economic activities of the huge majority of individuals and corporations which inhabit the globalization planet happen to be still regulated by domestic legal norms. Communicative, economic or social globalization are not sufficiently ruled or subjected to norms". Moreover, in his opinion, "the disconnection between the undeniably global nature of many actions and economic activities, and the prevailing private and state nature of the legal norms which support them, produces many perverse consequences which are at the basis of much of the discontent globalization has created". Is this true? It depends on how you look at it.

It is true if we regard law essentially as state law and international law in the classic sense: a law whose main players are fundamentally states. However, perhaps it is not true (or at least not as true) if instead of focusing on "official law" we focus on the legality coming from informal or more or less informal entities. The fact is that many authors believe that the outstanding feature of legal globalization consists in the privatization of law, in the same way that, in more general terms, globalization has resulted in a trend toward the privatization of what is public. The center of gravity has passed from the law, as a product of the state´s will, to contracts between individuals (even if those "individuals" –or some of those "individuals"- are the big multinational companies). This goes hand in hand with a growing (and relative) loss of state sovereignty, as a consequence of the advance of both supranational and transnational law. An example of the first, which is commonly put forward, is the existence of a European law which implies that a great number of the legal norms in force in the European Union are not state norms or are norms which are significantly conditioned by supra-state norms. And what is often put forward as an example of transnational law, is the existence of a new lex mercatoria which regulates international trade and which is not made either by national states or by public institutions of an international nature, but instead by the major law firms. The main figures in globalization law are no longer legislators, but rather judges and experts in law not occupying public office.

[22] Herbert Lionel Hart, The Concept of Law (Oxford: The Clarendon Press, 1978), 56

[23] http://www.worldbank.org/en/topic/poverty (accessed 25.02.2018)

[24] Francisco Laporta, Law and justice in a global society (Granada: Anales de la Cátedra Francisco Suárez, 2005), 235-236

It is said, moreover, that a new type of law has appeared with globalization – soft law- in which resorting to coercion is less important than in the case of state law. This can be seen in the tendency to favour conflict solving mechanisms (such as mediation or arbitration) which (in contrast to adjudication) are not of an obligatory nature, since they suppose the acceptance of the parties' (who are the ones that appoint the mediators or the arbitrators). It can also be seen in the importance of legal bodies such as the World Trade Organization, regulated by norms and procedures which are different to those existing in classic state law. In the same way, it is held[25] [Ferrarese 2000] that law (globalization law) no longer consists exclusively in norms (in orders), but instead it is held that many of the behaviour rules contained in this "soft law" seek to guide conduct in a flexible way or without trying to impose themselves through coercion: let us, for example, consider the European directives or the growing importance of ethical codes as auto-regulation mechanisms. All of this leads in the end, to the traditional limits of law losing definition: not only in relation to morality and politics, but also in relation to the traditional distinctions between private law and public law or between internal and external law.

Thus, nowadays, elements of private law, such as negotiation or the concept of private interest, play a role in the context of public law: consider, for example, "plea bargaining" in criminal law or "lobbies" as institutions which articulate private interests in the legislative process. What is more, as we have already mentioned, European law limits the internal law of European states and, at the same time, it is usual to speak about a "dialogue" between European and state jurisdictional and legislative bodies; in such a way that law no longer appears as a result of an imposition laid down by a superior, but rather as an agreement reached "from below". Consequently, the function of law is no longer only (or so much) one of prescribing, directing conduct, but rather that of providing ways of acting; its nature is instrumental more than political.

Well, all the above can serve as an argument to show that globalization has indeed had a significant effect on law, transforming many of its institutions, giving rise to new forms of juridicity, modifying the classic functions of law, etc. It is, however, also very important not to lose sight of the fact that law has not only suffered the effects of globalization but has also played a causal role in the process; in other words, all this interchange and interdependence which takes place on a global level –which define globalization- would be impossible if the necessary legal instruments had not been present. Without law (or without a certain type of law) we would not have globalization, and neither would capitalism or market economy existing without the legal institutions which are characteristic of the modern state. So, in relation to globalization, the legal theorists have reacted in different ways, in principle, in accordance with their political tendencies. Thus, those who could be considered to belong to the right political wing spectrum are also those who evaluate the phenomenon (the changes which have taken place in law) in a more positive way. After all, what globalization has meant until now is the victory of neoliberal ideology. One of the most illustrious supporters, Hayek, held that the order which could be found in complex phenomena was of two kinds: created and spontaneous. Spontaneous order is the unsought result of an evolutionary process whose main indicator is the market. The superiority of the market over any other organization of a deliberate type is due to the fact that human beings, in pursuit of their particular desires (whether egoistical or altruistic), make it easier for other people who, generally speaking, will never even meet, to reach their goals. Law´s raison d´être is, consequently, an essentially instrumental one: its mission is to contribute to the maintaining of this spontaneous order[26].

Globalization, then, as we said before, essentially means this, the subordination of politics to the market, of the law (or of the treaty) to the contract, which takes material form in the ideal of deregulation: a more globalized economy with fewer ties and, thus, less regulated by legal state norms or by international law norms. It should, however, be clarified that "deregulation" does not exactly mean that rules do not exist or even that fewer rules exist than before. It means, rather, that a type of rules (let us say, those of a public nature) have been substituted by others of a private nature. And this is precisely what causes the phenomenon of globalization to be seen with considerable scepticism from the stand point of a left side ideology.

The liberalization of the economy – deregulation- has gone hand in hand with a lack of measures guaranteeing human rights, particularly, social rights. Perhaps one should remember that, according to Hayek, social justice is one of the greatest threats to western culture, a prejudice of tribal nature, lacking any rational or moral support. Economic globalization has increased world wealth[27], but only at the price of deepening inequalities between countries and individuals and leading to a deterioration of the environment, which could have irreversible consequences for future generations.

Altogether, the law of globalization is clearly an undemocratic law; the loss of state sovereignty has meant a step backwards for democracy, precisely because the scope it operates within is that of the state. And if this is the situation, then, it is logical that one is rather pessimistic when suggesting a possible solution. After declaring his scepticism regarding global law´s chances of achieving the rule of law, Francisco Laporta, comes to the conclusion that "only processes like the European Union´s seem to meet the precise requirements needed to incorporate the ideal of the rule of law"[28]. Therefore, the solution cannot be found in "transnational private networks in a supposedly anomic world", but rather in "the construction of political units and supranational legal units". However, in his opinion, the legal model to be followed is not exactly that which we previously understood as constitutionalism but, instead, that of a more or less classic state in which the rule of law operates; a law based on rules which derive from a state or a supra-state authority, but which possess coercive backing and allow the advantages of the rule of law to be guaranteed in a broader scope than that of state.

[25] Maria Rosaria Ferrarese, Le istituzioni della globalizzazione (Bolonia: Il Mulino, 2000), 11-13

[26] Caridad Velarde, Hayek, Una teoría de la justicia, la moral y el derecho (Madrid: Civitas, 1994), 261

[27] http://www.unicef.org/mdg/index_childmortality.htm (accessed 25.02.2018)

Luigi Ferrajoli, for his part, defines globalization as "a gap in public law" and supports the need for a "world constitutionalism". The "extension of the constitutional state paradigm to international relations" implies, in his opinion, "the greatest challenge posed by the crisis of law and state to legal reason and political reason" and, moreover, represents "the only rational alternative to a future of wars, violence and fundamentalism". According to him, there are no "reasons for optimism", but not because it is a question of a utopic or unattainable program: "it is simply not wanted because it conflicts with the prevailing interests"[29]. Juan Ramón Capella[30] makes an even more pessimistic diagnosis of the situation. As he sees it, what really governs the globalized world is "business, military and political technocracy which takes the role of Plato´s Philosopher King and of his Nocturnal Counsel". Democratic institutions submit and subordinate themselves to this new imperial power [that of the military-industrial conglomeration; that of the big multinationals; that of the experts on financial capital management, on the administration of the big industries, on the creation of public opinion, on the economic, political and military adjustment]. On a daily basis, democratic procedures turn into forms lacking any content, social rights vanish, political rights become increasingly inefficient, except in the submission to global power. In addition, new institutions appear and remain beyond the reach of the exercise of political freedom.

In other areas of law, the incidence of supra-state or transnational regulations derives, simply, from what is demanded by the nature of things. International trade, the internet, migratory flows, ecology or terrorism are phenomena which cannot be regulated (or, at least, not efficiently) in the national scope and which are also not covered by international law understood in its classic sense. It is not, therefore, a question of whether law has ceased to be a state phenomenon but rather one of accepting the fact that juridicity does not only exist in this scope; there is also a suprastate (and infra-estate) juridicity, whose importance is becoming greater every day. Yet, also, insofar as the contract constitutes the typical form taken by juridicity in the scope of globalization, law, logically, tends to be seen less as a product of a political will and, instead, what takes on more importance is a vision of law as a means for obtaining certain ends, as a mechanism of social construction.

The direction in which globalization is causing laws to develop seems to go against a positivist conception of law. It seems to me that law tends to shape itself and to be seen by those who practise it, not so much, or not only, as a system, as a set of preexisting norms, but rather as a practice, as a procedure or a method used in order to reconcile interests, to solve conflicts, etc. This means that the limits of what is juridical disappears to a certain extent, and also implies a new way of understanding the function of science, of theory and of law: it is a question not so much of describing an already completely determined object (in a more or less abstract way), but rather of taking that (certain previously existing materials) as a starting point and showing how they can be used to carry out this practice to achieve certain goals.

5. Morality – in antithesis with "the deity" of globalization

The globalization phenomenon clearly shows the growing juridification of our societies and how wrong it is to take an interpretation scheme of social reality in which law is made to play a subordinated role as a starting point. As we know, this is what happened with the classic Marxist scheme[31], in which law belonged to the superstructure and not to the social base (which is considered to have a determining role), and this is, very probably, a prejudice which remains active in the minds of many social scientists. The result is an undervaluing of the role of law, which implies risks of both a theoretical and a practical nature. Theoretical, because it is impossible to understand our societies, including the globalization phenomenon, if one lacks a certain type of legal education. Practical, because law is, at the very least, a premise for the achievement of the most essential values in social life; to not take legal aspects sufficiently into consideration implies seriously putting at risk the achievement of these values. It is, naturally, not a question of not knowing the social conditioning (which is particularly economic) of law. It is a matter of understanding that economic, legal, cultural, etc.

[28] Francisco Laporta, Law and justice in a global society (Granada: Anales de la Cátedra Francisco Suárez, 2005), 25
[29] Luigi Ferrajoli, La crisis de la democracia en la era de la globalización, (Granada: Anales de la Cátedra Francisco Suárez, 2005), 50-51
[30] Juan Ramón Capella, La globalización: ante una encrucijada político-jurídica (Granada: Anales de la Cátedra Francisco Suárez, 2005), 23
[31] https://www.britannica.com/topic/Marxism (accessed 24.02.2018)

elements constitute a complex unit in which a constant interaction takes place. Thus, law –or certain legal instruments- has contributed to what we call the globalization of our societies but, at the same time, globalization is causing legal systems and the conception of law to change.

A consequence of this way of seeing things consists in recognizing the ambiguous role played by law in our societies: law is equally essential in processes of exploitation and in those of emancipation. The alternative to the so called "deregulation" is not simply the legal regulation of a certain kind of relationships (which are, in fact, regulated legally: by means of private law –contractual- schemes), but rather its legal regulation according to a certain kind of moral and political standards. In other words, we are, one could say, "condemned" to live in legal societies, but the law of our societies (and, as a result, society itself) can take many different forms[32].

And it is here where the concept of human rights, understood as a set of criteria which inspire legal practices, plays a fundamental role. Human rights are founded on morality, yet not on just any morality, but on one of universalistic nature. To deny that certain universal moral principles of an objective validity exist is, in my opinion, a serious error which has been made by a certain left side school of thought, influenced perhaps by two circumstances. Firstly, because in Marxist tradition (a tradition set in motion by Marx himself) morality (and law) was considered to be a part of ideology, in such a way that moral truths could not be said to exist and neither could any "rational" discourse on morality consisting in anything other than the "unmasking" of its deceptive nature. Secondly, because the language of moral truths and of absolute moral values is the language of religion, of the churches: secular, enlightened and rationalist thought – it is believed- leads inevitably to relativism in moral scope.

Even before the current surge of globalization, moral considerations have had a strong foothold in societal problem arenas that were largely "forgotten" by official and regular politics: protection of the natural environment, poverty, injustices within the justice system (e.g. small action groups against Transnational Corporations, the predicament of homeless or stateless people, illegal immigrants etc.), animal rights, protection of minorities and many other issues of "corruption" in the border zones between the regular operating modes of the sub systems of society. These moral issues have a strong case when they are carried forward by individuals for individual reasons. They turn problematic when they become entangled with the standard operating procedures of modern society, for these procedures demand the transformation of moral issues into legal cases. The crucial argument is that no individual, no hero nor villain, however urgent or singular he or she perceives their individual causes to be, can stand above the common man - as represented in the democratic legislature.

The situation is different on the global level. Here moral arguments and moralities play a prominent role because there is no overriding political and legal system providing binding decisions for a global constituency. Hence there is ample room for other ways and means to influence public opinion and frame collective action against all kinds of perceived evil in moral terms.

In spite of its paradoxical constitution, the global moral regime has real effects and consequences for global governance. It highlights the fact that there is no global "modern" politico-legal regime, so a regression to premodern forms of moral governance seems less offending. It points to the predicament of heterogeneous and even clashing religious and moral fabrics of different communities/societies in the world that somehow are joined or coupled together to form a global level of moral reasoning. Of course that underneath this broad umbrella, the differences and their under lying conflicts of interests persist. They impose dynamics upon the moral regime that lead to generalizations on the verge of self-evidence and banality - global justice and freedom for all or similar formulas that necessarily are deprived of any specific meaning. These over-simplified formulas depend on equally simplified images of evil. After the fall of the "empire of evil" the current culprits are perceived to be, once more, imperialism, neo-liberalism or capitalism at large. This self-propelling trivialization seems to be unavoidable since the idea and the regime of global morality conjoins two entities that contradict each other. On the one hand morality is having its legitimate function as a premodern form of integrating close communities like tribes, clans, villages or ethnic groups along the lines of simple, self-evident truths handed down from creator-gods or ancestors. On the other hand, globalization forces this elementary mode of governance on a level that has long lost all the constituent ingredients of a "community" and is even beyond the scope of modern national society.

As globalization connects people, it also raises associated responsibilities between them. Until recently, the interests in justice among political philosophers and social ethicists was mainly focused on the nation state. However, this is no longer feasible. Since economic globalization affects how wealth and power are distributed globally – and the gaps between the global rich and the global poor widens - it has become indispensable to discuss social ethics in a global context and to develop principles of global justice. Global justice, therefore, entails an assessment of the benefits and burdens of the structural relations and institutional arrangements that constitute and govern globalization.

Kant's explanation of the freedom enhancing nature of the law says if freedom means individual autonomy and self-determination, namely, recognizing only the authority of one's own will, there must be a technique for communicating that will between individuals on the one hand, and between individuals and the public power on the other. Law is needed for legislation to exist, and legislation is needed for self-determination to be possible. Law's virtue does not lie only in law-application. It resides equally in legislation as the expression of a community's self-determining will.

[32] https://www.oxfam.org/sites/www.oxfam.org/files /file_attachments/ib-wealth-having-all-wanting-more-190115-en.pdf (accessed 25.02.2018)

The predictability or stability brought by law is not what made Kant a legalist. Clearly, the ancient regime had been stable and had acted predictably for a long, indeed too long a time. It may have acted arbitrarily too, but that was not the main problem. The problem was its consistent reliance on social hierarchy, and the suppression of freedom from the bulk of the population. This is what resonates in the current experience of globalization, and in the sense in which fragmentation, deformalization and empire seem to undermine individual autonomy and communal self-determination. In fragmentation, law emerges from expert-guided "regimes"; in deformalization, it transforms into administrative compromises between powerful stakeholder groups, and in "empire," it collapses into domination. The worry about new global law reflects concerns about the absence of structures of political representation, contestation, and accountability, of a public sphere institutionally linked to global power. The present concern about freedom spells worries about autonomy, understood as self-legislation. Whatever the managerial mindset has to say about the difficulties of effective governance today fails to address the sense that these difficulties are undermining freedom, in the sense of leading one's life only under the authority of one's own (good) will.

Thousands of people have had their lives destroyed by the activities of multi-national corporations. Oil spills in Nigeria and gas leaks in India have killed, maimed and caused lasting environmental damage. Yet, these people and their families have struggled to hold the perpetrators to account and receive damages to ameliorate their suffering. This lamentable situation could be addressed by consensus between states around the world to develop a treaty that ensures human rights violations do not go unpunished (or, at least uncompensated). In the 21st century such a treaty is both a legal and moral necessity.

After the devastation of the Second World War and the horrors of the Holocaust, the mood was ripe to create an international order with certain basic moral principles at its core. Human rights were the key concept that created a bridge between law and morality. The intrinsic 'dignity' or worth of the human person was seen to give rise to certain entitlements that protect the most basic interests of people: the right to free speech, bodily integrity, food and housing. These protections could only be effective, however, if they created obligations for other actors. The focus at the time was on the obligations of states for realizing human rights.

Since then, the world has changed. Trade has exploded across international borders as have multi-national corporations with a common identity operating in multiple states. The wealth and power of some corporations is said to rival that of states. A legal paradigm of fundamental rights that ignores these significant development will lack the power adequately to protect the rights of individuals. Difficult problems, however, arise in holding corporations to account for rights violations.

First, international law has traditionally been built on the idea that each state is sovereign within its own domain and responsible for holding accountable those who commit wrongs within its domain. It is less well equipped to address wrong-doers who cross borders: where, for instance, an environmentally destructive strategy is planned in one country and executed in another. Suing a corporation in the country where a wrong is committed may thus fail to affect the real center of power or wealth.

This problem is compounded by a second difficulty in that, in law, each corporation is regarded as a separate legal person. As such, a multinational corporation does not in fact exist: it is rather a network of different entities all formed in terms of the laws of different countries. When a corporation in one country commits a wrong, the related corporations in other countries can disavow responsibility for its actions as they are distinct 'persons' in law.

Countries can be ruined economically because some big multinational companies do not like the government. A very vivid example is Palestine which had a democratically elected government that the West did not like. Israel blockaded the country with the support of the West and all the funding was stopped. The Palestinian territory was in a state of war until 2007 when the government co-opted the party that appeared to be acceptable to the West. Israel on the other hand has enjoyed the support of the West, in spite of the many occasions that it did not yield to international law, including numerous United Nations resolutions.

There are many international mergers of companies resulting in more use of technology-based instruments that change the face of assembly lines that produce goods without the benefits going to the workers or local small businesses. High profits and lower production costs usually come at the cost of employee wages and job cuts. In short, the profits of globalization are not necessarily for the benefit of the poor – both as individuals and as nation states.

The so-called developed countries are protectionist when it comes to their national economies and companies. For example, the United States and Western Europe are distorting the agricultural market by subsidizing their farmers. Even amongst themselves they are routing for narrow nationalist interests. For example, the major reason why the British are not using the Euro is because they have been arguing that it is not in their national interest – thus, whatever is not in their national interest must give way even if it is in the interest of the European Union.

One other evil brought about by globalization is the faith in privatization, whereby public institutions have to be auctioned off to the highest bidders, who in many cases do not pay the due rate for it. The companies can then decide to reduce or increase the workforce, increase or reduce production, depending on whether they will get the maximum profit. Went[33] gives the example of a company that reduced production in France, Holland and Belgium where laws were more favourable to employees, and increased production in China, Vietnam and Czech Republic where laws were unfavourable to employees. For example, they would pay an employee in these countries $1 per day when they could pay $31 in Japan. In poor countries, companies can just threaten to shut down production to force workers to accept slave wages, whilst they themselves make huge profits.

Globalization has also increased migration of millions of poor people who get exploited in the industrialized countries. Mexicans and people from other nations are exploited in the United States. They are illegal aliens who work for slave wages and can be dispensed with without any hassle. Of course this situation is experienced in developing countries, where one country is worse off economically than its neighbours.

The industrial West is currently experiencing shortages in medical personnel. It has now embarked upon a campaign to price away medical personnel from the developing world. We find nurses, doctors and other important medical personnel being recruited to work in the West. The poor countries where these personnel originate are not in a position to match the salaries offered by the rich north. The devastation of malaria, HIV/AIDS inevitably follow in places like Africa. This, of course, is not a new phenomenon, as a lot of brain drain has been going on from Africa and other third world societies to the Western world – the best professors in many academic fields have been transplanted to the West leaving their countries barren, without good academic leadership.

The above account shows the unjust nature of globalization as practised today. Our argument is that even though in many cases the West can point to the fact that they are not violating any international treaty or law, they are, all the same, behaving unjustly. It is the task of ethics to show not only that such injustice is immoral but also to agitate for change in the positive direction.

The possibility of justice for victims of human rights violations diminishes even further when we consider that multi-nationals often commit violations in countries with weak legal systems and where the independence of the judiciary is in doubt. The likelihood of successful prosecutions or claims for compensation is very limited in these jurisdictions.

Taken together, these three challenges create opportunities for multinationals to evade responsibility for wrongs they commit. To address them, it is necessary to devise an international solution which requires the collective action of states.

The second and most ambitious solution would be to establish an international court that could adjudicate cases where corporations violate fundamental rights across international borders. Such a court would be truly global in nature and be able to address the lacunae that arise in international law from the challenges discussed above. It would allow for the development of specific case law in this area and enable a deeper understanding of the obligations corporations owe in relation to fundamental rights. Its construction would need to be thought about carefully to ensure that it is not swamped by cases and that it does not replace the role of national courts.

There are many good reasons for a global treaty on business and human rights: one of the most significant is its ability to ensure that a remedy is found for victims of human rights violations by corporations. The current initiatives at the global level – such as the United Nations Guiding Principles on Business and Human rights[34] – lack the necessary legal status to offer a clear solution.

Objections thus far have been largely pragmatic, recognising significant division between developed and developing states on the need for such an international instrument. In June 2014, the Human Rights Council, in an initiative spearheaded by Ecuador and South Africa, agreed to commence discussions surrounding the possibility of such a treaty. The first meeting of this inter-governmental working group occurred in July in Geneva and drew in a range of experts from across the world. The treaty initiative has also stimulated many NGO initiatives across the world which are engaging directly with the people are affected by human rights violations of corporations. It is a great shame, however, that the United States and European Union countries – which profess to take human rights seriously – oppose this initiative. Their opposition increasingly strikes one as simply based on the self-interested expediency of their business interests and displays a callous disregard for the very real suffering of individuals that arises from inadequate regulation at the international level.

In the face of such strong division, it is necessary to stand up quietly and forcefully for why such a treaty is needed. Many visionary international developments – such as the formation of an international criminal court – have emerged in the face of initial division between states because they fill a clear moral and legal vacuum. A new global consensus needs to be forged too on business and human rights: the starting point is to recognize the moral and legal necessity for a treaty in this area. Expediency of the powerful should not be allowed to trump the basic principle of justice: anyone whose fundamental rights are violated by the effects of the globalization must be able to ensure the perpetrator is punished and compensates them for their loss.

[33] Robert Went, Globalization. Neoliberal Challenge, Radical Responses (London & Stirling Virginia: Pluto Press, 2000), 28-29

[34] http://www.un.org/millenniumgoals/ (accessed 25.02.2018)

Conclusions

Taken as a whole, these contributions show that when it comes to the globalization of law, the conventional questions and oppositions are rapidly becoming obsolete. And that legal knowledge is indeed a constellation of theories and practices far more complex and nuanced than legal theorists and practitioners may have acknowledged up to now. If there is any "global legal theory" to look for, it should be understood not as a new grand, single and uniform theory on global law, but as a theory made global through its common objects and new methods. From the above, we can conclude that globalization, philosophy and justice are related. There are possible mutual benefits from globalization for all concerned. Justice demands that globalization be pursued for the benefit of all, rather than being used as a tool to perpetuate the hegemony of the strong North. Justice seen from a moral point of view, rather than a legal, one is based on ethics of human action. The moral philosophical view of justice does call for certain behaviours, some of which are attested to in the many indigenous philosophies which have to be taken seriously at a global level, as competent and useful tools of philosophizing and understanding globalization.

In other areas of law, the incidence of supra-state or transnational regulations derives, simply, from what is demanded by the nature of things. International trade, the internet, migratory flows, ecology or terrorism are phenomena which cannot be regulated (or, at least, not efficiently) in the national scope and which are also not covered by international law understood in its classic sense. It is not, therefore, a question of whether law has ceased to be a state phenomenon but rather one of accepting the fact that juridicity does not only exist in this scope; there is also a suprastate (and infra-estate) juridicity, whose importance is becoming greater every day. Yet, also, insofar as the contract constitutes the typical form taken by juridicity in the scope of globalization, law, logically, tends to be seen less as a product of a political will and, instead, what takes on more importance is a vision of law as a means for obtaining certain ends, as a mechanism of social construction.

The impact of this paper is aimed at any person, academically or not, interested in the evolution of societies worldwide from a moral, economic or legislative point of view. For further research work, we propose to analyze the legitimacy of the law in democratic societies, and especially the legally paradigms as a contemporary way of studying and understanding the law.

References

- Boylan Michael, The Future of Affirmative Actio Upper Saddle River, New Jersey: Business Ethics. Prentice-Hall, 2001
- Capella Juan Ramón, La globalización: ante una encrucijada político-jurídica, Granada: Anales de la Cátedra Francisco Suárez, 2005
- Dicţionar enciclopedic român, Vol. III. K-P. Bucureşti: Editura politică, 1965
- Djuvara Mircea, Teoria generală a dreptului (enciclopedia juridică): Drept rațional, izvoare și drept pozitiv, București: Editura All, 1995
- Ferrarese Maria Rosaria, Le istituzioni della globalizzazione, Bolonia: Mulino, 2000
- Ferrajoli Luigi, La crisis de la democracia en la era de la globalización, Granada: Anales de la Cátedra Francisco Suárez, 2005
- Hart Herbert Lionel, The Concept of Law, Oxford: The Clarendon Press, 1978
- Kant Immanuel, Critica rațiunii pure, București: Editura Univers Enciclopedic Gold, 2009
- Laporta Francisco, Law and justice in a global society, Granada: Anales de la Cátedra Francisco Suárez, 2005
- Mînzală Traian. Studiu asupra principiilor dreptului, Constanța: Editura Muntenia, 1996
- Platon. Legile, Bucureşti: Editura IRI, 1995
- Simon Robert, Preferential Hiring: A Reply to Judith Jarvis Thomson in M. Boylan Upper Saddle River, New Jersey: Business Ethics. Prentice-Hall, 2001
- Steger Manfred B., Globalization: A Very Short Introduction, Oxford: University Press, 2003
- Thomson Judith Jarvis, Preferential Hiring in M. Boylan Upper Saddle River, New Jersey: Business Ethics, Prentice-Hall, 2001
- Velarde Caridad, Hayek. Una teoría de la justicia, la moral y el derecho, Madrid Civitas, 1994
- Went Robert, Globalization. Neoliberal Challenge, Radical Responses, London & Stirling Virginia: Pluto Press, 2000
- http://www.worldbank.org/en/topic/poverty (accessed 25.02.2018)
- http://www.unicef.org/mdg/index_childmortality.htm (accessed 25.02.2018)
- http://www.un.org/millenniumgoals/ (accessed 25.02.2018)
- https://www.oxfam.org/sites/www.oxfam.org/files /file_attachments/ib-wealth-having-all-wanting-more-190115-en.pdf (accessed 25.02.2018)
- https://philosophynow.org/issues/90/Platos_Just_State (accessed 24.02.2018)
- https://plato.stanford.edu/entries/moral-character/ (accessed 24.02.2018)
- https://www.britannica.com/topic/Marxism (accessed 24.02.2018)

PARALLEL BETWEEN THE REFUGEE CONCEPT ACCORDING TO THE CONVENTION RELATING TO THE STATUS OF REFUGEES FROM 1951 AND ITS PROTOCOL FROM 1967 AND THE REFUGEE CONCEPT ACCORDING TO EUROPEAN LAW

Patricia Casandra PAPUC*

Abstract

In this study our aim is to make a comparison between the refugee concept according to the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees from 1951 and its Protocol from 1967 which represent the international approach and the refugee concept according to European Law (the EU Treaties, EU Directives, the Dublin Regulation).

This parallel will present first of all the similarities between the international approach and the European approach such as : the definition of a refugee; the conditions required to obtain refugee status; the definition of the term injury; same request for international protection; same parameteres used to verify the existence of persecution; the conditions of cessation and the non refoulement principle.

Second of all the we will present the differences between the international approach and the European approach. European law completes the Convention and introduces new principles such as: subsidiary protection; temporary protection; different degrees of protection offered to refugees; the term persectution is defined ; the motivation behind persecution is defined ; recognising as persecution also the acts toward gender and children. Furthermore the cessation clause and the exclusion clause are defined differently in European law in comparison to the definition given by the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees from 1951 and its Protocol from 1967.

Lastly we will conclude with a set of recommendations for both the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees as well as for the European asylum system.

Keywords: refugees, the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, asylum law, persecution, international protection.

Introduction

"Refugees represent an anomaly in a world where human population is coordinated by the principle of each individual ' s belonging to a nation, to a sovereign state. The refugee status is probably proof of breach of the social contract concluded between the state and its citizens".[1]

In this article we propose to make a parallel between the refugee concept according to the Convention relating to the status of refugees from 1951 and its Protocol from 1967 and the refugee concept according to European law. "The Convention represents the starting point in the field of asylum, which has inspired and has created various normative acts with international and european coverage."[2] The Convention represents the international approach agreed by the members states of the UN. European law has the same definition for refugees as international law, but it has also extended the area of protection for refugees, including numerous provisions through which the principles from the Convention are implemented, allowing thus asylum seekers to claim their rights in European courts if those rights have been violated. Therefore European law completes the Convention, either by explaining certain terms, or by introducing new ones.

Before analysing the refugee concept from these two perspectives listed above, -the international approach and the european one- we will briefly present the notion of international protection, a widely discussed concept in the sphere of international relations, without which there would be no possibility of obtaining refugee status.

The concept of international protection has emerged as a result of the exile of millions of people forced by various circumstances to leave their country of origin. This migration represents essentially the inability or lack of interest of the authorities in that state to protect fundamental human rights.

These rights and freedoms of people are normally protected by their country of origin but the lack of protection in these countries determines the need for international protection: the concept that characterizes the forced exile of people and explains their motivation to seek asylum in another country.

* PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: patricia_papuc@yahoo.com)

[1] Vergatti, Cristina Narcisa, Statutul juridic al refugiaților, Institutul Român Pentru Drepturilor Omului, Bucharest, publishing house IRDO, Bucharest, 2009, www.irdo.ro

[2] Negură, Spătaru, Laura-Cristina, Papuc, Patricia, Scurta analiza a legislatiei europene si romane in materia azilului. Pozitia diplomatiei romane in fata crizei refugiatilor, publishing house The International Public Law Journal, ed The Legal Universe, 4/2016, October-December, Bucharest, pag 114

Unlike other categories of people, refugees are bound by extreme circumstances to leave their country of origin because their lives and freedoms are under threat and because these threats are not taken into account by the authorities, they do not benefit from the necessary protection they are entitled to. This can be caused by many reasons, either the authorities do not know how to react, whether if they should react or simply they do not want to react.

This requirement for protection that refugees need is the key element that distinguishes them from other foreigners. They can be perceived as outsideres, often with limited material resources, traumatized , having no identification documents, people guided by the single impulse of becoming part of another community where they can continue their lives without having their freedoms and rights under constant threat.

They are vulnerable because of the precarious situation that they are in. Besides their motivation to leave their country of origin; a motivation that varies from case to case; also the journey that they take to reach a new country is often paved with trauma and numerous negative experiences.

After they arrive to the new country, they have to undergo a very lengthy legal procedure in order to receive refugee status, a status which only some of them receive. This waiting period differes from state to state, but it is a hard time for the asylum seeker who has just reached that country, probably does not speak its language and where there are many cultural differences etc. In addition in this period of time the asylum seeker needs resources to cover his subsistence needs, access to medical services.

In light of these considerations, the concept of refugee will be defined and explained through a comparative presentation, namely the similarities and the differences between the concept of refugee from the perspective of the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees from 1951, its Protocol from 1967 and the European law perspective.

1. Similarities between the refugee concept according to the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees from 1951 and its Protocol from 1967 and the refugee concept according to European law

The legal basis for asylum is primarly the Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the United Nations Organization on the 10th of December 1948 which in Article 14 states the following principle: ”Everyone has the right to seek asylum and to enjoy asylum in other coutries, in case of persecution”[3]. The first ressemblance that we want to present concerns the definition of the refugee concept.

1.1. The definition of refugees is the same in the Convention as in European law

According to the Convention, the term refugee applies to any person who: ”1) owed to well founded fear of being persecuted; (2) for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion; (3) is outside the country of his nationality and is unable or, owing to such fear is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of that country; (5) or who not having a nationality and being outside the country of his former habitual residence as a result of such events is unwilling to return to it”.[4]

In our view, the quintessence of this definition is given by the concept of fear of being persecuted. This fear consists of two parts, on one hand there is an objective element, namely the fear must be justified, must be real and on the other hand there is a subjective element, the feelings that the person has about the persecution.

There may be a variety of fears that cause a person to leave his country, such as natural disasters, famine, poverty, war, but only a well-founded fear is vital in recognizing a person as a refugee. Reasons such as poverty, natural disasters or global warming are not reasons for obtaining asylum.

Every asylum seeker is required to demonstrate the existence of a well-founded fear, the fear of being persecuted by at least one of the reasons given in the definition - race, religion, nationality, belonging to a particular social group, or political opinion. Often the fear of persecution is caused by more then just one element.

The common denominator of this definition, which is also the common denominator of the five reasons for persecution, is the concept of belonging. Affiliation, according to the dictionary, is: "dependence or bondage of someone or something"; "belonging" or "relationship between an individual and the social class, the community, the party, etc of which he is a part[5]".

Affiliation is therefore the identification with a particular group of that community, a group that is defined by an essential feature of race, ethnicity, religious or political beliefs or another characteristic that differentiates that group from the rest of society.

After a more thorough analysis it can be noticed that the penultimate reason, namely belonging to a certain social group, essentially overlaps the other four reasons, but at the same time includes them, because all the facts imply an affiliation, namely the identification with a certain social group, having a certain dimension, race, religion, nationality or political opinion.

[3] Declaraţia Universală a Drepturilor Omului, from 10 December 1948 (http://www.monitoruljuridic.ro/act/declaratie-universala-a-drepturilor-omului-din-10-decembrie-1948-emitent-organizatia-natiunilor-unite-publicat-n-brosura-din-22751.html)

[4] Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, signed in Geneva on the 28th of July 1951 (http://www.unhcr.org/ro/wp-content/uploads/sites/23/2016/12/1951_Convention_ROM.pdf)

[5] https://dexonline.net/definitie-refugiat

History has demonstrated that the coexistence at state borders of various religious, linguistic, ethnic, political and non-political groups, with different interests, leads sooner or later to conflicts as a result of the struggle for supremacy, resources, etc.

As a general rule, the asylum seeker must be outside of his country of nationality because international protection cannot be enforced as long as the person is under the territorial jurisdiction of his or her country of origin

This well-founded fear of persecution must be related to the country of which he is a citizen otherwise there would be no need for international protection and no basis for asylum either. At the same time, there may also be the hypothesis that a certain person was not a refugee when he left his country, but subsequently became a victim of incidents in his country of origin. These incidents occurred in his absence and created an undesirable situation that has a direct impact on the person's return to his country of origin. As an example, we can take the situation of students or immigrant workers who live in other countries. In antithesis with this example, we also have the situation of stateless persons, who are often refused the protection of their country of habitual residence.

Following a more detailed analysis of the refugee definition, namely, aspect five of the definition, which states that the person can not or because of this fear does not want to be under the protection of that country, this idea essentially reinforces the concept that the refugee is in all these cases the person who can not benefit from the protection of his state of origin

In the 60 years since the adoption of the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, it has proved to be an instrument that can be used to provide international protection for refugees. As any legal instrument it has certain limits, and despite the relevant definition given by the Convention, there is still a clear disproportion between the refugees recognized by it and the great mass of persons in need of international protection who are not recognized as refugees.

For example, people who leave their country of origin following armed conflict, violence; or atrocities are still outside the definition of the Convention, even though they do not actually benefit from the protection of their country of origin. They flee their country because of the effects of war, disorder and fear of war, global warming, lack of livelihood, etc. But these people do not fulfill the imperative requirement imposed by the Convention, namely the fear of persecution.

The same definition of refugees is also found in European law. European law is made up of primary sources, namely the Treaty of the European Union and the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, on one hand, and secondary sources, ie directives, regulations, etc., on the other hand.

The legal basis for the protection of refugees is primarily found in the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, Article 78 which clearly and explicitly states the following*: "The Union shall develop a common policy on asylum, subsidiary protection and temporary protection with a view to grant a status corresponding to any third-country national in need of international protection and to ensure compliance with the principle of non-refoulement. This policy must be consistent with the Geneva Convention of 28 July 1951 and the Protocol of 31 January 1967 on the Status of refugees, as well as other treaties in the field.* " .[6]

Another similarity between the two legislative frameworks refers to the conditions that have to be fulfilled cumulatively in order to obtain refugee status.

1.2. The conditions required in order to obtain refugee status in the Convention are the same as those in European law

The 1951 Convention defines the elements that must be fulfilled in order for an asylum seeker to obtain refugee status and there have been no changes made in EU law on this topic. The three conditions to be met are the following:

- the asylum seeker has to face a fear of persecution;
- the basis for this persecution must be related to race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group/ expressing a political opinion;
- the existence of a causal link between the fear of persecution on one of these grounds (race, religion, nationality, belonging to a particular social group, political opinion) and the act of persecution.[7]

Once these elements have been established, the state must grant international protection to the asylum seeker who has been the victim of an injury, a concept that we will develop later in this paper.

1.3. The term injury has the same definition in the Convention as in European law

Article 15 from the Convention explains which types of serious injuries are taken into account:

- death penalty;
- torture or inhuman, degrading treatment that an asylum seeker may have in his / her country of origin;
- serious and individual threats to a civilian's life as a consequence of escalated violence, both in the event of armed conflict at the domestic and international level[8];

---

[6] Tratatul privind Uniunea Europeana, http://eur-lex.europa.eu/resource.html?uri=cellar:2bf140bf-a3f8-4ab2-b506-fd71826e6da6.0001.02/DOC_1&format=PDF

[7] Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, signed in Geneva on the 28th of July 1951 http://www.unhcr.org/ro/wp-content/uploads/sites/23/2016/12/1951_Convention_ROM.pdf)

[8] Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, signed in Geneva on the 28th of July 1951 http://www.unhcr.org/ro/wp-content/uploads/sites/23/2016/12/1951_Convention_ROM.pdf)

European law does not come up with additions to the concept of injuries, a concept which is otherwise relative, leaving states with a great margin of appreciation, so in essence, the analysis of injuries is on a case by case basis. In order to claim the existence of an injury, the person concerned must draw up an application for international protection which has the same characteristics both in the Convention and in European law

1.4. The request for international protection under the Convention is identical to that in European law

The applications for international protection must be assessed in the same way and several elements are taken into account, such as for example all facts of interest concerning the country of origin at the time of the decision on the application, including the laws and regulations of the country of origin and how they apply. All information and documents provided by the applicant are necessary to determine whether the asylum seeker is being persecuted or seriously injured.

The status of the individual and his / her personal situation, such as gender, past experiences or age, are also necessary to understand his situation. This makes it possible to determine whether he or she may be exposed to any kind of injury.

In addition, it is checked whether the asylum seeker could benefit from the protection of another state, ie whether he can apply for international protection in another state.

Other elements are also considered such as: has the applicant already been persecuted, has he suffered serious harm or has he been the subject of the direct threat of such persecution or harm. It is also relevant if there is a serious indication of the applicant's fear of being persecuted, or a real risk of suffering serious harm.

If there are issues related to the applicant's statements that are not supported by evidence, those issues do not need to be confirmed if the following conditions are met:

- the applicant has taken all diligence and has made a real effort to support his application for international protection;
- the applicant has provided all relevant elements and has given satisfactory explanations regarding the absence of some evidence;
- the declarations of the applicant are considered to be both consistent and plausible and such statements are not contradicted by any general or specific information that is known and that is relevant to his application;
- the request for international protection was filed by the applicant as soon as he was given this opportunity, the exception to this rule being the case where the applicant pleads a good reason for failling to fulfill this obligation;
- an overall credibility of the applicant was established;[9]

Any application for international protection must in essence be able to prove that the person concerned meets the conditions necessary to be granted refugee status.

1.5. Same parameters used to verify the existence of persecution

As we have shown the existence of fear is esential in order to be granted refugee status. Often fear is connected to acts of persecutions against refugees. The acts of persecution are not explicitly defined in the Convention, there are only some parameters introduced by the legislator. The acts of persecution must be:

- of a sufficiently serious nature or of a repetitive nature to constitute a serious violation of human rights, particularly those rights from which there is no derogation on the basis of Article 15 of the European Court of Human Rights;
- represent a multitude of actions, including human rights violations, that are sufficiently serious to impact on the individual;

Because the legislator's intention was to provide a more comprehensive framework, he introduced some possible ways in which acts of persecution can manifest:

- violence that can be of a physical, mental, sexual nature;
- taking different types of measures, such as legal, judicial, administrative measures that may be discriminatory in themselves or implemented in a discriminatory manner,
- prosecution or other sanctions that are discriminatory and disproportionate;
- criminal prosecution or other sanctions in the event of a refusal to perform military service in conflict situations, where the military service would involve the commission of offenses or the inclusion of acts falling within the exclusion clauses set out in Article 12, paragraph 2;
- acts against persons on grounds of sex, even acts against children;[10]

Not only the conditions for receiving refugee status are identical in international law to European law, but also the conditions for the cessation of refugee status, conditions that we will briefly outline below.

1.6. The conditions of cessation of the refugee status are the same in the Convention as in European law

Refugee status may be lost in the following situations:

- if the person concerned voluntarily lost the protection of the country of which he is a national;

[9] Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, signed in Geneva on the 28th of July 1951 http://www.unhcr.org/ro/wp-content/uploads/sites/23/2016/12/1951_Convention_ROM.pdf)

[10] Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, signed in Geneva on the 28th of July 1951 http://www.unhcr.org/ro/wp-content/uploads/sites/23/2016/12/1951_Convention_ROM.pdf)

- if the person lost his nationality and voluntarily regained it;
- if he has received a new nationality and he benefits from the protection of the country of nationality he acquired,
- if he has returned voluntarily to the country from which he came;
- if the circumstances underlying his recognition as a refugee have disappeared, he may no longer continue to refuse the protection of the country of his or her nationality;
- in the case of a person without citizenship because the circumstances under which he has been recognized as a refugee have disappeared, he may return to the country where he was habitually a resident;[11]

For the applicability of these provisions, Member States shall assess whether the change of circumstances is of sufficient significance and asses whether the refugee's fear of being persecuted can no longer be considered as founded.

1.7. The non-refoulement principle is defined in the same way in the Convention as in European law

The most important principle when considering the protection of refugees is the principle of non-refoulement (Article 33 of the Convention). The signatory States of the Convention are bound to respect the principle of non-refoulement on the basis of the international obligations they have assumed. States have the possibility to return a refugee only if this is not forbidden by international commitments. The situations in which a refugee can be returned to the state of origin are defined by the Convention:

- where there are good reasons to believe that that person presents a danger to the safety of the state in question;
- where the person concerned has been convicted by a final court decision for committing an offense of particular gravity which constitutes a threat to that state;
- if there are serious grounds for believing that this person poses a threat to the safety of his state;
- if that person has been convicted by a final court decision following a particularly serious crime that constitutes a threat to that state.[12]

The elements described above are the common elements that we have identified between the concept of refugee according to international law and European Law .

In the next part of the study, we will draw on the differences between the concept of refugee under the Convention and the concept of refugee under European law.

2. Differences between the refugee concept according to the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees from 1951 and its Protocol from 1967 and the refugee concept according to European law

Although the concept of refugee has the same definition in European law as in international law the protection afforded by European legislation is more extensive. The first newly introduced principle that completes the Convention is the principle of subsidiary protection.

2.1. Subsidiary protection is a new principle introduced by European law

Subsidiary protection is granted to any third-country national or stateless person who can not be considered a refugee , but only in those cases where there are valid grounds to believe that if the person is sent to his/her country he/ she would be subject to would be subject to a real risk of suffering serious harm.

If in the case of refugees the main characteristic is the fear of persecution in the case of people who obtain subsidiary protection the main characteristic is the exposure to a real risk in the event of return to their country of origin. European law complements the Convention and also introduces a new type of protection, namely the temporary protection.

2.2. Temporary protection is a new principle introduced by European law

Due to the situation caused by the division of Yugoslavia, the European Union saw itself facing a difficult situation, namely a huge wave of non-European citizens seeking asylum in the European Union. Therefore, the Member States of the EU collaborated and agreed that there was a need for a new legislation that could cope with the crisis. This is how Directive 2001/55 on minimum standards for giving temporary protection was created, to cope in the event of a large flow of displaced persons and to prepare measures that promote a balance of efforts between Member States in receiving such persons and bearing the consequences of these actions.

This directive defines temporary protection as an exceptional measure meant to ensure that displaced persons from outside the European fUnion who can not return to their country of origin are offered immediate and temporary protection. This legislation is particularly applicable in situations where there is a risk that the country's asylum system will not be able to cope with a large influx of people, and asylum claims would not be resolved in a timely manner.

This directive was necessary for various reasons. Firstly in order to improve the reception conditions for asylum seekers, Member States set minimum conditions in order to receive them. Secondly the directive promotes the idea of solidarity and shared responsibility between Member States. Thirdly it is depriving Member States of the inability to deal with the lack of a legal framework that can be used in emergency situations.

[11] idem
[12] idem

This Directive defines the stages of decision-making in order to trigger the temporary protection procedure, which can be extended or terminated. At the same time the Directive defines the rights of beneficiaries, which have been harmonized, such as duration of temporary protection, which may be between one and three years.

In addition it also contains information on access to employment, accommodation, social protection, subsistence methods, access to the medical system and juvenile education.

Council Directive 2001/55 also includes provisions for the return of displaced persons to their country of origin and for the exclusion of individuals who have committed crimes or who have threatened the security of the state and as such are not eligible for subsidiary protection. Some provisions have also been added to protect unaccompanied minors, especially for those who have been subjected to various traumas (mental, physical violence, etc.)[13].

Another principle reiterated in this Directive is the principle of solidarity and there is a mechanism established between Member States that allows the transfer of asylum seekers from one state to another.

2.3. Different degrees of protection granted to refugees by European law

From our perspective, the Convention can be divided into the following levels, which we will set out below. The first is that refugees are treated in the same way as other foreigners, the exception to this rule being the situation when the Convention provides refugees with more favorable conditions than to other foreigners.

The second level includes a variety of rights; rights that are granted by the parties to the Convention to refugees on their territory and rights that they would grant to their own citizens as well.

The third level concerns granting similar conditions to refugees as would be granted to their own citizens in terms of exercising their freedom of religion.

The fourth level of protection refers to granting refugees conditions no less appropriate than they would offer to other foreigners.

At a European level, these principles have been assimilated and have been complemented by the following , more explicit legal documents which are defining relevant aspects of the rights granted to refugees. Thus, the European Union has implemented:

- a common asylum regime in favor of third-country nationals valid throughout the European Union;
- a common subsidiary protection regime for all third-country nationals who, without receiving European asylum, still need international protection;
- a unitary temporary protection mechanism for displaced persons in cases of mass influx;
- other common procedures through which the unitary asylum and subsidiary protection regimes are granted and withdrawn;
- the mechanisms and rules for determining the Member State responsible for examining an application for asylum or an application for subsidiary protection,
- rules defining the conditions for the reception of asylum seekers and of applicants for subsidiary protection;
- the partnership between Member States and third countries in coordinating the flow of people claiming asylum, whether it is subsidiary protection or temporary protection for the above-mentioned causes.

Where an individual is in serious danger, the European Union has the possibility of adopting interim measures as well.

Thus a Common European Asylum System has been set up containing five essential documents:

1. A revised Directive on Asylum Procedures: refers to decisions which are better in terms of asylum applications.
2. A revised Reception Conditions Directive: guarantees the availability of appropriate reception conditions (eg accommodation) for asylum seekers in all EU countries.
3. A revised Minimum Standards Directive: refers to the reasons necessary in order to grant international protection, thus contributing to strengthening asylum decisions at a European level.
4. A revised Dublin Regulation: strengthens the protection granted to asylum seekers throughout the process of determining the State responsible for examining the application and clarifies the rules governing inter state relations.
5. A revised EURODAC Regulation: allows law enforcement authorities to access the EU database containing the fingerprints of asylum seekers under restrictive conditions in order to combat the detection or investigation of the most serious offenses, such as crimes and acts of terrorism.[14]

Since the concept of persecution is the defining element in obtaining refugee status and since the Convention does not contain a definition of persecution, the European Union adopted a definition of persecution and an explanation with the motivation which we will further analyze in our paper.

[13] Directiva 2001/55 s Consiliului UE cu privire la standardele minime pentru a oferi protecţie temporară în eventualitatea unui flux mare a persoanelor deplasate şi măsurile care promovează un echilibru al eforturilor între statele membre în a primi aceste persoane şi a suporta consecinţele acesteia http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=OJ:L:2001:212:0012:0023:EN:PDF

[14] Migration and Home Affairs, Temporary Protection, https://ec.europa.eu/home-affairs/what-we-do/policies/asylum/temporary-protection_en

2.4. The term persecution is only defined by European law

The Council of the European Union defines acts of persecution as follows (this list is exemplary and not exhaustive), "any acts of a physical or mental nature, including acts of sexual violence; legal, administrative, police, and / or judicial remedies that are discriminatory or implemented in a discriminatory manner; prosecution or punishment, which are disproportionate or discriminatory; denial of access to justice resulting in disproportionate or discriminatory punishment; prosecution or punishment for the refusal to perform military service in the event of a conflict where the military service would also include crimes or acts falling within the scope of the clauses set out in Article 12; acts directed against a certain gender, or against children".[15]

Article 2 (2) of Directive 2011/95 / EU states that the acts of persecution do not have to be commmited only by the state in question, but also acts of persecution committed by non-state actors may qualify under the 1951 Convention as acts of persecution where the state does not want or cannot protect the person requesting refugee status.

In the following, we will enumerate the elements that characterize the concept of persecution, elements not defined by the Convention

2.5. The motivation behind persecution is defined only by European law

The elements of persecution can be caused by the following particularities of the individual: race, religion, nationality, political opinion, or belonging to a particular social group. Any of these elements must be related to the act of persecution. The asylum seeker must prove the existence of at least one of the grounds presented in this section: race, religion, nationality, political opinion and affiliation to a particular social group.

Race: In this situation, elements such as the colour of the skin, the person's ascendancy or the ethnic group to which he belongs apply.

Religion: Elements such as the beliefs of that person, which may be of a theistic, non-theistic or even atheistic nature, are analyzed. It is also checked whether the person has participated in various events, such as worship ceremonies, whether private or public, irrelevant if those people have participated in these events alone or with a bigger group. Elements such as non-participation in certain events, free expressions of religious views, religious acts based on confessional reasons are also taken into account.

Nationality: This concept is not limited to the idea of citizenship or the lack of it, but rather it includes the aspect of belonging that we will detail below.

Political opinion may also be a basis for obtaining asylum. The term political opinion consists of elements such as ideas, beliefs, opinions in a certain area.

Affiliation to a particular social group is another element. The definition of this concept was made by the Council of the European Union which states that "individuals can be considered as belonging to a particular social group when sharing an immutable common feature, that is, something inherent in their being or so fundamental to their being that they can not expect to change it, and who have a distinct identity in their country of nationality or the country they live in because they are considered to be different from society. "[16]

2.6. Recognising as persecution also the acts directed toward gender and children exist only in European law

A principle that has completed the concept of persecution in the Convention is that which recognizes persecution against a particular gender or against children. This principle (Article 9 (2) (f) was defined in Council Directive 2004/83 / EC of 29 April 2004 on minimum standards for the qualification and status of third country nationals or stateless persons or people who, for other reasons, need international protection.[17]

The Convention and EU law have also created a legal framework through which a refugee can lose his right of residence, which we will present in the next part of the study.

2.7. The cessation clause is defined differently in European law

Council Directive 2004/83 / EC of 29 April 2004 on minimum standards for the qualification and status of third-country nationals is subject to a change in the exclusion clause. The Convention specifies that it will apply to "any person" who meets one of the following conditions:

- urges once again, without being forced, the protection of their country of nationality;
- if the person has lost his / her nationality but still benefits from the protection of the country that granted his / her nationality;
- in the event of unreasonably returning to the state he/she left or outside of which he/she experienced the fear of persecution;
- where the circumstances giving rise to the recognition of that person as a refugee have ceased to

[15] Directiva 2011/95/UE a Parlamentului European şi a Consiliului din 13 Decembrie 2011 privind standardele referitoare la condiţiile pe care trebuie să le îndeplinească resortisanţii ţărilor terţe sau apatrizii pentru a putea beneficia de protecţie internaţională, la un statut uniform pentru refugiaţi sau pentru persoanele eligibile pentru obţinerea de protecţie subsidiară şi la conţinutul protecţiei acordate (reformare) (http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/HTML/?uri=CELEX:32011L0095&from=RO)

[16] International Justice Resource Center, Asylum and the Rights of Refugees, Overview, http://www.ijrcenter.org/refugee-law/

[17] Directiva 2004/83/CE a Consiliului din 29 Aprilie 2004 privind standardele minime referitoare la condiţiile pe care trebuie să le îndeplinească resortisanţii ţărilor terţe sau apatrizii pentru a putea beneficia de statutul de refugiat sau persoanele care, din alte motive, au nevoie de protecţia internaţională şi referitoare la conţinutul protecţiei acordate, Jurnalul Oficial al Uniunii Europene , http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/HTML/?uri=CELEX:32004L0083&from=RO

exist, the person concerned may no longer refuse the protection of the country of which he is a national;

On the other hand, European law maintains all the criteria outlined above, but changes the starting formula, meaning the beneficiary of the cessation clause. Thus, Article 11 of Directive 2004/83 / EC states in Article 11 that the termination of refugee status occurs for any "third-country national or stateless person".[18]

2.8. The exclusion clause is defined differently in European law

The Convention defines the exclusion clause in Article 1 F. The legislator explains what type of people are subject to this exclusion clause. Thus, the Convention specifies that these provisions apply to persons where there are good reasons to believe that:

- they have committed crimes against peace, crimes against humanity, war crimes;
- they have committed a serious common law crime, the crime has been committed outside the host country, this being the case before they were admitted as refugees ;
- they are guilty of activities that are committed against the purposes and principles for which the United Nations militates[19];

Council Directive 2004/83 / EC of 29 April 2004 on minimum standards comes with the following additions. Thus, at the first paragraph (who committed crimes against peace, crimes against humanity, war crimes) there is a new sentence added to the original text of the Convention : " in the sense of the international instruments developed to provide for such offenses[20]".

The second paragraph (committed a serious common law crime, the offense was committed outside the host country, this being the case before accepting as a refugee the person concerned[21]) has a new phrase added "the actions particularly cruel, even if they are committed for an allegedly political purpose, can qualify as serious offenses of common law".[22] This paragraph also includes the concept of very serious actions, irrelevant of whether they were committed for a political purpose, they are still likely to qualify as serious offenses of common law.

The third paragraph only has one addition to the original text. It is stated here that acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the UN are also provided in the preamble to the UN Charter and are also found in Articles 1 and 2 of the UN Charter.[23]

A new paragraph has been added stating that the paragraph described above also applies to instigators and accomplices: " Paragraph 2 applies to persons who instigate or participate in any way in the offenses or acts referred to in that paragraph"[24].

3. Instead of a conclusion

In the present study we have analyzed the concept of refugee from the perspective of the 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees and its 1967 Protocol, as well as from the European law perspective: the European Union's Treaties, the Dublin Regulation and numerous directives.

The definition of refugees from the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees may be supplemented. In our view, other elements could be introduced in the definition given to a refugee and include more reasons which determine a person to flee his country such as: armed conflicts, natural disasters, global warming, genetic mutilation.

We believe that the principle of subsidiarity and temporary protection were needed in order to offer a wider international protections, since not all asylum seekers are eligible for refugee status, but they are eligible for international protection because their country of origin can not protect them.

The principle of non-refoulement is an essential principle for all asylum seekers who can not return to their country of origin. From our point of view, this principle is the basis of the international protection that a state must offer to the person concerned, it is a vital right, according to all international documents, from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, to the

---

[18] Directiva 2004/83/CE a Consiliului din 29 Aprilie 2004 privind standardele minime referitoare la condiţiile pe care trebuie să le îndeplinească resortisanţii ţărilor terţe sau apatrizii pentru a putea beneficia de statutul de refugiat sau persoanele care, din alte motive, au nevoie de protecţia internaţională şi referitoare la conţinutul protecţiei acordate, Jurnalul Oficial al Uniunii Europene , http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/HTML/?uri=CELEX:32004L0083&from=RO

[19] Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, http://www.unhcr.org/ro/wp-content/uploads/sites/23/2016/12/1951_Convention_ROM.pdf)

[20] Directiva 2004/83/CE a Consiliului din 29 Aprilie 2004 privind standardele minime referitoare la condiţiile pe care trebuie să le îndeplinească resortisanţii ţărilor terţe sau apatrizii pentru a putea beneficia de statutul de refugiat sau persoanele care, din alte motive, au nevoie de protecţia internaţională şi referitoare la conţinutul protecţiei acordate, Jurnalul Oficial al Uniunii Europene , (http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/HTML/?uri=CELEX:32004L0083&from=RO

[21] Directiva 2004/83/CE a Consiliului din 29 Aprilie 2004 privind standardele minime referitoare la condiţiile pe care trebuie să le îndeplinească resortisanţii ţărilor terţe sau apatrizii pentru a putea beneficia de statutul de refugiat sau persoanele care, din alte motive, au nevoie de protecţia internaţională şi referitoare la conţinutul protecţiei acordate, Jurnalul Oficial al Uniunii Europene , http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/HTML/?uri=CELEX:32004L0083&from=RO

[22] idem

[23] idem

[24] Directiva 2004/83/CE a Consiliului din 29 Aprilie 2004 privind standardele minime referitoare la condiţiile pe care trebuie să le îndeplinească resortisanţii ţărilor terţe sau apatrizii pentru a putea beneficia de statutul de refugiat sau persoanele care, din alte motive, au nevoie de protecţia internaţională şi referitoare la conţinutul protecţiei acordate, Jurnalul Oficial al Uniunii Europene, http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/HTML/?uri=CELEX:32004L0083&from=RO

Treaties of the European Union, the European Convention on Human Rights, etc.

We applaud the introduction of the definition of persecution in European law as well as the recognition of specific acts towards gender or children as a form of persecution.

In our view people who receive requests for international protection and who have the capacity to decide on asylum applications must meet certain conditions. These people need to know both the Convention and the European legislation on asylum, they must be people of good faith, tolerant and they should not discriminate in any way.

We conclude by stating that although the 1951 Convention and its 1967 Protocol were visionary treaties for the era in which they were adopted, times have changed and they are barely able to respond now to current needs. Although European law comes with additions, it still does not offer a complete and homogeneous vision, determined inter alia by the lack of interstate solidarity. And with regard to the applicable sanctions for non-compliance with the legislation , the sanctioning regime has proven to be sometimes ineffective.

References

- Actul final al conferinţei pentru Securitate şi Cooperare în Europa, Helsinki, 1st of August 1975 (http://www.dri.gov.ro/actul-final-de-la-helsinki/)
- Benitez, Daniel, Refugee concept in the international context http://www.academia.edu/11623350/Refugee_concept_in_the_international_context
- Chirtoaca, Natalia, Spînu, Veronica, Evoluţia şi relevanţa actuală a Convenţiei din 1951 privind Statutul refugiaţilor https://ibn.idsi.md/sites/default/files/imag_file/4.Evolutia%20si%20Relevanta%20actuala%20a% 20conventiei%20din%201951%20privind%20statutul%20refugiatilor.pdf
- Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, 1951 (http://www.unhcr.org/ro/wp-content/uploads/ sites/23/2016/12/1951_Convention_ROM.pdf)
- The European Convention on Human Rights signed on the 4th of November 1950 in Rome, which came into force on the 3rd of September 1953 (http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/Convention_RON.pdf)
- OAU Convention governing the specific aspects of refugee problems in Africa, signed in 1968 in Addis Ababa, which came into force in 1974 http://www.unhcr.org/about-us/background/45dc1a682/oau-convention-governing-specific-aspects-refugee-problems-africa-adopted.html
- Declaraţia Universală a Drepturilor Omului, from 10 December 1948 (http://www.monitoruljuridic.ro/act/declaratie-universala-a-drepturilor-omului-din-10-decembrie-1948-emitent-organizatia-natiunilor-unite-publicat-n-brosura-din-22751.html)
- Cartagena Declaration on Refugees, adopted by the Colloquy regarding the International Protection of Refugees from Central America, Mexico and Panama, signed on the 22nd of November 1974 in Cartagena de Indias Columbia http://www.unhcr.org/about-us/background/45dc19084/cartagena-declaration-refugees-adopted-colloquium-international-protection.html
- Directiva 2004/83/CE a Consiliului din 29 Aprilie 2004 privind standardele minime referitoare la condiţiile pe care trebuie să le îndeplinească resortisanţii ţărilor terţe sau apatrizii pentru a putea beneficia de statutul de refugiat sau persoanele care, din alte motive, au nevoie de protecţia internaţională şi referitoare la conţinutul protecţiei acordate, Jurnalul Oficial al Uniunii Europene (http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/HTML/?uri=CELEX:32004L0083&from=RO)
- Directiva 2011/95/UE a Parlamentului European şi a Consiliului din 13 Decembrie 2011 privind standardele referitoare la condiţiile pe care trebuie să le îndeplinească resortisanţii ţărilor terţe sau apatrizii pentru a putea beneficia de protecţie internaţională, la un statut uniform pentru refugiaţi sau pentru persoanele eligibile pentru obţinerea de protecţie subsidiară şi la conţinutul protecţiei acordate (reformare) (http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/HTML/?uri=CELEX:32011L0095&from=RO)
- Directiva 2013/32/UE a Parlamentului European şi a Consiliului din 26 Iunie 2013 privind procedurile comune de acordare şi retragere a protecţiei internaţionale (reformare) (http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/HTML/?uri=CELEX:32013L0033&from=RO)
- Directiva 2013/33/UE a Parlamentului European şi a Consiliului din 26 Iunie 2013, de stabilire a standardelor pentru primirea solicitanţilor de protecţie internaţională (reformare) http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/PDF/?uri=CELEX:32013L0033&from=EN
- https://dexonline.net/definitie-refugiat
- Directiva 2001/55 s Consiliului UE cu privire la standardele minime pentru a oferi protecţie temporară în eventualitatea unui flux mare a persoanelor deplasate şi măsurile care promovează un echilibru al eforturilor între statele membre în a primi aceste persoane şi a suporta consecinţele acesteia
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=OJ:L:2001:212:0012:0023:EN:PDF
- Fondul European pentru Refugiaţi, European solidarity, 19th of December 2016 http://www.unhcr.org/ro/152-rogeneralparteneriuniunea-europeanafondul-european-pentru-refugiati-html.html
- Gill-Bazo, Maria Theresa, New issue in refugee research, Refugee status, subsidiary protection and the right to be granted asylum under EC law, Refugee studies Centre, Oxford University, United Kingdom, Research paper no 136, November 2006 http://www.unhcr.org/research/working/455993882/refugee-status-subsidiary-protection-right-granted-asylum-under-ec-law.html

- Guidelines on International Protection, Cessation of Refugee Status under Article 1 C (5) and (6) of the 1951 Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, 10 th of February 2003, UNHCR, http://www.unhcr.org/3e637a202.pdf
- Handbook on European law relating to asylum, borders and immigration, European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights, 2014 file:///C:/Users/User/Downloads/handbook-law-asylum-migration-borders-2nded_en.pdf
- International Justice Resource Center, Asylum and the Rights of Refugees, Overview, http://www.ijrcenter.org/refugee-law/
- Manual referitor la proceduri şi criterii de determinare a statutului de refugiat în baza Convenţiei din 1951 şi a Protocolului din 1967 privind statutul refugiaţilor, The Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees http://cdom.rau.ro/download/Concurs/Manual%20UNHCR%20selectie.pdf
- Migration and Home Affairs, Temporary Protection, https://ec.europa.eu/home-affairs/what-we-do/policies/asylum/temporary-protection_en
- Madureira, Andre de Lima, International Refugee Law: Definitions and Limitations of the 1951 Refugee Convention http://blogs.lse.ac.uk/humanrights/2016/02/08/international-refugee-law-definitions-and-limitations-of-the-1951-refugee-convention/
- Course notes, Dreptul Refugiaţilor, Cycle 1 , Stela Litra, The University of European Studies from Moldova, Law Faculty http://www.usem.md/uploads//files/Note_de_curs_drept_ciclul_1/039_-_Dreptul_refugiatilor.pdf
- Necula, Cătălin, Mircea, Radu, Manual de pregătire în domeniul integrării refugiaţilor în România, publishing house the Ministry of Administration and Interior Affairs, 2009, (http://www.editura.mai.gov.ro/documente/biblioteca/2009/Manual%20ORI/Manual%20refugiati%20ORI.pdf)
- Note on the Exclusion Clause, EC-47- SC-CRP 29, UNHCR Standing Committe, 30 May 1997, http://www.unhcr.org/excom/standcom/3ae68cf68/note-exclusion-clauses.html
- Negură, Spătaru, Laura-Cristina, Papuc, Patricia, Scurta analiza a legislatiei europene si romane in materia azilului. Pozitia diplomatiei romane in fata crizei refugiatilor, publishing house The International Public Law Journal, ed The Legal Universe, 4/2016, October-December, Bucharest
- http://www.oxfordbibliographies.com/view/document/obo-9780199796953/obo-9780199796953-0040.xml
- Protocolul privind statutul refugiaţilor signed in New York on the 31st of January 1967 (http://www.cdep.ro/pls/legis/legis_pck.htp_act_text?idt=32365)
- Paraschiv, Ramona, Gabriela, Protecţia refugiaţilor potrivit reglementărilor internaţionale, Acta Universitatis George Bacovia, Legal, Volum 4, Issue 1/2015, http://www.ugb.ro/Juridica/Issue7RO/3._Protectia_refugiatilor_potrivit_reglementarilor_internationale.Ramona_Paraschiv.RO.pdf
- Papademetrio, Theresa, Refugee Law and Policy: European Union, March 2016, https://www.loc.gov/law/help/refugee-law/europeanunion.php
- Politica Uniunii Europene în materie de azil, Azilul în Uniunea Europeană, 19th of December 2016 http://www.unhcr.org/ro/150-politica-uniunii-europene-in-materie-de-azil.html
- Regulamentul UE nr 604/2013 al Parlamentului European şi al Consiliului din 26 Iunie 2013 de stabilire a criteriilor şi mecanismelor de determinare a statutului membru responsabil de examinarea unei cereri de protecţie internaţională prezentate într-unul dintre statele membre de către un resortisant al unei ţări terţe sau de către un apatrid (reformare), http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/PDF/?uri=CELEX:32013R0604&from=EN
- Protocolul privind statutul refugiaţilor, signed in New York on the 31st of January 1967
- http://www.unhcr.org/ro/wp-content/uploads/sites/23/2016/12/1967_Protocol_ROM.pdf
- Russel, Stanton, Sharon, Refugees Risks and Challenges Worldwide, 1st of November, 2012, Migration Policy Institute https://www.migrationpolicy.org/article/refugees-risks-and-challenges-worldwide
- Regulamentul UE nr 603/2013 al Parlamentului European şi al Consiliului din 26 Iunie 2013 privind instituirea sistemului Eurodac pentru compararea amprentelor digitale în scopul aplicării eficiente a Regulamentului UE nr 604/2013 de stabilire a criteriilor şi mecanismelor de determinare a statutului membru responsabil de examinarea unei cereri de protecţie internaţională prezentate într-unul dintre statele membre de către un resortisant al unei ţări terţe sau de către un apatrid şi privind cererile autorităţilor de aplicare a legii din statele membre şi a Europol de comparare a datelor Eurodac în scopul asigurării respectării aplicării legii şi de modificare a Regulamentului UE nr 1077-2011 de instituire a Agenţiei Europene pentru gestionarea operaţională a sistemelor informatice la scara largă, în spaţiul de libertate, securitate şi justiţie (reformare) http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/HTML/?uri=CELEX:32013R0603&from=RO
- The Cessation Clause, Guidelines on their application, UNHCR, Geneva, April 1999, Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees http://www.refworld.org/pdfid/3c06138c4.pdf
- Vergatti, Cristina Narcisa, Statutul juridic al refugiaţilor, The Romanian Institute for Human Rights, Bucharest, publishing house IRDO, Bucharest, 2009
- Webber, Frances, Exclusion from Refugee Status under Article 1F of the Convention http://www.refugeelegalaidinformation.org/exclusion-clause

IDENTIFYING THE RIGHT OF A PERSON AGGRIEVED BY A PUBLIC AUTHORITY IN THE ROMANIAN CONSTITUTION AND IN COMPARATIVE LAW

Cătălin-Radu PAVEL*

Abstract

The purpose of the present study is to analyze the development and the evolution of the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority in the Romanian Constitutions and in comparative law. The objectives of the study were to analyze the Romanian Constitutions in order to identify the provisions regarding the fundamental right of a person aggrieved by a public authority and to analyze the provisions of this fundamental right in the constitutions of other states: the Constitution of the French Republic, the constitutional Acts of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the Fundamental Law for the Federal Republic of Germany, the Constitution of the Republic of Italy, and the Constitution of Spain. By granting the fundamental right of a person aggrieved by a public authority is ensuring a good administration of the state by giving the citizens a compliance with their legitimate rights.

The citizen may be aggrieved in his legitimate rights and interests by a public authority, by means of an administrative act or by failure of a public authority to solve his application within the lawful time limit. The Romanian organic law that stipulates and protect this right is the administrative litigation law number 554/2004. Also, the Romanian state is liable for any prejudice caused as a result of judicial errors.

Keywords: the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority, Romanian Constitution, comparative law, citizens legitimate rights, granting a good administration by ensuring the guarantee rights.

1. Introduction

The purpose of this study is to analyse and identify the development and the evolution of the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority in the Romanian Constitutions and in comparative law.

The study is structured as follows: several selective aspects have been analysed with regard to the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority in Romania and the evolution of the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority in the Romanian Constitutions, and the selection from comparative law included for analysis the Constitutions of the following states: the Constitution of the French Republic, the constitutional Acts of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the Fundamental Law for the Federal Republic of Germany, the Constitution of the Republic of Italy, and the Constitution of Spain.

The studied matter is important because granting the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority at constitutional level ensures the protection of the manifestations of the citizens' will in relation to public authorities and also to other rights, liberties and citizen interests, thus ensuring the good governance of the State to the benefit of its citizens.

The present paper intended to answer to the matter studied by analysing both the evolution, the development and the improvement of the fundamental right of a person aggrieved by a public authority in time, beginning with the first Romanian Constitution and up to the present days, and the comparative law by identifying this right also in the Constitutions of other states.

As regards the relation between this paper and the already existent specialized literature, the analyses conducted so far have dealt less frequently with the topic approached here, which is the analysis of the fundamental right of a person aggrieved by a public authority in the Romanian Constitutions, from the Development Statute of the Paris Convention of 7/9 August 1858[1] and until the Draft Law on the review of the Constitution of Romania of 2014[2]. Furthermore, the author of this study has analysed this fundamental right in comparative law, in the Constitutions of other states, providing an overview of its application over the years and at international level.

In the current context, the author of this study considered the aspects approached by this research as having been especially important in view of the societal predispositions for a continuous improvement of its forms of governance, the citizens' aspirations, both of individuals and legal entities, for the development of social sciences, of the relations between public institutions and citizens, ensuring the good governance of the constitutional state.

* PhD candidate, Lawyer in the Bucharest Bar (e- mail: radu.pavel@avocatpavel.ro)

[1] I. Muraru, M.L. Pucheanu, G. Iancu, C.L. Popescu, Constituțiile Române Texte. Note. Prezentare Comparativă (The Romanian Constitutions. Texts. Notes. A Comparative Presentation), Regia Autonomă „Monitorul Oficial" Publishing House, Bucharest, 1993, p. 7-14.

[2] The Draft Law on the review of the Constitution of Romania of 2014 was published in Monitorul Oficial (Official Gazette) no. 100 of 10th of February 2014.

2. Selective aspects about the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority in Romania

The right of a person aggrieved by a public authority is regulated at constitutional level by Article 52 of the Constitution of Romania. This article grants the right of a citizen who was prejudiced by a Romanian public institution to obtain the recognition of the claimed right, the annulment of the unlawful deed which caused the prejudice and the reparation of the suffered damage.

With the adoption of the law reviewing the Constitution of Romania[3] in 2003, the Article 48 of the 1991 Constitution[4] was amended, and paragraphs 1 and 3 were modified. Paragraph (1) which in the 1991 Constitution read: "A person aggrieved with regard to a right by a public authority, through an administrative deed or by the non-settlement of a request within the time limit provided by law, is entitled to obtain the recognition of the claimed right, the annulment of the deed and the reparation of damage." was changed into "A person aggrieved with regard to a right or a legitimate interest, by a public authority, through an administrative deed or by the non-settlement of a request within the time limit provided by law, is entitled to obtain the recognition of the claimed right or legitimate interest, the annulment of the deed and the reparation of damage." Paragraph (3) which in the 1991 Constitution was: "The State has patrimonial liability, under the law, for any prejudice caused by miscarriages of justice in criminal trials." was changed to its current wording, which is: "The State has patrimonial liability for any prejudice caused by miscarriages of justice. The liability of the State is determined under the law and does not eliminate the liability of the magistrates who acted in bad faith or serious neglect."

This fundamental citizen right was "traditionally considered as falling into the broad category of rights that are guarantees, together with the right of petition, with which, as a matter of fact, it is closely correlated"[5].

Therefore, in the doctrine, the right of petition, granted by Article 51 of the Constitution of Romania, together with the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority, form the class of rights that are guarantees, which are as a matter of fact a guarantee for all fundamental rights and freedoms.

The right of a person aggrieved by a public authority was brought under regulation by the provisions of Article 52 of the Constitution of Romania: "(1) A person aggrieved with regard to a right or a legitimate interest, by a public authority, through an administrative deed or by the non-settlement of a request within the time limit provided by law is entitled to obtain the recognition of the claimed right or legitimate interest, the annulment of the deed and the reparation of damage. (2) The conditions and limitations related to the exercise of this right are provided for by an organic law. (3) The State has patrimonial liability for any prejudice caused by miscarriages of justice. The liability of the State is determined under the law and does not eliminate the liability of the magistrates who acted in bad faith or serious neglect."

In our opinion, the rights that are guarantees have ensured the protection of the manifestations of the citizens' will in relation to public authorities and also to other rights, liberties and citizen interests, thus ensuring the good governance of the State to the benefit of its citizens.

Article 52 of the fundamental law represents the constitutional legal ground for the assumption of responsibility by public authorities in relation with the citizens, and in relation with a person aggrieved with regard to a right or a legitimate interest, which consequently provides legal protection for the latter through the annulment of the deed and the reparation of damage.

All rights and guarantees which concern the person aggrieved with regard to a right or a legitimate interest have been governed in Romania by an organic law, namely the Law of Administrative Dispute 554/2004[6].

One first author[7], with regard to the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority, said that "the changes brought to paragraph (1) by the reviewing law pursued a correlation with the other constitutional provisions and first of all with Article 21 which brings under regulation the free access to justice, meaning that any person may appeal to justice for defending their rights, freedoms and legitimate interests, and no law may restrict the exercise of this right. In line with this constitutional provision, the text was completed, meaning that not only the person aggrieved with regard to a right acknowledged by law is entitled to an action before a court of administrative dispute, but also a person aggrieved with regard to a legitimate interest (direct and personal)."

A second author[8] held that "for a definition of the concept of "fundamental rights", the following have

[3] Law 429/2003 on the review of the Constitution of Romania, effective as from 29th October 2003, published in Monitorul Oficial, Part I no. 758 of 29th October 2003.

[4] The 1991 Constitution of Romania was published in "Monitorul Oficial" (Official Gazette) no. 233 of 21st of November 1991.

[5] M. Constantinescu, A. Iorgovan, I. Muraru, E.S. Tănăsescu, Constituția României revizuită – comentarii și explicații (The Romanian Constitution Reviewed – Comments and Explanations), All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2004, p. 120.

[6] Law of Administrative Dispute 554/2004, effective as from 06th of January 2005, with its subsequent changes and additions, based on its publication in "Monitorul Oficial al României (Official Gazette of Romania), Part I, no. 1154 of 07.12.2004.

[7] Coordinators I. Muraru, E.S. Tănăsescu, Constituția României, Comentariu pe articole (Constitution of Romania. Articles Commented), C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008, p. 517.

[8] N. Pavel, Drept constituțional și instituții politice, Teoria Generală (Constitutional Law and Political Institutions. General Theory), Publishing House Fundația România de Mâine, 2004, p. 70.

been considered: (a) the fundamental rights are subjective rights of the citizens; b) these subjective rights are essential to citizens' life, freedom and dignity, and indispensable to the free development of human personality; c) the fundamental rights are established by the Constitution and granted by the Constitution and by law."

A third author[9] stated with regard to the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority that "Article 52 of the Constitution of Romania is the constitutional ground for the liability of public authorities for grievances caused to individuals through the violation of their rights or freedoms or legitimate interests, which means that all other dispositions referring to rights and freedoms must be correlated with this constitutional text."

A fourth author[10] concluded that the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority is "the constitutional ground for the liability of public authorities for grievances caused to citizens through the violation or disregard of their rights and freedoms."

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 10 December 1948[11] provided for the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority in Article 8: "Everyone has the right to an effective remedy by the competent national tribunals for acts violating the fundamental rights granted him by the constitution or by law."

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights[12] is the source of the concept of fundamental human right. In the Preamble of the Declaration, the Member States of the United Nations Organisation assumed the responsibility of recognising the Declaration "as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of Member States themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction."[13]

In our opinion, the citizen who was aggrieved with regard with a right has no legal obligation to prove the guilt of the civil servant; they only have to prove the prejudice brought to their right by an adverse administrative act. Consequently, the citizen has the responsibility to prove the causality link between the adverse administrative act and the actual prejudice which was caused.

3. The evolution of the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority in the Romanian Constitutions

With regard to the evolution and development of the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority in the Romanian Constitutions, this study has analysed the Development Statute of the Paris Convention, the Constitution of Romania of 28 February 1938, the Constitution of 24 September 1952, the Romanian Constitution adopted on 29 June 1866, the Constitution of 29 March 1923, the Constitution of 13 April 1948, the Constitution of 21 August 1965, the Constitution of Romania of 8 December 1991, the Constitution of Romania reviewed in 2003, as well as the 2014 Draft Law on the review of the Constitution of Romania.

Therefore, the Development Statute of the Paris Convention, a statute which stood as a constitution, was the first Romanian Constitution. The Statute was adopted by the Prince of the Romanian United Principalities, Alexandru Ioan I, in May 1864.

No provisions referring to the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority have been identified in the Statute. Similarly, no provisions related to the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority have been identified in the Constitution of Romania of 28 February 1938[14], and neither in the Constitution of 24 September 1952[15].

As regards the Romanian Constitution adopted on 29 June 1866[16], it brought under regulation the fundamental citizen rights. Therefore, Article 29 has been identified, which provided that: "No prior authorisation is necessary for the aggrieved parties to take action against public servants for the acts of their administration; however, the special rules established with regard to ministers shall remain unchanged. The cases and the type of actions to be taken shall be regulated by a specific law. Special dispositions in the Criminal Code shall determine the penalties of the denunciated[17]."

These were among the first fundamental dispositions identified by this study with reference to the action taken by aggrieved parties against public servants for acts of their administration.

---

[9] G. Iancu, Drept constituţional şi instituţii politice, Ediţia 3 (Constitutional Law and Political Institutions, 3rd edition), C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, p. 294-295.

[10] I. Muraru, E.S. Tănăsescu, Drept constituțional și instituții politice, Ediția 15, Volumul I (Constitutional Law and Political Institutions), 15th edition, Volume I), C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016.

[11] The Universal Declaration of Human Rights was adopted and proclaimed by the United Nations General Assembly on 10th of December 1948.

[12] Ibidem.

[13] The Preamble of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted and proclaimed by the United Nations General Assembly on 10th of December 1948.

[14] Ibidem, p. 97-117.

[15] Ibidem,p. 141-159.

[16] I. Muraru, M.L. Pucheanu, G. Iancu, C.L. Popescu, Constituțiile Române Texte. Note. Prezentare Comparativă (The Romanian Constitutions. Texts. Notes. A Comparative Presentation), Regia Autonomă „Monitorul Oficial" Publishing House, Bucharest, 1993, p. 33-66.

[17] Ibidem, p. 40.

The Constitution of 29 March 1923[18] consecrated equal rights and freedoms for all. The following provisions of Article 31 have been identified in the content of this fundamental law: "No prior authorisation is necessary for the aggrieved parties to take action against public servants for the acts of their administration, while the special rules established with regard to ministers shall remain unchanged. The cases and the type of actions to be taken shall be regulated by a specific law."[19] The formulation of these fundamental provisions remained that of the 1866 Romanian Constitution.

With regard to the Constitution of 13 April 1948[20], Article 34 has been identified with the following provisions: "Every citizen has a right of petition, as well as the right to request the bodies stipulated by law to arraign any public servant for the offences committed during their service[21]."

As concerns these fundamental provisions, we found that with the promulgation of the 1948 Constitution the right of petition was brought under regulation too and a right was granted to request the bodies provided by law to arraign any public servant for offences committed in the course of their service.

The Constitution of 21 August 1965[22], which was adopted by the Great National Assembly at its meeting on 21 August 1965 and published in "Buletinul Oficial al R.S.R." no. 1 of 21 August 1965, stipulated in Article 35 that: "The individual aggrieved with regard to a right by an unlawful act of a body of the State may request to the competent bodies, under the law, the annulment of the act and the reparation of the damage[23]."

With regard to the analysis of the Romanian Constitution of 8 December 1991[24], it came into force on 8 December 1991, when it was approved by the national referendum organised to this end and was published in "Monitorul Oficial al României" no. 223 of 21 November 1991.

The following provisions of Article 48 have been analysed: "The right of a person aggrieved by a public authority (1) A person aggrieved with regard to a right by a public authority, through an administrative deed or by the non-settlement of a request within the time limit provided by law, is entitled to obtain the recognition of the claimed right, the annulment of the deed and the reparation of damage. (2) The conditions and limitations related to the exercise of this right are provided for by an organic law. (3) The State has patrimonial liability, according to the law, for any prejudice caused by miscarriage of justice in criminal trials."

The conclusion was that the 1991 Constitution stipulated that the State was liable for miscarriages of justice, limiting them to those committed in criminal trials. At the same time, the first ever, this right is named the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority and the Constitution requires that its limits and conditions are provided for by an organic law.

In the contemporary legal system, which is the Constitution of Romania reviewed in 2003[25], the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority, as a fundamental right in Romania, was provided for by Article 52 of the Constitution of Romania, republished in 2003: „(1) A person aggrieved with regard to a right or a legitimate interest, by a public authority, through an administrative deed or by the non-settlement of a request within the time limit provided by law is entitled to obtain the recognition of the claimed right or legitimate interest, the annulment of the deed and the reparation of damage. (2) The conditions and limitations related to the exercise of this right are provided for by an organic law. (3) The State has patrimonial liability for any prejudice caused by miscarriages of justice. The liability of the State is determined under the law and does not eliminate the liability of the magistrates who acted in bad faith or serious neglect."

As regards the 2014 Draft Law on the review of the Constitution of Romania, the analysis has identified the changes proposed in order to review the Article 52 of the Constitution in force. Therefore, in the reviewing proposal, Article 52 should be changed and complemented as follows: "Paragraph (2) shall have the following content: « (2) The conditions and limitations related to the exercise of this right are provided for by law. » Paragraph (3) shall have the following content: « (3) The State has patrimonial liability, integral and non-discriminating, for any prejudice caused by miscarriages of justice or administrative errors. The liability of the State is determined under the law and does not eliminate the liability of the magistrates or the officials who are the authors of the miscarriages of justice or administrative errors. » After paragraph (3), a new paragraph is inserted, with the following content: « (3.1) The State has the obligation to initiate, immediately, an action for recourse against the authors of the miscarriages of justice or administrative errors that caused prejudices[26]. »"

[18] Ibidem, p. 71-92.
[19] Ibidem, p. 77.
[20] Ibidem, p. 121-138.
[21] Ibidem, p. 126.
[22] Ibidem, p. 165-187.
[23] Ibidem, p. 171.
[24] The 1991 Constitution of Romania was published in "Monitorul Oficial" (Official Gazette) no. 233 of 21st of November 1991.
[25] Ibidem.
[26] Citizens' legislative initiatives according to Law 189/1999 Rationale of the draft law on the review of the Constitution of Romania – a citizen legislative initiative, 10 December 2013; published in Monitorul Oficial (Official Gazette), Part I, no. 100 of 10th of February 2014.

Following the analysis of the Romanian Constitutions, beginning with the Development Statute of the Paris Convention, a Statute which stood as the Constitution of Romania, and until the 2014 Draft Law on the review of the Constitution of Romania, we could see the evolution and the changes of the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority at fundamental level, the forms taken by this right over the years, the time when it acquired its name, which has been kept up to the contemporary period, as well as the changes proposed for the next review of the Constitution of Romania.

4. Selective aspects about the provisions related to the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority in the constitutions of other states

The following constitutions have been selected from comparative law for analysis: the Constitution of the French Republic, the constitutional Acts of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the Fundamental Law for the Federal Republic of Germany, the Constitution of the Republic of Italy, and the Constitution of Spain.

The provisions of the fundamental laws of the aforesaid states have been analysed in respect of the form consecrated by each state to the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority.

4.1. In the Constitution of the French Republic[27]

Provisions have been identified with regard to the right of society to call to account any public agent in Article 15 of the Declaration of Human and Citizen Rights[28] of 26 August 1789: "Society has the right to call to account any public agent of its administration."

The Preamble of the Constitution of the French Republic of 4 October 1958 shows that the French nation proclaims: "solemnly its dedication to Human Rights and the principles of national sovereignty as set out in the 1789 Declaration confirmed by the Preamble of the 1946 Constitution[29]."

No provisions have been identified with regard to the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority in the Constitution of the French Republic of 4 October 1958, this being provided for in the Declaration of Human and Citizen Rights, a declaration which is part of the so-called French "constitutional block", being an integral part of the Constitution.

An author[30] of the doctrine stated with regard to Article 15 that: "this formulation, which today seems a little embarrassing and rough to us, underlay the "invention" of the jurisdictional function of the Council of State in France and allowed the creation of the rich case law of this prestigious court with regard to administrative liability (subjective and objective). Indeed, this is the source of the specific traits proper to administrative liability, which differentiate it from the liability under civil or criminal law. Based on the "exorbitant" legal regime (as Napoleon would call it later on) benefitting the public administration, it needs to exercise its competence within the limits which the law pre-set for it; however, as soon as it produces a prejudice, its liability is engaged based on the simple fact of proving the prejudice and the administrative deed which caused it, while the aggrieved individual has no longer the duty of proving the causality link between the administrative deed and the prejudice or the guilt of the administrative authority. A legal regime of liability is therefore consecrated for the public administration which is tougher than for individual subjects of the law, precisely in consideration of the authority attributes of which it benefits."

4.2. In the constitutional Acts of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland[31]

Although the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland has not a written constitution, given its tradition, the constitutional Acts have been taken into consideration.

The analysis of the constitutional Acts of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland has identified in the document called the Bill of Rights" (1689)[32], point 1, the sub-point 13, the following provisions: "And that for redress of all grievances and for the amending, strengthening and preserving of the laws, parliaments ought to be held frequently. And they do claim, demand and insist upon all and singular the premises, as their undoubted rights and liberties; and that no declarations, judgements, doings or proceedings, to the prejudice of the people in any of the said premises ought in any wise to be draw hereafter into consequence or example. To which demand of their rights they are particularly encouraged by the declaration of this highness the Prince of Orange as being the only means for obtaining a full redress and remedy therein. Having therefore an entire confidence, [27] Ș. Deaconu, I. Muraru, E.S. Tănăsescu, S. G. Barbu, Codex Constituțional Constituțiile statelor membre ale Uniunii Europene, Volumul I (Constitutional Codex. The Constitutions of the Member States of the European Union. Volume I), Monitorul Oficial Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, p. 637-667.

[28] Ibidem, p. 668-670.

[29] Ibidem, p. 637.

[30] E.S. Tănăsescu, Prezentarea comparativă a abordărilor constituționale din alte state cu privire la răspunderea autorităților publice fată de cetățeni și relativ la integrarea în Uniunea Europeană (A Comparative Presentation of Constitutional Approaches in other States with regard to the Liability of Public Authorities towards the Citizens and in relation to the integration into the European Union), Revista de drept public (Public Law Magazine) no. 2/2002, p. 16-23.

[31] E.S Tănăsescu, N. Pavel, Actele constituționale ale Regatului Unit al Marii Britanii și Irlandei de Nord (The Constitutional Acts of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland), Publishing House All Beck, Bucharest, 2003, p. 36-100.

[32] Ibidem, p. 82-83.

That his said highness the Prince of Orange will perfect the deliverance so far advanced by him, and will still preserve them from the violation of their rights, which they have here asserted, and from all other attempts upon their religion rights and liberties."

In the constitutional Acts of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, in the 1998 Human Rights Act[33], provisions have been identified with reference to "8. Judicial remedies 1. In relation to any act (or proposed act) of a public authority which the court finds is (or would be) unlawful, it may grant such relief or remedy, or make such order, within its powers as it considers just and appropriate. 2. But damages may be awarded only by a court which has power to award damages, or to order the payment of compensation, in civil proceedings. 3. No award of damages is to be made unless, taking account of all the circumstances of the case, including: a. any other relief or remedy granted, or order made, in relation to the act in question (by that or any other court), and b. the consequences of any decision (of that or any other court) in respect of that act, the court is satisfied that the award is necessary to afford just satisfaction to the person in whose favour it is made. 4. In determining a. whether to award damages, or b. the amount of an award, the court must take into account the principles applied by the European Court of Human Rights in relation to the award of compensation under Article 41 of the Convention. 5. A public authority against which damages are awarded is to be treated: a. in Scotland, for the purposes of section 3 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1940 as if the award were made in an action of damages in which the authority has been found liable in respect of loss or damage to the person to whom the award is made; b. for the purposes of the Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978 as liable in respect of damage suffered by the person to whom the award is made. 6. In this section "court" includes a tribunal, "damages" means damages for an unlawful act of a public authority; and "unlawful" means unlawful under section 6(1)."[34]

4.3. In the Fundamental Law for the Federal Republic of Germany[35]

The analysis of the Fundamental Law for the Federal Republic of Germany has identified the provisions of Article 34: "[Liability for breaching the duties associated with the service] If anyone, in the exercise of a public position that is entrusted to them breaches their duty in relation to a third party, then the liability lies, in principle, with the State or with the established body within which they serve. In case of premeditation or serious neglect, the possibility for an action for recourse remains open. For compensation claims and for recourse, the possibility of ordinary legal proceedings cannot be closed[36]."

The conclusion is that there are provisions concerning the liability for breaching the duties associated with the service in the exercise of a public function in the Fundamental Law for the Federal Republic of Germany too.

4.4. In the Constitution of the Republic of Italy[37]

The analysis of the Constitution of Italy has identified the provisions of Article 28: "Officials and employees of the State and of public institutions are directly liable, under the criminal, civil and administrative laws, for their action violating the citizens' rights. In such cases, civil liability falls on the State and the public institutions."[38]

Other provisions have also been identified in the Constitution of Italy with regard to liability in case of miscarriages of justice, in Article 24 paragraph 4: "The law defines the conditions and the forms of remedy in case of miscarriages of justice[39]."

4.5. In the Constitution of Spain[40]

The analysis of the Constitution of Spain has identified the provisions of Article 106: "(1) The tribunals control the regulatory power and the lawfulness of the administrative action, as well as its abidance by the purposes justifying it. (2) Individuals have the right, under the law, to receive compensation for any grievance in relation to their rights and goods, except for force majeure cases, any time these prejudices are the consequence of the operation of public services[41]."

Also in the Constitution of Spain, the provisions of Article 121 have been identified: "The damages caused by miscarriages of justice, as well as those that are the consequence of an abnormal administration of justice give a right to a compensation which is incumbent on the State, under the law."[42]

---

[33] Ș. Deaconu, I. Muraru, E.S. Tanasescu, S. G. Barbu, Codex Constitțtional - Constitutiile statelor membre ale Uniunii Europene,Volumul II (Constitutional Codex. The Constitutions of the Member States of the European Union. Volume II), Monitorul Oficial Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, p. 232.

[34] Ibidem, p. 238-239.

[35] E. Focșeneanu, Legea Fundamentală pentru Republica Federală Germania (The Fundamental Law for the Federal Republic of Germany), All Educațional S.A. Publishing House, Bucharest, 1998, p. 29-140.

[36] Ibidem, p. 51.

[37] Ș. Deaconu, I. Muraru, E.S. Tănăsescu, S. G. Barbu, Codex Constituțional. Constituțiile statelor membre ale Uniunii Europene, Volumul I (Constitutional Codex. The Constitutions of the Member States of the European Union. Volume I), Monitorul Oficial Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, p. 637-667.

[38] Ibidem, pp. 815.

[39] Ibidem, pp. 815.

[40] E. Focșeneanu, Constituția Spaniei (Constitution of Spain), C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2006, p. 13-97.

[41] Ibidem, p. 57.

[42] Ibidem, p. 63.

The regulations and the constitutional principles granting the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority in the Constitutions analysed in the study of comparative law have regulatory aspects which are similar to the Constitution of Romania.

5. Conclusions

5.1. Granting the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority at constitutional level ensures the protection of the manifestations of the citizens' will in relation to public authorities and also to other rights, liberties and citizen interests, thus ensuring the good governance of the State to the benefit of its citizens.

5.2. The right of a person aggrieved by a public authority is brought under regulation at constitutional level by Article 52 of the Constitution of Romania. The Article grants to the citizens who have been prejudiced by a Romanian public institution the right to obtain the recognition of the claimed right, the annulment of the unlawful act which caused the prejudice and the reparation for the suffered damage.

5.3. We could see that the interest at constitutional level has been ever since old times to protect the rights of a person aggrieved by a public authority at a fundamental level, so that, at social level, this right which is a guarantee has pursued to defend citizens' rights and interests.

5.4. A citizen who was prejudiced with regard to a right has no legal obligation to prove the guilt of the public servant; they only have to prove the prejudice brought to their right by an adverse administrative act. Consequently, the citizen has the responsibility to prove the causality link between the adverse administrative act and the actual prejudice which was caused.

5.5. Beginning with the Development Statute of the Paris Convention, a Statute which stood as the Constitution of Romania, and until the 2014 Draft Law on the review of the Constitution of Romania, we could see the evolution and the changes of the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority at fundamental level, the forms taken by this right over the years, the time when it acquired its name, which has been kept up to the contemporary period, as well as the changes proposed for the next review of the Constitution.

5.6. The following constitutions have been selected from comparative law for analysis: the Constitution of the French Republic, the constitutional Acts of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the Fundamental Law for the Federal Republic of Germany, the Constitution of the Republic of Italy, and the Constitution of Spain. The provisions of the fundamental laws of the aforesaid states have been examined in respect of the form consecrated by each state to the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority.

5.7. The topics for future research will include the right of petition, which together with the right of a person aggrieved by a public authority make the class of rights that are guarantees and ensure the good governance of the constitutional state to the benefit of its citizens.

References

- I. Muraru, M.L. Pucheanu, G. Iancu, C.L. Popescu, Constituțiile Române Texte. Note. Prezentare Comparativă (The Romanian Constitutions. Texts. Notes. A Comparative Presentation), Regia Autonomă „Monitorul Oficial" Publishing House, Bucharest, 1993, p. 7-14
- The Draft Law on the review of the Constitution of Romania of 2014 was published in "Monitorul Oficial" (Official Gazette) no. 100 of 10th of February 2014
- Law 429/2003 on the review of the Constitution of Romania, effective as from 29th October 2003, published in Monitorul Oficial, Part I no. 758 of 29th October 2003
- The 1991 Constitution of Romania was published in "Monitorul Oficial" (Official Gazette) no. 233 of 21st of November 1991
- M. Constantinescu, A. Iorgovan, I. Muraru, E.S. Tănăsescu, Constituția României revizuită – comentarii și explicații (The Romanian Constitution Reviewed – Comments and Explanations), All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2004, p. 120
- Law of Administrative Dispute 554/2004, effective as from 06th of January 2005, with its subsequent changes and additions, based on its publication in "Monitorul Oficial al României (Official Gazette of Romania), Part I, no. 1154 of 07.12.2004
- Coordinators I. Muraru, E.S. Tănăsescu, Constituția României, Comentariu pe articole (Constitution of Romania. Articles Commented), C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008, p. 517
- N. Pavel, Drept constituţional şi instituţii politice, Teoria Generală (Constitutional Law and Political Institutions. General Theory), Publishing House Fundaţia România de Mâine, 2004, p. 70
- G. Iancu, Drept constituţional şi instituţii politice, Ediția 3 (Constitutional Law and Political Institutions, 3rd edition), C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, p. 294-295
- I. Muraru, E.S. Tănăsescu, Drept constituțional și instituții politice, Ediția 15, Volumul I (Constitutional Law and Political Institutions), 15th edition, Volume I), C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016
- The Universal Declaration of Human Rights was adopted and proclaimed by the United Nations General Assembly on 10th of December 1948
- The Preamble of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted and proclaimed by the United Nations General Assembly on 10th of December 1948

- Citizens' legislative initiatives according to Law 189/1999 Rationale of the draft law on the review of the Constitution of Romania – a citizen legislative initiative, 10 December 2013; published in Monitorul Oficial (Official Gazette), Part I, no. 100 of 10th of February 2014
- Ș. Deaconu, I. Muraru, E.S. Tănăsescu, S. G. Barbu, Codex Constituțional Constituțiile statelor membre ale Uniunii Europene, Volumul I (Constitutional Codex. The Constitutions of the Member States of the European Union. Volume I), Monitorul Oficial Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, p. 637-667
- E.S. Tănăsescu, Prezentarea comparativă a abordărilor constituționale din alte state cu privire la răspunderea autorităților publice fată de cetățeni și relativ la integrarea în Uniunea Europeană (A Comparative Presentation of Constitutional Approaches in other States with regard to the Liability of Public Authorities towards the Citizens and in relation to the integration into the European Union), Revista de drept public (Public Law Magazine) no. 2/2002, p. 16-23
- E.S Tănăsescu, N. Pavel, Actele constituționale ale Regatului Unit al Marii Britanii și Irlandei de Nord (The Constitutional Acts of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland), Publishing House All Beck, Bucharest, 2003, p. 36-100
- Ș. Deaconu, I. Muraru, E.S. Tanasescu, S. G. Barbu, Codex Constitțtional - Constitutiile statelor membre ale Uniunii Europene,Volumul II (Constitutional Codex. The Constitutions of the Member States of the European Union. Volume II), Monitorul Oficial Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, p. 232
- E. Focșeneanu, Legea Fundamentală pentru Republica Federală Germania (The Fundamental Law for the Federal Republic of Germany), All Educațional S.A. Publishing House, Bucharest, 1998, p. 29-140
- E. Focșeneanu, Constituția Spaniei (Constitution of Spain), C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2006, p. 13-97

REFLECTIONS ON THE REGULATION OF THE PRINCIPLE OF NON-DISCRIMINATION IN THE ROMANIAN CONSTITUTIONS AND IN THE INTERNATIONAL BILL OF RIGHTS – SELECTIVE ASPECTS

Nicolae PAVEL[*]

Abstract

At the onset of the study it is necessary to mention that its topic will be circumscribed to "Reflections on the regulation of the principle of non-discrimination in the Romanian Constitutions and in the International Bill of Human Rights - Selective aspects". By this approach, the proposed study opens a complex and complete vision, but not exhaustive, on the "Reflections on the regulation of non-discrimination in the Romanian Constitutions and in the International Bill of Human Rights - Selective aspects". In the analysis of the International Bill of Human Rights, we will keep a symmetrical approach to identifying regulations concerning non-discrimination. The subject of the scientific endeavour will be circumscribed to the scientific analysis of its parts, as follows: 1. Preliminary considerations. 2. Identification of constitutional rules on the principle of non-discrimination in the Romanian Constitutions. 3. Identification of rules on the non-discrimination in the International Bill of Human Rights. 4. The highlights of Romanian doctrine on the non-discrimination. 5. Jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court regarding non-discrimination (Selective aspects) 6. Conclusions.

Keywords: regulation of non-discrimination, Romanian constitutions, International Bill of Human Rights.

1. Introduction

The object of study of the scientific approach will be circumscribed to the scientific analysis of its five great parts, i.e.: 1. Identifying the constitutional norms regarding non-discrimination in the Romanian Constitutions. 2. Identifying the norms regarding non-discrimination in the International Bill of Human Rights. 3. Romanian doctrinal landmarks on non-discrimination. 4. Jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court regarding non-discrimination (Selective aspects) 5. Conclusions.

At the onset of this study, it is imperative to specify that in its contents, the International Charter of Human Rights gathers the following set of five documents:[1] a) the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. b) the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Political Rights. c) the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. d) the Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. e) the second Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, aimed at abolishing the death penalty.

As concerns the evolution of ideas regarding the elaboration of an International Bill of Human Rights, we specify as follows:

1. The idea of the elaboration of a Declaration of human fundamental rights, (Bill of Rights) was brought up at the Conference of the United Nations regarding the International Organization, held in San Francisco, between April-June 1945, at 26 June 1945 when the UN Charter was adopted.
2. The Economic and Social Council set up the Commission on Human Rights, under art. 68 of the Charter, by resolution 5(1) of 16 February 1946, and authorized it to present proposals, recommendations and reports on an international declaration of human rights.
3. At the second session, held in Geneva, between 2-17 December 1947, the Commission on Human Rights decided that the expression International Bill of Human Rights should apply to all the documents in preparation, i.e. to one declaration on human rights, a convention or a covenant on human rights and enforcement measures.

For this study, we will mention the following documents of the Charter, which contain regulations on non discrimination, respectively, Universal Declaration of Human Rights, The International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

The two Covenants in the UN system are called Covenants of Human Rights.

In our opinion, the study is important for the constitutional doctrine in the matter, for the doctrine of human rights and for the doctrine of international law of human rights, because by this scientific approach, we intend to determine, in a diachronic and selective approach a complex and complete but not exhaustive reflection, of the current sphere regarding non discrimination in the area of study.

For this study, we will mention the following documents of the Charter, which contain regulations on non discrimination, respectively, Universal

[*] Associate scientific researcher, „Acad. Andrei Rădulescu" Research Institute of the Romanian Academy, Associate Professor, PhD at the Faculty of Legal, Political and Adminsitrative Sciences., „Spiru Haret" University, Bucharest (e-mail: nicolaepavel0@yahoo.com)

[1] See, Activités de l'ONU dans le domaine des droits de L'homme, Nations Unies, New York, 1986, pp. 8-10. (author's translation)

Declaration of Human Rights, The International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

The two Covenants in the UN system are called Covenants of Human Rights.

In our opinion, the study is important for the constitutional doctrine in the matter, for the doctrine of human rights and for the doctrine of international law of human rights, because by this scientific approach, we intend to determine, in a diachronic and selective approach a complex and complete but not exhaustive reflection, of the current sphere regarding non discrimination in the area of study.

From the point of view of full but not exhaustive coverage, of the sphere regarding non discrimination, a diachronic and selective approach of the current trends on non discrimination.

Even if the regulation and theorization of non discriminations goes back in time, to the first UN documents and to the first Romanian constitutions, the theoretical interest for resuming it is determined by the fact that in the exiting specialized literature not enough attention has always been given at least to the three aspects, normative, theoretical and jurisprudential regarding the regulation of non discrimination, analyzed in this study.

2. Identifying the constitutional norms on non discrimination in the Romanian Constitutions

In this paragraph, we intend to identify the constitutional norms in the area of the study because, in our opinion, these norms in the Romanian constitutions set the constitutional principles referring to non discrimination, which will be later developed into the laws adopted by the parliament in various fields, where the observance of the constitutional principle of non discrimination is imperative.

2.1. From the systematic analysis of the normative contents of the Developer Status of the Convention of 7/9 August 1858[2] which in our opinion, subject to art. XVII, may be considered a Constitution, contains no provision on non discrimination.

2.2. The systematic analysis of the normative contents of the Romanian Constitution of 1866[3] shows that it sets no criterion of non discrimination.

2.3. The systematic analysis of the normative contents of the Constitution of Romania of 1923[4] shows that this is the first Romanian Constitution which regulates the following criteria of non discrimination, in the contents of art. 5 of Title II entitled On the Rights of the Romanians: "The Romanians, regardless of ethnic origin, of language or of religion, enjoy freedom of conscience, freedom of education, freedom of the press, freedom of meetings, freedom of association and all the liberties and rights set by the laws".

2.4. The systematic analysis of the normative contents of the Constitution of Romania of 1938[5] shows that it regulates the following criteria of non discrimination, in the contents of art. 4, art. 5 and art. 6 of Chapter I, Title II, entitled "On the Debts of the Romanians" having the following contents:

2.4.1. art. 4. "All Romanians, regardless of ethnic origin and religion, are liable to: deem Homeland as the most important ground of their meaning in life, to sacrifice for defending its integrity, independence and dignity; to contribute by their work to its moral ascension and economic growth; to fulfil faithfully public task sunder the laws and willingly contribute to completion of the public tasks, without which being of the State cannot live".

2.4.2. art. 5. "All Romanian citizens, regardless of ethnic origin and religion, are equal before the law, owing respect and obedience. Nobody can deem to be free of his/her civil or military, public or private, duties on the grounds of his/her religious beliefs or of any other kind.

2.4.3. art. 6. "In the Romanian State no distinction of social class is admitted. The privileges in setting the taxes are stopped. Tax decrease or increase cannot be general and established by laws ".

The systematic analysis of the normative contents of the three above-mentioned articles shows the nomination of the following criteria of non discrimination: ethnic origin, religion and social class.

2.5. The systematic analysis of the normative contents of the Constitution of 1948[6] shows that it regulates the following criteria of non discrimination, in the contents of art. 16 of Title III, entitled "Fundamental rights and duties of citizens " having the following phrasing: "All citizens of the People's Republic of Romania, regardless of sex, nationality, race, religion or level of culture, are equal before the law".

The criteria of non discrimination set by the mentioned text are the following: sex, nationality, race, religion or level of culture.

2.6. The systematic analysis of the normative contents of the Constitution of 1952[7] shows that it regulates to following criteria of non discrimination, in the contents of art. 81 Chapter VII, entitled "Fundamental rights and duties of citizens " having the following phrasing:

2.6.1. Art. 81 par. (1): "The working people, citizens of the People's Republic of Romania,

[2] See, Ioan Muraru., Gheorghe Iancu., Constituţiile române (The Romanian Constitutions), Texte (Texts), Note. Prezentare comparativă (A Comparative Presentation), Ed. Actami, Bucharest, 2000, pp. 7-27.
[3] Ibidem, pp. 31 - 80.
[4] Ibidem, pp. 63 - 92.
[5] Ibidem, pp. 95 - 119.
[6] Ibidem, pp. 123 - 139.
[7] Ibidem, pp. 143 - 166.

regardless of nationality or race are assured full equality of rights in all domains of economic, political and cultural life".

2.6.2. Art. 81 par. (2): "Any direct or indirect restriction of the rights of the working people, citizens of the People's Republic of Romania, setting direct or indirect privileges on the gorunds of race or nationality to whom citizens belong, any manifestation of chauvinism, racial hatred, national hatred or nationalist chauvinist propaganda shall be punishable by law".

The criteria of non discrimination set by the mentioned texts are the following: nationality and race.

2.7. The systematic analysis of the normative contents of the Constitution of 1965, as republished[8] shows that it regulates the following criteria of non discrimination, in the contents of art. 17 of Title II, entitled " Fundamental rights and duties of citizens " having the following phrasing:

2.7.1. Art. 17 par. (1): "The citizens of the People's Republic of Romania, regardless of nationality, race, sex or religion, are equal in rights in all domains of economic, political, legal, social and cultural life ".

2.7.2. Art. 17 par. (2): "The State guarantees equality of rights of all citizens. No restriction of such rights and no distinction in exercising such rights on the grounds of nationality, race, sex or religion are allowed".

2.7.3. Art. 17 pr. (3): "Any manifestation with the purpose of establishing such constraints, the nationalist chauvinist propaganda, incitement of race or national hatred, shall be punishable by law".

The criteria of non discrimination set by the mentioned texts are the following: nationality, race, sex, religion.

2.8. The systematic analysis of the normative contents of the Constitution of Romania of 1991[9] shows that it regulates the following criteria of non discrimination, in the contents of art. 4 par. (2) having the marginal phrasing People's unity and equality between citizens, in the contents of Title I, entitled "General principles" having the following phrasing: "Romania is the common and indivisible homeland of all its citizens, regardless of race, nationality, ethnic origin, language, religion, sex, opinion, political affiliation, wealth or social origin".

The criteria of non discrimination set by the above-mentioned text is, in our opinion the most complete and includes all the criteria of non discrimination phrased in the international and European documents in the line of human rights, existing at the time of elaborating the Constitution.

2.9. The systematic analysis of the normative contents of the Constitution of Romania of 2003[10], the republished edition of the Constitution of Romania of 1991, shows that it regulates the same criteria of non discrimination in the contents of the Constitution of Romania in the contents of the Constitution of Romania of 1991, in the contents of art. 4 par. (2) also, having the marginal phrasing People's unity and equality between citizens, in the contents of Title I, entitled "General principles" with the following phrasing: "Romania is the common and indivisible homeland of all its citizens, regardless of race, nationality, ethnic origin, language, religion, sex, opinion, political affiliation, wealth or social origin ".

The criteria of non discrimination set by the above-mentioned text is, in our opinion, the most complete and includes all the criteria of non discrimination phrased in the international and European documents in the line of human rights, existing at the time of the revision of the Constitution.

2.10. The systematic analysis of the normative contents of the Draft Law for the revision of the Constitution of Romania,11 sets forth at point 5 the following: article 4, par. (2) is amended and has the following contents: (2) "Romania is the common and indivisible homeland of all its citizens. Any discrimination based on sex, colour, ethnic or social origin, genetic feature, language, faith or religion, political or any other opinion, belonging to a national minority, wealth, birth, disabilities, age or any other situation is forbidden".

We find that art. 4 par. (2) was rephrased and new criteria of non discrimination were introduced, among which: colour, genetic feature, creed, political opinion or of any other kind,any other situation, which in our opinion will be discussed in the Constituent Assembly.

3. Identifying the norms regarding non discrimination in the International Bill of Human Rights

As mentioned in the introductory part of this study, we will indicate only the following documents of the Bill which include regulations regarding non discrimination, i.e., Universal Declaration of Human Rights, The International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

Romania signed the two covenants on 27 June 1968. These covenants were ratified by the Decree of the State Council nr. 212 of 31 October 1974, as published in the Official Journal nr. 146 of 20 November 1974.

3.1. Identifying the norms regardin non discrimination in the contents of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights[12]

[8] Ibidem, pp. 169 - 198.
[9] See, the Constitution of Romania of 1991, published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, nr. 233 of 21 March 1991.
[10] See, the Constitution of Romania of 2003, published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, nr. 767 of 31 October 2003.
[11] See, The draft law on the revision of the Constitution of Romania (Proiectul de Lege privind revizuirea Constituției României), was published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 100 of 10 February 2014.
[12] Access:http://www.anr.gov.ro/docs/legislatie/internationala/Declaratia_Universala_a_Drepturilor_Omului.pdf

The systematic analysis of the normative contents of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights shows that it regulates the following criteria of non discrimination, in the contents of art. 2 par. (1), with the following phrasing: "Every human may avail himself/herself of all the rights and liberties proclaimed in this declaration with no distinction whatsoever, such as the distinction of race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or any other opinion, national or social origin, wealth, birth or any other circumstances. Moreover, no distinction is made for political, legal or international status of the country or territory to which the person belongs, either this country or territory is independent, under guardianship, non autonomous or subject to any other limitation of sovereignty".

The criteria on non discrimination set forth by the mentioned text are the following: race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or any other opinion, of national or social origin, wealth, birth or any other circumstances.

3.2. Identifying the norms regardin non discrimination in the normative contents of the International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights [13]

The systematic analysis of the normative contents of the International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights shows that it regulates the following criteria of non discrimination, in the contents of art. 2 par. (1), under the following phrasing: "The State Parties to this covenant hereby undertake to observe and guarantee to all individuals who are on their territory and the rights recognized by this covenant are within their competence, without any distinction, in particular of race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or any other opinion, of national or social origin, wealth, birth or based on any other circumstance ".

The criteria of non discrimination set by the mentioned text are the following: race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or any other opinion, of national or social origin, wealth, birth or based on any other circumstance.

3.2. Identifying the norms regardin non discrimination in the normative contents of the International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights [14]

The systematic analysis of the normative contents of the International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights shows that it regulates the following criteria of non discrimination, in the contents of art. 2 par. (1), under the following phrasing: "The State Parties to this covenant hereby undertake to observe and guarantee to all individuals who are on their territory and the rights recognized by this covenant are within their competence, without any distinction, in particular of race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or any other opinion, of national or social origin, wealth, birth or based on any other circumstance ".

The criteria of non discrimination set by the mentioned text are the following: race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or any other opinion, of national or social origin, wealth, birth or based on any other circumstance.

3.3. Identifying the norms regardin non discrimination in the normative contents of the International Covenant of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights [15]

The systematic analysis of the normative contents of the International Covenant of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights shows that it regulates the following criteria of non discrimination, in the contents of art. 2 par. (2), under the following phrasing: "The State Parties to this covenant hereby undertake to guarantee that the rights set forth in therein shall be exercised without any distinction, in particular of race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or any other opinion, of national or social origin, wealth, birth or any other circumstance ".

The criteria of non discrimination set forth by the above-mentioned text are the following: race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or any other opinion, of national or social origin, wealth, birth or any other circumstance.

4. Romanian doctrinal landmarx on non discrimination.

Even from the debut of subparagraph it is imperative to specify that the study of the bibliography in the line of constitutional law shows that insufficient attention was paid to the theorization of the principle of non discrimination.

4.1. A first opinion[16] mentioned for this study refers to the concept of non discrimination.

The author makes the following remarks on the concept of non discrimination:

1. Due to the close relationship between equality and non discrimination, practically there is no equality in pure form and non discrimination in pure form. We are considering here the specifications made by the working group which elaborated the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and according to which „art. 2 sets forth the fundamental principle of equality and non discrimination".

In the case of strict equality, equality is identified with non discrimination, but in the case of relative equality not any discrimination is an inequality and vice versa, not any inequality is discrimination.

2. Once identified the non discrimination as a constitutional value which guarantees the citizens equality before the law and public authorities it

[13] Access: http://www.cdep.ro/pls/legis/legis_pck.htp_act_text?idt=63815
[14] Access: http://www.cdep.ro/pls/legis/legis_pck.htp_act_text?idt=63815
[15] Ibidem.
[16] See, Nicolae Pavel, Egalitatea în drepturi a cetățenilor și nediscriminarea (Equality of rights of citizens and non discrimination), Ed. Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2010, pp. 251-255.

results that its breach may be petitioned both before the courts, directly, and the normative act has an inferior legal force to the law,as well as under the form of exception of unconstitutionality, before the Constitutional Court, when forbidden or arbitrary discrimination is included in the law.

3. Non discrimination represents also an additional guaranteed under the form of prohibition of arbitrary discriminations, which is binding both for the legislator and for public administration. Thus, it is up to the Constitutional Court to investigate and find the arbitrary discriminations.
4. The constitutional text itself contains discriminations which are prohibited and discriminations that should be considered in the law-making process. The jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court shows that the text of art. 16 is sufficient for the relative variant of the principle of equality.

4.2. The second opinion[17] mentioned for this study refers to the concept of non discrimination.

The author makes the following remarks referring to the concept of non discrimination:

1. There is only one reference in Romanian doctrine to this issue, where it is mentioned that „concerning the constitutional principle of equality, it may take two forms: either a principle of non discrimination or the requirement of relative equality, of treatment".
2. Art. 4 par. (2) of the Constitution sets the criteria of non discrimination, thus guaranteeing a strict equality between citizens. In this respect, certain authors say that, „the principle of non discrimination appears as an improved form and, certainly, more realistic of the principle of equality"
3. In Romanian legal literature there is only one doctrinal reference where non discrimination is considered as a limit of the constitutional principle of equality. „We either consider it under the form of an objective principle as of right, or we analyse it in the context of fundamental rights, the constitutional principle of equality is not absolute. It has limits which give him a particular configuration."

5. Jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court on non discrimination. (Selective aspects)

5.1. The Decision of the Constitutional Court nr. 408/2016 regarding exception of unconstitutionality of the provisions of art. 850 par. (2) Code of civil procedure, as republished in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, nr. 683 of 2 September 2016.

The Constitutional Court was notified by the Chişineu-Criş County Court of the exception of unconstitutionality of the provisions of art. 850 par. (2) Code of civil procedure, an exception raised by the company Cosmo-Rom - S.R.L. of Socodor, Arad county, in a matter having as object the settlement of an appeal against enforcement requesting the cancellation of the adjudication act, of the minutes of the real estate public auction and continued prosecution from the cancelled act.

As for the criticism of unconstitutionality phrased in the relation with art. 16 of the Constitution, referring to the equality before the law, the Court finds that the criticized legal texts bring no prejudice to this constitutional principle, as they apply to all in the situation provided by the hypothesis of the legal norm, with no discrimination on arbitrary grounds, while any of the chirographic creditors may deposit their debt in the account of the price.

The Constitutional Court dismisses as unfounded the exception of unconstitutionality raised by the company Societatea Cosmo-Rom - S.R.L. of Socodor, Arad county, in the Case file no. 368/210/2015 of Chişineu-Criş County Court and finds that the provisions of art. 850 par. (2) Code of civil procedure are constitutional in relation with the criticism.

5.2. Decision of the Constitutional Court no. 47/1994 regarding the constitutionality of certain provisions of Law on war veterans, as well as certain rights of the disabled and war widows on the unconstitutionality of the specification "if they did not fight against the Romanian army" in art. 2 (b) of Law on war veterans, as well as certain rights of the disabled and war widows ", as published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, no. 139 of 2 June 1994.

The Constitutional Court was notified on 7 April 1994, by 55 deputies on the unconstitutionality of the specification "if they did not fight against the Romanian army "in art. 2 (b) of Law on the war veterans, as well as certain rights of the disabled and war widows".

Art. 4 par. (2) of the Constitution is less frequently met in the jurisprudence of the Court due to the fact that its intervention is actually not necessary.

But the Constitutional Court cannot pronounce on the proposals of amending the law, its review jurisdiction being determined exclusively by the notifications received under art. 144 (a) of the Romanian Constitution.

Finally, the Court decides the following:

1. Article 2 (b) of the Law on war veterans, as well as certain rights of the disabled and war widows, referring to those who were necessarily conscripted or called up, in unconstitutional concerning the condition " if they did not fight against the Romanian army ".
2. Article 2 (a) and (c), as well as article 7 (b) thesis 1 of the law are unconstitutional concerning the definition of the capacity of war veterans. During the review procedure, their correlation is required to assure the observance of the principle of equality of rights of citizens.

[17] See, Simina Elena Tănăsescu, Principiul egalității în dreptul românesc (Principle of equality in Romanian law), Ed. ALL BECK, Bucharest, 1999, pp. 28-29, 30.

6. Conclusions

Considering the above-described, we point out the following ideas:

6.1. The aim of the study referring to Reflections on the regulation of non discrimination in the Constitutions of Romania and in the International Bill of Human Rights - Selective aspects was in our opinion achieved.

6.2. In our opinion, the analyzed domain is important for the constitutional doctrine in the matter, for the doctrine of human rights and for the doctrine of the UN activities in the domain of human rights.

6.3. The regulations on non discrimination in the Romanian constitutional system and in the International Bill of Human Rights were successively identified.

6.4. The four parts of the study may be considered a contribution to the extension of research in the matter of non discrimination, in accordance with the current trend.

6.5. Moreover, we specify that the above study opens a complex and complete view, but not exhaustive, in the analyzed domain.

6.6. The key-scheme proposed, considering the selective approach of the identification of non discrimination may be multiplied and extended for other studies in the matter.

References

- Activités de l'ONU dans le domaine des droits de L'homme, Nations Unies, New York, 1986, pp. 8-10
- Ioan Muraru., Gheorghe Iancu., Constituţiile române Texte, Note. Prezentare comparativă . Ed. Actami,, Bucureşti, 2000, pp. 7-251
- Constituția României din anul 1991, a fost publicată în Monitorul Oficial al României, Partea I, nr. 233, din 21 noiembrie 1991
- Constituția României din anul 2003, a fost publicată în Monitorul Oficial al României, Partea I, nr. 767, din 31 octombrie 2003
  Proiectul de Lege privind revizuirea Constituției României,, a fost publicat în Monitorul Oficial, Partea I, nr.100 din 10. 02. 2014. Accesați site-ul:http://www.anr.gov.ro/docs/legislatie/internationala/Declaratia_Universala_a_ Drepturilor_ Omului.pdf Accesați site-ul: http://www.cdep.ro/pls/legis/legis_pck.htp_act_text?idt=63815 Accesați site-ul: http://www.cdep.ro/pls/legis/legis_pck.htp_act_text?idt=63815
- Nicolae Pavel, Egalitatea în drepturi a cetățenilor și nediscriminarea,. Ed. Universul Juridic, București, 2010, pp. 251-255
- Simina Elena Tănăsescu, Principiul egalității în dreptul românesc, Ed. ALL BECK, București, 1999, pp. 28-29, 30.
- Decizia Curţii Constituţionale nr. 711/2016 referitoare la excepţia de neconstituţionalitate a dispoziţiilor art. XVIII alin. (2) Teza a treia din Legea nr. 2/2013 privind unele măsuri pentru degrevarea instanţelor judecătoreşti, precum şi pentru pregătirea punerii în aplicare a Legii nr. 134/2010 privind Codul de procedură civilă publicată în Monitorul Oficial al României, Partea I, nr. 50 din 25 februarie 1994, a fost publicată în Monitorul Oficial al României, Partea I, nr. 166 din 7 martie 2017
- Decizia Curţii Constituţionale nr. 47/1994 cu privire la constituţionalitatea unor prevederi din Legea privind veteranii de eăzboi, precum şi unele drepturi ale invalizilor şi văduveloe de război, a fost publicată în Monitorul Oficial al României, Partea I, nr. 139 din 2 iunie 1994

THE IMPAIRMENT of CITIZEN'S RIGHT TO INFORMATION BY "FAKE NEWS" PUBLICATION

Alina V. POPESCU*

Abstract

In the context of an international society ever-evolving in the rapid development of information technology, there is a need to obtain information in a shorter time, which sometimes can lead to data being taken as real, without further verifying their trustworthiness.

The citizen's right to information, a fundamental one, indissolubly bound to the existence of a democratic society, has been applied in both international documents and the fundamental law. In order for the citizen to be able to make informed decisions and to participate to social life, they need information from various social fields. The need for information has become more and more acute as the surplus of information on the market has become increasingly obvious.

In this social context, the temptation of manipulating information, and more seriously that of breaking false news into the media market, which in the speed of everyday life, the citizen no longer has the time or the patience to check, appears more and more. The development of false information is facilitated by social media, by its barrier-free movement in the context of the information society.

From the point of view of the study, I intend to analyse the manner in which information manipulation and the so-called "fake news" impair the right to information, undermine democracy and which the limits, in this case, of freedom of expression, are or should be.

Keywords: right to information, freedom of expression, information, democracy, manipulation, fake news.

1. General Considerations

The topic of fake news has been approached quite recently, so I shall mostly focus on journalistic resources rather than academic ones, and I shall try to harmonise the information with studies on the right to information and freedom of expression.

It is an already recognized truth that a social individual needs information and clarification; they need information from the most diverse fields and, of course, when information is not provided by institutions or business environments, one looks for information from other sources. The development of information technology has allowed individuals to get information from multiple sources, but scientific literature has insisted that the state must be the one to provide the information a citizen needs. Thus, "European citizens must be better informed (a task for which the Union itself must find means and methods, in case the media should be unable or unwilling to provide accurate and comprehensive information)"[1].

The media has an overwhelming influence on society, on democracy or the lack thereof, depending on the government system. Its primary role is to provide information to the social community, to generate progress. In this context, one should also consider the fact that, under the current conditions, information becomes quickly degraded, we can even talk of the moral wear of information in the media ("information in a newspaper gets old quicker than information in a scientific paper"). The attention of professionals is needed here, so as not to provide information which is no longer actual and may create confusion in a society. In 1688, Jean de La Bruyère used to say: "A journalist goes to sleep thinking of a news that becomes old during the night, and he has to give it up in the morning as he wakes up[2]".

However, what happens when the citizens' trust in official information decreases? Analysing the Edelman trust barometers[3], we shall notice that the population's trust in governments, the business environment, the media and even NGOs has decreased in the latest years, depending on the social and

* PhD Candidate, The Bucharest University of Economic Studies (e-mail: avpalina_16@yahoo.com).

[1] Koeck H.F. – "Der gegenwärtige Stand des Verfassungsprozesses der Europäischen Union", communication at the conference"Prezent și perspective ale statului și dreptului în contextul integrării europene", 10-12 November 2006, Faculty of Law and Administrative Sciences, University of Craiova. Prof. PhD Dr. h. c. Heribert Franz Koeck is a professor of international public law and European law, Dr. Iur. (Vienna), M.C.L. (Ann Arbor), honorific professor of Pontificia Accademia Ecclesiastica (Rome), a corresponding member of Academia de Ciencias Morales y Políticas (Madrid), the Dean of the Faculty of Law of the Johannes Kepler University of Linz, Austria. http://drept.ucv.ro/RSJ/images/articole/2008/RSJ1/02Koeck.pdf

[2] Bârliba C. – "Informație și competență", Editura Științifică și Enciclopedică, Bucharest, 1986, p. 21

[3] Edelman TRUST BAROMETER ™ is the company's annual survey on trust and reliability, now in its 17th year. What has begun as a survey on 1300 persons in five countries, in 2001, has become a genuine measurement of trust in the entire world. The trust barometer is produced by the integrated division of research, analysis and measurement, Edelman Intelligence. https://www.edelman.com/insights/intellectual-property/edelman-trust-barometer-archive/

Edelman is a world leader in communication marketing, collaborating with many of the largest companies and emerging organisations in the world, helping them develop, promote and protect their brands and reputation. https://www.edelman.com/economic periods concerned, followed by small increases, after the economic and financial crises of the last years.

The conclusion of the Edelman Trust Barometer, in 2014, was that "global trust in the media goes back to the 2010 levels; almost 80% of the countries report a lower trust on average, in the last year".[4] The population's rate of distrust in the government, business institutions, media and NGOs has kept on decreasing in 2015 as well. The average of distrust in these institutions, in 2014, was 33% of the surveyed persons and 48% in 2015.[5] Thus, distrust in the media is found in 60% of the states, with the results being approximately equal to 2014.

As for information sources, the Edelman Barometer of 2015 outlined an increased trust of population in online sources, compared to newspapers and television. The growing trend of trust in online sources is maintained on all three analysed levels: the first source of information on general information, the first source of information on breaking news and the most frequently used source to confirm/validate information.

In 2016, the Edelman Barometer[6] emphasizes a slight increase in the population's trust in the government, business institutions, the media and non-governmental organisations, and online information sources still occupy the first position in the population's preferences. "A change in the media landscape" is seen during 2012-2016, i.e. an increased trust in online information sources (search engines +3%, social media +7%, "only online" publications +5%).

The 2017 Edelman Trust Barometer[7] shows a slightly decreasing trend in the population's trust in the government, business institutions, the media and NGOs, compared to the previous years, with the media having the highest decrease, i.e. 5% (governments and the business environment -1%, NGOs -2%). Distrust in the media is seen in 82% of the analysed countries, and in 17 countries distrust reaches an all-time low, while the trust is lower than 48% in most countries.

The barometer shows that traditional media has the highest decline, -5%, and online information sources are increasing: search engines +3%, "only online" publications +5%. Social media, with -3%, is a surprise regarding the decrease of trust, compared to 2016. Another conclusion of the barometer was that official information sources are thought to be less reliable than information received from reliable persons (family, friends, etc.) and the so-called "information from sources" is thought to be more reliable than official press releases/press statements.

The 2018 barometer[8], suggestively titled "The Battle for Truth", shows a crisis of trust at the global level, emphasizing that almost 7 out of 10 interviewed persons are worried about the use of fake news as "weapons".

Such social behaviour has been emphasizes especially in terms of sources of information, so as to understand why propaganda, manipulation and the so-called fake news have managed to catch the audience's attention.

In my opinion, an explanation would be that today's social individuals urgently need information, as quickly as possible, and they are unwilling or even unable to check the information they receive. People have certain predefined sources of information, as shown by Edelman barometers, which they trust, and if information comes from sources they personally consider to be reliable, the more reliable the information becomes.

From a social and human point of view, each individual processes the information they have access to from the perspective of their education, their cultural level, as well as their individualism (filtering information according to their needs and beliefs).

There is a saying that "the tone makes the music". Adapting the idea to the communication of information in the public space, we may notice that, sometimes, "a discourse may incite and convince just for its style and its intelligent structure, not because it would contain truth"[9].

2. Alteration of Information: Censorship, Manipulation and Propaganda

Public perception, which has resulted in a decreased trust of citizens in the media, is that the role of media has transformed, from an objective communication channel, to a channel for conveying information to the benefit of groups of interest.

Altered, shrunk, falsified information from various points of view appears in the public space more and more often. The forms of "processing" information are various: censorship, manipulation, propaganda, disinformation, full falsification.

Information is mainly censored by suppressing some means of communication, by taking control of them and by affecting the essence and form of information, as desired by the censor. Censorship is a

[4] 2014 Edelman Trust Barometer global results, http://www.slideshare.net/EdelmanInsights/2014-edelman-trust-barometer?qid=0682cc6b-2798-43d4-a9ca-fb0302ae0925&v=&b=&from_search=1

[5] 2015 Edelman Trust Barometer global results, http://www.slideshare.net/EdelmanInsights/2015-edelman-trust-barometer-global-results?qid=abe04a31-1394-4f4c-9b0b-d1afaa10b0b0&v=&b=&from_search=1

[6] 2016 Edelman Trust Barometer global results, http://www.slideshare.net/EdelmanInsights/2016-edelman-trust-barometer-global-results?qid=e3fcac3f-5c18-4d41-ae6b-6d24628262c2&v=&b=&from_search=1

[7] 2017 Edelman Trust Barometer global results, http://www.slideshare.net/EdelmanInsights/2017-edelman-trust-barometer-global-results-71035413

[8] 2018 Edelman Trust Barometer global results, http://cms.edelman.com/sites/default/files/2018-02/2018_Edelman_Trust_Barometer_Global_Report_FEB.pdf

[9] Koeck H.F. – op. cit.

form of limiting the right to information and freedom of expression, if applied by authorities, in order to preserve power. However, we may talk of some forms of censorship, not in the bad meaning, but in the sense of protecting the freedoms and rights of other people (an example would be the adoption, by the National Council of Audiovisual, of certain sanctions when the information provided to the public infringes prohibitive rules, such as information of no interest to the public, information affecting private life, etc.).

As for manipulation, it is considered that it actually does not matter what you say, but who you are targeting[10]. We are not discussing the distinction between political and economic manipulation, but the fact that the distortion of genuine information comes to influence the citizen's freedom to make the right decisions, in any field of his life. I consider that the multiple possibilities to disseminate information, which are used today, may result in the spreading of such information, even when it is not fully compliant with the truth. Online content manipulation is harder to detect and fight, which is why it affects more free debate and the access to accurate information, in an environment that is by excellence thought of as free.

In the early days of the press, when the coverage was not so large as now, manipulation occurred, with a focus on political issues, as the journalists or the managers of the concerned publication presented their own views. The evolution of the so-called "penny press" in the 1830s[11] resulted in a wider coverage, in a higher number of readers, as well as a repositioning in terms of editorial content, moving to the sensational area, which led to a different kind of distortion of information.

Propaganda as a form to influence information has a dual situation, like censorship. Propaganda in a positive sense and propaganda in a pejorative sense. Rémy Rieffel[12] outlines that, when it appeared, the term "propaganda" has "no pejorative connotations" (it only meant promoting religious ideas); however, at the beginning of the 20th century, it acquired negative connotations ("the action of convincing public opinion, by using all available means of persuasion"). In Rieffel's opinion[13], persuasion has "stronger" valences (political persuasion, whereby authorities want to maintain the advantage of power and disseminate the ideologies they propagate) and "milder" forms (sociological propaganda, "the complex of procedures by which a certain lifestyle and certain specific values are spread in a society").

As for the falsification of information, the journalist David Uberti[14] speaks of what he names one of the "most memorable fakes in American history", i.e. the fact that, in 1835, the New York Sun published a six-part series titled "Great Astronomical Discoveries Lately Made", talking of the alleged discovery of life on the Moon ("Moon Story"). Of course, the article did not include genuine information, but they cashed in that penny from the readers, drawing upon the target public's thirst for sensation. Though several journalists and writers subsequently criticized the false content of articles regarding the "Moon story" public reaction was not very strong, probably given the lack of actual information.

Other false information was published by the New York Herald in 1874, regarding the fact that animals in the Central Park Zoo had gone free in the streets of Manhattan, resulting in damages and victims. The article was accompanied by a footnote stating "The story above is pure invention. Not a single word is true". However, many readers may not have noticed it.

We can notice that these examples of fake stories were disseminated by publications with great success among the audience, and the following question comes naturally: "what makes journalists publish fake news?" I consider that one of the reasons is the quest for sensation, for publicity or audience. Especially nowadays, paid advertisements/publicity have significant influence on content, and the media is conditioned by audience (radio/tv), by views, shares or likes (online). Financial influence on the disseminated information is strongly seen here.

Another reason I see is the delivery of editorial policies following the wishes of the financer of the source of news or editorial coordinators. Thus, the Romanian public area[15] has lately witnessed statements from political people who admitted to having financed certain press trusts or publications, so that they might control the published information[16].

Several assumptions come to mind here as well: only information favourable to the financer is published (it is genuine, but it has the potential to manipulate public opinion), actual information on the financer, which is not favourable, is not published (a form of censorship, likely to limit the citizen's right to information, especially when talking about information on decision makers), the information is fake, but it refers to competitors of the finances (completely fake news, disinforming public opinion and damaging a competitor), actual information on a competitor, not favourable to the latter, which is persistently

[10] "In manipulation it almost never counts what you say, but, rather how you say it". Noam Chomsky, American linguist and professor.

[11] Cohen A.R. – "Relatarea obiectivă în media, între religie şi panaceu", Journal Jurnalism şi comunicare, issue 3/2003, p. 3.

[12] Rieffel R. – "Sociologia mass media", Editura Polirom, Iaşi, 2008, p. 62

[13] Rieffel R. – op. cit., p. 59-60

[14] Uberti D. – "The real history of fake news", Columbia Journalism Review, https://www.cjr.org/special_report/fake_news_history.php?link

[15] Roșca Stănescu R. – "Ziariști cumpărați la bucată. Sau în vrac / ANALIZĂ", https://www.stiripesurse.ro/ziari-ti-cumpara-i-la-bucata-sau-in-vrac-analiza_1241106.html

[16] Hendrik A. – "Elena Udrea: Există situaţii în care UNII jurnalişti au fost PLĂTIŢI în campaniile electorale", http://evz.ro/elena-udrea-jurnalisti-platiti.html

disseminated (so as to create an impression of guilt of the competitor among public opinion), etc.

Another cause determining the publication of fake news is manipulation at a high, state, international level, with the international press focusing on the fake news disseminated in the United States during the 2016 electoral campaign, the ones on the Crimean War, as well as older ones, on the political situations in Cuba or Venezuela. Studies undertaken by Freedom House[17] have outlined an alarming increase in the number of governments manipulating their citizens by means of online information sources.

The 2017 Freedom House report on online freedom, "Manipulating Social Media to Undermine Democracy"[18], outlines how governments manipulate information shared on the social media and how disturbances in the supply of internet services increase. Even when the online environment has remained generally free, information has been altered by fake news, manipulation, propaganda, the use of technical algorithms to increase the visibility of the concerned content, aggressive harassment of journalists, etc. (the example of the US was provided). Thus, the report identified five other trends which are considered to have had a significant contribution to the global decline of internet freedom in the last year: state censorship regarding mobile connectivity; restrictions on live videos applied by several governments; an increased number of technical attacks on news networks, the opposition and rights defenders; new restrictions on virtual private networks (VPN) and the concerning increase of physical attacks on internet users and online journalists.

The authors of the report state that: "Successfully countering content manipulation and restoring trust in social media—without undermining internet and media freedom—will take time, resources, and creativity. The first steps in this effort should include public education aimed at teaching citizens how to detect fake or misleading news and commentary."

As for freedom press, the 2017 Freedom House report – "Press Freedom's Dark Horizon"[19]shows that press freedom deteriorated to its lowest point in 13 years in 2016, not only in states with authoritarian regimes, but also in countries with a long-standing recognized democracy. State leaders attacked media reliability in certain countries, and telecommunication services failed in certain states at times of political or social turmoils. The authors of the report state that there is a grim outlook for the future, since, as shown in the content, also in major democracies where such intrusions had not been witnessed before, one can see an interference with freedom of expression (in various ways: delegitimizing sources of information, editorial pressure, selling or even closing hostile publications, etc.).

In the words of Dan Swislow[20], "online repression tactics (...) erode democratic dialogue". I would add that all these methods to alter information endanger institutional transparency and good governance, the role of civil society and human rights in particular.

3. Fake news

This term is more and more frequently used in the public setting and more and more people express their concern on how fake news affect social life.

The American journalist Brooke Borel[21] considers that "(...) fake news is worrying media folks Stories meant to intentionally mislead are an affront to journalism, which is supposed to rely on facts, reality and trust."

At a social and human level, communication today takes place "in real time"[22], and information has become actual or contemporary in the information society. The evolution of limitless online communication is an important step for society, as a "new space" is practically discovered. The current environment of information society needs uninterrupted flows of information, highly quick exchange of information, with the key words of current communication being: "immediate, instantaneous and interactive" [23]. Interactivity implies an exchange of information between individuals, as all are part of the communication society, with no exception. Social experience results to an ever quicker, immediate change, and an individual needs new information, faster and faster, to be able to adapt to such changes.

Some[24] argue that the internet is the means to transmit information that suppresses all other means. In my opinion, sending information online only helps increase the speed of information. Other means to disseminate information are still used, but their share is decreasing, given the social need to obtain information in "real time". However, this "real time" does not leave enough time to check the accuracy of the data we are provided.

We can notice that, in the online environment especially, the most important source of information (as [17] On Freedom House, https://freedomhouse.org/about-us. Romania was not included in the Freedom House research.

[18] Manipulating Social Media to Undermine Democracy, November 2017, https://freedomhouse.org/report/freedom-net/freedom-net-2017#

[19] Press Freedom's Dark Horizon, April 2017, https://freedomhouse.org/report/freedom-press/freedom-press-2017#

[20] Swislow D.– "The distributed denial of democracy. Coming together to address anti-democratic trolling and disinformation online", https://medium.com/@dswis/the-distributed-denial-of-democracy-23ce8a3ad3d8

[21] Borel B. – "Fact-Checking Won't Save Us From Fake News", https://fivethirtyeight.com/features/fact-checking-wont-save-us-from-fake-news/

[22] Bourque B. – "Temps et communication: trois moments historiques. Mémoire présenté comme exigence partielle de la maîtrise en communication.", Université du Québec à Montréal, January 2009. Le «temps réel», p. 2

[23] Bourque B. – op. cit., p. 78-79

[24] Bourque B. – op. cit., p. 78

shown by surveys), there is an amalgamation of information, with actual one being combined with fake one, so that a distinction is rendered more and more difficult. The source of information is more difficult to identify in the online environment, and the temptation to share information (apparently interesting or attractive, at a first sight) to one's virtual friends is high. The recipients, in turn, tend to believe that the information is real, since it has been provided by a reliable person.

In his 2016 article, David Uberti shows the risk of amplifying the "fake news" phenomenon for freedom of expression. He proposes that more accurate terms should be used: "disinformation, mislead, lie", considering that the generic term "fake news" discredits the entire press as a whole, which is a danger for a citizen's right to information. The author tries to show that, along the times, unreal information has appeared in prestigious publications, so that blaming the online environment nowadays only generates a dispute for the power to generate and disseminate news, a fight that, as shown before, has already been lost by the traditional media in the content of IT development.

Claire Wardle[25] also claims that the term "fake news" is "unhelpful", as no substitute term has been found. The journalist also states that the content of information, the motivation of people creating such information and the means to disseminate "fake news" must be subject to analysis. The author suggests a definition of information that may be included in the analysed category, i.e.:

1. "satire or parody (no intention to cause harm but has potential to fool);
2. false connection (when headlines, visuals or captions don't support the content);
3. misleading content (misleading use of information to frame an issue or individual);
4. false context (when genuine content is shared with false contextual information);
5. imposter content (when genuine sources are impersonated);
6. manipulated content (when genuine information or imagery is manipulated to deceive);
7. fabricated content (new content is nearly entirely false, designed to deceive and do harm)."

Analysing the typologies and hierarchy identified by Wade, we find that all previously mentioned forms of altering information may be included in the fake news category. We are fighting a genuine "information war", and causes generating fake news are multiple. In Wardle's opinion, these are: poor journalism, to parody, to provoke, passion, partisanship, profit, political influence or power and propaganda.

I consider that Wardle accurately states the causes of propagation of fake news, which affect the citizen's right to information. All identified reasons affect the integrity of information to a lesser or higher extent, so that the beneficiary no longer is certain of making informed decisions; s/he makes such decisions based on the information s/he receives which, hence, may not be fully accurate.

Authorities should be involved to prevent the spreading of fake news; such involvement could be shown with greater transparency, a better information on the adopted measures (be it the government, be it the legislative process) and the adoption of measures to regulate the virtual environment. Of course, regulating an area recognized as dedicated to the free circulation of information may result in controversy regarding the restricted right to information and freedom of expression.

Germany may be an example on the adoption of legislative measures. A draft law for improving law enforcement in social media was proposed in the spring of 2017. Criticisms to its content appeared in the public area presently, but the law[26] passed on September 1, 2017 and came into force on October 1, 2017. Its provisions mostly regard social media networks, as well as platforms for individual communication or specific content distribution. The provider of a social network is exempt from the obligations stipulated in this legislative act if the social network has less than two million registered users in Germany. The illegal content targeted by the text of the law is represented by facts sanctioned according to the German Criminal Code, which are not justified. The law stipulates some reporting requirements for providers, regarding complaints for illegal content, as well as the obligation to adopt an efficient and transparent procedure to manage such claims.

Italy has also passed measures against fake news, administrative action[27], as the police created a website where citizens may report information that seem to be fake, which shall be checked by specialised police officers. If the information is proved to be fake, this shall be publicly informed, and in case the information is denigrating in a criminal sense, the court will be notified.

The French President, Emanuel Macron[28] takes into consideration amending French legislation so that more transparency is requested from online platforms.

The European Commission [29] also is concerned to fight such fake news, as a High Level Group (HLG)[30] to advise on policy initiatives to counter fake news and the spread of disinformation online, including 39 experts, academics, media organisations, journalists, social media platforms, as well as civil society

[25] Wardle C. – "Fake news. It's complicated", https://firstdraftnews.com/fake-news-complicated/

[26] Gesetz zur Verbesserung der Rechtsdurchsetzung in sozialen Netzwerken (Netzwerkdurchsetzungsgesetz – NetzDG), https://www.bmjv.de/SharedDocs/Gesetzgebungsverfahren/Dokumente/BGBl_NetzDG.pdf?__blob=publicationFile&v=2

[27] http://www.poliziadistato.it/articolo/155a6077fdb05e3865595940

[28] https://www.agerpres.ro/politica-externa/2018/01/04/emmanuel-macron-anunta-o-lege-impotriva-fake-news--30782

[29] https://ec.europa.eu/digital-single-market/en/fake-news

[30] https://ec.europa.eu/digital-single-market/en/news/commission-appoints-members-high-level-expert-group-fake-news-and-online-disinformation representatives, was set up on January 15, 2018. Mariya Gabriel, European Commissioner for Digital Economy and Society, considers that "a European approach" is needed to the fake news phenomenon, with a public consultation being organized on such aspects. A conference was to be held with all stakeholders, with a view to establishing course of action and effectively protecting European citizens.

Conclusions

Information provided to citizens must be genuine, provided in due time, and drawn up in good faith. Hans Hellmut Kirst[31] states that the "so-called truth is a constantly moving swing - what matters is the moment when you sit on it". Of course, as shown in the first part, every individual filters the received information through his/her own mind, and s/he understands it according to his/her level of knowledge and understanding. However, it is essential for a citizen to be provided with diverse and reliable information, so that it may help him/her and so that s/he may choose.

Rieffel defines manipulation as "an organized lie, depriving the audience from freedom and an instrument to defeat its resistance"[32]. We may conclude that the citizen's right to information is affected by any of the techniques of altering information that were exposed above.

The professional deontology of those who disseminate information in the public space (journalists), as well as the self-censorship of non-professionals (bloggers, influencers), are very important. In the first case, of the professional, traditional or "only online" media, one should go back to the recognized values of the profession, to its primary role, to accurately inform public opinion. In the second case, of persons distributing online informative content, self-censorship is important when they have no guarantee that the information they spread is genuine.

The truth always comes out, but what do we do, as a society, when fake news only satisfy the thirst for sensation, for panic, for denigrating people, etc.? In this case, I would support the idea that "a fake news maker may be a social hazard".[33]

As shown by Borel[34] in his article, "fact-checking is key to journalism — it's a skill and a service that's instrumental in providing the information to the public".

The contribution of each of us to stopping fake news, by refusing to reproduce and possibly share information, with no minimum checking, is important. Our right to information can only be defended by engaging everyone, by refusing to propagate information whose accuracy is not guaranteed. A reader should have the same degree of attention in the online and in the actual environment, and s/he should manage clicks responsibly, as they legitimze information.

Authorities also play an important part, which is, in my opinion, a guarantee of the right to information, i.e. to communicate publicly, in a transparent manner, to clarify their decisions for citizens, so as to discourage the publication and dissemination of fake news. The state's regulatory role should be carefully analysed, since such measures could limit freedom of expression and, as in the case of any other right, a balance must be struck between guarantees and limitations.

Moreover, companies specialising in information technology should show some concern to identify new ways of recognizing fake accounts that disseminate fake news and affect the information environment.

Journalism professionals should re-focus on information, leave entertainment aside, accurately check news and try to recover the trust of information recipients, by reducing partisanship. For a good information of citizens, especially regarding public issues, information should aim at an objective presentation of facts, not public or political persons.

References

- Bârliba C. – "Informaţie şi competenţă", Editura Ştiinţifică şi Enciclopedică, Bucharest, 1986
- Kirst H.H. – "Preţul succesului", Editura Univers, Bucharest, 1976
- Rieffel R.– "Sociologia mass media", Editura Polirom, Iaşi, 2008
- Bourque B. – "Temps et communication: trois moments historiques. Mémoire présenté comme exigence partielle de la maîtrise en communication.", Université du Québec à Montréal, January 2009.
- Cohen A.R.– "Relatarea obiectivă în media, între religie şi panaceu", Journal Jurnalism şi comunicare, issue 3/2003
- Koeck H.F. – "Der gegenwärtige Stand des Verfassungsprozesses der Europäischen Union", communication at the conference"Prezent şi perspective ale statului şi dreptului în contextul integrării europene", 10-12 November 2006, Faculty of Law and Administrative Sciences, University of Craiova. http://drept.ucv.ro/RSJ/images/articole/2008/RSJ1/02Koeck.pdf
- Borel B. – "Fact-Checking Won't Save Us From Fake News", https://fivethirtyeight.com/features/fact-checking-wont-save-us-from-fake-news/
- Hendrik A. – "Elena Udrea: Există situaţii în care UNII jurnalişti au fost PLĂTIŢI în campaniile electorale", http://evz.ro/elena-udrea-jurnalisti-platiti.html

[31] Kirst H.H. "Preţul succesului", Editura Univers, Bucharest, 1976, p. 5
[32] Rieffel R.– op. cit., p. 60, quoting Philippe Breton – "Manipularea cuvântului", Editura Institutul European, Iaşi, 2006
[33] Bârliba C. – "Informaţie şi competenţă", Editura Ştiinţifică şi Enciclopedică, Bucharest, 1986, p. 98 – quoting La Bruyère
[34] Brooke Borel – idem.

- Roșca Stănescu S. – "Ziariști cumpărați la bucată. Sau în vrac / ANALIZĂ", https://www.stiripesurse.ro/ziari-ti-cumpara-i-la-bucata-sau-in-vrac-analiza_1241106.html
- Swislow D. – "The distributed denial of democracy. Coming together to address anti-democratic trolling and disinformation online", https://medium.com/@dswis/the-distributed-denial-of-democracy-23ce8a3ad3d8
- Uberti D. – "The real history of fake news", Columbia Journalism Review, https://www.cjr.org/special_report/fake_news_history.php?link
- Wardle C. – "Fake news. It's complicated", https://firstdraftnews.com/fake-news-complicated/
- Manipulating Social Media to Undermine Democracy, November 2017, https://freedomhouse.org/report/freedom-net/freedom-net-2017#
- Press Freedom's Dark Horizon, April 2017, https://freedomhouse.org/report/freedom-press/freedom-press-2017#
- 2014 Edelman Trust Barometer global results, http://www.slideshare.net/EdelmanInsights/2014-edelman-trust-barometer?qid=0682cc6b-2798-43d4-a9ca-fb0302ae0925&v=&b=&from_search=1
- 2015 Edelman Trust Barometer global results, http://www.slideshare.net/EdelmanInsights/2015-edelman-trust-barometer-global-results?qid=abe04a31-1394-4f4c-9b0b-d1afaa10b0b0&v=&b=&from_search=1
- 2016 Edelman Trust Barometer global results, http://www.slideshare.net/EdelmanInsights/2016-edelman-trust-barometer-global-results?qid=e3fcac3f-5c18-4d41-ae6b-6d24628262c2&v=&b=&from_search=1
- 2017 Edelman Trust Barometer global results, http://www.slideshare.net/EdelmanInsights/2017-edelman-trust-barometer-global-results-71035413
- 2017 Edelman Trust Barometer global results, http://cms.edelman.com/sites/default/files/2018-02/2018_Edelman_Trust_Barometer_Global_Report_FEB.pdf
- Gesetz zur Verbesserung der Rechtsdurchsetzung in sozialen Netzwerken (Netzwerkdurchsetzungsgesetz – NetzDG), https://www.bmjv.de/SharedDocs/Gesetzgebungsverfahren/Dokumente/BGBl_NetzDG.pdf?__blob=publicationFile&v=2
- http://www.poliziadistato.it/articolo/155a6077fdb05e3865595940
- https://www.agerpres.ro/politica-externa/2018/01/04/emmanuel-macron-anunta-o-lege-impotriva-fake-news-30782
- https://ec.europa.eu/digital-single-market/en/fake-news
- https://ec.europa.eu/digital-single-market/en/news/commission-appoints-members-high-level-expert-group-fake-news-and-online-disinformation

THE ROLE OF EU'S CONTROL MECHANISMS IN THE CONSOLIDATION OF THE RULE OF LAW IN ROMANIA. MECHANISM OF COOPERATION AND VERIFICATION

Bianca Elena RADU*

Abstract

Post-communist societies tend to function in a manner which contradicts the European integration model, placing the respect for democratic norms and values on a secondary position. The democratization process requires a functional and independent judiciary branch, the shaping of a justice culture, the internalization of justice laws and principles, both individual and collective levels. In other words, the consolidation of a democratic society could be achieved on fundamental principle of the rule of law. The present paper aims to highlight the European Mechanism of Cooperation and Verification' potential and its influence on the implementation of the rule of law during Romania's post-accession period. Methodologically, this paper employs content analysis of legislation and official European and Romanian documents.

Keywords: rule of law, justice culture, Mechanism of Cooperation and Verification, democratization process, European Union, Romania.

1. Introduction

In the initial treaties regarding the European community there is no mention regarding the rule of law, democracy and human rights. The change occurs along with the Maastricht Treaty also known as European Union'Treaty signed by the European Council in February of 1992. This treaty founds the EU has the role of inserting rule of law, democracy and human rights as a key reference to EU Development Policy as well as the Common Foreign and Security Policy (CFSP). The end of the Cold War is thus linked to the EU change in perspective which concentrated the attention on the political documents looking at this trio of values (rule of law, democracy and human rights) but highly important in a political construction such as the European one. Rule of law stands for a governing principle where entities, institutions and individuals including the state itself obey the law which have to be applied independently and in accordance to the international standards of legal and human rights. Amongs the indicators of the rule of law one may find: independence of justice including the nomination and the system of career progress, the right to obtain repairing warrantees in case of a legal error, correct trials, the access to law, recognition by legal institutions of treaties and conventions at an international level include the ones concerning human rights. The theoretical model chosen within this paper stands to show that a state under the rule of law represents a basisis for one democratic system. As Zillur Khan (2011) states:

"Democracy, without a sincere devotion of political leaders for the legal consolidation of justice, has a tendency to be lost in the sphere of low political interests. The most important values for a sustainable democracy and institutional welfare are the legal rules of justice."[1]

John Rawls also outlines that justice is a fundamental pattern and without it, social norms cannot exist these leading to an equal distribution of power and resources[2]. The concept of Europeanizing stands as a process through which the states, depending on its competencies and structures, adapt to EU rules which are conceived as a set of political, judicial, economical, social criteria[3]. The domestic intrastate changes are the result of the transposition of communitarian to intra state law, the reorganizing of internal institutional structures in relation to EU legislation, internalizing of a series of international conventions regarding human rights and the protection of minorities, jurisdictional acceptance of courts above national standards and policies for technical aid in more other important sectors.

This work aims to frame the way in which the EU along with its mechanisms has contributed to the consolidation of rule of law in Romania. In the first part of the article it will be looking at contextual aspects, as well as conceptual and theoretical for in the second part it will outline the Mechanism of Cooperation and Verification'influence on rule of law consolidation in Romania as the starting key point for a democratic society which follows the path asked by the model of European standardization. The theme of work itself asks for a synthetic and holistic view, the changes from

* PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: elbiaradu@gmail.com)

[1] Zillur R. Khan, The Concept of Justice and Democracy, IPSA Prepared for Presentation at the AIBS, (Dhaka, Bangladesh, March 15, 2011), http://rc37.ipsa.org/post/2011/03/29/The-Concept-of-Justice-and-Democracy, consulted march 2018.

[2] John Rawls, "Distributive Justice: Some Addenda," in Samuel Freeman (ed), John Rawls. Collected Papers, (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1999), 154-175.

[3] Tanja Börzel & Thomas Risse, "From Europeanisation to Diffusion: Introduction", West European Politics, 35 (1) (2012): 1-19.

the law sphere being treated in link to the social and political values of Romanian society under EU influence.

2. Theoritical approaches in promoting of EU values

The attempts to insert the EU capacity in theory as well as to Europeanize member states has become concrete in various paradigms which try to describe and explain the mechanisms through which the European values are promoted and internalized by states actors.

Rationalist Institutionalism approach[4] is one that shows external rewarding and rational negotiation. It is a model centered on actors and based on logic of consequences. The EU invests the states actors with responsibilities, offering them legal and political resources in order to keep up and implement changes within their internal systems. Formal internal institutions thus become the main factors which set a barrier/facilitate changes as an answer to EU adjustment pressures. Within the negotiation process actors exchange information, threats and promise according to their own preferences the final result depending on the negotiation capacity of actors. According to the model of external rewards, the EU establishes a set of rules as conditions which the states have to respect in order to get rewarded[5].

As a contrast, the social institutionalism[6] stresses on the fact that such an answer follows logic of what is adequate. The internal impact of the EU results from a socializing process in which states institutions internalize EU rules which they consider lawful. The internal rule carriers as well as internal cultural representations, the informal institutions are key factors which allow states institutions to engage in a process of social learning through which the EU rules redefine their interests and identities. Internalizing democratic principles stands as an assimilation process of some values, codes and norms of constructing and deconstructing some models, both at a normative and at a practical level. A socializing agent such as the EU promotes these models and values in democracy so that states actors assume and integrals them thus in the end they shall consider them norms and values which guide their behaviors.

The responsible relation concept is part of the institutionalism literature. According Robert Keohane, responsibility has both external and internal dimensions[7]. Not in few mentions, both practitioners as well as researchers have concentrated on the dimension of internal responsibility which stands for the key to the existence of a formal relationship, institutionalized between the EU and states, the states offering a delegate authority and resources to the Union, so that in the end the latter may take responsibility for them[8]. Responsibility also has an external dimension. Once an agent such as the EU consolidates its aim and power, the number of vulnerable actors to its policies is in growth. This growing vulnerability is due to the fact that the EU grows its capacity of producing consequences which matter for the state actors. The concept of responsibility asks for a holistic view as it demands for a by dimensional relation and reflection which combines both the rationalist institutionalism as well as the sociological one (the social institutionalism). Responsibility frames at a theoretical level the capacity of taking consequences for all actions, aftermath realities and the choices which the EU/a state actor takes for one 's self[9].

3. Rule of law - An EU priority

Each human community regalements the behavior of its members. Fuller[10] points out that the law, in order to establish a behavior, must be in rule with a set of conditions: to be a public and known law for the ones whom it is directed to, to be comprehensible, non contradictory, permanent or everlasting and the conditions for it to be followed are to be applied. If we admit that the rule of law is an instrument aimed to protect the liberties of individuals, normative functions will be given to different powers. Montesquieu (1958)[11] states that:

"If within the same person or the same body of jurisdictional staff the legislative power is reunited together with the executive there shall be no freedom ... There is no freedom if the power of judgment is not separated from the legislative and executive one. If the power of judgment or the law would unite with the legislative the criteria concerning the lives and liberties of citizens would be arbitrary as the judge would also be the legislator. If the power of justice

[4] Henry Farell & Adrienne Héritier, "A rationalist-institutionalist explanation of endogenous regional integration", Journal of European Public Policy, 12 (2) (2005): 273-290.

[5] Frank Schimmelfennig & Ulrich Sedelmeier, The Europeanization of Central and Eastern Europe, (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 2005), 10.

[6] Jane Jenson & Frédéric Mérand, "Sociology, institutionalism and the European Union", Comparative European Politics, 8(1) (2010): 74-92.

[7] Robert Keohane, "The Concept of Accountability in World Politics and the Use of Force", Michigan Journal of International Law, 24 (4) (2003): 1–21.

[8] Robert Dahl, "Can international organizations be democratic? A skeptic's view", in David Held & Anthony McGrew, The Global Transformation Reader, (Boston: Polity Press, 2003), 530-541.

[9] Robert E. Goodin, Protecting the Vulnerable: A Re-analysis of Our Social Responsibilities, (Chicago Illionos: Chicago University Press, 1985), 114.

[10] Lon L. Fuller, The Morality of Law, (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1969), 201.

[11] Montesquieu, Œuvres complètes, tome II, (Paris: Bibliothèque de la Pléiade, 1958), 397.

would unite with the executive the conditions created would make the power of justice turn into a torturer[12]."

Rule of law imposes the existence of institutional mechanisms meaning the possibility to control the hierarchy of norms and to sanction any rule breaking. Rule of law is more than anything a jurisdictional concept and it has a normative and institutional format. The jurisdictional perspective offers a formal view of the rule of law. Apart from this formal perspective it finds its lack of substantiality when it asks about the usefulness of the rule of law within the societal structures. Thus the rule of law stands as a meaningful instrument for the implementation of some values which individuals have no liberty to act upon and to consolidate their belonging to a society.

Positive liberty as in collective autonomy is the possibility for a community to decide upon its future[13]. It gives the possibility to directly or indirectly take part in determining the norms of common living. Rule of law and democracy both have consolidation links as well as those of potential competitively[14].

The present paper focuses on the perspective which states that the rule of law offers democracy establishment and more legitimacy. Firstly, the arguments are based on the existence of the link between the rule of justice as an instrument of governing (the law is an instrument and a guide to governing) and the rule of justice which imposes that every social actor has to be protected by the system of law, including by governors within a specified society. It hereby understands that the constitutional limitations of power (an essential element of democracy) can be possible only by using the rules of justice. Secondly, the rules of justice may be translated through various elements such as a solid constitution, an efficient election system, and consensus regarding gender equality, laws destined to protect minorities and other vulnerable groups, a strong civil society. From this perspective, the jurisdictional rules aided by an independent justice could offer a guarantee of the fact that the set of civil rights and liberties as well as political can be followed. Citizens could thus understand that their dignity and equality are not at risk.

Following this logical set, the principle of an attentive rule by government concerning the interests and needs of the citizen majority is strictly associated with the functioning of institutions and their capacity to act for the interest of citizens. As mentioned by the Secretary General (2004):

"The rule of justice is the main key for governing in which all people, institutions and public or private entities, including the state itself are responsible in front of the law which is publically announced, consolidated and independently pronounced and which is consequent with the norms and international standards of human rights[15]".

The nineties represent a period in time when the relations between central European candidates, the easterners and the EU had been characterized by the euphoria off returning to Europe. There had been an inoculated hope that democracy would follow its normal course without having major difficulties[16].

This euphoria faded once the first Accession Treaty appeared in 1991 which mentioned the member quality as an aim for union ship. At the Copenhagen Conference of 1993 the EU state leaders came to terms about the fact that countries in Central and Eastern Europe could become members. It is important to mention that the fact of the promise of belonging to the EU was for the first time accompanied by a pack which also contained formal conditions of membership meaning that it obliged for democracy, rule of law, a functioning market and the implementation of communitarian acquis. The EU passed on from an indirect influence to direct pressure once the European Council of Luxemburg in 1997.[17]

The EU offered and is still offering mainly institutional relations and financial aid to the states in Central and Eastern Europe. The institutional relations having associative or belonging main objectives incorporate contract and non-contract based relations established between the EU and national actors.

In the interval between 1999 and 2006 the main sectors of EU aid policies towards Romania have been economical and social cohesion followed by obligation regarding the acquis, the political criteria, community based programs, financial criteria and administrative capacity. The aid for political criteria for example has registered a significant growth in the year 2003, reaching as a point of reference at 57.90 millions of Euros in the year 2006[18].

In 1993 at the Copenhagen European Council[19] political conditions have been stated as well as economic and legal ones so that a state could become a member. Thus it had been covered that candidate [12] Montesquieu, p. 395.

[13] Drieu Godefridi, "État de droit, liberté et démocratie ", Politique et Sociétés, 23(1) (2004): 143-169.

[14] Idem.

[15] "The rule of law and transitional justice in conflict and post-conflict societies", 23.08.2004, S/2004/616, http://archive.ipu.org/splz-e/unga07/law.pdf, accessed March 2018.

[16] Sharon Wolchik & Jane Curry, Central and East European Politics from communist to Democracy, (Landham Maryland: Rowman & Littlefield Publishers, INC. , 2008), 4.

[17] Presidency Conclusions. Luxembourg European Council, 12-13. 12. 1997, http://www.europarl.europa.eu/summits/lux1_en.htm, accessed March 2018.

[18] Elena Baracani, "EU Democratic Rules of Law Promotion" in Amichai Magen & Leonardo Morlino, International Actors, Democratization and the Rules of Law, Anchoring Democracy?, (New York: Routledge Edition, 2009), 63.

[19] Conclusions of the Presidency. European Council in Copenhagen, 21-22. 06. 1993, 180/1/93 REV 1, https://www.consilium.europa.eu/media/21225/72921.pdf, accessed March 2018.

countries had to follow a criteria of institutional stability without which they could not guarantee their own democracy, the rule of law and human rights. Romania had been asked to follow a better functioning and efficiency of the internal justice system, its independency, to consolidate its fight against corruption.

Following the case of Romania the projects linked to the rule of law had been set in the aid sectors looking at political criteria and administrative capacity. In 2004 regarding the aid for political criteria, the analysis shows that the most important projects have been linked to the jurisdictional system, the public administration restructuring and the fight against corruption. The institution that benefited from the highest aid for political criteria can be the Ministry of Justice[20].

4. The Mechanism for Cooperation and Verification and its role in Romania

Romanian accession to UE at the first of January 2007 was accompanied by an alarm signal which the European Commission marked upon the vulnerabilities of the domestic legal and legislative system. The lacks and malfunctions that they have shown in the development of an internal market, and also of a space of freedom as well as the liberties and individual security values in Romania. The EU did no longer have the monitoring instruments which it could use in the pre-adhering period. Thus being constrained to create a new mechanism, which could rearrange the difficulties and regalement solutions in gaining the consolidation of Romania as a fundamental state with rule of law, applied principles. The Commission had decided to find a mechanism in order to solve the unpleasant situations that had been left unstable in the reforming of the legal system as well as in terms of fighting corruption and organized crime. Thus the MCV (the Mechanism for Cooperation and Verification) was applied in the month of December of the year 2006. For the first time in EU history new member states had been committed to stand to accept monitoring after becoming part of the Union. What did the monitoring mean? The Commission would evaluate the vulnerabilities and malfunctioning of the essential legal and legislative domains of action. The evaluation conclusions would be stated in a final annual progress report. Each year the report would be published containing a detailed evaluation of progress as well as realistic recommendations regarding the reform continuity. Each month the Commission would publish a separate report offering practical and technical details of the work for development that had been done over the past six months.

According to the decision of the Commission the main reason for the implementing of MCV was Romania's insufficient progress during the pre adhering period. The Commission desired to state that the progresses in the legislative as well as legal field stand as a necessary condition. Without such progress Romania would not be able to apply a clear legal pattern in regard to European rights and legislation. A better legal reform as well as the fight against corruption would allow Romanian citizens and enterprises to enjoy their legal rights as an integral part of the European Union.[21] In order to implement the MCV, the European Commission used article 37 of the Adhesion Act as a starting point. It gives the Commission full power to apply sanctions if Romania fails to accomplish the engagements set upon agreement. Thus the MCV incorporates a mixture of objectives and obligations among which Romania's task of reporting a constant progress. Within the number of MCV proposed objectives[22] we may remind: the adding of constitutional amendments which have to deny any ambiguities regarding the independence and clear responsibilities of the legal system, the ensuring of a more transparent and efficient legal trial through the adopting and implementation of a new system legislation as well as the reediting of new civil and criminal procedure codes, a continuous reforming evolution with the aim of consolidating professionalism, assumed responsibilities and efficiency upon acting, the accomplishment of clear and professional investigation in determining the cases of high level corruption accusations, the publishing of personal fortune records of high class officials, taking measures against corruption especially at the borders and concerning authorities of local areas, the implementation of an organized crime and infraction combat strategy, combating money robberies as well as taking the fortunes of corrupt officials into legal custody. However, within the annual reports, there are true and clear activities imposed on Romania. If Romania would not have respected the pressured rules imposed by the MCV, saving causes would have been applied as sanctions for the lack of professional conformism upon agreement. In the Adhesion Treaty[23], three such causes are stated: Amongst the mentions in the field of economics (see art 36) or the field concerning the internal market (see art 37) article 38 refers to the field of internal affairs and legal justice. It [20] Leonardo Morlino & Amichai Magen, EU Rule of Law Promotion in Romania, Turkey and Serbia-Montenegro: Domestic Elites and Responsiveness to Differentiated External Influence, Workshop on "Promoting Democracy and the Rule of Law: American and European Strategies and Instruments", CDDRL, (SIIS Stanford, 2004).

[21] Comunicare a Comisiei către Consiliu și Parlamentul European, Raport privind evoluția măsurilor de acompaniere în România după aderare, Bruxelles, 27.06.2007, p.2, https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legalcontent/RO/TXT/?uri=CELEX%3A52007DC0378, accessed February 2018.

[22] Dimitar Markov, The Cooperation and Verification Mechanism Three Years Later: What Has Been Done and What Is Yet to Come ,(Sofia: Friedrich Ebert Foundation, Office Bulgaria, 2010), 2-3.

[23] Institutul European din România, Acte privind aderarea Republicii Bulgaria și a României la Uniunea Europeană, (București, 2006), http://beta.ier.ro/documente/Tratate/DCT_Tratat_aderare_Bg_Ro.pd, accessed February 2018.

clearly points out the measures which can be taken if there are serious deficit or factors that lessen the effect of creating and implementing a good practice standard in criminal and civil law. The causes were clearly aimed at the progress of Romania in the MCV.

The Commission decision of 13 January 2006 clearly establishes the following criteria:

"Should Romania fail in accomplishing the stated objectives sanctions based on article 37 and 38 will be applied as mentioned in the Adhesion Treaty including the suspending obligation of member states to recognize and exercised, in the legal conditions of European law, exemplified trial decision such as the European placement under arrest mandates[24]."

The previously mentioned clauses can be applied as negative sanctions when the situation is out of hand, when the progress registered by the MCV in the action calendar is undetectable. The sole existence of these clauses stands as a method of imposing a rational behavior on Romania. There are also other kinds of instruments with the role of ensuring an adequate behavior of Romania. One of them consists in the Commission 's right to suspend or cancel the EU funding, having as a main reason the state s incapacity of correctly administering the given funds. If there are deficits without progress in terms of combating corruption and organized crime, the Commission finds this as a clear answer which can be understood through the fact that Romania is unable of administrating the European funds as to offer transparency and good practice in the previously stated fields.

Entering the Schengen zone is another controlling tool towards becoming fully European, a tool strongly linked to the MCV. The lack of responsibility shown towards accomplishing the tasks stated in the MCV could be an indicator showing general state vulnerability in terms of entering Schengen.

Both the Council and other member states fulfill the Commission's role in the MCV implementation process. The Council, as an EU legislator, may analyze the given reports and also state recommendations according to the information given by research in the case of Romania. Member states can also be considered real live agents as they can give suggestions after the careful study of each report.

4.1. Some examples of EU influence despite the Romanian resistance attitude

According to the theoretical model of rational institutionalism presented above, right after a substantial reward (EU integration in 2007) Romania should have assumed its role as a member state of the Union and should have consequently followed the path to becoming an European actor in full terms. In another manner of explaining, the Commission, the Council and the former member states expected that Romania made efforts in order to consolidate a state following the rule of law principles with an independent and clear legal system combating the incoming internal previous wrong deeds. Thus the role of the MCV was to follow and supervise a couple of institutions in order to help fighting against corruption. It was to be expected that after EU integration the pressures set on Romania would diminish, however, the adopting rhythm is way superior to the one Romania had in the period after 2004[25].

Willem de Pauw wrote a report for the European Commission in 2007 named Expert Report on the Fight against Corruption/Cooperation and Verification Mechanism,[26] which was published in the Economist magazine in July 2008. In the report, the author points out how a set of measures taken prior to the integration which had proven their former efficiency, had been abandoned rather than consolidated after the integration, although abandoning was not the adequate path to take:

"Many of the measures that were presented, before Accession, to be instrumental in the fight against corruption, have been deliberately blunted by Parliament or the Government immediately after Accession, while other factors have been instrumental in repulsing ongoing attempts to address high level corruption ... If the Romanian anti-corruption effort keeps evaporating at the present pace, in an estimated six months time Romania will be back were it was in 2003[27]".

Romanian Center for European Policies edited also in 2010 a Raport concerning the efficiency of of MCV Mechanism. The first example presented in this report is related to the blocking of amendments of the Legal Code of Criminal Procedure. The Criminal Procedure Code is the nucleus in the fight against corruption and criminality. The political elite had proposed one year after accession, a set of amendments which would have limited the power of prosecutors to find and justify the cases of high level corruption. The set proposed by the Parliament was stating that telephone signal interception should be canceled by the services after six months for any suspect official, the telephone interceptive listening had to be banned before the initiation of criminal investigations, there was also an interdiction in using intercepted

[24] Decizia 2006/928/CE a Comisiei din 13 decembrie 2006 de stabilire a unui mecanism de cooperare și de verificare a progresului realizat de România în vederea atingerii anumitor obiective de referință specifice în domeniul reformei sistemului judiciar și al luptei împotriva corupției, https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/?uri=celex%3A32006D0928, accessed March 2018.

[25] Centrul Român pentru Politici europene, Eficiența Mecanismului de Cooperare şi Verificare pentru România, Policy Memo (16) (2010): 9, http://www.crpe.ro/wp-content/uploads/2012/09/CRPE-Policy-Memo-nr.16-Merită-păstrat.-Eficiența-Mecanismului-de-Cooperare -și-Verificare-pentru-România.pdf, accessed April 2018.

[26] Willem de Pauw, Expert Report on the Fight Against Corruption/Cooperation and Verification Mechanism, Bucharest, November 12-15, 2007. The report was published on July 3, 2008 to the online edition of The Economist, "The European Union conceals Romania's backsliding on corruption", https://www.economist.com/node/11670671, accessed March 2018.

[27] Idem.

discussions of other individuals as evidence, and also banned intercepted conversations for more than 48 hours length from being brought as proof to the prosecutor and afterwards set to be examined by the judge. All stated amendments would have limited the investigations in cases of high level financial corruption, as well as economic and organizational. Having voted the above mentioned would have meant not respecting the procedures that other European member states adopted in the fight against corruption. Moreover it would have meant a undermining of independence of judiciary in relation to political aspects. The European Commission, interfered with the help of its experts signaling that a positive vote would not had been in favor of Romania and thus consolidated its position as an actor which corrected the mistakes of Romania regarding legal justice independence.

The second example of prudent vigilance and behavioral EU correction towards political leaders had been observed regarding the National Integrity Agency. This Agency has the task of analyzing incompatibilities, conflicts of interests, has to register fortunes and emit decisions with a compulsory value, decisions based on which sanctions can be applied. The law regarding these sanctions had been seen as unconstitutional. The Constitutional High Court stated that taking into legal custody of fortunes as well as transparently declaring the gained and published profits and investments would violate the right to privacy according to the National guideline laws. The cause that leads to such statements was a real case of taking an amount of money by law from a former member of the Parliament. The Court suspended the prerogatives of the Agency and labeled them as jurisdictional. Debates had been organized between the president and the Parliament members in terms of procedural aspects, the commissions of fortune control, and the aspects of declared fortunes... After long talks and a maize structured path (Parliament Senate Room of Deputies-Constitutional Court), the law had been set into action starting with the 31st of August 2010.

The report on legal justice in 2010[28] mentioned irregularities in the new legal procedures adopted by the National Integrity Agency. The critical approaches were also followed by negative reactions from EU ambassadors in Bucharest, as well as the reactions of the civil society which asked the president not to approve of the law.

Another example of EU pressures could be observed in 2010 where aspects about the exception of constitutionalism were taken into discussion. The guilty, in their grand intention of covering their guilt in cases of high level corruption, would address the Constitutional Court stating that some legal aspects of their trials were not covered by the National Constitution. The 2010 Report criticizes this method of practice considering it as inadequate for a state which agreed to respect EU principles. "The Unconstitutional exceptions, keep on delaying the process of trial for high level corruption cases, while a legal project which banned the obliged denial of suspending the trial when such statements are made is currently in pending for legislative approval"[29].

4. 2. Old and new considerations. MCV Reports over the years

The status as an EU Member State also implied a commitment on behalf of Romania to adapt measures that would guarantee Romanian citizens that the internal administrative and judicial decisions, norms and practices are in accordance with those from the EU. The final purpose of the application of the CVM in Romania is for the progress regarding the reforms in the judicial system and in the fight against corruption to be irreversible.[30] The moment when Romania will possess the instruments, institutions, and practices to correctly apply Community law, the final purpose of the CVM will be fulfilled. The irreversible progress depends on a series of variables such as respecting and strictly applying the principles of the separation of powers, a political will that would support the reforms and the fight against corruption, clear and long-term commitments phased into objectives that are found in an interdependent relation, the fulfilment of one contributing to the fulfilment of the other objectives. The CVM reports are made based on the information obtained from a series of institutions such as: the Romanian Government, the EC Representation, diplomatic missions of Member States in Romania, civil society organizations. Furthermore, in certain situations reports from independent experts from EU Member States who undertook various missions in Bucharest were taken into account as well.

The 2007 Report[31] presented the directions to follow in order to continue the judicial reform and the fight against corruption. Thus, the recommendations are focused on the following aspects (p. 20): "the adoption of a new Code of Civil Procedure, of a new Code of Criminal Procedure"; "the resolution of organizational and personnel problems from the judicial system, the establishment of certain performance indexes"; "the attainment of clear and efficient results from the National Integrity Agency"; "the insurance of the judicial and institutional stability

[28] Raport al Comisiei către Parlamentul European și privind progresele realizate de România în cadrul mecanismului de cooperare și verificare, COM(2010) 401 final https://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2010/RO/1-2010-401-RO-F1-1.Pdf, accessed April 2018.

[29] idem.

[30] Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on Romania's Progress on Accompanying Measures following Accession, COM(2007) 378 final, p.3. Http://Eur-Lex.Europa.Eu/Legal-Content/Ro/Txt/Pdf/?Uri=Celex:52007dc0378&From=Ro, accessed March 2018.

[31] Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on Progress in Romania under the Co-operation and Verification Mechanism, COM(2007) 378 final, Http://Eur-Lex.Europa.Eu/Legal-Content/Ro/Txt/Pdf/?Uri=Celex:52007dc0378&From=Ro, accessed March 2018.

of the anti-corruption frame, including key-institutions such as the DNA"; "the promotion of dissuasive measures in high-level corruption cases"; "the articulation of a coherent anti-corruption strategy at the national level that is focused on the most vulnerable sectors and on the local administration"; "the promotion of an open dialogue with citizens and instilling social responsibility in them"; "the transparent presentation of reforms that have been initiated". The European Commission has engaged taken upon itself to offer expertise, logistical and financial support in order to sustain the reforms from the judicial system.

The recommendations from the 2008 CVM Report[32] are not very different from those from 2007. The Commission recognises Romania's commitment in accomplishing the reforms but it also underlines the fact that the efforts put into fulfilling the objectives do not measure up. The report emphasizes as well the link between the reform of the judicial system and the progress in combating corruption. Among the report's recommendations (p. 7) one can retain: "the need for the Superior Council of Magistracy to adopt an unequivocal position in regards to the fight against high-level corruption in the context of the controversial political debates that took place in Parliament"; "the need for the Government to finalize the new Code of Criminal Procedure and to make progress regarding the Criminal Code project"; "giving up controversial emergency ordinances that aim at changing the Criminal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure"; "the continuation of independent investigations of those guilty of high-level corruption"; "regaining the trust of the public opinion in the fight against corruption and in respecting the rule of law". The Commission reiterates that it is a partner that offers financial support and adequate programmes with the purpose of continuing Romanian reforms.

The 2009 CVM Report[33] mentions that the numerous emergency ordinances and the legislative changes are the result of the fact that the two Codes, civil and criminal, have never been completely revised (p. 7). Another aspect underlined is that of the lack of consensus among political parties for the large scale support of reforms in favour of the beneficiaries, meaning of Romanian citizens (p. 7). The report offers a series of recommendations as well. In regards to the new Codes (Criminal, Civil, of Criminal Procedure, of Civil Procedure) what is recommended is (p. 7) the adoption of laws in order to put them into practice, after a public consultation and a minute analysis of their impact on the judicial system. In regards to the judicial reform, the report recommends (p. 8) an increased focus on the human resource, a redistribution of administrative tasks towards the auxiliary personnel, coherent personnel diagrams, the transfer of vacant positions where there's the greatest need. The recommendations regarding high-level and local corruption concentrate on the legal frame for fighting against them, including in the context of the new Codes (p. 8). In the cases of high-level corruption it is considered that it would be indicated to adopt a law that "would foresee the elimination of judging cases when exceptions of unconstitutionality are invoked" (p. 8), while in case of corruption at the local level it is recommended to "undertake measures to prevent corruption in vulnerable sectors" (p. 9).

The 2010 Report[34] presents "important deficiencies in making progress under the CVM" (p. 2), deficiencies that deter the reform process. "Limited" progress (p. 3) is ascertained in regards to the efficiency of the judicial system and the consistency of the jurisprudence. In this context, the recommendations refer to the adoption of "immediate measures" (p.8). In the field of the judicial system reform, we find, besides the recommendations from the 2009 Report, the following (p. 9): "the initiation of an independent analysis of the performance of the judicial system and the operate the necessary changes, including the transfer of magistrates"; "an easy and correct transaction from a legal point of view towards a new Superior Council of Magistracy", the consolidation of "the capacity of the National Institute of Magistracy in regards to the initial and continuous formation", "the revision of the competence of the High Court of Cassation and Justice", "a thorough reform in the disciplinary system". In regards to the recommendations related to the fight against corruption, the ones from the previous Report are maintained, to which are added (p. 10): "the correction of the law of the National Integrity Agency in accordance to the commitments assumed by Romania at the moment of accession", "the evaluation of the efficiency of the legislative code and of the assigning of responsibility in regards to public acquisitions".

The 2011 Report[35] presents a series of recorded process but it also emphasizes the deficiencies in regards to the fight against corruption, by mentioning among others the lack of a global and solid anti-corruption strategy (p. 3). The recommendations related to the reform of the judicial system target: "the adaptation of active measures that would accompany the coming into effect of the Civil Code and the adaptation of a comprehensive plan for the

[32] Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on Progress in Romania under the Co-operation and Verification Mechanism, COM(2008) 494 final, http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/PDF/?uri=CELEX: 52008DC0494& from=RO , accessed March 2018.

[33] Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on Progress in Romania under the Co-operation and Verification Mechanism, COM(2009) 401 final https://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2009/RO/1-2009-401-RO-F1-1.Pdf, accessed April 2018.

[34] Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on Progress in Romania under the Co-operation and Verification Mechanism, COM(2010) 401 final https://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2010/RO/1-2010-401-RO-F1-1.Pdf, accessed April 2018.

[35] Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on Progress in Romania under the Co-operation and Verification Mechanism, COM(2011) 460 final https://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2011/RO/1-2011-460-RO-F1-1.Pdf, accessed April 2018.

implementation of the other three codes" (The Criminal Code, that of Criminal Procedure and of Civil Procedure), "the allocation of sufficient resources for the reorganization of courts and prosecutors' offices", "the increase of the scope of the National Institute of Magistracy", "detailed analyses related to the work load within the judicial system" (p. 9). The series of recommendations in regards to the fight against corruption aims at: "the elaboration of a new solid multi-annual strategy for the prevention and punishment of acts of corruption", "the creation of a monitoring group, together with the civil society, in order to supervise the implementation of a anti-corruption strategy"; "proving convincing results in recovering criminal assets"; "the elaboration of norms for the prevention of conflicts of interest in managing public funds".

The 2012 Report[36], which was adopted in a tense moment marked by "important questions related to respecting the rule of law and the independence of the judicial system in Romania" (p. 2), marks 5 years from Romania's accession to the EU. The EU has supported, since 2007, the fight against corruption and the reform of the judicial system in Romania, by means of structural funds, with 12 million Euros (p. 3). Furthermore, the financial and logistic help was offered by Member States as well, through bilateral projects, with the purpose of supporting the reform of the judicial system and the fight against corruption.[37] Among the recommendations regarding respecting the rule of law and the independence of the judicial system the following can be noticed (pp. 22-23): "abiding by the provisions of the Constitution when issuing emergency ordinances, and implementing the decisions of the Constitutional Court", "political actors must respect the independence of the judicial system", "abstaining from appointing as ministers individuals against whom court decisions have been pronounced in regards to integrity". A series of recommendations were made for the reform of the judicial system as well (p. 23): "the adoption of a common and comprehensive plan to ensure the implementation of all the four Codes", "the restructuring of the courts and prosecutors' offices", "the creation of a monitoring group of the judicial reform". Regarding to the fight against corruption, the Report recommends (p. 25): "the presentation of some convincing results in regards to the recovery of criminal assets"; "establishing a clear mechanism of coordination and surveillance between the police, the prosecutors' office and the authorities for administrative control", "improving the results in regards to the prevention and sanctioning of corruption, fraud and conflicts of interest", "implementing new national anti-corruption strategies".

The 2013 Report[38] signals that Romania has not appropriately implemented the commitments regarding the independence of the judicial system and the decisions in matters of integrity (p. 2). During the period evaluated the Commission has signalled concerns regarding "the constitutional order" (p. 3), the unfounded use of emergency ordinances, which in fact "are adopted strictly in situations provided by the Constitutions and only in case of emergency" (p. 3), "acts of intimidation and harassment committed against individuals who work in important institutions from the judicial and anti-corruption systems..." (p. 4). To this end, the recommendations regarding the independence of the judicial system and the supremacy of the rule of law contain among others: "a consensus regarding the abstention from criticising court decisions, the undermining of the credibility of magistrates or from exercising pressures on them" (p. 5); "the need for the revision of existing norms in order to guarantee that the freedom of the press is accompanied by an adequate protection of institutions and of individual fundamental rights, as well as to make available efficient measures for reparations" (p. 5); "a high professional quality for individual in leadership positions at the Public Ministry and the DNA" (p. 8), "the use by Parliament of new norms for the adoption of clear and objective procedures in the case of suspending the members of Parliament who are the subject of negative procedures in matters of integrity" (p. 8). The Report mentions as well that the EU finances the anti-corruption projects from the Ministry of Education, Health, Regional Development and Public Administration. The European support will be efficient only if Romania will in turn understand that it has to put in "efforts to eliminate corruption at all the levels of the Romanian society" (p. 13). In the series of recommendations regarding the fight against corruption one can also find "the prevention and punishment of the corruption related to public acquisitions", "the instrumentation of money-laundry dossiers and the confiscation of assets" (p. 13).

Beside the positive aspects and the progress reached in the fight against corruption, the 2014 Report[39] reiterates the issue of the rule of law and the importance of the independence of the judicial system, subjects that have represented "a special theme of the July 2012 report and of the subsequent report from January 2013" (p. 2). The recommendations regarding the reform of the judicial system signals among others: "the intensification of the progress in regards to the

[36] Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on Progress in Romania under the Co-operation and Verification Mechanism, COM(2012) 410 final, https://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2012/RO/1-2012-410-RO-F1-1.Pdf, accessed April, 2018.

[37] Commission Staff Working Document Romania: Technical Report Accompanying the Document Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on Progress in Romania under the Co-operation and Verification Mechanism, ,SWD (2012) 231 final, p. 48, http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/PDF/?uri=CELEX:52012SC0231&from=ro, Accessed April 2018.

[38] Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on Progress in Romania under the Co-operation and Verification Mechanism, COM (2013) 47 final, https://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2013/RO/1-2013-47-RO-F1-1.Pdf, accessed April 2018.

[39] Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on Progress in Romania under the Co-operation and Verification Mechanism, COM (2014) 37 final, https://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2014/RO/1-2014-37-RO-F1-1.Pdf, accessed April 2018.

augmentation of the uniformity of the jurisprudence and of the judicial practice" p. 13), "the inclusion of certain measures for the acceleration of the judicial procedures and for the use of new possibilities such as extended confiscation" (p. 13), "solutions to problems generated by the work load" (p. 14), "legislative measures necessary for the restructuring of the court system" (p. 14). The recommendations regarding the fight against corruption are concentrated on the development of a "national anti-corruption strategy through the introduction of certain criteria of reference and obligations that are more coherent for the public administration and by making the results available to the public" p. 15), on the intensification of "the efforts for the prosecution of cases of small-scale corruption" (p. 14), on the implementation of legislation in the field of corruption "equally and in equal conditions" (p. 14).

The 2015 Report[40] emphasizes proactive attitudes in regards to reforms, the Commission expressing its hope that the objectives of the CVM will be reached. In relation to the reform of the judicial system, the Commission recommends to Romania: "to finalize as soon as possible the changes that are required to be made in the Criminal Codes..." (p. 14); "to elaborate an operational plan of action in order to implement the strategy for the reform of the judicial system" (p. 14); "to improve the insurance of the implementation of court decisions at all levels" (p. 15). The fight against corruption is submitted to the following recommendations: Romania has "to resort to the national anti-corruption strategy in order to identify better the domains exposed to the risk of corruption" (p. 15); "to intensify the pre-emptive and repressive actions directed against conflicts of interest, of favouritism, fraud and corruption in public acquisitions" (p. 15).

The 2016 Report[41] evaluates "how profound the reform is anchored", "the durability of the progress" (p. 2) without which the lifting of the CVM cannot be accomplished. The Commission salutes the positive results in the implementation of the reforms but considers that "the independence of the judicial system and the respect for court decisions" (p. 13) continue to be confronted with challenges. A series of recommendations regarding the independence of the judicial system concentrates on: the introduction of a "more robust and independent system of appointing high-level prosecutors" (p. 14); "the instauration of clear and solid procedures for appointment in leadership positions within the magistracy..." (p. 14); "the inclusion in the code of conduct of members of Parliament of clear dispositions regarding the respect for the independence of the judicial system by members of Parliament..." (p. 14); the placement "... of the independence of the justice and its role in the context of the balance of powers" (p. 14) at the centre of the debates regarding a new Constitution. The recommendations related to the reform of the judicial system stipulate: that "the present stage of the reform of the Romanian judicial codes should be quickly concluded through an accord in Parliament regarding the changing of the codes, by adopting only the changes that respect the opinions of the judicial institutions, as they were presented in the Government" (p. 15); "the elaboration by the Superior Council of Magistracy of a clear plan through which it could be ensured that the new deadline for the implementation of the outstanding dispositions from the Code of Civil Procedure could be respected" (p. 15). The Commission recommends Romania to continue the fight against corruption thusly: by using "EU funds for the dissemination of efficient pre-emptive measures against low-level corruption..."; "... improving the rates of actual recovery"; implementing a new strategy and plan of action in matters of public acquisitions, "by ensuring an anti-corruption framework that is solid from the point of view of the judicial frame, of the institutional mechanisms and of the administrative capacity..." (p. 15).

The 2017 Report[42] touches on the progress from the years 2014 – 2016 which outlined irreversible reforms. However, despite the expectancies, the events that took place in Romania in 2017 have interrupted the line of progress. "The sudden introduction of certain changes, by means of Parliament, hinders the task of proving the sustainability of the judicial frame in domains such as corruption" (p. 3). In regards to the reform of the judicial system, the Commission recommends Romania that: "the present stage of the reform of the Romanian Criminal Code and of the Code of Criminal Procedure should be concluded and Parliament should put into practice the plans of adopting the changes presented by the Government in 2016, after the consultation with the judicial authorities" (p. 11); "the Government and Parliament should ensure complete transparency and should adequately take into account the consultations with the relevant authorities and with the parties interested in the frame of the decisional process and in the legislative activity related to the Criminal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure, to the anti-corruptions laws, to the laws in matters of integrity (incompatibility, conflicts of interest, illicit assets), to the justice laws (referring to the organisation of the judicial system), as well as to the Civil Code and the Code of Civil Procedure, by taking inspiration from the transparency of the decisional process implemented by the Government in 2016" (p. 11). The Commission recommends Romania to continue the fight against corruption at all levels and to initiate actions for the adoption of certain "objective criteria for making and motivating decisions for lifting parliamentary immunity in order to ensure that the immunity is not used in order to avoid the criminal investigation and prosecution for corruption" (p. 14); to ensure that "The National Agency for the Management of Seized Assets is completely and effectively operational, so that to be able to publish the first annual report with viable statistical information regarding the confiscation of criminal assets" (p. 15).

[40] Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on Progress in Romania under the Co-operation and Verification Mechanism, COM (2015) 35 final, https://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2015/RO/1-2015-35-RO-F1-1.PDF, accessed April 2018.

[41] Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on Progress in Romania under the Co-operation and Verification Mechanism, COM (2016) 41 final, https://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2016/RO/1-2016-41-RO-F1-1.PDF, accessed April 2018.

[42] Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on Progress in Romania under the Co-operation and Verification Mechanism, COM (2017) 44 final, https://ec.europa.eu/info/sites/info/files/com-2017-44_ro_1.pdf, accessed April 2018.

5. Conclusions

After 2007, the EU invested in Romania with the responsibility that the latter would accomplish reforms in the following domains: the independence of the judicial system, the efficiency of the judicial system, integrity and the fight against corruption. All of these four objectives of reference defined at the moment of the accession cover the aspects essential for the functioning of an EU Member State. According to the theoretical perspective that has been presented, the EU's and Romania's choice in this first stage would come under the model of rational institutionalism. Romania has committed itself to implementing a pack that combines legislative and institutional measures in order to fulfil the proposed objectives, under the EU supervision but also with the financial and logistic help of the latter. The CVM represents the EU instrument where the progress but also the recommendations that the deciding Romanian factors are advised to follow are mentioned. The moment the objective will be reached, when the progress will be irreversible, Romania will be in accordance with EU democracies. The link between the rule of law as the basis for democratic regimes has been argued for in the first part of the paper as well. The examples presented and taken from the report of the Efficiency of the Co-operation and Verification Mechanism for Romania, compiled by the Romanian Centre for European Policies, but also the CVM reports show for the most part a resistance from the part of Romania in accomplishing the reforms but also certain progress (the years 2014, 2015, 2016). The recorded progress shows the role as an agent of change that the EU fulfils. The EU influence is also reflected in the change in attitude for a part of the Romanian elite, but especially for the civil society in Romania. These changes signify the fact that the EU values have been understood, positively received, shared, internalized and supported by a majority of Romanian citizens (see the model of social institutionalism). Opinion surveys are an argument to this end.[43] The moment when the measures taken by Romania will be felt by Romanian citizens, will be incorporated in the judicial and institutional frame, and the progress in matters of reforms will be irreversible, the final purpose of the CVM will be reached and the Romania – EU relationship will be considered a responsible one.

References

- Baracani, Elena, "EU Democratic Rules of Law Promotion" in Amichai Magen & Leonardo Morlino, International Actors, Democratization and the Rules of Law, Anchoring Democracy?, (New York: Routledge Edition, 2009)
- Börzel, Tanja & Risse, Thomas, "From Europeanisation to Diffusion: Introduction", West European Politics, 35 (1) (2012): 1-19
- Centrul Român pentru Politici Publice, Eficiența Mecanismului de Cooperare și Verificare pentru România, Policy Memo (16) (2010): 9, http://www.crpe.ro/wp-content/uploads/2012/09/CRPE-Policy-Memo-nr.16-Merită-păstrat.-Eficiența-Mecanismului-de-Cooperare-și-Verificare-pentru-România.pdf, accessed April 2018
- Dahl, Robert, "Can international organizations be democratic? A skeptic's view", in David Held & Anthony McGrew, The Global Transformation Reader, (Boston: Polity Press, 2003), 530-541
- Farell, Henry & Héritier, Adrienne, "A rationalist-institutionalist explanation of endogenous regional integration", Journal of European Public Policy, 12 (2) (2005): 273-290
- Fuller, Lon L., The Morality of Law, (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1969)
- Godefridi, Drieu, "État de droit, liberté et démocratie ", Politique et Sociétés, 23(1) (2004): 143-169
- Goodin, E Robert, Protecting the Vulnerable: A Re-analysis of Our Social Responsibilities, (Chicago Illionois: Chicago University Press, 1985)
- Institutul European din România, Acte privind aderarea Republicii Bulgaria și a României la Uniunea Europeană, (București, 2006), http://beta.ier.ro/documente/Tratate/DCT_Tratat_aderare_Bg_Ro.pd, accessed February 2018
- Jenson, Jane & Mérand, Frédéric, "Sociology, institutionalism and the European Union", Comparative European Politics, 8(1) (2010): 74-92
- Khan, Zillur R., The Concept of Justice and Democracy, IPSA Prepared for Presentation at the AIBS, (Dhaka, Bangladesh, March 15, 2011), http://rc37.ipsa.org/post/2011/03/29/The-Concept-of-Justice-and-Democracy, accessed March 2018

[43] Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on Progress in Romania under the Co-operation and Verification Mechanism, COM (2016) 41 final, p. 2, https://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2016/RO/1-2016-41-RO-F1-1.PDF, accessed April 2018.

- Keohane, Robert, "The Concept of Accountability in World Politics and the Use of Force", Michigan Journal of International Law, 24 (4) (2003): 1–21
- Markov, Dimitar, The Cooperation and Verification Mechanism Three Years Later: What Has Been Done and What Is Yet to Come , Sofia, Bulgaria: Friedrich Ebert Foundation, 2010)
- Montesquieu, Œuvres complètes, tome II, (Paris: Bibliothèque de la Pléiade, 1958)
- Morlino, Leonardo & Magen, Amichai, EU Rule of Law Promotion in Romania, Turkey and Serbia-Montenegro: Domestic Elites and Responsiveness to Differentiated External Influence, Workshop on "Promoting Democracy and the Rule of Law: American and European Strategies and Instruments", (CDDRL, SIIS Stanford, 2004)
- Pauw, Willem de, Expert Report on the Fight Against Corruption/Cooperation and Verification Mechanism, Bucharest, November 12-15, 2007. The report was published on July 3, 2008 to the online edition of The Economist, "The European Union conceals Romania's backsliding on corruption", https://www.economist.com/node/11670671, accessed March 2018
- Rawls, John, "Distributive Justice: Some Addenda," in Samuel Freeman (ed), John Rawls. Collected Papers, (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1999), 154-175
- Schimmelfennig, Frank & Sedelmeier, Ulrich, The Europeanization of Central and Eastern Europe. (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 2005)
- "The rule of law and transitional justice in conflict and post-conflict societies", 23.08.2004, S/2004/616, http://archive.ipu.org/splz-e/unga07/law.pdf, accessed March 2018
- Wolchik, Sharon & Curry, Jane, Central and East European Politics from communist to Democracy, (Lanham Maryland: Rowman & Littlefield Publishers, INC., 2008)
- Comunicare a Comisiei către Consiliu și Parlamentul European, Raport privind evoluţia măsurilor de acompaniere în România după aderare, Bruxelles, 27.06.2007, p.2, https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legalcontent/RO/TXT/?uri=CELEX%3A52007DC0378, accessed February 2018
- Conclusions of the Presidency. European Council in Copenhagen 21-22 june, 1993, SN 180/1/93 REV 1, https://www.consilium.europa.eu/media/21225/72921.pdf, accessed March 2018
- Decizia 2006/928/CE a Comisiei din 13 decembrie 2006 de stabilire a unui mecanism de cooperare și de verificare a progresului realizat de România în vederea atingerii anumitor obiective de referință specifice în domeniul reformei sistemului judiciar și al luptei împotriva corupției, https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/?uri=celex%3A32006D0928, accessed March 2018
- Document de lucru al serviciilor Comisiei. România: raport tehnic de însoțire a documentului. Raportul Comisiei către Parlamentul European și Consiliu privind progresele realizate în românia în cadrul mecanismului de cooperare și de verificare,SWD (2012) 231 final, p. 48, http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/PDF/?uri=CELEX:52012SC0231&from=ro, Accessed April 2018
- Eficienţa Mecanismului de Cooperare şi Verificare pentru România, Centrul român de politici europene, Policy Memo nr. 16, November 2010, p.9
- Presidency Conclusions, Luxembourg European Council, 12-13. 12. 2007, http://www.europarl.europa.eu/summits/lux1_en.htm, accessed March 2018
- Raport Comisiei către Parlamentul European și Consiliu privind Evoluția Măsurilor de Acompaniere în România după Aderare, COM(2007) 378 final, p.3. Http://Eur-Lex.Europa.Eu/Legal-Content/Ro/Txt/Pdf/?Uri=Celex:52007dc0378&From=Ro, accessed March 2018
- Raport al Comisiei către Parlamentul European și privind progresele realizate de România în cadrul mecanismului de cooperare și verificare, COM(2008) 494 final, http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/PDF/?uri=CELEX:52008DC0494&from=RO, accessed March 2018
- Raport al Comisiei către Parlamentul European și privind progresele realizate de România în cadrul mecanismului de cooperare și verificare, COM(2009) 401 final https://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2009/RO/1-2009-401-RO-F1-1.Pdf, accessed April 2018
- Raport al Comisiei către Parlamentul European și privind progresele realizate de România în cadrul mecanismului de cooperare și verificare, COM(2010) 401 final https://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2010/RO/1-2010-401-RO-F1-1.Pdf, accessed April 2018
- Raport al Comisiei către Parlamentul European și privind progresele realizate de România în cadrul mecanismului de cooperare și verificare, COM(2011) 460 final https://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2011/RO/1-2011-460-RO-F1-1.Pdf, accessed April 2018
- Raport al Comisiei către Parlamentul European și privind progresele realizate de România în cadrul mecanismului de cooperare și verificare, COM(2012) 410 final, https://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2012/RO/1-2012-410-RO-F1-1.Pdf, accessed April, 2018
- Raport al Comisiei către Parlamentul European și privind progresele realizate de România în cadrul mecanismului de cooperare și verificare, COM (2013) 47 final, https://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2013/RO/1-2013-47-RO-F1-1.Pdf, accessed April 2018
- Raport al Comisiei către Parlamentul European și privind progresele realizate de România în cadrul mecanismului de cooperare și verificare, COM (2014) 37 final, https://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2014/RO/1-2014-37-RO-F1-1.Pdf, accessed April 2018
- Raport al Comisiei către Parlamentul European și privind progresele realizate de România în cadrul mecanismului de cooperare și verificare, COM (2015) 35 final, https://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2015/RO/1-2015-35-RO-F1-1.PDF, accessed April 2018

- Raport al Comisiei către Parlamentul European și privind progresele realizate de România în cadrul mecanismului de cooperare și verificare, COM (2016) 41 final, https://ec.europa.eu/transparency/regdoc/rep/1/2016/RO/1-2016-41-RO-F1-1.PDF, accessed April 2018
- Raport al Comisiei către Parlamentul European și privind progresele realizate de România în cadrul mecanismului de cooperare și verificare, COM (2017) 44 final, https://ec.europa.eu/info/sites/info/files/com-2017-44_ro_1.pdf, accessed April 2018

THE LEGAL EFFECTS OF THE EUROPEAN UNION CITIZENSHIP

Oana-Mihaela SALOMIA[*]

Abstract

The citizenship of the European Union is a reality or a concept? The consecration of the citizenship of the European Union by the Maastrich0t Treaty has been accompanied by the specific rights allowed to the citizens of the Member States. At the present, the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union and the Charter of fundamental rights of the European Union mention the definition of the citizen of the European Union, the features and role of its citizenship: „Every person holding the nationality of a Member State shall be a citizen of the Union. Citizenship of the Union shall be additional to and not replace national citizenship". In the Preamble of the Treaty on the European Union, the Member States affirm that they are „resolved to establish a citizenship common to nationals of their countries".

The Court of Justice of the European Union has stated the importance of this concept and its application in relationship with the specific rights of the citizens of the Member States: „Union citizenship is destined to be the fundamental status of nationals of the Member States".

The concept has a certain applicablility in different fields as Internal Market or European Union's area of freedom, security and justice with legal effects in terms of rights and obligations. The citizenship of the European Union does exist but its added value will be tangible at the moment when our ID cards or passports will contain a reference to that; if the citizens of the Member States express their interest in this regard and the political commitement will be evinced, the national citizenship could be replaced with the European Union citizenship on the moment of the Treaties revision's, but, nowadays, according to art. 4. 2 of the Treaty on the European Union, „The Union shall respect the equality of Member States before the Treaties as well as their national identities, inherent in their fundamental structures, political and constitutional, inclusive of regional and local self-government".

In conclusion, the citizenship of the European Union must be analyzed in a dynamic evolution thanking into account its development, the interest and commitement of the Member States and their citizens and the future of the European Union.

Keywords: the citizenship of the European Union, rights, ID cards, Member States, Court of Justice of the European Union equal treatment, future, integration, legal effects.

1. General remarks

Since antiquity the citizenship allowed to a person belonging to a territory governed by an authority has been a source of rights and obligations for that person as individual placed closer or farther from the powerhouse depending on the type of government.

The citizenship represents one of the features of a state as subject of international public law, but European Union (EU) as international intergovernmental organization has created the same relationship with the citizens of its Member States proving the desire of a deep integration.

The establishment of the European Union in the same time with the citizenship of the European Union through the Maastricht Treaty[1] has demonstrated a clear trend for the evolution of this subject of international public law representing a new step within the process of the European integration; European Union is the solely international intergovernmental organization having created a specific citizenship[2].

According with the Treaties and the case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU), the European citizenship allows different rights for the citizens of the Member States[3] being a concept with legal effects and without a legal mention on the national identity cards; setting up such mention depends on the interest of the citizens and the political commitment on that.

The legal effects of the consecration of such citizenship are underlined establishing the list of the rights allowed to the citizens of the Member States by the Treaties, legal acts adopted by the EU institutions on the basis of the Treaties and the case-law of the Court of Justice from Luxembourg; the EU institutions and the Member States are obliged to observe their correct and efficient application.

[*] Assistant Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, University of Bucharest (e-mail: oana.salomia@drept.unibuc.ro)

[1] Augustin Fuerea, Manualul Uniunii Europene (6th edition, revised, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2016), 68. „An unional citizenship" has been estsablished by this Treaty.

[2] https://www.uantwerpen.be/en/conferences/the-future-of-eu-citizenship-2017/about-the-conference/abstracts/additional-materials/, accesed March 10, 2018: EU Citizenship as 'Inter-National' Citizenship – A Republican Intergovernmental Approach, Richard Bellamy: „EU citizenship often seen as 'transformative' of national citizenship".

[3] The rights conferred on the Union citizenship has been recognized also by the European Court of Human Rights (see case of Matthews v. The United Kingdom, Application no. 24833/94, judgment, 18 February 1999, para.14:"Although Gibraltar is not part of the United Kingdom in domestic terms, by virtue of a declaration made by the United Kingdom government at the time of the entry into force of the British Nationality Act 1981, the term "nationals" and derivatives used in the EC Treaty are to be understood as referring, inter alia, to British citizens and to British Dependent Territories citizens who acquire their citizenship from a connection with Gibraltar").

1.1. Related definitions:

The international legal instruments adopted in the field of human rights ensure and guarantee the respect of those rights for everyone and in the specific cases it is identified the category of persons who are considered by these legal texts; the citizen represents one of those categories.

The main definitions relevant for the analysis of the European Union citizenship can be the following:

- "The human being" or "everyone"[4] is used within the international human rights legal instruments the person or the individual, who is in a dynamic process of recognition as a subject of public international law. In the specialized doctrine, it is mentioned that "the position and activity of the individual within the macro and micro-social groups to which he belongs can be explained sociologically with the concepts of status and role of the individual", and "the status of the individual is defined as all the rights and duties of the individual within an existing group"[5] .

The preamble of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union uses the term of individual in connection with the European citizenship: "It places the individual at the heart of its activities, by establishing the citizenship of the Union and by creating an area of freedom, security and justice". In the meantime, the provisions of the Charter guarantee specific rights to "everyone" (for example art.11.1: "Everyone has the right to freedom of expression").

- The citizenship expresses the belonging of a person to a particular state or to another subject of international law - namely the European Union[6] .

The Romanian Constitution of 2003, republished, regulates, in art. 5, the Romanian citizenship, which "is acquired, is preserved or is lost under the conditions stipulated by the organic law" and "cannot be withdrawn from the person who acquired it by birth"; moreover, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights guarantees, in art. 15 that: (1) "everyone has the right to a nationality"; (2) "no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality nor denied the right to change his nationality".

- The "Union citizen means any person having the nationality of a Member State"[7], according to art. 2.1. of Directive 2004/38/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 29 April 2004 on the right of citizens of the Union and their family members to move and reside freely within the territory of the Member States amending Regulation (EEC) No 1612/68 and repealing Directives 64/221/EEC, 68/360/EEC, 72/194/EEC, 73/148/EEC, 75/34/EEC, 75/35/EEC, 90/364/EEC, 90/365/EEC and 93/96/EEC.
- The national[8] is a term used by the European Union law to designate the natural or legal person having the citizenship, or the nationality of a state in accordance with its domestic law.

The art.9 of the Treaty on the European Union (TEU) uses the both terms – citizen and national: "Every national of a Member State shall be a citizen of the Union". The Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU) provisions on the four fundamental freedoms mention also the term "national" or "nationality"[9] one of the reasons being the fact that these freedoms have been guaranteed, firstly, by the Treaty of Rome on the establishing the European Economic Community when the citizenship of the European Union was not yet introduced, for example:

- Art. 45.2 TFEU: "Such freedom of movement shall entail the abolition of any discrimination based on nationality between workers of the Member States as regards employment, remuneration and other conditions of work and employment";

---

[4] Art. 2.1 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Rome, November 4, 1950: „Everyone's right to life shall be protected by law".

Universal Declaration of Human Rights, December 10, 1948: Article I "All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights"; Article 3 "Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person".

[5] Nicolae Popa, Ioan Mihăilescu, Mihail Eremia, Sociologie juridică, (Editura Universității din București, Bucharest, 1999), 34.

[6] http://www.europarl.europa.eu/atyourservice/en/displayFtu.html?ftuId=FTU_4.1.1.html, accesed March 10, 2018: „In case C-135/08 Janko Rottmann v Freistaat Bayern, Advocate General Poiares Maduro at the CJEU explained the difference (paragraph 23): 'Those are two concepts which are both inextricably linked and independent. Union citizenship assumes nationality of a Member State but it is also a legal and political concept independent of that of nationality. Nationality of a Member State not only provides access to enjoyment of the rights conferred by Community law; it also makes us citizens of the Union. European citizenship is more than a body of rights which, in themselves, could be granted even to those who do not possess it. It presupposes the existence of a political relationship between European citizens, although it is not a relationship of belonging to a people' ".

[7] Decision, CJEU, Janko Rottmann v Freistaat Bayern, March 2, 2010, C-135/08, ECLI:EU:C:2010:104: „It is not contrary to European Union law, in particular to Article 17 EC, for a Member State to withdraw from a citizen of the Union the nationality of that State acquired by naturalisation when that nationality was obtained by deception, on condition that the decision to withdraw observes the principle of proportionality".

[8] In the French language, the term is „resortissant" which is also mentioned in the Romania Accession Treaty (ratified by the Law no 157/2005) as „resortisant".

[9] Roxana-Mariana Popescu, „ECJ Case-Law on the Concept of „Public Administration" used in Article 45 paragraph (4) TFEU", The International Conference – CKS 2017 – Challenges of the Knowledge Society Bucharest, 12th - 13th May 2017, 11th Edition, "Nicolae Titulescu" University Publishing House, 528: "The provisions of the EU treaties refer to citizenship, and not nationality, and condition the EU citizenship of the existence of citizenship of a Member State (Art. 9 TEU and art. 20 paragraph (1) sentences 2 and 3 TFEU: „any person holding the nationality of a Member State is citizen of the Union. The citizenship of the Union does not replace the national citizenship but it is additional to it"). Thus, in strictly constitutional terms, the citizenship of the Union, established by the Treaty of Maastricht of 1992 and developed by the Treaty of Lisbon of 2007, it is not comparable to that given to a citizen of one of the 28 Member States. EU citizenship puts people under the protection of EU law (according to Augustin Fuerea, Dreptul Uniunii Europene – principii, acțiuni, libertăți, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p. 193). EU citizenship confers a number of rights to citizens of the Member States and strengthens the protection of their interests".

– Art. 49 TFEU: "restrictions on the freedom of establishment of nationals of a Member State in the territory of another Member State shall be prohibited";

– Art. 56 TFEU: "restrictions on freedom to provide services within the Union shall be prohibited in respect of nationals of Member States who are established in a Member State other than that of the person for whom the services are intended".

Council Directive 2003/109/EC of 25 November 2003 concerning the status of third-country nationals who are long-term residents, provides that "third-country national means any person who is not a citizen of the Union within the meaning of Article 17(1) of the Treaty" (now art. 20 TFEU)[10]. In this regard, art.15.3 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union uses the same word: "Nationals of third countries who are authorised to work in the territories of the Member States are entitled to working conditions equivalent to those of citizens of the Union".

Initially, the citizenship has been defined using the term "nationality" which is still used by some national supreme laws (for example, the Sweden's Constitution)[11].

- According with the Directive 2004/38/EC , the "Family member" means:

"(a) the spouse;

(b) the partner with whom the Union citizen has contracted a registered partnership, on the basis of the legislation of a Member State, if the legislation of the host Member State treats registered partnerships as equivalent to marriage and in accordance with the conditions laid down in the relevant legislation of the host Member State;

(c) the direct descendants who are under the age of 21 or are dependants and those of the spouse or partner as defined in point (b);

(d) the dependent direct relatives in the ascending line and those of the spouse or partner as defined in point (b)".

1.2. The legal effects of the citizenship of the European Union:

As the Court of Justice of the European Union stated, the "Union citizenship is destined to be the fundamental status of nationals of the Member States, enabling those who find themselves in the same situation to enjoy the same treatment in law irrespective of their nationality, subject to such exceptions as are expressly provided for"[12] , while "As regards Article 20 TFEU, the Treaty provisions on citizenship of the Union do not confer any autonomous right on third-country nationals. Any rights conferred on third-country nationals by the Treaty provisions on Union citizenship are not autonomous rights of those nationals but rights derived from the exercise of freedom of movement by a Union citizen. The purpose and justification of those derived rights are based on the fact that a refusal to allow them would be such as to interfere with the Union citizen's freedom of movement by discouraging him from exercising his rights of entry into and residence in the host Member State"[13].

The art.20 of the Treaty on the functioning of the European Union mentions that the citizens of the Union have „inter alia" the following rights[14] :

„ (a) the right to move and reside freely within the territory of the Member States;

(b) the right to vote and to stand as candidates in elections to the European Parliament[15] and in municipal elections in their Member State of residence, under the same conditions as nationals of that State;

(c) the right to enjoy, in the territory of a third country in which the Member State of which they are nationals is not represented, the protection of the diplomatic and consular authorities of any Member State on the same conditions as the nationals of that State;

(d) the right to petition the European Parliament, to apply to the European Ombudsman, and to address the institutions and advisory bodies of the Union in any of the Treaty languages and to obtain a reply in the same language".

[10] Decision, CJEU, March 8, 2011, Gerardo Ruiz Zambrano, v Office national de l'emploi (ONEm), C-34/09, ECLI:EU:C:2011:124: „Article 20 TFEU is to be interpreted as meaning that it precludes a Member State from refusing a third country national upon whom his minor children, who are European Union citizens, are dependent, a right of residence in the Member State of residence and nationality of those children, and from refusing to grant a work permit to that third country national, in so far as such decisions deprive those children of the genuine enjoyment of the substance of the rights attaching to the status of European Union citizen".

[11] Ștefan Deaconu, Drept constituțional, (3rd edition – revised, C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2017), 122.

[12] Decision, CJEC, Septembre 20, 2001, Rudy Grzelczyk and Centre public d'aide sociale d'Ottignies-Louvain-la-Neuve, C-184/99, ECLI:EU:C:2001:458 para. 31.

[13] Decision, CJEC, May 8, 2013, Kreshnik Ymeraga, Kasim Ymeraga, Afijete Ymeraga-Tafarshiku, Kushtrim Ymeraga, Labinot Ymeraga v Ministre du Travail, de l'Emploi et de l'Immigration, C-87/12, ECLI:EU:C:2013:291 para.34-35.

[14] See Ștefan Deaconu, 143. See Augustin Fuerea, Dreptul Uniunii Europene – principii, acțiuni, libertăți, (Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2016), 193.

[15] Article 39.1 Right to vote and to stand as a candidate at elections to the European Parliament of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union: "Every citizen of the Union has the right to vote and to stand as a candidate at elections to the European Parliament in the Member State in which he or she resides, under the same conditions as nationals of that State".

WHITE PAPER ON THE FUTURE OF EUROPE. Reflections and scenarios for the EU27 by 2025, European Commission COM(2017)2025 of 1 March 2017, p. 25: „Illustrative snapshots: Citizens travelling abroad receive consular protection and assistance from EU embassies, which in some parts of the world have replaced national ones. Non-EU citizens wishing to travel to Europe can process visa applications through the same network".

The articles 21- 24 of the same Treaty explain the content of each of the mentioned rights:

- „Every citizen of the Union shall have the right to move and reside freely within the territory of the Member States, subject to the limitations and conditions laid down in the Treaties and by the measures adopted to give them effect"[16] .
- The Directive 2004/38/EC above-mentioned is named „the Citizenship directive" and „lays down: (a) the conditions governing the exercise of the right of free movement and residence within the territory of the Member States by Union citizens and their family members; (b) the right of permanent residence in the territory of the Member States for Union citizens and their family members; (c) the limits placed on the rights set out in (a) and (b) on grounds of public policy, public security or public health"[17] .
- „Every citizen of the Union residing in a Member State of which he is not a national shall have the right to vote and to stand as a candidate at municipal elections in the Member State, in which he resides, under the same conditions as nationals of that State"[18] .
- „Every citizen of the Union shall, in the territory of a third country in which the Member State of which he is a national is not represented, be entitled to protection by the diplomatic or consular authorities of any Member State, on the same conditions as the nationals of that State. Member States shall adopt the necessary provisions and start the international negotiations required to secure this protection"[19].

In this regard, it has been adopted the Council Directive (EU) 2015/637 of 20 April 2015 on the coordination and cooperation measures to facilitate consular protection for unrepresented citizens of the Union in third countries and repealing Decision 95/553/EC[20] which must be transposed by the Member States by 1 May 2018.

The effectiveness of this right must take into account the commitment of the third country for recognizing the consular protection of other state than the state of the nationality/citizenship[21] .

- „The European Parliament and the Council, acting by means of regulations in accordance with the ordinary legislative procedure, shall adopt the provisions for the procedures and conditions required for a citizens' initiative within the meaning of Article 11 of the Treaty on European Union, including the minimum number of Member States from which such citizens must come".

The conditions for using citizens' initiative have been stated by the Regulation (EU) no 211/2011 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 16 February 2011 on the citizens' initiative[22] .

- „Every citizen of the Union shall have the right to petition the European Parliament in accordance with Article 227"[23] .

The European Parliament represents the interests of the people or the citizens of the Union because this institution is „composed of representatives of the Union's citizens" (art. 14.2 TEU) and the „citizens are directly represented at Union level in the European Parliament" (art.10.2 of the TEU).

- „Every citizen of the Union may apply to the Ombudsman established in accordance with Article [16] Decision, CJEU, May 5, 2011, Shirley McCarthy v Secretary of State for the Home Department, C-434/09, ECLI:EU:C:2011:277: „Article 21 TFEU is not applicable to a Union citizen who has never exercised his right of free movement, who has always resided in a Member State of which he is a national and who is also a national of another Member State, provided that the situation of that citizen does not include the application of measures by a Member State that would have the effect of depriving him of the genuine enjoyment of the substance of the rights conferred by virtue of his status as a Union citizen or of impeding the exercise of his right of free movement and residence within the territory of the Member States".

---

Article 45 Freedom of movement and of residence of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union::"1. Every citizen of the Union has the right to move and reside freely within the territory of the Member States. 2. Freedom of movement and residence may be granted, in accordance with the Treaties, to nationals of third countries legally resident in the territory of a Member State".

[17] This Directive has been transposed in Romania through the Government Emergency Ordinance no 102/2005 on the free movement on the Romanian territory of the citizens of the European Union Member States and the European Economic Area and the Switzerland citizens.

[18] See the art. 5 of the Romanian Law no. 115/2015 on the election of the local public administration's autorities.

Article 40 Right to vote and to stand as a candidate at municipal elections of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union: "Every citizen of the Union has the right to vote and to stand as a candidate at municipal elections in the Member State in which he or she resides under the same conditions as nationals of that State".

[19] Article 46 Diplomatic and consular protection of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union: „Every citizen of the Union shall, in the territory of a third country in which the Member State of which he or she is a national is not represented, be entitled to protection by the diplomatic or consular authorities of any Member State, on the same conditions as the nationals of that Member State".

[20] https://ec.europa.eu/info/aid-development-cooperation-fundamental-rights/your-rights-eu/know-your-rights/citizens-rights/diplomatic-and-consular-protection_en, accesed March 10, 2018.

[21] Laura Magdalena Trocan, „Protecția cetățenilor Uniunii Europene de către autoritățile diplomatice și consulare în țările terțe", Probleme actuale ale spațiului politico-juridic al UE, (2013 edition, October 24-25 2013, Politicile europene în domeniul drepturilor omului: Cetățenia europeană-Implicațiile Cartei Drepturilor Fundamentale ale Uniunii Europene asupra spațiului juridic din România, Supplement of Revista Română de Drept European, Wolters Kluwer), 168.

[22] http://ec.europa.eu/citizens-initiative/public/welcome, accesed March 10, 2018: „The European citizens' initiative allows one million EU citizens to participate directly in the development of EU policies, by calling on the European Commission to make a legislative proposal".

[23] Any citizen of the Union, and any natural or legal person residing or having its registered office in a Member State, shall have the right to address, individually or in association with other citizens or persons, a petition to the European Parliament on a matter which comes within the Union's fields of activity and which affects him, her or it directly".

Article 44 Right to petition of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union:" Any citizen of the Union and any natural or legal person residing or having its registered office in a Member State has the right to petition the European Parliament".

228”[24].

„By the Decision of the European Ombudsman on Records Management in the Office of the European Ombudsman, 13 March 2017, „the European Ombudsman decided to promote the principle of online public registers by adopting the following provisions:

8.1 For the purpose of coherence in the EU administration, sound financial management and service to the public users, the European Ombudsman takes steps to further the use of a corporate public documents and data register and/or portal for the EU administration.

8.2 Pending the outcome of the above-mentioned actions, the Ombudsman implements, for its organization, the principle of online public registers through publication of core business documents on its online cases section, through direct and full publication of all documents adopted in relation to strategy, policy and high level management, and through the publication of its document filing plan.”[25]

- „Every citizen of the Union may write to any of the institutions or bodies referred to in this Article or in Article 13 of the Treaty on European Union in one of the languages mentioned in Article 55(1) of the Treaty on European Union and have an answer in the same language”[26] .

In different parts of the Treaties, the EU citizens benefit from other rights (see art. 10.3 TEU: “Every citizen shall have the right to participate in the democratic life of the Union. Decisions shall be taken as openly and as closely as possible to the citizen”) or those rights are developed and explained in the context of EU policies and actions; the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union ensures also the respect of other rights allowed to the EU citizens such as: “Right of access to documents - Any citizen of the Union, and any natural or legal person residing or having its registered office in a Member State, has a right of access to documents of the institutions, bodies, offices and agencies of the Union, whatever their medium” (art. 42).

The pursuit of these rights is assured by the European Union on the principle of equal treatement for all citizens in accordance with the art. 9 of the TEU which states: „in all its activities, the Union shall observe the principle of the equality of its citizens, who shall receive equal attention from its institutions, bodies, offices and agencies”.

3. The future development of the citizenship of the European Union concept

One of the most important challenges for the development of the European citizenship’s is represented by the creation of the specific ID cards. The Directorate general for internal policies (Policy department: citizens' rights and Constitutional affairs) has published in 2016 “The legal and political context for setting up a European identity document Study”.

On the “legal and political feasibility of a European Identity document”, this Study mentions the existence of the constitutional European Union’s principles:

- “There is no legal basis in the Treaties to legislate in connection with a European ID card, with the sole purpose of enhancing citizens’ participation in democratic processes at the EU level. Legal basis for action at the EU level is provided in connection with the enhancement of free movement rights, which rights however cannot be seen in isolation from other EU citizenship rights (principle of conferral).
- Given that there are factors hindering the exercise of democratic participation rights by EU citizens which cannot be overcome by the Member States alone (principle of subsidiarity), EU action is necessary. While shaping the concept of a European ID card it should be assessed whether or not it is the most appropriate and least onerous tool to resolve the issues identified (principle of proportionality).
- The process of setting up a European ID card cannot be seen in isolation from data protection legislation and rules applicable to interoperability of electronic identification schemes. In terms of data protection, the storage of, access to and control of personal data are the main issues to consider. The need to ensure the interoperability of a European ID card with electronic identification schemes at the national level should also be addressed.
- Considering the variety of actors involved in decision-making processes at the EU level and thus the plethora of interests, it is crucial for the introduction of a European ID card to be backed by a sufficient level of political will. Member States’ views might be controversial on many points, including the amount of data to be stored on the card or the link of the card with databases”.

The Union’s competence to regulate in connection with ID cards is set out in art. 77(3) of the TFEU which provides that within a special legislative [24] „A European Ombudsman, elected by the European Parliament, shall be empowered to receive complaints from any citizen of the Union or any natural or legal person residing or having its registered office in a Member State concerning instances of maladministration in the activities of the Union institutions, bodies, offices or agencies, with the exception of the Court of Justice of the European Union acting in its judicial role. He or she shall examine such complaints and report on them”.

Article 43 European Ombudsman of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union: “Any citizen of the Union and any natural or legal person residing or having its registered office in a Member State has the right to refer to the European Ombudsman cases of maladministration in the activities of the institutions, bodies, offices or agencies of the Union, with the exception of the Court of Justice of the European Union acting in its judicial role”.

[25] https://www.ombudsman.europa.eu/en/resources/publicregister.faces, accesed March 10, 2018.

[26] Article 41 Right to good administration of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union: „4. Every person may write to the institutions of the Union in one of the languages of the Treaties and must have an answer in the same language” procedure the Council may adopt provisions concerning ID cards[27] , in cases where EU level action would become necessary to facilitate the exercise of the rights under Article 20(2) (a) of the TFEU.

In the field of data protection, at the level of the European Union the following acts have been adopted:

- Regulation (EU) 2016/679 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 27 April 2016 on the protection of natural persons with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data, and repealing Directive 95/46/EC;
- Directive (EU) 2016/680 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 27 April 2016 on the protection of natural persons with regard to the processing of personal data by competent authorities for the purposes of the prevention, investigation, detection or prosecution of criminal offences or the execution of criminal penalties, and on the free movement of such data, and repealing Council Framework Decision 2008/977/JHA.

The third European Commissions' report[28] on the EU citizenship – "EU Citizenship Report 2017 - Strengthening Citizens' Rights in a Union of Democratic Change Justice and Consumers" provides also that "On 8 December 2016, the Commission adopted an Action Plan on document security setting out specific actions to improve the security of travel documents, including that of national identity cards issued by Member States and of residence documents for EU nationals residing in another Member State and their family members".

The report provides with information about the EU priorities for 2017–2019 in different action fields such as:

- "Promoting EU citizenship rights and common values:

1. In 2017 and 2018 conduct an EU wide information and awareness raising campaign on EU citizenship rights including on consular protection and electoral rights ahead of the 2019 European elections.
2. Take action to strengthen the European Voluntary Service[29] and promote the benefits and integration of volunteering in education. By 2020, invite the first 100,000 young Europeans to volunteer with the European Solidarity Corps (…).
3. Safeguard the essence of EU citizenship and its inherent values."

- „Promoting and enhancing citizens' participation in the democratic life of the EU:

1. Intensify Citizens' Dialogues and encourage public debates, to improve public understanding of the impact of the EU on citizens' daily lives and to encourage an exchange of views with citizens.
2. Report in 2017 on the implementation of EU law on local elections to ensure that EU citizens can effectively exercise their voting rights at local level.
3. In 2018, promote best practices which help citizens vote and stand for EU elections, including on retaining the right to vote when moving to another Member State and cross-border access to political news, to support turnout and broad democratic participation in the perspective of the 2019 European elections".

- „Simplifying travel, living and working across the EU for citizens:

1. Submit a proposal for setting up a 'Single Digital Gateway' to give citizens easy, online access to information, assistance and problem solving services and the possibility to complete online administrative procedures in cross-border situations by linking up relevant EU and national-level content and services in a seamless, user-friendly and usercentric way[30].
2. Further facilitate and promote Euwide multimodal travel in order to make mobility of EU citizens more efficient and user-friendly, through the specification of Euwide multimodal travel information services and improvements to the interoperability and compatibility of systems and services".

- „Strengthening security and promoting equality:

1. In the first quarter of 2017 finalise the study on EU policy options to improve the security of EU citizens' identity cards and residence documents of EU citizens residing in another Member State and of their non-EU family members.
2. In 2017 assess how to modernise the rules on emergency travel documents for unrepresented EU citizens, including the security features of the EU common format, to guarantee that citizens can effectively exercise their right to consular protection.
3. Carry out in 2017 a campaign on violence against women and actively support the accession of the [27] Regulation (EU) no. 910/2014 taking full legal effect on 1 July 2016 creates an EU-wide recognition system of electronic identification.

[28] Article 25 TFEU: „The Commission shall report to the European Parliament, to the Council and to the Economic and Social Committee every three years on the application of the provisions of this Part. This report shall take account of the development of the Union".

[29] https://europa.eu/youth/EU/Voluntary-activities/european-voluntary-service_en, accesed March 10, 2018.

[30] file:///C:/Users/oanas/Desktop/PART-2017-156445V1.pdf, accesed March 10, 2018: Proposal for a Regulation of the European Parliament and of the Council on establishing a single digital gateway to provide information, procedures, assistance and problem solving services and amending Regulation (EU) no 1024/2012 COM(2017) 256 final: „This Regulation: lays down rules for the establishment and operation of a single digital gateway to provide citizens and businesses with easy access to high quality, comprehensive information, effective assistance and problem solving services and efficient procedures regarding Union and national rules applicable to citizens and businesses exercising or intending to exercise their rights derived from Union law in the field of the internal market, within the meaning of Article 26(2) TFEU; (b) facilitates the use of procedures by users from other Member States and supports the implementation of the "once only" principle; (a) lays down rules for reporting on obstacles in the internal market based on the collection of user feedback and statistics from the services covered by the gateway".

Union to the Istanbul Convention alongside Member States and present proposals to address the challenges of work-life balance for working families.

4. Act to improve the social acceptance of LGBTI people across the EU by implementing the list of actions to advance LGBTI equality and actively support the conclusion of the negotiations on the proposed horizontal Anti-Discrimination Directive".

4. Conclusions

The citizenship of the European Union represents a concept ensured by the European Union law, namely the Treaties and specific legal acts having legal effects recognized and observed by the Court of Justice of the European Union.

The existence of this citizenship depends on the citizenship/nationality of one of the Member States in accordance with the art.20.1 of TFEU, "citizenship of the Union shall be additional to and not replace national citizenship"[31] ; for that, in the Brexit's context, the withdrawal of the United Kingdom implies the deprivation for its citizens of the rights guaranteed at the moment by the European Union citizenship[32].

The legal effects of the EU citizenship can be underlined and identified at the moment when a citizen wants to benefit from one of the rights allowed by the EU law [33]; the effectiveness of those rights is evident and relevant in different economic, political and social sectors[34] - the right to work or to study in any Member State in the same conditions as the nationals of that state; the legal possibility to be involved in the activities EU's institutions or to have access at their actions in certain conditions[35] . The similar rights for the third countries family members are also observed on the basis of the EU citizenship even they do not receive automatically this legal status.

The existence of the EU citizenship represents an important characteristic of the Union which makes EU a special or sui generis international intergovernmental organization proving a deep integration of the Member States within the Union.

The main challenge for the citizens[36], national and European leaders[37] aims to set up the European identity document which will prove the Union's citizenship[38] .

In a globalization framework, keeping the citizenship does not preclude the economic, social and cultural advantages of such context and the citizenship of the European Union does not affect the respect of "the cultural and linguistic diversity"[39] and the "national identities"[40].

---

[31] Ștefan Deaconu, 143:"The European Union citizenship subsumes the Romanian citizenship".

[32] http://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_MEMO-18-1361_en.htm, accesed March 10, 2018 : „The European Council (Article 50) of 15 December 2017 stated that while an agreement on a future relationship can only be finalised and concluded once the United Kingdom has become a third country, the EU will be ready to engage in preliminary and preparatory discussions with the aim of identifying an overall understanding of the framework for the future relationship, once additional guidelines have been adopted to this effect".

For the period setteled by the Withdrawal Agreement, both categories of citizens – of EU 27 and UK will benefit from the specific rights as European citizens: „A professional who had his or her professional qualifications recognised in the country (an EU Member State or the United Kingdom) where he or she currently resides or, for frontier workers, where he or she works, will be able to continue to rely on the recognition decision there for the purpose of carrying out the professional activities linked to the use of those professional qualifications. In addition, if he or she has already applied for the recognition of his or her professional qualifications before the end of the transition period, his or her application will be processed domestically in accordance with the EU rules applicable when the application was made".

[33] WHITE PAPER ON THE FUTURE OF EUROPE, p.24:"Citizens have more rights derived directly from EU law".

[34] The legal effects of the EU citizenship can be analyzed in the recent decisions of the CJEU which seem to reduce the full application of this concept:

Decision, CJEU, Jobcenter Berlin Neukölln v Nazifa Alimanovic, Sonita Alimanovic, Valentina Alimanovic, Valentino Alimanovic, September, 15, 2015, C-67/14, ECLI:EU:C:2015:597: „Article 24 of Directive 2004/38/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 29 April 2004 on the right of citizens of the Union and their family members to move and reside freely within the territory of the Member States, amending Regulation (EEC) No 1612/68 and repealing Directives 64/221/EEC, 68/360/EEC, 72/194/EEC, 73/148/EEC, 75/34/EEC, 75/35/EEC, 90/364/EEC, 90/365/EEC and 93/96/EEC and Article 4 of Regulation (EC) No 883/2004 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 29 April 2004 on the coordination of social security systems, as amended by Commission Regulation (EU) No 1244/2010 of 9 December 2010, must be interpreted as not precluding legislation of a Member State under which nationals of other Member States who are in a situation such as that referred to in Article 14(4)(b) of that directive are excluded from entitlement to certain 'special non-contributory cash benefits' within the meaning of Article 70(2) of Regulation No 883/2004, which also constitute 'social assistance' within the meaning of Article 24(2) of Directive 2004/38, although those benefits are granted to nationals of the Member State concerned who are in the same situation".

The same decision has been stated in the case-law C-333/13, Elisabeta Dano, Florin Dano v Jobcenter Leipzig.

[35] WHITE PAPER ON THE FUTURE OF EUROPE, p.13: „However, Europe and its Member States must move quicker to interact with citizens, be more accountable and deliver better and faster on what has been collectively agreed".

[36] WHITE PAPER ON THE FUTURE OF EUROPE, p.12: „However, citizens' trust in the EU has decreased in line with that for national authorities".

[37] Preamble of the Treaty on the European Union states that the Member States are „resolved to establish a citizenship common to nationals of their countries".

[38] https://www.uantwerpen.be/en/conferences/the-future-of-eu-citizenship-2017/about-the-conference/abstracts/additional-materials/, accesed March 10, 2018:

EU Citizenship as 'Inter-National' Citizenship – A Republican Intergovernmental Approach, Richard Bellamy: „EU citizenship often seen as 'transformative' of national citizenship": „Union citizenship has to be consistent with sustainability of national citizenship as determined by stakeholders in long-term political decisions about character of state and economy. Otherwise can become itself a source of domination".

[39] Art. 3.3 TEU: „It shall respect its rich cultural and linguistic diversity".

[40] Art. 4.2 TEU: "The Union shall respect the equality of Member States before the Treaties as well as their national identities".

References

- Deaconu, Ștefan, Drept constituțional, 3rd edition – revised, C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2017
- Dumitrașcu, Mihaela-Augustina, Dreptul Uniunii Europene și specificitatea acestuia, C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2015
- Fuerea, Augustin, Manualul Uniunii Europene, 6th edition - revised, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2016
- Fuerea, Augustin, Dreptul Uniunii Europene – principii, acțiuni, libertăți, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2016
- Popa, Nicolae and Ioan Mihăilescu, Mihail Eremia, Sociologie juridică, Editura Universității din București, Bucharest, 1999
- Popescu, Roxana-Mariana, "ECJ Case-Law on the Concept of „Public Administration" used in Article 45 paragraph (4) TFEU", The International Conference – CKS 2017 – Challenges of the Knowledge Society, Bucharest, 12th - 13th May 2017, 11th Edition, "Nicolae Titulescu" University Publishing House
- Trocan, Laura Magdalena, "Protecția cetățenilor Uniunii Europene de către autoritățile diplomatice și consulare în țările terțe", Probleme actuale ale spațiului politico-juridic al UE, 2013 edition, October 24-25 2013, Politicile europene în domeniul drepturilor omului: Cetățenia europeană-Implicațiile Cartei Drepturilor Fundamentale ale Uniunii Europene asupra spațiului juridic din România, Supplement of Revista Română de Drept European, Wolters Kluwer
- https://www.uantwerpen.be/en/conferences/the-future-of-eu-citizenship-2017/about-the-conference/abstracts/additional-materials/
- https://europa.eu/youth/EU/Voluntary-activities/european-voluntary-service_en
- http://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_MEMO-18-1361_en.htm

THE CONSTITUTIONAL DIMENSION OF THE RIGHT TO A HEALTHY ENVIRONMENT

Oana ŞARAMET*

Abstract

Paradoxically, for some of us, and first of all, our lives depend on the Planet Earth on which we live. A healthy Planet Earth will allow us a beautiful, long and healthy life. In international treaties or conventions, as well as in constitutions, there is written about the right to a healthy environment, a right that is usually recongnized to each human being. Although this right is recognized, protected and even guaranteed, shouldn't we speak about our fundamental duty to ensure a healthy environment? On the other hand, even if we are speaking about the right or the duty to a healthy environment, or both of them, first of all, from a legal point of view, there should be a constitutional regulation and not just the need to ensure a healthy environment. This article, being the first step in analyzing this fundamental right of every person, examines some of the international regulations of the right to a healthy environment, but also some of the provisions from different documents of international organizations at regional level, like Council of Europe, or European Union, or Organization of American States, or African Commission on Human and Peoples' Right, and also from eleven constitutions of Eastern Europe countries, but also some aspects regarding the content of this right.

Keywords: right, environment, health, constitutional, provisions.

1. Introduction

It is the end of February, the beginning of March, 2018, and in one of the Romanian cities – Braşov – the winter of December – February, 2018, has really come true just now. Nothing special could say many, but it is one of the cities located in the heart of the Carpathian Mountains where practicing winter sports should be a true tradition. We did not intend to analyze and discuss other aspects about the practical or not practical possibility of such sports, whether economic or social, but only reveal a less pleasant and unacceptable truth for many of us –the climate with which we have grown up 20, 30 or even 40 years ago is no longer the same? We often wonder where the winters or the springs are, we limit ourselves to these two seasons which, perhaps in a paradoxical way, coexist at this time because in the calendar we read about the end of the winter and the beginning of the spring, but when we go out we have to face the winter. And, unfortunately, we are not talking about a last cry of the winter, but a real one – with serious snow, with terrible frost, with a strong blizzard. Having spent most of my life in a mountain city, I knew that winter can not only keep the three calendar months of this season, but on the contrary, it can last even 5 or 6 month, from November to March, but under no circumstances manifests itself in the fullness of its forces towards the end of February.

Moreover, paradoxically, even this municipality surrounded by mountains and forest is one of the three, alongside Bucharest and Iasi, here the standards set for improving air quality are not met, which is why they are subject to an infringement procedure by the European Commission, in Case 2009/2296 concerning the finding of non-fulfillment of the obligation established by art. 13 para (1) in conjunction with Annex XI and art. 23 para (1) of Directive 2008/50/EC on ambient air quality and cleaner air for Europe, Directive transposed at national level by the Law No. 104/15.06.2011 on ambient air quality published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, No. 452 of June 28, 2011.

We have certainly witnessed, for years, climatic changes that have become more and more visible or felt more and more, affecting the planet we live in, and obviously ourselves. It is true that it is difficult to accept the production of climate change that affects the environment and the fact that the human being is one of the primary factors that causes these changes, and also their emphasis, but we believe that the moment of acceptance has gone a long way, now being a critical moment when words must be turn into actions.

Certainly we will not be able to heal the earth by returning lost health, but at least we will be able to stop its deterioration because "[t]omorrow it is now. We are confronted with the unrelenting threat of the present moment. In this mechanism, always moving, made up of our life and history, it is possible to get too late. There is an unseen book of life in which is written, without fail, as long as we are constant in our negligence"[1].

For a long time, the international community has not been concerned about the effects that human activity, especially industrial, has done on the environment. Perhaps, when the negative effects of his activities have repercussions on the environment, being more and more visible, people has not even been aware of them, "[t]he technical congregation generating the conviction that he is master of the planet"[2]. Time has shown to people that the Planet has its limits that it can not force because of its actions it can trigger even irreversible reactions that would endanger its own life and even existence on this planet. So we have begun to learn and we are still in such a process that humanity, its existence and its evolution, depend on this planet, the reciprocal being not necessarily valid, perhaps not at all. We like and even managed to control, to rule some natural phenomena, but in the same way "[t]he mankind is increasingly threatened by the processes that it has itself generated and which seem to escape to an ever increasing degree under its control"[3].

* Lecturer, PhD, Faculty of Law, Transilvania University of Brasov (e-mail: oana.saramet@unitbv.ro)

[1] Speech of Martin Luther King, quoted by A. Gore in Un adevăr incomod, „An inconvenient truth", RAO International Publishing Company, Bucharest, 2007, pp. 3-4 from Introduction.

Defining the environment, we can say that it is "the complex of physical, chemical, and biotic factors that act upon an organism or an ecological community and ultimately determine its form and survival"[4].

If we are looking on the English Environment Protection Act 1990, we'll see that by art. 1 Par.2, the "environment" consists of all, or any, of the following media, namely, the air, water and land; and the medium of air includes the air within buildings and the air within other natural or man-made structures above or below ground.[5]

A definition in the same way is provided by the Government emergency decree No. 195/2005 regarding the environmental protection[6] in which, by art. 1 para (2) the environment is considered to be the "set of natural conditions and elements of the Earth: air, water, soil, subsoil, landscape features, all atmospheric layers, all organic and inorganic matter, and living beings, interaction, including the elements listed above, including some material and spiritual values, the quality of life and the conditions that can influence the welfare and health of man".

From the above-mentioned definitions, we can see that the environment and, above all, the provisions of a healthy environment, implicitly recognizing, protecting and guaranteeing a right to a healthy environment as a fundamental right of any human being, is in close correlation with health, respectively with the right to health or the right to health protection, as found in international and/or constitutional regulations. In fact, the right to a healthy environment, over time, from the right to health, the fundamental international human rights regulations adopted under the aegis of the United Nations, and not only.

In this paper, we propose, as a first step in the analysis of this right, to identify and analyze international regulations, as well as the national constitutional framework of some states through which the right to a healthy environment is legally enshrined.

2. Content

2.1. The right to a healthy environment in international documents

As we said in the above, "environmental and human rights treaties also neither specifically provide for, nor define the right"[7].

Thus, we will find that in the process of defining and constructing the fundamental human rights, developed especially, its protection and, moreover, at least the recognition of a fundamental human right regarding it, as well as a correlative obligation of states and even the international community were not taken into account. It was appreciated at that time, paradoxically we said after the detonation of two atomic bombs, that "[t]he environmental preservation was not a priority"[8] which is why "[n]o mention of this would have been required"[9] in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights[10]. In fact, it was noted in the doctrine, that it was not a priority for the international community, "there is no mention of environmental protection under the Universal Declaration of Human Rights"[11]. The doctrine also highlighted the fact that the enrolment in international documents of the right to a healthy environment or just environmental references was considered necessary only when the various climatic changes began to affect our dimensions considerably. In this respect, it is stated

[2] D. Marinescu, Tratat de dreptul mediului, "Treaty of Environmental Law", Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2007, p. 11.
[3] Ibidem
[4] Encyclopedia Britannica. This document is available at: https://www.britannica.com/science/environment, accessed on: 04.03.2018.
[5] The English Environment Protection Act 1990 is available at: http://www.legislation.gov.uk/ukpga/1990/43/section/1, accessed on: 05.03.2018.
[6] This emergency ordinance was published in The Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no 1196 from December 30th 2005, being adopted, with amendments and additions, by Law no 265 from 2006, published in The Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no 586 from July 06th 2006.
[7] B. K. Twinomugisha, Some reflections on judicial protection of the right to a clean and healthy environment in Uganda in Law Environment and Development Journal, vol 3/3, 2007, p. 247, available at http://www.lead-journal.org/content/07244.pdf, accessed on: 10.03.2017
[8] S. Atapattu, The right to a healthy life or the right to die polluted?: The emergence of a human right to a healthy environment under international law in Tulane Environmental Law Journal vol 16, 2002, pp. 67-68 quoted by H. Kern, in The right to a healthy Environment versus mining:An examination of federal environmental law and its failure to protect people's health in The politics of human rights in Australia. Law under the spotlight, 2015, School of Law and Justice, Southern Cross University, p. 130, available at: http://docplayer.net/29001185-The-politics-of-human-rights-in-australia.html, accessed on: 06.03.2018
[9] H. Kern, op. cit., pp. 130-131.
[10] This Declaration was adopted by the UN General Assembly on 10 December 1948, by its Resolution 2171 A/III. Romania signed the Declaration on 14 December 1955, when it became member of the United Nation Organization, as it is settled by the Resolution R 955 (X) of the UN General Assembly.
[11] K. Toepfer, Statement to the 57th Session of the Commussion on Human Rights, CHR, 57th sess, (19 March 2001) quoted by H. Kern, op. cit., pp. 130-131, available at: http://docplayer.net/29001185-The-politics-of-human-rights-in-australia.html, accessed on: 06.03.2018 that "most human rights treaties were drafted and adopted before environmental protection became a matter of international concern"[12].

However, this declaration enshrines, through art. 25, the right to a sufficient standard of living through which it is also understood that "every person must be provided with the health and well-being of himself and of his family". Even though the Universal Declaration of Human Rights does not refer to a healthy environment, a right to this right, as we have previously mentioned, we could not imagine how the health of any human being can be assured in a unhealthy environment. For this reason, we also appreciate that, through an extensive interpretation of the stipulated provisions of the Declaration, indirectly is also considered "the right to a healthy natural environment as an aspect of collective health law which concerns both the members of a community which live in a certain area of the Earth, as well as the world's population as a whole"[13].

Even though for a good period of time, by other international regulation, it has not been envisaged to lay down a provisions that at least recognized the right to a healthy environment, however it is possible to be identified "few references to environmental matters in international human rights instruments, although the rights to life and to health are certainly included and some formulations of the latter right make reference to environmental issues"[14]. So, if we are looking if we are studying the International Convention on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights[15], we will be able to identify some provisions related to environment, or environmental protection, or right to healthy environment. In art. 7 lett. b, this convention guarantees the right to safe and healthy working conditions, and in art. 10 para 3 it is specified the right of children and young person to be free from work harmful to their health, and the art. 12 settles the two dimensions of the right to health and, also, in par 2 let. b) it is mentioned that one step to be taken by the States to achieve the full realization of this right shall include those necessary even for the improvement of all aspects of environmental and industrial hygiene. Moreover, in the interpretation that the Committee of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR)[16] gives to these latter provisions, it is mentioned, including that "art. 12 para 2 let. b) is about the right to healthy natural and workplace environments and this phrase – "the improvement of all aspects of environmental and industrial hygiene" comprises, inter alia, the requirement to ensure an adequate supply of safe and potable water and basic sanitation; the prevention and reduction of the population's exposure to harmful substances such as radiation and harmful chemicals or other detrimental environmental conditions that directly or indirectly impact upon human health"[17]. Also it is mentioned that "industrial hygiene refers to the minimization, so far as is reasonably practicable, of the causes of health hazards inherent in the working environment"[18], thus making reference to a convention of the International Labor Organization[19] which, by art. 4 para (2) provides, referring to the principles of national policy in its field, that "the aim of the policy shall be to prevent accidents and injury to health arising out of, linked with or occurring in the course of work, by minimize, so far as is reasonably practicable, the causes of hazards inherent in the working environment"[20].

In fact, if we take a look at regional regulations regarding the human rights, we will observe that the "European Convention of Human Rights" does not include in the articles or its Protocols the term "environment" or "the right to a healthy

[12] D. Shelton, Health and Human Rights Working Paper Series No 1. Human Rights, Health & Environmental Protection: Linkages in Law & Practice. A Background Paper for the World Health Organization, 2002, p. 6, available at: http://www.who.int/hhr/Series_1%20%20Sheltonpaper_rev1.pdf, accessed on: 03.03.2018

[13] I. Cloșcă, I. Suceavă, Tratat de drepturile omului, „Treaty of Human Rights", Europa Nova Publishing House, Bucharest, 1995, p.294.

[14] D. Shelton, op. cit., p. 6.

[15] This Covenant was adopted and opened for signature by the United Nations General Assembly on December 16th 1966, Resolution 2200 A (XXI), entered into force on January 3rd 1976, according to art 27. Romania has ratified the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights on October 31st 1974, by Decree no 212 which was published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no 146 from November 20th 1974.

[16] Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights Human, CESCR General Comment No. 14: The Right to the Highest Attainable Standard of Health (Art. 12), adopted at the twenty-second Session of the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, on 11 August 2000 (Contained in Document E/C.12/2000/4), p. 6, available at: http://www.refworld.org/pdfid/4538838d0.pdf, accessed on: 07.03.2018

[17] Ibidem

[18] Ibidem

[19] We are talking about the ILO Convention No. 155 Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981, available at: http://blue.lim.ilo.org/cariblex/pdfs/ILO_Convention_155.pdf, accessed on: 07.03.2018

[20] Regulations regarding the environment are found even in Convention on the Rights of the Child, adopted and opened for signature, ratification and accession by General Assembly resolution 44/25 of 20 November 1989, entry into force 2 September 1990. Romania has ratified this convention by Law no 18/1990 which was published in The Official Gazette of Romania, Part I no 314 from June 13th 2001. Thus, the article 24 recognizes the right of the child to the enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of health and to facilities for the treatment of illness and rehabilitation of health, and in the para 2 lett.c) it is mentioned that „to combat disease and malnutrition, including within the framework of primary health care, through, inter alia, the application of readily available technology and through the provision of adequate nutritious foods and clean drinking-water, taking into consideration the dangers and risks of environmental pollution". This Convention is available at: http://www.ohchr.org/Documents/ProfessionalInterest/crc.pdf, accessed on 07.03.2018. However, in the case of this regulation we can see that it was adopted after the moment when the environment the changes that affect it and, implicitly, our life, was taken into consideration by the states and the international community, starting to find their regulation in various normative acts.

environment"[21], considering that "[w]hen it was adopted, namely in 1950, environmental issues were not a major concern, industrial development nor raising a serious environmental problem"[22]. So, as it is noted in the doctrine, in this case one can speak of the recognition of the right to a healthy environment as "[t]he result of a jurisprudential evolution which, without the proper creation of new rights, extends the purpose of existing rights"[23]. Thus, in its jurisprudence, a new content of some of the rights enshrined in the Convention, such as the right to life (article 2 of the Convention), the right to respect for private and family life (article 8 of the Convention)[24]; the right of property (art. 1 of the Protocol No. 1 at the Convention); the right to free expression (art. 10 of the Convention); the right to a fair trial (art. 6 of the Convention), the persons have been guaranteed the right to a healthy environment[25].

Unlike the human rights regulations of organizations on the European continent, similar ones on the African and American continent contain environmental provisions as foreseen at American level, or even the need to secure a right in a generally satisfactory environment, favorable to their development, as it is called at African level.

So, the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights[26], by art. 24, regulates the right to a general satisfactory environment for all peoples and which has to be favorable to their development. The legal righting has pointed out to this text that it is a "[t]he first conventional, compulsory, stipulation of the right to a healthy environment"[27], the decision to include it in a charter of rights from the states of a continent that does not grant "in general, a priority for environmental concerns"[28].

American Convention on Human Rights Pact of San José[29], as amended by the Buenos Aires Protocol signed on 27 February, 1967, stipulates even in the Preamble that the representatives on the American States present at this conference "are convinced that the historic mission of America is to offer to man a land of liberty and a favorable environment for the development of his personality and the realization of his just aspirations", and by art. 95 let. c) no 1 states that "in order to achieve its various goals, especially in the specific area of technical cooperation, the Inter-American Council for Integral Development shall promote, coordinate, and assign responsibility for the execution of development programs and projects to the subsidiary bodies and relevant organizations, on the basis of the priorities identified by the Member States, in areas such as: economic and social development, including trade, tourism, integration and the environment". Moreover, through a protocol at the American Convention on Human Rights Pact of San José, namely Human Rights in the Area of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights "Protocol of San Salvador", Additional Protocol to the American Convention on (A-52), adopted on 17 November, 1998[30], more precisely through art. 11, was consecrated, expressis verbis, the right to a healthy environment according to which "everyone shall have the right to live in a healthy environment and to have access to basic public services", and the States Parties shall promote the protection, preservation, and improvement of the environment. Thus, not only the right granted to every person is stipulated, right granted to every persons, which in fac has who dimensions – the rights to engage in a healthy environment and the right to access basic public services, but also the correlated obligation which is the responsibility of each state to protect, preserve and improve the environment and its quality.

So whether at the regional level, through the established organizations, the states, either expressly, through regulations in conventions, or indirectly, by

---

[21] P. Trușcă, A. Trușcă Trandafir, Dreptul fundamental al omului la un mediu sănătos în jurisprudența CEDO (The right ro a healthy environment in the ECHR jurisprudence) in Revista Transilvană de Ştiinţe Administrative (Transylvanian Revue (Journal) of Administrative Science), no 1 (23)/2009, p. 99, available at: http://www.rtsa.ro/rtsa/index.php/rtsa/article/viewFile/124/120, accessed on 03.03.2018.

[22] Ibidem

[23] F. Stârc-Meclejan, Rolul creator al Curţii Europene a Drepturilor Omului privitor la dreptul mediului (The role of the European Court of Human Rights in the field of environmental law) in Analele Universităţii de Vest din Timişoara. Seria Drept. Studii, articole, comentarii. Secţiunea de drept privat (Annals of the West University of Timisoara. Law Series., Studies, articles, comments. Section of private law), p. 168, available at: https://drept.uvt.ro/administrare/files/1481047524-lect.-univ.-dr.-flaminia-sta--rc---meclejan.pdf, accessed on 03.03.2018

[24] For example, in the Lopez Ostra v. Spain Case, by the judgment from December 9th 1994, ECHR pointed out that „naturally, severe environmental pollution may affect individuals' well-being and prevent them from enjoying their homes in such a way as to affect their private and family life adversely, without, however, seriously endangering their health". Starting from this statement, ECHR has analyzed the matter „[i]n terms of a positive duty on the State - to take reasonable and appropriate measures to secure the applicant's rights under paragraph 1 of Article 8" from Convention. Lopez Ostra v. Spain, no 16798/90 §51, ECHR, 1994, available at: https://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng#{"itemid":["001-57905"]}, accessed on: 07.03.2018. Thus, the ECHR has highlighted a dimension of the right to a healthy environment that seeks to oblige a state to ensure the protection of this right, to make it possible to achieve it in its fullness.

[25] Ibidem

[26] African (Banjul) Charter on Human and Peoples Rights was adopted in Nairobi June 27, 1981, and was entered into force on October 21, 1986, is available at: http://www.achpr.org/instruments/achpr/, accessed on: 07.03.2018

[27] D. Marinescu, op. cit., p. 381; M. Duţu, Dreptul mediului (Environmental Law), Economica Publishing House, Bucharest, 1996, p. 80.

[28] Ibidem

[29] Adopted at the Inter-American Specialized Conference on Human Rights by the Organization of American States, San José, Costa Rica, 22 November 1969, is available at: https://en.wikisource.org/wiki/American_Convention_on_Human_Rights#CHAPTER_III_-_ECONOMIC,_SOCIAL,_AND_CULTURAL_RIGHTS, accessed on: 07.03.2018. The Charter of the Organization of American States, 119 U.N.T.S. 3, was adopted in 1948 and entered into force on December 13, 1951 and it aws amended more than one time. This Charter is available at: http://www.globalhealthrights.org/wp-content/uploads/2013/10/Charter-of-the-Organization-of-American-States-OAS.pdf, accessed on: 07.03.2018 jurisprudence, have recognized the right to a healthy global environment "[t]he reappointment for the quality and protection of the environment was debated in 1972 at the first World Conference on the United Nations on this issue"[31], held in Stockholm. Participants at this conference proclaimed that "man is both creature and molder of his environment, which gives him physical sustenance and affords him the opportunity for intellectual, moral, social and spiritual growth. In the long and tortuous evolution of the human race on this planet a stage has been reached when, through the rapid acceleration of science and technology, man has acquired the power to transform his environment in countless ways and on an unprecedented scale. Both aspects of man's environment, the natural and the manmade, are essential to his well-being and to the enjoyment of basic human rights-even the right to life itself"[32]. It is also emphasizes not only the need to protect the environment, or, as it is named by the statement itself – "the human environment", and to improve the quality of life, specifying that "the protection and improvement of the human environment is a major issue which affects the well-being of peoples and economic development throughout the world; it is the urgent desire of the peoples of the whole world and the duty of all Governments"[33]. By the first principle, the Stockholm Declaration recalls to every human being the fundamental right to a healthy environment, the content of which has the following dimensions: the right itself, what it is the "[r]ight to freedom, equality and adequate conditions of life, in an environment of a quality that permits a life of dignity and well-being", as well as the obligation of each human being to protect and improve the existing environment in view of the existence of a "[s]olemn responsibility to protect and improve the environment for present and future generations". Although the statement does not explicitly define the environment, its main components, elements that may form included in the definition of this environmental concept, can be found in Principle No. 2 of the Stockholm Declaration which mentions that "[m]ust be safeguarded for the benefit of present and future generations through careful planning or management, as appropriate", "[t]he natural resources of the earth, including the air, water, land, flora and fauna and especially representative samples of natural ecosystems".

[30] This Additional Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights in the area of Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights "Protocol of San Salvador" is available at: http://www.oas.org/juridico/english/sigs/a-52.html, accessed on: 07.03.2018.

The Declaration has built a number of 26 principles, a plan of action for the human environment, including a number of 109 recommendations categorized by areas of action, a resolution on institutional and financial arrangements.

The right to a healthy environment and, in particular, to environmental protection, will make sense and develop a series of regulations over time. The states and the United Nations have succeeded in adopting and obtaining ratification by more and more states of conventions, agreements that outline the legal framework in which to secure such protection. One of these last agreements is the Paris Agreement[34], and art. 4 point 13 stipulates that, "Parties obliged themselves "to promote environmental integrity, transparency, accuracy, completeness, comparability and consistency", Parties acknowledging, since point 11 form the Preamble, that "climate change is a common concern of humankind, and they should, when taking action to address climate change, respect, promote and consider their respective obligations on human rights, the right to health, the rights of indigenous peoples, local communities, migrants, children, persons with disabilities and people in vulnerable situations and the right to development, as well as gender equality, empowerment of women and intergenerational equity".

From the analysis of some of the international documents – "[v]arious treaty provisions, general comments or recommendations of treaty bodies and UN consensus documents, it may be possible to delimit some of the major components of the right"[35]. Thus, we also appreciate that "[t]he right to a clean and healthy environment involves many things including clean water, air and soil that are free from toxins, wastes or hazards that threaten human health"[36], given that the right to a healthy environment is also perceived as a dimension of the right to health and the protection of it, the health of any human being is absolutely conditioned by its existence, including in a healthy natural environment.[37]. On the other hand, in the case of this social-economic right, by its third-generation content, if we refer to the chronological classification criteria[38],, but also to the fact that "states need cooperation to

[31] D. Marinescu, op. cit., p. 14

[32] Point I.1. from Declaration of the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment, available at: http://www.un-documents.net/aconf48-14r1.pdf, accessed on: 07.03.2018

[33] Point I.2. from Declaration of the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment.

[34] The Paris Agreement was signed in 2015 and entered into force on 4 November 2016, thirty days after the date on which at least 55 Parties to the Convention accounting in total for at least an estimated 55 % of the total global greenhouse gas emissions have deposited their instruments of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession with the Depositary. See: available at: http://unfccc.int/paris_agreement/items/9485.php, accessed on: 08.03.2018. available atThis Agreement is available at: http://unfccc.int/files/essential_background/convention/application/pdf/english_paris_agreement.pdf, accessed on: 08.03.2018.

[35] B. K. Twinomugisha, op. cit, p. 247.

[36] Idem, p. 248-249.

[37] In thsi regard, we just recall that the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, through the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development , which was adopted during the proceedings of the conference held between 3 June and 14 June 1992, stated in its first principle that people "are entitled to a healthy and productive life in harmony with nature". Rio Declaration on Environment and Development is available at: http://www.un.org/documents/ga/conf151/aconf15126-1annex1.htm, accessed on: 08.03.2018.

[38] To see in this respect I. Muraru, E.S. Tănăsescu, coordinators, Constituția României. Comentariu pe articole, "Romanian Constitution. Comment on articles", C. H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008, p.326 ensure compliance of this right"[39], it is necessary to appreciate one of the "rights-claims"[40] in which we also refer to "[t[he state's duty to recognize this right of any person"[41], even if it is a "[d]iligence dependent on a number of other factor"[42] of various natures.

2.2. The right to a healthy environment in constitutions

From the above, we can see that, even though the states and the international community, by the United Nations, quite late, understood that they must first and foremost recognize and then create an international legal framework to the right to a healthy environment so that it can be protected.

Considering the delay in international understanding of the need to regulate the right to a healthy environment, as well as to regulate its protection, at national level the attitude of the states was no different. Thus, the right to a healthy environment will find its place in the constitutions after the Stockholm Declaration in 1972, more specifically "[a]fter 1975 and especially in the 1990s and the present millennium"[43].

Thus, "more than 100 constitutions throughout the world guarantee a right to a clean and healthy environment impose a duty on the state to prevent environmental harm, or mention the protection of the environment or natural resources. Over half of these constitutions explicitly recognize the right to a clean and healthy environment, including nearly all constitutions adopted since 1992. Ninety-two constitutions impose a duty on the government to prevent harm to the environment"[44].

Analyzing a number of 10 constitutions of Eastern European states, we have notices that all of them enshrine the right to a healthy environment in various ways and contents, a statement also valid for the Czech Republic[45] which Constitution does not contain a chapter on rights and of the fundamental freedoms, these being provided by a Charter which is part of the Czech constitutional block. Thus, by Article 35 para (1) and (2) of this Charter, it is recognized that "everyone has the right to a favorable environment", and also "the right to timely and complete information about the state of the environment and natural resources". More than that, Article 35 para (3) established that "no one may, in exercising her rights, endanger or cause damage to the environment, natural resources, the wealth of natural species, or cultural monuments beyond the extent set by a law". In fact, the Czech legislator considers that this right is not limited to being constituted as an act of constitutional value, any person being entitled, to the same degree, to be informed in a timely and complete manner not only about the state of the environment but and natural resources. The Bulgarian Constitution[46] contains similar regulations in the respect that it recognizes by art. 55 that "everyone shall have the right to a healthy and favorable environment corresponding to established standards and norms". Also, the Bulgarian constitutional legislator also appreciates that everyone has an obligation to protect the environment, as the Czech legislator in essence appreciates in par. (3) of art. 35. However, if we carefully observe the obligation laid down in that article, the Czech legislator extends the boundaries of that obligation, considering that this negative obligation not to endanger or harm any person concerns not only the environment, but also cultural monuments. Besides, in its preamble, the Constitution of Poland[47] states that the Polish nation adopts this constitution by „[o]bliged to bequeath to future generations all that is valuable from our over one thousand years' heritage". The Constitution of Slovakia[48] also stated, in the preamble, that the adoption of this constitution is also envisaged by the „[e]ndeavoring to implement democratic forms of government, guarantee a life of freedom, and promote spiritual, cultural and economic prosperity". Moreover, the same constitution regulates „the right to protect the environment and cultural heritage", through art. 44 and 45, the Slovak constituent legislator appreciating not only that „every person shall have the right to favorable environment", but also „the right to full and timely information on the environmental situation, and reasons and consequences thereof", and also that „every person shall have a duty to protect and improve the environment and foster cultural heritage", even that „no person shall imperil or damage the environment, natural wealth and cultural heritage beyond the limits set by law". And the Constitution of Hungary[49], speaking about the constitutional foundations, states in article P para (1) that the „natural resources, in particular arable land, forests and the reserves of water, biodiversity, in particular native plant and animal species, as well as cultural assets shall form the common heritage of the nation". The Slovenian

[39] Ş. Deaconu, Drept constituţional, „Constitutional Law", C. H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011, p. 261
[40] I. Muraru, E.S. Tănăsescu, coordinators, op. cit., p.326
[41] Ibidem
[42] Ibidem
[43] I. Muraru, E.S. Tănăsescu, coordinators, op. cit., p.328
[44] D. Shelton, op. cit., p. 22
[45] Charter of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms, Resolution of the Presidium of the Czech National Council of 16 December 1992 on the declaration of the Charter of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms as a part of the constitutional order of the Czech Republic Constitutional act No. 2/1993 Coll. as amended by constitutional act No. 162/1998 Coll. This Charter is available at: https://www.usoud.cz/fileadmin/user_upload/ustavni_soud_www/Pravni_uprava/AJ/Listina_English_version.pdf, accessed on: 08.03.2018.
[46] This Constitution is available at: https://www.constituteproject.org/constitution/Bulgaria_2015?lang=en, accessed on: 08.03.2018.
[47] This Constitution is available at: https://www.constituteproject.org/constitution/Poland_2009?lang=en, accessed on: 08.03.2018
[48] This Constitution is available at: https://www.constituteproject.org/constitution/Slovakia_2014?lang=en, accessed on: 08.03.2018
[49] This Constitution is available at: https://www.constituteproject.org/constitution/Hungary_2016?lang=en, accessed on: 08.03.2018

constituent legislator[50] also acknowledges, by Article 72 para (1) that, „everyone has the right in accordance with the law to a healthy living environment", but, by Article 73, settles that „everyone is obliged in accordance with the law to protect natural sites of special interest, rarities and cultural monuments". It is, therefore, that some of the fundamental laws speak of the components of the environment as the constitutive elements of the nation patrimony of a state, to the future generations must be transmitted, in its entirety and in no way, the environment of which we (still) rejoice. In this context, we appreciate that even more substantiated and justified the inclusion in a fundamental law „[t]he obligation of the State and everyone to protect and maintain them, and to preserve them for future generations"[51]. We also consider that such a fundamental duty should not only be borne by the state but by any person. For example, the Constitution of Latvia[52], by art. 115, states that only „the State shall protect the right of everyone to live in a benevolent environment by providing information about environmental conditions and by promoting the preservation and improvement of the environment". In the same way are the provisions of art. 54 para (1) of the Constitution of Lithuania[53], The „State shall take care of the protection of the natural environment, wildlife and plants, individual objects of nature and areas of particular value and shall supervise a sustainable use of natural resources, their restoration and increase", but para (2) of the same article provides that „the destruction of land and the underground, the pollution of water and air, radioactive impact on the environment as well as depletion of wildlife and plants shall be prohibited by law", constitutional text which indirectly imposes such an obligation on any person. On the other hand, the Estonian Constitution[54] established, by art. 53, that „everyone has a duty to preserve the human and natural environment and to compensate for damage caused to the environment by him or her". The Constitution of Croatia[55], by art. 69, recognizing the right to a healthy life, also takes into consideration its dimension of the right to a healthy environment, but states that „the State shall ensure conditions for a healthy environment", as well as that "everyone shall be bound, within their powers and activities, to pay special attention to the protection of public health, nature and environment". Moreover, the Constitution of Romania[56], by art. 35 para (3) stipulating that the „natural and legal persons have a duty to protect and improve the environment".

3. Conclusions

From the moment that Universal Declaration of Human Rights was adopted it had to pass almost 25 years until the right to a healthy environment is recognized and regulated internationally, and then another almost 30 years have elapsed before its incorporation into constitutions becomes a practice of the states. In this respect, the doctrine has highlighted several reasons that have generated such a situation, in addition to those mentioned above, underling that the "different avenues for the integration of environmental concerns in the realization of human rights can be envisaged"[57], and one of these is regarding the necessity that "a right to environment be formally added to the catalogue of internationally guaranteed human rights"[58].

Moreover, by some of the constitutions under consideration, the legislator was concerned about the inclusion of this right in one of the consecrated classifications, such as the category of liberties and economic, social and cultural rights, where they included this Constitution of Poland or Croatia. However, the essence of the issue of the right to a healthy environment, its consecration through constitutions, the regulation of its insurance, protection or guarantee mechanisms in principle should not be reduced to the classification of this right. That is why we share the opinion that "[w]e cannot and should not attempt to categorize this new right as, either a civil and political right, or an economic, social and cultural right, or a solidarity right because it transcends the distinctions and embodies elements found in each of the three categories"[59].

"On a factual level, it has already become apparent that preservation, conservation and restoration of the environment are a necessary and integral part of the enjoyment of, inter alia, the rights to health, to food and to life including a decent quality of life"[60]. "It is by now clear that environmental protection is intrinsically related to a number of other human rights and comes out as both a precondition and an outcome of the enjoyment of many rights"[61].

[50] This Constitution is available at: https://www.constituteproject.org/constitution/Slovenia_2013?lang=en, accessed on: 08.03.2018
[51] Art. P para 1 of Hungarian Constitution.
[52] This Constitution is available at: https://www.constituteproject.org/constitution/Latvia_2016?lang=enaccessed on: 08.03.2018
[53] This Constitution is available at: https://www.constituteproject.org/constitution/Lithuania_2006?lang=en, accessed on: 08.03.2018
[54] This Constitution is available at: https://www.constituteproject.org/constitution/Estonia_2015?lang=en, accessed on: 08.03.2018
[55] This Constitution is available at: https://www.constituteproject.org/constitution/Croatia_2013?lang=en, accessed on: 08.03.2018
[56] This Constitution is available at: https://www.constituteproject.org/constitution/Romania_2003?lang=en, accessed on: 08.03.2018
[57] P. Cullet, Definition of an environmental right in a human rights context, published in: 13 Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights, 1995, p. 25, available at: http://www.ielrc.org/content/a9502.pdf., accessed on: 08.03.2018.
[58] Ibidem
[59] R. S. Pathak, The Human Rights System as a Conceptual Framework for Environmental Law, in: Brown Weiss, E. (ed.), Environmental Change and International Law - New Challenges and Dimensions, UN University Press, Tokyo 1992, pp. 205-243, quoted by P. Cullet, op. cit., pp. 27-28
[60] P. Cullet, op. cit., p.26
[61] P. Cullet, op. cit., p.27

The existence of a healthy environment or not, as the case may be, affects positively or negatively, as the case may be, their life and quality and, implicitly, the existence and exercise of other fundamental human rights, such as the right to health or the protection thereof, the right to work, economic freedom, the right to a sufficient or decent living. An appreciation of this right and, implicitly, the protection of the environment as fundamental values in society would seem more opportune, the Croatian legislator who, through art. 3 of the Constitution has appreciated that the conservation of nature and the environment, next to "[f]reedom, equal rights, national equality and equality of genders, love of peace, social justice, respect for human rights, inviolability of ownership and a democratic multiparty system" is one of the "[h]ighest values of the constitutional order of the Republic of Croatia and the ground for interpretation of the Constitution".

It is also opportune for us to appreciate the environment as an essential component of the national patrimony of any state and, why not, of the universal heritage, preserving and protecting it more necessary, more urgently, more imperative that any other component. A sufficient, but not enough, reason for any state, the preamble, and the international community, through its specific organizations and instrument, to be obliged to protect the environment, to established a legal framework in this respect, knowing that "the right to environment requires States to refrain from activities harmful to the environment, and to adopt and enforce policies promoting conservation and improvement of the quality of the environment"[62]. Moreover, this obligation must be regulated so that it rests on any individual and legal entity, for enjoying the environment is possible only if you protect and preserve it, and not just for the present, the development of any society must comply with the principles of development where the environment occupies an important place. In fact, art. 37 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union[63], emphasizes those mentioned, specifying that "a high level of environmental protection and the improvement of the quality of the environment must be integrated into the policies of the Union and ensured in accordance with the principle of sustainable development".

References

- Al Gore, Un adevăr incomod, „An inconvenient truth", RAO International Publishing Company, Bucharest, 2007
- Daniela Marinescu, Tratat de dreptul mediului, "Treaty of Environmental Law", Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2007
- Encyclopedia Britannica, available at: https://www.britannica.com/science/environment
- The English Environment Protection Act 1990, available at: http://www.legislation.gov.uk/ukpga/1990/43/section/1
- Ben Kiromba Twinomugisha, Some reflections on judicial protection of the right to a clean and healthy environment in Uganda in Law Environment and Development Journ*al*, vol 3/3, 2007, available at http://www.lead-journal.org/content/07244.pdf
- Helena Kern, The right to a healthy Environment versus mining:An examination of federal environmental law and its failure to protect people's health in The politics of human rights in Australia. Law under the spotlight, 2015, School of Law and Justice, Southern Cross University, available at: http://docplayer.net/29001185-The-politics-of-human-rights-in-australia.html
- Dinah Shelton, Health and Human Rights Working Paper Series No 1. Human Rights, Health & Environmental Protection: Linkages in Law & Practice. A Background Paper for the World Health Organization, 2002, , available at: http://www.who.int/hhr/Series_1%20%20Sheltonpaper_rev1.pdf
- Ionel Cloșcă, Ion Suceavă, Tratat de drepturile omului, „Treaty of Human Rights", Europa Nova Publishing House, Bucharest, 1995
- Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights Human, CESCR General Comment No. 14: The Right to the Highest Attainable Standard of Health (Art. 12), adopted at the twenty-second Session of the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, on 11 August 2000 (Contained in Document E/C.12/2000/4), available at: http://www.refworld.org/pdfid/4538838d0.pdf
- ILO Convention No. 155 Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981, available at: http://blue.lim.ilo.org/cariblex/pdfs/ILO_Convention_155.pdf
- Convention on the Rights of the Child, available at: http://www.ohchr.org/Documents/ProfessionalInterest/crc.pdf
- Petrică Truşcă, Andrada Truşcă Trandafir, Dreptul fundamental al omului la un mediu sănătos în jurisprudenţa CEDO (The right ro a healthy environment in the ECHR jurisprudence) in Revista Transilvană de Ştiinţe Administrative (Transylvanian Revue (Journal) of Administrative Science), no 1 (23)/2009, available at: http://www.rtsa.ro/rtsa/index.php/rtsa/article/viewFile/124/120
- Flaminia Stârc-Meclejan, Rolul creator al Curţii Europene a Drepturilor Omului privitor la dreptul mediului (The role of the European Court of Human Rights in the field of environmental law) in Analele Universităţii de Vest din Timişoara. Seria Drept. Studii, articole, comentarii. Secţiunea de drept privat

[62] P. Cullet, op. cit., p. 28

[63]Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (2016/C 202/02) is available at: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/PDF/?uri=OJ:C:2016:202:FULL&from=EN, accessed on: 08.02.2018

(Annals of the West University of Timisoara. Law Series., Studies, articles, comments. Section of private law), available at: https://drept.uvt.ro/administrare/files/1481047524-lect.-univ.-dr.-flaminia-sta--rc---meclejan.pdf

- Lopez Ostra v. Spain, no 16798/90 §51, ECHR, 1994, available at: https://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng#{"itemid":["001-57905"]}
- African (Banjul) Charter on Human and Peoples Rights available at: http://www.achpr.org/instruments/achpr/
- Mircea Duţu, Dreptul mediului (Environmental Law), Economica Publishing House, Bucharest, 1996
- American Convention on Human Rights, available at: https://en.wikisource.org/wiki/American_Convention_on_Human_Rights#CHAPTER_III_-_ECONOMIC,_SOCIAL,_AND_CULTURAL_RIGHTS
- The Charter of the Organization of American States available at: http://www.globalhealthrights.org/wp-content/uploads/2013/10/Charter-of-the-Organization-of-American-States-OAS.pdf
- Rio Declaration on Environment and Development, available at: http://www.un.org/documents/ga/conf151/aconf15126-1annex1.htm
- Charter of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms in Czech Republic, available at: https://www.usoud.cz/fileadmin/user_upload/ustavni_soud_www/Pravni_uprava/AJ/Listina_English_version.pdf
- Constitution of Bulgaria, Poland, Slovakia, Hungary, Slovenia, Latvia, Lithuania, Estonia, Croatia, Romania, available at: https://www.constituteproject.org/constitution/search
- Philippe Cullet, Definition of an environmental right in a human rights context, published in: 13 Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights, 1995, available at: http://www.ielrc.org/content/a9502.pdf
- Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (2016/C 202/02), available at: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/PDF/?uri=OJ:C:2016:202:FULL&from=EN

THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN EURATOM AND THE UNITED KINGDOM AFTER BREXIT

Maria-Cristina SOLACOLU[*]

Abstract

On 29 March 2017 the United Kingdom invoked Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union, triggering the process of withdrawal from the Union – the first Member State to ever do so. This historic moment also marked the beginning of negotiations, with representatives of the two entities focusing primarily on provisions related to the single market and citizens' rights. One topic that has been seldom brought up during these talks is the future of the United Kingdom in the European Atomic Energy Community (Euratom). The purpose of this paper is to determine whether a Member State's withdrawal from the European Union entails leaving Euratom and to identify some of the options the United Kingdom has with regard to either its continued membership of the latter or the forging of a new type of relationship with it. Issues of particular interest are the jurisdiction of the Court of Justice of the European Union over matters relating to nuclear research, materials and technology, the freedom of movement that is granted to nuclear specialists and the fact that Euratom and the European Union share their institutional organisation. Failure to reach an agreement on these subjects, which are likely to hinder negotiations, would have important short-term and long-term consequences that also warrant a closer examination.

Keywords: Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union – Euratom Treaty – nuclear common market – institutional organisation – withdrawal from Euratom.

1. Introduction

The referendum deciding the United Kingdom's withdrawal from the European Union was held on 23 June 2016, the result of numerous debates regarding British participation in the European project. Criticism was focused on the matter of immigration and on the perceived loss of national and parliamentary sovereignty[1], as a consequence of the EU's growing array of competences[2] and of the requirement to submit to the jurisdiction of the Court of Justice of the European Union.

One issue that has been rarely, if ever, brought up during the debates over the UK's departure from the EU is the state's participation in the European Atomic Energy Community (Euratom). The likely reason for this omission is the fact that there have not been any serious complaints regarding membership of the organisation. On the contrary, the UK has been an active participant on the nuclear common market and has greatly benefited from it. In spite of this, when discussing plans for the UK's the departure from the EU, British authorities failed to take into consideration Brexit's consequences for the national nuclear industry.

On 29 March 2017 the United Kingdom invoked Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union, triggering the process of the state's withdrawal from the EU. The same letter also mentioned the decision to leave Euratom, with British officials considering that this was a legal necessity, due to the fact that the Treaties of the two organisations are "uniquely legally joined"[3]. The intention to depart from the EU (but not the specific motives behind it) had been previously stated in the Explanatory Notes for the European Union (Notification of Withdrawal) Act 2017[4]. The Notes mention that the power – provided by the Act – to notify the UK's intention of withdrawing from the EU includes the European Atomic Energy Community[5].

Criticism regarding the lack of foresight in respect to the potential departure of a Member State from Euratom can also be aimed at the organisations' authorities: the provisions regarding the withdrawal process are common to the EU and Euratom and they

[*] PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: maria.solacolu@gmail.com).

[1] The matter of sovereignty was one of several subjects discussed during the negotiations that took place between the EU and British officials prior to the Brexit referendum, with the final deal including several concessions for the UK in that regard. See Michael Gordon, "The UK's Sovereignty Situation: Brexit, Bewilderment and Beyond…", King's Law Journal, 2016, https://doi.org/10.1080/09615768.2016.1250465 (accessed on 10 March 2018).

[2] It has been pointed out that, far from the EU overextending itself, any development in its powers and competences is the result of decisions made by the Member States, after significant consideration and in accordance with the procedures regulated by the Treaties. See Paul Craig, "Brexit: A Drama in Six Acts", European Law Review, August 2016, Sweet & Maxwell, Oxford Legal Studies Research Paper No. 45/2016. Available at SSRN: https://ssrn.com/abstract=2807975.

[3] HM Government, Department for Exiting the European Union, Nuclear materials and safeguards issues - position paper, 13 July 2017, https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/nuclear-materials-and-safeguards-issues-position-paper, accessed on 10 March 2018.

[4] Available at http://www.legislation.gov.uk/ukpga/2017/9/contents. Article 1 paragraph (1) states that "The Prime Minister may notify, under Article 50(2) of the Treaty on European Union, the United Kingdom's intention to withdraw from the EU."

[5] Available at http://www.legislation.gov.uk/ukpga/2017/9/notes/division/1/index.htm. It is specified that "The power that is provided by section 1(1) [of the Act] applies to withdrawal from the EU. This includes the European Atomic Energy Community ('Euratom'), as the European Union (Amendment) Act 2008 sets out that the term "EU" includes (as the context permits or requires) Euratom (section 3(2))".

are sparse and general. Considering the importance of matters relating to nuclear energy, a more thorough legislation should be enacted by the competent EU institutions, in order to fill this legislative vacuum. The oversight has led to the current predicament: as the UK embarks on the (rather uncertain) process of withdrawal from the EU, its course of action with regard to Euratom is even more unclear.

It is essential to identify both the consequences of the UK's departure from Euratom and the options that the British state has at its disposal, starting from the limited dispositions contained in the Treaty establishing the European Atomic Energy Community, the Treaty on European Union (TEU) and the Treaty on the Funtioning of the European Union (TFEU). By stimulating academic discourse on this subject, new solutions could be provided, that could later on become legislation and be implemented by the competent authorities.

2. Euratom and the United Kingdom – past, present and future

The establishment of the European Coal and Steel Community was only the first step in the process of integration between its founding members[6]. In 1957, in Rome, the same six states decided, based on an economic impetus and less of a political one[7], to establish two more regional organisations, following the ECSC model: the European Economic Community and the European Atomic Energy Community[8].

It is important to note that, since the moment of their founding, the two Communities were legally distinct organisations, despite being interlinked and having the same membership. At first, the institutional systems of the EEC and Euratom were also separate, but, for practical and budgetary purposes, they were merged later on, leading to the current situation – two organisations, each with its own legal personality, run by the same authorities, with the same membership[9]. The UK's withdrawal decision has made it apparent that this model of functioning creates difficulties for any state that would be interested in being part of one organisation, but not the other.

While the primary objective behind the creation of the EEC was to establish a common market, Euratom's goal was to ensure the peaceful handling of matters related to atomic energy[10], a preoccupation amplified by the establishment of the first civilian nuclear reactors, whose functioning would need both materials of a sensitive nature and specialists competent to work with them. It has also been noted that, at the time of Euratom's founding, there was a particular interest in placing German nuclear industry under supranational control[11].

At present, the Euratom Treaty continues to regulate a common market where the free movement of goods, people, capital and services is applied to a specific domain: that of nuclear energy, which necessitates a very thorough legislation in order to ensure the safety of all participants. For this reason, Euratom established a set of standards that govern the safety of transportation of nuclear goods and of research[12].

One of the most important projects currently run under the guidance of Euratom is the International Thermonuclear Experimental Reactor (ITER), in Southern France, which is the result of a 35-year collaboration between the Member States of the EU (the organisation is a founding member and provides approximately 50% of the funding), China, India, Japan, Korea, Russia and the USA. If successful, ITER (currently the largest nuclear fusion reactor in the world) could provide a solution for limitless and non-polluting atomic power[13]. This project could suffer serious disruptions if its members are not prepared for the consequences of the UK's departure from Euratom and the EU.

2.1. Accession of the United Kingdom to Euratom

The UK refused to participate in the founding of Euratom and the EEC, withdrawing from the negotiations held at Val-Duchesse, in 1956, regarding the establishment of the two Communities[14]. The UK's reticence to participate in the European project was based on several reasons: the fact that the British prioritised their relationship with the Commonwealth over that with European states; the UK's preference for a cooperation system, as opposed to an integration, supranational one; British interest for the creation of a free trade area, and not an economic organisation concentrated on the elaboration of sectoral policies[15]. The UK was also wary of ceding part of its sovereignty and competences to a supranational entity, whose authority and legal jurisdiction it would have to respect. Some of these complaints were again brought up during [6] Belgium, France, Germany, Italy, Luxembourg and the Netherlands.

[7] Paul Craig, Gráinne de Búrca, EU Law: Text, Cases, and Materials, Fifth Edition, Oxford University Press, New York, 2011, p. 6.

[8] The basic plan of what would later become the EEC Treaty and the Euratom Treaty was contained in the Spaak Report, published in 1956.

[9] Augustin Fuerea, Manualul Uniunii Europene, Sixth Edition, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2016, pag. 25.

[10] Augustin Fuerea, Dreptul Uniunii Europeane – principii, acțiuni, libertăți, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2016, p. 16.

[11] Wolfram Kaiser, Using Europe, Abusing the Europeans - Britain and European Integration, 1945–63, Palgrave Macmillan, 1999, p. 96.

[12] For an example of such dispositions, see Council Directive 2011/70/EURATOM of 19 July 2011 establishing a Community framework for the responsible and safe management of spent fuel and radioactive waste.

[13] https://www.iter.org/proj/inafewlines#1, accessed on 10 March 2018.

[14] Augustin Fuerea, „BREXIT – trecut, prezent, viitor", Curierul judiciar, nr. 12/2016, C.H.Beck, Bucharest, p. 631.

[15] Emmanuel Mourlon-Druol, The UK's EU vote: the 1975 precedent and today's negotiations, Bruegel Policy Contribution, Issue 2015/08, p. 2.

the debates preceding the Brexit referendum, and influenced the outcome of the vote.

When the UK finally joined the European Communities, it committed to adhering to the Euratom Treaty's provisions, many of which are interdependent with those of the TEU and TFEU (the former EEC Treaty). As long as British membership of the organisations did not experience major setbacks, the aforementioned link was not an issue for the state. However, once the UK triggered Article 50 of the TEU, both the state and the EU were faced with an unforeseen question: what is to become of the UK's membership of the Euratom? The fact that the EU and Euratom are closely intertwined could pose a problem when attempting to continue being a members of only one of the organisations. At the same time, even if this were allowed to happen, the practicalities of it might hinder the functioning of Euratom. Additionally, many of the issues which lead to the UK deciding to leave the EU, such as the jurisdiction of the Court of Justice of the EU over the UK and the freedom of movement granted to workers (in this case, to specialist in the field of nuclear research), would still exist if it were to retain its membership of Euratom.

2.2. Relevant dispositions of the Euratom Treaty

According to the Treaty's Preamble, the Community's founders wished to "create the conditions necessary for the development of a powerful nuclear industry which will provide extensive energy resources, lead to the modernisation of technical processes and contribute, through its many other applications, to the prosperity of their peoples", "to create the conditions of safety necessary to eliminate hazards to the life and health of the public" and "to associate other countries with their work and to cooperate with international organisations concerned with the peaceful development of atomic energy".

Article 93 contains dispositions regarding the free movement of goods, prohibiting "all customs duties on imports and exports or charges having equivalent effect, and all quantitative restrictions on imports and exports" in respect of nuclear material.

Free movement of specialists is governed by Article 96: "The Member States shall abolish all restrictions based on nationality affecting the right of nationals of any Member State to take skilled employment in the field of nuclear energy, subject to the limitations resulting from the basic requirements of public policy, public security or public health" and Article 97 "No restrictions based on nationality may be applied to natural or legal persons, whether public or private, under the jurisdiction of a Member State, where they desire to participate in the construction of nuclear installations of a scientific or industrial nature in the Community".

Article 101 contains provisions regarding Euratom's external relations: "The Community may, within the limits of its powers and jurisdiction, enter into obligations by concluding agreements or contracts with a third State, an international organisation or a national of a third State", with Article 206 specifically mentioning the possibility of concluding an association agreement: "The Community may conclude with one or more States or international organisations agreements establishing an association involving reciprocal rights and obligations, common action and special procedures".

Article 106a lists those Articles of the TEU and TFEU that apply, accordingly, to Euratom. Among them are the Articles governing the process of joining the EU, as well as those concerning withdrawal from the organisation, dispositions concerning the institutions of the EU and matters that can be brought before the CJEU.

2.3. The current relationship between Euratom and the United Kingdom

The UK has been an active participant on the atomic energy common market and has benefited greatly from its provisions. As a consequence, there are many projects and experiments, currently being run on British territory, that depend on Euratom and the EU and that involve the participation of the other Member States and their citizens.

All eight nuclear plants in the UK are owned by a French government owned utility, EDF. A new plant is being built, under the same ownership, in Somerset, at Hinkley Point (with partial Chinese funding). Should the UK leave Euratom, the right of ownership over these facilities could become a major point of contention.

The Culham Centre for Fusion Energy, the UK's national fusion research laboratory, located in Oxfordshire, is partially funded by the EU and employs EU nationals[16]. This laboratory is currently the site of the Joint European Torus, the world's largest operational magnetic confinement plasma physics experiment and the only operational fusion experiment capable of producing fusion energy[17].

Another issue that will need careful reviewing is the fact that the UK houses the world's largest civil plutonium stockpile, at Sellafield[18], in Cumbria, the largest nuclear facility in Europe, owned by the Nuclear Decommissioning Authority (NDA)[19]. The site has

[16] UK Atomic Energy Authority, Mission and Goals 2017/18, p. 3, http://www.ccfe.ac.uk/assets/documents/ukaea_missiongoals17-18.pdf, accessed on 10 March 2018.

[17] For more, see https://www.euro-fusion.org/JET/.

[18] The world's first commercial nuclear power station was developed there.

[19] The NDA is a non-departmental public body created through the Energy Act 2004, that reports to the Department for Business, Energy and Industrial Strategy. Among its objectives are ensuring that all waste products, both radioactive and non-radioactive, are safely managed been operational since the 1940s, with the UK beginning to amass plutonium in the 1950s, fearing the potential running out of its uranium supplies. This did not come about, leaving the UK with the responsibility of storing immense amounts of plutonium, a task that poses numerous cost, security and safety challenges[20]. As long as the state has been a member of Euratom, the Community's civil safeguards have applied, with funding being provided from its resources.

Should the UK leave Euratom, both the procedures and the costs of running Sellafield would have to be reconsidered and could pose serious safety issues for both the host state and for the rest of Europe. According to Euratom provisions, the forms of uranium and plutonium that are used in nuclear fuels and some of the resulting waste belong to the Community[21]. Consequently, should a decision be made to move the Sellafield stockpile to a different state that is part of Euratom, a new issue would arise: the transfer of reprocessed nuclear fuel is governed by legislation that will no longer apply to the UK after it leaves the Community. On the other hand, if Euratom and the UK reach an agreement to transfer ownership of the stockpile to the state, the UK will find itself with increased responsibilities and costs.

2.4. Consequences of leaving Euratom

Withdrawing from Euratom could have serious consequences in several key areas, ranging from the UK's supply of nuclear materials to its opportunities for research and development.

In recent years, approximately 20% of the UK's energy supply came from nuclear power[22], which uses nuclear fuel – that the UK does not produce nationally. Instead, it relies on external sources, and leaving Euratom would hinder the import of such materials and would affect the long-term supply of nuclear fuel.

Another consequence of leaving Euratom would be the interruption to the supply of medical isotopes, which are used in nuclear medicine, especially for the running of medical tests and cancer treatments. Similarly to the case of nuclear fuel, the UK also lacks the necessary reactors for the production of this type of isotopes, importing them instead from Belgium, France and the Netherlands[23].

The British Nuclear Medicine Society has investigated potential sources for medical isotopes in the UK and reached the conclusion that leaving Euratom would have a strong impact on their supply and cost. Difficulties could also arise for patients who travel between Northern Ireland and the republic of Ireland in order to receive radioisotopes for diagnosis or therapy, as leaving the EU and Euratom would mean creating a border between the two, and undergoing the corresponding formalities would create delays and supplementary costs that could have very serious repercussions for the patients' health[24].

Following their departure from Euratom, it is also possible that the British will see their role in nuclear power research diminished. This is an area of particular interest to Euratom, and, by withdrawing from it, the UK would lose vital access to research funds, facilities and experts.

It should also be mentioned that Euratom reports to the International Atomic Energy Agency. If the UK left Euratom, it would need to reach a new agreement with the IAEA.

In May 2017, the UK Parliament's Business, Energy and Industrial Strategy Committee issued a report[25] regarding the consequences, in respect of energy and climate change policy, of leaving the EU and Euratom. The Committee echoed the concern of the nuclear industry that "new arrangements for regulating nuclear trade and activity could take longer than two years to set up" (the allotted time according to Article 50 of the TEU) and warned that "any interval between the UK leaving the European Atomic Energy Community (Euratom) and entering into secure alternative arrangements would severely inhibit nuclear trade and research and threaten power supplies". The Committee recommended that the British Government seek to "delay exit from Euratom, if necessary, to be certain that new arrangements can be in place on our departure from the EU".

2.5. Future possibilities and obstacles

Several solutions have been proposed, both by representatives of the British nuclear industry and by politicians, officials and legal experts. Some of these proposals are more feasible than others, but authorities have yet to decide upon one of them.

The option that would allow the UK to keep its current legislation and standards concerning the nuclear and implementing policy on the long-term management of nuclear waste. For more, see https://www.gov.uk/government/organisations/nuclear-decommissioning-authority/about.

[20] Houses of Parliament, Parliamentary Office of Science & Technology, Managing the UK Plutonium Stockpile, POSTnote nr. 540, September 2016.

[21] Article 86 of the Euratom Treaty: "Special fissile materials shall be the property of the Community. The Community's right of ownership shall extend to all special fissile materials which are produced or imported by a Member State, a person or an undertaking and are subject to the safeguards provided for in Chapter 7".

[22] National Audit Office, The Department of Energy & Climate Change, Nuclear power in the UK, 13 July 2016, https://www.nao.org.uk/report/nuclear-power-in-the-uk/, accessed on 10 March 2018.

[23] https://www.instituteforgovernment.org.uk/explainers/euratom, accessed on 10 March 2018.

[24] Press Statement on Euratom and supply of medical isotopes following Brexit from the British Nuclear Medicine Society, supported by the Royal College of Radiologists and Royal College of Physicians, https://www.bnms.org.uk/news/press-release-british-nuclear-medicine-society-statement-on-leaving-euratom.html, accessed on 10 March 2018.

[25] Available at https://publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm201617/cmselect/cmbeis/909/90902.htm, accessed on 10 March 2018.

industry would be that of reversing Brexit with regard to Euratom.

Several issues arise when considering this course of action: once the notification letter has been sent, triggering the withdrawal process, can it be revoked? If the answer is yes, the next point to consider is whether EU would have to consent to such a measure. Furthermore, the practicalities of being a member of Euratom, but not of the EU, would have to be taken into consideration. It is debatable whether the two organisations, albeit legally distinct, can operate separately and have different membership.

According to Article 50 paragraph (3) of the TEU, there are two possible moments when the Treaties cease to apply: either the date of entry into force of the withdrawal agreement or, in the absence of such an agreement, two years after the letter of notification has been sent (unless the European Council, in agreement with the Member State concerned, unanimously decides to extend this period). Consequently, before the two year period expires, it should be possible for the Member State to rethink its position. This interpretation of the dispositions would also benefit the EU (and Euratom, respectively), considering the fact that a Member State choosing to stay in the organisation would be to its advantage[26].

Article 106a of the Euratom Treaty mentions that Article 50 of the TEU "shall apply to [the Euratom Treaty]". If we were to interpret this disposition as meaning that invoking Article 50 automatically triggers the process of leaving both organisations, the possibility of withdrawing the letter of notification would mean renouncing the process of leaving both the EU and Euratom, something that the UK has yet to decide it wants.

If we were to interpret Article 106a of the Euratom Treaty as meaning that the withdrawal process itself is similar for both organisations, but that the triggering of it can regard only one, several other issues arise. One such problem is whether the letter of notification can be partially amended - can the UK change its mind regarding Euratom, but maintain its position concerning the EU?

If the answer is yes, the next problem to work out is whether the EU's consent is mandatory in such a situation. If the answer to the question of partial amendment is negative, a possible solution would be to revoke the letter in its entirety, and issue a new one, that would only mention leaving the EU. However, such a move would necessarily involve the consent of the EU.

Even if the UK were to amend its notification letter and the EU to accept such a measure, one major impediment would remain: the UK would still have to respect the EU institutions' authority in matters regarding the common nuclear market and would have to submit to the jurisdiction of the Court of Justice of the European Union. The state would also have to recognise the freedom of movement of nuclear experts who would be interested in working in the UK, for EU-funded reactors and plants. Considering that the CJEU's jurisdiction and the free movement of people have been major points of contention prior to the Brexit referendum, any solution involving their continuation would likely be opposed.

If the UK were to remain a full member of Euratom, several legal and practical complications would arise. The British authorities would have to ensure that all existing EU instruments relating to Euratom remain in force in the UK. The state would also have to continue incorporating in its national law any future regulations or directives relating to Euratom, despite the fact that British involvement in preparing and negotiating such regulations and directives would be limited as a consequence of no longer being represented in the legislative and executive institutions of the EU.

One option that has been repeatedly brought up, with regard to the nature of the future relationship between Euratom and the UK, is that of an "associate membership" of Euratom, with Switzerland being mentioned as an example of the type of rapport that could be established after Brexit. However, all states that enjoy full benefits with regards to funding and access must submit to the jurisdiction of the CJEU in matters relating to the nuclear industry[27]. Once again, the reluctance of the UK to submit itself to the authority of the EU's judicial institution proves to be an impediment.

Furthermore, Switzerland is an associated country (not an "associated member") of Euratom and, even so, it must respect the CJEU's jurisdiction and the dispositions regarding the free movement of nuclear scientists[28]. The two operate under a formal cooperation agreement[29] that centres on thermonuclear fusion and plasma physics. This agreement does not fulfil the role of an associate membership and does not make Switzerland an "associated state" of Euratom.

---

[26] For this opinion, see Paul Craig, "Brexit: A Drama in Six Acts", European Law Review, August 2016, Sweet & Maxwell, Oxford Legal Studies Research Paper No. 45/2016.

[27] David Phinnemore, "There's no such thing as 'associate membership' of Euratom", LSE EUROPP Blog, 18 July 2017, http://blogs.lse.ac.uk/europpblog/2017/07/18/no-such-thing-as-associate-membership-euratom/, accessed on 10 March 2018.

[28] Switzerland participates in several Horizon 2020 research programmes and was temporarily suspended from some of them as a consequence of introducing immigration quotas in 2014.

[29] Agreement for scientific and technological cooperation between the European Union and European Atomic Energy Community and the Swiss Confederation associating the Swiss Confederation to Horizon 2020 — the Framework Programme for Research and Innovation and the Research and Training Programme of the European Atomic Energy Community complementing Horizon 2020, and regulating the Swiss Confederation's participation in the ITER activities carried out by Fusion for Energy, published in the Official Journal of the European Union, L 370, 30 December 2014.

Ukraine also cooperates with Euratom on the basis of an association agreement[30], and the rapport between the two does not entail free movement of nuclear scientists, with the disputes being settled by Ukrainian courts of justice. This model of cooperation would be closer, in terms of obligations for the state, to what the UK wants from a future relationship with Euratom, but it also provides fewer advantages.

Euratom also has less onerous cooperation agreements with other countries such as the USA, Australia, South Korea, Canada, Japan. These third-party countries help fund projects such as the previously mentioned International Thermonuclear Experimental Reactor, which is run by Euratom. But resorting to such an agreement could cause difficulties, considering the UK is extremely integrated into the EU's nuclear energy market.

Another option that the UK has at its disposal, that would be the most difficult to enact, is to become completely independent from Euratom and the common nuclear market and to create its own national legislation regarding nuclear industry and research. To that purpose, the British Parliament has drawn up a Nuclear Safeguards Bill, that will offer an expanded role to the Office for Nuclear Regulation, the UK's national nuclear regulator, which will assume several new responsibilities once the UK exits Euratom. The Bill aims to maintain existing standards in the matter of safeguards.

3. Conclusions

The necessity for a well regulated relationship between Euratom and the UK is obvious when considering the advancement and wellbeing of both entities. The legal nature of said relationship remains uncertain, and is bound to depend as much on political factors, as it is on economical, legal and scientific ones. While membership of Euratom is intrinsically linked to that of the EU, in order to maintain even a more casual bond, similar to that of third-party states, into the future, the United Kingdom would have to accept ceding at least a modicum of sovereignty to the organisation and its institutions. It remains to be seen whether the UK will be willing to compromise on issues such as the freedom of movement of nuclear specialists and the jurisdiction of the CJEU over matters relating to the nuclear common market in order to enjoy the many benefits that come with being a participant in an international project of such magnitude.

Two years could prove insufficient, for a state who has been deeply involved and active on the common nuclear market, as is the case of the UK, to create a national regulation system and to establish independent agreements with third countries that it had been previously interacting with through Euratom. Failure to accomplish these goals could negatively affect not only the departing country itself, but all other Member States of Euratom as well, due to the fact that most projects run by the Community involve several participants, through funding, specialised workers and various other types of contributions. Moreover, a potential breach in safety regulations could cause extremely serious effects which could be felt all across Europe.

Bearing in mind the complex nature of this domain, it is surprising to note the current lack of a comprehensive strategy prepared for enforcement in case of departure of a Member State from Euratom. As a consequence of drawing attention to this oversight, discussions could be stimulated concerning the process and consequences of leaving the Community, with the objective to indentify more solutions.

In the future, thoroughly regulating the process of withdrawal from Euratom – and from the EU – should be a priority, in order to avoid a repetition of the current state of uncertainty. Particular attention should be paid to safety guidelines, ensuring the existence of a supply of time-sensitive medical resources, protecting the rights of EU citizens involved in Euratom projects and clarifying the situation of property rights over facilities and resources housed by the withdrawing state.

References

- Craig, Paul, "Brexit: A Drama in Six Acts", European Law Review, August 2016, Sweet & Maxwell, Oxford Legal Studies Research Paper No. 45/2016
- Craig, Paul; de Búrca, Gráinne, EU Law: Text, Cases, and Materials, Fifth Edition, Oxford University Press, New York, 2011
- Fuerea, Augustin, „BREXIT – trecut, prezent, viitor", Curierul judiciar, nr. 12/2016, C.H.Beck, Bucharest
- Fuerea, Augustin, Dreptul Uniunii Europene. Principii, acțiuni, libertăți, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2016
- Fuerea, Augustin, Manualul Uniunii Europene, Sixth Edition, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2016
- Gordon, Michael, "The UK's Sovereignty Situation: Brexit, Bewilderment and Beyond…", King's Law Journal, Volume 27, 2016, https://doi.org/10.1080/09615768.2016.1250465 (accessed on 10.03.2018)
- Kaiser, Wolfram, Using Europe, Abusing the Europeans - Britain and European Integration, 1945–63, Palgrave Macmillan, 1999
- Mourlon-Druol, Emmanuel, The UK's EU vote: the 1975 precedent and today's negotiations, Bruegel Policy Contribution, Issue 2015/08

[30] Association Agreement between the European Union and its Member States, of the one part, and Ukraine, of the other part, published in the Official Journal of the European Union, L 161, 29 May 2014.

- Phinnemore, David, "There's no such thing as 'associate membership' of Euratom", LSE EUROPP Blog, 18 July 2017, http://blogs.lse.ac.uk/europpblog/2017/07/18/no-such-thing-as-associate-membership-euratom/, accessed on 10 March 2018
- The European Union (Notification of Withdrawal) Act 2017 and its Explanatory Notes, available at http://www.legislation.gov.uk/ukpga/2017/9/contents, accessed on 10 March 2018, and Explanatory Notes, available at http://www.legislation.gov.uk/ukpga/2017/9/notes/division/1/index.htm, accessed on 10 March 2018
- Houses of Parliament, Parliamentary Office of Science & Technology, Managing the UK Plutonium Stockpile, POSTnote nr. 540, September 2016
- National Audit Office, The Department of Energy & Climate Change, Nuclear power in the UK, 13 July 2016, https://www.nao.org.uk/report/nuclear-power-in-the-uk/, accessed on 10 March 2018
- Press Statement on Euratom and supply of medical isotopes following Brexit from the British Nuclear Medicine Society, supported by the Royal College of Radiologists and Royal College of Physicians, https://www.bnms.org.uk/news/press-release-british-nuclear-medicine-society-statement-on-leaving-euratom.html, accessed on 10 March 2018
- Report of Business, Energy and Industrial Strategy Committee of the UK Parliament, available at https://publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm201617/cmselect/cmbeis/909/90902.htm, accessed on 10 March 2018
- HM Government, Department for Exiting the European Union, Nuclear materials and safeguards issues - position paper, 13 July 2017, https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/nuclear-materials-and-safeguards-issues-position-paper, accessed on 10 March 2018
- UK Atomic Energy Authority, Mission and Goals 2017/18, available at http://www.ccfe.ac.uk/assets/documents/ukaea_missiongoals17-18.pdf, accessed on 10 March 2018
- https://www.instituteforgovernment.org.uk/explainers/euratom, accessed on 10 March 2018
- https://www.euro-fusion.org/JET/, accessed on 10 March 2018
- https://www.iter.org/proj/inafewlines#1, accessed on 10 March 2018

SHAPING EU LAW THROUGH THE PRELIMINARY RULING PROCEDURE - THE UNITED KINGDOM'S CONTRIBUTION

Maria-Cristina SOLACOLU[*]

Abstract

Now that Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union has been triggered and negotiations regarding the withdrawal of the United Kingdom from the European Union are underway, the state's departure from the Union is becoming a reality. However, even if this process is finalised, it is important to draw attention to the fact that the United Kingdom's past contribution to the European project remains crucial and will maintain its relevancy in the future. The preliminary ruling procedure has been an invaluable tool for shaping and developing EU law, and the United Kingdom's withdrawal does not render void any of the rulings pronounced by the Court of Justice in answer to questions referred by British courts, rulings that have had a direct influence over the internal law of all Member States. In consideration of the essential role of the preliminary ruling procedure, this paper will present several instances where the judicial authority of the European Union was called upon to offer an interpretation on the compatibility of the United Kingdom's legislation with EU law and, by answering the questions referred by the British courts, established a binding precedent for the national courts of all Member States and furthered the process of judicial integration.

Keywords: judicial integration – national court – preliminary ruling – withdrawal from the European Union – binding precedent.

1. Introduction

The preliminary ruling procedure, currently contained in Article 267 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, has played a pivotal role in shaping EU law and furthering the process of integration between Member States of the Union. Upon being confronted with a disposition of EU law whose meaning is unclear, the national court can bring the matter to the attention of the Court of Justice of the European Union, who is competent to offer a legally binding interpretation of that disposition[1]. This procedure has been called the "jewel in the Crown" of the CJEU's jurisdiction[2] and has been essential in redefining the relationship between the national and EU legal systems. At first, this rapport was an horizontal one, with the Court in Luxembourg and the national courts being separate and equal. In time, as a consequence of the states' judicial authorities deferring numerous questions for preliminary rulings, the relationship between them and the CJEU took on a vertical aspect, with the latter holding a superior position to that of the national courts, whom it has enrolled as "enforcers and appliers of EU law"[3].

At present, the national courts are a central part of the EU judicial system, with the organisation's judicial authority occupying the highest position and the preliminary ruling procedure being the primary interface[4] between them - approximately two thirds of the cases that are brought before the CJEU concern matters of interpretation or validation of EU legislation.

The United Kingdom, albeit reticent to relinquish some of its competences to the EEC[5], as required by the participation in the European construction, became an active contributor to the development of Community (and, after the Treaty of Lisbon, EU) law once it finally became a member. At first, British courts manifested a restrictive approach to the referral process, only reaching out to the Court of Justice for particularly difficult matters regarding interpretation – a vestige, perhaps, of the UK's initial reluctance to submit itself to the jurisdiction of a supranational authority. However, as time passed and the state adapted to its new position, the British courts took the opposite stance and began referring questions for preliminary rulings whenever there was any amount of uncertainty regarding the correct interpretation of European law, to the extent that higher courts cautioned against overcrowding the CJEU with referrals where the ruling would be unlikely to have any application beyond the instant case.

It should also be mentioned that the UK has been an active intervenor in the procedure of the preliminary [*] PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: maria.solacolu@gmail.com).

[1] Augustin Fuerea, Dreptul Uniunii Europene. Principii, acțiuni, libertăți, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2016, p. 95.

[2] Paul Craig, Gráinne de Búrca, EU Law: Text, Cases, and Materials, Fifth Edition, Oxford University Press, New York, 2011, p. 442.

[3] Ibidem, p. 443. For details about the preliminary ruling procedure and its role in creating seminal notions of EU law, see Mihaela Augustina Dumitrașcu, Dreptul Uniunii Europene si specificitatea acestuia, Second Edition, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2015.

[4] Thomas de la Mare, Catherine Donnelly, "Preliminary rulings and EU legal integration: evolution and stasis", The Evolution of EU Law, Second Edition, Paul Craig, Gráinne de Búrca (ed.), Oxford University Press, Oxford, 2011, p. 363.

[5] Augustin Fuerea, „BREXIT – trecut, prezent, viitor", Curierul judiciar, nr. 12/2016, C.H.Beck, p. 631.

ruling, "submitting observations in roughly thirty to forty cases per year from other Member States"[6].

As a consequence of the UK's traditionally involved role in the shaping of EU law through the preliminary ruling procedure, the state's withdrawal from the organisation is likely to have an impact on the future evolution of the relationship between the national and EU judicial systems. It is for this reason that particular attention should be paid to the British contribution to the development of EU law and the deepening of legal integration.

2. Preliminary rulings and their impact on national legislation

The cases presented in this section were submitted to the Court of Justice by the United Kingdom's national courts, who were in doubt over the correct interpretation and application of Community/EU law and whether British legislation was in accordance with it. The judgments pronounced in these cases had important consequences for the Member States' legislation, with a particular impact on the way that the UK's institutions (judicial or otherwise) enforced EU law. As a consequence of their ample effect on national law, these judgements also affected the way both the European Union and its judicial authority were perceived by British citizens.

2.1. The Queen v./ Immigration Appeal Tribunal and Surinder Singh, ex parte Secretary of State for Home Department[7]

This case was brought before the Court of Justice by a national court of the UK, in order to obtain an interpretation of certain dispositions of the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community (now TFEU) and of secondary law concerning the right of residence of a Community (now EU) citizen's spouse, when said citizen returned to his or her country of origin, also a Member State, in order to establish a residence there.

The main proceedings, during which this question was raised, regarded the fact that Secretary of State for the Home Department had decided to deport Surinder Singh, an Indian citizen, who had been married since 1982 to a British national, Rashpal Purewal. Between 1983-1985 the two worked in Germany, and then decided to return to the United Kingdom, in order to set up a business. In 1987, at the wife's request, they divorced and, consequently, the British authorities decided to shorten Surinder Singh's residence permit, refusing to grant him indefinite leave to remain in the country as the spouse of a British citizen.

The following question was raised in front of the national court: if a married woman, national of a Member State, were to exercise the right recognised to her by the Treaty and worked in another Member State, and, subsequently, returned to her Member State of origin in order to open and run a business with her husband, would the relevant Community legislation entitle her spouse (not a Community national) to enter and remain in that Member State with his wife? More clearly, would a couple in that specific situation (returning to the Member State of origin) enjoy the same benefits that would be granted to a couple, consisting of a Community citizen and a national of a third-party state, who decided to move to a different Member State?[8]

The Court's observations were that the Treaty's provisions regarding the free movement of workers aim to facilitate the pursuit of all types of economic and occupational activities, anywhere on the Community's territory, and forbid any measures that would disadvantage those citizens who want to pursue said activities in a different Member State. It is for this reason that the nationals of Member States have the explicit right to enter and reside on the territory of any other Member States in order to pursue an economic activity[9].

A citizen of a Member State could be discouraged from leaving his country of origin in order to pursue an economic activity as an employed or self-employed person on the territory of the Community if, upon returning to the state of origin, with a view to continue pursuing such activities, the conditions which would apply „were not at least equivalent to those which he would enjoy under the Treaty or secondary law in the territory of another Member State"[10]. The Community citizen's spouse being barred from entering the state of origin and living there with him would certainly qualify as such a deterring measure.

It follows that the Member State must allow the citizen's spouse (regardless of his or her nationality) access and the right of residence on its territory, if said spouse travelled with the citizen to another Member State, so that the latter could pursue and economic activity, and then returned to the country of origin with the same purpose. The spouse, national of a third-party state, must enjoy the same rights that would be guaranteed to him or her in case the Community citizen decided to travel to another Member State[11].

This case – and its corresponding judgment – represented an important moment for the United Kingdom and caused significant ripples with regard to [6] Thomas de la Mare, Catherine Donnelly, op.cit., p. 373.

[7] Judgment of the Court of 7 July 1992, The Queen v./ Immigration Appeal Tribunal and Surinder Singh, ex parte Secretary of State for Home Department, C-370/90, ECLI:EU:C:1992:296.

[8] Ibidem, para. 9.

[9] Ibidem, para. 16 and 17.

[10] Ibidem, para. 19.

[11] Ibidem, para. 21 and 23.

British legislation concerning immigration for those individuals married to UK nationals who have travelled and pursued economic activities in other Member States.

At present, nationals of a third-party state can apply for an European Economic Area[12] permit in the UK if they fulfil the following requirements: they have lived in another Member State alongside a family member who is a British national; the two have genuinely[13] lived in that state; the British family member has the right to permanent residence in the other state or, as long as he lived there, was working, self-employed, studying or had the necessary means to be self-sufficient. If the British national has been back in the UK for more than three months, at the time of the application, it must be proven that he finds himself in one of the mentioned situations (is pursuing an economic activity, studying or is self-sufficient) in order for the spouse, citizen of a third-party state, to be able to obtain the residence permit.

The notion of British „family member" covers the spouse or partner; parents and grandparents (and their spouses or partners), if the national of third-party state is younger than 21 years old or is dependent on them; children and grandchildren (and their spouses or partners), if the person applying for a permit is dependent on them[14].

On occasion, this judgment has been criticised, in the UK, for creating a way to elude British legislation regarding the right of entry and residence for citizens from third-party states, an accusation which has contributed to the public perception that the EU and its judicial authority overextend themselves and interfere in the Member States' immigration policies.

2.2. Dr. Pamela Mary Enderby v./ Frenchay Health Authority and Secretary of State for Health[15]

Through the judgment pronounced in this case, the Court of Justice reaffirmed the principle of equal pay for men and women, transferring the burden of proof from the worker to the employer in those cases where there are sufficient grounds to suspect the existence of discriminatory practices based on the sex of the workers.

The appellant in the main proceedings was a female therapist, Dr. Pamela Enderby, employed by the Frenchay Health Authority. She stated that the members of her profession, predominantly women, were considerably underpaid in comparison to other similar professions, where most employees were men. As an example, the appellant, whose annual pay was 10.106UKL despite having a level of seniority in the National Health System, presented the case of a clinical psychologist, payed 12.527UKL per year, and that of a principal pharmacist, payed 14.106UKL for the same amount of time

Dr. Enderby's claim was dismissed by the national Employment Tribunal, who considered that, following separate collective negotiations and considering the difficulty in filling the positions of clinical psychologist and pharmacist, it was justified for these differences in pay to exist and that they were not discriminatory in nature. This decision was brought in front of the Court of Appeal, who referred several questions to the Court of Justice in order to establish whether the principle of equal pay for men and women requires that the employer be the one responsible for proving the absence of sex-based discrimination when the remuneration awarded for a job carried out almost exclusively by women is lower than that awarded for a job of equal value, carried out predominantly by men[16].

The Court in Luxembourg was keen to mention that the Treaty provides a framework for the close cooperation between itself and the national courts, „based on a division of responsibilities between them". The Court considered that, according to said division, it is strictly the duty of the national court before which the main proceedings take place (and who „must assume the responsibility for the subsequent judicial decision") to determine, taking into account the particularities of each case, both the need for a preliminary ruling from the Court of Justice and the pertinence of it with regard to the main dispute[17]. Therefore when the Court in Luxembourg receives a request for a preliminary ruling that is not evidently irrelevant to the case, it must respond and is not held to appraise the validity of the hypothesis, which is verified, if necessary, by the national court.

With regard to the existence of sex-based discrimination, the burden of proof normally lies with the worker who, considering himself to be the victim of such discrimination, brings legal action against his employer and, consequently, must support his claim. However, the burden of proof could shift when necessary in order "to avoid depriving workers who appear to be the victims of discrimination of any effective means of enforcing the principle of equal pay"[18].

Consequently, when relevant (in the national court's opinion) statistics indicate the existence of a [12] The Agreement on the European Economic Area, which entered into force on 1 January 1994, created an „Internal Market" which reunites the Member States of the European Union with three members of the European Free Trade Association – Iceland, Liechtenstein and Norway.

[13] In order to verify this fact, the applicant and the British family member must prove that they lived together in the other Member State for a considerable amount of time and that they integrated there.

[14] The requirements for a residence permit can be found on the official website of the United Kingdom's Government, https://www.gov.uk/family-permit/surinder-singh, accessed on 10 March 2018.

[15] Judgment of the Court of 27 October 1993, Dr. Pamela Mary Enderby v./ Frenchay Health Authority and Secretary of State for Health, C-127/92, ECLI:EU:C:1993:859.

[16] Ibidem, para. 7.

[17] Ibidem, para. 10.

[18] Ibidem, para. 14.

considerable difference between the pay granted for services of equal value, of which one is performed almost exclusively by women and one, predominantly by men, the Treaty demands of the employer to prove the said difference is based on objective criteria that do not involve sex-based discrimination[19].

Even when the rates of pay are established following separate processes of collective bargaining for each professional group, without there being any sort of discrimination within one particular group, the employer is not always exempt from providing justifications for the discrepancy. Should the results of the negotiations lead to said groups, having the same employer and syndicate, being treated differently, the former could still be expected to prove that he doesn't disregard the Treaty when establishing the rates of pay[20].

If the employer could invoke the absence of discrimination within each process of collective bargaining in order to justify the difference in remuneration rates, he could easily elude the principle of equal pay for men and women by engaging, each time, in distinct negotiations.

It is solely for the national court (the only one competent to make findings of fact) to determine, through the application of the principle of proportionality if needed, whether and to what extent the lack of candidates for a certain job and the need to entice them by offering a higher salary constitute objective economic reasons that justify the discrepancy between the pay rates for two services, of which one is carried out almost exclusively by women, and the other, by men[21].

The Court of Justice's judgment represented a step forward for the affirmation and enforcement of the principle of equal pay by removing the possibility for the employers to evade it through the use of distinct collective bargaining processes or other such measures.

2.3. Carole Louise Webb v./ EMO Air Cargo (UK) Ltd.[22]

This case confirmed the Court of Justice's position with regard to the fact that, in case of discrimination based on the worker's pregnancy, the fact that a sick man, absent from work for a similar period of time, would have been treated the same way does not constitute a valid defence.

The appellant in the main proceedings was Carole Louise Webb, a female employee of the EMO Air Cargo (UK) Ltd., a company that employed 16 people, of which 4 worked in the import operations department. One of those 4 was a Mrs. Stewart, who became pregnant and intended to depart on maternity leave. In order to cover for her during the period of absence, the company hired Mrs. Webb, for an unlimited period, with an understanding that she would continue to work there even after Mrs. Stewart's return from her maternity leave. Two weeks after being recruited, Mrs. Webb discovered that she, too, was pregnant and was going to give birth around the same time as Mrs. Stewart. The employer was made aware of this fact and decided to fire Mrs. Webb, on the grounds that she would not be able to fulfil the duties she had been hired to perform, which included those that Mrs. Stewart would have normally been responsible for[23].

Mrs. Webb was of the opinion that she had been the victim of sex-based discrimination and brought legal action against her employer before the Industrial Tribunal. Her claims were rejected on the basis that "the true and main reason" she had been fired was not her sex, but the fact that, in the future, she would find herself in the impossibility of fulfilling the role she had been recruited for – specifically, covering for Mrs. Stewart during her absence on maternity leave. According to the Tribunal, if a man had been hired for the same reason and, subsequently, had notified the employer that he would be absent for a period of time similar to that applicable in Mrs. Webb's case, he would have also been fired. Furthermore, the national jurisdiction dismissed the possibility of the case being an example of indirect discrimination, as "the reasonable needs of their business required that the person recruited to cover for Mrs. Stewart during her maternity leave be available"[24]. Appeals made by Mrs. Webb were unsuccessful, but she was allowed to appeal to the House of Lords[25]. The supreme court considered that the case's "special feature" was the fact that the claimant, who had been fired because of her pregnancy, had been hired specifically to replace, at least temporarily, another female worker who was, herself, absent for the same reason.

Unsure whether the importance of the duties Mrs. Webb had been recruited for justified her firing, the supreme court of the UK decided to stay the proceedings and issue a request for a preliminary ruling[26].

The Court of Justice decided that the relevant secondary law[27] prohibits the firing of a female worker

---

[19] Ibidem, para. 19.

[20] Ibidem, para. 23.

[21] Ibidem, para. 29.

[22] Judgment of the Court of 14 July 1994, Carole Louise Webb v./ EMO Air Cargo (UK) Ltd., C-32/93, ECLI:EU:C:1994:300.

[23] Ibidem, para. 3 and 4.

[24] Ibidem, para. 11 and 12.

[25] The House of Lords (specifically the Law Lords) was the supreme court of the United Kingdom until the Constitutional Reform Act 2005, which created the Supreme Court of the United Kigndom.

[26] Ibidem, para. 14 and 15.

[27] Council Directive 76/207/EEC of 9 February 1976 on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions. This act was repealed by Directive 2006/54/EC of who has been contracted for an undetermined amount of time in order to replace another employee for the duration of the latter's maternity leave and who isn't able to fulfil that role because, a short while after her recruitment, she has discovered that she is also pregnant.

Dismissing a female worker because she is pregnant constitutes direct discrimination based on sex, and the situation of a woman who, because of her gravidity, is unable to fulfil the duties she has been hired for cannot be compared to that of a man who is similarly incapable for medical or other reasons: "pregnancy is not in any way comparable with a pathological condition, and even less so with unavailability for work on non-medical grounds, both of which are situations that may justify the dismissal of a woman without discriminating on grounds of sex"[28].

Firing a pregnant woman, who has been hired for an indefinite amount of time, cannot be justified based on her inability to fulfil one of the fundamental conditions of the employment contract, even when the worker's availability is, for the employer, an essential factor for the proper functioning of the business. The reasoning behind this position is that protection granted by Community/EU law to pregnant women cannot be conditioned on whether their presence in the workplace during maternity leave is crucial for the business, any contrary interpretation rendering "ineffective the provisions of the directive"[29].

The Court's interpretation could be criticised for disproportionally affecting employers who find themselves in a situation similar to the one presented here, where a small business must continue employing two workers who are incapable to fulfil their contractual obligations, one of whom has been hired, shortly before becoming unavailable for work, specifically to carry out the tasks of the other absent employee. Moreover, this could discourage employers from hiring female workers due to a concern that they would, later on, find themselves in such a position. A possible solution would be to legislate a mandatory period of performing work duties, before an employee is allowed to take a prolonged leave of absence.

2.4. S. Coleman v./ Attridge Law and Steve Law[30]

Prior to this case, protection against direct discrimination and harassment on grounds of disability was only recognised for the disabled individuals themselves. As a consequence of the Court's ruling, the scope of the protection was extended and a new type of action was created, which can be brought before national Employment Tribunals.

The claimant in the main proceedings, Mrs. Coleman, was hired, starting with 2001, as a legal secretary. In 2002, she gave birth to a son who suffered from several congenital disorders, requiring specialized care, which was mainly provided by the mother. In 2005, Mrs. Coleman accepted to end her employment contract and entered voluntary redundancy. Shortly afterwards, she brought an action before the Employment Tribunal, London South, claiming that she had been the victim of unfair constructive dismissal and of discrimination based on the fact that her son was disabled, which forced her to stop working for her former employer. These discriminatory acts included, according to the claimant: refusal of reintegrating her on the position she had occupied prior to departing on maternity leave; refusal of allowing her the same flexibility as regarded her working hours and "the same working conditions as those of her colleagues who [were] parents of non-disabled children"; insulting the claimant when she asked to requested time off to care for her child, despite the fact that other employees had been granted that benefit; ignoring the formal complaint she made regarding these discriminatory acts; "abusive and insulting comments" targeting both her and her child, specifically because of the latter's disability; being threatened with dismissal when she was late for work "because of problems related to her son's condition", when other employees had not been reprimanded for the same situation[31].

The national court decided to stay the main proceedings concerning Mrs. Coleman's dismissal and to refer several questions for a preliminary ruling, regarding the correct interpretation of the relevant secondary law[32]. Of particular interest is the answer to the question of said legislation offering protection against discrimination and harassment for "employees who, though they are not themselves disabled, are treated less favourably or harassed on the ground of their association with a person who is disabled"[33]. The Court in Luxembourg considered that protection against discrimination as regards employment and occupation must not be limited to people who are, themselves, disabled, as the principle of equal treatment, protected through secondary law, does not apply to a particular category of persons, but according to certain reasons provided within said legislation: "Where an employer treats an employee who is not himself disabled less favourably than another employee the European Parliament and of the Council of 5 July 2006 on the implementation of the principle of equal opportunities and equal treatment of men and women in matters of employment and occupation.

[28] Judgment of the Court of 14 July 1994, Carole Louise Webb v./ EMO Air Cargo (UK) Ltd., C-32/93, ECLI:EU:C:1994:300, para. 24 and 25. The Court of Justice had previously drawn a clear distinction between pregnancy and illness in Hertz v./ Aldi Marked K/S, C-179/88, ECLI:EU:C:1990:384.

[29] Ibidem, para. 26.

[30] Judgment of the Court of 17 July 2008, S. Coleman v./ Attridge Law and Steve Law, C-303/06, ECLI:EU:C:2008:415.

[31] Ibidem, para. 19-26.

[32] Council Directive 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation.

[33] Ibidem, para. 27.

is, has been or would be treated in a comparable situation, and it is established that the less favourable treatment of that employee is based on the disability of his child, whose care is provided primarily by that employee, such treatment is contrary to the prohibition of direct discrimination laid down by Article 2(2)(a)"[34]. The same comments apply to cases of harassment, which is considered a form of discrimination and is also prohibited: "Where it is established that the unwanted conduct amounting to harassment which is suffered by an employee who is not himself disabled is related to the disability of his child, whose care is provided primarily by that employee, such conduct is contrary to the prohibition of harassment laid down by Article 2(3)"[35].

As a consequence of this ruling, employees can now invoke the protection granted by EU law against discrimination and harassment even in cases where the victim of such behaviour is targeted not for having a disability, but due to caring for or being associated with somebody who is disabled.

2.5. Williams and Others v./ British Airways plc.[36]

The impact of this case on British law has been recently amplified by several judgments given by the national courts, with great importance for the field of employment law, in particular for matters regarding working time. These judgments conformed to the CJEU's preliminary ruling, according to which employers have the obligation to include any supplementary remuneration and other elements of that nature when calculating the payments made in respect of paid annual leave.

The appellants in the main proceedings were pilots hired by British Airways. The terms of their employment contracts were the result of negotiations between British Airways and the pilots' union, the British Air Line Pilots Association[37]. According to those terms, the pilots' remuneration consisted of three elements: a fixed annual sum and two types of supplementary payments. One of them depended on the time spent flying, was fully taxable and was calculated at the rate of GBP 10 per planned flying hour. The second type of payment varied according to the time spent away from base, with a rate of GBP 2.73 per hour, and only 18% of it was taxable[38].

Among the conditions agreed upon by the pilots' union and British Airways was the provision that the payment made in respect to paid annual leave was based only on the fixed annual sum[39]. The pilots considered that, according to relevant EU legislation[40], the paid annual leave sum should be calculated based upon their entire remuneration, including the two types of supplementary payments. The Employment Tribunal and the Employment Appeal Tribunal found in favour of the appellants, but the Court of Appeal found in favour of British Airways, adopting the view that only the fixed annual sum should be considered remuneration[41]. The case was brought before the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom, who, in doubt over the meaning of "paid annual leave" and the extent to which Member States could impose "conditions for entitlement to, and granting of, such leave", decided to stay the proceedings and to refer several questions to the CJEU for a preliminary ruling.

According to the Court in Luxembourg, the article that the pilots based their claims on must be interpreted to mean that "every worker is entitled to paid annual leave of at least four weeks and that that right to paid annual leave must be regarded as a particularly important principle of Community social law"[42]. Furthermore, the right to paid annual leave is consecrated by the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, in Art. 31 par. (2). The notion of "paid annual leave" should be interpreted to mean that,, during the specified period of time, destined for rest, the workers' remuneration should be maintained at its normal level. The objective is to ensure that the workers' financial position is, during such leave, comparable to their usual one, so that quality of life is not affected during the rest period: "an allowance, the amount of which is just sufficient to ensure that there is no serious risk that the worker will not take his leave, will not satisfy the requirements of EU law". To that end, "where the remuneration received by the worker is composed of several components, the determination of that normal remuneration and, consequently, of the amount to which that worker is entitled during his annual leave requires a specific analysis"[43]. It is solely the national court's prerogative to determine which of the various elements that compose a worker's remuneration must be taken into consideration in a specific case.

Regarding the instant case, the CJEU considered that the supplementary payment corresponding to the time spent in flight should be included when calculating [34] Ibidem, para. 38, 50 and 56 and operative part 1.

[35] Ibidem, para. 58 and operative part 2.
[36] Judgment of the Court of 15 September 2011, Williams and Others v./ British Airways plc., C-155/10, ECLI:EU:C:2011:588.
[37] Ibidem, para. 7.
[38] Ibidem, para. 8.
[39] Ibidem, para. 10.
[40] Art. 7 of Directive 2003/88/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 4 November 2003 concerning certain aspects of the organisation of working time; Clause 3 of the Agreement annexed to Council Directive 2000/79/EC of 27 November 2000 concerning the European Agreement on the Organisation of Working Time of Mobile Workers in Civil Aviation.
[41] Judgment of the Court of 15 September 2011, Williams and Others v./ British Airways plc., C-155/10, ECLI:EU:C:2011:588, para. 11 and 12.
[42] Ibidem, para. 17.
[43] Ibidem, para. 19-22.

the sum corresponding to the paid annual leave[44]. Moreover, all components "which relate to the personal and professional status of an airline pilot must be maintained during that worker's paid annual leave"[45].

The Court also underlined the fact that entitlement to an annual leave and to receiving a payment for the duration of it represent two aspects of a single right. EU law does not prohibit Member States from granting workers a superior level of protection in comparison to that guaranteed by the EU, which represents a minimum standard.

In closing, the ruling provides that the dispositions which had been referred to the Court for interpretation mean "that an airline pilot is entitled, during his annual leave, not only to the maintenance of his basic salary, but also, first, to all the components intrinsically linked to the performance of the tasks which he is required to carry out under his contract of employment and in respect of which a monetary amount, included in the calculation of his total remuneration, is provided and, second, to all the elements relating to his personal and professional status as an airline pilot"[46].

3. Conclusions

The judgements we have summarily presented are just a few of those pronounced in cases that the UK has submitted to the CJEU for a preliminary ruling. The importance of national courts cooperating with the Union's jurisdiction can be seen in the effects these rulings have on internal law and on the evolution of EU legislation and integration.

The UK has a long and rich history in the EU, having played a crucial part in establishing many of its policies, even as it eschewed others it considered detrimental to British interests. As a consequence of this position toward the EU, involved and sceptical at the same time, the UK's national courts have frequently referred preliminary questions and submitted observations to the CJEU in order to ensure that they applied EU law as conveniently as possible for the state. These questions and the rulings that the Court of Justice pronounced in answer to them have been an important contribution to the continuous effort of clarifying, improving and shaping EU law.

In the future, the absence of a country preoccupied with safeguarding its national interests could actually prove disadvantageous, leading to a decrease in referred questions and observations and, consequently, of important rulings of the CJEU, that are essential in maintaining the adaptability of EU law and in furthering the integration process.

It is advisable to continue focusing on the essential relationship between the CJEU and the Members States, and encourage the latter's contribution, through the preliminary ruling procedure, to the development of EU law – by increasing the participation of each individual Member, the risk of losing important contributions and slowing the process of integration as a consequence of a state departing from the European Union is lessened.

References

- Craig, Paul; de Búrca, Gráinne (ed.), The Evolution of EU Law, Second Edition, Oxford University Press, Oxford, 2011
- Craig, Paul; de Búrca, Gráinne, EU Law: Text, Cases, and Materials, Fifth Edition, Oxford University Press, New York, 2011
- Dumitrașcu, Mihaela Augustina, Dreptul Uniunii Europene si specificitatea acestuia, Second Edition, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2015
- Fuerea, Augustin, Dreptul Uniunii Europene. Principii, acțiuni, libertăți, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2016
- Fuerea, Augustin, „BREXIT – trecut, prezent, viitor", Curierul judiciar, nr. 12/2016, C.H.Beck, Bucharest
- Hogarth, Raphael; Lloyd, Lewis, Who's afraid of the ECJ? Charting the UK's relationship with the European Court, Institute for Government, London, 2017
- Judgment of the Court of 8 November 1990, Hertz v./ Aldi Marked K/S, C-179/88, ECLI:EU:C:1990:384.
- Judgment of the Court of 7 July 1992, The Queen v./ Immigration Appeal Tribunal and Surinder Singh, ex parte Secretary of State for Home Department, C-370/90, ECLI:EU:C:1992:296
- Judgment of the Court of 27 October 1993, Dr. Pamela Mary Enderby v./ Frenchay Health Authority and Secretary of State for Health, C-127/92, ECLI:EU:C:1993:859
- Judgment of the Court of 14 July 1994, Carole Louise Webb v./ EMO Air Cargo (UK) Ltd., C-32/93, ECLI:EU:C:1994:300
- Judgment of the Court of 17 July 2008, S. Coleman v./ Attridge Law and Steve Law, C-303/06, ECLI:EU:C:2008:415
- Judgment of the Court of 15 September 2011, Williams and Others v./ British Airways plc., C-155/10, ECLI:EU:C:2011:588
- Council Directive 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation

[44] Ibidem, para. 24.
[45] Ibidem, para. 28.
[46] Ibidem, para. 31 and operative part.

- Directive 2003/88/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 4 November 2003 concerning certain aspects of the organisation of working time
- Council Directive 2000/79/EC of 27 November 2000 concerning the European Agreement on the Organisation of Working Time of Mobile Workers in Civil Aviation
- Council Directive 76/207/EEC of 9 February 1976 on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions.
- Directive 2006/54/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 5 July 2006 on the implementation of the principle of equal opportunities and equal treatment of men and women in matters of employment and occupation
- https://www.gov.uk/family-permit/surinder-singh, accessed on 10 March 2018

LIFTING THE VEIL OF THE GDPR TO DATA SUBJECTS

Laura-Cristiana SPATARU-NEGURA[*]
Cornelia LAZAR[]

Abstract

Every natural person is entitled to personal data protection regardless of his or her nationality, residence, race, age, gender, language, religion, political and other affiliations, ethnicity, social background and status, wealth, birth, education, social position or any other personal characteristic. Europe's clock is now ticking with regards to data protection: just in a few days, on 25 May 2018, a new EU data protection framework - the Regulation (EU) 2016/6791, will apply and will be directly applicable in all the Member States. This new General Data Protection Regulation governs the processing by an individual, a company or an organisation of personal data relating to individuals in the EU. Having in view the impact this regulation has for the entire world, we consider that it should be very well analysed.

The aim of this study is to raise awareness and improve knowledge of data protection rules established by the GDPR. It is recommended for legal professionals and non-specialist legal professionals, and other persons working in the field of data protection. Additionally, this study intends to provide guidance to data subjects as for their rights under the GDPR and to give some relevant examples from our daily life in which data breaches happen.

Keywords: data protection, data subjects, GDPR, personal, Regulation (EU) 2016/6791.

1. About Data Protection in Europe

This study provides an overview of the GDPR applicable to data protection in relation to the data subjects' rights. Data is personal data if it relates to an identified or at least identifiable natural person. If data about such a person is being processed, this person is called the "data subject". Personal data can be contained in computer files or in paper records (e.g. telephone numbers, addresses, financial information, photographs, satellite images, car registrations, ID numbers, e-mail addresses, health records).

Looking into the history of individual rights, we note that a right to protection of an individual's private life against intrusion from others (especially from the state), was for the first time foreseen in an international legal instrument in Article 12 of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948 on respect for private and family life:

No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon his honour and reputation. Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks[1].

This legal provision influenced the development of other human rights instruments in Europe. At the European level, there are several pieces of legislation on data protection, created by both the European Union (hereinafter the "EU") and the Council of Europe (hereinafter the "CoE"), which have been applied by the international jurisdictions through the years (the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union and of the European Court of Human Rights are relevant).

In the present, the main important acts in Europe are:

a) at the CoE level - the European Convention for Human Rights (Article 8 – Right to respect for private and family life, home and correspondence), as well as the Convention for the Protection of Individuals with regard to Automatic Processing of Personal Data (Convention 108). Article 8 of the Convention recognizes the right to protection of personal data, which guarantees the right to respect for private and family life, home and correspondence, and lays down the conditions under which restrictions of this right are permitted. The Convention 108 is the only legally binding international instrument in the field of data protection.
b) at the EU level - the Directive 95/46/EC on the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data.

At the EU level, both primary and secondary EU law[2] regulates the data protection field. The primary EU law comprises the treaties, namely the Treaty on European Union (TEU), the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU), the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union. The secondary EU law comprises the regulations, directives and decisions of EU adopted by the EU institutions.

[*] Assistant Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: negura_laura@yahoo.com).
[] Data Protection Officer, E-solution Manager, Ecoprotech Engineering, Green Group (e-mail: cornelia_gabor@yahoo.com).
[1] Available online at http://www.un.org/en/universal-declaration-human-rights/.
[2] For more information on sources of EU law, please see Nicolae Popa, Elena Anghel, Cornelia Ene-Dinu, Laura-Cristiana Spataru-Negura, Teoria generala a dreptului. Caiet de seminar, third edition, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, p. 153.

As mentioned above, the main EU legal instrument on data protection, in force at this moment, is the Directive 95/46/EC of the European Parliament and the Council of 24 October 1995 on the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data (hereinafter the "Data Protection Directive")[3].

From 25 May 2018 the only binding legal instrument at the EU level shall be the General Data Protection Regulation (hereinafter the "GDPR") - Regulation (EU) 2016/679[4]) adopted on 27 April 2016. By this regulation, the European Parliament, the Council of the European Union, and the European Commission intend to strengthen and unify data protection for all individuals within the EU. When the GDPR shall take effect, it will replace the 1995 Data Protection Directive.

Because of the importance of the data protection field, the EU institutions have decided to adopt this piece of legislation through a regulation (instead of a directive) because unlike a directive, it does not require domestic governments to pass any enabling legislation and so it is directly binding and applicable[5].

The GDPR provides data subjects with several rights that can be enforced against undertakings that process personal data. All undertakings acting as controllers are directly affected by the rights afforded to data subjects, while the undertakings acting as processors are affected to a lesser degree.

In Article 1 paragraph (1) of the GDPR it is underlined that:

This Regulation lays down rules relating to the protection of natural persons with regard to the processing of personal data and rules relating to the free movement of personal data.

According to Article 4 paragraph (1) of the GDPR, there is no need for high-quality identification of the data subject; it is sufficient that the natural person concerned be identifiable:

'[P]ersonal data' means any information relating to an identified or identifiable natural person ('data subject'); an identifiable natural person is one who can be identified, directly or indirectly, in particular by reference to an identifier such as a name, an identification number, location data, an online identifier or to one or more factors specific to the physical, physiological, genetic, mental, economic, cultural or social identity of that natural person.

A person shall be considered identifiable if a piece of information contains elements of identification through which the person can be identified, directly or indirectly.

The data subjects have several rights under the GDPR (please see Chapter 3 of the GDPR - Rights of the data subject).

For instance, Article 12 of the GDPR regulates the need of "[t]ransparent information, communication and modalities for the exercise of the rights of the data subject". In order that the data subject understand the information provided by the controller, the latter must use "a concise, transparent, intelligible and easily accessible form, using clear and plain language, in particular for any information addressed specifically to a child"[6]. Additionally, the "information shall be provided in writing, or by other means, including, where appropriate, by electronic means"[7] or orally (when the data subject requested it specifically, provided that the identity of the data subject is proven by other means.

We consider that such information given to the data subject should not consist of privacy policies that are difficult to understand or excessively lengthy.

This communication between the controller and the data subject shall be done "without undue delay and in any event within one month of receipt of the request"[8]. This deadline may be extended by two further months where necessary, depending the complexity and number of the requests, but the controller shall have to inform the data subject of any such extension within one month of receipt of the request, together with the reasons for the delay.

Usually, the controller shall communicate the information free of charge (except for the cases when the requests from a data subject are manifestly unfounded or excessive, raising a problem of repetitiveness)[9]. In this kind of bad faith situations, the controller shall be able to charge a reasonable fee to the data subject (for the administrative costs incurred) or to refuse to act on the request, but the controller shall have to demonstrate the manifestly unfounded or excessive character of the request.

To limit the risk that third parties gain unlawful access to personal data, under the GDPR the controllers should require data subjects to provide proof of identity before giving effect to their rights.

According to Articles 13-15 of the GDPR, the data subject shall have the right to obtain information and access to personal data. Depending if the personal data has been or not obtained from the data subject, the legal provisions are different (Article 13 of the GDPR

[3] Available online at https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/en/TXT/?uri=CELEX%3A31995L0046.

[4] Available online at https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=celex%3A32016R0679.

[5] For more information on different types of EU legislation, please see Augustin Fuerea, Dreptul Uniunii Europene, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p. 45 and following; Mihaela Augustina Dumitrascu, Roxana Mariana Popescu, Dreptul Uniunii Europene, Sinteze si aplicatii. Editia a II-a, revazuta si adaugita, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, p. 120 and following; Laura-Cristiana Spataru-Negura, Dreptul Uniunii Europene – o noua tipologie juridica, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p. 92 and following.

[6] Please see Article 12 paragraph (1) of the GDPR.

[7] Idem.

[8] Please see Article 12 paragraph (2) of the GDPR.

[9] Please see Article 12 paragraph (5) of the GDPR.

when collected from the data subject and Article 14 when not been obtained from the data subject). In both cases, the controller shall provide the data subject with certain information (e.g. the identity and the contact details of the controller, the contact details of the data protection officer, the purposes of the processing for which the personal data are intended as well as the legal basis for the processing, the recipients or categories of recipients of the personal data, the period for which the personal data will be stored, the existence of the right to request from the controller access to and rectification or erasure of personal data or restriction of processing concerning the data subject or to object to processing as well as the right to data portability, the right to lodge a complaint with a supervisory authority), except for the case when the data subject already had the information [Article 13 paragraph (4) and Article 14 paragraph (5) letter a) of the GDPR].

According to Article 15 of the GDPR, the data subject is entitled to obtain from the controller "confirmation as to whether or not personal data concerning him or her are being processed, and, where that is the case, access to the personal data" and certain information.

Section 3 of Chapter 3 of the GDPR regulates the rectification and erasure rights of the data subject. In relation to the right of rectification, the position taken through the GDPR is mostly the same as in the Data Protection Directive.

It is normal that in case of errors of personal data regarding a data subject, he or she must be entitled to obtain from the controller without undue delay the rectification of inaccurate personal data concerning him or her. Even in case of incomplete personal data, the data subject shall have the right to have complete the respective information, including by means of providing a supplementary statement.

In certain cases (e.g. the personal data are no longer necessary in relation to the purposes for which they were collected or otherwise processed, the data subject withdraws consent on which the processing is based and where there is no other legal ground for the processing, the personal data have been unlawfully processed), the data subject shall be entitled to obtain from the controller the erasure of personal data concerning him or her, without undue delay. Therefore, the controller shall have the obligation to erase the respective personal data without undue delay. We consider that the GDPR created a broader right to erasure than the Data Protection Directive, therefore the undertakings shall face a broader spectrum of erasure requests than during the Data Protection Directive.

There are certain exceptions to this right (e.g. if the processing is necessary for exercising the right of freedom of expression and information, for reasons of public interest in the area of public health, for the establishment, exercise or defence of legal claims)[10].

Under Article 18 of the GDPR, the data subject shall be entitled to obtain from the controller restriction of processing in certain situations (e.g. the data subject contests the accuracy of the personal data enabling the controller to verify the accuracy of the personal data, the processing is unlawful and the data subject opposes the erasure of the personal data and requests the restriction of their use instead, the controller no longer needs the personal data for the purposes of the processing, but they are required by the data subject for the establishment, exercise or defence of legal claims).

In case of rectification or erasure of personal data or restriction of processing, the controller shall be held to send a notification "to each recipient to whom the personal data have been disclosed, unless this proves impossible or involves disproportionate effort. The controller shall inform the data subject about those recipients if the data subject requests it"[11].

The data subjects have also a new right under the GDPR - the right to data portability. This means that individuals are allowed to obtain and reuse their personal data for their own purposes across different services. This right allows them to copy or transfer personal data easily from one IT environment to another, in a safe and secure way, without hindrance to usability. For certain undertakings, this new right creates a significant additional burden, requiring substantial investment in new systems and processes, while for other undertakings creates a significant opportunity to attract customers from the competitors.

In case the data subjects are not satisfied because of the data processing, they have the right to object, at any time, to processing of personal data concerning them[12]. Controllers are obliged under the GDPR to provide additional information to data subjects regarding this right, and we consider that this will require revisions to standard data protection policies and privacy notices.

The GDPR preserves the position taken through the Data Protection Directive (with only minor amendments) regarding the right to not be evaluated based on automated processing. According to Article 22 of the GDPR, the "data subject shall have the right not to be subject to a decision based solely on automated processing, including profiling, which produces legal effects concerning him or her or similarly significantly affects him or her". However, Article 22 paragraph (2) letter c) of the GDPR clarifies that the explicit consent of the data subject is a valid basis for evaluation based on automated profiling.

The rights enshrined in Chapter 3 of the GDPR can be subject of certain restrictions imposed by the EU or the Member States legislation, if "such a restriction respects the essence of the fundamental rights and freedoms and is a necessary and proportionate measure in a democratic society to safeguard:

a) national security;

[10] Please see Article 17 paragraph (3) of the GDPR.
[11] Please see Article 19 of the GDPR.
[12] Please see Article 21 of the GDPR.

b) defence;
c) public security;
d) the prevention, investigation, detection or prosecution of criminal offences or the execution of criminal penalties, including the safeguarding against and the prevention of threats to public security;
e) other important objectives of general public interest of the Union or of a Member State, in particular an important economic or financial interest of the Union or of a Member State, including monetary, budgetary and taxation a matters, public health and social security;
f) the protection of judicial independence and judicial proceedings;
g) the prevention, investigation, detection and prosecution of breaches of ethics for regulated professions;
h) a monitoring, inspection or regulatory function connected, even occasionally, to the exercise of official authority in the cases referred to in points (a) to (e) and (g);
i) the protection of the data subject or the rights and freedoms of others;
j) the enforcement of civil law claims"[13].

In the next section we aim to give several examples to frame certain situations that come under the GDPR, in order to see concretely how data protection influences our lives.

2. The Impact of the GDPR on Data Subjects, Data Controllers and Data Processors. Remedies and Sanctions

2.1. Analyzing the Impact of the GDPR on Data Subjects

GDPR will completely change the interaction of data subjects with the undertakings that have access to their personal data. Through the GDPR's right to information not only will they become more aware on what personal data is, but also on how granulated and microscopic data - when correlated - can lead to big data analysis.

The information mechanisms developed by the national and European data protection authorities will play a major role in raising awareness regarding the data subject's rights under GDPR. The Article 29 Working Party has already developed a set of Guidelines regarding GDPR's main articles implementation – with respect to the data subject's right, so that GDPR compliance becomes more at ease.

GDPR compliance becomes thus, a blessing for data subjects, while for online platforms, marketers, banking and insurance institutions it becomes a real challenge.

Online platforms and mobile applications (such as LinkedIn, Facebook, Google) must adapt their policies regarding the usage and sharing of personal data, so that they become compliant with the GDPR. The mechanisms through which online platforms inform their users regarding the collection, storage, sharing and usage of their data must be changed so that the opt in to different services will no longer be automated or preselected, and will become, starting with 25 May 2018, an aware, fully responsible given consent. Thus, we will no longer witness automatical subscription to email marketing, automatic sharing of data between platforms or cross platform integrations without our given consent. We are underlining the importance of awareness related to GDPR's definition of consent, as consent can no longer be subject to interpretation – when giving consent the user must be informed on the following information: the type of data that the platform collects, how the data is being used, with whom it is shared, where it will be transferred, and, most importantly, for how long it will be retained. In their quest for GDPR compliance, platforms rush into reconstructing their pages so that the user is properly informed.

One of the largest online banking platforms – PayPal - just revealed a list of partners to which the platform might share your personal data with: a list of "just" 690 comercial partners (banks, marketers, call centers) and authorities (e.g. international agencies, fiscal entities) to whom PayPal might reveal some of your most important data: e.g. full name, banking account, business details, contact details, transactions details. Prior to 1 January 2018, the webpage did not contain any of the above-mentioned information and none of its users really knew to whom PayPal revealed the information to[14].

Besides being informed on what data will be processed and in what way, from the very moment when creating a user account on an online platform, starting with 25 May 2018, the data subjects will be able to ask data controllers access to what personal data they hold on them. We should see to what extent large social platforms (e.g. Facebook) will also give access on the data they historically collected before the 25 May 2018. It would be logic for the data subject to have access both to present and hystorical data, as long as the platform continues to use hystoric data.

The most recent privacy case related to Facebook dates back to February 2018, when a Belgian court threatened to fine the social giant with 250,000 euro a day or up to 100,000,000 EUR if Facebook continues to track people on third party websites and does not delete all data on Belgium citizens holding an account on the platform or not[15]. Just a short Google search using the following keywords "Facebook fined privacy", will lead to no less than 8 million results.

[13] Article 23 paragraph (1) of the GDPR.
[14] List available online at https://www.paypal.com/ie/webapps/mpp/ua/third-parties-list.
[15] Available online at https://www.reuters.com/article/us-facebook-belgium/facebook-loses-belgian-privacy-case-faces-fine-of-up-to-125-million-idUSKCN1G01LG.

In 2017, a Spanish court fined Facebook with 1,200,000 EUR after the national data protection agency proved that Facebook collected and used utilized personal data for advertising purposes[16]. The platform had been collecting data on people's sex orientation and religious beliefs both from the Facebook platform and third-party platforms, without consent.

This was one of the first times when multiple data protection agencies in Europe cooperated on an investigation against a large player on the online market. The Spanish data protection agency cooperated with the other agencies from Belgium, France, Hamburg and the Netherlands, and succeeded in proving that Facebook did not inform its users, or third party websites's users, that they were collecting data and to what extent they were using it.

The findings were surprising: user data was being collected with the help of third party cookies[17] placed on Facebook pages or third-party websites. The cookies were collecting data on the user behaviour on the internet pages on which Facebook had placed its cookies (through the Like button). Moreover, it further processed the special character collected data - such as religious and sexual orientation - and profiled users, so they could be targeted with marketing campaigns. At no time the users could perceive that their data was being collected, nor did they know how the social giant was going to use it – the purpose and the extent to which Facebook or its partners will use it. What seems even more tragic is that people who never intended to use a social platform such as Facebook had their personal data collected and used simply by browsing websites.

Meanwhile there are constant debates on how Facebook surprises us each time we navigate. Imagine that behind every surprise you get from Facebook there is huge amount of data the platform gathers about you. We should debate few examples here: Facebook knows when you became friends with someone and congratulates you on that, it knows when you were born so it can say happy birthday – and it shares that information with friends and even friends of friends – maybe even with its commercial friends?!

However, while most of us are aware and agree to the above, we may not agree with Facebook keeping information of a picture we took with our phone (the metadata of the picture - timestamp or location, type of camera/phone), it may store our IP address and even smarphone unique identifier, if you are using Facebook on a dayly basis the platform even knows when you wake up and you go to sleep, all based on your usage behaviour[18]. All this information mixed with artificial intelligence could lead to numerous abuse cases.

Starting with 25 May 2018, with GDPR compliance in place, people will no longer be subject to such condemnable practices, as cookies policies will no longer be tacitly accepted – the active consent becoming a must. Moreover, special data can no longer be processed without explicit consent, and some countries have even suggested banning the usage of special data.

GDPR enforces both data subjects and data protection agencies. Data protection agencies are now able to emit sanctions and fines on their own, which until now, in certain countries, was only possible with the help of the courts of law.

One of the most important missions of GDPR was to protect children data subjects and their personal data. Starting this year children data can no longer be processed without the explicit consent of an adult.

In 2016, the largest top toy companies in the United States were fined for using tracking technologies on popular children websites: Viacom had to pay 500,000 USD, Mattel 250,000 USD, JumpStart 85,000 USD[19].

A more proeminent case of 2017 just crushed parent's trust in new generation toys. Parents in Germany were advised to destroy a doll that could spy their children[20]. The name of the spying doll was Cayla and it could be accessed through the internet with the help of a voice recognition software. Moreover, the doll could be controlled with the help of an application. The Bluetooth connection to the doll proved to be so unsecure that any hacker within 15 meters could listen to what happened near the doll and directly speak to the child playing with it. The case raised a huge debate on smart toys and tracking devices related to children usage.

In 2018 some of the European countries banned the usage of smart watches by children. In Germany the above-mentioned case ended with a cooperation between the national data protection and consumer protection agencies.

Artificial intelligence related to toys connected to the internet, will be raising huge problems in the future. Imagine the power of a toy who learns how to speak while interacting with children around the world. GDPR comes just in time to assure that children are protected from abuse.

As for Romania, in May 2016, the Romanian Fiscal Authority published a list of all citizens having outstanding tax payments at that time, also entitled "the [16] Available online at http://www.agpd.es/portalwebAGPD/revista_prensa/revista_prensa/2017/notas_prensa/news/2017_09_11-iden-idphp.php.

[17] According to the Tech Terms Computer Dictionary, a "cookie" is a small amount of data generated by a website and saved by your web browser. Its purpose is to remember information about you, similar to a preference file created by a software application. Please see https://techterms.com/definition/cookie).

[18] Please see https://9to5mac.com/2018/03/12/how-to-download-your-facebook-data/amp/.

[19] Please see http://www.dailymail.co.uk/sciencetech/article-3787859/NY-settles-4-companies-stop-tracking-children-online.html.

[20] Please see http://www.bbc.com/news/world-europe-39002142.

shaming list"[21]. It is very interesting that certain payables were contested in the Romanian courts of law, therefore they were very likely to be amended or even cancelled. In this respect, the Romanian data protection authority applied a fine on the Fiscal Authority based on fine capping under current Data Protection Law, amounting to 16,000 RON (approximately 3,500 EUR).

2.2. Analyzing the Impact of GDPR on Data Controllers and Processors

GDPR poses huge amount of pressure on data controllers and processors. It raises a lot of issues that were inexistent until now and both controllers and processors are prone to huge financial efforts in becoming compliant to GDPR.

Establishing internal procedures, applying them and following their implementation presupposes a considerable effort, especially for non-EU entities that process European citizens' personal data.

PwC Canada – through the voice of its privacy director, Mr. Constantine Karbaliotis – conceived a "nightmare letter" that comprised the requests of a data subject after the 25 May 2018[22]. The letter gives a striking image on all the possible requests of an informed data subject under the GDPR, such as:

- access to personal data pursuant to Article 15 of the GDPR;
- 30 days deadline to response – according to Article 12 of the GDPR;
- access to information regarding the collected type of data, data storage;
- request of a copy of the data in readable format;
- access to a list of third party to whom data is revealed to;
- details on the legal grounds for each type of data processing activities and data transfers;
- details regarding the retention period;
- if data from third party sources is being also processed;
- information on automated decision making or profiling – Article 22 of the GDPR;
- if a data breach has ever taken place;
- information on security measures of protecting data (e.g. encryption, minimization, anonymization).

The real challenges of the implementation under the GDPR are related to the following rights of the data subjects: access to a copy of the data, data portability, data erasure – the right to be forgotten.

For most undertakings, the right of the data subject to request a readable copy of all the data that they store on the data subject will be a challenge. Data could be stored in different platforms: CRMs excel files on different employees' computers, emails containing email signatures or archives of the emails, online cloud platforms, backups of individual computers or servers in the cloud or even physical archives stored in the other part of the world. If the previous internal procedures of the companies have not included an inventory of the personal data or policies on data storage, retention and circulation, it will be a real challenge to respect the rights to access, portability or erasure.

The right to data portability raises real problems in relation to competition laws and undertakings will be challenged to respect the data subject's right to transfer data to a competitor. The Article 29 Working Party revised its guidelines on the right to data portability on 5 April 2017, giving more light on the elements of data portability, when data portability applies, how general rules governing the exercise of data subjects' rights apply to data portability and how data must be provided in case of portability[23].

However, national competition laws are often not aligned to the GDPR so undertakings might get cought in the middle. In this view, national authorities are also in a race to become GDPR compliant. Starting with human resources related laws and ending with public authorities' policies, the GDPR is being implemented at national levels.

On 14 March 2018, the Romanian Senate published on its website a bill of law in application to the GDPR[24]. According to this bill, the Romanian law shall be more restrictive than the GDPR in certain aspects (i.e. Article 3 prohibits the processing of biometric or genetic data other than by public authorities). This bill intends to bring clearance to the processing of the unique identification number under Article 4 and human resources data processing under Article 5. With regards to the "the shaming list" published by the Romanian Fiscal Authority in 2016 mentioned above and to the fine applied in the respective case, please note that this bill of law proposes that fines applicable to public authorities will be no greater than 200,000 RON (approximately 43,000 EUR). We shall follow interestedly the legislative process in order to find out the final version of this piece of legislation.

2.3. Remedies and Sanctions

Rights under data protection law can be exercised by the data subject affected or by a "not-for-profit body, organisation or association which has been properly constituted in accordance with the law of a Member State, has statutory objectives which are in the public interest, and is active in the field of the protection of data subjects' rights and freedoms"[25]. The GDPR clarifies the requirements regarding claims brought by [21] Please see https://economie.hotnews.ro/stiri-finante-21000512-fiscul-publicat-lista-persoanelor-fizice-datorii-peste-1-500-lei-peste-187-230-romani-restante-fiscale-care-insumeaza-3-4-miliarde-lei.htm.

[22] Please see https://www.linkedin.com/pulse/nightmare-letter-subject-access-request-under-gdpr-karbaliotis/.
[23] Please see https://iapp.org/media/pdf/resource_center/WP29-2017-04-data-portability-guidance.pdf.
[24] Please see https://www.senat.ro/legis/lista.aspx.
[25] Please see Article 80 of the GDPR.

third parties on behalf of data subjects. We also consider that these associations can seek judicial remedies and compensation from controllers and processors, on behalf of multiple data subjects (in collective claims that are similar to class action litigation). It is obvious that in case of minors, they shall be represented by their parents or guardians.

Chapter VIII of the GDPR governs the legal problem of remedies, liability and penalties in case of breach of this regulation. From the analysis of the remedies and sanctions chapter, it appears that the GDPR takes a multi-layered approach for breach of its provisions. Although it sets out the high-level principles and maximum administrative fine amounts, the regulation leaves some latitude to the EU Member States as to how these remedies and sanctions will operate in practice.

According to Article 77 of GDPR, if a data subject considers that the processing of personal data relating to him or her infringes the GDPR, then he or she has the right to lodge a complaint with a supervisory authority, without prejudicing any other administrative or judicial remedy under the GDPR. This complaint can be lodged either where the data controller or data processor has its establishment or in the place of habitual residence of the complainant data subject. The respective supervisory authority shall have to inform the data subject on the progress and the outcome of the complaint, mentioning the possibility of a judicial remedy. We underline that under the "One-Stop-Shop" provided by the GDPR, the supervisory authority to which the complaint is addressed will not necessarily be the authority that is responsible for regulating the relevant controller.

As for the effective judicial remedy against a supervisory authority governed by Article 78 of the GDPR, it is worth mentioning that every natural and legal person shall have the right to bring such a claim if it concerns them[26]. This right shall be exercised where the competent supervisory authority:

a) does not handle a complaint;
b) does not inform the data subject within three months on the progress or outcome of the complaint lodged pursuant to Article 77 mentioned above. These proceedings shall be brought before the courts of the Member State where the supervisory authority is established. If these proceedings were preceded by an opinion or decision of the Board in the consistency mechanism, then the supervisory authority is bound to forward it to the court, the GDPR not stressing a sanction if this obligation is not respected.

Additionally, according to Article 79 of the GDPR, the data subject has the right to bring proceedings against a controller or a processor, before the courts of the Member State where that controller or processor is established, or where the data subjects has his or her habitual residence, "unless the controller or processor is a public authority of a Member State acting in the exercise of its public powers"[27].

We consider that the GDPR provides greater clarity and legal certainty regarding the claims that can be brought by the data subjects than it was regulated through the Data Protection Directive.

Because of the possibility of the data subject to bring proceedings in different Member States (raising the problem that a controller or processor may be subject to legal proceedings in unfamiliar jurisdictions), the GDPR expressly regulates in Article 81 the suspension of proceedings: any competent court other than the first seized one may suspend its proceedings. We emphasize that the claims could be delayed if a national court decides to suspend proceedings pending the outcome of the case in front of the first seized court of law (in another Member State), being also possible that the outcome of the case in the second jurisdiction be influenced by the decision taken in the first seized court of law.

Every data subject who has suffered material or non-material damage, as a result of an infringement of the GDPR, shall be entitled to receive compensation from the controller or processor for the damage suffered. Data controllers and data processors can escape liability if they prove they are not in any way responsible for the event giving rise to the damage invoked by the data subject. Article 82 paragraph (5) of the GDPR expressly provides a "joint and several" liability, meaning that where a controller or processor has paid full compensation for the damage suffered by the data subject, that controller or processor shall be entitled to claim back from the other controllers or processors involved in the same processing that part of the compensation corresponding to their part of responsibility for the damage. This type of clause is needed for ensuring effective compensation of the data subject.

Unlike the Data Protection Directive which exempted data controllers from liability for harm arising in cases of force majeure, the GDPR contains no such exemption, meaning that the data controllers may bear the risk in force majeure cases.

Even though the concept of administrative fines for breaches of EU data protection law did not change a lot under the GDPR, there are significant changes to both the amount of fines and the factors relevant to determining those fines.

The GDPR also provides that the supervisory authorities are entitled to establish the imposition of administrative fines, on a case by case analysis. Article 83 of the GDPR establishes the criteria for deciding whether to impose an administrative fine and deciding on the amount of the administrative fine in each individual case.

[26] Since the party against which are brought proceedings is a public authority, then the specificities of the administrative review shall be applicable. In this respect, please see Marta-Claudia Cliza, Drept administrativ. Partea a II-a, Editura Pro Universitaria, Bucuresti, 2011, p. 78 and following; Elena Emilia Stefan, Drept administrativ. Partea a II-a, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucuresti, 2013, p. 52 and following.

[27] Please see Article 79 paragraph (2) of the GDPR.

Although the GDPR establishes several amounts for the administrative fines, it is expressly mentioned that if "a controller or processor intentionally or negligently, for the same or linked processing operations, infringes several provisions of this Regulation, the total amount of the administrative fine shall not exceed the amount specified for the gravest infringement"[28].

The GDPR fundamentally changes the potential financial consequences of breaching EU data protection law, the level of the potential sanction depending on the breach and ranging from administrative fines of:

1. up to 10,000,000 EUR, or in the case of an undertaking, up to 2% of the total worldwide annual turnover of the preceding financial year, whichever is higher[29] (for breach of principles such as "by design and by default", non-compliance with the processing related obligations, or failure to appoint a Data Protection Officer). The relevant articles in this respect are:

a) Article 8 (Conditions applicable to a child's consent in relation to information society services);
b) Article 11 (Processing which does not require identification);
c) Article 25 (Data protection by design and by default);
d) Article 26 (Joint controllers);
e) Article 27 (Representatives of controllers or processors not established in the Union);
f) Article 28 (Processor);
g) Article 29 (Processing under the authority of the controller or processor);
h) Article 30 (Records of processing activities);
i) Article 31 (Cooperation with the supervisory authority);
j) Article 32 (Security of processing);
k) Article 33 (Notification of a personal data breach to the supervisory authority);
l) Article 34 (Communication of a personal data breach to the data subject);
m) Article 35 (Data protection impact assessment);
n) Article 36 (Prior consultation);
o) Article 37 (Designation of the data protection officer);
p) Article 38 (Position of the data protection officer);
q) Article 39 (Tasks of the data protection officer);
r) Article 42 (Certification);
s) Article 43 (Certification bodies);

2. up to 20,000,000 EUR, or in the case of an undertaking, up to 4 % of the total worldwide annual turnover of the preceding financial year, whichever is higher[30] (for breaches of the principles relating to processing or of the lawful processing requirements, and for breach of data subject rights). The relevant articles in this respect are:

a) Article 5 (Principles relating to processing of personal data);
b) Article 6 (Lawfulness of processing);
c) Article 7 (Conditions for consent);
d) Article 9 (Processing of special categories of personal data);
e) Article 12 (Transparent information, communication and modalities for the exercise of the rights of the data subject);
f) Article 13 (Information to be provided where personal data are collected from the data subject);
g) Article 14 (Information to be provided where personal data have not been collected from the data subject);
h) Article 15 (Right of access by the data subject);
i) Article 16 (Right to rectification);
j) Article 17 (Right to erasure);
k) Article 18 (Right to restriction of processing);
l) Article 19 (Notification obligation regarding rectification or erasure of personal data or restriction of processing);
m) Article 20 (Right to data portability);
n) Article 21 (Right to object);
o) Article 22 (Automated individual decision making, including profiling);
p) Articles 44 - 49 (Transfers of personal data to third countries or international organisations);
q) Infringements of obligations under Member State law adopted under Chapter IX (Provisions relating to specific processing situations);
r) Non-compliance with access in violation of Articles 58 paragraph (1) and of orders under Article 58 paragraph (2) (powers of the supervisory authorities).

We underline that the administrative sanction regime will require a case by case assessment of the circumstances of each individual infringement, therefore it does not impose liability on a strict liability basis. We consider that the factors that should be taken into account should be the nature, gravity and duration of each infringement, the form of guilt (intention or negligence), the damage mitigation steps already implemented, any technical and organisational measures already implemented, and the manner in which the supervisory authority became aware of the issue.

A Member State is entitled to lay down the rules on whether and to what extent administrative fines may be imposed on public authorities and bodies established in that Member State.

But what happens in the legal systems which do not provide for administrative fines (i.e. Denmark, Estonia)? The GDPR expressly regulates that in such Member States, the fine shall "be initiated by the competent supervisory authority and imposed by

[28] Please see Article 83 paragraph (3) of the GDPR.
[29] Please see Article 83 paragraph (4) of the GDPR.
[30] Please see Article 83 paragraphs (5) and (6) of the GDPR.

competent national courts, while ensuring that those legal remedies are effective and have an equivalent effect to the administrative fines imposed by supervisory authorities. In any event, the fines imposed shall be effective, proportionate and dissuasive"[31].

Member States may lay down the rules on other effective, proportionate and dissuasive penalties applicable to infringements of this Regulation in particular for infringements which are not subject to administrative fines and shall take all measures to ensure that they are implemented in the national legal system – as a third level of 'penalties'. Taking into consideration certain recitals of the GDPR, these effective, proportionate and dissuasive penalties to be established by the Member States can be interpreted as criminal sanctions for certain violations. We consider that the possible introduction of criminal sanctions for unlawful processing of personal data presents a significant risk for undertakings, depending on how the Member States interpret and apply this power.

For transparency, the Member States are obliged to notify to the European Commission the legal provisions which they adopt by 25 May 2018 and, without delay, any subsequent amendment law or amendment affecting them.

3. Concluding Remarks

The aim of this study is to raise awareness and improve knowledge of data protection rules established by the GDPR. It is recommended for legal professionals and non-specialist legal professionals, and other persons working in the field of data protection.

The data protection right developed out of the right to respect for private life, being related to human beings. Natural persons are, therefore, the primary beneficiaries of data protection - personal data covers information pertaining to private life or to professional or public life of a person. Data also relate to persons if the content of the information indirectly reveals data about a person.

With the application of the GDPR from May 2018, its rules will become legally binding, together with the right to protection of personal data which becomes a separate fundamental right. Having in view the new technologies and the digital revolution, GDPR will satisfy the growing need for the robust protection of personal data.

The new data protection rules shall be applied in Member States by the national courts and by the national data protection authorities (the latter being part of the public administration system[32]), which shall be liable for obeying the GDPR[33].

The new maximum fines of the greater of 20,000,000 EUR or four percent of an undertaking's worldwide turnover are devilish and will manage to scare every general manager perception in order to comply with the GDPR.

In any case, for all the actors involved in data protection, the final countdown is near!

References

- Augustin Fuerea, Dreptul Uniunii Europene, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016
- Marta-Claudia Cliza, Drept administrativ. Partea a II-a, Editura Pro Universitaria, Bucuresti, 2011
- Mihaela Augustina Dumitrascu, Roxana Mariana Popescu, Dreptul Uniunii Europene, Sinteze si aplicatii. Editia a II-a, revazuta si adaugita, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015
- Nicolae Popa, Elena Anghel, Cornelia Ene-Dinu, Laura-Cristiana Spataru-Negura, Teoria generala a dreptului. Caiet de seminar, third edition, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017
- Roxana-Mariana Popescu, ECJ Case-law on the Concept of "Public Administration" Used in Article 45 Paragraph (4) TFEU, CKS Ebook, "Nicolae Titulescu" University Publishing House, 2017
- Laura-Cristiana Spataru-Negura, Dreptul Uniunii Europene – o noua tipologie juridica, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016
- Elena Emilia Stefan, Drept administrativ. Partea a II-a, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucuresti, 2013
- Elena Emilia Ștefan, Răspunderea juridică. Privire specială asupra răspunderii în dreptul administrativ, ProUniversitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013
- European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights, Handbook on European data protection law, Council of Europe, 2014, available at https://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/Handbook_data_protection_ENG.pdf
- Matheson, GDPR in Context. Remedies and Sanctions, available at http://www.matheson.com/images/uploads/documents/GDPR_in_Context_-_Remedies_and_Sanctions.pdf
- White & Case, GDPR Handbook: Unlocking the EU General Data Protection Regulation. A practical handbook on the EU's new data protection law, September 2017, available at https://www.whitecase.com/publications/article/gdpr-handbook-unlocking-eu-general-data-protection-regulation
- www.9to5mac.com
- www.agpd.es
- www.bbc.com

[31] Please see Article 83 paragraph (9) of the GDPR.

[32] For the European Union public administration concept, please also see Roxana-Mariana Popescu, ECJ Case-law on the Concept of "Public Administration" Used in Article 45 Paragraph (4) TFEU, CKS Ebook, "Nicolae Titulescu" University Publishing House, 2017, p. 529.

[33] It is widely acknowledged that nobody can be exempted from liability for the offenses committed in the exercise of public function. For more information, please see Elena Emilia Ștefan, Răspunderea juridică. Privire specială asupra răspunderii în dreptul administrativ, ProUniversitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013, p. 317.

- www.dailymail.co.uk
- www.eur-lex.europa.eu
- www.hotnews.ro
- www.iapp.org
- www.linkedin.com
- www.paypal.com
- www.reuters.com
- www.senat.ro
- www.techterms.com
- www.un.org

THE CONCEPT OF UNDERTAKING IN THE EUROPEAN UNION COMPETITION LAW

Alexandra STĂNCIULESCU*

Abstract

One of the most important concepts that the European Union Competition Law uses is the undertaking. In order to correctly apply the rules under this domain, it is necessary to fully understand when an entity is or isn`t an undertaking under competition law. Therefore, the main purpose of the following paper is to facilitate the understanding of the concept of undertakings so as to delimit the area of competition law from others. In the following, we will identify the alternative definitions offered in time by the Court of Justice of the European Union in this matter, but also by doctrine and we will have a short glance over the national courts of the member states' practice. Our analyze will take into consideration also those cases which remain under discussion, such as, but not just that, when can a part of an undertaking that is a subject of a transaction be considered a merger under the European Commission Merger Regulation or how can a natural person represent an undertaking under the European Union competition law. In conclusion, undertakings, parts of undertakings or associations of undertakings, mainly in the light of EU competition law, are the concepts we will be dealing with in the following paper.

Keywords: Undertaking, European Union Competition Law, merger, European Commission, economic activity.

Introduction

The following paper covers a very important subject to the competition law in general and to the European Union competition law in particular. The matter in discussion regards the concept of an undertaking under a specific area of law. The main concept used in the rules and regulations for EU competition is "undertaking", word that can be interpreted differently according to various domains of law. The paper focuses only on the competition law.

The study comprises several aspects when defining an undertaking under EU competition law, but also takes a short glimpse on national case-law or legislation. The subject was very largely debated in the past and practice still isn't uniformly applied among Member States, even difference between EU Law and national legislation has been observed when analyzing cases under the same provisions. Also, different approaches when interpreting the definitions of an undertaking can deliver different assessments on similar cases. For this reasons, we believe that the subject of the study is one of currently relevance and importance for both, practitioners and theoreticians.

The study will reveal the existing definitions among the EU legislation and that will represent the point where we will start our analysis. Our intention is to find elements of niche in this topic, surprising those facts that can make a difference when approaching the definition of an undertaking under competition law. The research will take into account the jurisprudence of the European Union Court of Justice, the several definitions given by the relevant legislation, short glimpse into the national court-law practice and/or legislation and other sources. We are aware of the lack of uniformity when analyzing this concept, but we care to underline a part of the main differences.

Regarding the already existing specialized literature on this matter, we consider our study as an additional incursion on the subject, but with an overall approach from several sources. Representing only a short introduction on what it could represent a complete research on the existing differences when defining an undertaking, we are confident on a future development of the subject and on its contribution to the ongoing assessments.

Paper Content

The Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union ("TFUE") lays down several rules that concern competition, rules that apply only to undertakings, as they are defined by law. So, Article 101 stipulates that "The following shall be prohibited as incompatible with the internal market: all agreements between undertakings, decisions by associations of undertakings and concerted practices which may affect trade between Member States and which have as their object or effect the prevention, restriction or distortion of competition within the internal market, and in particular those which:

a) directly or indirectly fix purchase or selling prices or any other trading conditions;
b) limit or control production, markets, technical development, or investment;
c) share markets or sources of supply;
d) apply dissimilar conditions to equivalent transactions with other trading parties, thereby placing them at a competitive disadvantage;
e) make the conclusion of contracts subject to acceptance by the other parties of supplementary

* Competition inspector at the Romanian Competition Council (e-mail:alexandrastanc@gmail.com) obligations which, by their nature or according to commercial usage, have no connection with the subject of such contracts.

2. Any agreements or decisions prohibited pursuant to this Article shall be automatically void.

3. The provisions of paragraph 1 may, however, be declared inapplicable in the case of:

− any agreement or category of agreements between undertakings,

− any decision or category of decisions by associations of undertakings,

− any concerted practice or category of concerted practices, which contributes to improving the production or distribution of goods or to promoting technical or economic progress, while allowing consumers a fair share of the resulting benefit, and which does not:

a) impose on the undertakings concerned restrictions which are not indispensable to the attainment of these objectives;
b) afford such undertakings the possibility of eliminating competition in respect of a substantial part of the products in question." The following Article 102 stipulates that "Any abuse by one or more undertakings of a dominant position within the internal market or in a substantial part of it shall be prohibited as incompatible with the internal market in so far as it may affect trade between Member States. Such abuse may, in particular, consist in:

- directly or indirectly imposing unfair purchase or selling prices or other unfair trading conditions;
- limiting production, markets or technical development to the prejudice of consumers;
- applying dissimilar conditions to equivalent transactions with other trading parties, thereby placing them at a competitive disadvantage;
- making the conclusion of contracts subject to acceptance by the other parties of supplementary obligations which, by their nature or according to commercial usage, have no connection with the subject of such contracts."

Furthermore, Council's Regulation (EC) No 139/2004 of 20 January 2004 on the control of concentrations between undertakings uses this concept to identify the entities that this normative act applies to. In this case, when defining a concentration, the regulation takes into consideration the following aspects: "1. A concentration shall be deemed to arise where a change of control on a lasting basis results from:

a) the merger of two or more previously independent undertakings or parts of undertakings, or
b) the acquisition, by one or more persons already controlling at least one undertaking, or by one or more undertakings, whether by purchase of securities or assets, by contract or by any other means, of direct or indirect control of the whole or parts of one or more other undertakings.

2. Control shall be constituted by rights, contracts or any other means which, either separately or in combination and having regard to the considerations of fact or law involved, confer the possibility of exercising decisive influence on an undertaking, in particular by:

a) ownership or the right to use all or part of the assets of an undertaking;
b) rights or contracts which confer decisive influence on the composition, voting or decisions of the organs of an undertaking.

3. Control is acquired by persons or undertakings which:

a) are holders of the rights or entitled to rights under the contracts concerned; or
b) while not being holders of such rights or entitled to rights under such contracts, have the power to exercise the rights deriving there from.

4. The creation of a joint venture performing on a lasting basis all the functions of an autonomous economic entity shall constitute a concentration within the meaning of paragraph 1(b)."

We have underlined a part of the previously text because we believe it is important to observe the carefully change of concepts. An undertaking or a part of an undertaking has to fulfill the main condition of being an autonomous economic activity. This subject can be approached also when referring to the transfer of assets in the context of an existing concentration.

The Commission's Consolidated Jurisdictional Notice under Council Regulation (EC) No 139/2004 on the control of concentrations between undertakings explains that a concentration only covers operations where a change of control in the undertakings concerned occurs on a lasting basis. In the light of this document, "the acquisition of control over assets can only be considered a concentration if those assets constitute the whole or a part of an undertaking, i.e. a business with a market presence, to which a market turnover can be clearly attributed." The European Commission adds that "the transfer of the client base of a business can fulfill these criteria if this is sufficient to transfer a business with a market turnover."

The subject of defining the concept of an undertaking has been much debated among theoreticians and practitioners of competition law, the notion having a relative characteristic. "The functional approach and the focus on activity than the form of an entity may result in an entity being considered an undertaking when it engages in some activities but not when it engages in others[1]". Here are some relevant cases that show how the European Commission decided in different situations, where an entity was considered an undertaking or not.

On 28 November 1989[2], the Commission received a complaint from the travel agency Pauwels

[1] "EC competition Law – an analytical guide to the leading cases", Ariel Ezrachi, Hart Pubishing, 2008, p.3
[2] http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/ALL/?uri=CELEX%3A31992D0521

Travel BVBA ("Pauwels Travel") which was related to the ticket distribution system applied during the International Federation of Football Associations ("FIFA") World Cup held in Italy in 1990. The main facts where that Pauwels Travel wanted to put together and sell in Belgium World Cup package tours comprising transport, accommodation and entrance tickets to the stadia in which the various matches were to be played, but it found that the ticket distribution system that had been decided on did not allow travel agencies to acquire stadium entrance tickets for the purpose of putting together package tours, any attempts of procuring from different channels, on that matter, resulting in a cease and desist action being brought before the Belgian national courts by the travel agency authorized by the World Cup organizers to sell package tours in Belgium. Two main contracts were signed by the local organizing committee (Federazione italiana gioco calico - FIGC), appointed by FIFA, on the one hand and, firstly, The Compagnia italiana turismo SpA ("CIT") and Italia Tour SpA ("Italia Tour") and, secondly, 90 Tour Italia, on the other hand, which mainly concluded that the organization of the event and the distribution of tickets to be managed through a jointly set up company, respectively 90 Tour Italy, who had the exclusive grant of the worldwide distribution rights of tickets as part of package tours. This exclusivity arrangement prevented other travel agencies from offering combined package tours with tickets for the 1990 World Cup.

In its decision, the European Commission considered the compatibility of the exclusive distribution agreement with the Article 81 EC[3]. A preliminary question concerned the nature of the entities involved and whether they constituted an undertaking within the meaning of Article 81 EC.

The legal assessment of the concept of undertaking in this case started with the Court of Justice's case-law. In accordance with it, "any entity carrying on activities of an economic nature, regardless of its legal form, constitutes an undertaking within the meaning of Article 85 of the EEC Treaty[4] (see in particular Cases 36/74 of 12 December 1974, Walrave v. Union Cycliste Internationale (1) and C-41/90 of 23 April 1991, Hoefner v. Elser/Macrotron). An activity of an economic nature means any activity, whether or not profit-making, that involves economic trade (see Case 41/83 of 20 March 1985, Italy v. Commission (British Telecommunications)".

Regarding the commercial nature of the World Cup, the Court underlined that the World Cup is indisputably a major sporting event, which also includes activities of an economic nature, such as the sale of package tours comprising hotel accommodation, transport and sightseeing, the conclusion of contracts for advertising on panels within the grounds, the conclusion of television broadcasting contracts, the commercial exploitation of the FIFA emblems, the World Cup, the FIFA fair-play trophy and the World Cup mascot and others. FIFA, however, is a federation of sports associations and accordingly carries out sports activities, but also engages is activities of economic nature, such as - the conclusion of advertising contracts, the commercial exploitation of the World Cup emblems, and the conclusion of contracts relating to television broadcasting rights.

The FIGC is the national Italian football association, appointed by FIFA to organize the 1990 World Cup. The FIGC was accordingly responsible for the entire organization of the event in accordance with the provisions of the 1990 World Cup regulations and had in particular the task of ensuring that grounds were in order, press facilities provided, parking spaces laid out, etc. For the purpose of financing such expenditure, the FIGC had a share in the net profits of the competition and was able to exploit commercially in Italy the 1990 World Cup emblem, which it had itself created. Thus the FIGC also carried out economic activities.

The local organizing committee was a body set up jointly by FIFA and the FIGC for the purpose of carrying on all activities relating directly or indirectly to the technical and logistical organization of the World Cup. The local organizing committee's tasks included the establishment and implementation of the ticket distribution arrangements. The local organizing committee's revenue derived partly from television rights, advertising rights, the sale of tickets and the commercial exploitation in Italy of the World Cup emblem. The exclusive rights granted to 90 Tour Italia resulted in remuneration for the local organizing committee, in accordance with the provisions of Article 5 of the contract of 26 June 1987.

CIT was an Italian company engaged in travel agency activities. It was therefore an undertaking within the meaning of Article 85.

Italia Tour SpA was a company carrying on an activity similar to that of CIT and was thus also an undertaking within the meaning of Article 85.

90 Tour Italia SpA was a company established under Italian law by CIT and Italia Tour for the purpose of putting together and marketing package tours to the 1990 World Cup.

In this context, the Court decided that, the entities mentioned above, regardless of their legal form, had conducted activities of economic nature, meaning that they represented undertakings within the meaning of Article 85 of the EEC Treaty.

[3] The two fundamental European Competition Law provisions were Articles 85 and 86 of the Treaty of Rome, the treaty that founded the European Economic Community (EEC) that evolved into the European Union. The drafters of one amending treaty to the Treaty of Rome, the Treaty of Amsterdam, decided it was necessary to renumber the two Articles 81 and 82 from 85 and 86; the revised Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU) then renumbered the Articles 101 and 102.

[4] Currently article 101 from the Treaty on the functioning of European Union

Another case brought to the European Union`s Court of Justice referred to an action for annulment[5]. The plaintiff, respectively FENIN, which was an association of undertakings that marketed medical goods and equipment used in Spanish hospitals, submitted a complaint to the European Commission alleging an abuse of a dominant position, within the meaning of Article 82 EC, by various bodies and organizations responsible for the operation of the Spanish national health system (SNS). On 31 August 1999, the Commission definitively rejected the applicant's complaint on the dual ground that the bodies and organizations in question were not acting as undertakings when they participated in the management of the public health service. Consequently, the bodies managing the SNS were not acting as undertakings when they purchased medical goods and equipment from the members of the applicant association.

Again, the EU Court of Justice firstly approached this matter by enumerating some of the settled case-law, observing that "in Community competition law the concept of an undertaking covers any entity engaged in an economic activity, regardless of its legal status and the way in which it is financed (Höfner and Elser, Poucet and Pistre, Fédération française des sociétés d'assurances and Others, Case C-55/96 Job Centre [1997] ECR I-7119, Albany, Case T-61/89 Dansk Pelsdyravlerforening v Commission [1992] ECR II-1931 and Case T-513/93 Consiglio Nazionale degli Spdizionieri Doganali v Commission [2000] ECR II-1807)". On this matter, it is the activity consisting in offering goods and services on a given market that is the characteristic feature of an economic activity, not the business of purchasing, as such. The Court underlined that in accordance with the Commission's arguments, it would be incorrect, when determining the nature of a subsequent activity, to dissociate the activity of purchasing goods from the subsequent use to which they are put. "The nature of the purchasing activity must therefore be determined according to whether or not the subsequent use of the purchased goods amounts to an economic activity. Consequently, an organization which purchases goods — even in great quantity - not for the purpose of offering goods and services as part of an economic activity, but in order to use them in the context of a different activity, such as one of a purely social nature, does not act as an undertaking simply because it is a purchaser in a given market. Whilst an entity may wield very considerable economic power, even giving rise to a monopsony, it nevertheless remains the case that, if the activity for which that entity purchases goods is not an economic activity, it is not acting as an undertaking for the purposes of Community competition law and is therefore not subject to the prohibitions laid down in Articles 81(1) EC and 82 EC."

Regarding SNS, the Court qualified it as operating according to the principle of solidarity in that it is funded from social security contributions and other State funding and in that it provided services free of charge to its members on the basis of universal cover. In the light of the aspects mentioned above, the Court considered that the organizations in question do not act as undertakings when purchasing from the members of the applicant association the medical goods and equipment which they require in order to provide free services to SNS members.

The consequences of dual, public and private characteristics were not explored in this case, because FENIN brought up new facts, for the first time, in front of the Court. FENIN argued that SNS, on some occasions, provided private care in addition to State-sponsored healthcare and consequently, in those circumstances, it should be regarded as an undertaking. But, because no reference of this matter were made in the original complaint, the European Commission couldn't be accused of not examining facts which have not been brought to its notice by the complainant before rejecting a complaint on the ground that the practices complained of do not infringe Community competition rules or do not fall within the scope of the Community competition rules. Therefore, in its review of the legality of the decision contested in the present action, the Court also couldn't take the existence of those services into account and it was not necessary in this case for the Court to rule on their potential relevance to the question whether the purchasing operations of those organizations amount to an economic activity. So, in this case, the Court decided that the organizations in question do not act as undertakings under EU competition law, without taking into a consideration a possible relevant fact that could change its decision if it were brought to the European Commission in its original complaint.

A very interesting aspect, among member states' competition laws, regards the Competition Act currently into force in Slovakia. The term of "undertaking" is defined by this act and it comprises any entrepreneur according to the Commercial Code[6]. In addition, the term "undertaking", under the Competition Act, comprises any natural and/or legal person, their associations and associations of these associations, with respect to their activities and conduct that are, or may be, related to competition, regardless of whether or not these activities and conduct are aimed making profit. We can observe that these provisions are

[5] Case T-319/99: http://curia.europa.eu/juris/showPdf.jsf;jsessionid=9ea7d0f130de7b3f114105ed4cfb8780f728252721da.e34KaxiLc3eQc40LaxqMbN4Pb34Ke0?text=&docid=48089&pageIndex=0&doclang=en&mode=lst&dir=&occ=first&part=1&cid=415463

[6] "(i) any person registered in the Commercial register;
(ii) person which undertakes business based on the trade permission;
(iii) person which undertakes business based on other permission according to special legislation; or almost completely in line with the EU competition rules, with one important exception: the term of "undertaking", in this situation, covers only entities with legal personality. Thus, the Slovak Competition Act, when referring to an undertaking, it involves a person (natural or legal) but it does not cover a "group" of individual persons forming a single economic group.[7] This reasoning derives also from the Council's decision in GIS Cartel Case[8], in which it reached the conclusion that AMO[9] could not apply joint and several liability for the breach of competition rules of the companies belonging to the same economic group in the same way the European Commission did in the same case (Case COMP/F/38.899[10]). The Slovak Competition Act also applies to professional services provided, for example, by lawyers, pharmacists and architects and to the activities of these persons. This category of persons is considered entrepreneurs under the Slovak Commercial Code because they undertake businesses based on permission, according to special legislation. These persons are mainly organized in professional associations or chambers, therefor the case-law of the AMO[11] in the area of competition, as well as Slovak courts, is often related to the assessment of agreements restricting competition, concluded in the form of decisions of associations and, in such cases, the autonomous professional associations had to be treated as undertakings under the Slovak Competition Act. An example of this judgement comes after the Slovak Bar Association (SBA) started an administrative proceeding in order to dismiss the imposed penalty for a breach of an obligation to submit information to the AMO. SBA reasoned that was neither an entrepreneur according to the Slovak Commercial Code, nor any entity whose activities were connected to competition. The motives invoked refer to, on one hand, the fact that all advocates were grouped and listed in a register, which meant that these persons could not be treated as competitors since conditions of the provision of legal services were determined by the state in the public interest with the aim of safeguarding their quality and, on the other hand, that their remuneration for legal services was determined by the general legal regulation or by an agreement between the advocate and client, thus the economic competition influenced by price or advertisement was not present. The Council, after the Regional Court in Bratislava[12] rulling and also in accordance with the Judgement of the European Court of Justice[13] concluded that advocates were entrepreneurs pursuant to section 2(2) letter c) of the Commercial Code and that the SBA was, pursuant to the Act on Advocacy, an autonomous professional organization grouping all advocates and so it represented an association of undertakings according to section 3(2) of the Competition Act.
(iv) a natural person, sole agricultural producer registered in the evidence based on special legislation."

We found a similar case among the case-law of the Romanian High Court of Cassation and Justice - Decision no. 3415/30 October 2015. The main facts regard an appeal introduced by the Romanian Notary's Chamber ("RNC"), seeking to call off an unannounced inspection required by the Romanian Competition Council ("RCC"), arguing that the legal provisions invoked by the competition authority aren't applicable in this case. The RNC rejected the RCC interpretation regarding the assimilation of notary offices and chambers as undertakings, recalling art. 3 from Law no. 36/1995 that states the following: "The public notary is invested to fulfill a service of public interest and it has the statute of an autonomous public position". In addition, according to art. 27 from the Deontological Code of Public Notaries, "the work of a notary is exercised through competition conditions, on exclusive professional competence and probity criteria, recognized and unanimous accepted as principles of strengthening the prestige of the public notary institution". The appellant considered that this situation in particular represents the exception that Law no. 21/1996 regarding competition refers to in art. 2 (1) letter b), respectively that the competition law applies to acts and deeds which restrict, prevent or distort competition, except for situations when such measures are taken to enforce other laws or protect a major public interest. To support its idea, some of the EU Court of Justice case-law[14] was brought up, in which the court constantly separates the economic liberties associated to the internal market (i.e. the freedom of establishment, the freedom to provide services, the freedom of movement for workers, etc.) from their exceptions, regarding competition law. Another case was mentioned, one that refers to lawyers, where the EU Court of Justice stated that while an undertaking is subject to the competition law, according to the European treaties, the lawyer exercises its prerogatives of public power inside its responsibilities or an activity of general interest and these activities don't have an economic character, fact that hinder the applicability of competition rules. Another argument brought by the applicant says that nowhere in Europe, the public notary doesn't represent an activity on a market, but an institution of public services. This position helps with respecting the legality of transactions on some markets and this doesn't mean it should be confused with the markets themselves. Mainly, the RNC argues that a public general interest justifies the non-application of

[7] "Competition Law in the Slovak Republic", by Andrea Oršulová,David Raus, published by Kluwer Law International BV, the Netherlands, 2011, p. 48
[8] Decision of the Council No. 2009/KH/R/2/035, 14 august 2009
[9] Antimonopoly Office of the Slovak Republic
[10] http://ec.europa.eu/competition/antitrust/cases/dec_docs/38899/38899_1030_10.pdf
[11] http://www.antimon.gov.sk/antimonopoly-office-slovak-republic/
[12] No. IS 431/2005-43, 2 Oct. 2008
[13] C-309/99, 19 Feb. 2002
[14] Case C-415/93, C-94/04

competition rules, public notaries and their organization fall outside the scope of Article 101 TFUE and for these reasons the RCC shouldn't have the capacity to initiate an investigation and sanction the RNC. In its judgement, the High Court of Cassation and Justice ("HCCJ") argues the following:

- reaffirms the definition that Law no. 21/1996 regarding competition gives to the concept of "undertaking", that is "undertakings as described by this law represent any economic operator engaged in an activity of goods or services provision on a given market, regardless of its legal status and financing, as defined in the case law of the European Union", but, also, the fact that even though the public notary provides a service of public interest that does not exclude it from the scope of the competition rules;
- a part of the public notary's activity has a commercial/private character, which is provided in order to obtain profit, so at least this part falls under competition conditions, fact that gives it the status of an undertaking;
- for their services, consisting of documents/procedures completed by capitalizing their professional knowledge, the notary offices receive a price/fee;
- the fee represents income, which can vary from case to case, and the difference between the income and the amount spent on other costs represents profit, which is characteristic to an undertaking. Thus, the income realized by public notaries, in a determined period of time, is not preset, but varies according to the volume of work done, therefor there is an influence exerted by the offer of such services;
- the invoices/receipts given by a notarial office have V.A.T. included and that represents another reason to believe that it practices an economic activity.

Following all the arguments presented above, the HCCJ decided that the RCC has correctly considered the public notary office as an undertaking.

Another subject of interest for our paper is focused on the meaning of the transfer of a part of an undertaking. The Council Regulation (EC) no. 139/2004 of 20 January 2004 on the control of concentrations between undertaking ("the EC Merger Regulation") defines a concentration, among other situations, the change of control on a lasting basis that results from the acquisition, by one or more persons already controlling at least one undertaking, or by one or more undertakings, whether by purchase of securities or assets, by contract or by any other means, of direct or indirect control of the whole or parts of one or more other undertakings. When talking about the transfer of a part of an undertaking, we cannot forget that the Council's Directive 2001/23/EC of 12 March 2001 on the approximation of the laws of the Member States relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of undertakings or businesses ("Directive no. 2001/23/EC") refers to any transfer of an undertaking, business, or part of an undertaking or business to another employer as a result of a legal transfer or merger.

When do we consider the transfer of a business as a transfer of a part of an undertaking and is there any relation between the concept of "part of an undertaking" used in the EC Merger Regulation with the one used in the Directive no. 2001/23/EC? For example, as we mentioned in the beginning of the paper, the Commission's Consolidated Jurisdictional Notice under Council Regulation (EC) no. 139/2004 on the control of concentrations between undertakings says that "the acquisition of control over assets can only be considered a concentration if those assets constitute the whole or a part of an undertaking, i.e. a business with a market presence, to which a market turnover can be clearly attributed". The EU Court of Justice, in an early judgement (Case 24/85[15]), ruled that "a transfer of an undertaking, business or part of a business does not occur merely because its assets are disposed of" and that certain conditions need to be fulfilled in order to asses that the business was disposed of as an ongoing concern. The facts that the court took into consideration in order to determine whether those conditions were met, included the type of undertaking or business, whether or not the business's tangible assets, such as buildings and movable property, are transferred, the value of its intangible assets at the time of the transfer, whether or not the majority of its employees are taken over by the new employer, whether or not its customers are transferred and the degree of similarity between the activities carried on before and after the transfer and the period, if any, for which those activities were suspended. Even so, the court still underlined that "all those circumstances are merely single factors in the overall assessment which must be made and cannot therefore be considered in isolation." Furthermore, according to the Directive no. 2001/23/EC "there is a transfer within the meaning of this Directive where there is a transfer of an economic entity which retains its identity, meaning an organized grouping of resources which has the objective of pursuing an economic activity, whether or not that activity is central or ancillary". Also, the EU Court of Justice again indicates in Case C−458/12[16] that "According to settled case-law, in order to determine whether there is a 'transfer' of the undertaking within the meaning of Article 1(1) of Directive 2001/23, the decisive criterion is whether the entity in question keeps its identity after being taken over by the new employer" and "that transfer must relate to a stable economic entity whose activity is not limited to performing one specific works contract. Any organized grouping of persons and of assets enabling the exercise of an economic activity pursuing a specific objective, and which is sufficiently structured and autonomous, constitutes such an entity".

[15] Judgment of the Court (Fifth Chamber) of 18 March 1986. - Jozef Maria Antonius Spijkers v Gebroeders Benedik Abattoir CV et Alfred Benedik en Zonen BV. - Reference for a preliminary ruling: Hoge Raad - Netherlands. - Safeguarding of employees rights in the event of transfers of undertakings. - Case 24/85 - https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/ALL/?uri=CELEX:61985CJ0024

[16] Judgement of the Court (Ninth Chamber) from 6 March 2014 (*) (Request for a preliminary ruling – Social policy – Transfer of undertakings – Safeguarding of employees' rights – Directive 2001/23/EC – Transfer of employment relationships in the event of a legal transfer of part of a business that cannot be identified as a pre-existing autonomous economic entity) - http://curia.europa.eu/juris/document/document.jsf?text=&docid=148743&pageIndex=0&doclang=EN&mode=lst&dir=&occ=first&part=1&cid=530251

Conclusions

Summarizing the main outcomes of the present study, we can conclude the following:

- Even though an organization has no profit motive or functions without an economic purpose, that doesn't mean that it brings itself outside the concept of undertakings under EU competition law.
- Some cases can remain under discussions when possible relevant information was not taken into consideration at the relevant moment, because of a party's negligence in formulating a complaint or/and an action in front of the court.
- Even though the regulations are legal acts that apply automatically and uniformly to all EU countries as soon as they enter into force, without needing to be transposed into national law, becoming binding in their entirety on all EU countries, there may exist some countries, such as Slovakia (the example offered in the paper content which refers to the definition of undertakings), where the national law can differ from the EU competition rules.
- We can find ourselves dealing with an undertaking, even though an entity is entrusted with public power or provides services of general public interest. As long as this entity's activity or only a part of it is realizes a sort of profit, according to the applicable law, than that entity should be considered an undertaking under EU competition rules.
- When assessing a transfer of a part of an undertaking, several facts need to be taken into consideration in an overall matter, but the most important criteria is to evaluate the scope of the transfer, i.e. to see if the assets transferred or other parts of undertakings are able to maintain an ongoing business or an individual economic entity with a market presence.

We expect that study's impact will effect practitioners it their analyze, helping them to identify more easily when the object of a transfer represents an undertaking or a part of it under competition law and we believe that the study will also influence future articles/papers/documents elaborated by interested persons/entities, because of its synthetized approach and punctual references.

We consider this study only a beginning for a much more complex research of the existing differences between the use of the same concept and we suggest that a further research work should reach more into national court practices and those practices compared in relation with the EU jurisprudence and legislation in order to lead to new findings.

References

- Ariel Ezrachi , EC competition Law – an analytical guide to the leading cases, (Hart Pubishing, 2008)
- Andrea Oršulová,David Raus, Competition Law in the Slovak Republic, (Kluwer Law International BV, the Netherlands, 2011)
- Ioannis Kokkoris, Howard Shelanski, EU Merger Control. A legal and economic analysis, (Oxford Univeristy Press, 2014)
- Massimo Motta, Competition Policy. Theory and practice, (Cambridge University Press, 2004)
- http://heinonline.org/HOL/LandingPage?handle=hein.journals/ibl25&div=155&id=&page=
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/ALL/?uri=CELEX%3A31992D0521
- http://curia.europa.eu/juris/showPdf.jsf;jsessionid=9ea7d0f130de7b3f114105ed4cfb8780f728252721da.e34KaxiLc3eQc40LaxqMbN4Pb34Ke0?text=&docid=48089&pageIndex=0&doclang=en&mode=lst&dir=&occ=first&part=1&cid=415463
- http://ec.europa.eu/competition/antitrust/cases/dec_docs/38899/38899_1030_10.pdf
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/PDF/?uri=CELEX:12012E/TXT&from=RO
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=celex:32004R0139
- http://www.antimon.gov.sk/antimonopoly-office-slovak-republic/
- http://curia.europa.eu/juris/showPdf.jsf?text=&docid=46722&pageIndex=0&doclang=en&mode=lst&dir=&occ=first&part=1&cid=892387
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=CELEX%3A61993CJ0415
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=ecli:ECLI:EU:C:2006:758
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=CELEX%3A52008XC0416(08)
- https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/ALL/?uri=CELEX:61985CJ0024
- http://curia.europa.eu/juris/document/document.jsf?text=&docid=148743&pageIndex=0&doclang=EN&mode=lst&dir=&occ=first&part=1&cid=530251
- http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/PDF/?uri=CELEX:52008XC0416(08)&from=RO
- https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/PDF/?uri=CELEX:32001L0023&from=en

THE LEGISLATION OF THE ROMANIAN PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION IN TODAY'S EUROPEAN CONTEXT

Florin STOICA*

Abstract

In order to be able to adapt to the requirements of the current socio-economic and political context in which Romania is today, the public administration must strive for its efforts, perhaps more than ever, in the sense of its classic mission, namely the implementation of the law and providing quality public services. The connection to the European Central Public Administration obliges the public administration in Romania to keep up with the European trends in the field, and even contribute to the achievement of the Europe 2020 Strategy targets. Defective public administration legislation leads to a hindrance to a state's growth efforts. The modernization of the legislation, the modernization of the institutions in the field have the effects expected in the development of a state. If, since 1990, Romania has the excuse for the state in a "transition", a process that includes the state together with its institutions, the acceleration of the reform process can no longer be excusable due to the context. The integration of the Romanian state into the European space has come with a number of obligations but also rights, but in terms of obligations Romania is still outstanding. Political changes, frequent changes in parliamentary majority and ruling coalition have only increased the incapacity of the Romanian state to honor its obligations In line with European standards. But the common policy of the European community has not been blocked over time but has adapted to the challenges that international politics has provided, so Romania has to make major progress to assimilate the new challenges and honor its obligations.

Keywords: Public Services, Europe 2020 Strategy, Public Administration, Guvernoment, Legal framework, European Union, administrative capacity.

1. Introduction

A chapter often brought to the attention of the public, a distinct chapter in all governmental programs in recent years, the reform of public administration has never been a zero priority, although its implications on economic reform were well known. The changes have been slow and fragmented and have had no positive impact on this area.

In each government, the eyes were fixed on economic issues, and then the reforming of the field was attempted, the failure of these changes generated distortions in the economic reform. Worldwide in recent years a phenomenon, can be easily identified, namely globalization, which is also characterized by the intense development of social systems.

So, we are faced with new situations, national states face new challenges, meaning that institutions and administrative systems, and of course everything that is public administration, must prove flexibility in the face of these transformations. Thus, we deduce that within this new geopolitical context the administrative factor is the most defining one for the economic competitiveness of a country or economic region.

By understanding the transformations that the public administration has to suffer, we can conclude that interventions made under the unfinished reform, involve major changes not only at a local and central scale but also regarding public service.

By explaining the concept of reform we should also start from legislation and the provisions of agreements and treaties to which Romania is part. So, during this study, I will try to demonstrate the need to speed up the changes of legislation in the field of public administration. We will also go through the main changes proposed by the new legislation and examine their importance in the implementation of the reform.

Public administration reform is a normal change in the process of developing democracy and in a process of harmonization with the European framework. Thus, the degree of development of a democracy involves the establishment of relations between citizens and administration, the decentralisation of the transfer of power from local to central and the restoration of a solid partnership with the civil society.

Reiterating the above, in Romania, the changes in public administration are getting new dimensions, so that it is a must to keep up with the world trends, but also with the social and political and economic context that the European Union is facing today.

In understanding the concept of reform, we need to relate to all aspects of the public sector organization. Thus, we have on one side, how the coordination of activities in the public domain is authorised, the package of laws governing this matter and administrative capacity on the other side. Administrative capacity[1] requires an assessment of the functioning of the hierarchical structure of human resources in public services.

* PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: florin.stoik@gmail.com)

[1] For another details about administrative capacity, see Elena Emilia Ștefan, Drept administrativ. Partea a II-a. Curs universitar, ediția a 3-a revizuită, completată și actualizată, Universul juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2018, page 29.

In order to support the process of transformation of the public administration, it is necessary to take a package of measures to be taken within a defined period of time. Measures otherwise foreseen in the Public Administration Strategy.

2. Content

During the transitional period Romania passed through, the public administration underwent major transformations, both at central and at local level. Perhaps the biggest impact this domain has suffered as a result of joining the European Union in 2007, a process that resulted in the linking of public administration with European governmental mechanisms and alignment with the standards imposed by other European administrations[2]. Although notable progress is being made, we identify outstanding chapters, especially in terms of efficiency, effectiveness and image, which are nothing more than a reflection of a conservative organizational culture concentrated more on a formal administration. Thus, the lack of interest in the real impact of its outcomes on society and the acute shortage of partners, such as the business environment, academic enviroment, civil society and relevant social partners, in the decision-making process generate some degree of mistrust between citizens and officials and between civil servants and political actors.

Although Romania has been a member of the European Union for more than ten years and is currently in the second programming period in terms of structural funds allocation and has had several support tools to strengthen administrative capacity, still overdue to reducing bureaucracy, increasing the transparency and professionalisation of the administration, and making the spending of public funds more efficient.

For the current programming period 2014-2020, in the context of negotiations between Romanian authorities and European ones on the Partnership Agreement which is the basis of non-reimbursable grants, there is a growing tendency to be noted at both internal and Commission level of modernising the public administration and creating the necessary capacity to fulfill the role in Romania's socio-economic development. Thus, within the mentioned documents Romania had to fulfill an ex-ante conditionality regarding the public administration field, meaning the elaboration of a plan of measures in order to strengthen the administrative capacity.

The strategy for strengthening the capacity of the public administration has been elaborated in the mentioned context and is a provision included in the framework of the EU Regulation no. 1303/2013, as well as in the document entitled Position of the Commission's Services on the Development of the Partnership Agreement and Programs in Romania for the period 2014-2020.

The strategy contains three key elements, namely[3]:

- the need to remedy some structural weaknesses in the functioning of public administration;
- country-specific recommendations made by the European Commission for the years 2013 and 2014 on public administration;
- the need to ensure / prepare the public administration to meet the obligations assumed at European level in respect of a number of targets / targets set out in the Europe 2020 Strategy, For a Better Regulation Strategy.

At the moment, steps have been made in all three directions, but from the point of view of the legislative framework, the steps are shy, the amendments to the legislation proposed in 2014 are not even finalized today. However, it should be noted that a law change process started in 2015, at which moment the law was sent to the Constitutional Court, the petition showing an appearance of unconstitutionality, thus the law has never been promulgated.

Furthermore, we will continue to focus on proposed changes to the Civil Servants Act, since the law governing the most important institutional resource, namely the human resource, is defining the reform of a system as a whole.

The status of civil servants has its seat in Law 188/1999[4] a normative act that since its promulgation has so far suffered a number of substantial deformations, both at the level of 2006 and at the level of 2003. In 2007 the changes were substantive and led to the republishing of the law. However, today's form is not the one of 2007, the re-published form kept up with the socio-political changes of the times and was amended with successive modifications and additions.

At present, according to the law, the institution responsible for monitoring and methodological coordination at the administration level is ANFP[5]".In the exercise of the powers conferred by the law a number of malfunctions were identified in the interpretation and application of certain normative

[2] Marius Profiroiu,Tudorel Andrei, Dragos Dinca Radu Carp-Study no. 3 Reform of public administration in the context of european integration,European Institute of Romania, 2009.

[3] Annexes no. 1-3 to the Government Decision no. 909/2014 on the approval of the Strategy for Strengthening Public Administration 2014-2020 and the establishment of the National Committee for Coordination of the Implementation of the Strategy for Strengthening Public Administration 2014-2020 of 15.10.2014

[4] For details, see Elena Emilia Ștefan, Manual de drept administrativ. Partea a I-a. Caiet de seminar. Universul juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011, page 173.

[5] V.Vedinas, Statute of civil servants (Law No 188/1999). Comments, legislation, doctrine and jurisprudence Second Edition, reviewed and added, Universul Juridic, Bucharest, 2016, pag.111-121; Also, see. Elena Emilia Ștefan, Manual de drept administrativ. Partea a II-a, ediția a IV-a. Caiet de seminar. Universul juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2018, page 88.

provisions, malfunctions motivating the necessity of technical legislative interventions.

In order to elaborate the draft for the modifying normative act, a series of programmatic and strategic documents were considered. Furthermore, I am going to reiterate what has been said about the strategies developed as a result of European agreements and regulations. The following were analysed:

- Government Decision no. 909/2014 for the implementation of the Public Administration Reform Strategy (SCAP) 2014-2020;
- Government Decision no. 525/2016 for the approval of the Public Service Development Strategy (SDFP) 2016-2020;
- Government Decision no. 650/2016 for the approval of the Public Sector Vocational Training (PFS) Strategy 2016-2020.

Based on the elaboration of the strategies approved by the Government Decision no.525 / 2016 and the Government Decision no. 650/2016 five documents were elaborated by ANFP, according to the Strategy for Strengthening the Public Administration 2014-2020, namely:

- Analysis of the current situation of the recruitment and staff evaluation systems in terms of applying the rules in force;
- Analysis on strengthening the role of ANFP and / or setting up an institution responsible for managing contract staff in public administration;
- Analysis of the establishment of an entity with responsibilities in the field of training of public administration staff;
- Analysis on the evaluation of the implementation of the YPS (Young Professional Project) programs and the BSGR (Government of Romania Special Scholarship);
- Analysis of competence frameworks on strategic and specific identified areas

At the level of 2015, ANFP prepared a research report that focused on the correlation between the education system and the labor market. As a matter of fact, it was the product of a partnership, between the ANFP and the university environment.

By Parliament's Decision no. 1/2017 for granting the Government's trust through which the Governing Program 2017-2020 was adopted and one of the provisions of this document also refers to the completion of the action plan assumed by the two strategies.

At the level of the National Civil Servants'[6] Agency a mixed working sub-group was created for the elaboration of an integrated package of legislative solutions for amending and completing the Law no. 188/1999 on the Statute of civil servants. On the agenda of this working group was the transposition within the legislative framework of the Strategy for the development of the public function 2016-2020. The legislative transposition should have also taken into account the draft of the Administrative Code of Romania, the draft normative act on the working table of the legislature. The inter-ministerial working group set up, also benefited from representatives from the academical environment and representatives of trade unions in this field.

Also at the level of 2016, following the partnership between the Romanian Government and the Directorate for Public Governance and Territorial Development of the OECD, a project in the field of public governance was developed and implemented. The purpose of this project was to draw up a public-policy analysis. The outcome of this project can be quantified by identifying 5 priority areas for everything that means public governance in Romania. The following areas of major importance have been identified:

- Coordination at central level, at Government level,
- Strategic management of human resources in public administration,
- Budget Management,
- Open Governance and
- Digital Governance.

For the above-mentioned areas, expert group's recommendations were established, which would be in the course of the ongoing reform process of the administration.

2.1. The expected impact of the legislative amendments proposed by the draft law initiated by the Ministry of Regional Development and Public Administration.

The draft bill initiated by MDRAP proposes both programmatic changes and modifications aimed at completing and remedying some technical deficiencies identified at the level of the Officials' Statute.

Thus, at the level of the implementation programmatic theme, major changes were made aimed at extending the competences of the National Agency of Civil Servants by adding the accounting function and other categories of budgetary personnel within the public administration. Thus, at the level of the Agency, an electronic system for keeping the positions in the administration will be created, implemented and administered.

Also, under this point rules will be introduced that will form the basis of the regulation of the national competition as a means of recruiting civil servants. However, in the explanatory memorandum of the draft law, the implementation of a national recruitment contest will be carried out in the framework of a pilot project, a testing project. Initially, a pilot contest will be held, which will be regulated during the experimental period by some transitional rules. Transitional rules for non-experimental competitions will also be included.

[6] FUNDAMENTAL NOTE to the Government Decision no. 525/2016 for the approval of the Strategy for the development of the public function 2016-2020)

In order to occupy the central state and territorial public offices, two stages will be organised, recruitment and selection. The recruitment will be carried out by organising a national competition that will verify the general knowledge and skills. Selection will be carried out through institutional competition, for each post, and will aim at verifying the specialized knowledge and the specific skills needed to fill a vacant public position.

The contest organised for the purpose of occupying local public functions will have a more unitary organisation, so in the same competition the general and the specific and specialised skills will be checked.

For the recruitment field, the draft law proposes a centralisation at the level of the Agency, through the implementation of a recruitment plan which will be subject to the approval of the Government. The Agency will develop this plan taking into account the proposals of public authorities and institutions.

The rules governing the organisation and development of the civil servant's career are reviewed and supplemented. In this respect, associated salary rates will be introduced for all categories of officials including senior officials.

At the organisational level, the category of senior officials is redefined and a number of public functions are cancelled, namely the prefect, the sub-prefect and the government inspector, functions for which another legal regime will be established. The project also proposes transitional provisions for the implementation of these proposals.

Also within this project, the Agency has a new task, namely to develop general competence frameworks and specific frameworks.

From the second point of view of the MDRAP project, we can see changes that affect the material right of this matter. Thus, the changes and additions are aimed at some improvements for remediating the results of the practice and contributing to the implementation of the new laws.

From the second point of view of the MDRAP project, we can see changes that affect the material right of this matter. Such changes and additions are aimed at some improvements to remedy the results of the practice and contribute to the implementation of the measures imposed by the strategies.

The draft proposes a clarification of the general framework on special statutes[7]. The proposed rules also make flexible the way in which vacancies are temporarily vacant, regulate mobility within the body of civil servants, and extend the ways in which a public office can be employed.

The legislation will contain a new section "The Structure of Posts", which is characterised by general rules applicable to all public institutions and authorities. These norms regulate the organisational structure and the establishment of public functions.

Here too, the attempts are made to eliminate discriminatory situations, thus ammending the regulations on civil servants' rights. The rules on how to develop the careers of a civil servant are also reviewed in order to create a uniform regime.

Also from the point of view of human comprehensiveness, the provisions regarding the competence and activity of disciplinary and parity commissions are clarified.

The draft law technically clarifies the legal regime applicable to civil servants regarding the termination of service relationships.

The authors of the draft law proposed to revise the rules regarding the seniority of the civil service, but also to clarify the norms related to the actual institutional reorganization process as well as the terminology in the field.

This draft law seeks to standardise the applicable legal regime in the event of suspension of civil servants' service relationships in the conduct of their work in the governing bodies of trade unions and the conduct of political activities.

A controversial provision, respect, removal of service relationships in case of referral is provided. The project's authors also proposes regulations for contraventions and sanctions.

As a result of some divergences at the conceptual level, changes that are proposed are aimed at eliminating non-uniform interpretations of norms and simplifying the application of these norms. This explains the public institutions with which the civil servants are in legal service relations and the notion of budgetary personnel is redefined and clarified, in order to determine the regulatory object of the normative act.

Nowadays, the activities that involve the prerogatives of public power are redefined, and the duties involving the exercise of public powers are classified into two categories, namely general and special in nature. Rules on special statutes and specific public functions are introduced.

The draft law now also establishes the legal consequences that may arise if several cases of cessation or suspension of service relationships occur concurrently but also clarify the liability of civil servants in the exercise of their duties.

The rules on redistribution of civil servants and the reserve body of these are provided with clarification in this draft.

In order to obtain unitary legal provisions on reduction of the number of incomplete administrative acts, a new section "Administrative acts" will be introduced in the new laws. Within this section, the author of the text proposes definitions of the administrative act, the administrative act of appointing, amending, suspending and terminating the public office. These provisions are not only about definitions but also about how these administrative acts produce their effects.

[7] Draft "Law on the Statute of Civil Servants and Evidence of Budgetary Staff in Public Administration", March 2017.

The proposed project is perhaps the most complete modification and consolidation of the State Civil Servant since the Law was published in 1999. However, other proposed changes are also important, namely those related to the transposition into other programmatic documents. Thus, the transposition of the Incidental Provisions of the "Strategy for Promotion of Active Aging and the Protection of the Elderly for the Period 2015-2020" is made by introducing rules stipulating the possibility of keeping civil servants fulfilling the retirement conditions for old age in service, observing the express conditions laid down for that purpose.

The transposition of the provisions of the National Public Procurement Strategy is achieved through the introduction of a new public execution function, namely public procurement advisor.

3. Final changes sent to promulgation

Although the draft law initiated by the Ministry of Regional Development and Public Administration is launched in March 2017, in 2015 a group of MPs initiated another draft law amending the Civil Service Statute. Of the two projects, the one in 2015 is on the circuit of approval and approval of a normative act. This bill was submitted to the debates of the two chambers and was verified and amended by the Constitutional Court.

In the explanatory statement submitted, according to the practice and norms for the drafting of the normative acts, the authors of the proposal motivate the necessity of this act in order to strengthen the observance of the principles of equal opportunities for non-discrimination and equity between civil servants.

Among the proposed changes are the modification of the conditions necessary for the promotion, the modification of the situation of suspension of the service relationship, the possibility to continue the activity after retirement, the mobility of the public function.

The motivation of this draft law contains the supplementation required by the Constitutional Court Decision no. 1039/2009, which assumes: "One of the principles underlying the right to work is the stability of legal relationships that arise as a result of the conclusion of the individual labor contract, this principle stemming from the State's obligation to create the legislative framework meant to ensure the salaries of safety and security, the guarantee of keeping the workplace[8] ".

A first form of this proposal was adopted by the Chamber of Deputies in 2016, as amended by the Constitutional Court by the Constitutional Court's Decision No. 667 of November 9, 2016, following the notification of the Government. Subsequent to this notification the normative act is sent to the Senate for reexamination. The reason for unconstitutionality was the amendment related to the granting of bonuses to the staff of the National Agency of Civil Servants.

Following the consolidation of a new form of the normative act was amended by notices formulated by the President of Romania for diminishing the standards of integrity. The Constitutional Court no.32 of January 23, 2018 establishes the new provisions in conflict, art. I, points 14, 18 and 22.

Following the communication of this decision, a new form for this project is reinforced.

The main changes to be adopted are aimed at strengthening the position of senior civil servant, increasing the number of years necessary for the performance of these functions from 5 to 7 years and introducing new regulations regarding the clarification of the category of staff paid from public funds.

It also clarifies the way in which senior civil servants and senior officials can be appointed to public dignity positions, namely by suspending the service relationship. The way of entry into the body of civil servants is also regulated.

The form prepared for the promulgation also contains provisions regarding the development of the career of civil servants and the way of promotion or recruitment for management positions. These changes occur to professionalize and increase administrative capacity. Norms governing the possibilities of mobility within the public service are also provided here.

Notable in this normative act is the continuation of the activity after retirement, which also offers the character of professionalization of the public administration.

By making a parallel between the two draft normative acts, we find that the project elaborated by the Ministry of Regional Development and Public Administration is much more complete and presumes a restructuring of this legislative framework. The central authority project, the most competent authority in the field, supposes the affiliation with the European standards and the strategies and agreements assumed by our state. Some of these measures are also taken up in the project prepared for publication, but the act prepared for publication leaves gaps in the field and does not complete the planned measures within the programmatic documents. These changes are more of a political nature and have no scope that the proposed amendments by the central authority, do not come to follow the plan of measures taken to develop the administrative capacity of the Romanian state.

If these provisions are promulgated and published, they will not stabilize the legislative framework governing the State of Civil Service. We reiterate the need to see all measures taken as ex-ante conditionality in the framework of agreements with European mechanisms. Thus, we see the need to republish this legislation and to follow all the strategic documents that intersect with this area. Legislation needs to be adapted at the same time as the approximation of adjacent legislation and the harmonization of legislation on public and utility services.

[8] Decision of the Constitutional Court no. 1039/2009

4. Conclusion

Although apparently we may conclude that the reform of public administration is close to the end, the analysis of normative acts and the practice of recent years, denotes that the public administration reform is far from complete.

The various studies conducted by civil society and other non-governmental organizations have revealed a series of deficiencies in the management of public office.

All of these studies reveal that the reform of public administration must focus on this essential resource. The public administration faces an important challenge, namely the establishment of a way to create the creative potential of the human resource.

The last period was marked by the attempt to cosmetic the image of the public administration, by applying the conceptual principles regarding the increase of transparency of the administrative act and the taking of measures aimed at combating corruption measures that kept the pages of the newspapers.

The analysis made during the current study reveals precisely the lack of consistency of coherent legislative reform. However, we only refer to the proposal that followed the circuit of a normative act, a proposal that does not have an essential role in the process of reform to strengthen the administrative capacity.

If we relate to the first analyzed proposal, we find that this is incomplete as it does not contain provisions on the computerization and digitization of the administration and does not propose clear measures in encouraging the creative potential.

Although the recruitment process for civil servants is currently regulated, the recruitment process does not reveal the best managers or the best professionals. Practice shows us that the recruitment method has not yet come under the sphere of politics and interest. In this regard, it is worth noting the numerous frauds found by the authorities and the numerous acts initiated at the level of the National Anticorruption Directorate.

If the management style at present is characterized by an authoritative style lacking in professionalism, which denotes the need to develop a new recruitment method and a new way of training for the benefit of professionals, possibly inaccessible on the basis of a contract performance so that political sympathies or other occult forces can influence their activity. What is lacking in the public authorities in the present is the lack of an organizational culture and the lack of trained managers. Officials with senior management positions, even if they often know the field quite well, do not have managerial skills.

In order to be able to complete the reform process in this area it is necessary first to follow the strategies developed in this field and then to comply with the directives imposed by the European mechanisms. As I saying, the legislative framework needs to be modernized and simplified in order to increase administrative capacity, which will have repercussions on economical growth.

References

- Robert C. Denicola, Fair's Fair - An Argument for Mandatory Disclosure, University of Nebraska, 2004
- V.Vedinas, Theoretical and practical treatise on administrative law. Volume I, Editura Universul Juridic, 2018
- V.Vedinas, Statute of civil servants (Law No 188/1999). Comments, legislation, doctrine and jurisprudence Second Edition, reviewed and added, Universul Juridic,Bucharest, 2016
- Marius Profiroiu,Tudorel Andrei, Dragos Dinca Radu Carp-Study no. 3 Reform of public administration in the context of european integration,European Institute of Romania, 2009
- Elena Emilia Ștefan, Manual de drept administrativ. Partea a II-a, ediția a IV-a. Caiet de seminar. Universul juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2018
- Elena Emilia Ștefan, Manual de drept administrativ. Partea a I-a. Caiet de seminar. Universul juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011
- Alesina A., Perotti R., The Politics of Economic Growth, Harvard University,Cambridge, Working Paper, no 4341, Cambridge, 1993
- Alesina A., Perotti R., Income Distribution. Political Instability and Investment, NBER Working Paper, n0 4486, Cambridge, 1993
- Balls A., Bombing costs prezent allies with hefty bill, Financial Times, 9 avril1999
- Bardhan P., Corruption and development: a review of issues, Journal of Economic Literature, Vol.35, no 3, 1997
- Barro R., Lee J.-W, Losers and Wienners în economic Growth, NBER Working
- Barro R., J., Economic growth în a cross-section of countries, Quarterly Journalof Economics, vol. 106, p. 407-443, 1991
- Elena Emilia Ștefan, Drept administrativ. Partea a II-a. Curs universitar, ediția a 3-a revizuită, completată și actualizată, Universul juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2018
- LAW no. 188 of 8 December 1999 ( republished )on the status of civil servants *)
- PL-x no. 556/2015-Draft Law amending the Law no.188 / 1999 on the Civil Servants' Statute
- Draft law to amend Law no. 188/1999 on the Statute of civil servants published on 1 March 2017
- FUNDAMENTAL NOTE Government Decision no. 525/2016 for the approval of the Strategy for the development of the public function 2016-2020
- The Strategy for the Development of the Public Function 2016-2020
- Strategy for consolidated public administration 2014-2020
- Decision of the Constitutional Court no. 1039/2009

TOOLS TO ENSURE THE PREVENTION OF CONTRAVENTIONS

Elena Emilia ȘTEFAN[*]

Abstract

Nowadays, the most common form of law infringement is contravention. The Romanian contravention law was improved at the end of 2017 by a legislative novelty regulating the instruments to ensure the prevention of contraventions.

The contraventions provided in this administrative act are diverse and it is interesting that despite this, the law maker provides in many cases the application of a penalty, namely the warning, which is then followed, as the case may be, by the application of a measures plan, limited in time. Furthermore, the offenders will not be pardoned every time, but only once, provided that they fulfill the obligations provided by the measures plan and within the deadline established by the official examiner. This law would have remained only at the stage of intention and without application if the executive had not adopted the administrative act identifying the contraventions contemplated by it, but once the respective Government resolution has been adopted, we can only wait for the time to see the effectiveness of it application.

This is why, in this study, we will analyze this topic by being of great interest and adapted to social realities. By being a legislative novelty for the national law system, the scientific research that we performed is mainly focused on the legislation and the doctrine.

Keywords: Contraventions, prevention law, correction plan, warning, Government resolution.

1. Introduction

The field of contraventions is undoubtedly an area with the most profound and complex implications in the everyday life of citizens and, by default, in the administrative practice of authorities with duties in the field[1]. Therefore, we believe that it is required to know the legislation in the field, the contravention functioning mechanism, not so much in terms of the sanction, but especially in terms of the tools for the prevention of contraventions.

The scientific research started with the documentation on the topic and included: legislation, doctrine and case law. Therefore, we noted that, in what concerns the subject we propose and the date on which we draw up this study, no doctrine and case law is available, being about the recent adoption of Prevention Law no.270/2017 of 22.12.2017 (hereinafter referred to as the Prevention Law)[2] and Government Resolution no. 33/2018 establishing the contraventions which fall under the scope of Prevention Law no. 270/2017, and of the correction plan model[3], having the nature of legislative novelty.

Prevention Law no. 270/2017 came into force on January 17th, 2018 but it could not be applied due to the fact there is a provision in the content of the law, respectively art.10 para.(3) which conditioned the subsequent issue of an administrative act, respectively of a Government Resolution to identify the contraventions which fell under the scope of the law and of the correction plan model. This administrative act was adopted only on February 5th, 2018 due to the fact Romania had to face a resigning government during this term.

The activity of public administration authorities[4], at any level, is subject to principles resulting from the legislation, and the lawfulness principle is, in our opinion, the corollary of all principles and is provided by the revised Constitution of Romania itself: "no one is above the law". In the current historical background, in which humanity escalates a new stage of civilization, thus embracing "unity in diversity", the role of general principles of law, the legal expression of fundamental relationships within the society is amplified[5].

Every state has its own enacted law, in accordance with its own socio-political requirements, with the traditions and values it proclaims [6]. The failure to comply with the laws entails legal liability. One explanation for the failure to observe the laws is that the laws are inappropriately made, approved not for common good, but for private interests(...)[7].The violation by the lawmaker of the justness standard often [*] Lecturer PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (e-mail: stefanelena@gmail.com).

[1] Dana Apostol Tofan, Drept administrativ, volume II, edition 4, Bucharest, C.H.Beck Publishing House, 2017, p.371.

[2] Prevention Law no.270/2017 of December 22nd, 2017, published in Official Journal no. 1037 of 27.12.2017.

[3] Government Resolution no. 33/2018 establishing the contraventions which fall under the scope of Prevention Law no. 270/2017, and of the correction plan model, published in Official Journal no. 107 of 05.02.2018.

[4] For further details, see Roxana Mariana Popescu, Jurisprudența CJUE cu privire la noțiunea de „administrație publică" used in art. 45 ara. (4) TFUE, in proceeding CKS ebook 2017, pp. 528-532.

[5] Elena Anghel, The importance of principles in the present context of law recodifying, in proceeding CKS e-Book 2015, p. 753-762.

[6] See Elena Anghel, Constant aspects of law, in proceedings CKS-eBook 2011, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011, p. 594.

[7] Mario Vargas Llosa, Civilizația spectacolului, Translation from Spanish by Marin Mălaicu-Hondrari, Humanitas Publishing House, Bucharest 2017, p. 126.

leads to the adoption of unfair laws[8]. "Prevention", according to the definition provided by DEXonline means, among others "avoiding bad things by taking timely, preventive measures, prevention"[9]. Bad laws do not harm only the ordinary citizen, but they also lower the prestige of the legal system and amplify the contempt for the law, which, like a poison, empoisons the rule of law[10].

Therefore, in our opinion, Prevention law is not a bad law, but a good law, in accordance with the evolution of the society, adjusted to social realities. A good law should not be seen only from the penalties perspective, but also from the prevention perspective, as in case of the Prevention Law, according to its name given by the law maker. No state has a legislation valid for all times[11]. Therefore, the scope of this study is to point out the opinion of the law maker on the tools for the prevention of contraventions, by presenting in detail how this law works.

2. Content

2.1. Civil sanctions

The governing rules of contraventions are provided by Government Ordinance no. 2/2001 on the legal regime of contraventions[12]. Contravention is defined by Government Ordinance no. 2/2001 (...) as: "the act committed with guilt, established and sanctioned by law, ordinance, Government resolution, or as the case may be, by decision of the local council of commune, city, municipality or district of Bucharest, county council or General Council of Bucharest". Contravention Law protects social values which are not protected under the criminal law, according to art. 1 thesis 1 of Government Ordinance no. 2/2001 (...).

From another point of view, contravention, in the opinion of the European Court of Human Rights is qualified as "criminal charge"[13]. Romania is permanently bound to harmonize its legislation with the European legislation, and the national doctrine has given us many opportunities to analyze the supremacy of the European Union law[14]. Romania ratified the Treaty of Lisbon amending the Treaty on European Union[15] (...) in 2008. The failure to comply with the EU legal regulations leads, as well known, to the opening of the infringement procedure[16]. The European Union law embraces the theory of monism, that is the existence of a single legal order which includes international law and domestic law in an unitary system [17]. In order to eliminate arbitrariness in assessing the social danger degree of an act in order to qualify it as contravention or offence, normative acts provide expressly the category under which a certain illicit conduct falls[18]. A recent study has analyzed comparatively the contravention and the offence[19], but this is not the object of our study. We can therefore say that the will of the law maker, by being based on criminological analyzes, studies and researches is the one that cause an unlawful act to be included in the category of the contraventions or of the offences[20].

Civil sanctions are provided both by the regulations in the filed (s.n. G.O. no. 2/2001), and by laws and special contravention laws[21]. According to art.5 of G.O. no. 2/2001 on the legal regime of contraventions, civil sanctions can be principal and complementary. There are three principal civil sanctions: warning, fine and provision of community service. Complementary civil sanctions are: arrest warrant in rem intended to, used or resulted from contraventions; suspension or cancellation, as the case may be, of the endorsement, agreement or authorization to perform an activity; closing the unit; bank account lock out; the suspension of the activity of the economic agent; the withdrawal of the license or authorization for external, temporary or definitive trade; works dismantling and return of the land at its initial state.

The doctrine identified other complementary civil sanctions provided for by art. 96 para. (2) of G.E.O. no.195/2002: a.) application of penalty points; b.) the suspension of the exercise of the right to drive, on limited term; c.) arrest warrant in rem intended to [8] See Elena Anghel, Justice and equity, in proceedings CKS-eBook 2017, Bucharest, p.370.

[9] https://dexonline.ro/definitie/prevenire, accessed on 07.02.2018.

[10] Mario Vargas Llosa, Civilizația spectacolului, op.cit., p. 126.

[11] Laura-Cristiana Spătaru-Negură, Old and New Legal Typologies, in proceedings CKS-eBook 2014, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, p. 354.

[12] Government Ordinance no. 2/2001 on the legal regime of contraventions, published in Official Journal no. 410 of July 25th, 2001, as further amended and supplemented.

[13] See Elena Emilia Ștefan, Răspunderea juridică.Privire specială asupra răspunderii în dreptul administrativ, Prouniversitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013, pp.216-218.

[14] Roxana-Mariana Popescu, Specificul aplicării prioritare a dreptului comunitar european în dreptul intern, în raport cu aplicarea prioritară a dreptului internaţional, Revista Română de Drept Comunitar, no. 3/2005, pg. 11-21; Augustin Fuerea, Manualul Uniunii Europene, edition VI, revised and supplemented, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, pp. 252-253.

[15] For further information see the Treaty on the European Union, Roxana-Mariana Popescu, Introducere în dreptul Uniunii Europene, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011, pp.62-63.

[16] For other details, see Roxana-Mariana Popescu, General aspects of the infringement procedure, Lex et Scientia, International Journal, no.2/2010, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, pg. 59-67.

[17] Laura Cristiana Spătaru Negură, Dreptul Uniunii Europene-o nouă tipologie juridică, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p.190

[18] Cătălin Silviu Săraru, Drept administrativ.Probleme fundamentale ale dreptului public, C.H.Beck Publishig House, Bucharest, 2016, p.214.

[19] Elena Emilia Ștefan, Delimitarea dintre infracțiune și contravenția în lumina noilor modificări legislative, Dreptul no. 6/2015, pp.143-159.

[20] Cătălin Silviu Săraru, op.cit., p.215.

[21] A. Iorgovan,Tratat de drept administrativ, vol.II edition 4, All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2005, p.408.

contraventions provided for by G.E.O. no. 195/2002 or used for this purpose; d.) vehicle dowtime; e.) ex officio deregistration of the vehicle, in case of declared vehicles, according to the law, by order of the authority of local public administration, with no owner or abandoned.[22]

2.2. Prevention Law

2.2.1. Scope and terms of Prevention Law

Prevention Law no. 270/2017 of 22.12.2017 published in Official Journal no. 1037 of 27.12.2017 and Government Resolution no. 33/2018 establishing the contraventions which fall under the scope of Prevention Law no. 270/2017, as well as of the correction plan model, published in Official Journal no. 107 of 05.02.2018 are the two normative acts with novelty nature in our law system regarding the field of contraventions.

Prevention Law is a normative act which consists of a low number of articles, respectively 11. Appendix no. 1 of Government Resolution no. 33/2018 (...) has 70 items listing the contraventions which fall under the Prevention Law and Appendix no.2 The model of the record of findings and subsequent penalties which consists of: Part 1- Correction Plan and Part II – Correction measures fulfillment modalities.

The declared scope of the Prevention Law is "to regulate a series of tools to ensure the prevention of contraventions. The Government Resolution shall establish the contraventions which fall under the scope of this law". The Government Resolution the Prevention Law refers to is aforementioned Government Resolution no. 33/2018 (...).

The prevention Law defines the following terms which are found in its content, namely: correction measure, correction plan and correction deadline:

- correction measure: any measure ordered by the official examiner in the correction plan the scope of which is the fulfillment by the offender of the obligations established by the law;
- correction plan: appendix to the record of findings and subsequent penalties, whereby the official examiner established correction measures and deadline;
- correction deadline: the term of no more than 90 calendar days, as of the delivery or communication of the record of findings and subsequent penalties, where the offender can correct the ascertained irregularities and fulfill the legal obligations. The correction deadline shall be established by taking into account the circumstances of the offence and the term required for the fulfillment of the legal obligations. The correction deadline established by the control body cannot be modified.

2.2.2. Prevention Law functioning mechanism

According to the law maker, the Prevention Law seems to be a law that sanctions an offender who commits a contravention which falls under the scope of this law and establishes a measure plan that the offender is bound to fulfill within a certain established deadline. In fact, Prevention Law establishes two stages where the official examiner acts when founds the commission of a contravention, following the performance of a control. We hereby point out that not all contraventions benefit from this relaxed sanctioning regime, but only those expressly provided by Government Resolution no. 33/2018 (...) adopted by the executive branch. There is a sole institution with executive powers at the European Union level, namely the European Commission [23]. Furthermore, we have to make two important notes:

1. As of the enforcement of the Prevention Law, by way of derogation from the provisions of Government Ordinance no. 2/2001 (...), for finding and sanction contraventions referred to in Government Resolution no. 33/2018 (...), the provisions of this law shall apply.
2. In what concerns the sanctions applied according to Prevention Law, these shall be supplemented by the provisions of G.O. no. 2/2001(...).

Stage no. 1.

According to the provisions of art. 4 para. (1) in case of finding one of the contraventions established by the Government Resolution in art. 10 para. (3), respectively Government Resolution no. 33/2018 (...), the official examiner concludes a record of findings whereby warning sanction is applied and a correction plan is attached. In this case, no complementary contravention sanctions are applied.

The law expressly provides that the liability for the fulfillment of the correction measures shall be incumbent on the person who, according to the law, bears the contravention liability for the acts which were found.

The official examiner, according to paragraphs (2 and 3) of art. 4 of the Law shall not draw up a correction plan but shall only apply the warning sanction, in the following situations:

- if the offender fulfills the legal obligation throughout the performance of the control;
- if the contravention is not continuous
- if the sanctioning of the contraventions of art. 10 para.(3) of the Law expressly referred to in Government Resolution no. 33/2018 (...), expressly establish the exclusion from the application of the warning.

Furthermore, Prevention Law also regulates the situation where an offender committed several contraventions which fall under its scope. In such cases, if a person commits several contraventions which are found at the same time by the same official examiner, a single record of findings and subsequent penalties shall be concluded, under the fulfillment of the provisions of art. 4 and, as the case may be, a correction plan shall be attached to. We hereby point out that the correction plan model the Prevention Law refers to and which is attached to the record of findings and subsequent penalties is the one published in Government Resolution no. 33/2018 (...).

[22] Cătălin Silviu Săraru, op.cit., p.217.

[23] For further information on the European Commission, Augustina Dumitrașcu, Roxana-Mariana Popescu, Dreptul Uniunii Europene. Sinteze și aplicații, edition II, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Buchaerst, 2015, p. 65 and the following.

Stage no. 2

Art. 8 para. (1) of Prevention Law establishes that, within no more than 10 business days as of the expiry of the correction deadline, public authority/institution with control powers shall be bound to resume control and to fill in part II of the correction plan attached to the record of findings and subsequent penalties and if the case may be, the control ledger with notes on the fulfillment of the correction measures.

Art. 8 para. (2) of Prevention Law provides that, in case the failure to fulfill the legal obligations according to the correction measures within the established deadline is found during the resumption of the control, the official examiner concludes another record whereby the commission of the contravention is found and the contravention sanction/s, other than the warning, is/are applied.

Another important provision of the Prevention Law refers to the passing of a period of 3 years as of the conclusion of the record of findings and subsequent penalties, according to this Law. There are two situations regulated by art. 9 of the Law, namely:

- if, within 3 years as of the conclusion of the record of findings and subsequent penalties provided for by art. 4, the offender commits again the same contravention, the legal provisions in force on contravention finding and sanctioning shall be directly applicable;
- if within 3 years as of the conclusion of the record of findings and subsequent penalties provided for by art. 5[24] the offender commits again one or several contraventions provided for by art. 10 para. (3) of the Law, respectively in Government Resolution no. 33/2018 (...), the legal provisions in force on contravention finding and sanctioning shall be directly applicable.

The Prevention Law assigns an article to the importance of the Control Ledger. Therefore, art. 6 expressly provides that the official examiner shall be bound to check in the control ledger and in the records of the public authority/institution it is part of whether the offender benefited from the provisions of art. 4. This means that at the end of the control, the details of the control shall be recorded in writing in the control ledger.

There is also the category of those who are not bound to have a control ledger, according to the law. In this case, the official examiner shall be bound to check in the records of public authority/institution it is part of whether the offender benefited from the provisions of art. 4. The official examiner shall be bound to provide expressly the correction plan in the control ledger.

In what concerns the nullity of the record of findings, Prevention Law provides in art.7 that the violation of art. 4 paragraphs (1 and 2) shall lead to the nullity of the records.

2.2.3. The obligations of public authorities /institutions with control powers

Prevention Law establishes an obligation which is incumbent on public authorities and institutions responsible for controlling, sanctioning and finding contraventions and describes this obligation in art. 3. Public authorities and institutions responsible for controlling, sanctioning and finding contraventions shall be bound, depending on the fields they lead, to produce and disseminate documentary materials, guides and to allocate on the web page dedicated sections on public information on the following:

a) legislation in force on contravention finding and sanctioning;
b) rights and obligations of these public authorities/institutions in the performance of the activity on finding contraventions and subsequent penalties, as well as rights and obligations of persons subject to these activities;
c) distinct indication of contraventions for which public authority/institution has the power of finding and sanctioning contraventions, as well as of sanctions and/or other applicable measures.

Public authorities and institutions with control powers, depending on their competence areas, shall be bound to guide interested persons for an appropriate and unitary application of the law.

In order for the guiding activity to be carried out, public authorities and institutions with control powers shall be bound: a) to issue guidance and control procedures to be used by persons authorized to carry out control activity; b.) to publish on own sites high-frequency cases and guidance solutions provided in this cases, as well as the developed procedures; c.) to exercise actively the role of guidance of the controlled persons in case of every control activity, thus making available, according to the procedures, the indications and guidance required in order to avoid law infringement on the future. The fulfillment of this obligation shall be expressly mentioned in the control protocol, thus showing the provided indications and guidance.

Finally, the central public administration authorities with powers to coordinate nationally the business environment shall be bound that, within 6 months as of the enforcement of the law, to develop and operate a portal dedicated to providing centralized online services and resources for information purposes.

2.2.4. Examples of contraventions which fall under the scope of Prevention Law

Government Resolution no. 33/2018 for the establishment of contraventions which fall under the scope of Prevention Law no. 270/2017, as well as of the correction plan model, published in Official Journal no.

[24] It is about several contraventions (...).

107 of 05.02.2018 lists in Appendix 1 the contraventions which fall under the scope of Prevention Law.

For example, the following contraventions fall under the scope of the Prevention Law:

- The failure of the signatory parties to submit for publication purposes the collective labor agreement at the level of group of units or sector of activity (art. 217 paragraph 1, letter c. of the Law on social dialogue[25]);
- The establishment of plantations with areas of more than 0.5 ha of fruit trees and of areas larger than 0.2 ha of fruit-bearing shrubs by every economic operator or family or their extension over the limits of those existent, without planting permission, according to the law (art.29 the Law on fruit growing[26]) etc.
- The conclusion of management/forestry service agreements with persons who acquire exclusively the ownership over the land where it is located (art. 3 paragraph 2 of the Law on finding and sanctioning contraventions in the field of forestry[27]) etc.
- The following acts shall not be deemed offences: the issuance of the fiscal receipt containing erroneous data or not containing all the data provided by the law; the fiscal receipt is not handed to the customer by the operator of the electronic cash register and/or the failure to issue the invoice upon the customer's request (art. 10 letter f/ g of G.E.O. no. 28/1999[28]) etc.
- The following acts shall not be deemed offences: the failure of the taxpayer/payer to submit within the deadline provided by the law the tax registration declarations, tax deregistration declarations or declarations of mentions; the failure of the taxpayer/payer to comply with the obligation to submit to the tax body the data archived in electronic format and the computer applications that generated them (art. 336 paragraph 1 letters a/f of the Code of fiscal procedure[29]) etc.
- the failure to purchase the control ledger from the general departments of the public finance administration within the territory where the taxpayer has his/her registered office, on the legal deadline (art. 7 letter a of Law no. 252/2003 on the control ledger[30]) etc.
- The failure of the traders to comply with the legal provisions on misleading and comparative publicity (art. 10 paragraph 1 of Law no. 158/2008 on misleading and comparative publicity [31].) etc.

Conclusions

Prevention Law will prove its efficiency after passing the time test, after drawing a case law and after appearing its first weaknesses or, on the contrary, it will prove to be a perfect law. If the judge does not find principles appropriate to the case resorted for settlement, the judge can and must create a new rule of law[32]. For the time being, we cannot speak about case law, as we have shown before; despite this, in our opinion, the law maker's effort to pardon an offender from the application of a sanction, under certain terms, is commendable, being fully pointed out the preventive nature of this law with regard to contraventions, deeds entailing a lower social danger compared to offences.

As we have shown in the content of the study, Prevention Law has, on the one hand, a derogatory regime of application compared to common law on contraventions, namely G.O. no. 2/2001 and, on the other hand, is applied only to those contraventions which are expressly provided by Government Resolution, respectively Government Resolution no. 33/2018 on the contraventions which fall under the scope of Prevention Law no. 270/2017, as well as of the correction plan model.

The contraventions provided in this administrative act are diverse and it is interesting that despite this, the law maker provides in many cases the application of a penalty, namely the warning, which is then followed, as the case may be, by the application of a measures plan, limited in time. Furthermore, the offenders will not be pardoned every time, but only once, provided that they fulfill the obligations provided by the measures plan and within the deadline established by the official examiner.

To conclude, we believe that we have achieved the scopes established in drawing up of this study, namely to show this legislative novelty in the field of contraventions and we hope that this will be an efficient law and not a reason for breaking the law due to postponing the application of the penalty after the first control where the contravention was found.

---

[25] Law no. 62/2011 on social dialogue, published in Official Journal no. 625 of August 31st, 2012, as further amended and supplemented.

[26] Law no. 348/2003 on fruit growing, published in Official Journal no. 300 of April 17th, 2008, as further amended and supplemented.

[27] Law no. 171/2000 on finding and sanctioning contraventions in the field of forestry, published in Official Journal no. 513 of July 23rd, 2010, as further amended and supplemented.

[28] G.E.O. no. 28/1999 on the obligation of economic operators to use electronic cash registers, published in Official Journal no. 75 of January 21st, 2005, as further amended and supplemented.

[29] Law no. 207/20115 on the Code of fiscal procedure, published in Official Journal no. 547 of July 23rd, 2015, as further amended and supplemented.

[30] Law no. 252/2003 on the control ledger, published in Official Journal no. 429 of June 18th, 2003, as further amended and supplemented.

[31] Law no. 158/2008 on misleading and comparative publicity, republished in Official Journal no. 454 of July 24th, 2013.

[32] Elena Anghel, Judicial precedent, a law source, in proceeding CKS ebook 2017, Bucharest, p.364.

Refereces

- Elena Anghel, „Justice and equity", in proceedings CKS-eBook 2017, Bucharest
- Elena Anghel, „Judicial precedent, a law source", in proceeding CKS ebook 2017, Bucharest
- Elena Anghel, „The importance of principles in the present context of law recodifying", in proceeding CKS e-Book 2015
- Elena Anghel, „Constant aspects of law", in proceedings CKS-eBook 2011, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011
- Iorgovan,Tratat de drept administrativ, vol.II edition 4, All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2005
- Augustina Dumitrașcu, Roxana-Mariana Popescu, Dreptul Uniunii Europene. Sinteze și aplicații, edition II, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Buchaerst, 2015
- Augustin Fuerea, Manualul Uniunii Europene, edition VI, revised and supplemented, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016
- Mario Vargas Llosa, Civilizația spectacolului, Translation from Spanish by Marin Mălaicu-Hondrari, Humanitas Publishing House, Bucharest 2017
- Laura Cristiana Spătaru Negură, Dreptul Uniunii Europene-o nouă tipologie juridică, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016
- Laura-Cristiana Spătaru-Negură, „Old and New Legal Typologies", in proceedings CKS-eBook 2014, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014
- Roxana Mariana Popescu, „Jurisprudența CJUE cu privire la noțiunea de „administrație publică" used in art. 45 ara. (4) TFUE", in proceeding CKS ebook 2017
- Roxana-Mariana Popescu, Introducere în dreptul Uniunii Europene, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011
- Roxana-Mariana Popescu, „General aspects of the infringement procedure", Lex et Scientia, International Journal, no.2/2010, Pro Universitaria Publishing House
- Roxana-Mariana Popescu, „Specificul aplicării prioritare a dreptului comunitar european în dreptul intern, în raport cu aplicarea prioritară a dreptului internaţional", Revista Română de Drept Comunitar, no. 3/2005
- Cătălin Silviu Săraru, Drept administrativ.Probleme fundamentale ale dreptului public, C.H.Beck Publishig House, Bucharest, 2016
- Elena Emilia Ștefan, "Delimitarea dintre infracțiune și contravenția în lumina noilor modificări legislative", Dreptul no. 6/2015
- Elena Emilia Ștefan, Răspunderea juridică.Privire specială asupra răspunderii în dreptul administrativ, Prouniversitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013, pp.216-218
- Dana Apostol Tofan, Drept administrativ, volume II, edition 4, Bucharest, C.H.Beck Publishing House, 2017, p.371
- Prevention Law no.270/2017 of December 22nd, 2017, published in Official Journal no. 1037 of 27.12.2017
- Government Resolution no. 33/2018 establishing the contraventions which fall under the scope of Prevention Law no. 270/2017, and of the correction plan model, published in Official Journal no. 107 of 05.02.2018
- Law no. 207/2015 on the Code of fiscal procedure, published in Official Journal no. 547 of July 23rd, 2015, as further amended and supplemented
- Law no. 62/2011 on social dialogue, published in Official Journal no. 625 of August 31st, 2012, as further amended and supplemented
- Law no. 158/2008 on misleading and comparative publicity, republished in Official Journal no. 454 of July 24th, 2013
- Law no. 252/2003 on the control ledger, published in Official Journal no. 429 of June 18th, 2003, as further amended and supplemented
- Law no. 348/2003 on fruit growing, published in Official Journal no. 300 of April 17th, 2008, as further amended and supplemented
- Law no. 171/2000 on finding and sanctioning contraventions in the field of forestry, published in Official Journal no. 513 of July 23rd, 2010, as further amended and supplemented
- G.E.O. no. 28/1999 on the obligation of economic operators to use electronic cash registers, published in Official Journal no. 75 of January 21st, 2005, as further amended and supplemented
- Government Ordinance no. 2/2001 on the legal regime of contraventions, published in Official Journal no. 410 of July 25th, 2001, as further amended and supplemented
- https://dexonline.ro/definitie/prevenire, accessed on 07.02.2018

GOVERNMENT INVESTITURE

Elena Emilia ȘTEFAN[*]

Abstract

This study aims to analyze the procedure of the investiture of the Government and to briefly present current configuration of the Romanian Government. In this respect, based on the current legislation and on the analysis of the public activity official information, ministries which currently operate according to government program, as well as the modality the government program is established or the list of the future members of the cabinet is drawn up will be summarized. We believe that this is a highly topical issue, the Government being the public authority which, according to the provisions of the Constitution ensures the performance of domestic and external policy of the country and it is important to know the structure of the Government, especially since our country is quite familiar with the government investiture procedure since recent Governments had a rather short term of office.

The area covered by the subject we propose is quite extensive and includes a combination between constitutional law, parliamentary law, administrative law and general theory of law. The following are among the scopes of this study: the performance of an inventory of the ministries that make up the current Government; brief presentation of the Government investiture procedure and of the meaning of the government political program, due to the fact it is an extremely up-to-date subject and we strongly believe that it is important to understand the constitutional mechanism of making up the Government.

Keywords: Constitution, public authorities, ministries, Government, government resolution.

1. Introduction

So far, no similar study has been drawn up in the current doctrine[1], namely a study which aims to perform a review of the Government investiture procedure which includes a presentation of the ministries corresponding to a 4-year political program, on the structure we are proposing. Every state has its own law, in accordance with own socio-political demands, with traditions and values it proclaims[2]. The starting point in the draw up of our study was based on a social legal reality, namely in 2017 Romania had two Governments, both carried out the activity on 5-7-month term of office and now, at the beginning of 2018, we have a third Government. The difference between the two Governments of 2017 consists in the termination of the term of office, respectively Government no. 1- S. Grindeanu was dismissed by censure motion by the Parliament and Government no. 2- M. Tudose ceased the term of office by the resignation of the prime minister.

Therefore, by means of this study, we intend to analyze this situation, premise from which we start and we try to answer questions such as: are there any weaknesses in the legislation, is human factor to blame in this case, etc. Following this analysis, we hope that we can find the explanation of why there have been three governments in one year and two months. Therefore, the common point of the theoretical analysis of the subject is the constitutional procedure of Government investiture, with its components: government political program and structure of the future executive body.

The way the society evolves and the manifestation ways of the legal phenomenon will be the main indications of its efficiency[3]. The revised Constitution of Romania is a modern constitution, comparable with the European constitutions, our country having a two-chamber executive body. We have to mention that, there is a sole institution with executive powers at the European Union level, namely the European Commission[4]. The relation between European law and national law is by no means a one way road due to the primacy of the European law[5]. The [*] Lecturer PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: stefanelena@gmail.com).

[1] Dana Apostol Tofan, Critici și soluții cu privire la reglementarea Guvernului în perspectiva revizuirii Legii Fundamentale, RDP no.1/2013; Horia Diaconescu, Dan Claudiu Dănișor, Poziția Ministerului Public față de puterea executivă în dreptul unor state vest-europene și în România, Dreptul no.5/2006; Cristian Ionescu, Despre rolul constituțional al Ministerului Public, Dreptul no.6/2017; Elena Emilia Ștefan, Scurte considerații asupra răspunderii membrilor Guvernului, RDP no.2/2017, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017; Elena Emilia Ștefan, Participarea Ministerului Public la procesele de contencios administrativ, RDP no.1/2014 etc.

[2] Elena Anghel, Constant aspects of law, published in proceedings CKS-eBook 2011, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011, pp. 594 .

[3] N.Popa, I.Mihăilescu, M.Eremia, Sociologia juridică, University of Bucharest Publishing House, Bucharest, 1997, p. 7.

[4] For further details see Augustina Dumitrașcu, Roxana-Mariana Popescu, Dreptul Uniunii Europene. Sinteze și aplicații, edition II, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, p. 65 and the following.

[5] Nicolae Popa, Teoria generală a dreptului, edition 5, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, p, 108. Also, see Roxana-Mariana Popescu, Specificul aplicării prioritare a dreptului comunitar european în dreptul intern, în raport cu aplicarea prioritară a dreptului internațional, Revista Română de Drept Comunitar, no. 3/2005, pp. 11-21 and in what concerns the supremacy of the European Union law, see European Union law embraces the theory of monism, that is the existence of a single legal order which includes international law and domestic law in an unitary system[6].

2. Paper content

2.1. Government investiture

The law substantiates political administrative framework, jurisdictional hierarchy, capable of favoring for people a common and homogeneous living environment in which they can capitalize their legitimate interests[7]. The legislative branch has an important or a less important role in the formation of the executive[8]. The legitimacy of a Government depends on two cumulative factors:

a) the Government is invested by means of a legal procedure, which is strictly complied with;
b) throughout the performance of the mandate, the Government benefits from formal support, expressed by parliamentary procedures, by a majority of the members of the Parliament[9].

2.1.1. The stages of the Government investiture procedure

Stage 1 – the appointment of the candidate to the position of prime-minister

The Romanian Constitution recognized the role and historical importance of pluralism and political parties by dedicating them a place of honor within the general principles that enshrine our state as a state subject to the rule of law, democratic and social state[10].

According to the revised Constitution of Romania, art. 85 and art. 103, after the general parliamentary elections, the President of Romania calls the majority party or in its absence, all the parties represented in the Parliament, for consultation purposes, in order to appoint the candidate to the position of prime-minister of Romania. In fact, the one who has the initiative to carry out this constitutional procedure of forming the Government is the President of Romania. In recent years in Romania, there was no majority represented in Parliament, but there were unions, alliances, coalitions etc. The political groups and coalitions of political groups which are consulted by the head of the state before the appointment of the person who will form the government shall have an important role in the investiture of the prime-minister[11]. Therefore, as the doctrine provided, "pluralism is guaranteed by the Constitution[12]".

Stage 2- request of the investiture vote

The appointed candidate has available a 10-day interval when he/she has to prepare the two elements which will be submitted to the Parliament and for which the vote of confidence will be requested: respectively the government team and the program[13]. In what concerns the members of the government, they are chosen by their party based on the agreements between the parties which are members of the government coalition[14]. Of course, the appointed prime-minister has a certain influence in appointing ministers from his/her party[15].

Stage 3 - granting the investiture vote

According to the doctrine, the legislative branch of the Parliament is not limitless. It is a limited power which is exercised according to the Constitution, but also with some principles that go beyond it in its formal sense[16]. The Permanent Bureaus of the two Chambers will ensure the multiplication and distribution to the deputies and senators of the program and the list of the Government, as soon as they have been received from the candidate appointed for the position of prime-minister[17]. According to the provisions of art. 86 of the Regulation on the joint activities of the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, permanent bureaus establish the date of the joint sitting no later than 15 days after the receipt of the Government program and list, while taking measures to convene deputies and senators[18]. Deputies and senators who take part in the debates shall not be entitled to modify or supplement the program because it shall be accepted or rejected as such[19].

The members of the Parliament, who meet in joint sitting, vote under absolute majority the investiture of the Government, after the candidate has presented the

---

Augustin Fuerea, Manualul Uniunii Europene, edition VI, revised and supplemented, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, pp. 252-253.

[6] Laura Cristiana Spătaru Negură, Dreptul Uniunii Europene-o nouă tipologie juridică, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p.190.

[7] Nicolae Popa, Teoria generală a dreptului, op.cit., 2014, p. 50.

[8] I Muraru, E.S.Tănăsescu, Drept constituțional și instituții politice, edition 15, volume II, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017, p.246.

[9] Cristian Ionescu, Raporturile Parlamentului cu Guvernul și Președintele României. Comentarii constituționale, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013, p. 66.

[10] E. Niculescu, Political pluralism and multiparty, Challenges of the Knowledge Society, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest, May 16th -17th 2014, published in CKS e-book 2014, p. 315.

[11] Muraru, E.S.Tănăsescu, op.cit., p. 248.

[12] E. Niculescu, Constituțional landmarks of political pluralism, Challenges of the Knowledge Society, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest, May 17th-18th 2013, published in CKS e-book 2013, pp. 577-583.

[13] V. Vedinaș, Drept administrativ, edition IV, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2009, p. 330.

[14] Muraru E.S.Tănăsescu, op.cit., 149.

[15] Idem, p. 149.

[16] D. C. Dănișor, I. Dogaru, Ghe. Dănișor, Teoria generală a dreptului, edition 2, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008, p. 494.

[17] C.S.Săraru, Drept administrativ. Probleme fundamentale ale dreptului public, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p. 604.

[18] Ibidem, p. 604.

[19] C. Ionescu, op.cit., p. 84.

political government program and after every proposed future minister has passed the hearing of the specialized commissions who give an advisory opinion. Granting the vote of confidence shall entail the following consequences:

- The program turns into political government program;
- The list of proposals on the future government team, nominated by the resolution of the Parliament for the granting of the vote of investiture shall become mandatory for the president, who shall be bound to appoint the Government by means of a decree[20].

Stage 4 – the appointment by the President of the Government approved in the Parliament and the swearing into office

Two legal situations occur within this stage, namely:

- the head of the state signs the decree for the appointment of the Government, as approved by the Parliament and
- every minister swears into office before the head of the state, as provided by the Constitution.

The date of the oath is the date as of which the Government in its entirety and every member of it exercises its term of office[21].

2.1.2. Government political program and list

The legislation on the structure of the Government consists of the following: Constitution of Romania and Law no. 90/2001 on the organization and functioning of the Government and of the ministries[22].

In what concerns the structure of the Government, according to art. 102 para. (3) of the revised Constitution of Romania, the Government consists of: the "prime-minister, ministers and other members as established by the organic law". Law no. 90/2001 (...) provides that: "the Government consists of the prime-minister and ministers. The Government can also include the deputy prime-minister, Minister of State and Ministers-delegate, with special assignments granted by the prime-minister, provided in the Government list presented to the Parliament for the vote of confidence". The deputy prime-minister has available an own working apparatus, which is part of the working apparatus of the Government and coordinates the authorities provided for by art. 3 par. (30 of Law no. 90/2001, (...)[23].

In what concerns government program, according art. 103 of the revised Constitution of Romania includes two provisions on this subject matter, namely:

"(2) The candidate to the office of Prime Minister shall, within ten days as of his/her designation, seek the vote of confidence of Parliament upon the program and complete list of the Government.

(3) The program and list of the Government shall be debated upon by the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, in joint sitting. Parliament shall grant confidence to the Government by a majority vote of the Deputies and Senators".

Obviously, when finalizing the program, the opinions of the candidate for the position of prime-minister, as well as those of the future ministers will be taken into account for the areas where they will be assigned tasks, if the Parliament accepts the Government program and list[24]. The government program will be the mirror of the political program that the respective party proposed and supported in the electoral campaign and for the implementation of which requested the votes of the poll[25].

The current Government follows the 2018-2020 political program, which is a public document, being also available online on the executive page[26]. Again, the constitutional provisions on the investiture of the Government, an authority of the central public administration[27] were fulfilled with due to the fact we have the executive in office. In our law system, as the doctrine provided, "the obligation on the fulfillment of the rules of law is ensured, if required, by the coercive force of the state[28]".

The current Government of Romania, configuration 2018-2020, consists of a Prime-Minister, four deputy prime-ministers: 1.) deputy prime-minister and the minister for regional development and public administration; 2) deputy prime-minister and the minister of environment; 3.) deputy prime-minister for the implementation of strategic partnerships of Romania; 4.) deputy prime-minister and the following ministries: 1) Ministry of Regional Development and Public Administration; 2.) Ministry of Environment; 3.) Ministry of the Interior; 4.) Ministry of External Affairs; 5.) Ministry of National Defense; 6.) Ministry of Public Finance; 7.) Ministry of Justice; 8.) Ministry of Agriculture and Rural Development; 9.) Ministry of National Education; 10.) Ministry of Labor and Social Justice; 11.) Ministry of Economy; 12.) Ministry of Energy; 13.) Ministry of Transport; 14) Ministry of European Funds 15.) Ministry for Business Environment Commerce & Entrepreneurship; 16.) Ministry of Health; 17.) Ministry of Culture and

[20] V.Vedinaș, op.cit., p. 330

[21] R.N.Petrescu, op.cit., p. 79.

[22] Law no. 90/2001 on the organization and functioning of the Government and ministries, published in Official Journal no. 164 of April 2nd, 2001, as further amended and supplemented.

[23] R.N.Petrescu, op.cit., p. 80.

[24] Cristian Ionescu, op.cit., p. 82.

[25] Ibidem, p. 82.

[26] See: http://gov.ro/ro/obiective/programul-de-guvernare-2018-2020, accessed on 11.02.2018.

[27] In what concerns the term of "public administration" see, Roxana Mariana Popescu, Jurisprudența CJUE cu privire la noțiunea de „administrație publică" utilizată în art. 45 alin. (4) TFUE, published in proceeding CKS ebook 2017, pp. 528-532.

[28] Roxana Mariana Popescu, Introducere în dreptul Uniunii Europene, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011, p.12.

National Identity; 18.) Ministry of Waters and Forests; 19.) Ministry of Research and Innovation; 20.) Ministry of Communications and Information Society; 21.) Ministry of Youth and Sport; 22.) Ministry of Tourism; 23.) Ministry for Romanians Abroad; 24.) Ministry for Liaison with Parliament; 25.) Minister-delegate for European Affairs.

2.2. Case study – ministries of current Government

In order to meet the scope of this study that we proposed at the very beginning, we will present selectively information on certain ministries.

Ministry for Liaison with Parliament

One of the ministries of the current executive is the Ministry for Liaison with Parliament. It was established by Government Resolution no. 22/2017 for the organization and functioning of the Ministry for Liaison with Parliament[29]. The Ministry for Liaison with Parliament is a specialized body of the central public administration, with legal status, subordinated to the Government. This ensures and coordinates the performance of the activities within the constitutional relationships between the Government and the Parliament. In order to fulfill its duties, the Ministry is entitled to request information from the ministries, from the other authorities of the central or local public administration, as well as from the other public institutions.

According to the Regulation on the organization and functioning of the Ministry for Liaison with Parliament approved by Order no. 160/MRP/18.05.2017[30] the ministry is headed by the Minister for Liaison with Parliament, member of the Government, minister who has the capacity of main credit release authority. In the ministry coordination and representation, the minister is assisted by two secretaries of state, two secretaries general and a deputy secretary general. The personnel required for the performance of the activity of the ministry consists of public servants and of contractual personnel.

Ministry for Romanians Abroad

The Ministry for Romanians Abroad was established by Government Resolution no. 17/2017 on the organization and functioning of the Ministry for Romanians Abroad (...)[31] and has available a dedicated web page[32].

The Ministry for Romanians Abroad issues and applies the policy of the Romanian state in the field of the relationships with Romanians abroad under the meaning assigned to this term by Law no.299/2007 on the support provided to Romanians abroad[33] and acts to strengthen the relations with them and to preserve, develop and express their ethnic, cultural, linguistic and religious identity, under the fulfillment of the legislation of the state of which citizens or residents are, as well as in accordance with the relevant international regulations.

The phrase "Romanians abroad", according to the provisions of art. 1 letter a) of Law no. 299/2007 on the support granted to Romanians abroad refers to: "Romanian persons, as well as to those belonging to the Romanian cultural area outside Romania."

Institute "Eudoxiu Hurmuzachi" for Romanians abroad is a public national institution, with own legal status, subordinated to the Ministry for Romanians Abroad. The activity of the Institute is performed based on an annual plan of activities, which is subject to the approval of the minister until January 30th. Institute "Eudoxiu Hurmuzachi" for Romanians abroad is financed from own income and from state budget grants. The General Manager and the Deputy General Manager of Institute "Eudoxiu Hurmuzachi" for Romanians abroad are issued and appointed by the order of the Minister for Romanians abroad, under the terms of the law.

3. Conclusions

As A.Iorgovan showed, the government investiture is the complex of legal acts and deeds, as well as the appropriate procedures, provided by the Constitution in order to have a legal and legitimate government team[34]. From this point of view, the legislation on the forming of the Government has been observed in our country. We agree with the doctrine which provides that "no state has a legislation valid for all times"[35]. Despite this, the fact that we had three governments in one year does not mean a weakness of the legislation, but the loss of majority political support, based on the principle regarding the investiture procedure symmetry. If in public law the term of office terminates by specific means, as opposed to private law where we speak about insolvency[36], which cannot be applied in case of the termination of the Government

[29] Government Resolution no. 22/2017 for the organization and functioning of the Ministry for Liaison with Parliament, published in Official Journal no.49 of January 17th, 2017.

[30] See: http://mrp.gov.ro/web/organizare/regulament-de-organizare-si-functionare/, accessed on 08.02.2018.

[31] Government Resolution no. 17/2017 on the organization and functioning of the Ministry for Romanians Abroad and for the amendment and supplementation of Government Resolution no. 857/2013 on the organization and functioning of Institute Eudoxiu Hurmuzachi for Romanian abroad published in Official Journal no. 46 of January 17th, 2017.

[32] See: http://www.mprp.gov.ro/web/, accessed on 12.02.2018.

[33] Law no. 299/2007 on the support granted to Romanians abroad, republished in Official Journal no. 261 of April 22nd, 2009.

[34] A.Iorgovan, Tratat de drept administrativ, vol I, All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2005, p. 370.

[35] Laura-Cristiana Spătaru-Negură, Old and New Legal Typologies, published in proceedings CKS-eBook 2014, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, p. 354.

[36] For further details on international insolvency see G.Fierbințeanu, V.Nemeș, A new approach in cross border cases- Regulation (EU) no 2015/848 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 20 may 2015 on insolvency proceedings (recast)?, published in CKS-ebook 2017, pp. 227-233. See: http://cks.univnt.ro/cks_2017_archive/cks_2017_articles.html, accessed on 12.02.2018.

term of office, although this would be an interesting subject to analyze on the future.

Therefore, the current Government is quite large in its composition, but the large number of ministers is not necessarily a successful formula in fulfilling a 4-year term of office if there is no political support.

References

- Elena Anghel, Constant aspects of law, in proceedings CKS-eBook 2011, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011
- D. C.Dănișor, I. Dogaru, Ghe. Dănișor, Teoria generală a dreptului, edition 2, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2008
- Horia Diaconescu, Dan Claudiu Dănișor, Poziția Ministerului Public față de puterea executivă în dreptul unor state vest-europene și în România, Dreptul no.5/2006
- Augustina Dumitrașcu, Roxana-Mariana Popescu, Dreptul Uniunii Europene. Sinteze și aplicații, edition II, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015
- G.Fierbințeanu, V.Nemeș, A new approach in cross border cases- Regulation (EU) no 2015/848 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 20 may 2015 on insolvency proceedings (recast)?, in CKS-ebook 2017, pp.227-233
- Augustin Fuerea, Manualul Uniunii Europene, edition VI, revised and supplemented, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016
- Cristian Ionescu, Raporturile Parlamentului cu Guvernul și Președintele României. Comentarii constituționale, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013
- Cristian Ionescu, Despre rolul constituțional al Ministerului Public, Dreptul no.6/2017
- A.Iorgovan, Tratat de drept administrativ, vol I, All Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2005
- E. Niculescu, Political pluralism and multiparty, Challenges of the Knowledge Society, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest, May 16th -17th 2014, publicat în CKS e-book 2014
- E. Niculescu, Constituțional landmarks of political pluralism, Challenges of the Knowledge Society, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest, May 17th-18th 2013, published in CKS e-book 2013
- Nicolae Popa, Teoria generală a dreptului, edition 5, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014
- N.Popa, I.Mihăilescu, M.Eremia, Sociologia juridică, University of Bucharest Publishing House, Bucharest, 1997
- Roxana-Mariana Popescu, Specificul aplicării prioritare a dreptului comunitar european în dreptul intern, în raport cu aplicarea prioritară a dreptului internațional, Revista Română de Drept Comunitar, no. 3/2005
- Roxana Mariana Popescu, Jurisprudența CJUE cu privire la noțiunea de „administrație publică" utilizată în art. 45 alin. (4) TFUE, in proceeding CKS ebook 2017
- Roxana Mariana Popescu, Introducere în dreptul Uniunii Europene, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011
- C.S.Săraru, Drept administrativ. Probleme fundamentale ale dreptului public, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016
- Laura Cristiana Spătaru Negură, Dreptul Uniunii Europene-o nouă tipologie juridică, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest
- Laura-Cristiana Spătaru-Negură, Old and New Legal Typologies, in proceedings CKS-eBook 2014, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest
- Elena Emilia Ștefan, Scurte considerații asupra răspunderii membrilor Guvernului, RDP no.2/2017, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017
- Elena Emilia Ștefan, Participarea Ministerului Public la procesele de contencios administrativ, RDP no.1/2014
- Muraru, E.S.Tănăsescu, Drept constituțional și instituții politice, edition 15, volume II, C.H.Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2017
- Dana Apostol Tofan, Critici și soluții cu privire la reglementarea Guvernului în perspectiva revizuirii Legii Fundamentale, RDP no.1/2013
- V. Vedinaș, Drept administrativ, edition IV, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2009
- Constitution
- Law no. 299/2007 on the support granted to Romanians abroad, republished in Official Journal no. 261 of April 22nd, 2009
- Law no. 90/2001 on the organization and functioning of the Government and ministries, published in Official Journal no. 164 of April 2nd, 2001, as further amended and supplemented
- Government Resolution no. 22/2017 for the organization and functioning of the Ministry for Liaison with Parliament, published in Official Journal no.49 of January 17th, 2017
- Government Resolution no. 17/2017 on the organization and functioning of the Ministry for Romanians Abroad and for the amendment and supplementation of Government Resolution no. 857/2013 on the organization and functioning of Institute Eudoxiu Hurmuzachi for Romanian abroad published in Official Journal no. 46 of January 17th, 2017
- http://cks.univnt.ro/cks_2017_archive/cks_2017_articles.html, accessed on 12.02.2018
- http://www.mprp.gov.ro/web/, accessed on 12.02.2018
- http://mrp.gov.ro/web/organizare/regulament-de-organizare-si-functionare/, accessed on 08.02.2018
- http://gov.ro/ro/obiective/programul-de-guvernare-2018-2020, accessed on 11.02.2018

EMERGING LEGAL ISSUES REGARDING CIVILIAN DRONE USAGE

Andrei-Alexandru STOICA*

Abstract

Unmanned vehicles are becoming a common sighting in our day-to-day life and are soon going to become an important economic drive in creating workspaces and help achieve new milestones in human activities. As such, the technology revolving around the unmanned vehicles will push itself as much as it's needed but with each achievement in the field of robotics a legal issue arises around how to use the newly acquired piece of technology in a public or private space and whether or not should such a technology be placed under a strict governmental control.

As the saying by Prof. Henry W. Haynes (1879) goes "The possession of great powers and capacity for good implies equally great responsibilities in their employment. Where so much has been given much is required." so does an unmanned vehicle and its operator must follow a degree of legal guidelines on how to properly use the gadget and to also to understand the legal limitations when interacting with other entities.

This paper will focus on identifying and answering some legal issues regarding what is required for a drone to fly over an identifiable space, but also if the operator must have a document that was conferred by a state to acknowledge the skills of the pilot or should a software limitation be in place for national security safeguards. The paper will also tackle the issue of identifying legal documents from different states that can be applied to drone flight operations and also if different states have adopted sanctions to persons who did not abide to said legal norms.

Keywords: uav, pilot license, air laws, examination, drones.

1. Facts and legal issues regarding unmanned vehicles.

1.1. Introduction and facts regarding the legality of unmanned vehicles.

The progress of robotics and communications technology has drawn a point in which the average consumer now has the possibility to acquire unmanned drones and use them in their day-today life. This progress however brings forth new social and legal issues such as operator liability, privacy violations, certification requirements and new mulct or crimes to be classified.

Even at this stage of the technology, lawmakers must be ready to tackle future modes of transportation of passengers and cargo by unmanned vehicles, as such a new phenomenon of remote controlled devices will bring forth new social services that must be covered by laws.

Current drone technology only allows the drone to be handled by a remote pilot, who can either be a lone operator or comprised of a team operators, who operators the unmanned vehicle based on the data that is being gathered from its camera, sensors and satellite connection. A second type of unmanned vehicle is based on self-management and self-guidance, on the basis of pre-programmed instructions, machine learning or even artificial intelligence[1]. The later type of unmanned vehicles is a newly formed category that is based on automation and as such can only accomplish tasks within programmed limits.

The focus of this paper will be mainly on unmanned aerial vehicles and their legal status and situation based on current aircraft regulatory regime. While aircraft regulations may seem well established, drones offer a different approach to a traditional legal branch and bring a plethora of new situations which require either a new understanding of the older legal provisions or must be accompanied with new legal regulations based on their current and short-term future prospects.

The first time the concept of unmanned aerial vehicles was handled by the Protocol amending the Paris Convention (1929)[2] in the context of unmanned balloons that were developed and used both scientifically and military. Later, small planes were remote controlled and used with the same objectives in mind, but had shortcomings when range and fuel autonomy was taken into consideration.

As such, the Chicago Convention on International Civil Aviation[3] recognizes unmanned aerial vehicles under article 8[4] and establishes a positive obligation

* PhD. Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: stoica.andrei.alexandru@gmail.com).

[1] Kristian Bernauw, Drones: The emerging era of unmanned aviation, University of Ghent, Belgium, UDK: 347.823.37(497.5) 341.24:347.823.3 Prethodno znanstveno priopćenje Primljeno: kolovoz 2015, pg. 227-228.

[2] Convention relating to the Regulation of Air Navigation (1919), article 15 was amended in 1933 with the following provision: "No aircraft of a contracting State capable of being flown without a pilot shall, except by special authorization, fly without a pilot over the territory of another contracting State".

[3] 4.04.1947, International Civil Aviation Organization.

[4] No aircraft capable of being flown without a pilot aircraft shall be flown without a pilot over the territory of a contracting State without special authorization by that State and in accordance with the terms of euch authorization. Each contracting State undertake8 to insure that the flight of such aircraft without a pilot in regions open to civil aircraft shall be so controlled as to obviate danger to civil aircraft towards states to ensure that such flights will be conducted without endangering other civilian aircraft. The requirement for drones in this case should be to at least be registered to an individual, a legal entity or even to a governmental body, but just this condition has proven that it can be difficult to achieve or lackluster when accidents happen, this being taken under consideration as Annex 7 to the Chicago Convention established the requirement for states to have a national aircraft register[5]. For civilian aircraft accidents to even be considered a registry must exist and drones have been considered being registered to said registry to benefit from compensation clauses, as article 1 of the Convention on Damage Caused by Foreign Aircraft to Third Parties on the Surface[6] dictates.

To ensure that drones are flying in such a manner that allows for compensation in case of accidents and discourage unmorally conduct is by introducing a legal obligation for operators to be licensed, registered and have a minimal understanding of safety laws and procedures, similarly to how a person acquires a driving license for a car or a plane.

The only drawback of the Chicago Convention is that of not being able to foresee the rise of autonomous drones and semi-intelligent software, as such the convention only covers drones that are piloted by a human operator and not guided by one through a software interface. However, the International Civil Aviation Organization (henceforth will be abbreviated I.C.A.O.) has been active as of 2006 in recognizing the impact of unmanned vehicles and started developing legal guidelines for members to integrate in their national legal system.

I.C.A.O. had two informal meetings in 2006 and 2007 in order to develop standards regarding drone operations and started a collaboration with the European Organization for Civil Aviation Equipment and the Radio Technical Commission for Aeronautics in order to fully grasp how drones operate and to have a lager vision on how the technology might evolve later on[7].

The most important regulatory work is the inclusion of fully autonomous drones under the definition of article 8 of the Chicago Convention, as it was endorsed in the 35th Session of the I.C.A.O. Assembly[8] and as such ensuring that states will have to tackle this issue in their own national legislation. With this inclusion, a proper definition of the concept can be understood as „An unmanned aerial vehicle is a pilotless aircraft, in the sense of Article 8 of the Convention on International Civil Aviation, which is flown without a pilot-in-command on-board and is either remotely and fully controlled from another place (ground, another aircraft, space) or programmed and fully autonomous"[9].

Despite having guidelines on how drones should operate and how air space should be segregated to accommodate the new devices, states still have issues in implementing these principles and standards and sometimes require trial-and-error to grasp the real issues that drones bring forth.

However, the European Union acknowledges the ongoing need to regulate drones, this being a common strategy as the Riga Declaration[10] claims in the opening statement regarding principles: „Drones need to be treated as new types of aircraft with proportionate rules based on the risk of each operation" with rules being simple and performance based. As such, the European Union launched on the 7th of December 2015 the Aviation Strategy which will gather amendments from anyone interested and have a formal debate in the European Parliament on how the final regulatory document should handle drones. The current agenda supports a spring 2018 deadline for amendments and proposals followed by the formal debate[11].

This is however lackluster since by 2014 there were 87 states from around the world that were developing drones or were already owning civilian and military drones and doing operations on a regulatory basis[12] and as such not everyone was ready to discuss and adopt an international legal binding document on how unmanned vehicles should operate.

1.2. Standards and practices for unmanned vehicles.

To help states integrate unmanned aerial vehicles in non-segregated airspace I.C.A.O. developed guidelines that were integrated into the Manual on Remotely Piloted Aircraft Systems[13] which reinstates that "Each contracting State undertakes to adopt measures to insure that every aircraft flying over or maneuvering within its territory and that every aircraft carrying its nationality mark, wherever such aircraft may be, shall comply with the rules and regulations relating to the flight and maneuver of aircraft there in force. Each contracting State undertakes to keep its own regulations in these respects uniform, to the greatest possible extent, with those established from time to time under this Convention. Over the high seas, the rules in force shall be those established under this

[5] Tabel 1 of Annex 7 to the Chicago Convention.
[6] Rome, 7.10.1952.
[7] ICAO, Unmanned aircraft systems, Cir 328 AN/190, pg. 1-2, ISBN 978-92-9231-751-5.
[8] Global Air Traffic Management Operational Concept (Doc 9854), First Ed., I.C.A.O, Apendix B.
[9] See note 8, pg. 42.
[10] Riga Declaration on Remotely Piloted Aircraft (drones) "FRAMING THE FUTURE OF AVIATION" Riga - 6 March 2015, European Council.
[11] Information was gathered from http://www.consilium.europa.eu/en/press/press-releases/2017/12/22/updated-aviation-safety-rules-and-new-rules-on-drones-approved-by-the-council/.
[12] Michael Shank and Elizabeth Beavers, Sign a drone treaty before everyone does as we do, USNews, 04.02.2014.
[13] ICAO Document nr. 10019 AN/507, First Ed. 2015.

Convention. Each contracting State undertakes to insure the prosecution of all persons violating the regulations applicable."[14] As such article 12 requires states to adopt legal provisions to ensure that unmanned aerial vehicles are being flown under principles that govern public safety and transparent liability.

Furthermore, the manual offers an insight to what drones should require to be air ready based on what documentation is required for a civilian airplane, that being: a certificate of registration, certificate of airworthiness, a license for each member of the crew, a log book, a radio, and other requirements that are based on its capability (if it can carry passengers or goods)[15]. Regarding the certificate of airworthiness, this is a requirement that is only required if the device is capable of doing international flights and as such is not a requirement for internal drone flights and also the manual states that the license to fly a drone is not needed.

However, the problem of the drones is exactly the lack of a license to fly, since a lot of drones can easily be acquired from the market and be used right out of the box without any prior knowledge or safety checks. The lack of a proper course in air safety can be a decisive moment between a fatal accident and a safe conduct.

Furthermore, drones do not abide to the general type of operation that the Chicago Convention regulates, meaning that it does not follow a general commercial air transport operation paradigm or even that of the general aviation operation (corporate or aerial work).

Articles 8, 12 and 20[16] from the Chicago Convention establish the need for drone registration to be done similarly to an identification plate on a car, this being a sign of the drones nationality and that it is under the supervision of a state or more states. The obligation requires that the license plate (markings) to be placed in a prominent position or affixed conspicuously to the exterior. The markings are to be obtained after registration in a national database and be fixed, preferably, by the registrar.

The manual also covers the need for a certification for operators, but the requirement is only limited to commercial operators or to those who can conduct operations as services and must be contracted in this manner. Furthermore, the operator must ensure that all employees are familiar with the laws, regulations and procedures applicable to the performance of their duties, prescribed for the areas to be traversed, the aerodromes to be used and the air navigation facilities relating thereto, and operations must be conducted only under safe conditions and under operational control of the operator. The manual also recommends that responsibility for operational control should only be delegated to the remote pilot-in-command (PIC) and to a flight operations officer/flight dispatcher if an operator's approved method of control and supervision of flight operations requires the use of flight operations officer/flight dispatcher personnel[17].

The certification should contain the name of the state of the operator, a number and an expiration date, the name of the operator, contact details and signature of the governmental or private body that has provided certification, types of operations that are authorized, models of unmanned vehicles that can be operated and airspace categories that can be used accordingly. According to I.C.A.O. Assembly Resolution A38-12[18] certifications that are remitted according to international requirements are also recognized by other states without further need towards obtaining a new certification of the same class or category.

Furthermore, the Manual requires that licensed (certified) operators must hold a series of documents in order to conduct safe operations, these are represented by the present manual are not limited to the following[19]: the certificate of operations, operations specifics to the vehicle model, operations manual, flight manual, maintenance control manual, insurance, the registry certification, air worthiness certification (if its conducting international operations), certification for special components, radio license, noise certification, special loads certification and cargo manifest.

After the operator has launched an operation, he must have a certified copy of the license on him, a certified copy of registry paper, a certified copy of the air worthiness certification, license for each pilot/operator in certified copy, a log book, operation specifics, cargo manifest and special documentation for dangerous goods, noise certification and radio license, and also the operation must be accompanied with a flight manual in order to help during situations.

The operator is also responsible[20] for the maintenance of the vehicle and its components and also have on hand emergency equipment for servicing the flight or emergency situations. The manual recommends that commercial flights should only be allowed after a maintenance organization approves the flight and should be done as accordingly to a maintenance control manual that the state of registry has provided. Besides such a manual, a maintenance log book should be kept by the operator and also the operator must record modifications and repairs done to the vehicle.

Also, human resource management must be kept in check and encouraged since the remote flight crew

[14] Article 12 of the Chicago Convention,
[15] Pg. 6 of the Manual on Remotely Piloted Aircraft Systems.
[16] Every aircraft engaged in international air navigation shall bear its appropriate nationality and registration marks.
[17] Pg. 55-56 of the Manual on Remotely Piloted Aircraft Systems.
[18] Consolidated statement of continuing ICAO policies and associated practices related specifically to air navigation, 24.09-04.10.2013.
[19] Chapter 6.6, pg. 60-62 of the Manual on Remotely Piloted Aircraft Systems.
[20] Chapter 6.8, pg. 65-68 of the Manual on Remotely Piloted Aircraft Systems.

must be prepared with ongoing courses for knowledge and skills on operational procedures, coordination and handover procedures, abnormal and emergency situations, situational awareness and human performance indicators for threats and errors that may occur during flight. Also, the human resource management must be able to cope with fatigue and must grasp the risks and mitigation techniques for fatigue.

In addition[21], Chapter 8 of the Manual addresses one of the main issues regarding drone pilots, an issue in which they have to follow the same responsibilities and guiding principles as regular pilots meaning that they must abide to national and international air law. The manual opens up with a theory that in the future a single license will be able to cover all types of scenarios but will feature ratings, limitations and endorsements. Also, the manual does not apply to people who own and use drones as sports or recreational devices, however national legislation will have to include a degree of control on flight patterns and areas and also the category of drones that can be used in said areas.

The license will be issued or rendered valid by a legally based authority within the registrar state. The I.C.A.O. Manual addresses a key issue regarding the pilot license that can be obtained, meaning that he must have a medical assessment, an observer competency proof (if its needed), proof regarding experience and a special licenses for international flights. Also a minimum age is considered for obtaining a drone pilot license, as such it is considered that the age of 18 is appropriate.

Additionally, the guidelines offer the registrar state the possibility to organize examinations in order to award the pilot license and also a courses for safety operations and air safety, conducted by authorized instructors. The examination should have a theoretical knowledge examination and a practical skill test. The theoretical exam should at least cover subjects such as air law, general knowledge regarding drones, flight management, human performance, meteorology, navigation, radiotelephony and the principles of flight, while the practical test should focus on threat and error management, maneuvers, airmanship, drone controls.

Since the aforementioned manual is not legally binding member states to I.C.A.O. are not obliged to follow these guidelines, but they can implement some aspects in order to deter unlawful conduct and to prevent fatal accidents.

However, not all states have adopted a licensing procedure for pilots beyond that of doing a simple registration of the device and applying the markings on the drone. For the most part, the United States of America and European Union offer a small informational brochure regarding dos and don'ts in drone operations for civilians[22]. The informative material has common elements, even thou there are two distinct systems, and focuses mainly on what is prohibited with civilian drone operations.

Both administrative and legal systems consider as guiding principles for drone operations the following: safety checks before operations, applying and obtaining drone insurance, respecting private property and privacy laws, no operations near airports or crowded areas, always have the drone in sight and do not operate changes to the drone. While the I.C.A.O. Manual recommends the starting age for drone pilots should be 18, both the European Union and the United States of America offer the possibility for drone operators to obtain their license at the earliest of age 16.

This is however tied to drone tiers that are based on the weight of the device, manufacturer specifications and risk involved[23] and so it includes an open category that can be used by anyone without any certification, but requires the user to be at least 14 years old, and also a specific and certified category that requires prior certification depending on the type of drone that will be operated. The drones are to be registered if they pass the 250 grams mark and require special registration and certification if they pass the 55 kilogram mark[24], a similar approach is also available in the European Union[25]. If a drone is under the 250 grams mark, it will not be subject to any registration requirements or pilot licensing, the only rule is that of following the core principles of flight as established by the aviation administration authority.

2. Solutions and proposals in deterring unlawful drone operations.

2.1. Certifications and flight approvals approved by aviation authorities.

Starting with 2016 the Federal Aviation Administration in the U.S.A. introduced the Remote Pilot Knowledge Test that focuses on aspects such as regulations, airspace and requirements, weather, performance and operations, and is organized as a 2 hour written exam with a 60 question paper with only one possible answer and can require that the participant to have maps or charts on hand, while having a minimum of 70% of the questions needed to pass (42

[21] Chapter 8 of the Manual, pg. 73-76.

[22] Brochure for the European Union available at the following link: https://www.easa.europa.eu/sites/default/files/dfu/213888_EASA_DRONE_POSTER___v5.pdf and information for flying a drone in the U.S.A. can be read at the following website: https://www.faa.gov/uas/getting_started/.

[23] European Aviation Safety Agency Opinion 01/2018 – can be accessed at the following address: https://www.easa.europa.eu/document-library/opinions/opinion-012018.

[24] Section 336 from the Federal Aviation Administration.

[25] Julia Fioretti, EU agrees registration for drones, downloads of flight recordings, Reuters, 30.11.2017.

out of 60 questions must be answered correctly)[26]. The test must be repeated once every 24 months and must also be accompanied by a vetting by the security administration on transports.

The only exception to the examination is considered those who fly model aircraft and those who have drones under the 250 grams mark. Persons who are already licensed pilots for manned aircraft can also receive the drone certification without the need to pass the test but have to get their accreditation validated by a drone instructor beforehand.

In Romania, the Civil Aviation Agency published an informative brochure[27] regarding drone flight requirements and it's based on the Navigation Directive D.N. 14-02-001[28]. The document states that a certification of identification, a national permit to fly for drones with a mass of over 15 kilograms, insurance, approval for operations for general flights and a very special approval if the flight is done over the Danube Delta.

Regarding the aforementioned approval, Romania has an interesting approach in limiting drones over its skies, meaning that operators must reserve a portion of the airspace and must be requested with at least 45 days before the operation. Furthermore, if the drone is equipped with a camera, then the operator must request a special authorization from the Ministry of Defense of Romania that can be obtained anywhere from 1-30 days after submission. The only exceptions from these specifics are similar to other legal systems, meaning that model aircraft are exempted and also any other drone under 1 kilogram in mass if it only operates in no populated areas and contains no filming or data transmission devices. Currently there are no exams needed in order to fly a drone but there are some authorized flight instructors.

The European Air Safety Agency does not issue pilot licenses, this is reserved to member states that can issue such documents, but must be done under the guidelines established by the agency[29]. For example, the United Kingdom implements the I.C.A.O. Manual and the European Air Safety Agency Regulation[30] in order to restrict unlawful drone flights by requiring permits for operators. These permits are valid for 12 months and applies to both indoor and outdoor operations.

Under current guidelines, drone operators in the United Kingdom must comply with a series of requirements in order to operate, as such if the drone is under 20 kilograms then the operator must have an operating permission and a pilot qualification, but only if the operator is doing aerial work[31], if not, then the casual operator is exempted from this rule. If the total weight of the devices is more than 20 kilograms, then the operator will require a registration and airworthiness certificate[32]. A permission only addresses the flight safety aspects of the flight operation and does not constitute permission to disregard the legitimate interests of other statutory bodies such as the Police and Emergency Services, the Highway Agency, Data Commission or other authorities.

However, all drone operators must comply with the Regulation (EC) 785/2004 on Insurance Requirements for Air Carriers and Aircraft Operators[33] and as such must acquire a minimum insurance based on the device in question. The Regulation exempts from this requirement the following unmanned aircraft: model aircraft and drones that are under 500 kilograms that have no commercial purpose or are being used in local flight instruction. Also, the operators must abide to the visual line of sight principle, meaning that they can only operate at a distance of 500 horizontally and 400 feet vertically, but these ranges can be extended if the owner is a holder of special certifications or the aviation authority has approved an exempt for a situation.

In the United Kingdom a license exam has not been introduced officially as it is awaiting for a proper regulation by the European agency, however users who partake in aerial work must have a small unmanned aerial vehicle permission that can be obtained only after a course organized by a drone instructor has been undergone and a certificate was given to them.

Other European Union member states have adopted internal regulations as placeholders till a proper legal document is adopted, as such France is considered a pioneer[34] with the Creation and Use Orders that came into force in early 2016, both orders aiming at limiting the numbers of drones in the sky and also the number of drones being manufactured and their development. French laws also introduce a category that the current European legislation does not provide a [26] Part 107 of the Federal Aviation Regulations is the written drone knowledge exam introduced in order to limit the number of commercial and civilian drones in the sky, information can be accesed at the following website: https://www.faa.gov/news/fact_sheets/news_story.cfm?newsId=20516.

[27] Material can be read at the following link: http://www.caa.ro/media/docs/Guidance_material_Unmanned_Aerial_Vehicles.pdf.

[28] Which can be accessed at the following link: http://www.caa.ro/pdf/Directiva%20identificare%20UAV.pdf.

[29] E.A.S.A. informational document: https://www.easa.europa.eu/easa-and-you/general-aviation/licensing-general-aviation.

[30] As implemented by the United Kingdom in Cap 722 - Unmanned Aircraft System Operations in UK Airspace – Guidance published by the Safety and Airspace Regulation Group of the Civil Aviation Authority, 31.03.2015.

[31] Details that a flight is for the purpose of aerial work if valuable consideration is given or promised in respect of the flight or the purpose of the flight.

[32] See note 30, pg. 34-35.

[33] Official Journal of the European Union L 138/1, 30.04.2004.

[34] As stated by the legal blog lexology.com with information that can be read at the following website: https://www.lexology.com/library/detail.aspx?g=7257ad71-6f12-4c2c-bfde-ed40088fb961 and also the Library of Congress, U.S.A. has an online article that gets updated regularly: https://www.loc.gov/law/help/regulation-of-drones/france.php that was prepared by Nicolas Boring, Foreign Law Specialist, April 2016.

legal oversight and that being the particular activities situation, which is defined as something that is not hobby, competitive, commercial or experimentation. Also, to fly drones in public spaces is possible only with prefecture`s approval.

The particular activities, flight testing and competitive drone operators must also have pass a theoretical examination and must finish a practical training course (and may require up to 20 hours of drone flight), while commercial operators could also be obliged to possess additional license for a manned aircraft and at least one hundred hours of flying a manned vehicle.

Flying a drone without permission or without a license can lead to jail time to up to six months a fine of 15 000 euros (if done out of negligence) and can also lead to 1 year of jail time and a fine of 45 000 euros if the user intentionally flies the drone without permission and in a no-fly zone. The law also criminalizes drone video and photography that was done without respecting property, intellectual property and private laws, meaning that in doing so a person can face a jail time of at least one year in jail and a fine 75 000 euros.

Furthermore, the laws also require for a registration at the civil air authority and adding a license plate to the drone showing owner details and drone registration number. Manufactures must also include the force of impact from maximum height for all drones sold in France. Current legal drafts point towards electronic registrations and safety features pre-installed in drones.

2.2. Possible solutions in deterring unlawful flights.

Al-Jazeera reporters were fined and jailed for flying a drone over Paris in 2015[35] after two days of unlicensed operations and being caught by the Police without having the required documentation (license plate and registration documents) and without an approval to fly in public areas. French authorities also stated that at least 13 unauthorized drones' flights near nuclear plants were documented but nobody was found after the investigation in order to be accountable for the unauthorized flights.

Romania has started criminal investigations for at least 4 persons on the usage of drones during the February 2017 protests[36] as the drones were not registered and were flying in a crowded and public space, without special authorization. Romania has also fined unauthorized usage of drones[37] and users could also face jail time depending on the severity of their deed, as one person found after filming a local church and was fined for 5000 lei (over 1000 euros) for not registering the drone to the civil air authority and obtaining a license plate for it.

Currently, Italy and Germany have also started drone training programs aimed at limiting drones in the sky to only those who own operators flight licenses and only to those who have a minimum insurance. Germany has even introduced a take-off weight limitation and fireproof identification based on their weight as a requirement[38]. These two states are also implementing the I.C.A.O. guidelines and current European Air Safety Agency regulations in order to deter unlawful flights that can cause accidents. Without these legal requirements, accidents similar to the ones over Canada in autumn 2017[39] or early 2017 in China[40] could lead to potential catastrophic incidents in which a drone that flies in the cockpit of a much larger manned aircraft could lead to its crash and cause an unimaginable aftermath. As such, the case in China was also accompanied by the arrest of the operator, but in both cases the international agreed limit of 450 meters altitude was breached.

As a solution to these situations, states have adopted different measures of protecting no-fly zones from drones. As such United Arab Emirates[41], Japan[42] and South Korea[43] have adopted hunter drones to spot and take-out drones that are flying in protected areas and to try and identify and prosecute the owners for these situations. Other states have introduced specially trained police eagles in order to fight unlawful drone flights, but the results are mixed[44] and may require future usage and training to determine the impact in combating unauthorized flights.

Another possible solution is by introducing a theoretical examination before take-off and introduced in the drone application that comes with drone for the mobile phone camera/controller[45]. This has been implemented so far in the United States of America and United Kingdom by one of the leading drone manufactures and developers, DJI, and it forces operators to take an 8 question exam on its GO4app and based on the common-sense flight rules exam it will allow the user to either start the drone or attempt to pass the exam after the operator gained some more knowledge regarding flying under United Kingdom national legislation.

---

[35] BBC, Paris drones: Al Jazeera journalist fined 1000 euros, 3.03.2015.

[36] ProTV, Dosar penal pentru folosirea ilegala a unor drone in timpul protestelor din Piata Victoriei. 4 persoane chemate la Politie, 17.02.2017.

[37] Alin Cordos, 5000 lei amenda pentru drona folosita ilegal, ProPolitica, 22.05.2017.

[38] See note 34 for a brief mention of the laws that are referenced.

[39] Sherrise Pham, Drone hits passenger plane in Canada, CNN, 16.10.2017.

[40] Euan McKirdy, Drone's operator detained for flying near Chinese airplane, CNN, 17.01.2017.

[41] Zahraa Alkhalisi, Dubai develops a drone hunter to keep its airport open, CNN, 4.11.2016.

[42] Udi Tirosh, Japan introduces a drone hunting drone – nets rogue drones midair, Diyphotograpy.com, 15.12.2015.

[43] Jeff Daniels, Around 60.000 security forces, interceptors drones deployed to protect Pyeongchamp Olympics, CNBC, 05.02.2018.

[44] Tyler Essary, These drone-hunting eagles aren't messing around, Time, 17.02.2017; Thuy Ong, Dutch police will stop using drone-hunting eagles since they weren't doing what they're told, TheVerge, 12.12.2017.

[45] Nick Summers, DJI forces UK pilots to sit a 'knowledge quiz' before takeoff, Engadget, 21.12.2017.

Currently, the only limitation for drones is that of a geofencing system that has been implemented in order to force drones and their operators from straying in protected areas such as airports, high density urban areas or other areas, but this limitation has been hacked a number of times because of faulty security around the application that comes with the drone[46] and as such users could circumvent their way and be able to fly over the imposed limit.

3. Conclusions

Combating unlawful flights has proven a continued focus for most states, however people have adopted a stance against drones that fly over their private property and for situations where authorities failed to properly intervene.

For example, in the United States of America persons have adopted the stand-your-ground principle[47], a principle that derives from a law that designates a person's abode (or, in some states, any place legally occupied, such as a car or place of work) as a place in which the person has certain protections and immunities and allows such a person in certain circumstances, to attack an intruder instead of retreating. Typically, deadly force is considered justified homicide only in cases when the actor reasonably feared imminent peril of death or serious bodily harm to oneself or another.

This was an issue raised in front of a national court where a person shot a drone that was hovering his home, dubbing him the "Drone Slayer"[48]. Afterwards the pilot demanded a reparatory decision, but the county judge ruled that drone cases are under the competence of federal courts and as such the pilot must file another lawsuit. However, the court provided some light regarding private property limits by referring to the Supreme Court Case from 1946, Causby v. United States[49], in which the Supreme Court established that 83 feet (or 25 meters) is the maximum height limit for private property.

Some solutions to these types of privacy invaders have been considered and deployed, one of these being the DroneShield, a detector based on acoustic technology that notifies the local monitoring service if a drone comes close to the target in proximity. This device was a crowd funded gadget that soon came under military contracting and is now a piece of technology that can only be sold under the International Traffic in Arms Regulations (ITAR)[50] due to its functionality. This device was also used during the Boston Marathon in 2015, as the entire area was declared by local authorities as a no-fly zone[51].

Currently, there are lots of applications for mobile phones that showcase no-fly zones for drone users[52], but this technology has to be implemented into the drone themselves, while operators must follow training courses and eventually pass a theoretical and practical examination in order to operate drones, regardless of classification and/or weight. The I.C.A.O. Manual was published in 2015 but soon afterwards most states have started implementing it in various degrees and will implement most of its rules as they were laid out by technicians and legal practitioners around the world, being considered an international standard.

Sadly, most drone manufacturers will not implement a software based limitations to drones as it does require additional costs for software development and so will have to defer to states developing national solutions in order to deter unlawful flights. However, the automobile industry started in 1886 when Karl Benz built the first horseless carriage (the car)[53] and it was driven by people without a permit, but afterwards local authorities required people prove they can drive the car for their own safety and the safety of others and so certification was required[54] in order to drive the machine. So will drones follow suite and will abide to the I.C.A.O. regulations in order to be able to fly legally and will also require a proper insurance in case of responsibility.

References

- Kristian Bernauw, Drones: The emerging era of unmanned aviation, University of Ghent, Belgium
- Convention relating to the Regulation of Air Navigation (1919)
- Chicago Convention on International Civil Aviation (1947)
- Convention on Damage Caused by Foreign Aircraft to Third Parties on the Surface (1952)
- ICAO Circular - Cir 328 AN/190
- Global Air Traffic Management Operational Concept (Doc 9854), First Ed., ICAO
- Riga Declaration on Remotely Piloted Aircraft (drones) – 2015

[46] Lisa Vaas, Hacked drone flying up, up and away over geofencing restrictions, NakedSecurity, 18.07.2017.
[47] Mark Randall, The Castle doctrine and stand-your-ground law, Old Research Post, 24.04.2012, 2012-R-0172.
[48] Cyrus Farivar, Drone slayer cleared of charges, Arstechnica, 27.10.2015.
[49] No. 630/1.05.1946, Supreme Court of Justice.
[50] Adrianne Jeffries, The new Star Wars is still waiting on its DroneShield, TheVerge, 21.09.2014.
[51] Alan Philips, MIT Grad's Anti-Drone tech used at Boston Marathon, DroneLife, 21.04.2015.
[52] A small yet informative list can be viewed for reference here: https://dronelife.com/2017/03/14/where-can-i-fly-my-drone-these-5-apps-will-help/.
[53] Information can be accessed here: https://www.mercedes-benz.com/en/mercedes-benz/classic/history/benz-patent-motor-car/
[54] Automobile Magazine, Fast Facts: The 113-year history of the driver's license, 20.02.2012.

- Michael Shank and Elizabeth Beavers, Sign a drone treaty before everyone does as we do, USNews, 04.02.2014
- ICAO Document nr. 10019 AN/507, First Ed. 2015
- Consolidated statement of continuing ICAO policies and associated practices related specifically to air navigation, 24.09-04.10.2013
- Informative Broshure and EASA Opinion 01/2018
- Section 336, Federal Aviation Administration (USA)
- Julia Fioretti, EU agrees registration for drones, downloads of flight recordings, Reuters, 30.11.2017
- Part 107 of the Federal Aviation Regulations (USA)
- CAA (Romainia) Informative Guidelines for Drones
- Navigation Directive Romanian CAA – D.N. 14-02-001/25.02.2014
- Cap 722 - Unmanned Aircraft System Operations in UK Airspace – Guidance published by the Safety and Airspace Regulation Group of the Civil Aviation Authority, 31.03.2015
- Regulation (CE) 785/2004 - Official Journal of the European Union L 138/1, 30.04.2004
- lexology.com – legal blog and website dedicated for publishing articles
- Nicolas Boring, Regulations of Drones: France, Library of Congress, April 2016
- BBC, Paris drones: Al Jazeera journalist fined 1000 euros, 3.03.2015
- Sherrise Pham, Drone hits passenger plane in Canada, CNN, 16.10.2017
- Euan McKirdy, Drone's operator detained for flying near Chinese airplane, CNN, 17.01.2017
- Zahraa Alkhalisi, Dubai develops a drone hunter to keep its airport open, CNN, 4.11.2016
- Udi Tirosh, Japan introduces a drone hunting drone – nets rogue drones midair, Diyphotograpy.com, 15.12.2015
- Jeff Daniels, Around 60.000 security forces, interceptors drones deployed to protect Pyeongchamp Olympics, CNBC, 05.02.2018
- Nick Summers, DJI forces UK pilots to sit a 'knowledge quiz' before takeoff, Engadget, 21.12.2017
- Lisa Vaas, Hacked drone flying up, up and away over geofencing restrictions, NakedSecurity, 18.07.2017
- Mark Randall, The Castle doctrine and stand-your-ground law, Old Research Post, 24.04.2012
- Supreme Court of Justice (USA) Case No. 630/1.05.1946
- Automobile Magazine, Fast Facts: The 113-year history of the driver's license, 20.02.2012

BRIEF CONSIDERATIONS ON THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE ROMANIAN CONSTITUTIONAL COURT, THE STRASBOURG COURT AND THE LUXEMBOURG COURT

Cristina TITIRIŞCĂ*

Abstract

In 2018, our country celebrates the 11 years that have passed since Romania's accession to the European Union, this year also being a preparatory year for the Romanian presidency of the Council of the European Union. Throughout its history, Romania has undergone profound transformations, one of which being the emergence of a new constitutional order after the Revolution of 1989, represented by the 1991 Constitution, revised in 2003, which established the principles of functioning of the state governed by the rule of law, as well as its operating mechanisms. The constitutional review was assigned to the Constitutional Court, as the guarantor of the Constitution's supremacy and the sole authority of constitutional jurisdiction. The jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court has been steadily evolving, but it is indissolubly linked to that of the Strasbourg Court and that of the Luxembourg Court. The Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, on the one hand, and the Treaties establishing the European Union, as well as the European law, as interpreted by the Court of Justice of the European Union, are the benchmark elements of the constitutional review. In this context, it seems relevant to analyse the relationship between the Constitutional Court of Romania, the European Court of Human Rights and the Court of Justice of the European Union, from a theoretical perspective, but especially from a jurisprudential perspective.

Keywords: Constitutional Court, European Court of Human Rights, Court of Justice of the European Union, jurisdiction, relationship.

1. Introduction

The European Court of Human Rights and the Court of Justice of the European Union have been set up by two organizations with different goals and powers. The first of the two courts is the judicial authority of the Council of Europe, which operates as a corollary of a space of democracy and of the safeguarding of human rights. As to the Court of Justice of the European Union, essentially, its mission is to review the legality of acts of the institutions of the European Union, to ensure that Member States meet their duties resulting of the Treaties and to interpret EU law upon request of the national courts.

With regard to human rights, the powers of the two courts overlap. By way of example, we mention that, if in 2014, through the Judgment of July 16, 2014, in Case Hämäläinen v. Finland[1], the European Court of Human Rights reiterated that states are not required to recognize the marriage of same sex couples and that the definition of marriage and of the family, within the meaning of the European Convention on Human Rights is the traditional one, and that how the Member States address this issue is an internal problem, the question arises how the Court of Justice of the European Union shall adjudicate on a matter which also refers to the application of human rights, respectively on the meaning of the notion "spouse".

Under these terms, this paper, without pretending to treat exhaustively the human rights issue in relation to the two courts, addresses in a systematic manner, the way in which the Constitutional Court of Romania integrates the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and, respectively, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, into domestic law.

2. Legal framework

The legal basis of the relationship between the Romanian Constitutional Court, the Strasbourg Court and the Luxembourg Court is reflected in art. 20 and art. 148 of the Romanian Constitution, republished[2]. If

* PhD, Parliamentary advisor at the Legislative Department of the Chamber of Deputies, currently advisor at the Office of the President of the Constitutional Court, member of SRDE (e-mail: cristina_titirisca_r@yahoo.com)

[1] Source: https://hudoc.echr.coe.int/fre#{%22itemid%22:[%22001-145768%22]}

[2] According to art. 20 of the Fundamental Law, with the marginal title International treaties on human rights: „(1) Constitutional provisions concerning the citizens' rights and liberties shall be interpreted and enforced in conformity with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, with the covenants and other treaties Romania is a party to. (2) Where any inconsistencies exist between the covenants and treaties on the fundamental human rights Romania is a party to, and the national laws, the international regulations shall take precedence, unless the Constitution or national laws comprise more favourable provisions."

According to art. 148 of the Fundamental Law, with the marginal title Integration into the European Union: „(1) Romania's accession to the constituent treaties of the European Union, with a view to transferring certain powers to community institutions, as well as to exercising in common with the other member states the abilities stipulated in such treaties, shall be carried out by means of a law adopted in the joint sitting of the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, with a majority of two thirds of the number of deputies and senators. (2) As a result of the accession, the provisions of the constituent treaties of the European Union, as well as the other mandatory community regulations shall take precedence the first article was found, in a similar form, in the text of the Constitution of 1991[3], the second one was added during the revision of the Basic Law, in order to create the possibility of Romania's accession to the European Union.

As to the grounds for invoking the provisions of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union within the constitutionality control, we mention that, initially, the reporting was made to the provisions of art. 20 par. (1) of the Constitution, but, after 2009, the Constitutional Court held that it "is incorrect. The Charter, according to art. 6, par. 1 of the Consolidated Version of the Treaty on European Union, published in the Official Journal of the European Union, series C no. 84 of 30 March 2010, has the same legal value as the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty on the functioning of the European Union, which, within the meaning of art. 148 of the Constitution of Romania, are the constitutive treaties of the European Union. Therefore, within the Romanian constitutional system, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union is not covered by art. 20 of the Constitution, which refers to international treaties on human rights, so that the author of the exception should have invoked the norms of the Charter in conjunction with art. 148 of the Basic Law"[4].

3. The Constitutional Court of Romania and the Strasbourg Court

The relationship between the Romanian Constitutional Court and the European Court of Human Rights has a long history, as Romania has ratified[5] the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and its Protocols ever since 1994. Thus, since the time of the ratification of the Convention, it is a part of national law, so that any reference to any of its texts is subject to the same rules applicable at relating to the provisions of the Constitution[6]. Following the ratification, Romania undertook to respect its provisions, as well as the interpretation of the Convention given by the European Court of Human Rights, within the limits of this; otherwise, Romania would be in the situation of a party to the Convention that fails to comply with its obligations undertaken under international public law and domestic law, contrary to the provisions of art. 11 par. (1) and (2) and art. 20 par. (1) of the Constitution[7].

The beginning of invoking the provisions of the Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms within the constitutional review was carried out in a case filed in 1996 before the Constitutional Court, on the settlement on the exception of unconstitutionality of certain provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure[8]. Since then, the number of cases of alleged non-compliance with the provisions of the Convention has increased significantly, as shown in the chart below, concerning the situation of the last years[9]: Appropriately, the case-law of the Constitutional Court was significantly influenced by the judgments of the European Court of Human Rights. We can say that, nowadays, the judgments of the Constitutional Court where there isn't any reference made to the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights are becoming increasingly rare, especially if the provisions on the quality of the law, the principle of non-retroactivity of the law, the principle of equality of rights, free access to justice and the right to a fair trial or the right to defence are invoked as grounds for unconstitutionality[10].

Chart no. 1

A clarification of interest from the perspective of Romania's status as an EU member state, refers to the fact that the accession of the European Union to the Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms was launched at the same time with the entry into force, on June 1st, 2010, of the Protocol no. 14 to the Convention, that allows not only states but also international organisations, therefore, also the European Union, to become signatories to the over the opposite provisions of the national laws, in compliance with the provisions of the accession act. (3) The provisions of paragraphs (1) and (2) shall also apply accordingly for the accession to the acts revising the constituent treaties of the European Union. (4) The Parliament, the President of Romania, the Government, and the judicial authority shall guarantee that the obligations resulting from the accession act and the provisions of paragraph (2) are implemented. (5) The Government shall send to the two Chambers of the Parliament the draft mandatory acts before they are submitted to the European Union institutions for approval.";

[3] According to art. 20 of the 1991 Constitution, with the marginal title International human rights treaties: „(1) Constitutional provisions concerning the citizens' rights and liberties shall be interpreted and enforced in conformity with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, with the covenants and other treaties Romania is a party to. (2) Where any inconsistencies exist between the covenants and treaties on fundamental human rights Romania is a party to, and internal laws, the international regulations shall take precedence.";

[4] Judgment of the Constitutional Court no. 206/2012, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 254 of 17 April 2012;

[5] Law no. 30/1994, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 135 of 31 May 1994;

[6] Judgment of the Constitutional Court no. 146/2000, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 566 of 15 November 2000;

[7] Judgment of the Constitutional Court no. 233/2011, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 740 of 17 May 2011;

[8] Judgment of the Constitutional Court no. 129/1996, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 158 of 16 July 1997;

[9] Source: www.ccr.ro;

[10] For details, see, extensively, Toader and Safta, 2015, page 67 and subseq.;

Convention. It is, however, necessary for the accession to be ratified by all States party to the Convention, as well as the European Union. Negotiations between representatives of the Council of Europe and those of the European Union led to the completion of a draft agreement in April 2013.

The Court of Justice of the European Union, however, considered, in its Opinion no. 2/2013 of December 18th, 2014, that the respective project is not compatible with art. 6 par. (2) from the Treaty on European Union[11] and with Protocol no. 8 on art. 6 par. (2) of the Treaty on European Union, concerning the accession of the Union to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms[12], in that:

- it is liable adversely to affect the specific characteristics and the autonomy of EU law in so far it does not ensure coordination between Article 53 of the ECHR and Article 53 of the Charter, does not avert the risk that the principle of Member States' mutual trust under EU law may be undermined, and makes no provision in respect of the relationship between the mechanism established by Protocol No 16 and the preliminary ruling procedure provided for in Article 267 TFEU;
- it is liable to affect Article 344 TFEU in so far as it does not preclude the possibility of disputes between Member States or between Member States and the EU concerning the application of the ECHR within the scope ratione materiae of EU law being brought before the ECtHR;
- it does not lay down arrangements for the operation of the co-respondent mechanism and the procedure for the prior involvement of the Court of Justice that enable the specific characteristics of the EU and EU law to be preserved; and
- it fails to have regard to the specific characteristics of EU law with regard to the judicial review of acts, actions or omissions on the part of the EU in CFSP matters in that it entrusts the judicial review of some of those acts, actions or omissions exclusively to a non-EU body.

As a consequence, new negotiations will be required before a potential accession. At the same time, following this decision of the Court of Justice of the European Union, European citizens will continue to be able to appeal to ECHR court for ruling on decisions of national courts and on national legislation, as well as to refer questions to the Luxembourg Court, but they will not be able to lodge a complaint concerning the institutions of the European Union or the functioning of the European Union legislation.

4. The Constitutional Court of Romania and the Luxemburg Court

The relationship between the Constitutional Court of Romania and the Court of Justice of the European Union must be seen on two levels: on the one hand, we refer to the priority of the application of the European norms, namely the provisions of the EU constituent treaties and other binding Community regulations by the contrary provisions of domestic laws[13] and, on the other hand, we are considering the procedure for the preliminary questions referred to the Court of Justice of the European Union.

It should be noted, first of all, that in 2009, through the Treaty of Lisbon[14], the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union became legally binding, being given a legal value equal to that of the Treaties of the European Union, and the Union recognized the rights, freedoms and the principles laid down therein[15]. The text of the Charter was signed on December 7th, 2000, in Nice, as a reaffirmation of the conviction of the signatories that respect for human rights and fundamental values is the essential rule on which the cooperation of the European states is based upon, but, until 2009, it has functioned at a declarative level, even though, in its case-law , the Court of Justice of the European Union has used it as a source of interpretation[16]. In fact, the special significance of this document, but also the contents of its provisions have led, even since that time, for some specialists to see in [11] See, to that extent, art. 6 par. (2) of the Treaty on European Union, the consolidated version of which was published in the Official Journal of the European Union series C no. 202 of the 7 June 2016, according to which: „(2) The Union shall accede to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. Such accession shall not affect the Union's competences as defined in the Treaties.";

[12] Source: http://curia.europa.eu/juris/document/document.jsf?text=&docid=160882&pageIndex=0&doclang=RO;

[13] See, to that extent, art. 148 par. (2) of the Constitution of Romania, republished;

[14] Treaty of Lisbon amending the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty establishing the European Community, signed at Lisbon, 13 December 2007, ratified by Romania by Law no. 13/2008, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 107 of 12 February 2008;

[15] See, to that extent, art. 6 par. (1) of the Treaty on European Union, the consolidated version of which was published in the Official Journal of the European Union series C no. 202 of the 7 June 2016, according to which: „(1) The Union recognises the rights, freedoms and principles set out in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union of 7 December 2000, as adapted at Strasbourg, on 12 December 2007, which shall have the same legal value as the Treaties. The provisions of the Charter shall not extend in any way the competences of the Union as defined in the Treaties. The rights, freedoms and principles in the Charter shall be interpreted in accordance with the general provisions in Title VII of the Charter governing its interpretation and application and with due regard to the explanations referred to in the Charter, that set out the sources of those provisions.";

[16] By way of example, for cases where provisions of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union were invoked, prior to 2009, see: Judgment of 23 October 2003, case RTL Télévision GmbH c. Niedersachsische Landesmedienanstalt für privatem Rundfunk, C-245/01 (Rec.2003, p. I−12489), par. 38; Judgment of 12 May 2005, Regione autonoma Friuli−Venezia Giulia and ERSA, case C−347/03 (Rec., p. I−3785) par. 118; Judgment of 27 June 2006, European Parliament/Council, case C−540/03 (Rec., p. I−5769) par. 38; its adoption a step towards the drafting of the European Union Constitution[17].

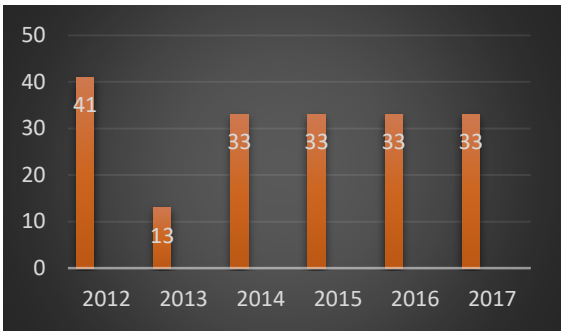
From a statistical point of view, the highlighting of the case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union, in general, and of the failure to comply with the provisions of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, in particular, in cases pending before the Constitutional Court has constantly evolved. The beginning[18] was made in 2004, in resolving an exception of unconstitutionality concerning, inter alia, the provisions of Law no. 43/2003 on financing the activity of political parties and electoral campaigns[19]. Following the ratification of the Treaty of Lisbon, the number of such cases has increased, as shown in the chart below[20]:

Chart no. 2



The beginning of the concrete application of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union within the Constitutional Court's reasoning was made in 2011, when the Court expressly provided that the provisions of the Charter "are applicable to constitutional review insofar as they assure, guarantee and develop the constitutional provisions in the field of fundamental rights, in other words, to the extent that their level of protection is at least at the level of the constitutional provisions on human rights"[21].

A particular aspect of the relationship between the Constitutional Court and the Court of Justice of the European Union, as we have stated beforehand, concerns the reference for a preliminary ruling[22], a procedure open to judges of the Member States of the European Union, which may address the Court with questions on the interpretation or validity of European law in a pending case. Thus, the preliminary questions may concern two situations[23]:

a) the reference for interpretation of the European norm (as a primary and secondary law), when the national judge asks the Court of Justice to specify a point of interpretation of the European law in order to be able to apply it correctly; and
b) the reference for the assessment of the validity of a European norm as a secondary law rule, where the national judge asks the Court of Justice to check the validity of an act of European law.

Indeed, as early as 2011, the Constitutional Court stated that "it remains at the Constitutional Court's discretion to apply, within the constitutionality review, the rulings of the Court of Justice of the European Union or to address itself preliminary questions for the purpose of determining the content of the European norm. Such an attitude is related to the cooperation between the national constitutional court and the European one, as well as to the judicial dialogue between them, without calling into question issues relating to the establishment of hierarchies between these courts"[24].

Although the procedure is widely used by the common courts, the Constitutional Court appealed to it relatively recently[25], in a case brought before the Constitutional Court in early 2016, thus joining the constitutional courts in states such as Austria, Belgium, France, Italy, Lithuania or Spain[26], who have used this procedure.

The case concerns the settlement on the exception to the unconstitutionality of the provisions of art. 277 par. (2) and (4) of the Civil Code, an exception raised by Relu Adrian Coman, Robert Clabourn Hamilton and ACCEPT Association, in a file of the 5th District Court in Bucharest – The Civil Section. The European legislative act applicable to the case is Directive 2004/38/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 29 April 2004 on the right of citizens of the [17] See, Duculescu Victor (2001), pp. 316-320;

[18] Source: www.ccr.ro;
[19] Judgment of the Constitutional Court no. 517/2004, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 49 of 14 January 2005;
[20] Source: www.ccr.ro;
[21] Judgment of the Constitutional Court no. 765/2011, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 476 of 6 July 2011;
[22] The basis of this procedure is found in the provisions of art. 267 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, the consolidated version of which was published in the Official Journal of the European Union series C no. 202 of the 7 June 2016, according to which: „The Court of Justice of the European Union shall have jurisdiction to give preliminary rulings concerning: (a) the interpretation of the Treaties; (b) the validity and interpretation of acts of the institutions, bodies, offices or agencies of the Union. Where such a question is raised before any court or tribunal of a Member State, that court or tribunal may, if it considers that a decision on the question is necessary to enable it to give judgment, request the Court to give a ruling thereon. Where any such question is raised in a case pending before a court or tribunal of a Member State against whose decisions there is no judicial remedy under national law, that court or tribunal shall bring the matter before the Court. If such a question is raised in a case pending before a court or tribunal of a Member State with regard to a person in custody, the Court of Justice of the European Union shall act with the minimum of delay." Source: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/PDF/?uri=CELEX:12012E/TXT&from=RO;
[23] Source: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/?uri=LEGISSUM%3Al14552;
[24] Judgment of the Constitutional Court no. 668/2011, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 487 of 8 July 20;
[25] Constitutional Court file no. 78D/2016. Source: www.ccr.ro;
[26] See, extensively, Toader and Safta, op. cit., page 104 and subseq.;

Union and their family members to move and reside freely within the territory of the Member States[27].

In essence, the case is a civil one and concerns the existence of a discriminatory treatment of a couple on the basis of sexual orientation, justified on the provisions of art. 277 par. (2) of the Civil Code[28], which prohibit, in Romania, the recognition of marriages between persons of the same sex, with the consequent refusal for these people, of the rights deriving from Directive 2004/38/EC on free movement of persons, consisting in granting residence rights for the reunification of the family.

Thus, the Constitutional Court has referred the following questions to the European Court of Justice:

1. The term "spouse" in art. 2(2)(a) of Directive 2004/38/EC, in conjunction with art. 7, 9, 21 and 45 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union includes the same-sex spouse from a non-EU country, of a European citizen with whom the citizen has legally married, under the law of a Member State, other than the host State?
2. If the answer to the first question is in the affirmative, then art. 3(1) and 7(1) of Directive 2004/38/EC, in conjunction with art. 7, 9, 21 and 45 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union require for the host Member State to grant the right to reside on its territory for a period longer than three months to a same-sex spouse of an EU citizen?
3. If the answer to the first question is in the negative, the same-sex spouse from a non-EU Member State, of an European citizen, with whom the citizen has legally married under the law of a Member State other than the host State, may be qualified as "any other family member, [...]" within the meaning of art. 3 par. (2) letter (a) of Directive 2004/38/EC or as a "partner with whom the Union citizen has a durable relationship, duly attested" within the meaning of art. 3 par. (2) letter (b) of Directive 2004/38/EC, with the host State's correlated obligation to facilitate his or her entry and stay, even if the host State does not recognize same-sex marriages nor does it provide for any other alternative form of legal recognition, such as registered partnerships?
4. If the answer to the third question is in the affirmative, then art. 3(2) and 7(2) of Directive 2004/38/EC, in conjunction with art. 7, 9, 21 and 45 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union require the host Member State to grant the right to reside in its territory for more than three months to a spouse of the same sex of a European citizen?

There is yet to have a ruling, at the date of this paper[29].

5. Conclusions

Currently, in Romania, just as in other member states of the European Union, the protection of the rights and fundamental freedoms is performed in a system in which they are recognized and protected by the Constitution, by the European Convention of Human Rights and by the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union. The one who implements the national and international instruments, through a "judicial dialogue", is the judge, called upon to apply the legal provisions to specific case-law.

References

- Judgment of the Constitutional Court no. 129/1996, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 158 of 16 July 1997
- Judgment of the Constitutional Court no. 146/2000, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 566 of 15 November 2000
- Judgment of the Constitutional Court no. 517/2004, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 49 of 14 January 2005
- Judgment of the Constitutional Court no. 233/2011, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 740 of 17 May 2011
- Judgment of the Constitutional Court no. 765/2011, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 476 of 6 July 2011
- Judgment of the Constitutional Court no. 668/2011, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 487 of 8 July 2011
- Judgment of the Constitutional Court no. 206/2012, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 254 of 17 April 2012
- Duculescu Victor, Carta drepturilor fundamentale de la Nisa – un prim pas către Constituţia Europeană?, in „Juridica", Second Year, July - August, No. 7-8 (2001), pp. 316-320
- Toader, Tudorel and Marieta Safta, 2015, Dialogul judecătorilor constituţionali, Bucharest: Universul Juridic

[27] Published in the Official Journal of the European Union series L no. 158 of 30 April 2004. Source: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/TXT/PDF/?uri=CELEX:02004L0038-20110616&from=RO;

[28] Law no. 287/2009 on the Civil Code, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 505 of 15 July 2011, as subsequently amended;

[29] March 2018.

LEGAL PROTECTION OF THE RIGHT TO EDUCATION IN ROMANIA AND EUROPEAN UNION

Dan VĂTĂMAN[*]

Abstract

This year marks the 70th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, a document that formally recognized free and compulsory elementary education as a basic human right. Thus, the right to education is fundamental in the development of each individual and at the same time a key element in developing and enhancing wellbeing and quality of life for the whole European society. Considering the fact that education is both a human right in itself and an indispensable means of realizing other human rights, the objectives of this study are to identify barriers that need to be overcome and, at the same time, to raise public awareness on the right to education because, as is well known, if individuals knows their rights they are empowered to claim them. The importance of this study consists on the fact that the analysis is focused, in a first stage, on clarifying the essential features of the right to education as a human right, so that, in a second stage, to be presented the European and Romanian legal frameworks protecting the right to education. As a novelty, this study attempts to outline how it is implemented the right to education in Romania, highlighting achievements, but without trying to avoid weaknesses and the less pleasant aspects.

Keywords: right to education; European legal framework; EU's Human Rights policy; human rights in Romania, legal framework of Romanian education.

1. Introduction

The year 2018 marks the 70th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, a document that formally recognized free and compulsory elementary education as a basic human right, the stated purpose being to pursue the full development of the human personality and to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms.[1]

Since then, the right to education has been widely recognized and developed by a number of international normative instruments, among which we mention: Convention against Discrimination in Education (1960); International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (1965); International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1966); Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (1979); Convention on the Rights of the Child (1989).

Following global recognition of the right to education as a human right, the signatory States of these international normative instruments have a number of duties and responsibilities. Like all human rights, the right to education imposes three levels of obligation on States parties, respectively to respect, protect and fulfil the right to education.

Considering the fact that education is both a human right in itself and an indispensable means of realizing other human rights, the objectives of this study are to identify barriers that need to be overcome and, at the same time, to raise public awareness on the right to education because, as is well known, if individuals knows their rights they are empowered to claim them.

Although the specialized literature comprises many studies on this topic, I am convinced that a new study is necessary in the context in which, as evidenced by UNESCO, 264 million children and youth are still out of school around the world, the total includes 61 million children of primary school age, 62 million of lower secondary school age and 141 million of upper secondary age.[2]

Given this undesirable situation, the importance of this study consists on the fact that the analysis is focused, in a first stage, on clarifying the essential features of the right to education as a human right, so that, in a second stage, to be presented the European and Romanian legal frameworks protecting the right to education. As a novelty, this study attempts to outline how it is implemented the right to education in Romania, highlighting achievements, but without trying to avoid weaknesses and the less pleasant aspects.

2. Essential features of the right to education as a human right

Article 13 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights recognized "the right of everyone to education" and also affirmed that "education shall be directed to the full development of the human personality and the sense of its dignity, and shall strengthen the respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms". In addition, Article 14 of the

[*] Professor PhD, "Ovidius" University, Constanța – Romania (e-mail: danvataman@yahoo.com)

[1] Article 26 of Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR)

[2] Out-of-School Children and Youth - http://uis.unesco.org/en/topic/out-school-children-and-youth, accessed on 18 February 2018

Covenant states that "each State Party which, at the time of becoming a Party, has not been able to secure in its territory compulsory primary education, free of charge, undertakes, within two years, to work out and adopt a detailed plan of action for the progressive implementation, within a reasonable number of years, to be fixed in the plan, of the principle of compulsory education free of charge for all".[3]

For identified the status of the progressive realization of the right to education throughout the world, the Commission on Human Rights in its resolution 1998/33 of 17 April 1998 empowered Katarina Tomasevski (UN Special Rapporteur on the right to education) to report on the status, throughout the world, of the progressive realization of the right to education, including access to primary education, and the difficulties encountered in the implementation of this right. In her preliminary report to the Commission on Human Rights, the Special Rapporteur shown that there could be no right to education without corresponding obligations for governments. Moreover, she said that these obligations can be easily structured into a conceptual framework contain four essential features of the right to education, namely: availability, accessibility, acceptability and adaptability (also known as 4-A scheme) [4].

As a first State obligation, availability relates to ensuring that primary schools are available for all children, which necessitates a considerable investment. Accessibility requires the State to ensuring access to available public schools, most importantly in accordance with the existing prohibition of discrimination. In light of the principle of acceptability, the State is obliged to ensure that all schools conform to the minimum criteria which it has developed as well as ascertaining that education is acceptable both to parents and to children. The usual approach regarding adaptability, the fourth principle, is to review the contents and process of learning from the viewpoint of the child as future adult, that's because the best interests of the individual child highlights the need for the educational system to become and remain adaptable.[5]

As it appears from the General Comment of Article 13 adopted by the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights in 1999, while the precise and appropriate application of the terms will depend upon the conditions prevailing in a particular State party, education in all its forms and at all levels shall exhibit the interrelated and essential features establish in 4-A scheme, as follows:

a) Availability - functioning educational institutions and programs have to be available in sufficient quantity within the jurisdiction of the State party;
b) Accessibility - educational institutions and programs have to be accessible to everyone, without discrimination, within the jurisdiction of the State party. Accessibility has three overlapping dimensions: Non-discrimination - education must be accessible to all, especially the most vulnerable groups; Physical accessibility - education has to be within safe physical reach, either by attendance at some reasonably convenient geographic location or via modern technology; Economic accessibility - education has to be affordable to all;
c) Acceptability - the form and substance of education, including curricula and teaching methods, have to be acceptable (e.g. relevant, culturally appropriate and of good quality) to students and, in appropriate cases, parents;
d) Adaptability - education has to be flexible so it can adapt to the needs of changing societies and communities and respond to the needs of students within their diverse social and cultural settings. [6]

At the same time, Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights shown that the right to education, like all human rights, imposes three types or levels of obligations on States parties: the obligations to respect, protect and fulfil. Thus, the obligation to respect requires States parties to avoid measures that hinder or prevent the enjoyment of the right to education, the obligation to protect requires States parties to take measures that prevent third parties from interfering with the enjoyment of the right to education and the obligation to fulfil requires States to take positive measures that enable and assist individuals and communities to enjoy the right to education (the obligation to fulfil incorporates both an obligation to facilitate and an obligation to provide). [7]

3. The EU legal framework for protection of the right to education

3.1. General provisions relating to the education

Pursuant to Article 6(e) of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU), the Union shall have competence to carry out actions to support, coordinate or supplement the actions of the Member States in several areas, including education. Moreover,

[3] International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, adopted and opened for signature, ratification and accession by General Assembly resolution 2200A (XXI) of 16 December 1966 - http://www.ohchr.org/EN/ProfessionalInterest/Pages/CESCR.aspx, accessed on 18 February 2018

[4] Preliminary report of the Special Rapporteur on the right to education, Ms. Katarina Tomasevski, submitted in accordance with Commission on Human Rights resolution 1998/33 (E/CN.4/1999/49, para. 50) - http://repository.un.org/handle/11176/223172, accessed on 18 February 2018

[5] Ibid, paras. 51, 57, 62 and 70.

[6] General Comment No. 13: The Right to Education (Article 13 of the Covenant), (E/C.12/1999/10, para. 6), adopted at the Twenty-first Session of the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, on 8 December 1999 - http://www.refworld.org/pdfid/4538838c22.pdf, accessed on 18 February 2018

[7] Ibid, paras. 46-47

Article 9 of TFEU states that, in defining and implementing its policies and activities, the Union shall take into account, among others, requirements linked to the promotion of a high level of education.

To this end, the Articles 165 of TFEU empowers the Union to contribute to the development of quality education by encouraging cooperation between Member States and, if necessary, by supporting and supplementing their action, while fully respecting the responsibility of the Member States for the content of teaching and the organization of education systems and their cultural and linguistic diversity.

3.2. Guarantee of the right to education

The European Union is based on a common set of values, including respect for human rights whether civil and political, or economic, social and cultural[8]. More than that, the Union recognizes the rights, freedoms and principles set out in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (hereinafter: Charter), which shall have the same legal value as the Treaties.[9]

Thus, in Article 14 of the Charter is stipulated that "everyone has the right to education", this right includes the possibility to receive free compulsory education. Also, is provided the freedom "to found educational establishments with due respect for democratic principles and the right of parents to ensure the education and teaching of their children in conformity with their religious, philosophical and pedagogical convictions shall be respected, in accordance with the national laws governing the exercise of such freedom and right". As shown in official explanations relating to the Charter, these provisions are based on the common constitutional traditions of Member States and on Article 2 of the Protocol no. 1 to the ECHR according to which "no person shall be denied the right to education"[10].

4. Romanian legal framework protecting the right to education

4.1. Constitutional provisions

Basic principles regarding the education in Romania are established in Article 32 of the Constitution. Thus, according to the constitutional provisions, "the right to education is provided by the compulsory general education, by education in high schools and vocational schools, by higher education, as well as other forms of instruction and postgraduate improvement". In addition, it is shown that "State education shall be free, according to the law".[11]

It should be noted that in accordance with Article 11 of Constitution, the Romanian State pledges to fulfil as such and in good faith its obligations as deriving from the treaties it is a party to, that's because the treaties ratified by Parliament, according to the law, are part of national law. If we strictly refer to the provisions concerning the citizens' rights and liberties, under Article 20 of Constitution these "shall be interpreted and enforced in conformity with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, with the covenants and other treaties Romania is a party to" and "where any inconsistencies exist between the covenants and treaties on the fundamental human rights Romania is a party to, and the national laws, the international regulations shall take precedence, unless the Constitution or national laws comprise more favorable provisions".[12]

Moreover, the Romanian Constitution provides that, as a result of the Romania's accession to the European Union, "the provisions of the constituent treaties of the European Union, as well as the other mandatory community regulations shall take precedence over the opposite provisions of the national laws, in compliance with the provisions of the accession act"[13]

4.2. Legal basis for ensuring the right to education

As is apparent from the first article of the Law of National Education no. 1/2011, the purpose of this law is "to provide the legal framework for the exercise, under the authority of the Romanian state, of the fundamental right to lifelong education". In addition, the law provides that "the State guarantees to the citizens of Romania equal rights of access to all levels and forms of pre-university and higher education, as well as lifetime education without any form of discrimination, the same rights being equally acknowledged for the citizens of the other EU states and the states belonging to the European Economical space and Swiss confederation"[14]. The law also contains other provisions on guaranteeing the right to education, such as "equal right to education to all people with disabilities or with special education needs"[15] and "lifelong education is a right guaranteed by law"[16].

The right to education is also provided in the Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of the rights of the child, law according to which "the child has the right to receive an education which would allow him or her to develop his or her capacities and personality, in non-discriminatory conditions". Under the law, the Ministry of Education and Research, as a

[8] Article 2 of the Treaty on European Union (TEU)
[9] Article 6 (1) TEU
[10] http://fra.europa.eu/en/charterpedia/article/14-right-education, accessed on 20 February 2018
[11] http://www.cdep.ro/pls/dic/site.page?den=act2_2&par1=2#t2c2s0sba32, accessed on 20 February 2018
[12] Ibid
[13] Article 148 of Romanian Constitution
[14] Article 2(4)-(5) of Law no. 1/2011
[15] Article 12(6) of Law no. 1/2011
[16] Article 13(1) of Law no. 1/2011

specialized institution of the central public authority, as well as the school inspectorates and the education institutions, as establishments of the local public administration, "must undertake all measures that are necessary for facilitating the access to pre-school education and providing regular obligatory tax-free education for all children"[17].

Law no. 448/2006 regarding the protection and the promotion of the rights of persons with disabilities states that such persons benefit, inter alia, the right to education and training[18]. It specifically provides that "disabled persons shall have a free and equal access to any form of education, irrespective of their age, according to the handicap type, degree and the educational needs thereof". More than that, "the disabled persons shall be ensured permanent education and professional training throughout their life"[19].

Hindering access to compulsory public education is incriminated by the Romanian Penal Code in Title VIII, Chapter II - Offenses against family. Thus, "a parent or a person to whom a juvenile was entrusted by law and who withdraws the juvenile from school or prevents them, by any means, from attending compulsory public education, shall be punishable by no less than 3 months and no more than 1 year of imprisonment or by a fine"[20].

5. Implementation of right to education in Romania

For a proper depiction of how it is implemented the right to education in Romania, our analysis should be focused on the way in which the Romanian government fulfils its obligations in education, in relation to 4-A scheme – making education available, accessible, acceptable and adaptable.

As Katarina Tomaševski pointed out in her work entitled Right to education primers no. 3, availability embodies two different governmental obligations: the right to education as a civil and political right requires the government to permit the establishment of educational institutions by non-state actors, while the right to education as a social and economic right requires the government to establish them, or fund them, or use a combination of these and other means so as to ensure that education is available. [21]

Referring to these obligations of the Romanian state, it must first of all be mentioned that there is a complete legislative framework providing adequate funding for the education. According to the provisions of the Law of National Education no. 1/2011, the State provides basic finance for all preschool children and pupils attending compulsory state, private and accredited religious education. The state also provides basic finance for the accredited vocational and high school state, private and religious education, as well as for state post high-school education. They shall be financed on the basis and within the limits of the standard cost per pupil or per preschool child, according to the methodology set by the Ministry of National Education. Public education is free of charge, in compliance with the law, but for certain educational activities, levels and curricula, taxes may be charged.[22] More than that, the Law of National Education establishes that a minimum of 6% of the Gross domestic product (GDP) of the year in question is allotted annually from the state budget and from the budgets of the local authorities in order to finance national education. The educational institutions may also get and use their own income. [23]

Despite these clear provisions, today, six years after the adoption of Law 1/2011, the Romanian state has not complied with its legal obligation to allocate a minimum of 6% of the GDP to finance national education, the term for the allocation of these funds being extended year by year through the Government Emergency Ordinance. [24]

In accordance with Education and Training Monitor 2017 – Country analysis, Romania's general government expenditure on education as a proportion of GDP remains the lowest in the EU, underfunding being evidenced by the unusually large financial burden falling on Romanian households, which spend 35 % of what the government spends on education: this is the highest proportion in the EU. [25]

The same state of affairs emerges from OECD evaluation in education (2017), according to which Romania's public expenditure on primary and secondary education is the lowest of all the EU countries, both in relative and absolute terms. In 2013, Romania had the lowest level of expenditure on education as a share of total government expenditure (7%), compared with an EU average of 11%. Also, the

[17]Articles 47(1) and 48(1) of Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of the rights of the child, Published in the Official Gazette, Part I no. 557 of 23 June 2004

[18]Article 6(b) of Law no. 448/2006 regarding the protection and the promotion of the rights of persons with disabilities, republished in the Official Gazette, Part I no. 1 of January 3, 2008

[19]Article 15 of Law no. 448/2006

[20]Article 380(1) of the New Penal Code (Law 286/2009)

[21] Katarina Tomaševski, Right to Education Primers, no 3 - Human rights obligations: Making education available, accessible and adaptable, 2001, p. 13 – http://www.right-to-education.org/sites/right-to-education.org/files/resource-attachments/Tomasevski_Primer%203.pdf, accessed on 23 February 2018

[22] Article 9(2) and (3) of Law no. 1/2011

[23] Article 8 of Law no. 1/2011

[24] Most recently by Emergency Ordinance no. 9/2017 on some budgetary measures in 2017, the extension of some deadlines, as well as the modification and completion of some normative acts, Official Gazette no. 79 of 30 January 2017.

[25] Education and Training Monitor 2017 - Country analysis, Romania, p. 250 – https://ec.europa.eu/education/sites/ education/files/ monitor2017-ro_en.pdf, accessed on 24 February 2018

2017 evaluation shows that Romania invests relatively less at all levels of education than other European countries, and allocates more resources to upper secondary and tertiary education than compulsory education. [26]

Accessibility requires the Romanian State to secure access to education for all children in the compulsory education age-range, but not for secondary and higher education. Thus, post-compulsory education may entail the payment of tuition and other charges and could thus be subsumed under "affordability"[27]. Access to public schools should be guided by the overriding principle of nondiscrimination, which is not subject to progressive realization but has to be secured immediately and fully. Respect of parental freedom of choice for the education of their children is also not subject to progressive realization but should be guaranteed fully and immediately. [28]

Although the existing legal framework ensures for all citizens equal rights of access to all levels and forms of pre-university and higher education, in fact there are significant discrepancies in access to quality education between urban areas and rural areas, where 45% of Romania's school population (ISCED 1-2) is studying. If we refer only to the integration of Roma people in education, a recent survey by the European Agency for Fundamental Rights (FRA 2016) shows that only 38 % of Roma children attend ECEC, while 77 % of Roma aged 18-24 are early school leavers. This indicates that ECEC participation has worsened since 2011, when the figure was 45 %.[29]

The OECD 2017 evaluation on Romania's education system shown that inequity in education overlaps closely with urban/rural disparities. Thus, students from socio-economically disadvantaged backgrounds are more likely to leave school before finishing upper secondary education. Boys in rural areas and from poorer quintiles are most at risk of dropping out before completion. Other vulnerable populations include Roma students and students with disabilities. [30]

One important aspect of the acceptability of education is the fact that, besides available and accessible, education must also be of good quality. Thus, each State should enforce minimal standards regarding quality, safety, environmental health or professional requirements for teachers.

With regard to these issues, in Romania has been developed a consistent legal framework that covers all aspects relating to quality assurance in education. Despite improvements over time, there are still a number of challenges especially that quality assurance in education is interconnected with education funding. Thus, increasing spending in education may help improve educational outcomes, support human capital development and economic growth.[31]

Adaptability of the education implies rejecting of any type of segregation or exclusion of the children with special educational needs.

As shown in National Strategy on Social Inclusion and Poverty Reduction (2015-2020), the Romanian Government's objective is that all citizens to be provided with an equal opportunity to participate in society, to feel valued and appreciated, to live in dignity and that their basic needs to be met and their differences respected. In terms of education, the Government's goal is ensuring equality of opportunity to quality education for all children, special attention should be paid to the quality of education and training and to their relevance to the needs of both the labor market and of individuals. [32]

Also, an order issued by Ministry of Education and Research regarding the prohibition of any form of segregation in schools in Romania stipulates that education policy ensuring equity in educational system, in terms of equal access to all forms of education, but also in terms of quality education for all children without any discrimination caused by ethnicity or language maternal disability and/or special educational needs, socioeconomic status families, residence or school performance of primary education of the beneficiaries. Also, were established a series of legal obligations to various structures in the education system and provides specific penalties for failure to comply with these obligations. [33]

These measures were taken as a result of general comment of the Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD) on the right to inclusive education, article 24 of the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities. In its comment the CRPD states unequivocally that the right to education of people with disabilities can only be adequately and effectively ensured only by inclusive education. The right to inclusive education imposes obligations on States parties to respect, protect and fulfil each of the

[26] OECD Reviews of Evaluation and Assessment in Education: Romania 2017, p. 58 - http://www.oecd-ilibrary.org/fr/education/romania-2017_9789264274051-en, accessed on 24 February 2018

[27] Katarina Tomaševski (2001), p. 13.

[28] Ibid, p. 27

[29] Education and Training Monitor (2017), p. 250.

[30] OECD Reviews of Evaluation and Assessment in Education, Romania 2017, p. 56 - http://www.oecd-ilibrary.org/fr/education/romania-2017_9789264274051-en, accessed on 24 February 2018

[31] Education and Training Monitor (2017), p. 251.

[32] National Strategy on Social Inclusion and Poverty Reduction (2015-2020), p. 58 - http://www.mmuncii.ro/j33/images/Documente/Familie/2016/StrategyVol1EN_web.pdf, accessed on 25 February 2018

[33] Order of the Ministry of Education and Research no. 6134 / 21.12.2016 on banning school segregation in school units, Official Gazette no. 27 of 10 January 2017 essential features of education: availability, accessibility, acceptability, adaptability. [34]

6. Conclusions

As is apparent from the above, the access to education is not a privilege, it is a human right. Thus, as defined by the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, "education is both a human right in itself and an indispensable means of realizing other human rights" and "as an empowerment right, education is the primary vehicle by which economically and socially marginalized adults and children can lift themselves out of poverty and obtain the means to participate fully in their communities"[35].

In these circumstances, it can be said that the right to education is a powerful instrument for developing the full potential of each person, ensuring and respecting human dignity and, thereby, creating the premises for individual and collective wellbeing.

To overcome the perpetual crisis and achieve a state of general wellbeing, the Romanian society must pay more attention to education at all levels. During the last years, Romania has developed a range of legislative and institutional tools destined to ensure implementation of right to education, but there are still a number of barriers to be surmounted. In my opinion, in order to ensure the access to quality primary and lower secondary education for all citizens, the Romanian authorities have to tackle inequalities and promoting an inclusive education, what it means to improve access to quality mainstream education, in particular for Roma and children in rural areas.

Also, given that funding for education is very low, it should be emphasized that quality educational outcomes are not being achieved with a very low level of spending. Following the same logic, I express my conviction that only by increasing spending in education the Romanian authorities may help improve the performance of the Romanian education system and, finally, even to achieve the objectives set out in the national project "Educated Romania", initiated and promoted by the Romanian President, who proposed beginning of "the repositioning of the society on values, the development of a success culture based on performance, work, talent, honesty and integrity".[36]

References

- Education and Training Monitor 2017 - Country analysis: Romania, https://ec.europa.eu/education/sites/education/files/monitor2017-ro_en.pdf;
- National Strategy on Social Inclusion and Poverty Reduction (2015-2020), http://www.mmuncii.ro/j33/images/Documente/Familie/2016/StrategyVol1EN_web.pdf;
- OECD Reviews of Evaluation and Assessment in Education: Romania 2017, http://dx.doi.org/10.1787/9789264274051-5-en;
- UN Commission on Human Rights, Preliminary Report of the Special Rapporteur on the Right to Education, prepared by Katarina Tomasevski, E/CN.4/1999/4913 (Geneva, January 1999), http://repository.un.org/bitstream/handle/11176/223172/E_CN.4_1999_49-EN.pdf?sequence=3&isAllowed=y;
- UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR), General Comment No. 13: The Right to Education (Art. 13 of the Covenant), 8 December 1999, E/C.12/1999/10, http://www.refworld.org/docid/4538838c22.html;
- UN Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD), General comment No. 4 (2016), Article 24: Right to inclusive education, 2 September 2016, CRPD/C/GC/4, http://www.refworld.org/docid/57c977e34.html;
- UN General Assembly, International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 16 December 1966, United Nations, Treaty Series, vol. 993, p. 3, http://www.refworld.org/docid/3ae6b36c0.html;
- UN General Assembly, Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 10 December 1948, 217 A (III), http://www.refworld.org/docid/3ae6b3712c.html;
- Tomaševski, Katarina. Right to Education Primers, no 3 - Human rights obligations: Making education available, accessible and adaptable, 2001, http://www.right-to-education.org/sites/right-to-education.org/files/resource-attachments/Tomasevski_Primer%203.pdf;
- Treaty on European Union;
- Constitution of Romania;
- Law of National Education no. 1/2011;
- Law no. 272/2004 on the protection and promotion of the rights of the child;
- Law no. 448/2006 regarding the protection and the promotion of the rights of persons with disabilities;
- Law 286/2009 - New Penal Code;

[34] UN Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD), General comment No. 4 (2016), Article 24: Right to inclusive education, 2 September 2016 - http://www.refworld.org/docid/57c977e34.html, accessed 27 February 2018

[35] General Comment No. 13: The Right to Education (Article 13 of the Covenant), (E/C.12/1999/10, para. 6), adopted at the Twenty-first Session of the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, on 8 December 1999 - http://www.refworld.org/pdfid/4538838c22.pdf, accessed on 28 February 2018

[36] http://www.presidency.ro/ro/romania-educata, accessed on 1 March 2018.

- Government Emergency Ordinance no. 9/2017 on some budgetary measures in 2017, the extension of some deadlines, as well as the modification and completion of some normative acts;
- Order of the Ministry of Education and Research no. 6134 / 21.12.2016 on banning school segregation in school units;
- http://www.cdep.ro;
- http://uis.unesco.org;
- http://www.ohchr.org;
- http://fra.europa.eu;
- http://www.presidency.ro.

INDONESIA AND LGBT: IS IT TIME TO APPRECIATE LOCAL VALUE?

Rima Yuwana YUSTIKANINGRUM*

Abstract

This article addresses the issue on why Indonesian people cannot accept Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, and Transgender ("LGBT"). Further, it also illustrates the reflection on how the society changes paradox in the era of globalisation. More concretely, which shows its willingness to uniform the social structure, at the same time attempts to preserve their own distinctive identity. Indonesian people who uphold Pancasila or five national ideologies would be a perfect example in this case. Pancasila, in this case, is a crystallization form of the values such as religious, social, and cultural realm which live within Indonesian society. As time passes, Pancasila is often grounded and contrasted to western cultural values like LGBT. The influx of LGBT thoughts which relies on the human rights concept spread a long time ago in Indonesia. However, this issue reemerges into the air, at the same time in different places and countries, becomes the vast spread of LGBT legalization such as in Europe and America. The resistance against Indonesian people, who mostly anti LGBT concept, is sparked by the influence of international human right law. These are recorded several times in Indonesia's history. Attempts such as submitting judicial review in the Constitutional Court about the offense of adultery contained in the criminal law case, establishing the pro-LGBT legal communities, and gathering social supports are also conducted to convince Indonesian people to accept LGBT in the society. However, both society and government agree to take steps and synergize to stand firmly to drown this effort. Then, this article will also expose some scholars' arguments, cases, jurisprudence, and journals to show the authors' standing in this context.

Keywords: LGBT, Indonesia, Five National Ideologies, Human Right Law, Local Norms.

1. Introduction

This paper covers the grounds of majority Indonesian people who agree that LGBT is unacceptable behavior and prohibited choice for being applied in Indonesia. It is essential to remember that having contrast culture with western countries style which putting freedom expression on its first plate, Indonesia has its own style which influencing its direction to define what freedom of expression is. Approving Pancasila and The 1945 Constitution of the Republic of Indonesia ("1945 Constitution") as its the highest norm and law in Indonesia cause the state choose not to separate between the non-religious matters, including the state matters and the religious matters. In addition, the state shows its believing in God by putting this idea as the first norm in Pancasila, which is the basic value for the acts under the 1945 Constitution. Religion, social norms, and ethnic factors also add the cause of LGBT rejection among society which has been existed for a long time in this country. Alongside, the submissions in this paper are specifically based on some of related constitutional court verdicts, domestic laws, and some domestic cases.

Aiming to show another coin side which focussing on LGBT rejection issue in Indonesia is the main purpose of this writing. Discussing LGBT rejection in Indonesia never become a small snow for Indonesian. For some people, including the human right practitioners who defending LGBT actors, the outlook of Indonesia seems unfair and sounds as a threat of intolerance and as a form of human right implementation crisis. These views spark due to the thought of distrust to the state for not being capable protecting LGBT actors as a minority group in Indonesia due to full rejection of its existence. Also, some of them expect that freedom of expression in western countries shall be considerably applied in eastern countries, including Indonesia. Therefore, this writing is essential to comprehend the international society that Indonesia has its own consideration for not legalizing LGBT implementation and showing its decision for not accepting LGBT actors and behavior in its territory without disregarding their right as human and recognizing their right as a citizen.

This paper serves as a complimentary article compares to previous articles that have been written by some previous authors about the issue of LGBT in Indonesia. Pros and cons are understandable in this case, however, this paper is not going to elaborate the pros and cons but focuses on the perspective of Indonesians in LGBT issues. International Human Rights Law are the specialized and related branch of science in this paper. Therefore, this writing will be elaborated the topic based on this areas but still focus on how and in which particular area Indonesians consider the human right law to be applied for express its human right.

Last but not least, the submissions in this paper uses paper-desk research for the research methodology. Further, collecting some data, such as articles, journals; opening some official institutional websites, and using some court verdicts, including some of the judges' dissenting opinion, are the main way for answering the questions in this paper. It is also going to involve some references from local laws, such as acts, Pancasila, and 1945 Constitution.

* LLM, Constitutional Court of the Republic Indonesia (e-mail: ryuwana@gmail.com)

2. Indonesia and Pancasila

As consequence of placing Pancasila as Staatsfundamentalnorm in Indonesia[1]and as the state philosophy foundation, Pancasila holds the significant role in defining the outlook, direction, and identification of the state among international society members. Furthermore, as the highest norm in Indonesia, all the product of laws under Pancasila cannot against the value that being uphold by Pancasila. Consisting of five national ideologies concerned with local values and norms which upholding the values of religious, Indonesians put the value of believing in the one and only God as the first ideology in the order. Through the four judges' dissenting opinion for the case number 46/PUU-XIV/2016, Constitutional Court submits that the Founding Fathers of Indonesia do not comprehend the first ideology of Pancasila as theology and philosophies value only, but more interpret them as the principle or standard to live together in the society with multi-belief of religion and faith. Accordingly, this principle shall be interpreted as the standard for living among society, such as be fair to others and speak honesty as for avoiding the split among society. Based on these values, the state obtains its fundamental. Accordingly, the state stands firmly not to separate between the state matters and the religious matters. More concretely, under Pancasila perspective, the state strictly cannot allow any practicals in the daily life which keeping the distance away between the people and Pancasila values. Accordingly, protecting all the activities or daily routine practicals which decreasing the value of religious among the society under the name of freedom or basic right is unacceptable and violate the law.[2] This fact explains the reasons on why in every single Indonesia's court verdicts, it always mentions the term "In the Name of Justice Under The God Almighty" in the first order or in the local term, it is used to call as irah-irah, which means the head of the verdict. This consideration reflects that every legal certainty in Indonesia shall always be illuminated by religious value so that the existence of legal norms in Indonesia cannot be reduced and/or contradict the religious values.[3] This background also becomes one of the government consideration to state its citizen religious on the national identification card.

As for highlighting human rights meaning, the government of Republic Indonesia has its own interpretation, namely that the only way to view the application of human rights in Indonesia is that by seeing them through Pancasila dan 1945 Constitution's perspective.[4] That background also bring a claim that this character is a differentiator this country compare to others.

Indonesia: LGBT is human right?

In the recent years, recognition of LGBT as a part of human right – freedom of expression – has increased significantly and mostly happened in western countries. Taiwan and South Africa are only the two countries outside western countries group which recognize the existence of LGBT in its country respectively.[5] However, it can be seen that this movement is not significantly happened in eastern countries. The various causes can be the ground but religion is included as one reason behind this policy. The technology is a useful means in this globalization era, which helping the spread of LGBT thought faster than ever. At same day as many countries start recognizing the existence of LGBT people and right by legalizing same marriage or allowing adoption for same-sex couple, the other people in another countries who also support this movement are able to celebrate this victory instantly. Therefore, the same time as fast as the spreading news, the thought that LGBT as a part of human right which should to be recognized and protected by the state become wider and more powerful. However, it is always being forgotten that the idea that LGBT is a part of human right sparked around western culture countries cannot always be accepted easily in the countries which its culture and values contrast with the western countries. Since local cultures and values, histories, people, beliefs, and customs are sociology factors impacting the thought of the rejection or acceptance of any ideas in one particular area, the concept of LGBT as a part of the human right is not only uncommon but also different with their thought. Therefore, whilst some people agree with this idea, some groups of people take the initiative to prevent the influx of LGBT. The case of judicial review for Indonesia Penal Code to Constitutional Court can be an example of how some people disagree on the idea of LGBT. Briefly, the applicants submit that as the government of Republic Indonesia is not categorized as secularism country, then the state should protect its people from the danger of the LGBT influx. The applicants also use the family endurance and religious value protection as the ground of the submission. All of them agree that the potential threat caused by LGBT influence is able to be a threat for their family endurance. Although the Court rejected the application, the Court in its verdict mentioning that the Court agrees on the idea of renewal which submitted by the

[1] Maria Farida Indrati, Ilmu Perundang-undangan, Kanisius 2007, page 59
[2] Paragraph [3.34.5] the constitutional court verdict number 140/PUU-VII/2009, page 273-274
[3] Dissenting Opinion of four judges for the case number 46/PUU-XIV/2016, page 456
[4] Paragraph [3.34.10] constitutional verdict number 140/PUU-VII/2009, page 275
[5] http://ilga.org/downloads/2017/ILGA_WorldMap_ENGLISH_Recognition_2017.pdf access 19/3/2018 at 4.21 pm applicants. In other words, the Court agree that the importance of expanding the meaning of the article is necessary needed but those authority does not on the Court's hand[6].

Four out of five judges submit their dissenting opinion which pointedly stating that:[7]

1. Under article 28J (2) 1945 Constitution, it affirms that 1945 Constitution is Godly Constitution. Therefore, the religious value and public order serve as the standard to be fulfilled in term of establishing the law. It means that the 1945 Constitution cannot permit the implementation of absolute freedom to everyone, especially to the actions which clearly against the religious value;
2. The paradigm and philosophy in those articles do not provide a place for religious values and living laws of society which being fully considered by the society. Furthermore, the ignominious nature which causes negative impact is not only considered as an individual issue but also as the communal problem due to the nature of human who is counted as a part of a group people;
3. Vigilante actions to perpetrators of sexual intercourse are occurred due to the disproportionate placing of religious values and living laws in the criminal law system in Indonesia.

Hence, based on those dissenting opinions it can be concluded that religious values and living laws have essential function and become guideline of living for Indonesians. It also can be highlighted that due to the individualism matter is not capable to apply in this system of society, then any kind of the ignominious nature which having a negative impact for the society automatically become communal matters. The framework of human right is not the same concept as the western countries, which does not connect between individualism matters and communal matters. Accordingly, the choice of life which risk the safety of religious values and living law will not affect the surroundings. This different concept in some particular occasion forgotten easily by the human rights activists who demand the right equality for LGBT people, especially to those who do not exactly understand the system of living in the eastern countries, such as Indonesia, because the different does not always have the same color.

LGBT is uncommon things to accept for most people in Indonesia. They consider LGBT is not as a part of the right, which guaranteed under 1945 Constitution, but more see it as ignominious nature, an act which against the God's will. The concept of man must marry the opposite sex and couple only be referred to marriage people grows stronger in the mindset of society instead of accepting the idea that everyone has same right to be with anyone – does not matter the gender. The LGBT action is more seen as inappropriate behavior which clearly against the religious values and leads to a commit to sin action. It is essential to remember that in Indonesia, there is only six religion and a community of ancestral believe admitted by the government. The state's rejection to accept LGBT to live together with society does not come in one side but this decision taken after having a discussion with all the religious leaders. In this stage, all of the religious leaders agree that LGBT actions are against their respectively religious values and more consider LGBT actions as a sin instead of a right. Adultery case for Indonesians is a taboo thing and considered as an inappropriate behavior. The term adultery refers to the unmarriage – man and woman – couple. Recently, the term adultery is also referred to the same-sex couple. An act can be considered as a good behavior as long it does not against the God's values, rules, and laws.[8] In this context, it is essential to understand that there is a strong connection between the society and the influx of religion values for defining the good and bad thing. For Indonesians, religion values contain many aspects, such as sociology, cultural, historical, and identity that is being a community belief. Religion values never being an individual experience but more being a social value and communal thing.[9] Therefore, it is safe to submit that in Indonesia, LGBT actions are not a part of the right and not suitable to apply due to the religious values and living laws upholding the society. In addition, this becomes a national submission for not accepting LGBT actions to ensure the fairness justice.

Restriction and Right to the freedom of expression

Under article 28E point (2) 1945 Constitution, the state protects the right to the freedom to believe people's respectively faith and express their views and thoughts, in accordance with their conscience. Through this article, the state respect, recognize and protect the right to the freedom of its people to express their views and thoughts so that people in Indonesia have open access to speak for their thought/views. However, this article cannot be a guideline to speak in public for asking people to join to the community which it's standing against the government and potentially spark the unrest.

Also, attempting to use this article to interpret as a way or permission for expressing their thought in public freely without considering other people's right, living laws, and other social norms. The freedom is limited to some boundaries, such as other people right's, religious values, living laws, security, public order, or any kind of actions which containing reduction the values that the society believes. More concretely, the views which spread full of violence

[6] Point 7, page 452, Constitutional Court Verdict for case number 46/PUU-XIV/2016
[7] Page 457-467 Constitutional Court Verdict for case number 46/PUU-XIV/2016
[8] Page 454, Dissenting Opinion four judges in the case number 46/PUU-XIV/2016.
[9] Paragraph [3.34.22] the Constitutional Court Verdict for the case number 140/PUU-VII/2009, page 278 content and against the religious values and living laws are not allowed. The Penal code is a law product which regulates the penalty. Moreover, the Constitutional Court also agree that preventive aspect is always a priority consideration in a heterogenous society[10].

Seeing from international society, this policy might be seen as a violation of the right of the freedom of expression. The limitation of express the idea or the views of themselves, the interference of government to define their identity, and the involvement society in private life matter are likely some factors to measure the standard of violence to the right of freedom to expression. However, it is safe to assume that the standard to define there is any violence caused in this case is that totally different. Human right in the western countries cannot be compared to human right in eastern countries, particularly in a country which believing in God and consider religion as a society value such as Indonesia. In addition, the term protecting the nation that written under the preamble of the 1945 Constitution which implicitly states that the general goals of society or general acceptance of the same philosophy of government shall be meant as providing full protection to cultural identity, ethnic, religion, and the characteristic of Indonesia as an individual and communal[11]. To protect the nation, the government should strive the society stability atmosphere, security, and public order. Those can be achieved by applying some restrictions for any actions which potentially sparks social unrest. In this stage, it also important to bear in mind that the restriction about the implementation of the human right is strictly enforced under law. Through its verdict for the case number 140/PUU-VII/2009, the Constitutional Court affirms that under article 1 point (3) 1945 Constitution, Indonesia declares and defines its form as the rule of law, which means that the determining factors in the implementation of state power are that supremacy of law and not the individual or specific group[12].

Then, the next question followed is that can all of these considerations lead people to the conclusion that the government and the people in Indonesia violence the right for people who support LGBT people? The author submits that the state never ignore the right the LGBT people which protected by the 1945 Constitution. Right to education, to health, to work, and some of the right are allowed to this group of people. However, the state cannot risk its goals for the specific group of people business because the state has the responsibility to protect all nation as referred under the 1945 constitution by upholding the values contained under Pancasila.

3. Conclusion

To sum up there is three points to conclude the writing, namely:

1. The implementation of human right in Indonesia, especially the freedom to expression – LGBT people and its actions – is not permitted due to the characteristic of Indonesia which upholding the religion values and living laws as consequence for placing Pancasila as grundnorm. Religion values cannot be seen as an individual experience but more to communal matters and the society, including the government, consider LGBT as a sin instead of a right;
2. Through this paper, the author expects that the international societies, including the LGBT activist, have a chance to see from another side of the coin about the cause of LGBT rejection in Indonesia. Although the spreading of pro LGBT community going wider, imposing another country to also support LGBT shall not to do. It does not mean that by rejecting LGBT actions in Indonesia, the government will not protect the LGBT people's right. The government recognizes its right as citizen and human, but the government strictly does not allow the support of LGBT continually exist in its territory. Another point, the author also expects that the international society, including the activist of LGBT, appreciate the local values that uphold by Indonesians. Through its values -- religious values and living laws – Indonesia becomes a solid country and respect its diversity thought as well as Malaysia, Brunei Darussalam, and Philipines;
3. It is safe to assume that this writing needs more constructive suggestion. Therefore, the author welcomes any constructive suggestions. This paper serves itself as a complimentary literature which concerned on LGBT in Indonesia. LGBT and Indonesia is an interesting topic to be concerned on because there are many aspects involved in this issue. Thus, the author suggests to the researcher to make research about this issue more comprehensive.

References

- 1945 Constitution of Republic of Indonesia
- International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights
- Universal Declaration of Human Rights
- Indrati, Maria Farida. Ilmu Perundang-undangan. Kanisius, 2007

[10] Paragraph [3.34.6] the Constitution Court verdict for the case number 140/PUU-VII/2009, page 274
[11] Paragraph [3.34.23] the Constitution Court verdict for the case number 140/PUU-VII/2009, page 278
[12] Paragraph [3.34.20] the Constitution Court verdict for the case number 140/PUU-VII/2009, page 278

- Cviklova, Lucie. “Advacement of human rights standards for LGBT people through the perspective of international human right law”. Journal of Comparative Research in Antrhropology and Sociology, volume 3, number 2 (winter 2012). http://compaso.eu
- Shannahan, Dervla Sara. “Sexual ethics, marriage, and sexual autonomy: the landscapes for Muslimat and lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgendered Muslims”. DOI 10.1007/s11562-008-0077-4
- Constitutional Court of the Republic of Indonesia, case number 140/PUU-VII/2009
- Constitutional Court of the Republic of Indonesia, case number 46/PUU-XIV/2016
- “Map of LGBT recognition”, accessed March,19th 2018, http://ilga.org/downloads/2017/ILGA_WorldMap_ENGLISH_Recognition_2017.pdf

MOTIVATION OF ADMINISTRATIVE ACTS – GUARANTEE OF GOOD ADMINISTRATION

Adelin Mihai ZĂGĂRIN*

Abstract

The present article deals with the aspects of motivating administrative acts, both doctrinaire and practical, of jurisprudence. The duty of the administration to motivate its decisions is submitted in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, art. 41. In the current European legal order, the rationale for administrative acts is considered and refers to one of the most important conditions of validity of the administrative act. The Romanian Constitution ensures and emphasizes the motivation, as it is imposed by the Charter. The realization of this fundamental right to motivate administrative acts is possible by calling upon a set of values from the administration, such as transparency, professionalism and the imposition of high quality standards. Motivation is achieved where we have a good administration, and whether citizens are, among other things, respected fundamental rights and freedoms, access to information is guaranteed and motivated their decisions. Although administrative normative acts are motivated by the administration, examples that show that individual ones are unmotivated or incompletely motivated are enough, which made the various employers legally answer for the non-motivation of their decisions to terminate work relationships with several of the employees. The motivation of administrative acts is necessary, mandatory and must be done with rigor. It is highlighted that inadequate, incomplete or vicious reasoning may result in suspension or even annulment of the administrative act by the court.

Keywords: motivation, administrative acts, essential rights, decision-making, administrative culture.

1. Introduction. Motivating administrative acts in the context of the operationalization of the concept of the right to good administration.

A first document to which reference can be made in analyzing the concept of good administration is the Strengthening public administration strategy 2014-2020 and the ambitious objectives contained therein. It is envisaged in a metaphorical expression that Romania will go through a spiral of confidence and that it wants to increase the citizen's trust as a beneficiary, in the services provided by the public administration.

It is envisaged in this strategy that the fulfillment of the objectives is done by calling and joining a set of values including transparency and professionalism, both for the civil servants and the contractual staff, by pursuing the needs of the citizens, since the ultimate goal of the administration is precisely meeting the needs of our fellow citizens. This can be achieved by imposing high quality standards.

By the right to good administration, we understand the right of every person, systemically integrated, to see their issues impartially and fairly treated, within a reasonable time, by public authorities and institutions.

In practical terms, we understand through good administration how the institutions work and this is done if citizens have access to information, if their fundamental rights and freedoms are respected and protected, if the administrative acts, their publication and the decisional transparency are ensured, all these concepts forming part of the right to good administration.

At European Union level, the concept of good administration is generally considered to protect citizens' rights against the abuses of the institutions, and in particular a form of procedural protection against such abuses.

The right to good administration can be achieved through 2 very important documents for European citizens and the institutions of the Union, which are part of its legal order:

1. The Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union;
2. The European Code of Good Administrative Behaviour.

The right to good administration is also a European law principle of the European law, binding on Member States, and refers to how public administration acts to achieve general interests.

The concepts included in the right to good administration are the performance and the report of the administration with those administered. Performance is characterized by the principles of decision-making efficiency and transparency. The report of the administration with the administered ones is a fundamental right of natural or legal persons, provided by art. 41 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union.

The Charter is the document governing all political, social, economic and citizen rights, and according to art. 41, the person is entitled to impartial treatment by public authorities and institutions. This right may be interpreted as the right of any person to be heard before a decision affecting his/her individual rights and interests, the right of any person to his/her own file, with respect for the confidentiality of professional, commercial or other data. The last element of content of the right to good administration, with the same importance of the other, is the obligation of the public administration to motivate its decisions in the exercise of its obligations.

* PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: adelin_zagarin@yahoo.com)

The last paragraph of art. 41 is the one referring to the right of any citizen to refer the European Ombudsman in the situation when he/she considers that the Romanian administration does not respect this principle of the right to good administration. The referral is done in accordance with the principle of subsidiarity, which involves solving the problems of those who are aware of the authorities/institutions closest to the citizen: the lawyer of the people or even the institutions of the public authorities under the law of administrative contentious, if it is considered to have been violated a legitimate right or interest.

Regarding the evolution of the right to good administration (efficiency, transparency, motivation), in 2000 the adoption of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union introduced the right to good administration and the right to refer the European Ombudsman to attack the decisions of a public institution.

Following the adoption of the Charter and the inclusion of the fundamental right to good administration in a European Parliament resolution, the European Code of Good Administrative Behavior, revised in 2013, was adopted in order to explain in detail the content of the right to good administration, setting multiple obligations for those working in the public administration sector. Also, the content of the code explains the attitude it has to adopt in relation to the citizens, the employees of the institutions.

The code contains several principles and rules of effectiveness that need to be respected, and in the introductory part there is a call for an administrative culture of work.

The preamble to the TFEU refers to the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and the values it has introduced.

We also have the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Constitution of Romania that appeal to the right to good administration. This right is fundamental because the document that enshrines it belongs to the category of documents with the same legal force as the treaties.

If we are in the presence of a fundamental right, we must also benefit from guarantees of achievement that will lead and pursue its realization.

In Romania, we have normative acts regulating decision-making transparency, and although administrative acts of an individual and judicial nature are motivated, we find many situations in which the employees have gained a case in law on the ground that the employer has failed to mention which were the reasons behind the termination of the employment contract or the decision to dismiss.

Good administration includes, based on art. 41 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, the following rights:

- the right of any person to be heard before taking any individual measure that could prejudice him in the field of legitimate rights and interests;
- the right of any person to have access to his/her own file, with due regard for the legitimate interests of the administration relating to confidentiality and professional or commercial secrecy;
- the obligation imposed on the administration to motivate its decisions.

Everyone shall be entitled to compensation by the Union for damage caused by its institutions or agencies in the performance of their duties in accordance with the general principles common to the laws of the member states.

Decisional transparency is closely related to the right to good administration, referred to in art. 298 TFEU and art. 42 of the Charter.

2. Content. The administrative act. Characteristics.

The administrative act is the "main legal form of the activity of public administration bodies, which consists in a unilateral and express manifestation of the will to generate, modify or extinguish rights and obligations, in the realization of the public power, under the main control of the legality of the judiciary courts"[1].

The constant defining elements of the administrative act and the definition of the concept refer to "the main legal form of activity of the public administration, which consists in a manifestation of express, unilateral will and subjected to a regime of public power, as well as the control of the lawfulness of the courts, which emanates from administrative authorities or from private persons authorized by them, through which are born, altered or extinguished correlative rights and obligations."[2]

According to the criterion of the extent of the effects of the administrative act, we have two major categories of administrative acts:

1. Administrative normative acts, which are those acts which contain rules of principle applicable to an indeterminate number of people and which produce ergaomnes legal effects. Ex: ministerial orders, instructions issued by the authorities of the specialized public administration, etc.
2. Individual administrative acts – representing the category of acts that produces legal effects with respect to a precisely determined subject of law. Ex: appointment/dismissal decisions.

[1] Antonie Iorgovan, Tratat de drept administrativ, Volume II, Ed. 4, Ed. All Beck, București, 2005, p 25.
[2] Verginia Verdinaș, Drept administrativ, Edition X, revised and updated, Ed. Universul Juridic, București, 2017.

One of the distinctions between the two categories is that the individual administrative acts can never violate the provisions of the normative administrative acts.

The individual administrative acts are also classified as:

- Acts establishing defined rights and obligations for the subjects to which they are addressed, named generic authorizations;
- Acts conferring a personal status, namely rights and obligations for a determined right subject: diplomas, certificates, permits;
- Acts that apply different forms of administrative constraint: contravention minutes, sanctioning decisions;
- Administrative acts of a judicial nature.

1. Acts of an internal character, which are customary to apply within a public authority or institution and produce effects on the staff of that institution. They are also opposed to other subjects of law such as citizens, natural or legal persons who request the services of an authority or institution, when they fall under the provisions of its internal rules. In turn, these administrative acts can be: normative (internal organization and functioning regulation) or individual (appointment decisions).

The legality of administrative acts is analyzed according to certain general conditions:

a) Respecting the supremacy of the Constitution;
b) Respecting the principle of legality in the adoption of the administrative act;
c) The administrative act is issued or adopted by the competent body within the limits of its competence;
d) The form of the administrative act and the issuing procedure shall be those provided by the law.

The form of the administrative act usually includes the written form, except for the warning that can also be expressed orally. This is the case with individual administrative acts.

Regulatory administrative acts always take the written form. Writing language, according to art. 13 of the Constitution, is Romanian. Another external condition related to the form of the act is motivation.

Normative acts, subject to the rule of advertising, are motivated by a substantiation note, a statement of reasons, a report, placed in the form of a preamble before the actual act. The role of this preamble is to focus on the legal and factual elements that legitimize the intervention of the respective legal act.

A particular situation appears at the administrative-judicial acts, which are always motivated.

The authorities resort to the motivation of the administrative acts, as this justifies the reasons for the legality of an administrative act, which is particularly relevant in challenging the legality of an act, and is presented as a guarantee of respect for the law and protection of citizens rights.

The realization of the motivation of all administrative acts has as consequence the reconciliation of administrative practice in Romania with the existence in other states. Prestigious French authors support the thesis that "all administrative acts must be motivated, that is to say, the reasons of fact and law underlying their issue/adoption must be justified. The motivation of administrative acts refers to the existence of an obligation for the administration to make these reasons known in the decision"[3].

Complying with the mandatory nature of motivating administrative acts diminishes the risk that the administration will make arbitrary, abusive, and certainly decisions by reference to the beneficiaries' legitimate interests and rights, it will improve the work of the administration.

In this respect, we have in support of the statements Law 24/2000 regarding the legal technical norms for elaborating normative acts, including texts regarding motivation of projects of this category of acts (including the administrative ones), in the provisions of art. 30-34.

Over time, it has been considered that the authorities are not obliged to motivate their administrative act unless the law expressly compels them, but the need to act on the grounds is recognized more and more as a guarantee of the legality of the administrative acts.

A reasoned decision sets out the reasons of fact and law for which its authority considered it to be justified, as a condition of the external legality of the act which is the subject of an appreciation in concreto, by its nature and the context of its adoption.

In the case of the administrative normative acts, according to the provisions of art. 31 of Law 24/2000, the motivation must refer to the requirements that justify the adoption of the act, the basic applicable principles and the purpose of the proposed regulation, the social, economic, political, cultural effects, the implications for the regulation in force, as well as the phases in the issuance or adoption of that act.

In the case of individual acts, the reasoning refers mainly to the factual and legal causes which required the adoption of the act in question. The motivation thus arises as a consequence of the exigency that every administrative act, whether normative or individual, has a cause, a reason that can be in fact or rightful. The factual fact consists in the necessary conditions for the public authority to issue the act, and the legal grounds are the legal norms on which the authority is based in the issuing of the administrative act.

From this point of view, the use of the motivation of the administrative act is revealed in several aspects:

- by motivation there is an explanation of the act and thus the conflicts between the administration and the beneficiaries of the services they provide;

[3] Verginia Verdinaș, Drept administrativ, Edition X, revised and updated, Ed. Universul Juridic, București, 2017, p. 341.

- obliges the administration to act in its actions according to the legal norms;
- allows for more rigorous control by all right holders to exercise control, whether by hierarchically superior control, by the court, public opinion or other holder.

A weak practice that draws attention is that, in motivating the issuance of administrative acts, an act in its entirety is invoked and not the provisions of the normative act that are applicable in the issuance or adoption of an administrative act.

The principle of the motivation of administrative acts in European administrative law.

The principle of motivating administrative acts also includes motivating those implementing the "basic acts of the European Union". In accordance with art. 296 TFEU legal acts shall state the reasons on which they are based and shall refer to the proposals, initiatives, recommendations, requests or opinions provided for in the treaties.

The obligation to motivate the EU acts is to indicate clearly and unequivocally the reasoning of the EU authority as the author of the contested act in such a way as to enable the parties concerned to know the justification of the measure adopted in order to defend their rights, and the EU court to exercise its review of legality.

The motivation must be adapted to the nature of the act in question and is appreciated by the circumstances of the case in the content of the act, the nature of the grounds relied on and the interest of the addressees or other persons directly and individually concerned by that act, to be given explanations. It is obligatory for the motivation to specify all the relevant factual and legal elements. To the extent that the issue of the statement of reasons for an act complies with the conditions imposed by Article 296, not only the wording, but also its context, and all the legal rules governing that matter, are appraised.

The obligation on the administration to motivate its decisions derives from the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, Article 41. This obligation is provided for in the Treaty of Rome[4] by art. 190. The provision was developed by the European Code of Good Administrative Behaviour, art. 18, which states that all decisions of the European institutions which may prejudice rights or private interests must indicate the reasons on which they are based, specifying the relevant facts and the legal basis for the decision.

In this way, officials are urged to avoid making decisions that are based on short or imprecise legal considerations and do not contain individual observations.

If, due to the large number of people on similar decisions, it is impossible to carry out the communication in detail on the grounds of the decision or when the answers are given as standard, the official is obliged to ensure an individual answer to each request.

Motivation is of particular importance in cases where an interested party's request is rejected. In this situation, the motivation must clearly indicate why the arguments submitted by the requested party could not be accepted.

Where there is insufficient reasoning for a regulation, we are in a situation where there is a deficiency in the annulment of the act in question, in breach of an important procedural requirement which may be invoked by way of review of the lawfulness of that regulation before the Court of Justice. The Court will object, on its own initiative, to any lack of motivation.

By sufficient justification of the act issued by an EU institution, the parties are allowed to defend their rights, the European Court of Justice to exercise its control function and the member states and interested citizens to know the conditions under which the institution has applied the Treaty.

In the Romanian legal landscape, there are numerous references to the motivation of decisions and administrative acts through:

- The public procurement law, regarding the reasons for the decisions in the tender selection procedures, the reasons for designating the winner, the reasons for which the contracting authority decided to cancel the award procedure, the reasons for the rejection, etc.
- The tax procedure code of 20 July 2015, complies with the Law no. 207 of 20 July 2015, makes numerous references to the motivation of the authorities' decisions in the reception of administrative acts: extension of the deadlines based on motivated grounds, reasoned deferment of the exercise of certain attributions, motivation of the decisions to engage the liability, motivation of the fiscal administrative act and inclusion in its content of the elements stipulated in the Fiscal Procedure Code, the factual and legal reasons for the results of the tax audit, the motivation of the decision to adopt/remove the precautionary measures, etc.
- The expropriation law no. 33/1994. Motivating the decision of the commission to analyze the complaints that were formulated regarding the expropriation proposal, this being a *sine qua no*n condition of the legality guaranteeing both the transparency of the decisional act and the possibility of its censorship by the court, based on art. 20 of Law 33/1994. In this way, the obligation to state reasons can no longer be regarded merely as a formal condition and must be regarded as a condition of legality which concerns the substance of the administrative act, the fulfillment of which depends on the very validity of that act.

[4] The Treaty of Rome refers to the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community (EEC) and was signed by France, West Germany, the Netherlands, Italy, Belgium and Luxembourg on 25 March 1957.

Motivation for the administrative act

The Romanian doctrine of administrative law enshrines and supports, by a majority, the recognition of the principle of the motivation of administrative acts as a principle of administrative law, as well as its recognition by jurisprudential law[5].

States with a democratic tradition, such as France, have enshrined this principle of administrative law in the legislative branch, with the 1979 legislation requiring the motivation of all decisions unfavorable to the addressee as a general rule for: building permits, sanctions, decay, prescriptions, etc.[6].

Additionally, it is necessary to motivate the decisions which introduce derogations from the rules established by laws and higher normative acts. Exceptions to the motivation may intervene in the case of decisions that might disclose statutory administrative secrets, medical secrets, decisions taken in extreme or urgent situations, and in the case of implicit refusal by the authorities, but in this case, at the request of the person concerned, the administration is required to motivate its decision within one month.

In the German law, the rationale for the obligation to enforce administrative acts is imposed by a provision of a general nature in the Code of administrative procedure.[7] If the contested act is fully reasoned or concerns all matters of fact, the period for bringing an action for annulment is one month after notification of the contested act or from the reply to the administrative appeal, and if the contested act or the reply to the administrative appeal fails contains the required entries, the term is 1 year. Thus, for the incomplete motivation of estimates, the administration is sanctioned by dilating the terms of appeal.

Motivation of individual administrative acts issued on request

In the case of administrative acts issued on request, based on the resolution of a petition, based on some provisions of the Government Ordinance no. 27/2002, the following clarifications are required:

- the motivation established by art. 13 concerns only the legal grounds, which allow the verification of the legality of the issued administrative act;
- the full motivation of the administrative act requires the submission of the factual reasons (in particular in the exercise of the discretionary power), the legal remedies available and the indication of the competent court, the deadline for introducing the finding;

Numerous Romanian authors have supported and supported the need, through de lege ferenda proposals, to regulate the mandatory motivation of administrative acts, in particular through an administrative code, in the following respects: legal grounds, factual reasons, indication of available means of action, the competent court, the deadline for contestation.

The motivation for the refusal to communicate information of public interest to the petitioner is provided by Law no. 544/2001 by art. 22 and circumscribed in Government Ordinance no. 27/2002, being obligatory to include all the elements of the existence of full motivation.

The obligation to state reasons is also found in the case of judicial administrative acts, examples of which are: the decisions of the State Office for Inventions and Trademarks, the decisions of the Commission for resolving the expropriations (Law 33/1994 on expropriation for public utility reasons).

Motivation of normative administrative acts

The obligation to motivate the regulatory administrative acts is imposed by Law no. 24/2000 regarding the normative technical norms for the elaboration of normative acts

The law stipulates the obligation to draw up a substantiation note for the ordinances and government ordinances, which will accompany the normative act in the process of its adoption, after which it will be published with it in the Official Journal of Romania and published on the website of the issuing institution .

In the case of the other administrative acts issued by the central authorities, the draft normative act shall be accompanied by an approval report, without any provision regarding the publication of the latter with the normative act.

In accordance with Section 4 of Law 24/2000, the motivation will refer to the following aspects:

- the requirements that suppose regulatory intervention with particular reference to the shortcomings of the regulation in force;
- the existence of legislative inconsistencies or lack of regulation;
- the purpose of the legislative proposal, the basic principles with highlighting the novelties;
- what are the effects, studies, research, evaluations, etc.
- The draft normative acts will, in their motivation, have expressly mentioned in terms of compatibility with European Union law and possible future measures or circumstances regarding the necessary harmonization.

The acts adopted by the local public administration authorities in the preamble must contain a motivation in law, in other words, the legal norm of the local public administration Law 215/2001, which is the basis in whose power it was adopted.

Lack of motivation and legal sanction of lack of motivation for the legal act.

[5] Mircea Anghene, , Motivation of administrative acts - a factor for the strengthening of legality and the approach of citizens administration, in "Studies and legal research", no. 3/1972, pag. 504

[6] Jean Rivero, Jean Waline,Droit administratif, 18th edition, Dalloz, Paris, 2000, pag. 106

[7] Hartmut Maurer, Droit administratif allemand, traduit par M.Fromont, Librairie générale de droit et de jurisprudence, Paris, 1994, pag. 246.

In law no. 24/2000 on the normative technical norms for the drafting of normative acts does not provide legal sanctions for the situation in which the motivation is not published simultaneously with the normative act.

The constant Romanian doctrinal solution, applicable to the situation of lack of motivation, lies in considering the act as null in terms of content, if the reasons are illegal interfering absolute nullity, and if motivation is missing, the relative nullity occurs.

The legality control exercised by the administrative litigation court extends to the pleas in law and, if the reasons are required by law, these are legality issues.

The reasons invoked, when the law does not require the reasoning of the respective administrative act, represent elements of appreciation of the opportunity of the administrative decision which are not subject to the control of the administrative court.

Examples from the European Jurisprudence.

1. In Ireland and Others v./Commission, the annulled the Commission's decision to exempt the excise duty on mineral oils used as fuel for the production of alumina in certain regions of Ireland, France and Italy, invoking of its own motion a failure to state reasons the reference to the non-classification of this measure in the "existing aid" established by Regulation 658/1999. According to this regulation, art. 1 letter (b) point (V) is deemed to be the aid for which it can be demonstrated that at the time of implementation it was not an aid and that it subsequently became aid due to the evolution of the common market without having been modified by the member state. The Court finds that, in accordance with the community provisions governing the right to excise duty, the exemptions at issue had been authorized and prolonged by several Council decisions adopted on a proposal from the Commission. In those circumstances, the Court considers that, when the Commission excluded the assessment of the aid at issue as existing under the provisions of the Regulation, it wrongly merely stated that that provision was not applicable in the present case[8].
2. In another case, the Salvat pere et fils and Others v./Commission clarified the case-law of the Court on the requirement to state reasons for the Commission's decisions on the measures considered by the Commission to be State aid under Art. 87 CE (current 107TFUE). In that judgment, the Court stated that an examination of the conditions for the application of Article 87 CE cannot be regarded as contrary to the obligation to state reasons as long as the measures in question were part of the same action plan[9].
3. On another occasion, in the judgment of the Department du Loiret v./Commission, the Court found an insufficient statement of reasons for a Commission decision declaring state aid incompatible with the common market to be unlawfully paid to an undertaking in the form of a transfer to a preferential price of a landscaped plot. The Court stated that that decision did not contain the necessary information on the method of calculating the amount of aid to be recovered, in particular with regard to compound interest, in order to update the initial amount of the subsidy.[10]

National jurisprudence.

Decision no. 2973 dated 10 September 2012, passed on appeal by the Bucharest Court of Appeal - Section VIII Administrative and fiscal litigation having as object the annulment of the decision to dismiss from the public office).

"The Bucharest Court of Appeal ruled that the reasons for an administrative decision cannot be limited to considerations relating to the competence of the issuer or its legal basis, but must also contain factual elements enabling the addressees to know, on the one hand, and to assess the grounds for the decision and, on the other hand, to make possible the exercise of legality control. In this sense, the failure to motivate the decision to release from public office is a cause of its nullity, since the obligation to state the reasons for the administrative act is a requirement of legality, accepted both internally and at community level, as a guarantee against arbitrariness."[11]

Conclusions

Analyzing what has been said shows that the motivation of administrative acts is necessary, mandatory, and must be rigorously carried out. In order to be aware of the importance of the motivation operation for its beneficiaries, we have provided examples of European and national jurisprudence. It is highlighted that inadequate, incomplete or vicious reasoning may result in suspension or even annulment of the administrative act by the court. Civil servants are urged by the legal rules in force to avoid making decisions based on legal or imprecise motives and not containing individual observations.

References

- Adrian M. Truichici, Luiza Neagu, Jurisprudență, Anularea actului administrativ - practică judiciară, Ed. Hamangiu, 2016

[8] http://curia.europa.eu/juris/liste.jsf?num=C-272/12&language=RO
[9] http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/ALL/?uri=CELEX:62005TJ0136
[10] http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/RO/ALL/?uri=CELEX:62000TJ0369(01)
[11] http://portal.just.ro/2/Lists/Jurisprudenta/DispForm.aspx?ID=1565

- Antonie Iorgovan, Tratat de drept administrativ, Volumul II, Ed. 4, Ed. All Beck, Bucharest, 2005
- Apostol Tofan, Dana, Instituții administrative europene, Ed. C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2006
- Lazăr Teofil, Drept administrativ european, Ed. Pro Universitaria, Bucharest, 2013
- Negruț, Vasilica Drept administrativ. Partea generală. Bucharest: Ed. Didactică şi Pedagogică, 2015
- Ovidiu Podaru, Actul administrativ, vol. I, Repere pentru o teorie altfel, Editura Hamangiu, București, 2010
- Săraru, Cătălin-Silviu, Legea contenciosului administrativ nr. 554/2004, Examen critic al Deciziilor Curţii Constituţionale, 2004-2014, Editura C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2015
- Trăilescu, Anton, Alin Trăilescu, Legea contenciosului administrativ, ed. 3, Ed. .H.Beck, 2017
- VerginiaVerdinaș, Drept administrativ, Ediția a X-a, revised and updated, Ed. Universul Juridic, Bucharesti, 2017
- CHARTER of 12 December 2007 on the fundamental rights of the European Union available through unrestricted access to the web page: http://legislatie.just.ro/Public/DetaliiDocument/111500
- Code of good administrative behavior, available through unrestricted access to the web page: https://www.ombudsman.europa.eu/ro/resources/code.faces#/page/1
- Tax procedure code, respectively Law no. 207 of 20 July 2015, available through unrestricted access to the web page: http://legislatie.just.ro/Public/DetaliiDocument/172697
- LAW no. 24 of 27 March 2000 on normative technical standards for the drafting of normative acts, available through unrestricted access to http://legislatie.just.ro/Public/DetaliiDocument/21698?isFormaDe Baza=True&rep=True.
- The Strategy for strengthening public administration, approved by G.D. 904/2004 and published in O.J., available through unrestricted access to the web page
- http://www.mdrap.ro/userfiles/strategie_adm_publica.pdf

THE SOCIAL-POLITICAL CONTEXT OF THE UNION OF BUKOVINA WITH THE KINGDOM OF ROMANIA

Cornelia Beatrice Gabriela ENE-DINU*

Abstract

Bukovina was the second province which made the union with its motherland, after Bessarabia. 100 years ago, on November 28th, 1918, the proclamation of the union of Bukovina with Romania occurred, an important historic moment in the building of the Romanian unitary national state, together with the previous union of Bessarabia – March 27th, - and previous union of Transylvania, on December 1st, 1918. On the same date, November 28th, 1918, the General Congress of Bukovina announced the powers of the Entente that the inhabitants of this territory decided to return to old borders, respectively to the Kingdom of Romania, "in virtue of the rights of the people to decide their own fate".

Keywords: Union, Bukovina, General Congress of Bukovina, National Council, Romanian soldiers, 100 years.

1. Bukovina in the 18th century

The 18th century represented for the Romanian Principalities a period in which they came to play an increasingly important role in Europe's politics and diplomacy, thus becoming the subject of military disputes between Austria, Russia and the Ottoman Empire. In the beginning of the century, the Porte imposed in the Principalities the Phanariot regime, which emerged as a necessity in front of the danger posed by Christian powers. During the Phanariot area, series of wars took place between these three powers, most of the times waged on the territory of the Principalities, "by bringing their convoy of misery every time, not to mention Turkish requisitions."[1]

Following the armed conflict between Russia and Ottoman Empire, carried out between 1768-1774, the Treaty of Peace of Kuciuk-Kainardji was concluded, following which the old provisions guaranteeing the autonomy of the Principalities, in other words the return to old habits of the country were reconfirmed. However, after the peace concluded between Russians and the Ottomans, as a result of its diplomatic intervention, Austria obtained from the Porte, on May 3rd, 1775, by means of the Convention of Constantinopole, the assignment of a part of northern Moldavia, on the pretext of facilitating its passage to southern Poland, that it had acquired after the first disjunction of Poland in 1771, a part that acquired the name of Bukovina ("The Land of the Beeches", in Slave languages). Therefore, by actions of venality, blackmail and military pressures materialized in the concentration of troops of Belgrade area, almost 50,000 Romanians passed under Habsburg rule. The protests of the ruler of Moldavia at that time - Grigore the 3rd Ghica – against this decision of separating his country were useless, and, moreover, the ruler was killed two years later. In the Habsburgs view, Grigore Ghica considered himself an independent sovereign.

After Bukovina passed under the administration of Galicia, Austria pursued two objectives: to turn the province into a Slave province and the conversion of Slave population to the Greek-Catholic confession. The reasons of turning the province into a Slave one were represented by the prevention of a potential Moldavian attempt to recover this territory, while the Austrians supported the Ukrainians with their national aspirations[2]. This period is considered by the Romanian historiography as the worst in the history of Bukovina, an opinion shared by several prestigious Austrian Historians, as well as by some contemporary Ukrainian historians.

Under the Metternich regime, Bukovina evolved under the influence of Austria, but continued to be closely linked to Moldavia, the body from which it had been amputated. There have been a series of reforms in education, Church and in respect of the development of the agriculture, industry, crafts and trade.

A major problem was represented the leaving of the Church under the authority of the Metropolitan Church of Iaşi and the entry under Serb jurisdiction, which has generated many protests. This favored the creation of a so-called Ukrainian origin of the old scribes of Bukovina. In 1786 the military administration is also abolished, the attributions being transferred to the Bohemian-Austrian united chancellery of Vienna. Furthermore, the Romanian nobility failed to gain recognition of its feudal rights and the right to have a diet, which led to the withdrawal of some boyar families in Iasi. Spiritual life was making progress despite the Germanization of the Catholic Church: the traditions were preserved, transmitted and perpetuated, and the language of writing the church books remained Romanian.

* Lecturer, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: liadinu78@yahoo.fr)

[1] Neagu Djuvara, O scurtă istorie a românilor povestită celor tineri, Bucharest, 2002, p. 147.

[2] Nicolae Ciachir, Din istoria Bucovinei: 1775-1944, Bucharest, 1999.

2. The main political events in Bukovina in the 19th century

As such, until 1848, Bukovina faced a more prominent Slave phenomenon, as can be seen in the census the figures of which are as follows: 209293 Romanians and 108907 Ruthenians[3].

The revolution of 1848 had consequences in what concerns the national struggle of Bukovinians. The political program of the Revolution in Bukovina included, among the 12 points, the following:

- the separation of Bukovina from Galicia and the fact that it became the "Crown Country", autonomous;
- the preservation of Romanian nationality and the creation of national schools;
- manumission of peasants - by the dissolution of the statute labor and of the teind;
- detachment from the Orthodox Metropolitan Church of Karlovac.

Therefore, these four essential aspects, formulated with tenacity, represented an obvious attempt to stop the removal of Bukovina from the Romanian nature. In their turn, the Ruthenians shared two different positions within the revolution involvement: there was the Pan-Slavism and the national-Ukrainian movement.

Yet, although the revolution was stopped, the House of Habsburg fulfilled the desires of Bukovina, which became a 'country of hereditary crown, thus forming the Duchy of Bukovina. One of the effects of the year of 1848 was the dissolution of serfdom and the apportionment of property of the fugitives, and the Ruthenians benefited the most from the promulgation of the new Constitution, whose intellectual elites propagated the idea that the Ruthenians were in fact the native population and the Romanians would have arrived here later. Although the Habsburg Empire was led by absolutism rules throughout 1849-1860, Bukovin conserved its autonomy, and in 1861 it obtained several rights.

The national struggle of the Romanians from Bukovina was again stimulated by the events of the beginning of 1859, by the union of the two Principalities, as a consequence of which the foundation of the Romanian national state was laid. Furthermore, by the return to Moldavian Principality of the counties of Ismail, Cahul and Bolgrad by the Tsarist Emire, a precedent occurred which favored Bukovina in the attempt to become a part of Moldavia, and implicitly, to return to the body from which it had been amputated. The Romanians from Bukovina studying abroad (especially in Vienna) also transmitted a national revival movement.

On April 5th, 1861, the new Diet of Bukovina met in Cernauti, where the Romanians held the absolute majority until the beginning of the 20th century. Historian Eudoxiu Hurmuzaki played an important role in supporting and defending Romanian interests, being for many years President of the Diet and captain of Bukovina. During this period, the Romanians from Bukovina and not only, will fight to detach from the jurisdiction of Karlovac, in an independent metropolitan.

The effects of the Crimean War and the subsequent events that took place at the European level led to a certain decline of the Habsburg Empire, particularly affected by the defeat before Prussia in 1866, when it ceased to play a central role in continental politics. The national struggle widened within the Empire, so that the Austro-Hungarian dualism was reached, which led to a worsening of the situation of the constituent nationalities of the Empire. Bukovina was not directly affected by this because it was to remain under Austrian rule, but Austro-Hungarian dualism caused the diminishing of its relations with Transylvania and Banat, which were to be subordinated to the Hungarian part of the Empire. The Ruthenian element was favored again in the following period, the Austro-Hungarian Empire wanted to stop the Russian penetration.

By creating the University of Cernăuți in 1875, a powerful German cultural and scientific center, a Habsburg outpost was created in Eastern Europe. A Viennese newspaper, "Neue Freie Presse", made it clear that the purpose of the University of Cernăuţi was to complete the Germanization of Bukovina and to throw civilization rays on Moldavia and Bessarabia[4]. If the Habsburgs had failed to occupy the Principalities by army means, they were attempting by economic and cultural means, thing that represented a positive aspect for the modernization and spiritual emancipation of the Romanians.

Another major event, with great importance and strong influence on the Romanians of Bukovina was represented by the Independence War, where the Bukovinian troops participated as volunteers.

On the domestic political background, the Romanian political parties of Bukovina sought to avoid a collaboration with the Ruthenians, because it was obvious that they were pursuing a policy in favor of their own claiming interests. But the claiming of Bukovina was unsubstantiated for various reasons: from the demographic point of view, the Moldavians represented the majority in this territory, and from the historical point of view the assets of the monasteries represented donation of the Moldavian vaivodes and boyars. Furthermore, after the annexation of Bukovina, the Habsburg Empire has established all laws for the new province to be translated into Romanian.

By the Treaty of Peace of Bucharest (1913), which ended the Second Balkan War, the prestige of Romania increased, representing a new impetus for the Romanians from Bukovina. On this occasion, the political, cultural and scientific contacts between [3] Ilie Corfus, Agricultura în Ţările Române (1848-1864), Bucharest, 1982, p. 21.

[4] Nicolae Ciachir, op. cit., Bucharest, 1999.

Bukovina and the other Romanian provinces are amplified.

3. Participation in the First World War

Bukovina entered the stage of the Great War two years before Romania, thus becoming theatre of military operations as of August 1914, the territory being located between the two empires at war, the Austro-Hungarian and the Tsarist. In 1915, Entente tries to attract Romania at war, by offering to it the Romanian territories possessed by the Austro-Hungarian Empire, including Bukovina. This obviously benefited Russia which could not afford to lose a territory on which it had a strong influence and which, in its turn exerted a Russian influence on the other Romanian territories, materialized mainly by the activity of the University of Cernăuți. Furthermore, Bukovina represented a "corridor" to the Slavic people in the center of the continent: Czechs, Slovaks, Slovenes and Croats. Therefore, the convention signed on July 17th, 1916 provided the guarantee of the territorial integrity and the reunification of Bukovina, Transylvania and Banat to the Old Kingdom. In other words, Bukovina was recognized by Russia as a part of the Romanian unitary national state[5]. Romania's entry into war on the part of the Entente – and implicitly of Russia – triggered a genuine oppression against the Romanians of Bukovina.

Once with the outbreak of the Bolshevik revolution in Russia and the entry of the United States into war, the situation became even more complicated. The Romanian political and cultural elite stood high in favor of the American intervention. The efforts made by the Romanian diplomacy came to fruition, so that in November 1918, Romania obtained a declaration indicating that the United States approved and guaranteed the national aspirations of our country.

On October 27th, 1918 the Constitutional Assembly is set up, which decided as a main scope the union of Bukovina with the other Romanian territories. On November 11th, the Romanian units were going into Cernăuți, and on November 27th, the building of the University was flying the tricolor. One day later, the General Congress of Bukovina established the political relationship of Bukovina with the Romanian Kingdom. In other words, the Declaration of Union was read.

On September 10th, 1919, the peace with Austria is concluded at Saint-Germain, whereby "Austria recedes in favor of Romania, from all rights and titles on the part of the former Duchy of Bukovina located beyond the borders of Romania, as they will be subsequently set up by the main allied and associated powers."[6]

4. The Treaty of Saint-Germain

The Treaty of Peace of Saint Germain en Laye, known as the Treaty of Saint Germain represented the treaty of peace concluded between the Allies of the First World War and the newly created Republic of Austria. The Treaty was signed on September 10th, 1919 by the representatives of Austria and the representatives of 17 states. The treaty recognized the independence of the Republic of Austria (colloquially called at that time German Austria in order to mark the difference to Austria-Hungary), the dismemberment of the Double Monarchy was recognized de jure, by the constitution of the states of Poland, Czechoslovakia and the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, the membership of Bukovina to Romania and South Tyrol to Italy[7].

The Treaty with Austria generated great disputes between the representatives of the great powers and the representatives of smaller countries, set up or reunited, generated mainly by the territorial and ethnic issues on the agenda.

In the plenary session of May 31st, 1919, after the speech of Georges Clemenceau, the Romanian representative was heard. He stressed out that the conclusion of the peace with Austria had left no doubt on the union of Bukovina with Romania; furthermore, he made proposals on the modification of certain articles. In the text of the Treaty of Saint-Germain-en-Laye, Romania only appeared (opinion of I.I.C.Brătianu) in order to make known the conditions which violated its political independence and seriously compromised its economic freedom. He meant that Romania had to sign a "treaty of minorities", and the great powers had the right to check if their rights were met and, furthermore, to grant "free transit" on its territory for goods and persons belonging to allied powers, which affected the state income sources. The officials of Bucharest, including the royal family considered the clause of the minorities as the preamble of the treaty, contrary to "sovereign rights" of Romania, therefore they did not agree to sign it.

The English Foreign Minister, Arthur James Balfour, suggested Romania to be drawn the attention on its attitude, namely to be told that it would not receive the territory in question until it accepted the clause of the minorities and signed the treaty

I.I.C.Brătianu rejected the control of the great powers on small states, but not the control of the League of Nations. Furthermore, he pointed out that his observations were formulated "in the name of the independence of the Romanian state" and of two principles: one concerning "peace, order, brotherhood among the populations of the same state", and the other targeting "the equality of all large and small states in accordance with their domestic law rights".

[5] Idem, Gheorge Bercan, Diplomația europeană în epoca modernă, Bucharest, 1984, p. 480.
[6] Nicolae Daşcovici, Interesele şi drepturile României în texte de drept internațional public, Iași, 1936, p. 22.
[7] Istoria Romaniei intre anii 1918-1981,Gh.I.Ionita,Ioan Cartana,Ioan Scurtu,Gh.Z.Ionescu,Eufrosina Popescu,Vasile Budriga,Doina Smarcea,E.D.P.,Buc.1981

On June 14th, 1919, a meeting of the government was held at Cotroceni Palace presided by king Ferdinand; Iuliu Maniu, the chairman of the Conducting Council and Victor Antonescu, the minister of the country in Paris were invited. Those present had already learned that in Saint-Germain-en Laye, when the terms of the Treaty with Austria had been discussed, Romania had had to face "the accomplished facts". King Ferdinand showed that the purpose of the meeting was Romania's future attitude towards the content of the Treaty with Austria. Victor Antonescu presented a summary of the reasons why Romania could not sign this treaty. Despite the justified protest of the Romanian representatives – Antonescu informed – the treaty was handed over to the Austrian plenipotentiaries, without removing the clauses on the guarantees for minorities, the transit and the customs regime. The final decision in what concerns the attitude of Bucharest diplomacy will be made after Prime Minister I.I.C.Brătianu returns to the country.

As a reaction to the negative attitude of the Conference on the issue of the treaty with Austria, I.I.C.Brătianu left Paris on July 4th, thus considering that his country was "a sovereign state the independence of which nobody challenged."

On September 10th, 1919, the Treaty with Austria was signed at Saint-Germain-en-Laye[8].

The Treaty was divided in 14 parts:

The first part consisted of the Covenant of the League of Nations, which represented a common part of the peace treaties concluded after the First World War.

The second part defines the borders of the Republic of Austria with neighboring countries: Switzerland, Liechtenstein, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, the State of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes (subsequently Yugoslavia) and Italy. The Covenant established the independence of Czechoslovakia (the Czech Republic was part of Transleithania, the Austrian part of the former monarchy), the incorporation of South Tyrol into the territory of the Italian state of Burgenland (region which, during the monarchy, was part of Transleithania, the Hungarian part, especially populated by German ethnics) in Austria. The boarder with the state of Slovenes, Croats and Serbs was partially established, the region of Klagenfurt was to be assigned to one of the two states after a plebiscite.

This third part called "political clauses for Europe" mainly includes a series of provisions on the Austria's bilateral relations with the successor states of the Double Monarchy. Austria committed to recognize the independence of Czechoslovakia and the state of Slovenes, Croats and Serbs, as well as the territories which belonged to Russia on August 1st, 1914 (the Baltic States, Finland, Poland).

Section forth (articles 59-61) established the waiver of Austria in favor of Romania to any rights and titles on the parts of the former Duchy of Bukovina under the possession of Romania. The wording is ambiguous and was used because the borders between Romania, Czechoslovakia and Poland were established after the conclusion of the Treaty of Peace of Saint Germain, but it represents the international recognition of the union of Bukovina with Romania.

Furthermore, this section defines the area of Klagenfurt where the population was mixed (Slovenian and German) where a plebiscite was organized in order to establish the will of the majority of the population to belong either to Austria or to the State of Slovenes, Croats and Serbs.

Of particular importance was Article 88, which provided that the independence of Austria was inalienable, unless the League of Nations had consented to this effect. For this reason, Austria was required to refrain from any action that would compromise its sovereignty. This article was intended to prohibit the unification of Austria with Germany (another state defeated in war).

The fourth part (Austrian interests outside Europa) provided the waiver of the Republic of Austria to a series of treaties and rights of the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy in relations with Morocco, Egypt, Siam (Thailand) and China.

The fifth part (military clauses) provides the limitation of military capacity to 30,000 militaries, including officers.

The other nine parts of the treaty contained provisions relating to the compensations to be paid by Austria, to the Danube shipping regime for the organization of rail transport between Austria and the other states (particularly important, taking into account Austria's position in the European rail system) etc[9].

On September 12th, 1919, I.I.C.Brătianu resigned from the position of prime minister; a new government of technicians was set up, led by general Arthur Vaitoianu. There were several final notifications delivered to Romania at the Peace Conference, whereby it was required to sign the Treaty with Austria, but the authorities of Bucharest did not fulfill the requirements.

After the parliamentary elections of November 1919 the government of the "Parliamentary Block" was set up, chaired by Alexandru Vaida-Voievod. Between December 1st and 3rd 1919 various representatives of the Block were engaged in discussions with the representatives of the Entente, and on such occasion Al. Vaid a-Voievod declared that his government was going to accept the ultimatum (the 12th), under certain conditions; he called for the waiver to the "shameful preamble" of the "Special Convention" of the Treaty of Saint-Germain where it was deemed that the independence of Romania had been recognized in 1878, under the condition of the amendment of art.7 of the Constitution. Thanks to the efforts of Victor Antonescu, the deadline for the expiration of the ultimatum was postponed from December 2nd to December 8th, 1919 and the modification of the letter and spirit of the treaty of minorities. The allied representatives communicated their approval on the change of the treaty of minorities, provided that the ultimatum was accepted.

[8] Istoria Românilor,vol.VIII, University Professor Ioan Scurtu, coordinator.Petre Out PhD, Enciclopedica Publishing House, Buc.2003

[9] Principiul Naţionalităţilor, Romulus Seisanu, typography of newspaper "Universul", Buc.1935

The recognition of the union of Bukovina with Romania raised a low number of issues, but its registration with the Treaty of Saint-Germain was postponed; the registration was to be made after the set up of the boarders with the State of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes.

During the negotiations for the conclusion of the Treaty of Saint-Germain, the British and the French resisted the desires of the Americans of not to grant Romania the whole Bukovina, based on the decision of the General Congress of Cernăuţi. The Americans forced Romania to separate the basin of Ceremus river which economic interests were in the direction of Galicia.

The Romanian diplomacy, when informed on the division of Bukovina, refused to accept the solution and preferred a common border with Poland in Eastern Galicia. Its efforts were focused on the rewording of art.59 which, in the original text, did not recognize Bukovina as a territory belonging to the Romanian state. In its new wording, the article provided: "Austria waivers in favor of Romania all rights and titles on the part of the former duchy of Bukovina, located beyond the borders of Romania", the boarders being those set out in the Unification Decision of November 15/28, 1918. Although the amendments did not abolish the principle under which the great powers (the Council of the League of Nations) assumed the right to "protect" the interests of the minorities of Romania, removed or diminished other clauses affecting the national dignity and sovereignty of the Romanian state.

The representative of Romania at the Peace Conference, general C. Coandă signed, on December 10th, 1919, 6 p.m., the Treaty with Austria and the treaty of minorities. The document was dated December 9th. The positive part of the Treaty of Saint-Germain concerned the dissolution of the Austro-Hungarian dualist monarchy and the recognition of the revolutionary processes that had taken place in the territory of the former empire in 1918. This was also noted by deputy Ion Nistor, who, on the occasion of the ratification of the Treaty by the Assembly of Deputies of Bucharest, declared: "I believe that the abolition of Austria (dualist monarchy) and the ratification of this treaty does not only entail the return of Bukovina to the motherland but, moreover, this treaty has a much greater significance. The dismemberment of the Austro-Hungarian kingdom gave us back Bukovina, Transylvania and Banat, this long-awaited dismemberment made possible our national unification."

5. Application and consequences of the treaty

The boarders of Austria with neighboring countries were delimitated in the following years. The territory of Burgenland entered under the possession of Austria, but in Șopron (Odenburg in German), together with other eight villages, a new referendum was organized in 1921 where the membership to Hungary was decided.

The plebiscite organized in Klagenfurt showed that most of the inhabitants wanted to remain in Austria.

After the economic crisis which followed the end of the war, the Austrian state was not able to pay the damages established under the peace treaty.

Austria, unlike the all the other states defeated in the first world war, did not seek to challenge the peace treaty and return to the previous situation. The majority of the population and political class would have preferred, during the first years after the war, to join the German state, but this possibility was forbidden by the winners who did not want to strengthen Germany.

The issue of the union with Germany remained on the Austrian internal political agenda until 1938, when Austria was annexed to Nazi Germany of Adolf Hitler.

After the World War II, Austria was again recognized as an independent state (full sovereignty was recognized by the State Treaty of 1955), within the borders established by the Treaty of Saint Germain[10].

References

- Bărbulescu, Mihai; Deletant, Dennis; Hitchins, Keith; Papacostea, Serban; Teodor, Pompiliu, Istoria României, , Corint Publishing House, Buc.2005
- Chis, Ioan, Istoria statului si dreptului romanesc, Universul Juridic Publishing, Bucharest, 2013
- Ciachir, Nicolae, Din istoria Bucovinei: 1775-1944, Bucharest, 1999
- Idem, Gheorge Bercan, Diplomaţia europeană în epoca modernă, Bucharest, 1984
- Corfus, Ilie, Agricultura în Ţările Române (1848-1864), Bucharest, 1982
- Dașcovici, Nicolae, Interesele și drepturile României în texte de drept internațional public, Iași, 1936
- Djuvara, Neagu, O scurtă istorie a românilor povestită celor tineri, Bucharest, 2002
- http://foaienationala.ro/bucovina-istoricaevoluti.html
- , Istoria românilor, vol. VI, Românii între Europa clasică şi Europa luminilor (1711-1821), Bucharest, 2002

[10] Istoria României, Mihai Barbulescu, Dennis Deletant, Keith Hitchins, Serban Papacostea, Pompiliu Teodor, Corint Publishing House, Buc.2005

- Ibidem, vol. VII, tom I, Constituirea României moderne (1821-1878), Bucharest, 2003
- Ibidem, vol. VII, tom II, De la independenţă la Marea Unire (1878-1918), Bucharest, 2003
- Ioniţă, Gheorghe; Cartana, Ioan; Scurtu, Ioan; Ionescu, Gheorghe Z.; Popescu, Eufrosina; Budriga, Vasile; Smârcea, Doina, Istoria României între anii 1918-1981, , E.D.P., Buc.1981
- Univ. Prof. Scurtu, Ioan; coordinator Out, Petre PhD., Istoria Românilor, vol. VIII, Enciclopedică Publishing House, Buc.2003
- Seişanu, Romulus, Principiul Naţionalităţilor, typography of newspaper "Universul", Buc.1935

THE LIABILITY OF THE PHD CANDIDATE AND OF THE MEMBERS OF THE DOCTORATE PUBLIC SUSTENANCE COMMISSION FOR INFRINGEMENTS OF DEONTOLOGY RULES IN THE ACTIVITY OF THESIS ELABORATION

Gheorghe BOCȘAN[*]

Abstract

The present paper proposes an analysis of the liability of PhD candidates and members of the doctorate commission for infringements of the deontology and ethics of the elaboration of a PhD thesis.

In last years, Romania toughened the control over the compliance of PhD researchers and the professors monitoring this compliance with the rules of deontology and ethics of scientific research accomplished in the process of formulating the doctorate thesis. These legal standards are regulated mainly by Law on National Education no. 1/2011 and Government Decision no. 681/2011for the approval of the Code on PhD Studies.

This kind of control passes many filters inside the university organising the doctoral studies but also an extern evaluation conceived in two rounds, one before the conferral of the PhD title and another afterwards, by the National Council on Attestation of Titles, Diplomas and University Certificates (CNATDCU).

The form of liability of PhD candidates when infringing deontology rules in the process of elaboration of doctorate thesis is mainly disciplinary, though in certain cases could be based upon non-compliance with the contractual obligations. The liability of the doctorate commission members is predominantly administrative-disciplinary and in some specific situations based on the law of torts.

The study compares the Romanian model of regulation of the matter with the legal provisions on the same topic from France, Italy and the United Kingdom. Reference are made on the role of the state organisms on research evaluation, such as CNATDCU (in Romania), Hcéres (in France), UKRIO (in the United Kingdom) and ANVUR (in Italy).

Keywords: deontology and ethics of doctoral scientific research, integrity of research, liability of the PhD candidate for deontology and ethics infringements, liability of the doctorate commission members, administrative-disciplinary liability, contracts, law of torts, thesis evaluation.

1. Introduction

In the process of analysing the liability for deontology of doctoral research infringements in the process of elaboration of the PhD thesis it is necessary to start from the scope of the doctorate scientific studies, as it is defined by the provisions of art. 158 par. (6) (a) of the Law on National Education no. 1/2011[1], respectively the production of original scientific knowledge, institutionally relevant, on the basis of scientific methods. Therefore, the fundamental elements of the scope of thesis are the scientific originality and the use of scientific methods with a view to produce innovatory knowledge.

The use of scientific methods of research presupposes ipso facto the attendance of deontology and ethics norms which forms the integrity in research. So, in our opinion, there couldn't constitute a valid method of scientific research the one which doesn't respect deontology and ethics (such as if plagiarism, the falsifying of scientific data and the elimination of results that contradict the hypothesis which must be proved through research are used).

In the following study we shall use the notion of ethics of research in the strictest term, even when the rules which regulate it are not legally sanctioned, in contrast with the notion of deontology, which are based upon legal norms which are raised from ethics and moral considerations. Another notion that is used extensively in this area of reflection is that of the integrity of scientific research, representing a cumulus of deontology and ethics. The Romanian laws regards ethics of research as a legally sanctioned domain, as we will see bellow in this study, but that fact does not change however the primary meaning of expression of the moral imperative, of Kantian origin, deprived however of the coercion provided by positive law.

Legal liability could be defined as the legal relation who constitutes itself as a consequence of committing an illicit fact, which represents an act forbidden by a legal norm, action or inaction constituting in the same time a trespass of a legal obligation.

For determining the content of a legal liability relation who appears as a consequence of infringing deontology rules in scientific research conducing to elaboration of the PhD thesis, as regulated for the moment by Law no. 1/2011 and Government Decision no. 681/2011, we shall identify first the legal obligations whose noncompliance is sanctioned by the two mentioned pieces of law.

Legal nature of liability is dependent on the one of the infringed obligation, on the quality of the subject of rights and correlative obligations implicated in the liability relation and on the form of guilt demanded by law for engendering liability, as we will see below.

[*] PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: gbocsan@gmail.com)

[1] Published in the Official Journal of Romania, part I, no. 18 from 10th of January 2011.

2. The obligation of a PhD candidate of respect for deontology rules in elaborating the doctorate thesis

The liability of the PhD candidate in the context illustrated above in the study's title is based upon his or her obligation to respect deontology rules. By this term we understand, primarily, those norms which set off the interdiction of committing the acts which are defined as infringement of academic ethics and deontology by the Code on university's deontology and ethics, referred by art. 306 (3) of Law no. 1/2011 on national education, code on whose elaboration has contributed the commission on academic ethics, proposed to the university's senate for adoption and then incorporated in the University's Chart.

In the same context, the commission on academic ethics and deontology is habilitated, by dispositions of art. 306 (3) (d) of the same law to exercise the attribution set out by the Law no. 206 from 27th of May 2004 regarding the good practices in scientific research, technologic development and innovation activity[2].

According to provisions of art. 20 from the Academic Doctorate Studies Code, approved by Government Decision no. 681 from 29th of June 2011[3] :

"(1) The doctoral school together with the doctorate director have the obligation to inform the PhD candidate about the scientific, professional and university ethics and to verify the respect for those, including: a.) the respect of deontological provisions on the whole realization of doctoral research; b.) the respect of deontological provisions in the writing of the thesis.

(2) The doctoral school and IOUSD[4] take measures on prevention and sanctioning of infringements of norms of scientific, professional and university ethics, according to the code on professional ethics and deontology of the organization.

(3) In the case of academic frauds, of certain infringements of university's ethics or of certain infringements of rules on good conduct in scientific research, including plagiarism, the PhD candidate and/or the director of thesis are liable in the law's terms."

We notice that the infringements of deontological rules in the elaboration of doctorate thesis, comprising both activities set out by points a.) and b.) of article 20 paragraph (1), above cited, could be subject to sanctions applied by the doctoral school and IOUSD. The last paragraph of art. 20 of the Academic Doctorate Studies Code sets out expressly the liability of the PhD candidate and the doctorate director for academic frauds, infringements of university's ethics and infringements of good practices in scientific research, including plagiarism.

This legal text, which applies also to the liability for deontology infringements in the activity of thesis elaboration, identifies also another category of acts which conduces to engaging of this type of liability, namely the infringement of norms regarding the good practices in scientific research, provided by Law no. 206/2004. On this respect, the mentioned text corroborates to the one in art. 306 par. (3) of Law no. 1/2011, to which we referred above.

Art. 2 and art. 2^1 of Law no. 206/2004 as amended to the present date sets out the acts which constitutes infringements to the good practices in scientific research activity which could be committed by the PhD candidate in the activity of realization of the thesis, among others:

- fabrication of results and data and their presentation as experimental data, data obtained by calculus and computer numeric simulation or as data or results obtained through analytic calculations or deductive reasoning;
- falsification of experimental data, of data obtained by calculus and computer numeric simulation or as data or results obtained through analytic calculations or deductive reasoning;
- plagiarism;
- auto plagiarism;
- unauthorized publication of certain results, hypothesis, theories or scientific methods unpublished yet.

The law defines the main concepts used in text.

Thus, art. 4 par. (1) (d) sets out that plagiarism means "presentation in a written work or an oral communication, including in digital format, of texts, ideas, demonstrations, data, hypotheses, theories, results or scientific methods extracted from written works, including those in digital format, belonging to other authors, without mentioning that and without sending to the original sources" and art. (4) (d) defines auto plagiarism as "presentation in a written work or an oral communication, including in digital format, of texts, ideas, demonstrations, data, hypotheses, theories, results or scientific methods extracted from written works, including those in digital format, belonging to the same author or authors, without mentioning that and without sending to the original sources".

Plagiarism and auto plagiarism could be found as such only in Law no. 206/2004 on good practices in scientific research, technologic development and innovation. Law no. 8/1996 regarding the author's rights and connected rights doesn't mention plagiarism or auto plagiarism as forms of infringement of rights regulated by that law because: "Law no. 8/1996, art. 9 (a) excludes clearly from the protection ideas, theories,

[2] Published in the Official Journal of Romania, part I, no. 505 from 4th of June 2004.
[3] Published in the Official Journal of Romania, part I, no. 551 from 3rd of august 2011, amended by Government Decision no. 134/2016.
[4] IOUSD = acronym with the meaning Institution Organizing University Studies of Doctorate; concepts, discoveries and inventions contained in a work. As all those are representing the work's scientific originality, we could sustain only the second opinion which says that the protection's object in the case of a scientific work is the form exposing the result of the author's scientific research activity. But, in scientific research should be respected the rules established by Law no. 206/2004 on good practices in scientific research, technologic development and innovation activity, which by art. 4 confers protection to ideas too"[5].

According to art. 1 par. (4) of Law no. 206/2004, PhD candidates doesn't appear as addressee of the law, excepting perhaps the situation when they receive public funding for their research. However, we express the opinion that practicing forbidden acts constitutes an infringement of deontology rules. This conclusion is based upon the Law on education texts regarding the doctoral activity, among them, art. 306 referred before in the study and the direct dispositions aiming the same, such as those of art. 20 of the Academic Doctorate Studies Code also referred to above.

Thus, in the area of norms regulating good practices in scientific research (the activity of elaboration of the PhD thesis being such an activity), there are legal provisions included in Law on National Education, in Academic Doctorate Studies Code and in Law no. 206/2004, which refers to the other two mentioned laws, constructing a complex legal framework that stands at the basis of the liability for infringements of university and scientific research deontology. Regarding this, we notice also the provisions of art. 4 par. (2) from Law no. 206/2004, according to those "gross infringements of good practices in research and development activity are those set out by art. 310 of Law no.1/2011" and this last article says "gross infringements of good practices in scientific research and academic activity are: a.) the plagiarism of results and publications of other authors; b.) fabrication of results or substitution of results with fictive data; c.) using fake information in demands for grants and funding".

Art. 65 of the Academic Doctorate Studies Code establishes the principle of solidarity in liability between the PhD candidate and the director of the thesis for "the respect of quality standards and professional ethics, including the assurance of content originality, as regulated by art. 170 of the Law no. 1/2011".

More, in conformity with the provisions of art. 9 (h) of "The evaluation methodology of PhD thesis", constituting Annex no. 1 of Minister of National Education and Scientific Research Order no. 3482/2016 from 24th of March 2016 regarding the approval of the Regulation of establishment and functioning of the National Council on Attestation of Titles, Diplomas and Academic Certificates[6], the doctorate case should contain "a scanned copy of the declaration signed by both by the PhD candidate and the director of thesis regarding the assuming of liability for the content originality of the doctorate thesis and for the conformity with the quality and professional ethics standards established by art. 143 par. (4) and art. 170 from the Law on National Education no. 1/2011, amended to date and art. 65 par. (5) – (7) from the Government Decision no. 681/2011, amended to date". The necessity of such a declaration highlights once more the legal obligation of the PhD candidate, under the scientific supervision of the director of thesis, to respect the ethics and deontology standards in the doctoral scientific research activity. Moreover, this declaration opens the way to possible criminal liability for lying in an official statement committed by the PhD student in the situation where he or she perpetrated acts of infringement of scientific research ethics in the doctoral studies.

As we proved above, the obligation of the PhD candidate to follow the rules of deontology in the activity of thesis elaboration is established ex legge, but also through the internal regulations of the doctoral school or of IOUSD, mainly by the Code on academic ethics and deontology.

3. The engaging of PhD candidate's liability for violation of deontology rules in the elaboration if thesis activity

The director of the thesis, responsible together with the PhD candidate for the quality and respect of ethics and deontology in scientific research conducing to the thesis, is the first one called upon by the law to take measures in the situation of infringements of deontology rules by the candidate. He or she has the legal possibility to seize the ethics commission when the acts perpetrated by the PhD candidate take the form of a specific violation set out by law or by the University's Code of Ethics and Deontology. Moreover, the director of thesis, as any member of the guidance commission, has the choice to oppose the official deposal and the public sustenance of the thesis, according to art. 67 par. (2) (c) from the Academic Doctorate Studies Code.

The members of the public sustenance of the thesis have the obligation, based on the provisions of art. 68 par. (2) of the Academic Doctorate Studies Code:" a.) to seize the ethics commission of the university in which the PhD student is matriculated and the ethics commission of the university in which the director of thesis is an employee for the investigation and finalizing of the case, including by the expulsion of the PhD student, according to art. 306-310, art. 318-322 of Law no. 1/2011 and to the provisions of Law no. 206/2004 on good practices in scientific research, technologic development and innovation, amended to date; b.) to notify the infringements to all members of the doctorate commission and to propose the rating « unsatisfactory»" when "identifying in the framework of thesis evaluation prior to the public sustenance or in the sustenance time of gross infringements of good practices in scientific research and academic activity, including plagiarism of the results or publications of other authors, fabrication of results or substitution of results by fictive data".

[5] V. Ros, Dreptul proprietății intelectuale. Vol. I. Drepturile de autor, drepturile conexe și drepturile sui-generis, Editura C. H. Beck, București, 2016, p. 226, my translation.

[6] Published in the Official Journal of Romania, part I, no. 248 from 4th of April 2016.

Each person has the legal possibility to claim the infringement of deontology rules in the activity of elaboration of a doctorate thesis, following mainly the disclosure of the thesis by depositing one exemplary of it at the IOUSD library and in the case when the author doesn't plan to publish the thesis, by posting it on an electronic platform, specially conceived by the Ministry of National Education and Scientific research with this scope.

Another situation of engaging PhD candidate liability for the infringements of deontology in the thesis is the one in which the infringement was detected by CNATDCU[7] following a complaint or ex officio, according to the provision set pot by art. 68 par. (6) and art. 69 par. (5) from the Academic Doctorate Studies Code.

4. The legal nature of the liability of PhD candidate for infringement of deontology rules in the elaboration of thesis

As we have seen before, the regulation of the acts which engender this kind of liability is realized by the law, so the infringement of deontology rules by the PhD candidate when elaborating the thesis represents an infringement of the law; however, this kind of infringement could be detrimental to the doctorate contract too. We have to keep in mind also that the PhD candidate isn't necessary employed on a contract basis by an organization which takes part of an IOUSD or constitutes an IOUSD.

Bearing in mind all these consideration, we establish that the legal liability that we referred to is of administrative nature. This isn't a contractual liability from the point of view of the PhD candidate because it has as legal basis mainly the law itself, even so there could be a repetition of this provisions in the doctoral contract. In the same time, there couldn't be a disciplinary liability because such a liability characterizes an employment relation, or the doctoral activity and the elaboration of the thesis are not realized on an employment basis. The possible employment relation binding the candidate to an IOUSD does not have as an object the thesis elaboration, but a teaching activity subsidiary to the doctoral studies.

For infringements of good practices in the scientific research, technologic development and innovation activities, Law no. 206/2004, in art. 2^1 par. (6) sets out that the nature of liability is "ethical". Subject of this responsibility could be also the PhD candidate. We appreciate that this form of liability represents a particular form of administrative liability.

Separately of the above qualification, when deontology infringements are a result of responsibility situations derived from the doctoral studies contract and could be sanctioned only by the ethics commission of a doctoral school or of a university part of an IOUSD or being an IOUSD because they are not established through the law, we appreciate that the liability of the PhD student could be, exceptionally, of civil contractual nature.

5. Sanctions applicable to the PhD student for infringement of deontology in the elaboration of the thesis and the consequences of liability

According to art. 319 of the Law on National Education no. 1/2011, "The sanctions there could be applied by the university ethics commission to students and PhD candidates for university ethics infringements are: a.) written reprimand; b.) expulsion; c.) other sanctions set out by the University Code on Ethics and Deontology."

Another sanction for deontology infringements perpetrated by a PhD candidate is the refusal of the accept for public sustenance of the thesis, according to art. 67 par. (3) of the Academic Doctorate Studies Code, which stands: "Following identification of infringements of good practices in research and development, including plagiarism of results and publication of other authors, fabrication of results or substituting results with fictive data, in the framework of thesis evaluation by the director of the thesis or by the consulting commission, the approval of public sustenance of thesis shall be denied".

When the doctorate public sustenance commission identifies infringements of deontology in the elaboration of the thesis, besides the notification of the ethics commission, there is the possibility to note the thesis as "unsatisfactory" and to show the elements of content that should be revised or completed in the thesis (including those that are the product of infringement of deontology), also the possibility to demand a new public sustenance of the thesis, followed by a new eventual "unsatisfactory" note, which will automatically conduce to denial of the doctorate title and expulsion of the PhD student (art. 68 par. 4 of the Academic Doctorate Studies Code).

Also, another possible sanction could be the invalidation of the thesis by CNATDCU whenever the conditions established by art. 68 par. (6) of the Academic Doctorate Studies Code: "In the case of detection of misconduct in professional ethics, including plagiarism, by CNATDCU members of an evaluation commission of a thesis, these members should invalidate the thesis, communicate the conclusions to the other members of the evaluation commission and should seize the General Council of CNATDCU for the analysis of director of thesis responsibility or of the doctoral school liability and for the application of art.69 par. (5)".

[7] CNATDCU = acronym used for the National Council of Attestation of Titles, Diplomas and University Certificates, which is part of the Ministry of National Education and Scientific Research.

In case that CNATDCU is seized by an interested person with allegation of deontology infringement after the conferral of the PhD title, the General Council of CNATDCU shall ask the point of view of IOUSD in the case. In the situation where IOUSD confirms the infringements, a decision regarding the proposal of the withdrawal of the PhD title, signed by rector and legally advised by the university shall be send to CNATDCU.

The PhD title shall be withdrawn from the one which obtained it by infringing the deontology, when this fact is detected by the General Council of CNATDCU, at the proposal by its President, by the Ministry of National Education and Scientific Research. After evaluation of the director of thesis guilt or of the doctorate school liability, the same Ministry, at CNATDCU's President proposal, could apply sanctions such as the withdrawal of the quality of director of thesis and the withdrawal of the accreditation of the doctoral school (according to art. 69 par. 5 from the Academic Doctorate Studies Code.

Also, art. 170 par. (1) from Law no. 1/2011 on National Education sets out that "In case of infringements of quality or professional ethics standards, the Ministry of National Education, on the basis of external evaluation reports, done by CNATDC, the National Council on Scientific Research, the Ethics and University Management Council or the National Council of Scientific Research, Technologic Development and Innovation Ethics could undertake the next sanctions, alternatively or simultaneous: a.) the withdrawal of the quality of director of thesis; b.) the withdrawal of PhD title; c.) the withdrawal of the accreditation of the doctoral school, which measure is implying also the withdrawal of the doctoral school right to organize admission examination for matriculation of new PhD candidates".

In conclusion, we appreciate that the liability of the PhD candidate for infringements of the deontology rules in the process of elaboration of the thesis, as set out by Law no. 1/2011 and Government Decision no. 681/2011 is an administrative liability, which attracts mainly the sanction of expulsion, the one of the withdrawal of PhD title, but could generate for other persons the withdrawal of the quality of director of thesis, or other sanctions (based on an administrative liability) and the withdrawal of the accreditation of the doctoral school.

6. The liability of the members of public sustenance commission for the deontology infringements perpetrated by the candidate in the elaboration of the thesis

The public sustenance commission is composed by: the president, as representative of the IOUSD, the director of thesis and at least three official referends, specialists on the thesis domain. At least two of them should be external of the IOUSD.

In the framework of paragraph II.) of this article we showed that the members of the public sustenance commission have the obligation, according to art. 68 par. (2) of the Academic Doctorate Studies Code: " a.) to seize the ethics commission of the university in which the PhD student is matriculated and the ethics commission of the university in which the director of thesis is an employee for the investigation and finalizing of the case, including by the expulsion of the PhD student, according to art. 306-310, art. 318-322 of Law no. 1/2011 and to the provisions of Law no. 206/2004 on good practices in scientific research, technologic development and innovation, amended to date; b.) to notify the infringements to all members of the doctorate commission and to propose the rating « unsatisfactory»" when "identifying in the framework of thesis evaluation prior to the public sustenance or in the sustenance time of gross infringements of good practices in scientific research and academic activity, including plagiarism of the results or publications of other authors, fabrication of results or substitution of results by fictive data".

According to art. 68 par. (4) of the Academic Doctorate Studies Code, when the doctorate public sustenance commission identifies infringements of deontology in the elaboration of the thesis, besides the notification of the ethics commission, there is the possibility to note the thesis as "unsatisfactory" and to show the elements of content that should be revised or completed in the thesis (including those that are the product of infringement of deontology), also the possibility to demand a new public sustenance of the thesis, followed by a new eventual "unsatisfactory" note, which will automatically conduce to denial of the doctorate title and expulsion of the PhD student.

Thus, we appreciate that the obligation of the public sustenance commission regarding the infringement of deontological rules by the candidate in the elaboration of the thesis are the following:

1. to abstain from participating to the works of the commission when a conflict of interest appears;
2. to discover the infringements – this constitutes an obligation of prudence for the commission's members; the failure to detect infringements of research deontology when this activity requires extraordinary and rare abilities, even compared to the very high scientific standards specific to the members of the commission could not entail their liability;
3. to seize the ethics commission of the university where the PhD candidate is matriculated and the ethics commission of the university where the director of thesis is employed;

4. to notify the findings to all the members of the commission;
5. to propose the note "unsatisfactory" for the thesis;
6. to publicly present the elements of the thesis which are the product of deontology infringements and demand for their reformation or completion;
7. to note "unsatisfactory" the thesis at the second sustenance if the consequences of deontology infringements were not eliminated; this event shall entail automatically the expulsion of the candidate and the refusal of conferral of the title.

The infringement of any of the above obligations attracts the commission member liability.

Concerning the problem of establishing the liability's nature of the commission member who did not abstain in case of conflict of interest, we appreciate that this is an administrative liability, generated by the perpetration of the transgression set out in art. 2^1 par. (3) (a) of Law no. 206/2004, consisting in "non-disclosure of the conflict of interest situations in elaboration or participation in evaluations".

Regarding the liability in case of non-completion of obligation stated in point 2.), we express the opinion that the liability exists only in the situation of intent or gross negligence in evaluation because, as we state before, the obligation of ethics infringement detection could not be absolute neither operant beyond a reasonable level of expectations.

Taking in consideration all mentions made above, if the deontology infringement non-detection was caused by intent or gross negligence from the part of the commission members, this may attract a form of tort liability aiming to the repair of the damages caused to IOUSD, if such damages were caused.

Because nor the Law on national education no. 1/2011 neither the Academic Doctorate Studies Code doesn't provide sanctions for non-completion of point 3.) – 7.) obligations, we distinguish between the following situations:

a) If the infringement of the obligation constitutes itself a transgression of ethics rules or of good practices in scientific research, the liability shall be administrative as legal nature.

This is the case, beyond conflict of interest, of the obstruction of an ethics committee or analysis commission activity (art. 2^1 par. (6) (e) of Law no. 206/2004), of the infringements of legal provisions aiming to assure the respect for good practices norms in scientific research (letter f. of the same article) or of the knowledge of the perpetration by others of the infringements and refusal to seize the ethics commission (letter b. of the same article).

For such infringements, the management or the ethics commission of the university or of the scientific research institute where the commission member is employed shall apply to him/her one or more of the sanctions set out in art. 11^1 of Law no. 206/2004, the most appropriate for such situations being: written reprimand or suspension for one to ten years of the right to participate in an examination commission. In the situation where the doctorate commission member is employed of a university or scientific research institute, some of the mentioned deeds could entail a disciplinary liability under the labor law, producing the consequence of a disciplinary sanction.

b) If the infringement of the obligation constitutes itself a transgression of ethics rules or of good practices in scientific research, the liability shall be established under the law of torts if a damage has been caused to the doctoral school or to IOUSD.

As we have already seen, in case of infringement of ethics, including plagiarism, the Ministry of National Education, on the proposal made by CNATDCU, could undertake the sanction of the withdrawal of the doctoral school's accreditation, which measure is implying also the withdrawal of the doctoral school right to organize admission examination for matriculation of new PhD candidates. Such a measure is highly damageable to the university morally and materially. In the situation where that could be established a causality nexus between the damages and the perpetration with intent or by negligence of a tort by a doctorate commission member, a civil liability based on the law of torts could be entailed. The sanction for such a deed consists in the recuperation of caused damages.

For infringements of norms on good practices in scientific research, technologic development and innovation, Law no. 206/2004, art. 21 par. (6) sets out an "ethic liability". The subjects of such a liability could also be the doctorate commission members. We appreciate that this liability form represents a particular typology of administrative liability, precisely of an administrative-disciplinary liability.

In synthesis, the liability of doctorate commission members for infringements of deontology rules by PhD candidates in the activity of thesis elaboration, as set out by Law no. 1/2011 and Government Decision no. 68/2001 is mainly of an administrative nature, namely administrative-disciplinary, as the doctrine of administrative law has called it[8]. Separately, it is possible to entail a liability based on the law of torts where the acts caused a material or moral damage to the doctoral school or to IOUSD. Both liabilities could be cumulated.

Another consequence of the PhD candidate's liability or of a doctorate commission member who perpetrated serious violation to the rules of scientific research and university's activity consists in the interdiction of occupying academic and scientific positions, established by art. 325 of Law no. 1/2011 on national education.

[8] Concerning the administrative-disciplinary liability, see V. Vedinaș, Drept administrativ, Ediția a X-a, revăzută și actualizată, Universul Juridic, București, 2017, capitolul XXV – Răspunderea în dreptul administrativ. Răspunderea disciplinară., § 6 – Răspunderea administrativ-disciplinară, p. 533 și urm.

7. Comparative law elements

The principal variable on which depends the liability for ethics and deontology infringements in scientific research in different legal systems is the level of real autonomy conferred to universities. This principle is universally claimed in the western world, but however it has a concrete content more or less solid.

The degree of de facto academic autonomy is influencing the regulatory mechanisms of the liability for infringement of scientific research ethics and deontology, meaning that to a real autonomy of the universities is corresponding a maximum regulation and procedure transfer in the area that we are referring to, with very few possibilities of state centralized control.

In such an ideal model, the infringements of ethics and deontology in scientific research are regulated exclusively through academic charts documents, realized upon good practices models, proposed by state agencies, but also by NGO's and academic think-tanks. Such models are not imperative, representing more of a kind of soft law.

Observing the positive law of France, Italy and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, we notice that the law is rather minimal in establishing the ethics and deontology rules, leaving a very large space to universities and public or private research institutes for regulating themselves ethics and deontology, in conformity with the universal standards.

7.1. Italian law on university professor's liability for ethics and deontology of research infringements – a relevant example of positive re-evaluation of academic autonomy

The most important piece of Italian legislation in this domain is Law no. 240 from 30 December 2010 on norms regarding the organizing of universities, the statute of academic personnel and the recruitment of the personnel and for Government empowerment for improving the quality and efficiency of the academic system, named also Gelmini Law[9], after the name of the Italian Minister of education from Berlusconi's Government who proposed the law to Parliament, Mariastella Gemini.

This law brought to major novelties from the point of view of sanctioning ethics and deontology transgressions of academic personnel, including directors of thesis and members of public sustenance commissions, but also for PhD candidates.

For understanding this legislative reform it should be said that academic personnel in Italy has the basic statute of a public servant, thus it applies to the members of this professional corpus all disciplinary regulation generally applicable to all public servants, which, initially were regulated through collective employment conventions (traditionally containing a part called "disciplinary code"), and nowadays more and more regulated through legal dispositions pertaining to administrative law, having a sectorial character[10].

The first novelty mentioned above consists in the regulation of substantial law which assures the basis for ethics and deontological liability solely by each university's ethics code, without the existence of a generic law on ethics norms applicable in all situations[11]. Thus, art. 2 par. (4) of Law no. 240/2010 contains the obligation for universities to adopt a code of ethics in a maximum of 180 days from the moment of the application of the law. The ethics code should be applicable to the whole academic community, meaning academic teaching stuff, administrative personnel, students and PhD candidates. This ethics code should establish also the interdiction of any form of discrimination or abuse, regulation of conflict of interest and infringement of intellectual property. The same article of the law establishes that the procedure for detecting, proving and application of sanction should be in the competence of the university's Senate, at the rector's proposal.

The second notable type of provisions in the domain of ethics liability is the one set out by art. 10 of Law no. 240/2010 about disciplinary competence. These dispositions are applicable in the case of infringement by university professors, including directors of thesis and members of the public sustenance commission of the thesis of the rules provided for by collective employment conventions or administrative law provisions. If certain obligations set out in the ethics academic codes contains disciplinary sanctions provided also by laws and collective employment conventions, the infringements should be submitted to art. 10 of Law no. 240/2010 and not to art. 2 par. (4) of the same law. There is an area where ethics illicit intersects disciplinary illicit, becoming under the law only disciplinary illicit.

Thus, according to art. 10 of the law, in each university should function a disciplinary college, formed entirely by university professors and scientific researchers based in that university. The disciplinary proceedings are based on the justice among peers' principle and referred only to the gross infringements which have the potential to entail disciplinary consequences. The disciplinary college could be seized only by the university's rector. The investigated person

[9] Legge 30 dicembre 2010, n.240 Norme in materia di organizzazione delle universita`, di personale accademico e reclutamento, nonche` delega al Governo per incentivare la qualita` e l' efficienza del sistema universitario, Gazzetta Ufficiale della Republica Italiana, Serie Generale n. 10 del 14-01-2011-Suppl. Ordinario n. 11, my own translation.

[10] B.G. Mattarella, La responsabilità disciplinare dei docenti universitari dopo la legge Gelmini: profili sostanziali, legal on-line publication "ROARS", Return on Academic ReSearch, at internet address https://www.roars.it/online/la-responsabilita-disciplinare-dei-docenti-universitari-dopo-la-legge-gelmini-profili-sostanziali/ , accessed on 10 February 2018, my own translation.

[11] L. Ferluga., La responsabilità disciplinare dei docenti universitari, article published on an on-line legal portal „diritto.it" on 29 July 2017, accessed at internet address https://www.diritto.it/la-responsabilita-disciplinare-dei-docenti-universitari/ , on 10 Februry 2018.

could be assisted by a "confidence defender" or by a lawyer.

The disciplinary college takes a decision in 30 days from initiation of the procedure (which is the day when the rector officially seized the college). Next, in another interval of 30 days, the university's Administration Council applies a sanction.

As we can see, the Italian regulation of PhD candidate, director of thesis and members of the public sustenance commission liability for ethics and deontology infringements in scientific research aiming to the elaboration of thesis is a generic one, superposing itself to university's ethics and administrative rules containing disciplinary sanctions in academic activity, without special provisions dedicated to doctoral studies.

Concerning the legal nature of such a liability, we should distinguish between the following situations:

- the university's ethics code infringement by a PhD student entails an ethic liability, established by university's Senate;
- the university's ethics code infringement by the director of thesis or by a member of public sustenance commission, when the infringement acts are not regulated by administrative law as entailing disciplinary liability, attracts also ethics liability;
- the university's ethics code infringement by the director of thesis or by a member of public sustenance commission, when the infringement acts are regulated by administrative law as entailing disciplinary liability or other infringements, even so they are not regulated by the university's ethics code, but their perpetration attracts disciplinary liability applicable to a public servant based on an administrative law, entails administrative-disciplinary liability.

Thus, the administrative-disciplinary liability for infringements situated in our debate area is common to both Romanian and Italian law.

7.2. United Kingdom and the code of practice for researchers as model which could be transposed to academic regulations

The Government agency of the UK in matters in matters od ethics and deontology of scientific research is UKRIO – UK Research Integrity Office. One of the main function of UKRIO is the elaboration of models for deontological codes, which will be integrated and adapted afterwards by universities and research institutes.

Thus, two of the main documents produced by UKRIO are: "Code of Practice for Research. Promoting good practice and preventing misconduct"[12] and "Procedure for Investigation of Misconduct in Research"[13].

The Code insists on definition and classification of ethics and deontology infringements in scientific research, enumerating infringements such as: fabrication, falsification, misrepresentation of data and/or interests and/or involvement, plagiarism, failures to follow accepted procedures or to exercise due care in carrying out responsibilities for: avoiding unreasonable risk or harm to humans, animals used in research and the environment and the proper handling of privileged or private information on individuals collected during the research (point 3.16 of the Code).

As point 1.2. of the Code sets out "recognising that many forms of guidance already exist, the intention is that research organisations may use the principles and standards outlined in this Code as benchmarks when drafting or revising their own, more detailed, codes of practice".

With the aim to facilitate the drafting of universities Codes of research integrity, UKRIO has elaborated also the second document that we mentioned above, the Procedure for Investigation of Misconduct in Research. Thus, the universities and research institutes implement this procedure and adapts it to their structure and internal organisation. As an example, London's Global University (UCL) has elaborated at 1st of January 2017 a "Procedure for investigating and resolving allegations of misconduct in academic research"[14].

Paragraph 1 of the UCL Procedure stands that: "this Procedure follows closely the model procedure prepared by the UK Research Integrity Office (UKRIO), although some necessary minor adaptations have been made to reflect UCL's local circumstances and terminology. However, these adaptations are not so significant as to mean that UCL is not adhering to the key features of the UKRIO model procedure". The adaptations have been operated by the Committee on Research Governance of UCL.

The UKRIO model procedure uses a generic terminology, comprising abstract terms, such as "named person" for the individual designated to receive the complaints. The university is the entity which designates that person. In the UCL case, the "named person" is the Registrar.

Also, the university's rules send to the disciplinary procedure of the university, procedure which is regulated distinctly by each university. All these rules apply also to scientific doctoral research.

What is really impressive in the model procedure of UKRIO is the legal accuracy. The procedure is divided in three phases. In the first phase, one of the main activity is directed to the establishment of the fact that the complaint for integrity in research infringements has been made in good faith, that "the allegations are not mistaken, frivolous, vexatious and/or malicious". This activity should be completed in 10 working days (point C.15 of the Procedure).

[12] UK Research Integrity Office, Code of Practice for Research. Promoting good practice and preventing misconduct. September 2009, internet address http://ukrio.org/wp-content/uploads/UKRIO-Code-of-Practice-for-Research.pdf , accessed 12 February 2018.

[13] UK Research Integrity Office, Procedure for Investigation of Misconduct in Research, August 2008, internet address http://ukrio.org/wp-content/uploads/UKRIO-Procedure-for-the-Investigation-of-Misconduct-in-Research.pdf , accessed at 12 February 2018

[14] London's Global University (UCL), Procedure for investigating and resolving allegations of misconduct in academic research, 1 January 2017, internet address https://www.ucl.ac.uk/srs/governance-and-committees/resgov/research-misconduct-procedure-jan-2017.pd , accessed at 12 February 2018.

C. 16. of the Procedure says: "If the named Person decides that the allegations are mistaken, frivolous, vexatious and/or malicious, the allegation will then be dismissed. The decision should be reported in writing to the Respondent and the Complainant (…)". In such a case "the Named Person should consider recommending to the appropriate authorities that action to be taken under the Organisation's disciplinary process against anyone who is found to have made frivolous, vexatious and/or malicious allegations of misconduct in research (…)" (C.17.).

Another scope of this preliminary phase is to take all necessary measures for preventing or removing any danger for persons, animals and/or the environment (C.6.a.). In the same phase, there is the possibility to seize government agencies responsible of different aspects of human activity which could be endangered by infringement of ethics and deontology in research (such as, for example, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affaires, Department of Health and Social Care etc.). In the same phase, the Named Person takes all necessary measures for conservation of evidence about the facts.

In the next phases, the Screening Panel shall consider if the allegations are sufficiently credible, serious and made in good faith as to justify a thorough investigation. Then, at recommendation of the Screening Panel, the Named Person forms an Investigation Panel, which will conduct proper investigation of the facts, based upon administered evidence, respecting also the right of defence for the Respondent, the presumption of innocence, the right to an equitable process etc. The standard of proof is that of "the predominance of probability", an intermediary standard, which is higher than the one characterising civil procedure: "the predominance of proofs" but lower that the criminal procedure uses: "beyond a reasonable doubt".

In the situation of proving the infringements of research integrity, the Investigation Panel draws up a report, comprising mediation solutions and, if the case, send the report to the disciplinary organism of the university or research organisation. The disciplinary procedure is differently structured for students, including PhD students and academic personnel because of the inexistence/ existence of an employment contract under labour law. All the way to the finalising of the disciplinary process, the university has to fill up periodic reports to UKRIO.

The link between the procedure of investigation allegation of misconduct in academic research and the disciplinary procedure, which are distinct, is very well delineated in point C.6.b. of the Procedure: "Where allegations include behaviour subject to defined sanctions in the Organisation's disciplinary process, then the Named Person should take steps to implement the disciplinary process. As above, the Procedure may continue in parallel with the disciplinary process but may have to be suspended, to be concluded later, or to be declared void by the Named Person".

Certain UK universities of great tradition and name have a single academic document regulating both the substantial and the procedural law in the case of integrity in research infringements, which could be extremely brief and concentrated, but accompanied by numerous academic custom[15].

Thus, we appreciate that in UK law, the liability for infringement of integrity in scientific research is mainly disciplinary, regulated and conducted by the universities and for some infringements that are not encompassed in disciplinary procedures, there is only a liability for integrity, a kind of "ethics liability", set out by universities on the model Code and procedure elaborated by UKRIO.

7.3. France – the accreditation of universities for doctoral studies as guarantee of respect for the ethics and deontology rules in doctoral scientific research

The regulation of doctoral studies in France in very similar to that of Romania, but certainly presents certain notable particularities.

The most important piece of legislation in this domain is the Ministry's of National Education and Science Decision from 25thof May 2016 for the establishment of national framework for the formation and modalities conducing to the awarding of national doctorate diploma[16].

Very alike the Romanian Law on national education no. 1/2011, the French ministerial decision shows in art. 1 that: "doctoral formation is a formation by and for research" and "conduces to production of new knowledge".

Art. 5 of the above-mentioned Decision sets out that the accreditation decision of a university signifies empowerment to deliver the PhD diploma in specialities that were authorised for this aim and the accreditation of doctoral schools is realised by the High Council of Research and Superior Education Evaluation[17] (Hcéres).

The accreditation of doctoral schools and universities makes that the definitive decision over the [15] It is the case of Oxford University, which has adopted "Academic integrity in research: Code of practice and procedure", that could be found at internet address http://www.admin.ox.ac.uk/personnel/cops/researchintegrity/ , accessed at 14 February 2018.

[16] Arrêté du 25 mai 2016 fixant le cadre national de la formation et des modalités conduisant à la délivrance du diplôme national de doctorat, JORF no. 0122 du 27 mai 2016, NOR: MENS 1611139A, my own translation.

[17] Haut conseil de l'évaluation de la recherche et de l'enseignement supérieur (Hcéres), established by the Research Code, whose art. L. 114-3-1, point. 3 sets out evaluation functions in the area of scientific formation and of the diplomas emitted bu superior education and, where the case, the validation of evaluation procedures realised by other, Code de la recherche, internet address https://www.legifrance.gouv.fr/affichCode.do?cidTexte=LEGITEXT000006071190 , accessed on 16 February 2018, my own translation.

conferral of the PhD title pertains only to the university and not, by any means, to Hcéres. This is a difference to the situation in Romania where CNATDCU, the equivalent agency of Hcéres, decides itself on a preliminary basis if the thesis complies to the ethic and deontology standards before the conferral of the title. In France, the university's accreditation is regarded as a sufficient guarantee for the assurance of respect for ethics and deontology rules, meaning that the doctoral schools and the universities have made in place the organisational mechanisms for detection and sanctioning of infringements, regulated mainly by the Chart over the Thesis (Charte des thèses) of a Doctoral Chart.

Another important difference of the French regulation compared to the Romanian one could be notice regarding the liability of the director of thesis (directeur de la thèse), because unlike the case of Romanian law, the French one establishes that this university professor is not liable for the content of the thesis, that is considered as the sole product of research activity of the candidate, to whom entire liability for the content belongs.

Somehow similarly, the public sustenance commission, called in France "the thesis jury "(le jury de la thèse) does evaluate solely the following aspects of the thesis: the quality of doctoral thesis, it's novelty, the aptitude of the PhD candidate to situate the thesis in a scientific context and the quality of thesis sustenance (art. 19 of the Ministerial Decision).

The thesis jury is designated in accordance to the provisions of art. 18 of the Ministerial Decision by the chief of superior education institution, approved by the director of the doctoral school and the director of thesis. The number of jury's members is between four and eight with the condition that at least half of them should be external to the university and the doctoral school. At least half of the jury members should be university professors or persons assimilated by the law to those (such as scientific researchers of a certain degree). The jury members elect from their part a president of the jury and a rapporteur over the thesis. The director of thesis takes part in the jury but does not participate to deliberations and decisions of the jury.

The majority of doctoral charts of French universities contain separate chapters on scientific research deontology, ethics and integrity and separately of the Chart over the Thesis there is a Deontology Chart.

Thus, as an example, strengthening the idea of academic autonomy, the Doctoral Chart of Paris-Saclay University sets out, within the section dedicated to the thesis jury, that: "the doctorate national diploma is realised by the chief of the accredited institution at the conform proposal of the jury of thesis sustenance"[18]. As a matter of fact, no administrative authority of the state interposes itself in the procedure of conferral of the PhD title, such as it is the case in Romania at the moment.

Finally, the PhD candidate, the director of thesis and the members of public sustenance commission liability for the infringement of ethics, deontology and integrity rules in scientific research in the French law is disciplinary.

According to art. L. 712-6-2 of the Code of Education[19], the disciplinary power over the academic personnel-researchers, scientific researchers, professors and students (including PhD students) is exercised by the Academic Council of the university, sitting in Disciplinary Section.

8. Conclusions

In the Romanian regulatory model, but also in the French, Italian and British one, analysed in this article, the liability of the PhD candidate and of the members of the public sustenance commission for infringement of scientific research deontology oscillates between an administrative and a disciplinary dimension, being rather administrative-disciplinary (for the academic personnel and scientific researchers that take part in such commissions). Function of the nuances and the complexity of the facts in cause, there is also a possibility of contract liability (in the PhD candidates case) or of tort liability (in the commission's members case).

The administrative-disciplinary liability hypothesis is well reasoned in Italian and Romanian law, systems which establish for academic personnel a position similar to the public officials with special status (at least when speaking of public superior education).

Thus, generally, the findings on the Romanian law on the domain are valid also in other systems, we notice some administrative differences being linked directly to the degree of academic autonomy conferred by different states, reflected mainly in the powers vested in national organisms established for the accreditation and evaluation/control over the doctoral schools and universities, powers that could be very important (the case of Romanian CNATDCU) or limited (such as the case of UKRIO).

Nowadays, Romania, by the most extended powers conferred to CNATDCU, marks a veritable summit of restriction on academic autonomy in the area of the control and evaluation of doctorate thesis. This may however correspond to a real necessity raised by the concrete situation on the matter. CNATDCU verifies the thesis both before the conferral of the PhD title and afterwards, at the complained of any person or ex officio. The university and doctoral school arrived at [18] La Charte de doctorat de l'Université Paris-Saclay, internet address https://www.universite-paris-saclay.fr/fr/la-charte-du-doctora , accessed at 16 February 2018, my own translation.

[19] Code de l'éducation, (Dernière modification : 17 février 2018), internet address https://www.legifrance.gouv.fr /affichCode.do?cidTexte=LEGITEXT000006071191&dateTexte=20180217 , accessed on 17 February 2018, my own translation.

the stage of having a purely formalistic role in the releasing of the PhD diploma. The final decision on that matter is pertaining to the Ministry of National Education and Scientific Research. By comparison, in France, the equivalent of the Romanian CNATDCU, Hcéres, performs ulterior verification only on complaint. We appreciate that a single procedure of thesis verification by a state organism should be sufficient to guarantee the observance of ethics and deontology in doctoral scientific research. There is here also a problem of stability and predictability of the legal relations generated by the conferral of the PhD title – this fact should not be doubted perpetually. There should be a final and definitive decision on the matter because otherwise the PhD researcher will always be treated as a dubious candidate. The presumption of innocence must prevail here ones again.

The accreditation of a university and of a doctoral school by Hcéres, submitted undoubtedly to pretentious criteria, values in France absolute confidence accorded to the university hosting doctoral studies in its power to organise a proper functioning system for the prevention, detection, sanctioning and generally fighting the infringements of research integrity.

In the UK, the power to establish and operate such a system pertains also to universities and other research institutes. UKRIO, the British equivalent of the Romanian CNATDCU, produces models of integrity in research codes and procedures for the investigation of ethics and deontology infringements in scientific research. These models do not have an imperative character. What is really interesting in the UK regulation on the domain is the refusal to investigate allegations of integrity in research infringements if they have been made in ill faith (vexatious, malicious etc.). The British thinking in research integrity considers a contestation of the scientific activity of a researcher (including a PhD candidate) only when this is made in good faith, meaning in an ethical way. Adhering ourselves to this line of ethical thinking and regulations, we appreciate that such a practice is empowering the good faith legal principle in all areas of law enforcement.

Finally, the Italian legal instrument on the matter, Legge Gelmini from 2010, promotes a direct transfer from the state to universities of competencies in evaluation and liability for deontological infringements in doctoral studies. The Italian regulatory framework provides only for an ethic liability in the case of PhD students and for both an ethic liability and an administrative-disciplinary liability for the members of the public sustenance commission.

The government organism similar to the Romanian CNATDCU in Italy is the National Agency for Evaluation of University System and of Research (ANVUR)[20], having concrete attributions in the matter of universities accreditation for doctoral studies.

References

- Ferluga, Loredana, La responsabilità disciplinare dei docenti universitari, article published on an on-line legal portal „diritto.it" on 29 July 2017
- Mattarella, Bernardo Giorgio, La responsabilità disciplinare dei docenti universitari dopo la legge Gelmini: profili sostanziali, legal on-line publication "ROARS", Return on Academic ReSearch
- Ros, Viorel, Dreptul proprietății intelectuale. Vol. I. Drepturile de autor, drepturile conexe și drepturile sui-generis, Editura C. H. Beck, București, 2016
- Vedinaș, Virginia, Drept administrativ, Ediția a X-a, revăzută și actualizată, Universul Juridic, București, 2017
- France. Arrêté du 25 mai 2016 fixant le cadre national de la formation et des modalités conduisant à la délivrance du diplôme national de doctorat, JORF no. 0122 du 27 mai 2016, NOR: MENS 1611139A;
- France. Code de la recherche, at address https://www.legifrance.gouv.fr/affichCode.do?cidTexte= LEGITEXT000006071190 , accessed on 7.03.2018
- France. Code de l'éducation, at address https://www.legifrance.gouv.fr/affichCode.do?cidTexte= LEGITEXT000006071191 , accessed on 7.08.2018
- Italia. Legge 30 dicembre 2010, n.240 Norme in materia di organizzazione delle universita`, di personale accademico e reclutamento, nonche` delega al Governo per incentivare la qualita` e l' efficienza del sistema universitario, Gazzetta Ufficiale della Republica Italiana, Serie Generale n. 10 del 14-01-2011-Suppl. Ordinario n. 11
- La Charte de doctorat de l'Université Paris-Saclay, at address https://www.universite-paris-saclay.fr/fr/la-charte-du-doctorat , accessed on 7.03.2018
- Oxford University, "Academic integrity in research: Code of practice and procedure" at address http://www.admin.ox.ac.uk/personnel/cops/researchintegrity/ , accessed on 7.03.2018
- London's Global University (UCL), Procedure for investigating and resolving allegations of misconduct in academic research, 1 January 2017, at address https://www.ucl.ac.uk/srs/governance-and-committees/resgov/research-misconduct-procedure-jan-2017.pdf , accessed on 7.03.2018
- UK Research Integrity Office, Code of Practice for Research. Promoting good practice and preventing misconduct. September 2009, at address http://ukrio.org/wp-content/uploads/UKRIO-Code-of-Practice-for-Research.pdf , accessed on 7.03.2018

[20] ANVUR = Agenzia Nazionale di Valutazione del Sistema Universitario e della Ricerca, internet portal at address http://www.anvur.org/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=55&Itemid=103&lang=it , accessed on 17 February 2018.

- UK Research Integrity Office, Procedure for Investigation of Misconduct in Research, August 2008, at address http://ukrio.org/wp-content/uploads/UKRIO-Procedure-for-the-Investigation-of-Misconduct-in-Research.pdf , accessed on 7.03.2018
- Romania. Academic Doctorate Studies Code, approved by Government Decision no. 681 from 29th of June 2011 Published in the Official Journal of Romania, part I, no. 551 from 3rd of august 2011, amended by Government Decision no. 134/2016
- Romania. Law on National Education no. 1/2011, Published in the Official Journal of Romania, part I, no. 18 from 10th of January 2011
- Romania. Law no. 206 from 27th of May 2004 regarding the good practices in scientific research, technologic development and innovation activity Published in the Official Journal of Romania, part I, no. 505 from 4th of June 2004

SOME ISSUES CONCERNING JURISDICTION ON CLAIMS FOR PRELIMINARY RELIEF FOR INFRINGEMENT OF INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY RIGHTS

Paul-George BUTA*

Abstract

The article deals with some issues surrounding the assertion of jurisdiction on claims for preliminary or provisional relief for infringement of intellectual property rights in Romania. Starting with the sources of the national provisions on provisional measures which were the result of implementation of international and EU law, the article then analyzes the relvant provisions in both the Code of Civil Procedure and the laws concerning the protection of intellectual property rights. In the very end, some more strange possible factual situations are analyzed in order to demonstrate the need for further legislative and judiciary guidance on the matter.

Keywords: intellectual property rights, provisional relief, preliminary relief, enforcement of intellectual property rights, jurisdiction, procedure.

1. Introduction

1.1. Importance and International Regime

Claims for preliminary relief in matters of infringement of Intellectual Property Rights are essential tools for the protection of these rights.

The overall importance of enforcement through the courts of such rights has caused some in the literature to affirm that intellectual property rights are only as good as the procedures and remedies by which they are enforced[1].

The overall importance of court enforcement of such rights was expressly recognized with the adoption of the Agreement on Trade Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPS) in 1994. Part III of the Agreement deals specifically with this issue with the aim to create procedural means by which to insure that the level of protection achieved at material level (the purpose of the Agreement having always been to provide and grant the highest possible degree of protection to intellectual property rights) is matched and rendered practical[2].

In this context, art. 41 par. (1) of TRIPS provides that "Members shall ensure that enforcement procedures as specified in this Part are available under their law so as to permit effective action against any act of infringement of intellectual property rights covered by this Agreement, including expeditious remedies to prevent infringements and remedies which constitute a deterrent to further infringements". We can note the fact that preliminary relief claims are referred to as "expeditious remedies to prevent infringements"[3]. Par. (2) of art. 41 further requires (with respect to all procedures for enforcement of intellectual property rights and not just with respect to claims for preliminary relief) that such procedures be "fair and equitable. […] not be unnecessarily complicated or costly, or entail unreasonable time-limits or unwarranted delays".

However, the Agreement explicitly indicates that it does not amount to an obligation for the Member States to create or amend their existing judicial system, nor to allocate additional resources or prioritize the enforcement of intellectual property rights over enforcement of other rights (par. 5). Art. 41 does however require that all decisions (even administrative) be open for judicial review, at least, with respect to judicial first instance decisions, on issues of legality (par. 4). Also, reasoned decisions and the right to be heard only apply to decisions on the merits, not claims for preliminary relief (par. 3).

Art. 50 of the Agreement provides the detailed procedural for the enforcement of provisional measures in correlation with the general tenets of art. 41.

These detailed procedural rules do not also provide guidance with respect to what court holds jurisdiction over such claims.

1.2. IPR Enforcement Directive

Because of the importance of enforcement to intellectual property rights and the fact that TRIPS did not manage to align the Member States on their policies for the enforcement of Intellectual Property Rights, the issue was taken up again by means of a European Directive dedicated to this very issue: the enforcement in the EU of intellectual property rights. It is Directive 2004/48/EC of the European Parliament and of the

* Assistant Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: paul.buta@univnt.ro);

[1] C. Greenhalgh, J. Philips, R. Pitkethly, M. Rogers and J. Tomalin, Intellectual Property Enforcement in Smaller UK Firms (2010), p. 3 cit. in Lionel Bently, Brad Sherman, Intellectual Property Law, 4th ed., OUP (Oxford, 2014), p. 1201;

[2] S. Vander, „Before Articles 41–61" in P-T Stoll, J. Busche and K. Arend, WTO – Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers (Leiden, 2009), p. 679;

[3] Idem, p. 740;

Council of 29 April 2004 on the enforcement of intellectual property rights (Directive 48/04)[4].

Importantly, Preamble 3 to the Directive, reads as follows: "without effective means of enforcing intellectual property rights, innovation and creativity are discouraged and investment diminished. It is therefore necessary to ensure that the substantive law on intellectual property, which is nowadays largely part of the acquis communautaire, is applied effectively in the Community. In this respect, the means of enforcing intellectual property rights are of paramount importance for the success of the Internal Market". The intimate link between substantial provisions related to intellectual property rights and the procedural rules for their enforcement is further emphasized in preamble 9[5] which also justifies action at Union level.

Directive 48/04 also indicates that there are major disparities between the means of enforcement of Intellectual Property Rights provided by the Member States, among others also with regard to provisional measures (preamble 7), such disparities being prejudicial to the functioning of the Internal Market since there is no level ground of enforcement of such rights throughout the Union (preamble 8).

The overarching objective of Directive 48/04 is summarized in preamble 10 as being "to ensure a high, equivalent and homogeneous level of protection in the Internal Market", its scope being defined "as widely as possible in order to encompass all the intellectual property rights covered by Community provisions in this field and/or by the national law of the Member State concerned" (preamble 13).

Therefore the purpose of Directive 48/04 is to complement and harmonize existing enforcement measures implemented by Member States pursuant to TRIPS and/or other international applicable conventions or other such measures enacted by local law, the principle of application being that the more favorable (to the right holder) provisions would apply (art. 2 (1) of Directive 48/04).

1.3. The issue of jurisdiction

Jurisdiction to try a case on the merits is a component of the right to a fair trial protected by art. 6 par. (1) of the European Convention for Human Rights, as established by the European Court of Human Rights in, among others, Arlewin v. Sweden[6].

The court held that "The Court reiterates that Article 6 § 1 secures to everyone the right to have any claim relating to his or her civil rights and obligations brought before a court or tribunal. In this way it embodies the "right to a court", of which the right of access, that is the right to institute proceedings before courts in civil matters, constitutes one aspect (see Golder v. the United Kingdom, 21 February 1975, §§ 35-36, Series A no. 18). This right presupposes that the case brought can be tried on its merits" [7] and that any limitations to such "must not restrict or reduce the access left to the individual in such a way or to such an extent that the very essence of the right is impaired. Furthermore, a limitation will not be compatible with Article 6 § 1 if it does not pursue a legitimate aim and if there is not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be achieved [cit. ommit.]" [8].

Therefore there is an obligation that the state provide possible claimants, pursuant to art. 6 par. (1) of the Convention, with an effective access to court, such not being insured where the alternative would not be "reasonable and practical for the applicant" thereby depriving the claimant from pursuing the "only viable option for an effective examination" of his claim[9].

1.4. Preliminary view

Having regard to the objectives pursued by the enactments aimed at securing means of enforcement of intellectual property rights and the requirement, pursuant to the European Convention on Human Rights, that access to court be insured also by securing a jurisdiction where no reasonable and practical alternative for the claimant exists, it seems that the procedural rules governing the procedures for preliminary relief in Romania ought to secure a very high and wide level of protection for right holders. Given the fact that an obvious component of the high and wide level of protection is access to fast preliminary relief proceedings (such being derived from the provisions of art. 50 TRIPS and preamble 22 of Directive 48/04[10]), this would presuppose, in turn, access to Romanian courts whenever this is the reasonable and practical alternative.

---

[4] Directive 2004/48/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 29 April 2004 on the enforcement of intellectual property rights, OJ L 157/30.04.2004

[5] „The current disparities also lead to a weakening of the substantive law on intellectual property and to a fragmentation of the Internal Market in this field. This causes a loss of confidence in the Internal Market in business circles, with a consequent reduction in investment in innovation and creation. [...] Effective enforcement of the substantive law on intellectual property should be ensured by specific action at Community level. Approximation of the legislation of the Member States in this field is therefore an essential prerequisite for the proper functioning of the Internal Market".

[6] European Court of Human Rights, 3rd ch., case of Arlewin v. Sweden, decision of 1 March 2016, Application no. 22302/10;

[7] Par. 66

[8] Par. 67

[9] Par. 73

[10] „It is also essential to provide for provisional measures for the immediate termination of infringements, without awaiting a decision on the substance of the case, while observing the rights of the defence, ensuring the proportionality of the provisional measures as appropriate to the characteristics of the case in question and providing the guarantees needed to cover the costs and the injury caused to the defendant by an unjustified request. Such measures are particularly justified where any delay would cause irreparable harm to the holder of an intellectual property right [emphasis added]".

2. Analysis of the relevant provisions

2.1. The general procedural regime

Directive 48/04 was implemented in Romania by means of Emergency Government Ordinance 100/2005[11] (GEO 100/05) with respect to industrial property rights, while the enforcement regime for copyright and related rights was implemented by means of Emergency Government Ordinance 123/2005[12]. The regime for industrial property rights and copyright and related rights respectively are, for all purposes of the present article, identical and therefore we will refer to both by common reference to GEO 100/05.

Both regmies were subsequently amended pursuant to the adoption of the New Civil Procedure Code and both provide that provisional relief is to be ordered by „the competent judicial court" pursuant to the rules in the Civil Procedure Code relating to provisional measures for the protection of intellectual property rights.

The Code of Civil Procedure (CPC) provides, at art. 978, that the regulations in articles 978 and 979 concern the enforcement of provisional measures for the enforcement of intellectual property rights, irrespective of their content (economic or moral) and irrespective of their source.

The provisions are silent with respect to the jurisdiction for such claims, solely indicating that the measures envisaged by these provisions are to be taken by courts according to the provisions governing the procedure of the presidential ordinance.

In the title dedicated to the procedure of the presidential ordinance, art. 998 of the CPC specifically provides that „the claim for a presidential ordinance shall be filed with the court having first instance jurisdiction over the claim on the merits of the case".

The issue of jurisdiction over claims for preliminary relief for infringement of intellectual property rights seems therefore to be linked to jurisdiction over claims for the (main or on the merits) claims for infringement of intellectual property rights.

2.2. Jurisdiction over the main/merits claim

After some debates in the literature[13] and some uncertainty in the practice of the courts is was clearly established that jurisdiction in first instance for claims of infringement of any intellectual property rights rests with the Tribunals, irrespective of the monetary value of the claim[14].

In terms of the territorial jurisdiction, the CPC provides for the rule that the claim is under the jurisdiction of the court where the defendant is domiciled/headquartered or, alternatively, for claims under tort, the court where the tortious act was committed or the damage has occurred. Several additional rules are applicable where the domicile/headquarter is not known, where the claim concerns acts committed by the subsidiary of a company, where the claim is against a person without legal personality or against a public entity.

The CPC also provides some rules concerning jurisdiction where there is a foreign component to the claim. Romanian courts hold jurisdiction over claims where defendant has in Romania, at the moment of filing of the claim, his/her domicile, usual seat of residence, headquarter, secondary headquarter or goodwill. Romanian courts also hold preferred jurisdiction (absent a convention on the forum) on claims regarding the protection abroad of the intellectual property rights of a natural person domiciled in Romania (either a Romanian citizen or stateless person).

For 'regular' claims for infringement of intellectual property rights therefore, the jurisdiction would rest with the Tribunal at the defendant's headquarter or the Tribunal where the infringement was committed or where the damage has occurred. Within the Tribunals, it is the civil divisions that handle the cases concerning infringement of intellectual property rights (even where the parties are professionals, the jurisdiction rests with the 'purely' civil divisions and not with those handling disputes involving professionals. The Bucharest Tribunal has specialized intellectual property panels within its 'purely' civil divisions.

The High Court has held[15] that territorial jurisdiction ought to be established based on a predictable criterion and therefore the place where the damage has occurred is not mean the place where payment of remunerations for use of copyright was due to the collective management organization. As the CJEU has itself found in Pinkney[16], "in the event of alleged infringement of copyrights protected by the Member State of the court seised, the latter has jurisdiction to hear an action to establish liability brought by the author of a work against a company established in another Member State and which has, in the latter State, reproduced that work on a material

[11] Government Emergency Ordinance no. 100 of 14 July 2005 concerning the Enforcement of Industrial Property rights in Monitorul Oficial no. 643/20.07.2005

[12] Government Emergency Ordinance no. 123 of 1 September 2005 for the modification and amendment of Law no. 8/1996 concerning copyright and related rights in Monitorul Oficial no. 843/19.09.2005 as amended by Law no. 329 of 14 July 2006 regarding the approval of Government Emergency Ordinance no. 123/2005 for the modification and amendment of Law no. 8/1996 concerning copyright and related rights in Monitorul Oficial no. 657/31.07.2006

[13] Gh.-L. Zidaru, „Commentary to art. 95" in V. M. Ciobanu, M. Nicolae (coord.) Noul cod de procedură civilă comentat și adnotat. Vol. I – art. 1 -526, Universul Juridic (Bucharest – 2013), p. 282, 278-279

[14] See, for example, Curtea de apel Cluj, s. I civ., decision no. 68 of 14 May 2015, in Curtea de apel Cluj, Curtea de apel Cluj. Secția I civilă. Decizii relevante trimestrul II 2015, Înalta Curte de Casație și Justiție, s. I civ., decision no. 3393 of 28 November 2014;

[15] Înalta Curte de Casație și Justiție, s. I civ., decision no. 2571 of 17 November 2015;

[16] CJEU, decision of 3 October 2013, Peter Pinckney v. KDG Mediatech AG (C-170/12); support which is subsequently sold by companies established in a third Member State through an internet site also accessible with the jurisdiction of the court seised" [17]. Such jurisdiction does not mean that the court may order payment of damages for what occurred on a different national market but it may determine the prejudice as for that Member State.

In the same case mentioned above, the High Court has held that since the unauthorized communication to the public of the copyrighted works was undertaken on buses traveling between Bucharest and Vâlcea, these acts are continuous acts of infringement (each or the entire duration of the trip)and are considered to have taken place both in the Vâlcea county and in Bucharest and therefore either of the two Tribunals could assert jurisdiction over the claim of infringement.

2.2. Jurisdiction over the main/merits claim in some special cases

Where the claim concerns infringement of EU rights (EU trademark or EU design), the first instance jurisdiction over the claim is with the Bucharest Tribunal (art. 71 of Law no. 84/1998[18] and art. 47 of Law no. 129/1992[19]).

These national enactments would appear inapplicable due to the fact that their provisions come within the scope of art. 124 of Regulation 1001/2017[20] and art. 81 of Regulation 6/2002.

The latter grant exclusive jurisdiction on the courts designated by Member States as EU Trade Marks Courts and, respectively, Community Design Courts for (i) all claims of infringement (and, where possible, threatened infringement) of such rights, (ii) for actions for declaration of non-infringement of such rights, (iii) for counterclaims for a declaration of invalidity of such rights. Moreover, EU trade mark courts have exclusive jurisdiction on claims for compensation for infringement of provisional rights pursuant to the publication of the EU trade mark application and Community designs courts have exclusive jurisdiction over actions for a declaration of invalidity of an unregistered Community design.

Interestingly, the two Regulations provide that the EU trade mark courts and Community design courts have jurisdiction to decide in respect of infringements or threatened infringements in any Member State except where jurisdiction is asserted due to the infringing act being committed in a certain Member State, in which situation the EU trade mark or Community Design court only has jurisdiction on the infringement or threatened infringement in that Member State (where the court vested with the claim is).

3. Discussion

As mentioned before, the rule is that jurisdiction for the claim for preliminary relief follows jurisdiction for the main (on the merits) claim for infringement.

However, in some situations, given the urgent nature of the preliminary/provisional relief sought, Romanian courts will assert jurisdiction on the preliminary relief claim even where they would be more reluctant to do so in respect of the claim on the merits.

On such situation is encountered in the context of article 1075 of the CPC which provides for the emergency jurisdiction of Romanian courts in matters concerning provisional measures, conservation and enforcement measures concerning persons or goods in Romania at the date of filing, even where the Romanian court would not hold jurisdiction over the case on the merits.

Another situation concerns cases where the main claim for relief would be subject to arbitration (either national or international). The existence of a valid arbitration clause normally excludes the possibility that a court would retain jurisdiction over a claim it has been seised with.

Romanian courts have held[21] that the existence of the arbitration clause seems to exclude even the application of exclusive jurisdiction as provided by the EU Regulations (e.g. for EU trade marks). The court has also established that, even where the jurisdiction over the case on the merits rests with an arbitral tribunal, Romanian courts still have jurisdiction over the claim for provisional measures based on art. 35 of Regulation 1215/2012[22] and the test established by the CJEU's decision in Van Uden[23].

References

- Greenhalgh, C. Philips, J. Pitkethly, R. Rogers M. and Tomalin, J., 2010, Intellectual Property Enforcement in Smaller UK Firms
- Bently, Lionel Sherman, Brad, 2014, Intellectual Property Law, 4th ed., Oxford: Oxford University Press

[17] Idem;

[18] Law no. 84 of 15 April 1998 concerning trademarks and geographical indications, in Monitorul Oficial nr. 161/23.04.1998, as subsequently amended;

[19] Law no. 129 of 29 December 1992 concerning the protection of designs and models, in Monitorul Oficial nr. 1/8.01.1993, as subsequently amended;

[20] Regulation 2017/1001 of 14 June 2017 on the European Union trade mark in OJ L154/16.06.2017;

[21] Curtea de apel București, s. IV civ., decision no. 456 of 11 May 2016;

[22] Regulation no 1215/2012 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 12 December 2012 on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters;

[23] CJEU, decision of 17 November 1998, Van Uden Maritime BV, trading as Van Uden Africa Line v Kommanditgesellschaft in Firma Deco-Line and Another. (C-391/95);

- Stoll, P-T. Busche J and Arend, K., 2009, WTO – Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers : Leiden
- Ciobanu, V. M. Nicolae, M. (coord.), 2013,Noul cod de procedură civilă comentat și adnotat. Vol. I – art. 1 -526, Bucharest: Universul Juridic

CHALLENGES OF INTERPRETING THE NOTION OF SOFTWARE COPYRIGHTS IN THE CURRENT ECONOMIC AND SOCIO-POLITICAL CONTEXT

Ramona DUMITRAȘCU*

Abstract

Every country has it' s own interpretation and enforcement of copyrights. The challenge is in case of a conflict of interpretations to create a common structure accepted by all parties as a base of mutual understanding and agreement. ESCIA guidelines seek to provide a scalable assessment framework which in turn can be a tool for research and development of structures to deal with the different cultural and social economic circumstances of the different countries / the assessment of which system is dominant is an ongoing, ever-changing debate for which you need the guideline tools to steer the discussion in the right direction which is a challenge on it's own.the digital economy is the most important part of the global economy.The digital transformation of international production requires regulation,governing, investor behaviour. The negative impact of manipulation of data obtained from consumers by global powerfull multinationals is to be considered a major insentive for a rigourus monitorization and regulation of international productions. The diversity of interests, political and finacial, make fair regulations covering all aspects of the situation, extremlely difficult, in addition to the ever chainging parameters governing the subject as such. The complexity of the matter should not prevent an indepth assassement and solution seeking policy.

Keywords: software, piracy, computer, economic effects, challenges.

1. Introduction

Intellectual property rights (IPR) are assuming an increasingly important role in international trade, in investment and in economic relations and are valuable commercial assets and a driving force in technological progress leading to increasing competitive capability and resultant empowerment in the international marketplace.

The globalization or universalization or internationalization of trade and economy, and the multilateral rules that most of us have accepted to be bound by, require us to adopt a post approach regarding IPR through close interaction between government, industry and the creative / inventive segment of society.

The international norms and national laws on copyright and related rights, while recognizing that the promotion of creativity and cultural and information production is an important public interest, also take into account other public interests, such as those which relate to the availability to the public of all the information necessary for the participation in social and political activities, public education, scientific and scholarly research, etc. For these purposes, these norms and laws contain appropriate exceptions to and limitations on the rights of copyright and related rights owners.

2. Content

The intellectual property system might play the main role in modern economic policy, and even though a decade ago it was thought that protecting IP rights for software might determine the chances of an economy to recover or to become competitive, the reality we live in proves that society is becoming more and more global, linking people together by their needs and interests and yet still leaving room for national or regional specificity without creating a conflict in between the two areas, but proving that there are natural ways of evolving in your specificity and yet be connected and be a part of the global.

Software industry and IP is increasingly becoming an important tool for sustainable development. Understanding and appreciating the social, cultural and the economic foundations of intellectual property and the copyright system, is a prerequisite for comprehending its increasing importance and role in national strategies for enhancing competition.

In software solutions, intellectual property is not and should not become the end in itself, but a catalyst for accelerating social, cultural and techno-economic growth and development and it's evolution in offering effective protection and use has proven spurs socio-economic growth through providing the necessary incentives for increasing creativity, inventiveness and competitive capability. It is (was) believed that a quality conscious approach towards economic management would generate higher growth and greater resources for social programs although this approach might increase the gaps between humans, communities, interests.

* PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: monadumitrascu@yahoo.com)

Intellectual property comprises creations of human mind, of the human intellect. It consists mainly of two branches, one dealing with industrial property comprising technological inventions, utility models, trademarks for goods and services, industrial designs, etc. and the other being copyright. The existence of such exclusive rights is also the legal basis for contractual arrangements between the creators or the ones developing the idea, on the one hand, and the institutions or entrepreneurs wishing to use those ideas in the manufacturing process, on the other. The recognition of the creator, the protection of his rights and the rights of those who invest in the making of his creations, contributed positively to socio-economic development of a developing country and yet now we can see some of the side effects and forsee possible questionable consequences.

With the extension of this system during the last two decades to the protection of computer software, a considerable size of commercial activity of a country involves use of rights protected by copyright. Until recently, one did not have a real idea as to the extent of the economic dimensions of the copyright or cultural industry. In the last two decades, however, independent surveys and studies in certain industrialized countries have indicated how sizeable the industry is. All these studies indicated the contribution of the copyright or cultural industries to their GNP, in Australia 3.1%; Germany 2.9%; India 5.06%; Netherlands 4.5%; New Zealand 3.2%; Sweden 6.6% (although Jennifer Skilbeek in the economic importance of copyright published by the International Publishers Association places it at 3.16%, which seems more likely); the United Kingdom 3.6%; the United States 3.3% for the core industry and 5.8% for the total copyright including the dependent industry.

Computer software industry is a classic example of what effective intellectual property protection can do to ensure economic growth. Protected as a literary work under copyright law since 1984, the industry has grown to be of the foremost in the world with a compounded growth more than 50% between 1990 and 1997, and is increasingly becoming the driving force in information technology. Exports of software increased from US $225 million in 1992-1993 to US $1760 million in 1997-1998, to US $2650 million in 1998-1999 and up 57% to over US $4 billion in 1999-2000; the projection was that this wioud go up to US $9 billion by 2001-2002, to US $25 billion by 2004-2005 and to US $50 billion by 2007-2008[1] and it was confirmed. By then the country's software industry is expected to earn an annual revenue of US $85 billion. The exports, for example, in 1998-1999 were 61 billion to the USA and North America and 23% to Europe. The compound advantage of the software industry is based on its cost effect world class quality, high reliability and rapid delivery of all of it powered by the state-of-the-art technologies.

China's software industry, has made a substantial contribution to the country's economic development. This industry has created more than 60.000 jobs. The average annual growth rate of the software industry was expected to be 28% in the 5 years, 2000 to 2005. It was also estimated that China will by become one of the world's largest Internet markets and that estimation was confirmed. The number of Internet users in China increased, for example from 2.1 million in 1998 to 8-9 million in 1999. The websites were expected to grow to e-commerce activities and their e-commerce turn over was expected to reach US $1.2 billion by 2002[2].

The digital economy is becoming an ever more important part of the global economy. It offers many new opportunities for inclusive and sustainable development. It also comes with serious policy challenges – starting with the need to bridge the digital divide. Both the opportunities and challenges are top policy priorities for developing countries. The digital economy is fundamentally changing the way firms produce and market goods and services across borders. Digital multinationals can communicate with and sell to customers overseas without the need for much physical investment in foreign markets. Their economic impact on host countries is thus more ethereal and less directly visible in productive capacity generation and job creation. And, today, the digital economy is no longer just about the technology sector and digital firms, it is increasingly about the digitalization of supply chains across all sectors of the global economy. The digital transformation of international production has important implications for investment promotion and facilitation, and for regulations governing investor behavior. Rules designed for the physical economy may need to be reviewed in light of new digital business models. Some countries have already taken steps to modernize policies; others face the risk of letting rules become obsolete or of unintentionally slowing down digital development. Many countries around the world have development strategies for the digital economy. Yet most of these strategies fail to adequately address investment issues. And those that do tend to focus exclusively on investment in telecommunication infrastructure. The investment policy dimension of digital development strategies should be broadened to enabling domestic firms to reap the benefits of digitalization and easier access to global markets. The World Investment Report 2017 makes a cogent argument for a comprehensive investment policy framework for the digital economy. It demonstrates how aligning investment policies with digital development strategies will play a pivotal role in the gainful integration of developing countries into the global economy and in a more inclusive and sustainable globalization in the years to come. This is an indelible contribution to the discourse on how to narrow the digital divide and meet the enormous investment challenges of the 2030 agenda on sustainable development[3].

[1] Shahid Alikhan, The Role of Copyright in the Cultural and Economic Development of Developing Countries, in Journal of Intellectual Property Rights, 7, 2002, p. 489-505.

[2] Ibidem.

The most attractive industries include services and technology-based activities. The annual parallel survey of IPAs in 2017 provided a ranking of the most promising industries for attracting Foreign Direct Investment in their region. The results for 2017 are broadly in line with responses from past years, with IPAs in developed economies focusing on IT and professional services, while those in developing economies all mention agribusiness among the most attractive industries. Information and communication – which includes telecommunication, data processing and software programming – is emerging as an attractive industry in selected developing regions, confirming that the digital economy is growing in importance beyond developed economies[4].

Of all suppliers of copyrightable works, suppliers of computer software generate by far the greatest added value. Markets for business software and entertainment software (for example video games) are much younger than other copyright industries and as a rule, they have grown rapidly over recent years. Software is also unique because in contrast to literary texts, movies or sound recordings, the market for software has been subject to unauthorized, digital copying for as long as it exists.

In 1980, software has enjoyed copyright protection in the USA, analogous to literary texts. In many other countries, software also falls in the realm of copyright law but enforcement varies, as will be discussed below. In contrast to other types of copyright works, machine-readable software can also be patented if it is accepted as non-obvious (or considered to constitute an 'inventive step' in many European countries). Suppliers of software thus have a choice. Copyright protection concerns the code itself, requires no registration fee, lasts longer and allows for the software itself to remain a trade secret[5]. Patent protection prevents others from putting software with equivalent functions to use, requires complete disclosure, a test of non-obviousness and a registration fee.

There may be a particularly great rift between legal arrangements regarding copyright protection and protection in practice. For example, peer-to-peer file-sharing of copyright works is illegal in most major economies today, but it still occurs on a massive scale. Part of the problem is that in contrast to patents, benefitting from the ideas and works protected by copyrights does not require much expertise or capital. Copyright infringements occur more frequently and often in the private domain, which inhibits effective enforcement of copyright law. This is one reason why most studies on unauthorized, digital copying use measures of copying rather than measures of the strength of copyright law to assess IP protection.

One problem in research on copyright is that most research on innovation has deliberately ignored the types of aesthetic and intellectual innovations covered by copyright law. To be sure, in the copyright industries technical innovations do occur as well. The adoption of new media technologies is a case in point. However, much innovation in the copyright industries concerns the creation of new media content. In order to measure innovation in copyright industries, it is useful to distinguish between more conventional 'humdrum innovation' and 'content creation'. Humdrum innovation concerns all facets of technological innovations and can be assessed with the familiar instruments of empirical research on innovation. 'Content creation' concerns aesthetic and intellectual variations that distinguish different copyright works from each other. To measure content creation, it seems necessary to adapt traditional methods of innovation research. Innovation input is traditionally measured by the size of R&D departments. Regarding content creation, there are two outstanding problems. First, much content creation occurs in relatively small firms and particularly volatile organizational set-ups. Second, content creation is not usually conducted in formally defined R&D departments. Other measures of innovation input are necessary to deal with innovation in small enterprises, with self-employed creators, or with user / amateur innovation that seems to play an important role in the cultural sector (e.g. regarding user-generated content)[6].

Empirical studies concerned with so-called 'piracy' of computer software often deal with copyright and patent infringements at the same time, and the authors rarely bother with this distinction. Many empirical studies on software piracy precede the current interest in copying of other types of copyright works. The bulk of this literature takes a business and management perspective. It is less concerned with social welfare and implications for public policy but with the interests of private business, in particular suppliers of software. Furthermore, in contrast to research on unauthorized, digital copying of recorded music or movies, the extensive literature on software 'piracy' features few original assessments of the impact on sales and rights holder revenues. Estimates of lost sales due to piracy come from software suppliers and their representatives.

---

[3] Mukhisa Kituyi, Foreword, in Word Investment Report 2017, Investment and the Digital Economy, United Nation Conference on Trade and Developement, Geneva, 2017, p. IV.

[4]. Ibidem.

[5] Christian Handke, Economic Effects of Copyright. The Empirical Evidence So Far, Rotterdam, 2011 p. 8-9.

[6] Ibidem, p. 15.

The academic literature mostly discusses piracy rates (the ratio of users utilizing legitimate software and users of pirated software) but does not quantify the likely impact on rights holder revenues. There may be several reasons why academic researchers hesitate to forward estimates of lost sales due to piracy. The rapid rate of product innovation in the industry makes it hard to isolate the effect of unauthorized use on sales. There may have been few sudden and substantial changes in the de facto level of copyright protection for software, which could have been analyzed as natural experiments. Furthermore, the rapid growth of the market for computer software could reduce the concern for sales displacement from piracy[7]. The coincidence of rapid revenue growth, great innovation intensity and extensive piracy seems to have motivated many studies on how network effects may mitigate any adverse effects of piracy[8].

The role the protection of copyright and related rights is above all the promotion literary, musical and artistic creativity, the enrichment of national cultural heritage and the dissemination of cultural and information products to the general public. Such protection offers the indispensable incentives for the creation of new valuable works and for the investment into production and distribution of cultural and information goods. This is done through granting appropriate economic and moral rights to authors, performer, producers and publishers, through establishing adequate framework for the exercise of these rights, and through providing efficient mechanisms, procedures, remedies and sanctions that are necessary for their enforcement in practice.

It was accepted that an efficient and well-balanced system for the protection of copyright and related rights is necessary for the preservation of national culture and identity. Experience shows that for this, it is not sufficient to grant protection to national creators, producers and publishers. Without adequate protection also for them, foreign works and cultural products may inundate the markets of the given country and create a kind of unfair competition for any domestic creations and publications[9]. Yet again, one cannot stop wondering nor question, g iven the today market, how it was possible for the software protection of certain products to motivate and chalenge a fearcefull competition provoked by markets like Vietnam or China.

It is / was accepted and embraced by a large part of the academic community the idea that an appropriate copyright system is also indispensable for the participation of international cultural and economic cooperation. Without this, a country may not be able to attract foreign investment in a number of important fields, and may not get access to certain cultural and information products and services in such an obstacle-free manner as it would be desirable for the acceleration of the social and economic development. Yet, the paradox faced by the economic development for areas that use world heritage inovations to provide alternatoves without trademarks for disproportional law prices that allow the consumers south east Asian markest to benefit of the same technology as western Europe or American markets for sometimes less then 10 percent of the EU or US market price.

The protection of IP is based on many examples to prove that an appropriate, well-balanced copyright regulation may contribute both to the survival and to the success – sometimes spectacular success – of smaller and medium-sized enterprises.

One example is an old story- but the example is from an early period of its history when, on the basis of the present criteria, it still could have been regarded a kind of developing country: the United States of America from the period when it had just obtained its independence and was in the stage of establishing its own economic, social and legal system. As far as copyright was concerned the first idea – which, at the first sight, perhaps seemed to be attractive and clever – was to promote local culture and creativity through granting copyright protection for the works of domestic authors, leaving, however, foreign works – first of all works published in England – unprotected. The results proved to be catastrophic from the viewpoint of what the isolationist approach to copyright was believed to serve. Those publishers – according to our present comparative scale, certainly small or, at least, medium-sized ones – that had chosen to invest in the publication of some still less well-known American authors were unable to compete with the others which achieved easy and safe success by publishing unprotected works of famous and popular English writers and poets without any need whatsoever for bothering with obtaining authorization and paying remuneration to them. The then “SME” publishers supporting local creativity either went bankrupt or changed publishing policy in abandoning their patriotic extravaganza.

Another example is from a developing country, and quite a huge one, which just as a consequence of the success story involved, is emerging as one of the most important players in the field concerned: India. The great success of the Indian software industry has even started its dynamic extension also to the European and U.S. markets (and not only through “exporting” its excellent experts). There is general agreement that, in the success story of the numerous software SMEs of that huge country – some of which, of course, in the meantime, have grown out this category – in addition to certain other factors (such as a well-thought governmental development strategy and an advantageous educational structure), the early introduction of a well-balanced copyright protection for computer programs played a decisive role.

[7] Ibidem, p. 19.
[8] Ibidem, p. 19.
[9] Mihály Ficsor, The Importance of Copyright and Related Rights for Economic Development with Special Reference to the Position of SME'S, In Wipo National Seminar On Copyright, Related Rights, And Collective Anagement, organized by the World Intellectual Property Organization (WIPO) in cooperation with the Ministry of Culture, Khartoum, February 28 to March 2, 2005, p. 2

Another one is from a country which, at the time of the story was still a reluctant member of the group of the so-called socialist countries (although, as the Western press put it, the merriest barrack in the camp), which then happily became a "transition country", and in 2004, became a member of the European Union: Hungary. Copyright protection was recognized in the statutory law (the first time in Europe) in 1983. This alone would not have been sufficient in a so-called socialist country to become the basis for an SMEs success story. By that time, however, certain economic and political changes allowed the establishment of small private enterprises (or sometimes even medium-sized ones). The carrier of the small software houses established in that period became truly a great success story, bringing Hungary into the frontline of software development in Central and Eastern Europe and contributing – along with many other factors – to a smooth transformation of the (ever less) centrally planned economy into a full-fledged market economy.

At the end of the 70's and the beginning of the 80's, there were still a lot of heated debates at the international level on what kind of intellectual property protection might be adequate for computer programs, the growing importance of which at that time was becoming evident. During those debates, patent protection – which now, in certain countries, has started a spectacular, although in some aspects controversial, new carrier – was, in general set aside and rejected as a major option. The possibility of a sui generis system was considered more or less seriously (of which still there are some very much articulate arrière-guard advocates), but copyright was emerging as the most ready-made and most easily applicable option. The breakthrough towards copyright as a generally accepted option took place in February 1985, at a meeting organized in Geneva at the WIPO headquarters. It was due to the excellent working paper, to the thorough discussion at the meeting, but also to the existing positive examples to which the working paper had been able to refer. At that time, in addition to some positive developments in the case law of some countries, there were already five countries where statutory law explicitly recognized the copyright protection of computer programs.

It may not be a surprise that the United States of America was among the first five. In the case of that country, the contribution of copyright protection might not be so easily and evidently identified as the single key factor for the enormous success of the software industry, although its important role could hardly be neglected. However, India and Hungary were also among those first five countries, and, in the case of these countries it is easier to identify what kind of impact copyright protection had made.

Yet again, one cannot ignore the history and the lessons that past times emphasize: the main basis and premises for some of the national economies to emerge was, at least at a certain point, the ability to use freely, without financial restraints, the world heritage of the best creation of human kind. My wonder: how will the evolution of the world software development is going to be influenced by the lack of reglementation / zero recognition for IP on markets like east south Asian markets. Furthermore: is it possible that overprotective regulations that focus on the software's author s financial rights might turn into a subtle, masked brake for triggering the creativity and the evolution from public usage? And how well is the example of decompilation of computer programs is actually being taken seriously.

There is no need to elaborate on some very well known examples where the breathtaking success of certain software enterprises – which at the beginning were born even not just as small or medium-sized ones but as micro-enterprises – has led. They have obtained quite an extensive market dominance with the possibility of their proprietary products obtaining the status of de facto world-wide standards relegating by this their potential competitors (among them all software SMEs) into the depending status of simple clients.

This evolving scenario was recognized and duly taken into account in the European Community in the framework of the preparation and adoption of the directive on the legal protection of computer programs. The directive (Council Directive No. 91/250/EEC of 14 May 1991) contains certain provisions to protect users of computer programs against the dangers of overprotection in favor of software developers: such as the ones guaranteeing for the lawful owners of copies of computer programs to be able to use it for the intended purpose, including error protection (Article 5(1)), to make back-up copies (Article 5(2)) and to observe, study or test the functioning of the program in order to determine the ideas and principles underlining any element of the program (Article 5(3)).The latter provision has already quite a substantial relevance also for the possible competitors – among them many small medium enterprises – in the software markets. However, what is particularly important for them – especially for the more vulnerable SME's of the field – is the regulation of the issue of "reverse engineering" or "decompilation" of programs in Article 6 of the directive. This regulation became necessary in order to eliminate the possibility of some anti-competitive practices of owners of certain widely used computer programs based on the exclusive right of reproduction and / or the exclusive right of adaptation (and translation) granted to them by Article 4 of the directive. In the absence of an appropriate regulation, owners of rights in such programs would have been able to prohibit the transformation of the programs (only made available by them in object code form) into source code form (this transformation is called "decompilation" – or "reverse engineering" of the program). And without such decompilation, the potential competitors would not have been able to develop and make any computer programs that would have been able to function together –

"interoperate" – with the existing and widely used, quasi standard programs. Such a consequence would have been, of course, particularly disastrous for SMEs of the software development sector. The regulation was not easy. There was quite an important resistance against any specific rules authorizing decompilation, since some major software houses were afraid that the new norms may be used also for simple piratical activities. It seems, however, that the provisions in Article 6 of the directive have established an appropriate balance between conflicting legitimate interests and eliminated the possible dangers as much as possible. The said Article of the directive provides that the authorization of the rightholder is not required where reproduction of the code and "translation" of its form are indispensable to obtain the information necessary to achieve the interoperability of an independently created computer program with other programs, provided that certain conditions are met. These conditions serve as guarantees that the limited freedom granted in this field does not prejudice the legitimate interests of owners of rights. The conditions are as follows: (a) these acts are performed by the licensee or by another person having a right to use a copy of a program, or on their behalf by a person authorized to do so; (b) the information necessary to achieve interoperability has not previously been readily available; (c) these acts are confined to the parts of the original program which are necessary to achieve interoperability; (d) the information obtained must not be used for goals other than to achieve the interoperability of the independently created computer program; (e) it must not be given to others except when necessary for the interoperability of the independently created computer program; and (f) must not be used for the development, production or marketing of a computer program substantially similar in its expression, or for any other act which infringes copyright[10].

It was proven that software piracy determined economic development. Most leading studies on software piracy are cross-sectional or panel studies with countries (or US states) as the unit of analysis: there were explored explanations for different piracy rates for business software, there were resoults that suggested highly developed countries exhibit lower piracy rates, there were conclusions stating inverse relationship between development and the extent of software piracy as well.

Next to income / economic development, the literature discusses a number of other factors determining software piracy, like the fact that culture that puts greater emphasis on individualism rather than collectivism correlates with less business software piracy . Also, it was stated that various indicators of the strength of the legal and judicial system are associated with less piracy.

While dealing with official, secondary data is usually considered to be preferable among economists, existing data does not address many specific phenomena related to unauthorized copying. Surveybased studies on the determinants of software piracy confirm that increasing retail prices are associated with greater piracy rates, consistent with what economic theory predicts for relative prices of close substitutes. Unauthorized copies seem to be inferior goods in the sense that demand for them decreases with wealth. Also, it was concluded that the type of education mattered.

It seems clear enough that unauthorized copying occurs in part because of financial incentives. With access to some widely diffused ICT, the pecuniary costs of acquiring an unauthorized copy are usually much lower than retail prices[11].

Unauthorized copies are no perfect substitutes for authorized copies, however, in software domain, it might be that the quality of the the unauthorized copy is just as good as the original. Also, decompliation and the ability to modify, adapt a nd improve a software might have better consequences for the consumer

3. Conclusions

This well-balanced and precise regulation has made it possible – not only in the European Community but also in other countries where this model has been taken over and applied – *for software-developers to continue and extend their creative activities with a chance to succeed, and many of them have used this opportunity with great efficiency. The big chalenge is still to be ruled by the free market, a natural consequence of globalization, and that will still provoke major debates with no certain forseeble effects on software intellectual property rights.

References

- Shahid Alikhan, The Role Of Copyright In The Cultural And Economic Development Of Developing Countries, in Journal Of Intellectual Property Rights, 7, 2002, p. 489-505
- Mukhisa Kituyi, Foreword, in Word Investment Report 2017, Investment and the Digital Economy, United Nation Conference on Trade and Developement, Geneva, 2017
- Christian Handke, Economic Effects of Copyright. The Empirical Evidence so Far, Rotterdam, 2011
- Mihály Ficsor, The Importance of Copyright and Related Rights for Economic Development with Special Reference to the Position of Sme's, in Wipo National Seminar on Copyright, Related Rights, and Collective Anagement, organized by the World Intellectual Property Organization (WIPO) in Cooperation with the Ministry of Culture, Khartoum, February 28 to March 2, 2005;

[10] Ibidem, p. 5-6.
[11] Christian Handke, op. cit.

REGISTERED vs. UNREGISTERED TRADE MARKS IN THE EUROPEAN UNION

George-Mihai IRIMESCU[*]

Abstract

This paper aims at analyzing the possibilities of protection of unregistered trademarks in the European Union. Although the European legislation mainly focuses on the protection of registered trademarks, specific provisions provide for the opposabiity of unregistered trademarks that are protected according to the national legislation. The first chapter analyzes the relevant legal provisions, highlighting the European legislator's approach with respect to the protection of unregistered trademarks, from the perspective of the applicable regulations and directives. Then, the main provisions regarding the opposability of national unregistered marks at European level and the conditions they have to meet are also analyzed, also reviewing the relevant case-law. The paper focuses on fulfilling the condition of use, which must meet both the criteria set by the national legistaion and the „Europena criteria". The notion of „use in the course of trade" is also analysed from the perspective of the applicable case-law. Moving further, the article continues with short considerations on the opposability of well-known trademarks at European level, and, more specifically, regarding the opposability of unregistered trademarks by Romanian holders. Last but not least, the protection of trademarks with reputation is briefly analysed. In conclusion, the paper raises the question wether protection of European unregistred trademarks should concern the European legislator in future amendment of the EU Trade Mark Regulation.

1. The European legal provisions

Regarding the current provisions established at EU level, the trademark protection system implemented is undoubtedly the first-to-file system.

However, the European legislator's optics introduced with the new regulation on the European Union trade mark seems to have mitigated the categorical approach set up under the previous legal provisions.

Thus, Article 7 of the preamble of the Council Regulation (EC) No. 207/2009 of 26 February 2009 on the Community trade mark (hereinafter „Community trade mark regulation") ha the following content: „ The rights in a Community trade mark should not be obtained otherwise than by registration, and registration should be refused in particular if the trade mark is not distinctive, if it is unlawful or if it conflicts with earlier rights"[1]. Such a rule expressly excluded the existence of a possible 'unregistered Community trade mark' which could confer exclusive rights to its proprietor. However, the Community trade mark regulation does not suppress the rights of Member States to confer trade mark rights in a manner other than registration, Article 6 of the preamble having the following content: „(...) The Community law relating to trade marks nevertheless does not replace the laws of the Member States on trade marks (...)[2]". The main purpose of this article is not imposing the obligation of registration of a Community trade mark if the economic needs of the proprietor impose only the registration of a (or some) national trade mark(s): „It would not in fact appear to be justified to require undertakings to apply for registration of their trade marks as Community trade marks. National trade marks continue to be necessary for those undertakings which do not want protection of their trade marks at Community level[3]". However, at least indirectly, the first sentence of this article allows Member States to grant trade mark rights under their own legislation, including allowing acquiring of rights in unregistered trade marks. This is also relevant for the registration of European trade marks, since the rights acquired under national laws in the Member States may be opposed to the registration of such marks, as will be further detailed.

As regards the new legal provisions, Article 9 of the preamble of the Regulation (EU) 2017/1001 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 14 June 2017 on the European Union trade mark (hereinafter the EU trade mark regulation) establishes that „The rights in an EU trade mark should not be obtained otherwise than by registration, and registration should be refused in particular if the trade mark is not distinctive, if it is unlawful or if it conflicts with earlier rights"[4]. Permissibility with regard to the possibility for Member States to grant trade mark rights under their own legislation is also maintained in the new regulation, in Articles 7-8 of the preamble: „The Union law relating to trade marks nevertheless does not replace the laws of the Member States on trade marks. It would not in fact appear to be justified to require undertakings to apply for registration of their trade marks as EU trade marks (...). National trade marks continue to be necessary for those undertakings which do not want protection of their trade marks at Union level, or which are unable to obtain Union-wide protection while national protection does not face any

[*] PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: georgemihai.irimescu@gmail.com)

[1] Article 7 of the Preamble of Council Regulation (EC) No 207/2009 of 26 February 2009 on the European Union trade mark published in the OJ L 78 of March 24, 2009;

[2] Idem, article 6;

[3] Idem;

[4] Article 9 of the preamble of Regulation (EU) 2017/1001 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 14 June 2017 on the European Union trade mark, published in OJ from June 16, 2017; obstacles. It should be left to each person seeking trade mark protection to decide whether the protection is sought only as a national trade mark in one or more Member States, or only as an EU trade mark, or both"[5].

However, „UE trade marks" are still defined in relation to the registration procedure, as being „A trade mark for goods or services which is registered in accordance with the conditions contained in this Regulation (...)"[6], while Article 6 states that „An EU trade mark shall be obtained by registration"[7]. Therefore, the provisions of the preamble remain only provisions in principle that could eventually pave the way for discussion of accepting the notion of "European unregistered trademark" in a future amendment of the European trade mark regulation.

As regards the harmonization of the legislations of the Member States through directives, the evolution of the legal provisions followed the same approach. Thus, the recently repealed directive, namely Directive No. 2008/95/EC of the European Parliament and the Council of 22 October 2008 to approximate the laws of the Member States relating to trade marks (hereinafter „The old directive") provided in Articles 4 and 5 of its preamble the following: „ It does not appear to be necessary to undertake full-scale approximation of the trade mark laws of the Member States. It will be sufficient if approximation is limited to those national provisions of law which most directly affect the functioning of the internal market."; „ This Directive should not deprive the Member States of the right to continue to protect trade marks acquired through use but should take them into account only in regard to the relationship between them and trade marks acquired by registration"[8]. This directive therefore has a neutral position on the protection of unregistered trade marks by the Member States. The Directive neither establishes the obligation to accept unregistered trade marks by Member States nor does it suppress this right. Thus, the Directive did not intend to harmonize the national legislations with respect to unregistered marks, probably considering that that such harmonization does not directly affect the functioning of the internal market. Keeping the same neutral approach, the directive continues: „ This Directive should not exclude the application to trade marks of provisions of law of the Member States other than trade mark law, such as the provisions relating to unfair competition, civil liability or consumer protection"[9]. The provisions on unfair competition are, in turn, relevant in the matter of unregistered trade marks.

Although the new directive has been adopted to narrow the discrepancies between Member States' legislative provisions, it maintains a similar approach. Directive (EU) 2015/2436 of the European Parliament bad of the Council of 16 December 2015vto approximate the laws of the Member States relating to trade marks (hereinafter „The new directive") states that „This Directive should not deprive the Member States of the right to continue to protect trade marks acquired through use but should take them into account only with regard to their relationship with trade marks acquired by registration"[10]. Further, Article 40 of the preamble states that „ This Directive should not exclude the application to trade marks of provisions of law of the Member States other than trade mark law, such as provisions relating to unfair competition, civil liability or consumer protection"[11], keeping the provisions of the repealed directive.

In conclusion, the Member States remain free to decide on the grant of rights to unregistered trade marks, while European regulations is limited to establishing the relationship between those rights and those obtained through registration.

Thus, there are situations, regulated as exceptions, where rights deriving from unregistered trademarks may represent obstacles to the registration of a subsequent European marks, as we will be shown below.

2. Protection of unregistered trademarks under Article 8 (4) of the European Trade Mark Regulation

The main exception under the European Trade Mark Regulation, which confers protection on unregistered rights, reads as follows:

„ Upon opposition by the proprietor of a non-registered trade mark or of another sign used in the course of trade of more than mere local significance, the trade mark applied for shall not be registered where and to the extent that, pursuant to Union legislation or the law of the Member State governing that sign:

a) rights to that sign were acquired prior to the date of application for registration of the EU trade mark, or the date of the priority claimed for the application for registration of the EU trade mark;
b) that sign confers on its proprietor the right to prohibit the use of a subsequent trade mark."[12]

[5] Idem, art. 7-8 of the preamble;
[6] Idem, art. (1) para. (1);
[7] Idem, art. (6);
[8] Articles 4 and 5 of the preamble of Directive 2008/95/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 22 October 2008 to approximate the laws of the Member States relating to trade marks, published in the Official Journal of the European Union of November 08, 2008;
[9] Idem, art. 7 of the preamble;
[10] Artile 11 of the preamble of Directive (EU) 2015/2436 of the European Parliament and of the Council of December 16, 2015 to approximate the laws of the Member States relating to trademarks, published in the Official Journal of the European Union of December 23, 2015;
[11] Idem, art. 40 of the preamble;
[12] Article 8 para. (4) of the Regulation (EU) 2017/1001 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 14 June 2017 on the European Union trade mark, published in OJ from June 16, 2017;

This legal provision is completed by the provisions of Article 60, which reads as follows:

An EU trade mark shall be declared invalid on application to the Office or on the basis of a counterclaim in infringement proceedings:

(…)

(c) where there is an earlier right as referred to in Article 8(4) and the conditions set out in that paragraph are fulfilled[13];

The existence of the above articles is the result of the fact that the European trade mark system was designed to coexist with national trade mark systems. Such coexistence cannot not imply respecting the priority of prior rights acquired by a holder, irrespective of whether that right has been acquired at national or European level. Thus, even if the European legislator chose not to regulate the existence of unregistered European marks (not even of well-known European marks), he can not ignore the regulation in various forms in the Member States of the European Union of the protection granted to such marks .

In relation to the system of protection of European trade marks, the doctrine stated that although this system is classified as an international one, it differs significantly from other international systems such as the Madrid Arrangement and Protocol, being closer to a national system, as it implies filing an application for a trade mark before an office in order to obtain registration under the applicability of a set of laws, rules and procedures. According to the quoted authord, the only difference from a national office is that this jurisdiction covers a collectivity of states, namely the Member States of the European Union, and not a single state[14].

Regarding the coexistence of the two trade mark protection systems (namely the European and national systems), we wish to make the following specification. In the light of the European regulations, the proprietor of a trade mark filed before the Alicante Office, which has received an opposition on the basis of an unregistered national mark, has the possibility to continue the registration procedure before other national offices (of any of the other Member States of the Union European), keeping the filing date of the European mark originally filed. This system of conversion of the European mark into national marks takes into account the fact that, although the registration conditions of the marks are, in principle, harmonized at the level of the Member States, there are still sufficient differences which could, for example, allow the registration of a mark at the level of the national jurisdictions but not at European level, or vice versa[15]. We are of the opinion that the same logic subscribes to the possibility of registering a mark in the other Member States of the Union after it has been rejected fllowing an opposition based on an unregistered mark valid in a Member State. Although the European system is regarded as covering a unitary jurisdiction, namely the European Union, the unitary character of the European mark being one of the basic principles of the relevant legislation, it should be remembered that, if there is a barrier to registration deriving from a single Member State, it would be inequitable for the proprietor of the trade mark not to have the possibility to continue the registration procedures in the other Member States of the European Union, keeping the filing date of the European mark. Thus, the European system is weighted and balanced by national systems, as long as there is no complete harmonization at European level of Member States' trademark law with respect to trademark protection. Moreover, as stated above in the preamble to the European trade Mark regulation „National trade marks continue to be necessary for those undertakings which (…) are unable to obtain Union-wide protection while national protection does not face any obstacles[16]".

Consequently, these provisions are intended to balance European provisions with the national ones, giving effect to national rules protecting unregistered trade marks, but adding its own criteria for their applicability, as will be seen below.

Returning to Article 8 (4) of the European trade mark regulation, several conclusions can be drawn from the economy of these legislative provisions. First, the procedural framework in which rights relating to an unregistered sign can be invoked is clearly delimited in opposition proceedings, cancellation actions and counterclaims in infringement proceedings. It follows from the strict analysis of these provisions that the rights deriving from the use of a sign in compliance with the conditions of Article 8 cannot be invoked in a direct infringement action at European Union level. These may, however, be invoked to put an end to the use of a later European trademark at national level, as further detailed in this article.

Also, for a complete analysis of the proceedings before the EU IPO, we mention that the proprietor of such a sign can bring both a cancellation action based on absolute grounds and an action for revocation of a trade mark on the grounds of non-use. This is possible because filing these actions does not involve the justification of any earlier rights of the party who initiates them, nor the justification of an interest, as is the case before the national courts, according to the relevant civil legislation. In this respect, for example, the EU IPO Guidelines provide the following: „As regards applications for revocation or for invalidity based on absolute grounds, the applicant does not need to demonstrate an interest in bringing proceedings (…).This is because, while relative grounds for

[13] Idem, art. 60 para. (1);

[14] Tina Hart, Linda Fazzani, Simon Clark, Intellectual Property Law, Ediția a 4-a, Palgrave Macmillan, Londra, 2006, pages 153 – 154;

[15] Idem, pages 154-155;

[16] Idem, art. 8 of the Regulation (EU) 2017/1001 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 14 June 2017 on the European Union trade mark, published in OJ from June 16, 2017; invalidity protect the interests of proprietors of certain earlier rights, the absolute grounds for invalidity and for revocation aim to protect the general interest (including, in the case of revocations based on lack of use, the general interest in revoking the registration of trade marks that do not satisfy the use requirement)"[17].

As regards the conditions for the applicability of Article 8 (4), one of the essential conditions is that the use of the sign "more than mere local significance". Therefore, although it is necessary, it is not sufficient for the unregistered trade mark to enjoy protection under national law. Thus, according to established case-law, the evaluation of the use of the sign is subject to a dual system, both from the point of view of the applicable national legislation and the criteria established at European level: „ In order to successfully invoke Article 8(4) EUTMR in opposition proceedings, the earlier rights must be used. There are two different use requirement standards which must be taken into account: • national standard • European standard. The two use requirement standards, however, clearly overlap. They must not be viewed in isolation but have to be assessed together. This applies, in particular, to the 'intensity of use' under the national standard and 'use in trade of more than mere local significance' under the European standard"[18].

However, we consider that the explanations provided by the EU IPO Guidelines do not provide a clear explanation of those aspects of use for which the national filter is applied and those for which the European standard is being analyzed. The concept of 'intensity' of use is very broad, which may include territorial or temporal variables or the market-share of the goods / services designated by the mark in question. On the other hand, there is no doubt that the notion of 'use in trade of more than mere local significance' implies an analysis of the intensity of use of the opposed mark.

However, in order to determine the notion of "use in the course of trade", the European case law has laid down several criteria. The European Court of Justice held that the meaning of the phrase "use in the course of trade" should not have the same meaning as "serious use" within the meaning of the provisions on proof of use which may be sought in opposition proceedings or a revocation action[19].

Instead, the European Court of Justice has established other criteria for determining use in accordance with Article 8. Thus, the European Court of Justice has held that the 'use in the course of trade' refers to the use of the sign 'in the course of a commercial activity with a view to economic advantage and not as a private matter". In the cited case, Mr. Reed, supporter of the Arsenal football club in London, has sold unofficial souvenirs that have been bearing the sport club's signs for more than 30 years. In April 2001, Mr. Reed convinced the national judge that, when he used it on replicas and other commodities, the Arsenal name did not function as a trade mark in the traditional sense, as the ARSENAL trademark did inform to the buyers on where the goods came from. The ARSENAL mark served only as a "sign of support, loyalty or affiliation." Since the law provides protection to trade mark owners to prevent consumers from misrepresenting the origin of the products, Mr. Reed argued that the use of Arsenal marks, which did not distort the place of origin of the goods, was lawful. However, the European Court of Justice has stated that the use of Mr. Reed's Arsenal brand was likely to give the impression that there is a material link between his replica products and the Arsenal club. The defendant argued that there could be no such link because the sign displayed above his stand informed the buyers that the goods are unofficial, but the Court of Justice held that when these products are seen by third parties away from its stand, those third parties would not know that the products are unofficial and would assume the opposite. In that context, the Court has established in that decision the scope of the concept of 'use in the course of trade'[20], having as reference rather the identification function of the mark.

An interesting aspect highlighted by the doctrine about the Arsenal case is that the European Court did not use as criterion the well-known phrase "use as a trademark". On the contrary, the court has approached a very generous view of the types of use which, in that context, could have adversely affected the essential functions of the trade mark, namely to guarantee the commercial origin of the products to which it was applied[21].

Further analyzing the conditions for the applicability of Article 8 (4), concerning the period of use, the Court of Justice held that the opponent must show that the use of the opposed mark took place prior to the filing of the trade mark application against which the opposition was filed, or its priority date. Although such a conclusion seems prima facie obvious, it occurred in the context where the Court has dealt with whether the use of an unregistered mark made exclusively or to a large extent between the filing of the application and its publication is sufficient to satisfy the requirement of its use. To this end, the Court concluded that such use „will not be sufficient to establish that the use of the sign in the course of trade has been such as

[17] Guidelines for Examination of European Union trade marks, European Union Intellectual Property Office, (EUIPO), Part D, Cancellation, Section 1, Proceedings; page 4;

[18] Examination of European Union trade marks, European Union Intellectual Property Office, (EUIPO), Part C, Opposition, Section 4, Rights under article 8(4) and 8(6) EUTMR; page 16;

[19] Judgment of the General Court (Seventh Chamber) of 30 September 2010, Granuband BV v Office for Harmonisation in the Internal Market (Trade Marks and Designs) (OHIM), para 24-27;

[20] Judgment of the Court of 12 November 2002, Arsenal Football Club plc v Matthew Reed, para. 12-40; to prove that the sign is of sufficient significance"[22]. Although the time elapsed between the filing of a trade mark application and its publication may be considerable, the Court has held that only use prior to the date of filing of the application can guarantee that the use was real and not only for the purpose of challenging the new mark[23].

[21] Jeremy Phillips, Ilanah Simon, Trade Mark Use, Oxford University Press, New York, 2005, pages 170 – 171;

Moreover, according to the applicable case-law, the use must be continued until the time of filing the opposition or the cancellation action. In that regard, in one of the decisions of the Cancellation Division of the EU IPO (at that time, OHIM), the Commission stated that, by analogy with the requirement that an earlier mark be still valid or renewed at the time of the filing the cancellation, the same condition must also apply to unregistered marks. As long as the use of these marks is the premise (in fact) justifying their existence, the same premise must be proven and exist at the time of filing the opposition or the cancellation action[24].

Another condition set for the by the analyzed article of the European trade mark regulation is that the use of the mark should be mere than local. This is a condition that adds to any requirements set under national law. For this reason, we consider that, if the use of a sign at a local level confers rights under national law, this use will not automatically confer rights also at European level. In assessing whether that condition has been fulfilled, the case-law has laid down a number of criteria in order to prevent, according to the Court, that „an earlier sign, which is not sufficiently important or significant, from making it possible to challenge either the registration or the validity of a Community trade mark". Also, according to the cited decision, although there are no clear territorial delimitation standards to meet the requirement to overcome local use of the sign, it is normally the use in one town or in a single province, it should not be enough[25].

„Furthermore, the significance of a sign used to identify specific business activities must be established in relation to the identifying function of that sign. That consideration means that account must be taken, first, of the geographical dimension of the sign's significance, that is to say of the territory in which it is used to identify its proprietor's economic activity, as is apparent from a textual interpretation of Article 8(4) of Regulation No 40/94. Account must be taken, secondly, of the economic dimension of the sign's significance, which is assessed in the light of the length of time for which it has fulfilled its function in the course of trade and the degree to which it has been used, of the group of addressees among which the sign in question has become known as a distinctive element, namely consumers, competitors or even suppliers, or even of the exposure given to the sign, for example, through advertising or on the internet"[26].

Therefore, the fact that the use must go beyond the local sphere requires both a territorial, geographical interpretation, as well as a qualitative, active interpretation, representing the economic relevance of this use. More than a mere geographical examination of this use, it is necessary to examine the intensity of use, which can be translated, for example, by the market share of the products / services designated by that mark or, in other words, the economic dimension of this use.

As mentioned above, as regards the territorial dimension, the same decision shows that the use of the mark within a single town, even of a large size, without showing that the relevant public outside that territory could have had contact with the mark, is not sufficient for the purposes of Article 8 (4) of the Regulation[27].

The doctrine emphasized that the purpose of these provisions is to prevent a person from opposing the registration of a European trade mark on the basis of a right which does not have a real presence on the relevant market. For this reason, the role of the jurisprudence has been to determine how proof of use of the opposing mark is to be analyzed in each conflict[28].

However, although an exclusively local use of a sign cannot be opposed to the registration of a European trade mark, it may be opposed to the use of that sign in that territory. We take into account the provisions of Article 136 of the Regulation, which reads as follows: „The proprietor of an earlier right which only applies to a particular locality may oppose the use of the EU trade mark in the territory where his right is protected in so far as the law of the Member State concerned so permits"[29].

We understand from the economy of this text that the application of a European standard on the use of the opposed mark is no longer necessary. The following article penalizes the passivity of the holder of the earlier right, since he will no longer be able to oppose such use if he has tolerated for 5 years the use of the European mark in that territory. However, the proprietor of the European trade mark cannot oppose the use of this right[30], thereby creating the premises of forced coexistence, which has as reason both respecting the rights acquired locally under national law and the rights

[22] Judgment of the Court (Grand Chamber) of 29 March 2011, Anheuser-Busch Inc. v Budějovický Budvar, národní podnik, para. 166-168;
[23] Idem;
[24] Decision of the Cancellation Division of July 30, 2010 in the proceedings between Dimian AG v. Bayer Design Fritz Bayer, page 6;
[25] Judgment of the Court of First Instance (Second Chamber) of 24 March 2009, Alberto Jorge Moreira da Fonseca, Lda v Office for Harmonisation in the Internal Market (Trade Marks and Designs) (OHIM), para. 36-42;
[26] Idem, para. 37;
[27] Idem, para. 44;
[28] Lionel Bently, Brad Sherman, Intellectual Property Law, 4th Edition, Oxford University Press, Oxford, 2014, pages 1012 – 1013;
[29] Article 138 alin. (1) of the Regulation (EU) 2017/1001 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 14 June 2017 on the European Union trade mark, published in OJ from June 16, 2017;
[30] Idem, art. 138 para. (2) and (3); acquired by virtue of the registration of a trade mark at European level.

The doctrine names these provisions as the 'Emmental' provisions, given that the proprietor of an earlier unregistered mark may choose not to oppose the registration of a European mark but may oppose its use in the territory of that state. According to the author, the European mark is valid in the territory of the other Member States, except in the territory covered by the earlier unregistered trade mark, "like a piece of cheese with holes"[31].

However, we believe that it would be more rigorous to assert about the European mark, although valid at European Union level, as the principle of its uniqueness cannot be formally infringed, that its validity is either devoid of content or neutralized by the action of the proprietor of the earlier unregistered trade mark.

Another reason for the existence of these provisions identified by the doctrine is the expansion of the European Union from 15 states to 28 in the year 2013. These rules are therefore a protection offered to holders of unregistered trade marks of newly admitted Member States (if such marks are protected under national law) in the face of a "devastating" effect of the automatic extension of the protection of European trademarks to these new territories[32]. We consider that this reasoning justifies the exclusive application of the national standard relating to the use of the opposed mark, since what is protected is the interest of such a proprietor who is in a position to defend himself against a new mark valid on his territory and the legislation subsequent to his use, which it could not have foreseen when it began to use its mark.

To sum up, the national provisions providing for the protection of the sign, the requirements to obtain such protection, the existence of a right to the sign, if the right has been validly acquired (e.g. by use), the legal protection condition (for example in case of misuse, use of identical or similar signs, likelihood of confusion), the scope of protection (the right to prohibit use, etc.) are elements that must be demonstrated under national law, whereas the commercial use of the sign and the demonstration of the incidence of more than mere local significance are elements that are analyzed according to the "European standard"[33].

It is also very important that the opponent is required to demonstrate before the European office that the unregistered marks are protected under national law. In this respect, the "BUD judgment" established that in this respect the burden of proving that this condition had been fulfilled lies with the opponent before the EU IPO. „(...) the General Court allegedly made an error there in holding that, in the present case, the Board of Appeal was required to acquaint itself of its own motion with the outcome of proceedings brought by Budvar before the Oberster Gerichtshof, the court of last instance in Austria, against a judgment whose consequence was that Budvar had not been able to prohibit use of a subsequent trade mark on the basis of the appellation 'Bud' as protected under the relevant bilateral treaties. Furthermore, (...),the burden of proving that that condition is met lies with the opponent before OHIM. Under these circumstances and regarding the previous rights invoked in the matter, the General Court correctly held (...) that regard must be had, in particular, to the national rules advanced in support of the opposition and to the judicial decisions delivered in the Member State concerned and that, on that basis, the opponent must establish that the sign concerned falls within the scope of the law of the Member State relied on and that it allows use of a subsequent mark to be prohibited"[34].

Further on, the case „Elio Fiorucci" establishes that the opponent has the burden to „ to provide OHIM not only with particulars showing that he satisfies the necessary conditions, in accordance with the national law of which he is seeking application, in order to be able to have the use of a Community trade mark prohibited by virtue of an earlier right, but also particulars establishing the content of that law"[35].

Consequently, the opponent is required to submit a complex line of argument by which he must show to the Office the content of the national legislation and also to argue that the invoked legal provisions give him the right to oppose an unregistered national mark.

3. Protection of well-known trademarks according to Article 8 para. (2) letter. c) of the European Union trade mark regulation

A second exception is the opposability of trade marks that are well known at national level. While listing the prior rights that can be invoked in an opposition, The European Union trade mark regulation provides that „For the purposes of paragraph 1, 'earlier trade mark' means: (...) (c) trade marks which, on the date of application for registration of the EU trade mark, or, where appropriate, of the priority claimed in respect of the application for registration of the EU trade mark, are well known in a Member State,

[31] Hector MacQueen, Charlotte Waelde, Gramae Laurie, Contemporary Intellectual Property, Law and Policy, Oxford University Press, Oxford, 2008, page 554;

[32] Lionel Bently, Brad Sherman, op. cit., 4th Edition, Oxford University Press, Oxford, 2014, p. 1076;

[33] Examination of European Union trade marks, European Union Intellectual Property Office, (EUIPO), Part C, Opposition, Section 4, Rights under article 8(4) and 8(6) EUTMR; page 27;

[34] Judgment of the Court (Grand Chamber) of 29 March 2011, Anheuser-Busch Inc. v Budějovický Budvar, národní podnik, para. 187-190.

[35] Judgment of the Court (Grand Chamber) of 5 July 2011, Edwin Co. Ltd v Office for Harmonisation in the Internal Market (Trade Marks and Designs) (OHIM), para. 50 in the sense in which the words 'well known' are used in Article 6bis of the Paris Convention"[36].

From the economy of this text we understand that this legal provision does not regulate a well-known European trade mark, but only refers to the protection of well-known trade marks in a particular Member State of the European Union.

However, there are substantial differences from the previously analyzed legal provisions. Firstly, the opponent is no longer required toprove the national legislation protecting the well-known marks. Moreover, it is presumed that Member States protect well known trade marks in their own legislation, since the Directive aimed at approximating and harmonizing Member States' legislations requires them to protect well-known under the Paris Convention[37].

Therefore, by analyzing the legal text, the opponent or the applicant in a cancellation action is required to indicate the mark whose well known status he is going to demonstrate and also to indicate the goods and / or services for which it is well-known and the Member State in which the well-known status is invoked.

Regarding the intensity of use to be demonstrated, the applicable legal provisions do not regulate this issue. As far as case-law is concerned, it offers a wide range of possibilities to demonstrate the well-known status of a mark: „In order to determine the mark's level of recognition, all the relevant facts of the case must be taken into consideration, including, in particular, the market share held by the trade mark, the intensity, geographical extent and duration of its use, and the size of the investment made by the undertaking in promoting it[38]".

4. Is it possible to file an opposition based on an unregistered trademark used in Romania?[39]

To establish if Romania unregistered trademarks could be opposed to the registration of an European trade mark, it must first be established to what extent unregistered marks are protected at national level.

Without going into detail, one of the main exceptions to the principle of the first to file system, set out in the national legislation, is the protection of well-known trade marks.

To this end, Article 6 para. (1) letters a) and b) from the Trade marks law, coroborated with para. (2) letters f) have the following content: registration of a trademark shall also be refused or shall be susceptible to being cancelled, as the case may be, if it is identical with an earlier trademark, and the goods and services for which registration is applied or the trademark has been registered are identical with the goods and services for which the earlier trademark is protected or if, because of its identity with or similarity to the earlier trademark and because of identity or similarity of the goods or services covered by the two trademarks, there exists a likelihood of confusion in the public perception, the likelihood of association with the earlier trademark included. Para. 2 establishes that the category of prior marks, in the sense of para. 1, comprises marks that, at the filing date of the trademark application or, as the case may be, at the date of the invoked priority, are well known in Romania, in the sense of art. 6 bis of the Paris ConventionAlin. (2)[40].

The doctrine considers that obtaining the rights for a trademark through proving its well known status has the same effects as registration thereof. A natural consequence of this is that a well known mark must fulfill the same conditions as a registered trademark, namely: to be licit, susceptible of being graphicaly represented, distinctive and available. In the absence of these conditions, the item may be percieved as a well known sign, but not a well known trademark[41].

Further on the conditions of protection, is the likelihood of confusion a condition for successfully opposing a well known mark? Without going into discussions on the national legislative developments, at this moment, the amendment of the Trade Marks Law in 2010 has, however, led to the amendment of the article on the opposability of the well known trademark, making, like the Directive, a reference to Art. 6bis of the Paris Convention. We therefore consider that arguing of the likelihood of confusion, including the risk of association, became a condition for succesfully opposing a well known trademark, taking into consideration as a relevant factor in the overall assessment of the likelihood of confusion the fact that a higher degree of distinctive character favors the likelihood of confusion, including the likelihood of association.

Moreover, the same conclusion can be drawn from the legislative technique used by the legislator. Thus the well known mark substitutes the notion of prior mark in the sense of art. 6 letter b) of the Trademark Law, which is the article that imposes the likelihood of confusion as an essential condition for [36] Article 8 para. (2) letter c) of the Regulation (EU) 2017/1001 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 14 June 2017 on the European Union trade mark, published in OJ from June 16, 2017;

[37] Article 5 para. (2) letter d) of the Directive (EU) 2015/2436 of the European Parliament and of the Council of December 16, 2015 to approximate the laws of the Member States relating to trademarks, published in the Official Journal of the European Union of December 23, 2015;

[38] Decision of the EU IPO Opposition Division in the matter B 2 752 866 of October 13, 2017, regarding the trademark between the trademarks ARIA vs. ARIA, page 3;

[39] A detailed analysis of the protection of well-known trademarks, as well as passages of this chapter were published in the Romanian Intellectual Property Law Magazine, no. 2 / 2016, in the article Regimul juridic al mărilor notorii, George-Mihai Irimescu, pages 139 – 154;

[40] Article 6 para. (1) letters a) and b) and para. (2) letter. f) of Law no. 84 / 1998 regarding Trademarks and Geographical Indications, republished in the Official Gazette no. 337 from May 8, 2014; opposing a prior mark. The same considerations apply to the European Union trade mark regulation, which replaces the well known mark to a prior mark in the sense of its opposability, provided that the likelihood of confusion exists.

[41] Viorel Roș, Octavia Spineanu-Matei, Dragoș Bogdan, Dreptul Proprietății Intelectuale. Dreptul Proprietății Industriale. Mărcile și indicațiile geografice, All Beck Publishing, Bucharest, page 103;

Concretely, the need to prove the likelihood of confusion was also underlined in a recent decision of the Romanian Patent and Trademark Office, which established the following: The Board finds that the provisions of art. 6 para. (2) letter f) are not applicable in this matter, as the conditions required by the art. 6 bis of the Paris Convenion are not fulfilled (The countries of the Union undertake, ex officio if their legislation so permits, or at the request of an interested party, to refuse or to cancel the registration, and to prohibit the use, of a trademark which constitutes a reproduction, an imitation, or a translation, liable to create confusion, of a mark considered by the competent authority of the country of registration or use to be well known in that country as being already the mark of a person entitled to the benefits of this Convention and used for identical or similar goods. These provisions shall also apply when the essential part of the mark constitutes a reproduction of any such well known mark or an imitation liable to create confusion therewith[42]). We mention that the same words were underlined by the editors of the decision.

At EU level, the same the same considerations were supported in one of the EU IPO decisions according to which: „In the context of Article 8(2)(c) EUTMR, the requirements for applying Article 6bis of the Paris Convention and Article 8(1)(b) EUTMR are the same, although the terminology used is different. Both provisions require similarity between the goods or services and similar or identical signs (…). Both articles also require a likelihood of confusion („liable to create confusion" is the wording used in Article 6bis)[43]".

As regards the use of the well known trademarks, according to the provisions of Law no. 84 / 1998 on Trademarks and Geographical Indications, republished, the well known trade mark is defined as a trademark that is widely known to the segment of the public concerned by the goods or services to which it applies, without being required either registration or use thereof in Romania for the trademark to be opposable[44]. Therefore, what is essential under national law is the degree of knowledge, and not the use of the well-known mark itself, although the doctrine, case law and even national consultative documents have issued many recommendations on the evidence of use that should be made to demonstrate such a degree of knowledge. However, it must be remembered that, in order to oppose a well-known trade mark under the European Trade Mark Regulation, it is necessary to fulfill the "European criteria" for the use of the mark, as described above.

We thetefore conclude that Romanian well-known trade marks may be successfully opposed to a subsequent European mark, provided that the opponent clearly mentions the trademark whose well-known status is invoked, the products and / or services for which the mark is notorious, the territory in which the trademark is well-known and, not least, to provide sufficient evidence to that effect.

5. European trade marks with reputation

The European Union trade mark regulation states that „Upon opposition by the proprietor of a registered earlier trade mark within the meaning of paragraph 2, the trade mark applied for shall not be registered where it is identical with, or similar to, an earlier trade mark, irrespective of whether the goods or services for which it is applied are identical with, similar to or not similar to those for which the earlier trade mark is registered, where, in the case of an earlier EU trade mark, the trade mark has a reputation in the Union or, in the case of an earlier national trade mark, the trade mark has a reputation in the Member State concerned, and where the use without due cause of the trade mark applied for would take unfair advantage of, or be detrimental to, the distinctive character or the repute of the earlier trade mark"[45].

We consider that the protection of trade marks with reputation is a mechanism which, to a certain extent, confers rights to the proprietor of a trade mark outside the scope of the protection of a registered trade mark. This is a conclusion we can draw solely from the point of view of the protection of trade marks with reputation. However, the premises of protection are different. Firstly, the protection of the marks with reputation has as its starting point a registered trade mark and not an unregistered trade mark. From this perspective, the similarity is only partial, in the sense that trade marks with reputation are also protected against goods or services which are not designated by the earlier registered mark. It should also be noted that both the marks with reputation and the unregistered marks require proof of use of the earlier mark. However, without going into the details of the quantitative and qualitative criteria that the evidence of use to be made should meet, these criteria being different including in the case of unregistered trade marks from different territories, we mention that the legal nature of the use is different. In the case of unregistered trade marks, use is constitutive of rights, whereas in the case of the trade marks with reputation,

[42] Decision of the Romanian PTO's Board of Appeal no. 210 from October 14,.2014 in the matter Mineral Quantum SRL vs. Rewe (România) SRL, page 8;

[43] Decision of EUIPO's Cancellation Division in the matter 11 232 C from July 14, 2017, page 14;

[44] Article 3 letter d) of Law no. 84 / 1998 regarding Trademarks and Geographical Indications, republished in the Official Gazette no. 337 from May 8, 2014;

[45] Idem, article 8 para. (5); their reputation widens the scope of protection, the intensive use being only the instrument by which that reputation is demonstrated.

6. Conclusions

As the doctrine has underlined, European intellectual property regulations "must be understood, first of all, by the desire to create a single European market [46]". Thus, although the European Union is a jurisdiction that operates by applying the principle of registration priority, the legislator can not ignore the reality of the national jurisdictions it covers. Thus, under certain conditions, the proprietors of unregistered marks may oppose both the registration and the use of subsequent European marks.

However, we conclude by asking the following questions - is it advisable in a forthcoming regulation, a possible future Directive on the approximation of national trademark laws to harmonize their provisions on the protection of unregistered trade marks? Would such a regulation provide an increased predictability to trade mark owners in the internal market? Or, on the contrary, would create imbalances in the national jurisdictions where such changes would bring essential changes?

We do not have an answer at this time. However, we believe that the European legislator has relaxed its approach in this regard, opening the way for a stronger protection of unregistered brands in the future.

References

- Viorel Roș, Octavia Spineanu-Matei, Dragoș Bogdan, Dreptul Proprietății Intelectuale. Dreptul Proprietății Industriale. Mărcile și indicațiile geografice, All Beck Publishing, Bucharest
- Mihaela Daciana Boloș, Mărcile și indicațiile geografice în sistemul relațiilor internaționale, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2013
- Lionel Bently, Brad Sherman, Intellectual Property Law, 4th Edition, Oxford University Press, Oxford, 2014
- Tina Hart, Linda Fazzani, Simon Clark, Intellectual Property Law, 4th Edition, Palgrave Macmillan, London, 2006
- Jeremy Phillips, Ilanah Simon, Trade Mark Use, Oxford University Press, New York, 2005
- Romanian Intellectual Property Law Magazine, no. 2 / 2016, Regimul juridic al mărilor notorii, George-Mihai Irimescu
- Hector MacQueen, Charlotte Waelde, Gramae Laurie, Contemporary Intellectual Property, Law and Policy, Oxford University Press, Oxford, 2008
- Guidelines for Examination of European Union trade marks, European Union Intellectual Property Office, (EUIPO), Part D, Cancellation, Section 1, Proceedings
- Examination of European Union trade marks, European Union Intellectual Property Office, (EUIPO), Part C, Opposition, Section 4, Rights under article 8(4) and 8(6) EUTMR
