DATABASES AND THE SUI-GENERIS RIGHT – PROTECTION OUTSIDE THE ORIGINALITY. THE DISREGARD OF THE PUBLIC DOMAIN

Monica LUPAȘCU[*]

Abstract

This study focuses on databases as they are regulated by Directive no.96/9/EC regarding the protection of databases. There are also several references to Romanian Law no.8/1996 on copyright and neighbouring rights which implements the mentioned European Directive. The study analyses certain effects that the sui-generis protection has on public domain.

The study tries to demonstrate that the reglementation specific to databases neglects the interests correlated with the public domain. The effect of such a regulation is the abusive creation of some databases in which the public domain (meaning information not protected by copyright such as news, ideas, procedures, methods, systems, processes, concepts, principles, discoveries) ends up being encapsulated and made available only to some private interests, the access to public domain being regulated indirectly. The study begins by explaining the sui- generis right and its origin. The first mention of databases can be found in "Green Paper on Copyright (1998)," a document that clearly shows, the database protection was thought to cover a sphere of information non-protectable from the scientific and industrial fields.

Several arguments are made by the author, most of them based on the report of the Public Consultation sustained in 2014 in regards to the necessity of the sui-generis right. There are some references made to a specific case law, namely British Houseracing Board vs William Hill and Fixture Marketing Ldt. The ECJ's decision în that case is of great importance for the support of public interest to access information corresponding to some restrictive fields that are derived as a result of the maker's activities, because in the absence of the sui-generis right, all this information can be freely accessed and used.

Keywords: databases, sui-generis, copyright, lack of originality, public domain, free uses, Directive on databases.

1. Introduction.

Legal ground:

- Directive 96/9/EC regarding the legal protection of databases;
- Romanian Law no.8/1996 regarding copyright and neighbouring rights – chapter VI – articles 122^1 – 122^4

The copyright legislation offers protections to certain materials even outside of the originality criteria. As far as databases are concerned, law identifies a double protection, because databases are protected not only by copyright but also by the sui-generis right, correspondent not only to exceptional (original) collections, but also, apparently, to any database. We can, in this context, take into consideration the sui-generis protection for databases that benefit from this hybrid legal formula also, which is granted as an additional measure of protection for collections, also called compilations of materials resulted from qualitative and quantitative investments.

Protection outside originality was conferred on the European front to any "collection of works, data, or other independent elements," whose characteristic is indicated as being "disposed in a systematic or methodical manner," being "individually accessible through electronic or other means." Directive no. 96/9/EC regarding legal protection of databases identifies in its preamble, paragraph (38), the reasons that justified the creation of this system of protection of databases aside of copyright, as being:

"Whereas the increasing use of digital recording technology exposes the database maker to the risk that the contents of his database may be copied and rearranged electronically, without his authorization, to produce a database of identical content which, however, does not infringe any copyright in the arrangement of his database;"

If databases with content protected by copyright could have benefited from all the prerogatives of copyright law, previous to the uniformity of the sui-generis right at a European level, collections with unprotected content were, in the eyes of the Community legislator, exposed to risks of its duplication and electronic adaptation, through the creation of the so-called parasite products and services.

The sui-generis protection is motivated, therefore, by the need to protect databases with content that is free to use, since it's the only type of content that does not benefit from copyright protection and this is the only type of content to which there cannot be imposed any limitations and obligations regarding a correct usage. We mention this because treating the subject of databases in this study will be explained exactly by the analysis of certain effects that the sui-generis protection has on the public domain.

We consider also that, despite the internal and European regulation regarding this type of protection through copyright law, databases that fall under the sui generis protection cannot be integrated in the sphere of copyright.

2. Protection outside originality

If the basis of copyright is originality, the creation of intellectual source, the sui generic protection has a purely economic basis, being tied to the investment and the resources allocated by certain companies to create some databases. The sui-generis protection has to be extremely well understood as referring exclusively to content that cannot be protected and not to the structure of the database, as this, by choosing and disposing the material, could benefit from copyright insofar as it presents originality.

The main differences between copyright protection and the sui-generis protection of databases, and the way in which they affect the public domain:

I. The condition of the enforcement of copyright protection consists mainly in originality, as the work needs to be an intellectual creation. But the materials protected by the sui-generis right are not conditioned by originality, the natural conclusion being that the materials contained by the database can, therefore, lack originality, as also the structure itself, which does not need to stand out as bearing the name of a certain author. The databases that are protected by copyright have a content and/or structure that presents originality, whereas databases protected by the sui-generis right can lack originality and have content that is unprotected, meaning it is free to use, most of these types of materials being, as I mentioned, from the sphere of the public domain. We can remember, as a first differentiation between copyright and sui-generis, that while the former refers to databases that are the object of copyright, the sui-generis protection regards databases that, through their content, are part of the public domain.

II. The object of copyright protection relates both to the content of the database as well as to its structure, the sui-generis protection being exclusively related to content, materialized, as is clear from the above analysis, in works belonging to the public domain.

III. The legitimacy of usage of the sui-generis protected databases presents significant differences to the sphere of usage allowed in the case of public domain materials. If the materials located outside of the copyright's object are considered free for any use, of any nature, commercial or not, and without considering qualitative and quantitative aspects, the usage of materials that belong to sui-generis databases is limited as a sphere, the internal law allowing only certain acts, which, basically, should not affect the activity and interests of the database's producer.

The law considers, also important, to give priority of usage to acts of extraction and reuse that are not substantial, this quantitative reference marking the first major difference, which takes into account materials that are supposedly for public use. Referring to this aspect, although the regulations are assumed to take into account technological development and innovation interests, we must not forget the fact that the entire content of the databases that benefit from the sui-generis right pertains to the public domain.

If we were to disregard this abusively implemented right, we would have, at a legislative level, a copyright whose existence would not prevent unrestricted forms of access to materials that are free to use. Copyright, both in the form that covers the content as well as the one in which the structure of the database is taken into account, is not as such to affect the use of materials that belong to the public domain but, on the contrary, can only affirm corresponding rights such as the right of access, including through the dispositions that make evident the exclusion from protection of some materials like ideas, theories, simple data and information, a.s.o. The general public, beneficiary of the right of access to any material that pertains to the public domain, makes use of it in any way, being able to use the public domain in its entirety, if this was possible, no quantitative prohibition being able to be imposed. But the sui-generis right not only prohibits any forms of substantial extraction and reuse, but also unsubstantial extractions if they are "repeated and systematic" and if they "imply acts contrary to normal use of this database or could cause undue damage to the legitimate interests of the database's maker."(art. 122^2 paragraph (5)).

The database producer's interest is also supported and motivated at a European level, through the indications made in the Database Directive, article 6, paragraph (3):

"In accordance with the Berne Convention regarding the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works, this article cannot be interpreted in such a way as to allow the use of its application in a way that would bring forth unduly prejudice to the legitimate interests of the owner of the right or that contravenes normal exploitation of the database"

It remains unexplained why a referral to an act that refers to copyright protection of certain works is available, in the context in which the regulation regarded the sui-generis right whose existence was justified by completely different interests than those having to do with the necessity of copyright protection. It must not be omitted the fact that the interest of awarding copyright to the works' creators is founded on intellectual creation, copyright not being conceived outside the concept of originality. Therefore, the existence of a creation that has an intellectual source, which has justified the protection through copyright in its current normative form, cannot be brought as a justification for protecting some rights whose justification is strictly pecuniary.

Returning to the sphere of allowed uses, through a denaturation of what a normal exploitation of public domain works should be, it's considered that an act of prejudice is also that through which "acts that come in conflict with the normal usage of this database." The first conclusion that one comes to as a result of the interpretation of this syntagm, is the disposal to opposite extremes of two users of public domain works, a database user being considered as being in a position of opposite interests to the database's manufacturer, whom, we must not forget, is also a public domain works user. The second conclusion one comes to is the re-confirmation of the existence of a distinct sphere of normal exploitation of the same type of public domain material, a sphere created exclusively only as a result of the integration of these types of materials in certain databases. Therefore, the normal exploitation of the public domain is different than the normal exploitation of the public domain integrated in databases, as in the case of the latter, the usage has common ground with the individual interest and not with the public interest, which means that, in this case, the public interest is considered as not having the value of the economic interest of a single individual.

Reducing the sphere to what was supposed to be maintained as normal usage of public domain, regulating the sui-generis right has practically pushed outside legality multiple acts that were ensuring the public's access to materials that were free to use.

The disadvantage to innovation is much greater than the advantage that the initiators of the Database Directive invoked, and this is confirmed even in the first reports[1] of the European Institution, through which it was admitted that the economical impact that was desired is not at all what they were hoping for. Nor could it have been, in the context in which, the acts through which similar databases that could have been developed were able to be forbidden on the grounds of an identity or similarity in content.

Due to the same abusive regulation, the right of access over the public domain risks not being able to be exercised independently but only in correlation with what the database legislation calls normal usage. According to art. 122^3 from the internal law, acts of reproduction and public communication can be made without the consent of the databases' manufacturer, only if they are necessary for normal usage and access to the database. According to this disposition, the act of reproduction of a public domain material is conditioned by two circumstances that need to be met cumulatively, the reproduction having to be both an act of normal usage, as well as justified by the access to the database. The conclusion is even more interesting when we realize that normal usage represents a sphere of actions considered by paragraph (2) of the same article as being different from the one in which the database manufacturer's interests are harmed or not, one being able to sustain that an act, even without concretely causing harm to the manufacturer, could be considered outside what we call normal usage. The act of normal exploitation is different from the non-prejudicial one:

"(2) The legitimate user of a database, which is made available to the public in any way, may not perform an act that comes in conflict with the normal use of this database or that unjustifiably undermines the legitimate interests of the database's manufacturer"

IV. Considering the previous mentions regarding the particular legitimacy that acts of access over information conserved in databases has gained, we need to mention again that all of these only neglect the interests correlated with the public domain. The effect of such a regulation is the abusive creation of some databases in which the public domain ends up being encapsulated and made available to some private interests, the access to public domain being regulated indirectly.

The situation is even more disadvantageous if we take into account particular databases, which, although created on platforms owned by certain companies, end up being consolidated through the action of the general public, among these being User Generated Content (UGC) platforms. Another atypical situation, having been considered or not when the Directive was created, is that in which databases are created as an effect of activities specific to certain companies or entities, among which are museums, which have the possibility to exclusively gather and combine certain data and materials from the public domain. The ability to gather or collect certain information will largely depend in this case on the type of information in question, which is less accessible to the general public. An investment in collection of such information, even if it could be proven, is not exclusively allocated to creating the database, being specific to the manufacturer in question and only to him. Moreover, considering the aforementioned particularity of information, another manufacturer outside of the museum in question, would not have even been in a position to gather the information, which are not accessible to the general public. There is, therefore, a social and economical disadvantage because of which only certain entities will be in the position of database manufacturer, if we take into account certain materials. The case of museums, which, through their activity have come in possession of the multiple photographs of works from the public domain could be an example that highlights the situation of profound disadvantage of the public, who has not only the limited possibility of taking photographs inside the museum, but who is also prohibited from using (systematic or sustained) such images, if they are in online databases created by museums.

Cases[2] brought to the Supreme Court in Europe have shown, however, that the above-mentioned examples were not taken into account when drafting the Directive.

In all of these cases, the European Court of Justice (ECJ) held that "the investment in obtaining, verifying and presenting the contents of the database refers to resources that sought the collection of existing materials independently and not to resources used for the creation of such materials." In other words, it was decided that the sui-generis right will not be applied if the database is a product that is incorporated into the main activity of its maker, in this case, being considered that the investment was made with the purpose of supporting that activity and not for the collection of pre-existing materials.

V. But what the Directive doesn't manage to regulate can be less important to take into account comparatively with the real legislative "goals" that it ends up covering. Aspects not only unregulated, but which are controversial because of the way in which it affects the public interest, end up being indirectly "resolved" by the sui-generis right, due to which certain limitations of copyright are abolished (canceled).

We're especially referring to the time limitation specific to copyright, which is not perpetual and benefits form a specific protection period. The mentions regarding the protection period are considered to be imperative, no law may impede the reaching of the term or the rights that would arise after it. The sui-generis right, although, apparently, regulated to take into account a shorter period of protection compared with copyright, of 15 years, has the capacity to be renewed multiple times, including an infinite number of times, creating the possibility of some perpetual protections. The proof of this lies in the following paragraphs available in the internal legislation:

"Art. 122[4] (3) Any substantial change, evaluated qualitatively or quantitatively, to the contents of a database, including any substantial change resulting from the accumulation of successive additions, deletions or alterations, which would result in the database being considered to be a substantial new investment, evaluated qualitatively or quantitatively, shall qualify the database resulting from that investment for its own term of protection."

The internal text represents the implementation of art. 10 paragraph (3) from the Directive, with which it is identified as a law text. The interpretations of these provisions allows the museums of public database creators to extend their banning periods beyond the 15 years by periodically updating the information they already have.

If a substantial modification that is based on a sizeable investment, can be contested as being made regularly, at least at a general level, the 15-year term itself is a non-recommended plus, a period abusively added to the duration already quite long of protection if we take into account the author's years of life plus the following 70, generally applicable in the copyright domain. The works that naturally would have ended up in the public domain, being available freely by any person, could be integrated in specific databases, ending up enduring the restrictive system for an additional period of 15 years, at least. That's exactly why we must rethink the position regarding the current "effort" made by so many curators and collectors, which, aside from the noble purpose of easing the access to public domain works, could, at any point, make use if their status as database manufacturers, the resources involved ending up actually supporting a right in disconsidering the public domain.

If the law itself, in its current form, creates the possibility of circumventing the provisions of time limitation of copyright and the prohibitions specific to it, the law also creates situations that are just as unbalanced in regards to other aspects, such as that of the controversy regarding digital reproduction of works of art. The problem of artwork photographs, although it's created and still creates multiple discussions, being able (at least theoretically) to affirm rights of both the author of the work, as well as the photographer's, was resolved at a European level and reaffirmed through public declarations of the United Kingdom Intellectual Property Office[3], an institution that said that "the simple photographing of a work of art does not create distinct rights." The decision of the British office regarded digital reproductions of works that are in the public domain, with the following argument:

"According to the European Court of Justice, copyright can be affirmed only in regards to original materials, in the sense in which these are the personal intellectual creation of the author. Considering this criteria, it is very unlikely that a simple digital image of an older work to be considered original."

The sui-generis right, without contradicting that which, obviously, can be concluded from the interpretation of the laws in force, can create interdictions in access to the photographs of the works of art that are in the public domain, if these photographs end up being part of a certain database. It's true that, based on the latest decisions of the European Court of Justice, a photographer that photographs works of art from the public domain, does not benefit from any distinct right over his photographs, not being able to affirm his interests/rights to any other person. This photographer will not be able to prohibit the usage of his photograph because its subject is free to use, belonging to the public domain. If, however, that photograph ends up being part of a collection, there is a new set of limitations and interdictions created to its use as a direct effect of the sui-generis right, thus diminishing, as consequence, the possibility to affirm the right of access to that public domain photograph.

3. The genesis of the sui-generis right. Short historical presentation.

But what is the sui-generis right actually, and what justified its appearance? Beyond the clear interests that this right protects, its historical journey is interesting to study, especially through the fact that it brings back into discussion the basic principles of copyright.

The first mention of databases can be found in "Green Paper on Copyright...(1998)[4]," a document that looked at the "importance of databases that need to be perceived exactly as deposits of content from the information era." It was also mentioned that we "need to encourage and protect the investment in databases."

In the chapter dedicated to databases, it was mentioned that "the most frequent use of databases was, at that time, predicted as being in the scientific, industrial, and business domains, whose potential was not given by originality but by content rich in unprocessed information, which could be easily recovered and updated. This factor can have an impact over the selection of materials that will become part of the database if we take into account that, in some scientific fields, short extracts from scientific publications, such as formulas, can be enough to deliver essential information, this means that, in the case of the compilation of certain types of information, the form of expression is of much lower importance compared to the substance of the information itself."

As the text clearly shows, the database protection was thought to cover a sphere of information non-protectable from the scientific and industrial fields. The distancing from the originality required by copyright is motivated by the potential that some information is likely to have, but not because of the form under which they could present themselves.

The interest in the necessity of protecting databases was expressed, therefore, long before the adoption of the Directive regarding databases. The above-mentioned texts are proof of the fact that the main interest was given by the potential that they had to incorporate information that could not be protected through copyright.

The texts from the European communication also gave expression to an already-existing doctrine in the United Kingdom and the Netherlands ("sweat of the brow"), according to which, the author of a compilations, even if unoriginal, was protected for its effort and investment. In England, although the statutory legislation[5] expressly provisioned that the protection of a work through copyright necessitates originality, in practice, there was no ad literam interpretation of this law, because the British courts had held, for a hundred years, that "including labor and effort investment is sufficient to provide protection." The basis of these assertions was, in fact, one of the principles of copyright, namely that which confirms the protection of the idea only in its forms of exteriorization. Taking into account the exclusion from protection of the idea itself, it's considered that, in the case in which subject A creates a protectable work, subject B can add to it his own skills, resources, and interpretations, modifying A's work (idea) in a manner that would create an independent protectable work. This protection was based on the taking of the idea, but in a form that was not conditioned by creativity and inventiveness. Obviously, this doctrine could not survive in the digital era and, in truth, in 2012[6], the European Court of Justice, on the basis of the interpretation of the British legislation, excluded the protection based solely on work and skill, sustaining that "in the case in which the creation procedures of the lists are not supplemented by elements that reflect originality in the selection and arrangement of those lists, these cannot be protected by copyright."

In reality, the interest was not to support independent forms of taking over ideas because these also had the risk of being, in practice, real formulas through which copyright over the initial work ended up being breached. What has been preserved, however, at a European level, as an extension of the "sweat of the brow" doctrine, was the interest of a protection with a purely economic justification. Unlike copyright, whose protection is justified through intellectual resources allocated by each author in his creations, sui-generis is explained only by the material contribution of the database's maker. And if initially, as we noticed, the database protection outside originality was thought out to cover only information in the scientific and industrial field, by consolidating the sui-generis right, the protection sphere has become a lot greater, ending up covering any unprotectable material, including materials that have become unprotectable as a result of the expiration of the term of protection, which basically means the entire public domain.

We mention that the sui-generis right, this exclusively European creation, could not have been extended in the U.S. as well, a legislation that has maintained as relevant the Feist[7] case, in which it was established that "the information as such, without any minimal creativity, cannot be protected."

4. Public consultation. The participants' arguments in regards to the necessity of the sui-generis right.

Coming back to the evaluation report of the Directive (2005), we make the mention that the already proven failure of this regulation has led to the need of public consultation concentrated around 4 options, which the participants needed to take into account to identify a solution. We find it relevant to present them as they were taken into account by the 2005 report, as well as by the acts that followed it, from March 2006.

1. Repeal the entire Directive;
2. Withdrawing the sui-generis right, while, however, maintaining unchanged the original database protection;
3. Modifying the provisions corresponding to the sui-generis right, in order to clarity its applicability;
4. Maintaining the current situation.

The options put forward by the commission have led to responses that were found to be favorable, especially options 3 and 4, but this is understandable considering that, among the entities called to participate, the majority[8] was made up of database production companies, press agencies, editors, betting companies, which considered the regulation favorable to their own interests.

In support of those interests, we show the following excerpts from the claims of certain participants who supported the sui-generis right, with some of them also exhibiting possible counter arguments:

- Software & Information Industry Association ("SIIA[9]") SIIA "Database editors do not just collect, combine, and organize information, but they also keep it updated and safe. These investments are worth benefiting from a legal protection." In order to counteract with the consumer's interest, the same association makes the following statement: "Consumers need quality databases that contribute to the comfort of their activity and their productivity. Finding a needle in a hay stack from the many, and poorly organized sources, could take weeks or even months. Thankfully, database editors provide a fast and secure access through databases."
- The France Press[10] press agency ("The Agency") has made many references to the issue of extending the exceptions corresponding to the sui-generis right, considered as being "risky proposals" to the interest of the database maker. In response to the opinions that the sui-generis right would lead to real information monopoly situations, the Agency argues that "it is generally recognized that the sui-generis right is applied to the database's content and not to the individual components within it (i.e.: the information itself)," so the accusation of monopoly cannot be considered.

We mention that the Agency's argument cannot be held in the context in which the law provisions restrictions in the use or the extraction of (even) non-substantial parts, when it is repeated and systematic. The regulation of the use of non-substantial parts of the database is equal to regulating of the use of every piece of information within the database.

In regards to the proposals of enlarging the exceptions sphere of the sui-generis right, the Agency sustains that "the Directive seeks to create a balance of interests between those belonging to database manufacturers and those of the databases' users. It's also considered that the purpose is achieved in a satisfactory manner by the Community regulations and that the widening the exceptions sphere would do nothing but jeopardize this balance."

In supporting its arguments, the Agency omits to consider and to properly address the users' interests and rights of access and free use of the public domain. The rights of these users are not only a priority but also precede in constitution those of the database makers', since the public domain, from the resources of which the databases are created, is necessary to exist prior to the indexation of certain materials. sui-generis itself should be provided in the legislation as an exemption granted to manufacturers on the basis of the investments made, and not as a stand-alone right, since its exercise impedes the exercise of the right of access and free use of the public domain.

The Agency also states that the "widening of the exceptions sphere to the sui-generis right presents the risks of leading to thefts and acts of piracy." The Agency's note refers to inadequate legal institutions because the sui-generis right, even if it's treated as part of the copyright legislation, must not be confused with it, as the provisions regarding piracy cannot be applied to it, because they represent an act of copyright infringement. Theft is also out of this discussion, because it can only refer to goods that are in a person's possession or detention. At most, the possibility of theft could be accepted in the exclusive case in which a database would be copied in its entirety, both in structure and form, as well as its content.

The takeover of information to which the Agency refers, in fact, has as its object content over which the database manufacturer does not own any rights, because that information belongs to the public domain. The database manufacturer is also just a user of public domain information. Even if, through his frequent and systematic usage, a database could be formed, he must not be viewed as anything more than a user of resources that should remain in public usage. Therefore, the database manufacturer's status as a public domain information user, and not owner, MUST NOT be forgotten, any arguments or interpretations of the sui-generis right must be made with consideration to this status from which the database manufacturer cannot separate himself just because the information he gathered is greater than others', or just because he was the first to have access to certain data that, precisely due to this circumstance he had the possibility of collecting.

It is unnatural, to say the least, that the systematic and repetitive acts of taking from the public domain end up being legalized to certain people to the disconsideration of acts of the same type exercised by other people just because the latter are made after those made by the database manufacturer. Principles applicable to other exclusivist protections (first come, first served in the field of trademarks) is also found in the field of copyright, but not to serve the interests of the creators, but, on the contrary, to block the entire access to the public domain assumed to be for the use of the general public.

At least questionable is the fact that this manner of fructifying the public domain has come to be considered as treating the interests of the database manufacturers and those of the users equally. The Agency's arguments, as well as those of other companies with interest in the disadvantageous fructifying of the public domain, omit to speak from the perspective of a user of some public information, on the contrary, their arguments highlight rights similar to those of property, whereas the property of the public domain must not exist, being a contradiction with the very notion of public domain. Moreover, there should be avoided any possibilities through which the interdiction of public domain material appropriation is eluded.

- Data Publishers Association[11] ("DPA") - makes mentions of the applicability of the sui-generis right in light of the European Court of Justice ruling[12] from 2004:

"The sui-generis right is difficult to understand. The ECJ's decision from November 2004 made a distinction between creating and obtaining information. The court's argument was helpful in the given cases, but has created the possibility of misinterpretation through the fact that it suggests that publishers should make a distinction between separating certain data and obtaining them. Many DPA members do not recognize the difference and have asked for guidance and clarification. The DPA considers that the Commission should strengthen the sui-generis right to ensure that investments in databases combined with the data created will benefit from the same protection as the obtained data."

In regards to the DPA's argument, we consider it appropriate to re-highlight the ECJ's Decision from 2004 in its main points.

The DPA's submission takes into account the opinion of the European Supreme Court, according to which, the Directive 1996/9/EC cannot protect databases that are created only as a direct result of the manufacturer's own activity. In order to benefit from the sui-generis right, the court states that the "investments needs to have as its sole purpose, or its main purpose the collection, verification, search, and presentation of materials that already exist."

For a better understanding of the ECJ's decision we can even take into account one of the cases that were considered by the ECJ, namely British Houseracing Board vs William Hill and Fixture Marketing Ldt. The European court considered that the "football matches lists necessitated no particular effort to be created by the professional league. These activities are invisibly linked to the creation of the data in question, in which the league directly participates, as its responsible for organizing the football matches."

The court's decision is of great importance for the support of public interest to access information corresponding to some restrictive fields that are derived as a result of the maker's activities, because in the absence of the sui-generis right, all this information can be freely accessed and used. The corresponding information to such restrictive fields are not independently and easily accessible by the public, the only option of access and use being the consultation, verification, use, or possibly extraction of the information from the database that contains them.

The ECJ's decision is of general applicability, the court's expression being of a manner of creating a misinterpretation that does not exclusively regard football matches lists. And, we consider it fair to have such an interpretation because, it's true, in such a case, the database manufacturer cannot prove any investment in finding and collecting some preexisting data, and this condition clearly derives from the concrete interpretation of the law's text.

In continuation, we will look at art. 122^1 (4) from the internal law:

"(4) For the purposes of the present law, the database manufacturer is the natural or legal person that has made a qualitatively and quantitatively substantial investment for the obtaining, verification or presentation of the contents of a database."

The corresponding article in the Directive is even clearer in highlighting the link between the sui-generis right and the investment in obtaining the data.

"(1) Member States shall require the manufacturer of a database to have the right to prohibit the extraction and reuse of the whole, or substantial part, evaluated qualitatively and quantitatively, of its contents, when obtaining, verifying, and presenting this content demonstrates a substantial qualitative and quantitative investment."

– The European Direct Marketing Federation (FEDMA[13]) is another supporter of option 4 among the options made available to the participants through the 2005 public consultation. And this entity expresses worry in regards to the above-mentioned ECJ decision, which, according to FEDMA, would have misinterpreted the sui-generis right, creating applicability issues.

FEDMA, like other supporters of the option to maintain the status quo, challenged the ECJ's decision, but not in its entirety, but only in regards to the limitation of the application of the sui-generis right. The perception of this false inequality that these types of entities intend to create can easily be overturned if we were to consider not only the aforementioned conclusion of the court, but the entire content of the decision in its main points, which will surprise with aspects that are in disadvantage not of the database manufacturer, but, on the contrary, to the user himself.

I. "the simple generation of data is not covered by the Directive but "where the creation of data coincides with its collection and verification and creates an inseparable body, then the Directive will be applied." As can be seen, even if the sui-generis right will not be applicable to created data, in the cases in which they will present an inseparable collection of both created data and obtained data, the sui-generis right can be exercised, thus becoming applicable also to the data created through the manufacturer's activity itself. In light of this assertion the inapplicability of the sui-generis right will be found in the circumstance in which between the activity of creation and that of obtaining there is a clear and obvious demarcation, or in the context in which the database contains only created data.
II. "the Directive prohibits the rearranging of the databases' contents."
III. "there is a general interdiction in regards to the extraction and reuse of a substantial part, considered as being, for example – more than half of the database."
IV. "Extraction and reuse of some unsubstantial parts is prohibited if it represents a repeated and systematic act, and it prevents the economic exploitation of the database by its manufacturer."
V. "Reuse is also forbidden when the data is taken from independent sources (for example, the internet)."
VI. "Substantial modifications give birth to a new database and a new protection term. For dynamic databases, the new database benefits from a new protection term when a certain modification is made."
VII. "The base term needs to be interpreted broadly." "it is left to the interpretation of the courts from the Member States to verify in each case if the investment was a substantial one."

As can be seen, points v. and vi. indicate an interpretation that serious prejudices the interests of the general public, extending the applicability of the Directive over some situations that the law maker did not take into account in the text of the Directive. And which, it must be mentioned, could not have been taken into account reasonably, as it makes a protection of information beyond the sphere of the database. At least that's what point vi. expresses, through which the reuse of the information is prohibited, even when the information is taken off the internet and not from inside the database. But, the only justification of the sui-generis protection is exactly the existence of information as part of the database, because outside of this data structure, it will still be public information, meaning unprotectable.

It must be noted that, aside from the particular situations brought into question by the concrete cases in respect of which the court was called to express itself, the database content that is supposedly subject to the sui-generis right, is made up of data and materials that are not subject to copyright, which belong largely to the public domain. This decision of the court not only widens the Directive's sphere of applicability, but makes the sui-generis right a much more restrictive right even than copyright itself, as it's known that copyright presupposes a protection that can be given to identical works created independently by its authors.

Aside from the possibility, or rather the real impossibility of such a circumstance, in which two different people could have identical forms of creative representation, this is however admitted, at least in theory, in certain creative fields, such as plastic art, in which two painters, having the same theme, could create identical original works and, therefore, protectable.

Independent protection represents a direct consequence of the relativity and subjectivity of copyright, whose originality needs to be appreciated outside of the sphere of "novelty", considered an objective notion specific to the domain of inventions and not of copyright.

Creativity itself represents a direct consequence of the unaltered preservation of these principles of law, as a protection conditioned on novelty or perceived absolutely would have the effect of blocking subsequent developments on the grounds of identical or similar content. Whereas, according to copyright, originality does not need to be absolute, it not being necessary for protection that the works to not have been inspired from previous creations. In addition, the very concept of inspiration is worth treated in association with the idea and not with the form of its expression.

Per a contrario, a copyright protection in which originality was understood in its objective and absolute form, would lead to situations in which protection would extend not only on the form of expression, but on the idea itself.

The idea as a foundation for inspiration, must circulate freely and be capable of being exploited by any person, just as with the public domain. The reasons used to justify non-protection of the idea are also valid for the case of the public domain's non-protection. A restraint of this goal would lead to situations identical with the ECJ's decision itself, in which information from the public domain cannot be used freely because it can be ALSO found in a certain database. To accept such a position coincides with affirming that an idea cannot be used by two or more people only because, at some point in time, it ended up being, one way or another, part of a work belonging to a different author.

– The European Consumer Organization (BEUC[14]) is one of the few participants to the consultation that stated its position against both the Directive as well as the aforementioned ECJ decision:

"As mentioned, the rulings of the ECJ limits the ambit of the "sui-generis" right. However, the consequences of these rulings should not be underestimated. Even after these rulings, the Directive has a significant impact on competition in the database market. In a recent article published in European Intellectual Property Review, Davidson and Hugenholtz argues that the database industry will develop different strategies to circumvent these decisions. The authors mention two such strategies: database manufacturers could invest more in the presentation of the data, or they could prevent the data from being publicly available, and sell the exclusive right to them. Arguably, purchasing access to data might be deemed a substantial investment."

5. De lege ferenda – repealing the Directive and/or eliminating the sui-generis right. As the European Consumer Organization has also expressed, the Directive creates multiple inconveniences in its enforcement and the sui-generis right jeopardizes competition and innovation. In addition to the BEUC statements, as it's been shown earlier, the existence of the sui-generis right greatly affects the right of access to the information corresponding to the public domain and we consider it to be a particularly important aspect, especially in the context in which the position of the lawmaker, as far as the public domain is concerned, is rather deduced than expressly formulated, at a legislation level there being no texts that would express any guarantee in regards to exercising the access right.

Moreover, even in the absence of the sui-generis right, copyright over database structures may continue to be exercised by owners of such collections, its exercise not having the nature of bringing into question the database's content and information contained within said compilation.

It must be mentioned that, as it's said in the Directive and in its implementation laws, the sui-generis right represents, concretely, a real right of property expressed in a completely inadequate context, if we consider that the object of this protection is made up exactly of works that cannot be protected, meaning that cannot be proprietary, or over which one cannot assume ownership. An inadequate context is also that of copyright, whose protection presents serious differences from private property, only the latter being of the nature to be exercised exclusively. The specific non-exclusivity of copyright is sustained not only by the limited protection term, but also by the existence of a sphere of materials that cannot be appropriated. The exercise of the right itself is subject to certain limitations, beyond which there is no copyright, but other rights corresponding to the public's interest, such as the right of access. This is the specific balance of copyright, according to which the author or the owner has only certain rights, for a certain period of time and intended to be exercised only within certain limits. If the reinvention of other rights, such as the sui-generis rights, threatens to affect this balance, the position of this right in the legislation must be rethought.

THE PRIVATE COPY REMUNERATIONS SYSTEM

Ana-Maria MARINESCU*

Abstract

The study aims to provide an actual overview of private copying compensation systems (also known as private copying levies or remunerations). These remuneration systems are an important element of copyright and related rights infrastructure.

Private copy remunerations systems vary substantially across the world because of a multitude of circumstances. Remuneration is funded either by importers and manufacturers of devices on which consumers make copies, or by State funds. Either way, the intention is that consumers should pay directly or indirectly for private copying. Levies on products are collected either as a percentage of the sales price or as a flat rate.

The study demonstrates that significant differences exist in key areas such as tariff levels, the selection of products for which levies can be collected, the liability of market players, methods of reporting, legal tools for monitoring and enforcement and methods of setting the tariff, to mention just a few.

In the early 1990s, the European Commission attempted to harmonize private copying compensation systems in the EU, but the Commission's efforts have not yet resulted in legislative proposals. On the contrary, legal and practical developments in the countries involved have proceeded unaffected by any cross-border considerations. The recent renewed interest of the European Commission and the European Parliament in investigating the viability of measures that would further the approximation and possibly the harmonization of (the important parts of) the private copying systems in the EU is of great significance for the future of levy systems, as is the multitude of rulings issued by the Court of Justice of the European Union.

Keywords: private copy, remunerations, levies, INFO-SOC Directive, tariffs, products, EU legislative proposals and developments.

1. Introduction

The Berne Convention allows Member States to provide for exceptions and limitations to the right of reproduction, provided that the conditions of the three-step-test are met. Many jurisdictions limit the application of the reproduction right for activities that can be qualified as "private copying" because it is practically impossible to grant permission to large numbers of individuals or to monitor how such permission is subsequently used. In general, the solution was found in an exception or limitation to the exclusive right on condition that fair compensation was paid to authors and other rightholders for loss of revenues or harm caused to the rightholder whose work had been copied. This is currently the only efficient mechanism for compensating creators for the widespread copying of their works for private or domestic use.

In EU copyright law, private copying has been given a specific meaning relating only to the reproduction right, not to other rights like: communication to the public, distribution to the public, public performance or adaptation. Also, at EU level the private copy is regulated by the Directive on the harmonization of certain aspects of copyright and related rights in the information society (called INFOSOC Directive)[1].

According with art. 5 (2) (b) of the Directive: in respect of reproductions on any medium made by a natural person for private use and for ends that are neither directly nor indirectly commercial, on condition that the rightholders receive fair compensation which takes account of the application or non-application of technological measures referred to in Article 6 to the work or subject matter concerned.

By consequence, a private copy is usually defined as any copy for non-commercial purposes made by a natural person for his/her own personal use.

A levy on products used for copying was first introduced in Germany in 1966, replacing the exclusive reproduction right with a right to equitable remuneration. In other jurisdictions, levies were attached to longstanding private copying exceptions when modern technological developments made it difficult to deny that private copying was affecting the income potential of rightholders.

In general, the exception only applies when the source is legal. Downloads from a peer-to-peer network, newsgroups, torrent sites and the like, where music and films have been uploaded without consent from the rightholders, are usually not within the scope of the exception. There are exceptions to this rule: the Russian Federation, Switzerland and Canada do not have a specific provision regarding the source of the copy, and thus all copies made for private use fall within the scope of the exception.

Also the private copy doesn't apply to computer programs, case in which, for example according with the Romanian Law on copyright and related rights[2] – Law no. 8/1996, the authorized user of a computer program may, without authorization from the author, make an archive or reserve copy where necessary for the use of the program.

2. Content[3]

The European Commission has been reviewing the copyright framework, including the private copy topic, for a long time.

In 2012, the issue of private copying levies was the subject of an industry mediation process fostered by the Commission and led by former Commissioner António Vitorino[4]. Mr. Vitorino delivered a report on this issue in February 2013, including several recommendations, although it has not led to any legislation. The aim of the recommendations is to make EU copyright law and practice fit for the digital age. The core elements of the recommendations are to clarify that copies that are made by end users for private purposes in the context of a service that has been licensed by rightholders do not cause any harm that would require additional remuneration in the form of private copying levies, also that levies should be collected in cross-border transactions in the Member State in which the final customer resides, and the fact the liability for paying levies should be shifted from the manufacturer's or importer's level to the retailer's level while simplifying the levy tariff system and obliging manufacturers and importers to inform collecting societies about their transactions concerning goods subject to a levy, or alternatively, clear and predictable ex ante exemption schemes should be established. In the field of reprography, the core elements of the recommendation, are set on the fact that more emphasis should be placed on operator levies than on hardware based levies. Regarding the final customers, the levies should be made visible for them, and as regards the negotiation procedures, there is a need to provide a procedural framework that would reduce complexity, guarantee objectiveness and ensure the observance of strict time-limits[5].

The debate on levy systems has continued through stakeholder dialogue.

In 2014, the European Parliament published the Castex Report[6] which describes the private copying levies as a virtuous system, which is nonetheless in need of modernization and harmonization. It focused especially on cross-border situations, the scope of the exception and the need for transparent and effective exemptions for professional uses. The Report also emphasizes that the major disparities between national systems for the collection of levies, especially as regards the types of product subject to the levy and the rates of levy, can distort competition and give rise to 'forum shopping' within the internal market.

As an important element the Report invites the Member States and the Commission to conduct a study on the essential elements of private copying, in particular a common definition of the concept of 'fair compensation' – which at present is not explicitly regulated by Directive 2001/29/EC – and of the concept of 'harm' to an author resulting from unauthorized reproduction of a rightholder's work for private use. From this point of view, the Castex Report calls on the Commission to look for common ground as regards which products should be subject to the levy and to establish common criteria for the negotiating arrangement for the rates applicable to private copying, with a view to enforcing a system that is transparent, equitable and uniform for consumers and creators.

Also as my opinion, the Report considers that the private copying levy should apply to all material and media used for private recording and storage capacity where private copying acts cause harm to creators and that private copying levies should be payable by manufacturers or importers, because if the levy were transferred to retailers, this would result in an excessive administrative burden for the small and medium-sized distribution companies and the collective management organizations.

In line with the judgment in Case C-462/09 (Opus), cited above Case C-462/09, Stichting de Thuiskopie v Opus Supplies Deutschland GmbH and others, the Report recommends, in the case of cross-border transactions, that private copying levies be collected in the Member State in which the end user that purchased the product resides.

July 2014 saw the results of the Consultation on Copyright in the 2013-14 3rd consultation (review of EU copyright rules), and on December 9, 2015, the communication "Towards a modern, more European copyright framework" was published[7]. The communication revealed the European Commission' vision to modernize the EU copyright rules: the first step was to adopt a legislative proposal on cross-border portability, then to review the Satellite and Cable Directive and other Directives in the field[8].

At the present, the levy systems are not much discussed in the communication and are no longer a priority on the copyright agenda for the new EU Commission. For the most part, the possible impact on the Digital Single Market is a concern and even though the CJEU clarified some issues, some disparities remain and the national legislation in the field differ as it will be detailed in the following.

The relevant jurisprudence of the European Court of Justice regarding the private copy systems can be summarized as it follows: in the case C-467/08 Padawan v SGAE the issue was the indiscriminate application of the private copying levy; C-462/09 Stichting de Thuiskopie v Opus GmbH cross-border transactions; C-277/10 Luksan v Van der Let the main issue was that the author is entitled directly and originally to the right of fair compensation; the cases VG Wort v Kyocera tacled the issues of technological measures and the consequences of an authorization to reproduce; the case C-521/11 Amazon v Austro-Mechana Gesellschaft referred to the indiscriminate application combined with a reimbursement scheme, payment of the revenue in part to social or cultural institutions, double payment in cross border transactions; in the case C-435/12 ACI Adam v Stichting de Thuiskopie the issue was the lawful nature of the origin of the copy; in the case C-463/12 Copydan Båndkopi v Nokia Danmark the main topics referred to equal treatment, reimbursement scheme, consequences of an authorization to reproduce; the case C-572/13 HP v Reprobel relates to the allocation of fair compensation to publishers and copying of sheet music; the case C-470/14 EGEDA pointed the compensation financed from the General State Budget; C-110/15 Nokia Italia v SIAE ex ante exemption and reimbursement scheme for professional use; the case C-37/16 Minister Finansów v SAWP reffered to the value-added tax and the last case C-265/16 VCAST Ltd v R.T.I. SpA in the field is referring to the cloud computing services.

The scope and legal construction of private copying differs considerably between countries:

- In some countries, sources need to be lawful, in others not;
- In some countries, there are a set number of permitted copies specified, in others there are definitions of private circles;
- In some countries, the levy is constructed as a statutory license, in others as a debt;
- In some countries compensation is only due for private copying of music, in others for printed matter (reprographics) and audio-visual works.

22 of 27 EU countries have implemented the private copy, with the exceptions of UK, Ireland, Malta, Cyprus and Luxembourg. In the world, the private copy is implemented also in countries like: Burkina Faso, Canada, Japan, Norway, Paraguay, the Russian Federation, Switzerland, Ukraine, United States, Canada, Turkey, Ecuador, Peru, Nigeria, Côte d'Ivoire, Morocco etc.

The levy schemes vary widely in the following respects:

- Levies apply to different media or equipment that can be used to make copies (e.g. recordable carriers, hard disks, MP3 players, printers, PCs);
- Levies differ in tariffs for the same media or equipment, and apply different methods of calculation (e.g. memory capacity, percentage of price);
- Levies differ in whether they are imposed on the manufacturers, importers or distributors of media or equipment, or consumers;
- Levies differ in beneficiaries (music, audio-visual, reprographic rightholders; wider cultural or social purposes);
- Regulatory structures differ (processes for setting tariffs and distribution, contestability of tariffs, governance and supervision of agencies).

The tariffs setting models are presented in the Annex 1.

Countries commonly apply a fixed tariff directly related to the capacity of objects. An overview of the countries that apply a fixed tariff can be seen in the Annex 2 and in Annex 3 is presented the fixed tariff for 8 standardized media types and devices in 14 countries/Euros/2016.

As an alternative to fixed tariffs, countries can also apply a tariff based on a percentage of the sales or import price to determine the amount of the levy.

The Czech Republic, Latvia and Lithuania combine fixed tariffs and a percentage depending on the medium or device.

The levies and remuneration are intended as compensation for private copying acts by consumers in a certain country; rightholders whose works have been copied in that specific country have a right to be remunerated.

For this reason, if leviable products are exported, the exported items are exempted in most countries.

Different systems exist for refunding the levies that have already been paid on a product which is later exported.

Usually, the exporter can request a refund from the collecting society if he can show the proof of the actual export.

Another possibility is a contractual relationship between an exporter (often a wholesaler) and an importer and/or the collecting society, which can include an upfront exemption such that the exporter can buy within his country without levies and no refunds are payable upon export.

Some countries do not have a refund system in place; the exporter is only required to report goods sold in the home country. In these cases, levies on exports can often be recovered in the next report to the collecting society.

[8] https://ec.europa.eu/digital-single-market/en/news/towards-modern-more-european-copyright-framework-commission-takes-first-steps-and-sets-out-its - accessed on 08.03.2018.

Finally, some countries have multiple possibilities: exemption upfront via an agreement with the collecting society or a refund request.

Examples for exports and exemption from payment are presented in Annex 4.

Blank media and devices can be used for purposes wholly unrelated to the private copying exception, for instance, for the storage of professional data, or for professional reproductions where a license would be required. In such cases, products can be sold to a professional end user and no private copying is taking place.

In some countries, either products sold to professional end users are exempted from the payment of the levy or liable parties are entitled to a refund.

Within the EU, the CJEU ruling in Padawan v SGAE (October 21, 2010) had a considerable impact on the collection of levies. The court ruled that the indiscriminate application of the private copying levy to all types of digital reproduction equipment, devices and media, including cases in which such equipment is acquired by persons other than natural persons for purposes clearly unrelated to private copying, is incompatible with the 2001 Information Society (or "Copyright") Directive. Before this ruling, mutualisation systems, as they were known, were common. In these systems, the professional use was incorporated into the tariff, resulting in a reduced flat-rate tariff to be paid on all sales. Without this approach, the tariff would have been higher for products intended for private copying.

Padawan has led to follow-up cases in national jurisdictions and new cases before the CJEU to clarify the ruling further. In Spain, the result was the abolition of the collecting system through media and devices, leaving Spanish rightholders with an amount determined annually by the government based on the harm caused to rightholders by private copying. European rightholders have lodged a complaint with the European Commission and the questions have been referred to the CJEU (C-470/14). For Spain, the recent ruling in this case has created the possibility of reintroducing a levy system.

Court cases resulting from Padawan are still ongoing in many European countries.

In some countries, the systems exempting professional users were adapted in order to implement the latest case law.

Similar to the procedures used in the case of exports, if the professional use is exempted, countries have implemented a refund system or an upfront exemption (in the law or via contractual arrangements with the collecting society) for specific professional users (e.g., hospitals or government institutions).

Many of the levied products are bought online and sometimes the seller is located in another country, where a different private copying system is in place or there is no such system at all.

Of particular relevance for EU Member States, but also interesting for other jurisdictions, is the judgment of the CJEU in Thuiskopie v Opus (2011). The Court ruled that the State that has a private copying exception in the law in conjunction with a levy system should ensure that the levy is paid. The judgment states: […] it is for the Member State which has introduced a system of private copying levies chargeable to the manufacturer or importer of media for reproduction of protected works, and on the territory of which the harm caused to authors by the use for private purposes of their work by purchasers who reside there occurs, to ensure that those authors actually receive the fair compensation intended to compensate them for that harm.

In this case, the court in the Netherlands – the country of residence of the consumer, where a private copying compensation system is in place – was requested to ensure recovery of the levy from the seller in Germany.

The collection process of the private copy remunerations is done by the collective management organization appointed by the government or by rightholders. The collective management organization must be representative of the whole variety of rightholders, and often the board of such a collective management organization consists of various rightholders' representatives (authors, performing artists, producers and the like).

In almost all countries, collection is done by one collecting society, to which importers, manufacturers and other liable parties are required to report.

In some cases, however, the collecting society only represents a specific group of rightholders and multiple societies collect remunerations on behalf of their rightholders. This is the case for the Czech Republic, Greece, the Slovak Republic and Romania.

Distribution follows a more complicated scheme.

Some collected funds are distributed directly to individual rightholders – this is the case if multiple collection societies operate on the market – but in most cases, distribution is done in stages.

The society responsible for the collection allocates the funds to organizations of rightholders (distributing organizations) representing the various categories of rightholders (authors, producers and performing artists) for further distribution to individual rightholders.

Distribution to different categories of rightholders, represented by the collecting societies responsible for distribution to individual rightholders, follows the schemes determined either by rightholders' organizations or by law, ministerial decree or other State intervention.

Where the distribution scheme is a matter for rightholders, the shares are established in negotiations between the different groups of rightholders. In some cases, the results must be validated or approved by the government.

Usually, the total amount collected is first split between categories like audio, video, written works and interactive works. The amounts allocated to these categories are divided among the groups of rightholders within them. Distribution to audio rightholders is split between authors, performers and producers; video rightholders are authors (directors, screenwriters, music authors, and literary authors), producers and performing artists (actors and dancers).

The introduction of levies on multifunctional devices makes it possible to remunerate copying of all digital works, and the advent of relatively new digital content like e-books and other written works that implies the creation of new schemes for distribution to these rightholders.

The first step is the allocation of the remunerations to a category of copied works that is usually based on a market research regarding the type of the works copied on the various media. As the levied products become increasingly multifunctional and all works can be digitized, the actual copying behavior becomes more important for distribution. Some countries (like Switzerland) have a distribution scheme for each levied product for which monies were received.

In the majority of the countries, a percentage is deducted for social and cultural purposes, on average about 30 per cent. These cultural funds are intended for the promotion of young artists or to feed pension funds for artists.

In most cases, the law determines these percentages (i.e., Austria, Bulgaria, Croatia, Denmark, France, Portugal, and Turkey) or they are established in the Statute by law (i.e., Latvia, Poland, and Switzerland). Cultural government bodies welcome funds that are allocated to promote the culture of society and improve the position of rightholders. The percentages vary from 10 per cent to 100 per cent (i.e., 50% - Austria, 30% - Bulgaria, 30% - Croatia, 33% - Denmark, 25% - France, 20% - Poland, 20% - Portugal, 10% - Latvia, 10% - Switzerland). Turkey is the only country where the levies are used entirely for cultural purposes by the Ministry of Culture. In the future copyright legislative reform in Turkey, the private copy remunerations will be still collected by the State, but is intended that a part of the remunerations to be distributed also to the copyright and related rights holders' through the collective management organizations.

In Romania, according with the Law on copyright and related rights[9], the list (see Annex 5) of physical media and devices for which compensatory remuneration for private copy is owed, as well as the quantum of such remuneration is negotiated every 2 years, at the request of one party, within a committee consisting of:

a) One representative of each main collective management organizations, which activate for a category of rights each, on the one hand;
b) one representative for each of the main associative structures mandated by manufacturers and importers of physical media and devices, appointed from them, and one representative each of the first 3 manufacturers and importers of physical media and devices, established on the basis of the turnover and market-share in the respective field, on the other hand.

The remunerations are in percentages and calculated at the value in custom for importers, respectively to the invoiced value without VAT, with the occasion of putting into circulation of products by the producers, and it shall be paid in the following month of import or date of invoicing.

The compensatory remuneration for private copy is a percentage quota from the aforementioned value, as follows:

a) A4 paper sheets for photocopier: 0.1%;
b) Other physical media: 3%;
c) Devices: 0.5%.

The compensatory remuneration for private copy is collected as follows[10]:

- By one CMO sole collector for the works reproduced after sound and audiovisual recording
- By one CMO sole collector for the works reproduced from paper.

The two sole collector collecting management organizations, are designated through the majority vote of the beneficiary collecting management organizations, at the first meeting, or the majority vote of those present, at the second meeting.

Compensatory remuneration for private copy collected by the CMOs, sole collector is distributed to the beneficiaries as follows[11]:

a) in the case of physical media and devices for sound recorded copies, by analogical proceeding: 40% from the remuneration shall be paid, in negotiable shares, to the authors and publishers of the recorded works, 30% shall be paid to performers and 30% shall be paid to the producers of sound recordings;
b) In the case of physical media and devices for audiovisual recorded copies, by analogical proceeding, the remuneration shall be divided in equal shares between the following categories: authors, performers and producers;
c) In the case of copies recorded by digital proceeding, on any type of support, the remuneration shall be divided in equal shares between the beneficiaries corresponding to both categories mentioned above;
d) In the case of paper recorded copies, by analogical proceeding, on paper, the remuneration shall be divided in equal shares between authors and publishers. The due sums for publishers are distributed only through publishers associations, based on a protocol established between them which includes the criteria for distribution as well the shares owed to each association.

The compensatory remuneration for private copy shall not be paid where unrecorded video, audio or digital physical media manufactured within the country or imported are traded wholesale to the producers of audiovisual and sound recordings or to television and radio broadcasting organizations for their own broadcasts[12].

In the case of paper recorded copies, by analogical proceeding, the remuneration shall be divided in equal shares between authors and publishers[13]. The distribution rule is set down by the Law on copyright and related rights.

The due sums for publishers are distributed only through publishers associations, based on a protocol established between them which include the criteria for distribution as well the shares owed to each association.

At the distribution protocol shall take part only publishers associations fulfilling the conditions established Romanian Copyright Office Director General's decision.

There are no deductions for social and cultural purposes and the administrative fee composed by the fee owed by the owners of rights, which are members of a collective management organization, for covering the operation expenses, cumulated with the fee owed to the collective management organization which is the sole collector, cannot exceed 15% from the annually collected amounts.

The distribution scheme for each category of copyright and related rights holders is established by each collective management organization in their Statute by law approved by the Romanian Copyright Office and by the courts.

In Poland, in the case of written works the distribution of the private copy remunerations is made also in 'waterfall' or three-level distribution scheme:

- Level 1: 50:50 author–publisher split set by law;
- Level 2: division between book publishers and press publishers;
- Level 3 (book publishers): number of titles / category / number of copies (based on statistical data supplied by the National Library and on results of private copying surveys).

The remunerations are divided between COPYRIGHT POLSKA which is representing the publishers' reprography rights and KOPIPOL which is representing authors' reprography rights.

The distribution principles are controlled by the Ministry of Culture and National Heritage and the data is reported to the Ministry and to the public (via website) by 30 June of the following year.

The distribution is done on the basis of surveys of copying practice that are conducted annually and that are underlying the division of all the collected levies between press publishers and book publishers (the macro-distribution scheme) and the share of the various types of books (academic, scientific, school, popular, fiction, maps, music sheets, etc.) in copying.

Also, the statistical data concerning the Polish book market provided by the Polish National Library are taken into account, as well as the legal deposit of all books published in Poland and the data concerning the number of copies printed of each book published by any Polish publisher.

On the basis of the macro-distribution scheme (books–press) the relevant amounts are transferred to the press publishers' collective management organization – the Association of Press Publishers REPROPOL, which distributes them directly to individual press publishers.

The remaining share of the collected levies (usually ca. 60–70%) is distributed by COPYRIGHT POLSKA directly to book publishers that are taking into account various types of books (academic, scientific, school, popular, fiction, maps, music sheets, etc.) in copying.

Some 80–85% of this share of the levies is distributed to academic, scientific and textbook publishers (these types of book are copied most frequently)

The amount assigned to specific book types is divided into two tranches: number of books published in the two years preceding the distribution year (two-thirds of the amount) and number of copies printed data (one-third of the amount).

3. Conclusions

The private copy remunerations are an important part of the copyright and related rights system in EU and the world. The system should be balanced in order to compensate the prejudice brought to the copyright and related rights holders by the private copy uses.

The article aims to provide an overview on the important developments in the private copying law and practice of countries that have such an exception in place.

COPYRIGHT PROTECTED PLASTIC ARTWORK IN THE LIGHT OF THE EUROPEAN AND ROMANIAN LAWS AND THE ARTWORK VALUE RELEVANCE

Mihai OLARIU[*]

Abstract

The plastic artwork, as a species of the "work of art" genre, is subjected to copyright. However, the law does not define plastic artworks, which are generally included in non-exhaustive listings, in phrases of the types: "plastic or graphical artworks, such as...". This study analytically presents the categories of artworks that may be included in the plastic artwork group, in the light of the European and Romanian law. At the same time, the study analyses the legal relevance of an artwork value, under all its aspects.

Keywords: artistic work, plastic artwork, sculpture; painting, engraving, lithography, scenography, tapestry, ceramics, glass and metal plastic, design, artwork value, artwork protection.

1. Introduction

The term “art” broadly designates any human activity relying on knowledge, exercise, perception, imagination, and intuition. More restrictively, art is also characterized by the lack of (practical) functionality, by knowledge, and aesthetics.

In the Age of Enlightenment, arts included the various forms of the so-called fine arts: the classical genres of painting and graphics, sculpture, architecture, and may other secondary genres; dramatic art, having as main genres theatre, dance/choreography; music having as main branches vocal and instrumental music; literature with the epic, dramaturgic, and lyrical genres.

Starting the beginning of Modernism, the forms artistic expression, and the artistic techniques and means expanded significantly. For instance, photography and applied art were included in the category of plastic arts. Dramatic art, music, and literature, and plastic arts are currently supplemented by the so-called new media, such as radio and television, cinematography, etc.

2. Content

The phrase "plastic arts” designates all practices or activities leading to a representation through visual images, using dots, lines, colors, shapes, or volumes. In French, the phrase arts plastiques derived from the Latin ars and from the Greek plastikos and initially defined three-dimensional arts, such as sculpture or architecture, to then include painting, drawing, and engraving. Unlike decorating or applied arts - which were regarded as "minor”, especially during the Neoclassic and Academic Ages (the end of the 17th century and up to the 2nd half of the 20th century) - plastic arts were regarded as "major”, being the most appreciated. In the linguistic Anglo-Saxon area, the term plastic arts only defines the arts with three-dimensional manifestation, while the broad meaning of the plastic art notion is rendered through the phrase "visual arts”.

Even in Romanian, pursuant to the development of new techniques such as "video art" or "conceptual art" - which are hard to define as "plastic" – the term of "plastic art” – in its broader sense - is increasingly replaced, in the artistic language, with the phrase visual arts.

The equivalent of plastic arts in German is "Bildende Kunst”. German did not import an equivalent of the recent English phrase "visual arts".

The term "plastic arts" was traditionally associated to the term of "fine arts” or "belle arte”, the equivalent of the French "beaux-arts", and of the Italian "belle-arti"[1].

The plastic artwork, as a species of the "work of art" genre, is subjected to copyright. However, the law does not define plastic artworks, which are generally included in non-exhaustive listings, in phrases of the types: "plastic or graphical artworks, such as...”. Thus, the Law no. 8/1996 on copyright and related rights, as republished stipulates, in art. 7, that "original intellectual creation works in the literary, artistic fields, […] such as: [...] f) photographic works, as well as any other works rendered through a process analogue to photography; g) graphical or plastic artworks, such as: sculpture, painting, engraving, lithography, monumental art, Scenography, tapestry, ceramics, glass and metal plastic, drawing, design, as well as other artworks applied to products with practical use; h) architectural artworks, including drawings, mock-ups, and graphical works developed as part of architectural projects; i) plastic artworks, maps, and drawings in the field of printing, geography, and science in general" are subjected to copyright.

In the European Union law, Directive no. 2001/84/EC on the resale right granted to the author of an original artwork, of September 27, 2001, stipulates, in art. 2, entitled "Resale right for the benefit of the author of an original work of art" that "For the purposes of this Directive, "original work of art" means works of graphic or plastic art such as pictures, collages, paintings, drawings, engravings, prints, lithographs, sculptures, tapestries, ceramics, glassware and photographs, provided they are made by the artist himself or are copies considered to be original works of art."

In the absence of a legal definition, but starting from the listing of "works of art", it may be summarized that the notion designates all artistic practices of activities generating a representation through visual means, using dots, lines, colors, shapes, or volumes. Hereinafter, we shall analyze the plastic art genres listed in the relevant laws in the field of copyright.

Sculpture is a branch of plastic arts dedicated to the development of three-dimensional artistic images, by carving or shaping a piece of material. As an art of three-dimensional shapes, sculpture in general, and stone sculpture in particular, represents one of the oldest means of visual expression of human thoughts and feelings - older than cave painting - the significations and themes whereof - initially exclusively zoomorphic and anthropomorphic - are common to both artistic genres.

Hence, practiced since immemorial times, stone carving has known, along the millennia, periods of maximum and complex boost in Ancient Egypt and Classical Greece, in the Hellenic countries, and in the Roman Empire, in ancient India and in pre-Columbian America, in Gothic, Renaissance, Neo-Classical, and Romantic Age Europe, or in the contemporary world everywhere, characterized through unprecedented diversification of working styles and techniques. Ever since ancient times, stone carving manifested in all currently known fundamental aspects: as an independent, autonomous art or as an auxiliary art, subordinated to and integrated in, architecture; as transfigured reflection of reality or, quite on the contrary, as non-figurative creation, with purely decorative function[2].

Painting is the branch of plastic arts representing reality in two-dimensional artistic images, using colors (oil, aquarelle, gouache, acryl, ink, etc.) applied on a surface (canvas, paper, wood, glass, etc.). In the theory of modern art, painting is regarded as a universal category including all artistic creations rendered on surfaces. However, the types of paintings vary depending on the materials and supports used and on the artist's working technique: frescos suppose the painting of a freshly plastered wall, while still wet (colors chemically combine with the support surface and they finally set after drying); stained glass is obtained through the combination of differently colored or painted pieces of glass; the pointillist technique is characterized by the combination of small dots, which the viewer can individually join, if he watches the support from the correct distance.

Engraving is a plastic art genre including as techniques the digging, incision, perforation, or shuttering of a generally flat surface using various physical or chemical procedures, for the subsequent printing and multiplication of the image, or in order to obtain an individual artistic object. Individual engraving is used for the inscription or decoration of the various items with shapes or decorating motifs. If engraved on precious, semi-precious metals or moulds for coins or medals, they belong to the glyptic art.

Lithography represents a technique consisting of the printing of the image from a flat typographic surface directly onto the paper passed through the press. The typographic surface is developed on a lithographic stone (dense chalk) or on a metallic board (zinc, aluminum). Developed by the German Alois Senefelder in 1796, the lithographic technique quickly expanded in Europe and America due to the less complex process and to the quality of materiality and expressiveness effects, similar to those of drawing.

Monumental art is the field of plastic arts that relates to large-sized works[3], generally carved. Mosaic, painting (fresco) and stained glass are monumental art genres, each having their specific features in terms of the plastic procedures used. The term "monumental sculpture" is frequently used in art history to determine, on the one hand, the category of a concrete oversized work, and on the other - simple in concept, virtuously performed, rigid and stable, with timeless qualities. In general, monumental sculpture is directly related to the surrounding environment (architecture or landscape), marking a space with a memorial, religious, funerary value or one that is consecrated to illustrious historical personalities who played an important role in certain geographical areas. Monumental sculpture has been known ever since ancient times (Colossi of Memnon, Egypt, 25th century BC; the colossal statues of Ramesses II, 15th century BC; the Pergamon Altar, 2nd century BC); and importantly developed along several centuries (the Statue of Liberty in New York, 1886; the Statue of Christ the Redeemer, 1931, Rio de Janeiro, etc.). Another monumental art genre is the mosaic, which creates images using colored glass or ceramic

[2] Similarly to wood or other material carving, regardless of the indicated situations, stone carving of all times fall - depending on their technique and purpose - into two large categories: free-standing (in the round) and attached (in relief). The former are referred to as such because they can be viewed from all sides, a tutto ronda, according to an Italian phrase or ronde-bosse, according to the French one, both consecrated as such in our specialised literature (available at www.putna.ro).

cubes glued with mortar onto the wall. The mosaic art has been known ever since Antiquity (Ishtar Gate, the New Babylon, 6th century BC), and has importantly developed in the Roman and Byzantine art (San Vitale Church, Ravenna, 5-6th century, Saint Sophia's Cathedral in Constantinople, 9th-11th century, etc.). Finally, the term of stained glass designates decorative compositions made of colored glass, joined between lead elements, to obtain specific images. Generally, the metal structure frame for which the glass shapes are created is dictated by the geometrical, segmented shape of the details, which forms the visual integrity of the composition. Stained glass, as monumental art, attained its peak in the Gothic age, being almost omnipresent in European cathedrals. To conclude, we can state that the phrase "monumental art" includes works of art belonging to other plastic art genres, which, however, stand out through sizes and functions.

Scenography was traditionally defined as the "art of painting and setting the scene in theatre", or as the "art of creating the plastic ambiance (scenery, props, lighting) in theatre, cinematography, etc.". In other words, the scenography character of a work of art is given by its very destination. If a board is painted to create an atmosphere as part of a performance, the painting will be regarded as a scenography work of art. However, the scenography work of art is unitary, and it is not only a mere combination of pre-existing plastic works of art. Most of the time, the scenography work of art includes elements with no artistic value if taken individually - a certain type of scene lights; the management of the space on a scene; the costumes of the performing artists etc. –, but when combined by the scenographer, they render a certain image on the space and the theatre or cinematographic work to the public. Thus, scenography is an autonomous art, which aims at triggering a certain type of emotion, by creating artistic images and, more broadly, an "artistic atmosphere".

Tapestry is a form of textile art, which consists of weaving a piece of fabric on a vertical or horizontal loom. The fabric is made up of braids called woof and warp. The warp is parallel to the vertical of the fabric (if the weaving is performed on the vertical loom) and represents the bearing element of the fabric, while the woof is crosswise, being introduced between the warp braids during weaving. Tapestry is generally used in interior design, either hung onto the wall or on a vertical surface. Tapestry originates in Ancient Egypt, and it greatly developed in Medieval Europe, but it still is much spread.

Ceramics is the art of processing the plastic mixture made of common clays, kaolin, quartzite, talc, graphite, and coke in various percentages, through the homogenization, shaping, decoration, glazing, drying or burning thereof. Depending on the composition and on the artist's working procedure, ceramic may be gross (unbaked or baked pottery – terra cotta) and fine (porcelain, faience, etc.).

Glass and metal plastic is a type of plastic art involving the three-dimensional shaping of the two materials. Glass plastic works can be clear, opaque, or can include colors obtained from various pigments. Metal plastic works are achieved through the shaping of the various metal types (platinum, gold, silver, bronze, iron, alloys, etc.).

Drawing is the graphical representation of an object, a face, or a landscape on a two-dimensional, flat, or curve surface, generally, using lines, dots, spots, symbols, etc. Drawing may be monochromatic or colorful.

Collage is a form of plastic art characterized through the combination of different shapes (with or without artistic content) in order to obtain a new unitary artistic form. Previous shapes are glued together on a base. The term "collage" originates in the French "coller" ("to glue"). Though it has a quite lengthy history, collage mainly became a modern art genre starting the beginning of the 20th century, having as representatives Georges Braque[4] and Pablo Picasso.

The works of art applied to practical use products are dedicated both for the individualization - through plastic art-specific aesthetic elements and the industrially ("batch") manufactured utility goods. This category of works of art benefits from a double protection system, both in relation to copyright, and under the laws on "industrial drawings and designs". This added protection derives from the very fact that, due to their destination and reproduction manner, applied works of art fall under the scope of industrial copyright, and, in the light of the way they were developed, they fall under the scope of copyrighting.

Design was defined as a "multidisciplinary field interested in the overall factors (socio-economic, technical, ergonomic, aesthetic, etc.) that contribute to the aspect and quality of the large batch product." In other words, design is a creative activity, which takes into account the development of new forms for practical use items. However, unlike the industrial model or drawing - where the applied shape or drawing aim at individualizing the product through its aesthetic aspect – design aims at "facilitating and rationalizing the manufacture of the product"[5].

Architecture was defined as the "science and art of the organization and building of spaces required for human life and activity"[6] or as the "art of designing and constructing buildings and building complexes based on certain proportions and rules, depending on the nature and destination of the structures"[7]. Because it has both a functional, and an artistic value, the evolution of architecture depends upon the types of materials used in a certain age (wood, stone, brick, concrete), the destination of the building (dwellings, religious buildings, industrial, military buildings, etc.), and on the spiritual environment it is developed in. The basic architecture elements volume, surface, and plan – organized based on a certain pace, characterize architectonic styles. Depending on the perception of the time (i.e., towards the functional or the spiritual), architecture accentuates either the structure of the buildings (classical Greek, Renaissance, or 20th century architecture), or the general shape and the decor, in order to trigger an emotion or accentuate national specificity (Egyptian, Baroque architecture, etc.). Depending on the destination of the building, architecture is divided into: civil, religious, military, industrial, etc. A new architectural genre is landscaping, defined as the art of intervening over the landscape in order to obtain an aesthetic space. The destination of the architectonic work is, however, irrelevant in terms of copyright protection, according to the provisions in art. 7 from the Law no. 8/1996 on copyright and related rights, as republished.

Being both an artist, and a technician, "the architect is, however, protected as the developer of original forms, and not as a technician using purely engineering processes"[8]. According to art. 7 lett. h from the Law no. 8/1996 on copyright and related rights, as republished, "even the plans, the mock-ups, and the graphical works that are part of the architecture projects" are protected. Art. 84 from the aforementioned law also concerns the "architecture and urbanism studies and projects exhibited in the vicinity of the architectural work site". Pursuant to the analysis of the two articles, it follows that architectural works of art play a double role: on the one hand, the plans, the mock-ups, the graphical works making up the architectural projects, and, on the other hand, the structure built. Or, even if the plans are not followed by the actual development of the project, the architectural work will be copyright-protected. This also is the conclusion that follows from the formulation of the Romanian legislator which, in paragraph 2 from art. 84, stipulates: "the building of a work of art, whether fully or partially developed based on another project, can only be performed with the approval of the holder of the copyright over the respective project."

Due to the relativity of art assessment criteria in general, the legal protection granted to works of art ignores their value. However, in our opinion, it is the just solution, because in social evolution, artistic and aesthetic standards have significantly developed, and the granting of legal protection only to the works of art regarded as valuable at a certain point, would deprive subsequent generations from the access to the works of art rejected by a certain socio-aesthetic circumstance.

The solution is also adopted expresis verbis by the Romanian legislator, which, in art. 7 paragraph 1 from the Law no. 8/1996 on copyright and related rights, as republished, stipulates that "original intellectual creation works in the literary, artistic, or scientific works, regardless of the creation method, the expression manner or form, and independently of their value and destination […]" are protected.

We believe that the legislator understood to include in the notional scope of the term "value" both the aesthetic value of the work, and other elements characterizing the work, such as: the content of the work; the sizes thereof, and its commercial value.

In so far as the aesthetic value of the plastic work of art is concerned, it should be stated that, despite the commonly attributed meaning, the term "aesthetics" does not only designate the category of "beauty", but it also supposes the capacity to trigger and communicate emotions that are specific to the receiver's senses. Or, in order to achieve this goal, the mere contemplation of "beauty" does not suffice. A series of contemporary artistic movements actually focus on the rejection of the conventional notion of "beauty".

Or, if the aesthetic value of the work were accepted as a criterion for the legal protection thereof through copyright, the law courts – called upon to rule on the fulfilment of the aesthetic criterion – would make an arbitrary decision affecting "the author's legal security. The law does not hold the capacity to decide whether a work of art is valuable or not, to distinguish between art and pseudo-art. The law has to treat all works equally, whether perfect or not, so as to avoid arbitrary decisions. The courts should only fulfil their mission of telling the truth, while leaving it to the academies to grant prizes and to the history to decide whether the work survived the author and the times when it was created, through its value, the only guarantor of immortality"[9].

In so far as the content of the work of art is concerned, it concerns the approached theme, which, in our opinion, may not be regarded as a criterion in deciding whether copyright protection is to be granted or not. "The protection of the work cannot be rejected because it does not comply with good manners, it is sacrilegious or anticlerical"[10]. Even if the work is, through its content, against the good manners of the time, it cannot be deprived of legal protection. The morality of society is a relative and changing notion, and a valuable work, regarded as obscene at a certain time, could be accepted, or even appreciated by subsequent generations. Such an example is the work of the painter Edouard Manet[11], "The Luncheon on the Grass". Featuring a group made up of two men wearing suits and two naked women, having a picnic, the scene scandalized the public and the critics of the time, because of the usual ambiance in which the female nude - only approved of at the time to evoke mythological themes - was presented. Regarded as shameless and challenging, the work was rejected from the "Official Salon" - an exhibition yearly held in Paris. In 1906, 23 years after the painter's death, the painting was exhibited at the Louvre, the largest and most prestigious art museum in France.

The dimensions of the work should not be a criterion in deciding whether to grant legal protection or not. A huge painted canvas, or a miniature the artistry whereof is hard to perceive at first sight; the Sistine Chapel, painted by Michelangelo over several years, or one of Da Vinci's unfinished drafts, are equally protected. Obviously, the works of art involving various author involvement levels will be differently appreciated by the public, critics, or the works of art market, but, as already shown, this appreciation is not relevant in terms of copyright protection.

Finally, legal protection is granted to a work of art regardless of its commercial value. The commercial value of works of art, set on the specialized market as the relation between demand and offer, may differ based on various criteria, but especially pursuant to the aesthetic value thereof as acknowledged by the public or the specialized critics. Generally, the commercial value of a work of art is only set after the work is "achieved" and disclosed, when it already is - if original - subject to copyright. However, especially in the case of works of art belonging to widely known authors, the commercial value of a future or still undisclosed work of art can be estimated based on the author's market share - set based on the commercial value of previous works belonging to the same author. In these cases, the commercial success of a work of art is the very granting thereof to a certain author. An eloquent example to this end is the case of the portrait entitled "Bearded Young Man" – attributed to Rembrandt - from the famous Thyssen collection, evaluated by Christie's auction house in 1986 to approximately ten million dollars. Immediately after the publication of the conclusions of "Rembrandt Research Projekt" - where Dutch experts stated that the work might have been painted by one of Rembrandt's students, but in a very similar style - the market value of the work dramatically decreased, to no more than $ 800,000. Similarly, in the case of a living painter, the value of an unfinished work may be evaluated according to his market share. Or, regardless of this aspect, as already shown, the future work will be copyright-protected, immediately after it was completed.

3. Conclusions

Romanian legal regulations concerning the plastic works are compliant with the ones provided in the European laws.

The article presents in a complex and historical manner the subjects of the plastic works, their definitions and characteristics.

The commercial value of the plastic works it is very important both for the authors, public and clients, expecially for the specialized market. Also, the commercial value of the plastic works has an important topic as regards the aesthetic value thereof as acknowledged by the public or the specialized critics.

ISSUES ON ENFORCEABILITY OF FINAL DECISIONS OF EUROPEAN UNION INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY OFFICE REGARDING EUROPEAN TRADEMARKS ON FIXING THE AMOUNT OF COST IN ROMANIA

Sorin Eduard PAVEL[*]

Abstract

The purpose of this paper is to analyse the enforceability in Romania of final decisions fixing the amount of costs related to European trademarks, issued by European Union Intellectual Property Office.

According to art 110 (1) and (2) of EU Regulation 2017/1001[1], such decisions are titles enforceable in any Member State and enforcement proceedings are governed by applicable national civil law of the Member State in territory of which the enforcement is carried out.

Apparently, the enforcement of these decisions in Member States should be a formal procedure devoid of issues. Things may be complex having in view that each Member State is compelled by the art 110 (2) of the EU Regulation 2017/1001, to designate a national authority responsible with the verification of the authenticity of respective decisions.

Precisely, what happens when a Member State "forgot" to designate such national authority? Can enforcement proceedings regarding these decisions in respective Member State, be effective?

Romania does not designate the national authority prescribed under art. 110 (2) of EU Regulation 2017/1001, fact that generates, at least from theoretical perspective, issues on the enforcement of this kind of decisions. In a nutshell, if no such national authority has been designated, the procedure on verification of authenticity of these decisions cannot be fulfilled, meaning that enforcement proceedings may be deemed as failing to comply with the national law.

Introduction

European Union Intellectual Property Office (EUIPO) is EU office "responsible for managing the EU trademark and the registered Community design"[1]. EUIPO "was created as a decentralised agency of the European Union to offer IP rights protection to businesses and innovators across the European Union (EU) and beyond"[2].

As regards EU trademarks, EUIPO issues decisions inter alia grounded on the provisions set forth by the EU Regulation 2017/1001, out of which decisions fixing the amount of costs.

EUIPO has divisions that deal with legal aspects on the EU trademarks such as Opposition Divisions competent for making decisions on opposition proceedings related to EU trademarks [art. 161 (1) of EU Regulation 2017/1001], Cancellation Divisions competent for making decisions on revocation and invalidation proceedings related to EU trademarks [art. 163 (1) (a) (b) of EU Regulation 2017/1001], and Boards of Appeal responsible for deciding on appeals related to those decisions inter alia issued by examiners, Opposition Divisions and Cancellation Divisions [art.165 (1) of EU Regulation 1001/2017].

All Opposition Divisions, Cancellation Divisions and Board of Appeals could rule decisions on fixing the amount of costs and some of these decisions can become final (Office Decision).

This paper tries to point out those issues related to enforcement of Office Decisions in Romania.

Under art. 110 (1) (2) of EU Regulation 2017/1001, Office Decisions should be enforced in any Member State according to national civil code of the Member State in territory of which enforcement proceedings should be carried out, each Member State having the obligation to designate a sole national authority responsible with the verification of the authenticity of Office Decision as the sole formality (National Authority). After the verification of the authenticity of an Office Decision, the National Authority shall issue an order of enforcement, document which shall be attached to the Office Decision [art. 110 (2) of the EU Regulation 2017/1001].

So far, Romania has not designated a National Authority, fact that may generate legal issues when a creditor of costs fixed by an Office Decision initiates legal proceedings to enforce his title in Romania against the debtor.

This study on enforceability of Office Decisions in Romania is important because it reveals the legal issues that may occur in the absence of the designation of the National Authority for Romania. Such legal issues may lead, as we will see below, to the blocking of national enforcement proceedings initiated by the creditor before Romanian competent authorities.

In the absence of the designation of Romanian National Authority, the procedure whereby the authenticity of Office Decision should be verified according to art. 110 (2) of the Regulation 2017/1001, cannot be complied with, fact that may lead to the non-compliance with enforcement rules provided by the Romanian Civil Procedural Code (RCPC).

In this paper, we shall present the legal issues deriving from the application of enforcement rules provided by RCPC when a creditor tries to enforce an Office Decisions in Romania.

So far, we are not aware of a case whereby enforcement proceedings on Office Decisions have been blocked due to the non-compliance with the procedure related to the verification of authenticity of Office Decision, either because the enforcement was not necessary (debtor voluntary complied with the payment obligations set forth under Office Decision), or because such non-compliance has not been noticed by the Romanian authorities competent with enforcement proceedings

1. National Authorities designated by Member States, which are responsible with the verification of authenticity of Office Decisions

As per the information provided by EUIPO official website, the following National Authorities have been designated so far: courts of first instance in Belgium[3], the High Court in Ireland[4], the Federal Patent Court (Bundespatentgericht) in Germany[5], Industrial Property Office of the Slovak Republic in Slovakia[6], the district courts (Bezirksgerichte) in Austria[7], Danish Patent and Trademark Office in Denmark[8], the Institut national de la propriété industrielle in France[9], the district courts (Arrondissementsrechtbanken) in Netherlands[10], the Secretary of State in United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland[11], Industrial Property Office in Czech Republic[12], Estonian Patent Office in Estonia[13] , the Court of Appeal in Lithuania[14].

The above outlook shows that Romania has not designated the National Authority, but also that our country is not the sole Member State which has failed to do so.

2. Legal aspects regarding enforcement procedure of Office Decisions in Romania

As we mentioned above, the National Authority has the sole purpose to verify the authenticity of Office Decision at the request of concerned party (creditor), in which case, the National Authority shall release an order of enforcement appended to the Office Decision [art. 110 (2) of EU Regulation 2017/1001].

After obtaining this order of enforcement, the creditor could continue the enforcement proceedings by notifying national competent authorities from the Member State in the territory of which the enforcement should be carried out [art. 110 (3) of EU Regulation 2017/1001].

Considering above matters and the compulsory nature of the provision of art. 110 of EU Regulation 2017/1001, the verification of the authenticity of the Office Decision subject of enforcement in Romania, cannot be performed in the absence of the Romanian National Authority.

Under Romanian law, an EU enforceable title for which EU law does not regulate a preliminary procedure for the recognition in the Member State in which the enforcement should be carried out shall de iure be enforceable without any preliminary formality (art. 636 RCPL). This means that an Office Decision could be deemed enforceable title in Romania, after obtaining the enforcement order (that should have been issued by the National Authority) when the verification of the authenticity of Office Decision – procedure provided at art. 110 (2) of the EU Regulation 2017/1001, is ended.

The enforcement proceedings in Romania are carried out by a competent bailiff (the Bailiff) and a competent enforcement court (the Enforcement Court) at the creditor's written enforcement request which is registered by the Bailiff under a writ [art. 665 (1) RCPC].

After the registration of creditor's written enforcement request, the Bailiff notifies the Enforcement Court to grant the authorization for enforcing the title. The Bailiff's notification addressed to the Enforcement Court is accompanied by the following certified copies: creditor's written enforcement request, the title subject of enforcement, the writ under which the creditor's enforcement written request has been registered by the Bailiff, and the proof of payment of the prescribed stamp duty [art. 666(1) RCPC].

The Bailiff's notification could be accepted by the Enforcement Court, in which case the latter issues the authorisation to enforce the title, or could be refused.

The Enforcement Court could refuse to grant the authorization for enforcing the title under specific conditions expressly provided by RCPC, namely:

I. the creditor's enforcement request falls under the competence of another enforcement authority (e.g. other bailiff is competent with the enforcement) [art. 666 (5) (1) of RCPC];
II. the title subject of enforcement does not constitute by law an enforceable title [art 666 (5) (2) of RCPC];
III. the title subject of enforcement, other than court's decisions, does not comply with all formal conditions prescribed by the law or other requirements under specific cases provided by the law [art. 666 (5) (3) of RCPC];
IV. the debt is not certain, of a fixed amount and due [art. 666(5) (4) of RCPC];
V. the debtor enjoys immunity to enforcement due [art. 666(5) (5) of RCPC];
VI. the title subject of enforcement contains provisions that cannot be enforced [art. 666(5) (6) of RCPC];
VII. there are other restraints prescribed by the law [art. 666 (5) (7) of RCPC].

3. Consequences of the absence of enforcement order under proceedings of enforcement of Office Order in Romania

3.1. The case when the Enforcement Court notices the absence of the enforcement order

Since there is no National Authority designated for Romania, the procedure of verification of the authenticity of Office Decision provided under art. 110 (2) of the EU Regulation 2017/1001, cannot be performed and in consequence, the enforcement order cannot be obtained.

The absence of the enforcement order may be noticed by the Enforcement Court under proceedings whereby the Bailiff seeks to obtain the authorization for enforcement, in which case, the Enforcement Court shall find the provisions mentioned at point iii) of above section, applicable (Office Decision is not in compliance with formal requirements prescribed by the law) and shall refuse to grant the authorization for enforcement. Such refusal makes enforcement proceedings ineffective.

How can this legal impediment be overcome? There is no straight answer but only assumptions based on the interpretation of the law as follows:

a) The competence of Romanian National Authority is deemed to be taken over by the Enforcement Court

From the very beginning of proceedings when the Bailiff notifies the Enforcement Court to issue the authorization of enforcement, the Bailiff may additionally request the Enforcement Court to verify the authenticity of the Office Decision and to issue the enforcement order as provided under art. 110 (2) of EU Regulation 2017/1001. The Enforcement Court could be deemed as taking over the competence of the National Authority since the later has not been designated. However, this interpretation is arguable and may not be upheld due to the following reasons:

I. provisions of art. 110 of EU Regulation 2017/1001 are mandatory for any Member State (including for Romania). The obligation to designate a single National Authority responsible with the verification of Office Decisions is expressly provided under article 110 (2), without any possibility for the Member States to derogate from these specific provisions. Because of these arguments, since the Enforcement Court has not been expressly designated by the Romanian state, it cannot be deemed to play the role of National Authority within the meaning of art. 110 (2) of EU Regulation 2017/1001;
II. under RCPC, the Enforcement Court could be any of the Romanian courts of first instance in the jurisdiction of which the registered office/domicile of the debtor is located, except for those cases where the law provides otherwise. If the debtor does not have the domicile/registered office in Romania, the Enforcement Court is the Romanian court of first instance in the jurisdiction of which the registered office/domicile of the creditor is located, and if the latter is not in Romania, the Enforcement Court is the Romanian court of first instance in the jurisdiction of which the registered office of the Bailiff vested by the creditor is located [art. 651 (1) RCPC]. Thus, the Enforcement Court is actually "a series" of Romanian first instance courts and not a single court, therefore the interpretation whereby the Enforcement Court has the competence of the National Authority as the latter is defined under art. 110 (2) of EU Regulation 2017/1001, does not comply with the express provisions of the EU Regulation 2017/1001 whereby Member States are compelled to designate a single authority the contact details of which should, according to the same art. 110 (2), be communicated to EUIPO, the Court of Justice of European Union (CJEU) and to the European Commission.

b) The Enforcement Court is deemed to not have the competence of the National Authority

The Enforcement Court may deem the Office Decision unenforceable because it fails to comply with the formal requirements stipulated under art. 110 (2) of EU Regulation 2017/1001 (there is no enforcement order issued by the Romanian National Authority), in which case, the Enforcement Court shall not issue the authorization for enforcement requested by the Bailiff. Under this circumstance, the creditor cannot recover the costs owed by the debtor, which is ascertained in the Office Decision.

How can the creditor enforce his rights if the debtor refuses to pay the costs having in view that the enforcement proceedings are blocked because Romania has not designated the National Authority? A solution might be an action in tort against the debtor on the legal grounds of civil liability stipulated by the Romanian Civil Code (RCC).

RCC provides the obligation of any person to refrain from bringing prejudice to the rights and legitimate interests of others [art. 1349 (1) of RCC].

Furthermore, the person who commits an illicit act is compelled to repair the caused prejudice also when this prejudice is a result of the infringement of the interest of the other person, if the interest is lawful, serious and, by way of its manifestation, the interest creates the appearance of a subjective right [art. 1359 of RCC].

The conduct whereby the debtor refuses to indemnify the creditor with those costs ascertained in the Office Decision, may be deemed having an illicit nature, in which case, civil liability provided by RCC may apply. Under these circumstances, the creditor may request the Romanian competent court to compel the debtor to pay the amount of costs ascertained in the Office Decision.

In order for the action in tort to be successful the creditor should demonstrate to the court the elements of the civil liability, namely: the prejudice, the illicit act, the relationship of causality between the prejudice and the illicit act and the guilt of the debtor. Failure to prove one of these elements leads to the rejection of the action.

In the case at hand, the debtor could defend himself by invoking that the amount of costs ascertained under Office Decisions represents in fact court expenses and not a prejudice in the meaning of civil liability legal provisions, thus these costs should be recovered under enforcement proceedings and not by way of an action in tort. The creditor could contest this claim by invoking that the debt ascertained under Office Decision has the nature of a prejudice within the meaning of art. 1349 (1) of RCC, since the recovery of this debt is not possible under enforcement proceedings due to the fact that Romanian state has not designated the National Authority.

3.2. The case when the Enforcement Court not notice the absence of the enforcement order

After the Enforcement Court grants the enforcement authorization for the Office Decision, without notice the legal aspect raised by the absence of enforcement order that should have been issued by the National Authority, the Bailiff proceeds to enforce the respective Office Decision against the debtor.

The Bailiff shall communicate the debtor (i) a copy of the Enforcement Court's decision whereby the enforcement of Office Decision has been authorised by the Enforcement Court, (ii) a copy of the Office Decision certified by the Bailiff and (iii) a notice to perform if the law does not provide otherwise [art. 667 (1) of RCPC].

Against the enforcement acts performed by the Bailiff, the debtor could file a contestation with the competent court which is actually the Enforcement Court within 15 days as of the date of receipt of the Bailiff's notice to perform, together with corresponding documents (certified copy of the Enforcement Court's Decision attesting the authorization of enforcement, certified copy of the Office Decision) [art. 715 of RCPC].

Having in view the mandatory legal provisions that should be complied with by an Office Decision to become enforceable, we consider that the debtor could successfully challenge the enforceability of the Office Decision claiming the absence of the enforcement order that should have been issued by the National Authority under the procedure set forth by art. 110 (2) of the EU Regulation 2017/1001. Thus, the debtor could request the Enforcement Court to cancel the enforcement title since the Office Decision does not comply with the formal requirements requested by the law [art. 666 (5) (3) of RCPC].

Conclusions

The failure by Romania to designate the National Authority risks to prejudice the rights of the creditors attested under Office Decisions because it creates a legislative vacuum that may impede the enforcement of these rights.

As a top priority, Romania should "fill out" this legislative vacuum with appropriate legal provisions, designating the National Authority responsible with the verification of the authenticity of Office Decision as it is provided under art. 110 (2) of EU Regulation 2017/1001.

Until this measure is taken, in order to secure creditors' rights ascertained by Office Decisions, the Romanian judicial authority should agree with the solution according to which, in the absence of a National Authority, the competence to verify the authenticity of an Office Decisions as provided under art 110 (2) of EU Regulation, vests with the Enforcement Court. Such interpretation is in accordance with the constitutional provisions whereby in case of conflict between a national rule and an EU compulsory rule, the latter shall prevail [art. 148 (2) of the Constitution of Romania]. Moreover, among other Romanian authorities, the Romanian judicial authority has to ensure (i) the compliance with the obligations resulted from the agreement on accession to European Union and (ii) the priority of EU law [art.148 (4) of the Constitution of Romania]. Having in view these matters, the Romanian judicial authority must admit that under EU Regulation 2017/1001, creditors' rights ascertained under Office Decision are to be enforced and the right to enforce cannot be devoid of effects due to the gap in the Romanian legislation generated by the non-compliance with the obligation to designate the National Authority.

An appropriate National Authority that can be designated is the Romanian State Office for Inventions and Trademarks, since this authority is partner of EUIPO. Other solution could be the designation of Bucharest Tribunal (Tribunalul Bucuresti) considering that this court represents an European trademark court within the meaning of art.123 of EU Regulation 2017/1001.

Designating the Enforcement Court may be problematic, having in view that Enforcement Court could be any of the Romanian courts of the first instance from all national jurisdictions. Such designation may be deemed contrary to the provisions of art. 110 (2) of EU Regulation 2017/1001, since the National Authority should be a single one.

FISCALIZATION OF COPYRIGHT. CONTRIBUTIONS TO CLARIFYING CERTAIN ISSUES REGARDING FISCALIZATION OF COPYRIGHT (fiscus ubique praesens est)

Abstract

Intellectual creations and taxes have the gift (the first) and vice (the last) to be everywhere. Intellectual creations are sources of income for rights holders and the revenues incurred from their exploitation are, with some exceptions, taxed everywhere under a regime of favour. In some countries, the facilities granted are so attractive that the most important creators have established their headquarters in these „intellectual tax havens". Researching the share of tax revenues from the capitalization of intellectual property rights in the total budgetary revenues of Romania in the last years, as they are highlighted in the annual budget laws, the first words spoken were: It can not! It can not be true! We can not be so low!

According to Annex no. 1 of the state budget law, from the total amount of the planned revenues to be made in 2017, the amount of 96,825,000 lei is „income tax on the exploitation of intellectual property rights" and we find that it increased compared to 2016 with over 10,000,000 lei (from 86,384,000 lei), the forecasts for the following years being also of growth. Referring to the programmed amount to be made from the taxing of the results of the intellectual creation activity, we find that the share in the total state budget revenues is 0.082% (a sum that should not be worried by its small size only if we refer to the tax on profit of the commercial banks planned to be realized, that of 357,000,000 lei).

1. Questions instead of introduction

No matter how controversial Thomas Malthus[1] is for his ideas and theories, and especially for the one pursuant to which poverty, famine, disease, epidemics, climate change, calamities and wars are beneficial factors for mankind because they ensure the balance between the number of individuals and livelihood, we have to admit that he is right when he says, optimistically, that when a man is born „God sends not only an extra mouth to be fed, but also a pair of arms that will work." And I think we can forgive the cynicism of some of his theories in exchange for the realistic demand he made, that „instead of poverty laws, take measures to educate the poor." A suggestion that, when it was made, was in line with the spirit of Queen Anna's Statute of 1709, whose declared purpose was to encourage teaching and educators, not only for the benefit of the ignorant but also for the benefit of the country. What the British did in the 17th-18th centuries in the field of intellectual property and by the laws they had adopted over time in order to teach the subjects to work, and if necessary, force them to work and what Malthus said is a good and timely urge for our politicians and for that part of the population that refuses to school and work. And who should be educated to work, not to stand in the queue of social aid, taught to have an initiative, encouraged and helped to undertake when this desire exists, determined to produce goods and added value. How could they do it and we can not?

Many civil law teachers start their first course asking students the question: what did you see on the street coming to college? People and goods hurry most to respond, to the satisfaction of those for whom there is nothing else but pure civil law. The more perceptive they will say, of course, that they see around them creations of God and creations of men! Among these ones, some will continue to say: material goods and intellectual goods. And maybe some will say that all these are „goods" within the meaning of article 1 of The European Convention on Human Rights First Protocol to the Convention and, going further, they will say that upon all these we have some kind of ownership that, if we look closely we find that we are partakers of the state and not of our own. That ownership rights upon goods and/or exclusive rights on intellectual creations are not so exclusive and opposable to everyone as we would want, imagine, or affirm, since the state is entitled to a „portion" of our wealth and income.

[1] Thomas Robert Malthus (1766-1834), a British cleric and economist, author of a theory that bears his name (Malthusianism), according to which the population grows in geometric progression while livelihood increases in arithmetic progression, this prospect is worrying in the absence of demographic controls. He was contested even during his lifetime, slandered, demonized by many, but many, lucid, admired him. However, he is topical, many are today who recognize the value of his theories and are seeking solutions to the present state of affairs (which confirms Malthus) pursuant to his ideas. His work "Essay on Population" was translated into Romanian language by Victor Vasiloiu and Elena Angelescu and published by the Publishing House Științifică in 1992.

Including those created as a result of performing an intellectual creation activity. We always divide our wealth and income with the state, and it seems natural for us to do it. It is true that if we did not do it, if we rebelled against this kingly right of the state, we would have soon find out how bitter the taste of this disobedience is and how „opposable" to the state is our right on what we have gained in property or over what we have created through intellectual activity. We would see how indisputable this kingly right of the state is, getting its share, and how serious this is, and not just in the eyes of the state, the fact of not giving it what is long and definitively admitted being owed to it. Why is that?

It seems to me that the Ecclesiastes has answered to all the questions. And we do not find fault with either one. We all agree that the State and the Tax are inseparable (or even one and only) that people can only live in organized communities, that living together involves spending to meet common needs, and that this requires everyone to participate supporting public spending, including creators who make revenue from exploiting their intellectual creations. We agree with the obligation principle, universality and equality in tax matters because we cannot live together otherwise and because it is moral and fair. We are unmistakably aware that the progress of mankind is due to the activity of those endowed with creative power and that our future depends on what and how much we will create. I mean the creators.

We are reserved as regards tax incentives that violate the obligation principle, universality of taxes and equality of individuals (taxpayers) against taxation. We are against social assistance for all who can work and do not because their help has perverse effects. Is this assistance the cause of laziness[2], denial of work and misery for those who can work and do not do so as a deterrent to those who work. Don't you think that Ecclesiastes (2.21) referred to this when he said: „for a man who has put into his work wisdom and science and has succeeded, shares it with the one who has not worked. And this is vanity and an exceeding great evil"? Or is the Book of Books overcome?

Albert Einstein, perhaps the greatest creator of all time, considered by the international science community „the man of the twentieth century," is a name associated with the genius. Nobel Laureate for Physics in 1921, the man who stunned the world with his theories, his findings, his scientific work, and related inventive applications[3], the man who always found light where for many only deep darkness was, said that „the hardest thing to understand in the world is the income tax"! And looking over a tax statement he stated that „it's too difficult for a mathematician (to fill out). I need a philosopher." And if for Einstein it was hard to understand, then who would understand what our taxes are all about?

Not all people can create, of course, and not all those who claim to do so are truly creators, life showing that plagiarism is not only a very shameful and old job, an act which is not forgotten, is not forgiven, and does not prescribe, but also a profit-maker (this could be one of the hypotheses where the legislator understood to allocate tax on illicit income, upon which I will return)! But with the exceptions justified by illness, disability or age, all those in power should work according to their skill, and those who lack knowledge, helped to acquire it, however in order to achieve this we need an efficient education system where the authors of works, creators in all fields and teachers are the most important contributors.

Comparative history and statistics with their insipid but convincing figures shows us what the states that have understood this simple truth have achieved. Shortly after England became the United Kingdom (1707), in 1709, the United Parliaments of England and Scotland adopted the first modern law on copyright whose title was: „An act for the encouragement of learning, by vesting the copies of printed books in the authors or purchasers of such copies, during the Times therein mentioned". Subsequently, the title of the law was adjusted and reduced to the „Law for the encouragement of learned people to compose and write useful books" or „The law for encouragement of teaching," which is even better known in the specialized works as Queen Anna's Statute. The purpose of the law derives from its very title: encouraging creative work as one that is useful to learning. In the copyright system, the usefulness of new and original creations is the real reason for the protection of works, and here is the fundamental distinction between this system of protection and that of the Berne Convention, at the heart of which is the creator and its personality. And even if we are emotionally attached to the European copyright protection system (the Berne Convention), we must admit that the copyright system has proven its efficiency, as it is in the states that practice it, the creative work is at higher levels than in Europe, categorically refuting the idea that the satiated creator (artist) can not create, an idea that has a long history in Europe.

The punishment was the first tax. The beneficiaries of the robbery-tax, says Mancur Olson[4]

[2] After adopting the "Law of Poverty" in England in 1601, „idleness and hatred of work were found encouraged", as in France, the establishment by the state, under the authority of the Constitution of 1848 and the ideas of Louis Blanc, of the National Workshops where work was paid by the state by day which was lasting for 10 hours, without the workers producing much, made the number of such paid persons increase, from 6,000 in March 1848 to 150,000 in June 1848, a bankrupt idea for the state. Apud Nicolae Idieru, Political Economy and Finance Studies, Carol Muller Publishing House, 1895, p. 135 et seq.

[3] A. Einstein was not an inventor in the classical sense of the word, but his theories and discoveries are inexhaustible sources of valuable inventions. Among them, the missiles, the atomic bomb.

[4] The American economist Mancur Lloyd Olson Jr. (1932-1998) in his latest paper, Power and Prosperity, and in other studies, analyzing the economic effects of various types of government (anarchy, tyranny, and democracy) distinguishes between roving bandit and stationary were not at the beginning only a band of wandering robbers who, with time settled and started, with arms in their hands and then words that became themselves a force (the church had its role and interest), to arrogate their role as protectors of those they subjected with force, to gain legitimacy for their actions, then to organize themselves, to establish rules (one of the first being the repetitiveness of the performance, the other, the severe punishment of the one who refuses the imposed burden), institutionalize the coach and the coercive apparatus. And the little ones had finally the reasons to choose the latter as masters and to obey them, even if they made them gnashing their teeth, because their behaviour, besides offering them the safety of life, and has, and has the potential to, however, encourage economic development. The tax was born out of and through violence and is the consequence of a report of obedience, but not many are those who offer other justifications for the right to tax. It is, therefore, natural that relations between State / Tax Authorities and individuals should not be just as cordial Individuals, unable to completely avoid paying taxes, want to give the state as little as possible (including creators, authors of the works of the spirit do that), and the state wants to take from everyone as much as possible! Individuals are seen by the state as fraudsters and not all of them are, because nowhere else, tax optimization is not evasion, but many of our states lawyers[5] and not a few judges (unfortunately) are determined to cut off the Romanian taxable material to make room for those who are to replace Romanian capitalists (incapable of organizing and becoming not only a voice to be heard, but also a force to be taken into account) and then expatriate their income to other lands , wondering of what will be paid for in the future prepared by them without discernment for the „good" they are doing to the country now. And the country can not strip robbers of the unjust, because the irremovability of judges is a trivial status in relation to the special status of state lawyers in Romania. The state, on the other hand, has always been seen by tax payers (a part of them) as the greatest robber! And so it is still today. The Bible tells us the same (we will return), but also Lysander Spooner[6], a genius creator, who defeated the United States in two famous trials, and whose work on the unconstitutionality of slavery offered solid arguments for its abolition.

Researching the share of tax revenues from the capitalization of intellectual property rights in the total budgetary revenues of Romania in the last years, as they are highlighted in the annual budget laws, the first words spoken were: It can not! It can not be true! We can not be so low! That's why I ask: Do you know dear politicians sent by us (wrongly?) where you are and decide on our behalf, what is the share of intellectual creation assets in performing societies and developed countries? If you know, why don't you encourage and support creative work and development research, as is the case in those countries? Do you know gentlemen politicians that we are the country with the lowest level of innovation in the European Union? If you know, why do not you do anything to fix things? Do you know that a country with such a rich culinary tradition has only four geographical indications protected at European level? Do you know it's harder to write a valuable scientific book than to produce software? If you know, why only IT programmers are exempt from income tax? But our list of questions is long. Now we end up with: Do you know that OSIM and ORDA are agonizing from your unpredictability? Do you know how incoherent, inadequate to the interests of the country and out of date (to be polite) is the Romanian legislation on intellectual property?

2. The Ubiquity of Tax Authorities and Intellectual Creations

Intellectual property and Tax Authorities or Intellectual Property and Tax Authorities have in common not only the seniority, permanence and continuous evolution, but also the gift of ubiquity, of their omnipresence at the same time. According to some authors, Intellectual Creation and the Tax Authorities have something sacred, divine[7]. And perhaps by the end of writing and / or reading and before concluding that yes, life might perhaps exist without a Tax and without intellectual creation, but it would certainly be much harder if not impossible, we bandit, stating that a steady bandit is preferable, which, unlike the wandering one, correlates its interests with those of the population and robbers wisely in order not to remain without the wealth.

[5] This name is not good for those who should be "state attorneys", because attorneys work for the benefit, not against the interests of those who hire them. And many of these "state attorneys" do not understand their true meaning. For the statement that "tax avoidance is the only intellectual effort that still has a reward", Nobel laureate for economy, John Maynard Keynes, is likely to be declared, after the expression used by Romanian politicians to compromise competitors, and from which state lawyers they made themselves a currency, a "prisons".

[6] Lysander Spooner (January 19th, 1808 – May 14th,1887), philosopher, pamphlet, abolitionist activist, lawyer and entrepreneur, one of the most important figures in the history of American anarchism because of the consistency between written principles and values in action. He gained fame after having obtained the repeal of a regulation that forbids his lawyer access because he did not graduate from the college and after an uneven fight he conducted with the US Post Office holding the legal monopoly on postal services in the US, bankrupt the company he had created but also urged the US Congress to reduce postage rates several times. He also noted, through his belief in the primacy of the natural law of the laws created by men, that he was an opponent of slavery and defended for free the fugitive slaves, his work "The Unconstitutionality of Slavery" (published in 1845), sparked the admiration of slave opponents and defenders for their clarity and rigor, demonstrating that slavery is incompatible with the United States Constitution.

[7] See Ernst H. Kantorowicz, The King's Two Bodies, Polirom Publishing House. "It is, perhaps, the most important work on the history of medieval political thought, certainly the most spectacular of the past decades," wrote the American Political Science Review. The work was published in 1957 and translated into many languages. In Romanian it was published in 2014. E. H. Kantorowicz (1895-1963) was a specialist in medieval history and taught at the University of California, Berkeley.

will discover and other elements common to the two areas of social, economic and cultural life and law.

If Tax Authorities and its usual form of expression, the tax (we adopt the British model here and we understand by tax and taxes and contributions, when it will be necessary to refer explicitly to them, because they are not only conceptually different in our law, but are quite different and under the aspect of their legal regime) is „the blood of the state", intellectual creations are the „state mind" and the engine of its development. There can be no states without taxpayers' contributions to support general spending, as there can be no states that go beyond the creation of people, intellectual property.

The tax is contemporaneous with the state, and according to some authors the state is the cause of the tax, but others say that, on the contrary, the tax would be the cause of the state. Could the state and the tax appear outside the minds that have thought and put into operation these ideas (state and tax)? We do not believe it! The intellectual creation activity (not the legal institution of intellectual property, the intellectual property right) is older than the state rather than the tax, but only in organized communities (in states) and with great delay in relation to other protected social and economic values, the creation intellectual property has begun to be valued at its true value and legally protected. after the emergence of the state and on a certain level of development, theologians and scientists - creators, authors of scientific works - formulated ideas and theories, developed them broadly, not a few times with biblical arguments, and offered state reasons for justifying taxation and the right to tax. Among them, we only mention Thomas d'Aquino[8],who, inspired by Aristotle, sees in the state a necessary product because,"man is a social creature"[9] and asserted the right of sovereigns to collect taxes when the ordinary – areas income - was not sufficient, with the argument that the monarchs work for the general interests of the community, so that the community has a duty to contribute to their support, and so much more as a lack of means would put the sovereign in a position to contract loans, which would be likely to reduce the prestige that a state must enjoy in relation to another state.

The tax is ubiquitous and some authors (E. H. Kantorowicz among them) say that through this it resembles God. But the (intellectual, people's) creation is missing from something that satisfies people's needs today? Tax is a combination of divine and earthly evidence, proof that this is the very theory of solidarity, so often used in recent times in modern states to justify imposing, and which theory originates in the biblical commandment: help your neighbour (love your neighbour as yourself, Matthew 22:39). But is intellectual creation not the same? Has God not made us (Genesis 1: 26-27) with intellect, emotion, will, and of course, with creative power in his image and likeness? Are not we the way God wanted us to be? It is not the artistic creation a permanent mixture of divine and humanity, of grace of witch only some are gifted and of enormous human toil! He did not say in his famous aphorisms the most original plastic artist of all time, Constantin Brancuși, that he puts into his work divine fire, coincides with it and burns himself inside his work, or that to be true artist must „ to create as a demiurge, to command a king, to work as a slave „?

In the context it must be said that the artist of genius, whose gift made to the Romanian people in 1951 (230 sculptures according to some sources) was denied by those who then decided the destinies of the country and its culture and among which were great creators who they did not understand him[10] or they were simply afraid of his greatness, he would also deserve to be studied by jurists[11] and not just in terms of his vision of the originality of works, in which he succeeded in defeating the US customs authorities following a famous, a process that is quoted in all the important works in the field, but also many other events in our lifetime and from our life's realization, even today, for example, whether he died having or not Romanian citizenship , and whether his bones may or may not be [8] Thomas d'Aquino Theologist (1225-1274, canonized in 1323) and medieval scholastic philosopher, author of "Summa Theologiae". He founded the philosophical system recommended in 1879 as the official philosophy of Catholicism, confirming his professor Albertus Magnus, who said that "This silent ox will fill the world with his prick" (The colleagues from Koln College - where he studied Aristotle - who admired d'Aquino for his qualities, called him "silent bull"). He is considered one of the greatest philosophers of the world, although his work is not explicit philosophical but theological. He built the philosophical method of harmonizing faith and reason, combining aristotelism with the dogmas of the church.

[9] Thomas d'Aquino took over from Aristotle who first said that man was a „zoon politikon" in his Political work and no one accused him of plagiarism. True, about the right of citation, limits and conditions quoting law speaks only in 1812 (Charles-Emmanuel Nodier was the first to say that "any loans from previous works, except citations can not be excused") and then A.C. Renouard who said in 1838 that "to ban writers quoting predecessors, refused to advance science and public discussion using any passage from a work which is in the private sector is undoubtedly an exaggeration. It has even said that an author that cites another, or he makes know the one that supports or disapproves, indicating that he did not want to take authorship of the work of another, is of course out of any conduct guilty. But it can be abused by anything. „Apud Frederic Pollaud-Dulian, Le droit d'auteur, Economic Ed., 2005, p. 508

[10] It was not the first time when Brâncuși was not understood, but the refusal of the authorities and the culture people to accept his gift, which hurt the artist who demanded French citizenship and lacked our country to have in her cultural patrimony the works offered by this.

[11] The Brâncuși process against the United States, having as object the artwork of sculpture "The bird in space", with the consequence of the duty exemption for its introduction in the US, is a lawsuit on a law problem posed by a much better known work of art , but no less important in civil law than the dispute between Joseph Kohler (1849-1919), professor in Berlin, with important contributions to the philosophy of law, intellectual property and comparative history of law, among others, authors of a work devoted to legal issues in W. Shakespeare's work ("Shakespeare vor den Forum der Jurisprudenz") and another professor at the University of Vienna Rudolf von Jhering (1818-1892), author of "Der Kampf ums Recht" , went on the edge of issue of executing a penalty clauses can not be taken out of the legal fabric of the play "The Merchant of Venice" (the punishment debtor could not meet the payment obligation of pounds of meat cut from the body of the debtor).

repatriated as some politicians and about 180 blood relatives in life say they want to do[12].

And in reverse of this state, i.e., in the dark side of the Tax Authorities and intellectual creations, there are similarities. In the consciousness of most people, the Tax Authorities has never been associated with holiness, on the contrary, and St. Augustine[13] he considered the Romanian State (and his instrument - the Tax Authorities), whose collapse he witnessed when he perfected his work as the fruit of the innate sin or instrument of Satan. In his work De Civitate Dei, St. Augustine identified the city of God with the Church, not with the State, although at that time the Christian Church, so oppressed by the State not long ago, vigorously supported the State. The Terrestrial Fortress of the People (the State), whose organization it saw, though useful, especially if it was impregnated by the Christian faith, was good only because it made possible the evolution of the people towards the City of God. We must not, of course, surprise the attribution of a divine origin to the monarchs by the monarchs, that is, by those who instituted them (the monarchy itself claiming divine origin for it, this descendancy being still affirmed in the Old Testament), for such an origin taxes, sustained, as we saw the Church, was useful for their acceptance by taxpayers and for their compliance by voluntary payment of gifts and, if necessary, by coercive measures.

And yet, those who gathered the ancient trials and were called customs officers[14], were like the robbers and sinners or the pagans, and they were hated by the people (Matthew even denied the shameful tax-collector service in the service of the Romans at the time of his calling to become a disciple of Jesus and evangelist, and in his Gospel the publican is a character negative, referring even to him as „Matthew the Witness", a sinner). But of those who created over time, were not some of the purifying fire given as heretics, as unbelievers, and sometimes the bows that were burned were not even made their books inconvenient to the Church? However, the fraternity of the Church and its odious Inquisition is not stranger, with the states in which the inquisitorial tribunals acted (I do not think it is a word expressing the inhuman way they did it) for punishing the subjects who were and not only of the Church? The Church was even more sympathetic to Tax Authorities and its agents than to many of the books and to many of the authors of books. The bibliocide is ancient millennia, but it is the Church that instituted a diabolical censure before the Nazis, communists or denizens, the mere possession of books forbidden by Index librorum prohibitorum[15] being sufficient reason for the heretical condemnation of the banner.

Tax Authorities are omnipresent and omnipotent by that, it really resembles the Divinity. The lawyers assign ubiquity to Tax Authorities and are right about it. But ubiquity, which is an attribute of Divinity and of Tax Authorities, is also a feature of intellectual creations. These can be found anywhere, anytime and can be easily accessed by anyone and used at the same time by an indefinite number of people.

Tax is part of our lives, like days and nights, cold and heat, good and evil. And if the tax can not be included in our gene, as it would, of course, the State and Tax Authorities, it is long ago and perhaps more than the idea of ownership, part of our education, our culture acquired through reading, studying the works of others through experience. The person lacking goods or income is not and can not be sanctioned because he has no goods[16], because it does not create or because it does not have any revenue [17]. But the one who does not pay his taxes has no escape; he will be pursued by the Tax Authorities until the last possibility of realizing the fiscal claim of the state is exhausted. Is the book missing out of our lives? But our education is the product of what has been (intellectually) created throughout history and what is transmitted to us through books?

Tax is in everything we do (sometimes even without profit), and it is the instrument by which the Tax Authorities (State) takes its part, which wants continuously to increase it, from our income and wealth. We learn from early age (from books) that the one who has (or only claims) to care for us, our school, our health, our safety, our roads, that is, the state, to we are indebted and we have to return a price for the goods and utilities that he offers us so that he can take care of himself even more and better! First we learn the rule and then submit ourselves to life, the rule by which the [12] We do not think it would be bad. It's just that we should know if Brâncuși really wanted to be buried near his mother and if not, let's not disturb his eternal sleep. I know, however, that there are two crosses in the Hobita cemetery with the name of Maria Brâncuși and it is not known where his mother is, and the house where he was born is no longer and that the one who show us that he is, is ready to collapse.

[13] Augustin de Hipona (354-430), bishop, theologian, philosopher, doctor of the Church, one of the four parents of the Western Church, alongside Ambrose, Jerome, and Gregory the Great. It was canonized (St. Augustine to the Catholics, Blessed Augustine to the Orthodox). Patron of the theologians and printers. The work of De Civitate Dei is essential for understanding the history of the Middle Ages.

[14] In the New Testament the word "tax collector" is used 22 times, never in a positive context.

[15] The list of books forbidden by the Catholic Church was promulgated in 1565 by Pope Pius V and was completed by 1948, published in 32 editions. The index was abolished only in 1966.

[16] The one who has goods "above average", according to a controversial legislative initiative that has not yet been finalized, should pay another tax, a "wealth tax" hidden under a name that wants to make it moral „solidarity tax ".

[17] By a law of June 16, 1948, a "leniency tax" was introduced in France due to males who had not reached the age of 50 who could not justify carrying out an activity likely to ensure existence. Various exemptions were provided in the law, including that of students who had not reached the age of 30 on December 31, 1947, and were enrolled at university regularly (on a regular basis). The amount due as "leniency tax" was 50,000 old francs, with overdue payment being followed by corporal constraints. In fact, the normative act adopted was aimed at taxing people who had undeclared income. Harshly criticized "leniency tax" was not applied. L. Lamarque, O. Négrin, L. Ayrault, Droit fiscal général, 2nd Edition, LexisNexis, Paris, 2011, p. 97. In Belarus, a draft law on the taxation of non-employed persons was announced in amount of 250 dollars per year, the declared purpose of the legislative initiative is to force everyone to work.

state is partaker of all our acts and deeds, and we must divide with it what we have gained through our physical or intellectual work, inheritance, the play of the hazard because we are under his protection or just (and certainly) in his power.

Tax is a creation of the human mind, and the Tax Authorities is as we know it today thanks to the work of intellectual creation of some of our fellow men, not just the old ones, and today they are looking for new methods of taxation. The value added tax, for example, efficient indirect taxation, was „invented" in France in 1954 by the Maurice Lauré[18], an engineer who came after the Second World War (that is, in times of the heaviest for public finances) general director of taxes in the French Ministry of Finance. Generalized in France in 1966, appropriated by CEE in 1967 and then generalized in the European Union (its application is condition of EU accession). VAT is therefore an intellectual creation, because it is the result of a creative work, of putting into practice an idea that has changed the existing reality. True, the „invention" of which its author was dissatisfied before his death was not and is not protected by any intellectual property right, which allowed „copying" in most states of the world without the author's permission and without remuneration for it.

We work for the state to pay taxes, just as much as for us. Some, the Nordic case, even more (statistics say up to 57%). We try to integrate (but we fail) and become the same with the average European working half a week to obtain the resources needed to meet individual needs and the other half to pay taxes, fees and other mandatory contributions, and we look yearning to the European average above which the mandatory levies on their income exceed this half. We accept the dry humour of a famous French cyclist Bernard Hinault[19], who in front of excessive taxes on his earnings said that „when I pedal four times, three times I do it for the state and once for me"[20]. It is true that from time to time we are witnessing fiscal tax anachoresis (adapted to the times in which we are, of course), known to us as băjenia (refuge), a form of disobedience to the Tax Authorities, in response to which, certain Lord of the Romanian Land[21] allocated a tax called: năpasta (the blight), a punishment-tax that was to be paid by the collectivity from where the ones that "fled" took part.

Nowadays, unhappy with the heavy burden of taxes, they are looking for more tax-friendly places, many choosing the way of the bloody tax havens. Among these, we recall a French genius actor, Gérard Dépardieu, who was full of the taxes he had to pay in his country (the country that gave the world VAT) and especially the solidarity tax (the wealth tax) has demanded and obtained Russian citizenship, stirring the fury of some of its fellow citizens, but also the appreciation of others who have followed suit, because more and more are those who establish their tax domiciles in friendly territories in terms of the level of income tax, thus leaving less and less money in their country[22]. In front of the offensive of fiscal anticorruption, which also takes the form of demonizing tax havens [23], new forms of organization for tax optimization have been devised lately - the case of multinationals that are virtually uncontrollable - not least by encouraging states by the facilities granted this phenomenon Ireland's case is IT-enhancing).

Most, however, under academic education or for reasons of moral, it seems natural today to work half the time to fill state coffers and we do not argue, although I have learned from history that our ancestors stood up against the state and the exploiters (boyars, noblemen, gentlemen, kings) and sometimes even for less hitting, which is true all over the world[24].

The tax not only fills the state treasury on the basis of a substantive law report of a regal nature (of divine origin and he), which is completely careless to the principle of equivalence of benefits (do ut des), and it also has a special symbolic value. Indeed, the tax symbolizes to a great extent the state's power over the subjects and the acceptance by the taxpayers of the ratio of obedience. Evidence: our contribution to supporting state expenditures is one of the four fundamental obligations of the constituent citizens (not just of Romania), along with the obligation of loyalty and [18] Maurice Lauré (1917-2001), a valuable polytechnist (he is also the author of a patent for a turbine model) "invented" VAT at the same time as rock'n'roll in the United States (July 5/6, 1954 when Elvis Presley recorded his famous song That`s All Right). According to M. Cozian, Précis de fiscalité, p. 277. In an interview given in 2000, Maurice Lauré said he regrets that he "invented" this tax, whose virtues also bent in the period in which the Government and the French Parliament were trying to introduce. The First VAT Directive was adopted on 11 April 1967 (called the Directive on the harmonization of Member States' legislation on turnover tax). VAT is now considered to be the most evolved indirect taxation system. It was adopted in over 120 states, including China, India, Japan and Russia, but not the United States, which remained insensitive to the charms of this kind of indirect tax.

[19] Bernard Hinault has won 5 times the French Cycling Tour and is considered one of the greatest champions of this sport.

[21] But it is known that Lord Constantin Brâncoveanu gave a letter to merchants from Câmpulung that the taxes should be paid individually, thus removing the collective burden called the blight.

[22] In France, where the solidarity tax exists, but without a "good wind from the aft" (M. Cozian, Précis de fiscalité des enterprises, chapter L 'impote de solidarité sur la fortune, p. 407 et seq.), Official statistics demonstrate in -a 10-year period, since 1998, no less than $ 125 billion have been removed from the country because of it. As far as social effects are concerned, the increase in the number of divorces is only one of them, the most important one being the tax evasion, with all the consequences of this fleeing in the medium and long term. [23] And yet, 92 countries have tax havens or they are tax havens themselves. Among them, the Netherlands (the one giving lessons to Romania), Great Britain, Malta, China (Hong Kong), Panama. The State of Delaware in the US is one of the largest tax havens.

[24] The war of independence of the United States of America stems from a fiscal dispute that ended with the emergence of a new state, at the beginning, a confederation of 13 states. But since the very beginning of its existence, the US has had a protectionist policy and encouraging intellectual creation activity, being the first (or the first) country in the world that included the authors' protection in the Constitution.

defence of the country, the latter, that of exercising in good faith rights rather than to ensure the fulfilment of the others. The state is privileged in the tax law report. The author, the creator, is also twice privileged: for the first time through the intellectual property laws, the second time, in fiscal terms, of some granted facilities, both aiming to encourage creative work.

Tax Authorities have been, are and will be everywhere and in all the times when there were and there will be states. It could not lack intellectual property and its most consistent and widely regulated part: in copyright.

We do not know exactly when intellectual property is being taxed. We know, however, that writing and book have become a good deal when the printing was invented. Fine for publishers, not for authors, because the idea that a satiety artist can not create is not even abandoned today, and from the „production" of books today the publisher wins more than the author, and publishers claim that the share of distributors is higher than their share. We also know that the privileges of the prints were used by the monarchs and the incomes they brought to their beneficiaries (but also because they allowed for effective censorship to prevent publication of inconvenient works). How do we know that the reasons for the US legal protection of software (first through the patent and later by the Copyright Act of 1976) have weighed very hard the fiscal aspects: the programs involved money and work, or expenses that companies had to deduct, the programs made and / or purchased are intangible assets that have to be accounted and depreciated, their capitalization brings revenues / profits that must also be taxed after the deduction of expenses, or all of which require the recognition of a right for the software created through intellectual creation activity. We also know that being indifferent their borders (art knows no strangers, said C. Brâncuşi), intellectual creations cause double taxation problems.

3. The state of research and the need to investigate the issue

In spite of the permanent offensive of the Tax Authorities against all kinds of taxpayers, including the offensive creators, which is based on the growing need for state resources and aims at the correct and complete identification of taxable material, the increase of taxable material through appropriate measures (but often these actions are devoid of legal and economic logic) and the collection of what is to be collected (part of taxpayers' income and wealth), the problem of copyright taxation (the creators being also the target of this offensive) reactions from journalists, and rarely creators, researchers have a rather reserved, expectant attitude. There are, however, a few exceptions, and we should remember them.

First of all, Professors Gabriel Edmond Olteanu and Sorin Domnișoru, with a very interesting and consistent study on „The ambiguity of the delimitation between the taxation of creativity and that of normal labour". A study demonstrating that it is imperative to research on the issue interdisciplinary, by intellectual property specialists and by tax specialists, as did the aforementioned authors. The two captivate by the way they dealt with issues and if they would continue, they would, I believe, do a great job to those who create both those who consume creations and those who want to tax all, that is, the Tax Authorities (the State). The authors of the remarkable study also recall and quote Alexandru Mihnea Găină from the Univeristy of Craiova when they also question the specific rules for determining the taxable income from intellectual property rights, referring to his work Tax Law and tax procedure[25], but the reference to a single page (88) of the work (which I have not been able to obtain) is likely to lead to the conclusion that the approach to the problem in the work of our colleague A. M. Gain is unfortunately reduced in size.

I also mention Cristian Râpceanu with an article on „Copyright regime in 2016"[26], a very technical and good study for all those who have to make payments to the budget, because I'm a creator and earning income "Taxation of income from copyrights" (GEO no.58/2010 by Andrei Straton[27], „Copyright less taxed" (Anonymous ?!), „Labour taxation of the blogger. Impressions from Web stock „by Emil Călinescu[28] and „Taxation of civil conventions and copyright contracts"[29] (under the name A & I consulting), Intellectual property income: social contributions payable by Mădălina Moceanu[30] are also part of the category of resources available on the Internet. Useful but small in size. He also wrote Luiza Daneliuc, but I did not (I know if) I managed to identify the correct posting [31] and there are many other technical ones.

By comparison, in the French doctrine there is a paper in 2005, having 500 pages, written by Jean-Luc Pierre and titled „Fiscalité de la recherche de la propriété industrielle et des logiciels"[32], dedicated, as it results from its title, only to taxation in the field of industrial property and software. Belgium seems to be champion in the field of intellectual property taxation.

France has a wealth of jurisprudence, but also studies dedicated to this theme, many available on the Internet.

The domain is also worth exploring for us, the arguments for more extensive research are, we believe, numerous and in any case more than those we have identified. So:

According to the State Budget Law no. 6/2017[33], the state budget for 2017 was set at revenues, to the amount of 117.046.581.000 lei and to expenses, to the amount of 150.159.500.000 lei, with a deficit of 33.111.900.000 lei.

According to Annex no. 1 of the state budget law, from the total amount of the planned revenues to be made in 2017, the amount of 96,825,000 lei is „income tax on the exploitation of intellectual property rights" and we find that it increased compared to 2016 with over 10,000,000 lei (from 86,384,000 lei), the forecasts for the following years being also of growth. Referring to the programmed amount to be made from the taxing of the results of the intellectual creation activity, we find that the share in the total state budget revenues is 0.082% (a sum that should not be worried by its small size only if we refer to the tax on profit of the commercial banks planned to be realized, that of 357,000,000 lei).

Also according to Annex 1 of the law, in the chapter „tax revenues", in the year 2017 it is planned to make the amount of 94,000 lei as „profit tax obtained from illicit commercial activities or from non-observance of the Consumer Protection Law". It is hard to understand how the two sources could be united, because GO no. 21/1992 on the protection of consumers, in art. 55-55, establishes the contravention of the violation of the rules established by this normative act and the fines that apply. If, however, it had been taken into account that, according to Art. 61 of GO no. 21/1992 „falsified or counterfeit dangerous products are confiscated (...) and destroyed or used as appropriate, according to the legal regulations, then there are two problems:

- does the state legalize the consumption of products that can be dangerous, spurious or counterfeit, or does the state itself commit the act of putting spurious or counterfeit goods into circulation?
- if the recovery concerns only products that are not harmful (and probably this is the hypothesis envisaged by the legislator), then the income obtained is not taxable, can not be assimilated to it and is not the place next to a „tax on profit „.

As regards the first hypothesis, that of the „profit tax obtained from illicit commercial activities", here things are equally unclear, because, on the one hand, illicit commercial activities are not shown, not even exemplary, the law being in this respect and on the other hand, if we admit that, for example, the musical performances of a category of singers whose income is evaded from taxation, the programmed amount was to be paid (94.000 lei) as tax income from the tax on profit is ridiculous and demonstrates a lack of will rather than the state's impossibility to tax those incomes and those who make such incomes.

Regarding the individual health insurance contributions due by the persons who obtain revenues from intellectual property rights, the total intended income is to be credited by creators' contributions is 12.775.000 lei, in a total foreseen in this chapter (insurance contributions) of 23.551.730.000 lei, which represents 0.54% of the total contributions from this source.

Research revenues represent the penultimate category of size (4.000 lei), the last place, with 3.000 lei being the social stamp duty on the value of imported new cars.

If things are as they are from budget laws, then the situation is alarming for Romania. Because of these figures, the easy conclusion is that in our intellectual property, creative activity is either quantitatively reduced or worthless if viewed in its qualitative aspect. Or if we can accept that creative work with its research, development, innovation component is low and underfunded compared to other states, we still have significant activity in several areas. And we can mention here the programming activity, the creation of software, but it is immediately noticeable that this domain benefits from tax incentives that other domains are denied. This may be one of the reasons for the explosive development of IT activities in Romania, which is extremely attractive in terms of tax, but also evidence of inequality and incorrect legal behaviour.

It is, we believe, a duty of the state not only to identify the taxable matter (which is not to be confused with the taxable value, the latter being the value expressed in the unit of measure used for that, respectively the currency) in the intellectual property, correctly determine the value and subject it to taxation, how the duty of the state is to make the legal framework appropriate and where the creative work develops, and the taxable material and the tax revenues realized on the creative activity to grow.

The evolution of states' economies shows that if, over three centuries ago, wealth was based and appreciated exclusively by holding assets such as land, labor, and capital because mankind did not realize the true value of intangible assets, including intellectual creations , little by little, the economy built with primitive means has been replaced by an economy based on ideas and new creations, an economy in which wealth itself is generated by these ideas and creations, and humanity is increasingly aware of their economic value. Today, intellectual creation is, in terms of value, in terms of the effects, results and competitive advantages it derives, the most important component of the companies and even of the industrial branches as a whole. Creations and innovations related to the social and humanitarian domain also generate effects at least as valuable and important for the development of societies as technical inventions, some authors even claiming that „social innovation is more important than inventing the locomotive steam or the telegraph"[34]. Intellectual creations, which are not only literary and artistic creations, but also computer databases, advertising messages, trademarks, industrial designs, inventions and models, semiconductor topographies, generally all products of creative minds, constitute the heart of modern economies, are producing important incomes. In other words, they are valuable taxable items.

On the other hand, we must admit that even today, it is quite difficult to assess the contribution of intellectual property to the development of economies, among other things, and because there is no adequate way to highlight intellectual property intangible assets in the accounting balances of enterprises. However, studies on the evolution of the US Gross Domestic Product (GDP) between 1909 and 1949, by Robert Solow[35], have shown that an increase in labor and capital accounts for only a small portion of total US GDP growth, the other (estimated by no less than four-fifths), also called Solow's the result of technological progress. Subsequently, the results were confirmed by Edward Denison[36], which showed that „between 1929 - 1957, 40% of income per capita in the US growth was due to technological advances, and today these figures are probably even higher"[37].

Statistics show a steady increase in the share of intangible assets of the type of intellectual property to the detriment of tangible assets all over the world, but the highest growth is also recorded in developed countries and especially in countries allocating large R & D resources. Thus, if in the United States until 1982, about 62% of companies' assets were tangible assets; in 2000 the value of tangible assets decreased to 30%, correspondingly, the value of the intangible assets of the type of intellectual creations increased to 70%. The situation is similar in all developed countries where significant increases in gross domestic product are directly related to research and innovation, new technologies, and efficient exploitation. At present, the value of the intangible assets of the successful commercial companies' intellectual property goes to 80% of the total assets, their exploitation being extremely profitable, because the incomes that intellectual creations bring to those who exploit them efficiently and their authors are clearly superior income earned through physical work. In fact, the world's top wealth is lead by people who work or have intellectual property businesses, with Bill Gates (whose company, Microsoft, the second most widely spoken language in the Romanian language). At the same time, it is found that the authors of important intellectual creations are the best paid today, all over the world.

4. The legal framework of copyright taxation

Law no. 8/1996 on copyright and related rights has three texts in which it deals with tax issues.

First, is the article no 131[1], which regulates the methodologies for the use of works, and provides that, in the case of broadcasters, they must be negotiated under predictable and proportionate conditions with potential broadcast receivers, so that users can have the representation of payment obligations at the beginning of each fiscal year. It is, we believe, an application of the principle of predictability of taxation provided by art. 3 lit. e) and 4 of the Tax Code, which responds to the need for predictability, stability of taxes, taxes and contributions for a period of at least one year, for which the amendments to the Fiscal Code can not enter into force within a shorter term than 6 months from the date of its publication in the Official Gazette. Under this special provision, we believe that the negotiated methodologies can only enter into force in the year following that in which they were negotiated but not less than six months after the date of the negotiation. For example, methodologies negotiated between July and December of one year will not enter into force on January 1st of the following year. We believe, however, that this rule should apply in all cases where methodologies are negotiated in accordance with article 121 of Law no 8/1996, and not only if the payers are broadcasters, the current solution of the legislator being discriminatory.

The second is art. no 138 which establishes the attributions of the Romanian Office for Copyright (ROC) and provides that for their fulfilment the Office

The same conclusion came, independently and at the same time, Australian economist Trevor Winchester Swan, so the model is also called Solow-Swan.

[36] Edward Denison (1915-1992), American economist. He estimated the influences that various improvements in production factors had on economic growth and had the idea of taking into account the qualitative changes in the training of the labour force. Analyzing the correlations between economic growth, technological change and improving the quality of the workforce, Denison concluded that technological change and, implicitly, economic growth are not ensured simply by purchasing more efficient equipment, but only by increasing the quality of the workforce, so , the increase in education spending, which is reflected in gross domestic product growth, which means that investment in education does not mean money spent in an unproductive sector. Denison strengthened its findings by taking into account the Japanese experience in the field. The "Japanese Miracle" produced in the aftermath of the Second World War is explained by the initial increase in spending on education, which has led to the existence of people ready to quickly assimilate technological novelties. Investments in education are found in strong increases in gross domestic product, which makes education one of the most profitable economic sectors "[Apud C. Stoenescu, The New Immaterial Economy and Knowledge Management (http://www.sferapoliticii.ro/sfera/145/art08-stoenescu.html)].

has access to the necessary information operable and free of charge from the (...) National Agency for Tax Administration (...), as well as from the financial institutions -Banking, under the law. Access is justified by the ROCs control over the collecting societies, payment bodies and the budget for rights holders whose rights they collectively manage.

The third is art. 150 (2), which states that „the sums due to the authors, as a result of the use of their works, benefit the same protection as wages and can only be pursued under the same conditions. These amounts are taxable according to tax legislation in the matter „. It is a stipulation that should not be confusing, as the text assimilates the earnings of creators obtained from the valorisation of intellectual property rights with wages only when they are subjected to forced execution.

The Tax Code refers to its texts 27 times to intellectual works, also of 27 times in works of art and 7 times in copyright. The code also defines the royalty, but the term is used in at least two senses in the Tax Code, the intellectual property royalty being defined twice, in art. 7 point 36 and art. 257.

Income taxation from the exploitation of intellectual property rights is regulated in a regime that is special because it has some own rules and can be characterized as favour only because the personal deduction of 40% of the gross income for determining the taxable income is automatic, there is no need for proof from the author because we do not believe that it is really a facility in relation to other categories or that it really represents the measure of the authors' effort. Exceptions are those who earn salary or salary earnings as a result of software creation.

5. What is taxed in Intellectual Property? The object and / or material taxable

From a tax point of view, the qualification of intellectual property rights and in particular of copyright as a „property right" is of no interest. And this is because the object of taxation, the taxable matter, is not the object on which the intellectual property is exercised, that is, the good-creation, but the income deriving from the exploitation of the rights on it, which is the result of the intellectual work of the author. From this point of view, in the case of creators, the Romanian Tax seems rather attached to the idea of remuneration for work for which the author could be paid a salary, this being a sentence that has enough followers among those who demand the abolition of property rights and replacing them with a simple right to remuneration[38].

The Fiscal Code regulates the Income Tax in Title IV (Income Tax), the revenues from the capitalization of the intellectual property rights being „income from any source" within the meaning of Art. 59 fine the tax code, obtained from „independent activities", according to art. 61 lit. a) of the Fiscal Code, which are defined in article 67 of the same code. However, the tax code is not consistent, because when regulating VAT, intellectual creation activity is assimilated to service provision (otherwise, as will be shown below, VAT application to creators would be impossible).

Income from self-employment within the meaning of the Tax Code (Article 67) is, among others, income from intellectual property rights, made individually and / or in a form of association, including related activities, which means that income from the use of related rights also falls into this category.

Independent activity, within the meaning of the Tax Code (Article 7.3), means any activity performed by an individual for the purpose of obtaining income, which fulfils at least 4 of the 7 criteria listed by law: 1) has the freedom to choice of place, mode and work schedule; 2) has the freedom to conduct business for more than one client; 3) assume the risks inherent in the activity; 4) uses his / her heritage in his / her activity; 5) use for his / her activity intellectual capabilities and / or his own physical performance; 6) is part of a professional body / order with the role of representation / regulation and supervision of the profession; 7) has the freedom to carry out the activity directly with employed personnel or through collaboration with third parties under the conditions of the law. If a person does not meet at least 4 out of the 7 criteria, then it is considered to be tax-dependent, so that the taxation regime will be different, this being a controversial issue, especially for journalists, developers and presenters radio and television broadcasts, moderators, participants in such programs.

It should be noted that the Tax Code defines the royalty as income from the valorisation of intellectual property rights in art. 7.36, but later on it is about taxing income, without referring to it as royalties. The Tax Code also speaks of the classical royalties, that is, the sums due to the state for service or utilities provided by the state institutions or for agricultural concessions, mining, oil, etc. and which are budgetary revenues, some (the three mentioned above) assimilated from the point of view of administration and their tax revenue regime.

The Tax Code defines the royalty that is related to intellectual property rights twice, once in Art. 7.36 and the second time in Art. 257. The two definitions, although slightly different, make it possible to conclude that, from a fiscal point of view, royalties are the sums received for the use of rights, that is to say, licenses for use, those paid for the „full acquisition of any property or any property right" on creations not being royalties (Article 7.36 (2) of the Tax Code). In order to be a royalty, it is not mandatory for payment for usage or usage to be periodic. For example, licenses for software for which a single payment is made.

[38] See Gabriel Olteanu and Sorin Domnișoru, "Ambiguity of the Determination between the Taxation of Creativity and that of normal labour", Journal of Legal Sciences, Supplement, Craiova, 2015, p.83-93.

It is worth mentioning here a worrying fact (I have also noted in other papers [39]), namely, that according to the dispositions of Title VI, Chap. I, Section I, point 7 of the Methodological Norms for the application of the Tax Code [40]„,the amount to be paid for the use or right to use ideas or principles relating to software, such as logic schemes, algorithms or programming languages is a fee „, although according to art. 72 par (2) of the Law no 8/1996, „the ideas, processes, methods of operation, mathematical concepts and principles underlying any element of a software, including those underlying its interfaces, are not protected." And apart from the fact that the conflicting provisions show a worrying lack of correlation, it is once again remarked that Norms for the application of a law contradict the law and create a state of inexcusable confusion.

Is it then justified to define royalties? Yes, because according to art. 255 of the Tax Code, payments (...) of royalties from Romania are exempt from any taxes applied to those payments in Romania, either by withholding or by declaration, provided that the beneficial owner of the interest or royalties is a company in another member state (EU or EEA, n.n.) or a permanent establishment, situated in another member state, of a company in a member state, but this issue should be dealt with separately, in a study dedicated to it to identify and investigating all situations in which royalties are owed and taxed or exempt from taxation.

The object of taxation under the tax regime regulated by the Tax Code is, therefore, the income from the capitalization of the intellectual property rights, the tax being due by the holders of the rights of individuals. Legal entities, who may also be holders of intellectual property rights (in the case of works of art, software made by employees, collective works) as corporation tax payers, do not benefit from the regime of favour exclusively for the authors. The regime of favor does not apply to the successors of the authors of the works, regardless of whether they become rights holders for the cause of death or acts among the living.

6. The justification of favour regime of revenues taxation from capitalization of intellectual property rights

In the 70s, Ireland introduced a system of taxation known as the IP Box-Regime or patent box, a regime that established different, benevolent tax rules, of revenues from the capitalization of intellectual property rights and which made big IT companies (Google, Facebook, and Apple) to establish their headquarters in this country. Later, other countries have begun to apply income tax regimes to intellectual property rights, even if they have criticized the Irish solution (for example, the case of French Prime Minister Lionel Jospin between 1997 and 2002).

Generally, under this regime, income from intellectual property rights is taxed from a certain upward income or through reduced tax rates. In Ireland, the tax rate is 6.25% applied to the profit, 15% in France, 5% in the Netherlands, 9% in Spain, 8.5% in Belgium, in Belgium a deduction of 85 %, in Spain, 50% of the profit is exempt from tax. And it is possible that in the United Kingdom, which has announced that after Brexit will still be a good place for creation and protection of creations, tax benefits will be sized to make this country truly a tax haven.

In this state of affairs, we believe, is also the explanation of the exemption from the tax on the salary income of those who work in the field of software creation, but also in the flat personal deduction regulated by article 70 of the Tax Code.

The system, which has made it possible to develop tax optimization schemes, especially from multinationals, erodes the taxable base through the phenomenon of transfer of profits and a massive reduction of the state's tax revenues, and therefore worries and provoked critical reactions and proposals for measures and from the European Union and the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development.

An OECD Plan of Measures is intended not to change the level of taxation (it is difficult to impose tax levels even in EU countries, direct taxes being, as it is known, non-harmonized and difficult to harmonize), but to establish a modal allocation of profits, the proposed plan being known as BEPS - Base erosion and profit shifting and it is expected that in the near future many double taxation avoidance treaties will be amended in this respect. Another direction of action is that of taxing corporate income at the place where the profit is made or where its actual decisions are made, although in the era of digitization and distance communication, the development of home-based work (home office) , this place will be harder to establish. Another measure that our legislators also seem to be interested in is that the preferential regime applies only to the substantial activities that generated income in the country providing the facilities.

7. Establishing income from the capitalization of intellectual property rights

Establishing annual net income from intellectual property rights, regardless of category creation is done by subtracting expenses from gross income determined by applying 40% to the gross income. In other words, it is considered deductible expenses 40% of the gross income received for making of the work, and it can not be increased even if it proves to higher expenses nor be proven.

In the case of the exploitation by the heirs of intellectual property rights as well as in the case of remuneration for the right to sue and the compensatory remuneration for the private copy, the net income is determined by deducting from the gross income the amounts due to the collective management bodies or other payers such income, according to the law, without applying the flat rate of 40%, applicable only to the authors. This means that they will pay the 16% income tax on gross income earned.

For the determination of net income from intellectual property rights, taxpayers can only fill in the income part of the tax records or fulfil their reporting obligations directly on the basis of documents issued by the payer of income. Taxpayers who fulfil their declaratory obligations directly on the basis of the documents issued by the payer of income have the obligation to archive and keep the supporting documents at least within the time limit stipulated by the law and have no obligations regarding the keeping of the accounting records.

For income from intellectual property rights, payers of income, legal entities or other entities required to keep accounting records are also required to calculate, withhold and pay the tax corresponding to amounts paid by withholding, representing early payments of the income paid (Article 72 of the Tax Code). In this case, a 10% rate of income is applied and the tax to be paid in advance will be deducted at source, and for the difference of 6% the author will pay the difference after receiving the income.

This method requires a greater involvement from the holder / author, so that after deducting 10% of the contract value, it will have to submit the Declaration 200 until May 25th of the year following the receipt of the income. Only now will he be able to deduct the flat rate of 40%, and the remaining 6% will be regularized until the sum representing 16% of the declared revenues is met.

a) Taxpayers who obtain income from intellectual property rights at the time of withholding may choose to set the income tax as final tax. The option to impose the gross income is exercised in writing at the time of the conclusion of each legal report / contract and is applicable to the income generated as a result of the activity carried out on its basis.
b) Income tax is calculated by deduction at source when income payers, legal entities or other entities required keeping accounting records by applying a 16% share of the gross income from which the flat rate of deduction is deducted, as the case may be, and the mandatory social contributions withheld at source (Article 73 of the Tax Code).

8. Categories of taxpayers for income derived from the capitalization of copyrights

Tax laws (Tax Code and Tax Procedure Code) use to designate the person who, by virtue of the law, is the debtor of the state, the term „taxpayer". Thus, according to article 1 point 4 of the Tax Procedure Code and article 13 and 58 of the Tax Code, all individuals and legal entities and entities without legal personality who are liable to pay, according to the law, taxes, social taxes and social contributions are taxpayers. The term „taxpayer" covers a heterogeneous category of tax debtors: individuals, legal persons (public or private), employees, retirees, people not employed, low or large taxpayers, residents and non-residents earning income in Romania. These include, of course, creators and performers, related rights holders, and database makers who make revenue from capitalizing on their creations and their successors in rights.

Our Tax Code distinguishes between 2 categories of taxpayers, namely resident and non-resident taxpayers individuals.

A resident individual is any individual fulfilling at least one of the following conditions:

a) is domiciled in Romania;
b) the center of the person's vital interests is located in Romania;
c) it is present in Romania for a period or periods exceeding in the aggregate 183 days during any 12 consecutive months ending in the fiscal year concerned;
d) is a Romanian citizen who works abroad as an official or employee of Romania in a foreign state.

A non-resident individual is one who does not meet the above conditions, as well as any individual with foreign citizenship and diplomatic or consular status in Romania, or a foreign citizen who is an official or employee of an international and intergovernmental body registered in Romania or a foreign citizen who is official or employee of a foreign state in Romania and their family members.

As regards the scope of income tax, resident Romanians individuals domiciled in Romania owe income tax from any source, both in Romania and abroad.

In the case of non-resident individuals, they owe, as appropriate, income tax, as follows:

- self-employed through a permanent establishment in Romania for the net income attributable to the permanent establishment.
- in the case of residents who are dependent in Romania, they owe tax on the salary income from this activity. Dependent activity is any activity carried out by an individual in an income-generating employment relationship.
- in the case of non-residents who earn income from other categories of activity (CPF Article 129), they are subject to income tax determined according to the rules corresponding to the respective income category (from investments, goods recovery, etc.).

Non-residents who become residents in Romania owe income tax on income earned both in Romania and abroad, from the date they became residents, except for those who benefit from possible double taxation conventions on the basis of agreements Romania has with other states. Residents of countries with whom Romania has concluded Double Taxation Conventions have to prove their tax residency by a certificate issued by the tax authority of the foreign state or another authority with powers in the field of residence certification.

Law no. 8/1996, in article 150 (2), as we have seen, only refers to „the amounts due to the authors as a result of the use of their works" and it is understood that they may be residents or non-residents. Taxpayers to income incurred from exploitation of intellectual property rights are not only the authors of works that are natural persons, in this category of taxpayers is falling besides the authors, their successors in rights, who are secondary subjects and who can be both natural persons or legal entities such as assignees, licensees, individuals authorized to use the works without the consent of the rights holders, employers of the authors, copyright holders of collective works. Obviously, in the case of legal entities, they will be liable to corporate income tax, but this tax is not subject to this article.

Micro-enterprises (creators may also organize themselves in an enterprise with this status) who are liable to income tax, for the case where they derive income from the exploitation of intellectual property rights, pay their tax pursuant to the taxable base determined according to article 53 of the Tax Code, without benefiting from regulated deductions for authors' earnings, the advantage of a 40% flat-rate personal income deduction from gross income cannot be cumulated with the benefits of establishing the taxable base for micro-enterprises by derogating rules and applicable only to this category of taxpayers. If the authors establish a micro-enterprise and exploit their rights through the established micro-enterprise, the authors, natural persons, cannot benefit from the personal lump-sum deductions, which are due to them in the nature of the dividends, not the revenues referred to in article 70 of the Tax Code.

9. The subjects of taxation in cases of copyright

According to tax laws, subjects of taxation are natural or legal persons or any other entity without legal personality to whom the law has imposed the obligation to pay a tax, a fee or other obligation to make a certain levy to the national public budget (into the account of the state budget, state social security budget, etc.). The law establishes payment obligations for all those who are tied to the state of income / profit.

At first sight, subjects of taxation, namely the taxpayers are all authors of works.

In reality, things must be nuanced; because authors do not always own the patrimonial rights of the author, not always that the authors of the works exploit or are able to exploit their work and the authors do not always make their income from the creative work done.

However, the position as taxpayer is conditional on income, not as author of works. A painting, for example, is the result of the creative work of the plastic artist, but the artist becomes a taxpayer only if, by selling his/her painting, displaying it in exhibitions, authorizing reproduction, etc., he/she earns income.

And in the context, it should be remembered that for the plastic artist the sums collected as a resale royalty are also considered revenues, although in this case the author – the plastic artist is the one who re-exploits the work.

Independent author

The author who exercises the moral right to bring the work to public knowledge and exclusive patrimonial right to decide whether, how and when his/her work will be used, including consenting to the use of the work by others, whether it earns income, regardless of the manner of use (those referred to in Article 13 of Law No. 8/1996 or others not listed by law) of his/her work. In the absence of the exercise of the rights to divulging and use the work, although the work exists, the author has only a virtual patrimonial right and this is not taxable. A tax obligation falls under the duty of the author of the work only when he/she, by exercising his/her right of divulging and the right to use the work with patrimonial consequences, derives income.

We note that under the common law, the owner of a good is a taxpayer regardless of the fact that the good (for example, an agricultural land, a construction, a motor vehicle, etc.) provides an income or not. It is the consequence of the exclusive nature of copyright and which also proves to be opposable to tax authorities, which cannot bind the author to divulging the work or to exploit it to obtain revenue, nor the price for which the use of the work may be authorized by the author.

If the author doing the work on his own (the independent author), the issue of taxation seems simple, for common and collective works, things are different.

The authors of common works

In the case of joint works, of works carried out in collaboration (art. 5 of Law no 8/1996), the use of the work shall entitle each co-author to remuneration in the agreed proportion, and in the absence of a convention, in proportion to the contribution parties or equally if the parties cannot be established. Obviously, each co-author is entitled to the deduction governed by the tax law in order to determine then the taxable income.

In the case of collective works (Article 6 of Law No. 8/1996), the law provides that „copyright" belongs to the individual or legal entity on the initiative, under the responsibility and under whose name it was created. The „copyright" to which the law refers should be understood here as the patrimonial rights (it is questionable in the copyright to which the moral rights belong to collective works[41]), but the status of taxpayer can have two categories, namely:

Authors of collective work for payments made to them by the initiator of the work and whether such payments have been made. But these would be copyrights, and the law provides that copyrights in collective works belong to people other than authors. Thus, the originator of a collective work may be a co-author, but this is not mandatory, and sometimes it is also impossible, as is the case with the legal entity initiator;

The copyright holder, respectively, the individual or legal entity on the initiative, under the responsibility and under whose name the work was created. In this case, it is a question of whether or not the copyright owner of the collective work is entitled to a deduction of 40%, considered to be deductible expense from gross income, the tax owed to the net income thus established (Article 70 of the Fiscal Code) . The deductible amount is, however, considered as an expense for the realization of the work, and this expenditure may also be incurred by the originator, so it should also be deductible for him. This means, however, that regardless of the remuneration paid by the originator to the authors, only an amount equivalent to 40% of the gross income can be deducted from the gross income, the difference being taxable income.

The authors employed

In the case of authors employed who are employed on the basis of an individual labour contract with a creative assignment (we exclude those who do software programs who have a regime of favour, as we will see later) for which the contract stipulates that the patrimonial rights of the author (those who are interested in the fiscal aspect) belong to the employer, the authors of the works are not subject to taxation when the works are capitalized by the employer. They can become taxpayers only if they become holders of patrimonial rights on their creation as employees upon expiry of the terms provided by article 44 of the Law no 8/1996 and which is three years for the hypothesis of not having entered into the contract. The creation made by them is taxable matter in the employer's hand and to the extent that it is valued and produces income, this being the one to be taxed. The authors of the work on which the rights belong, according to the individual employment contract, to the employer; can not claim from the employer any payments other than those agreed upon. He can not benefit from the deduction of 40% of gross income for two reasons: the first is that the rights of the employer can not be redeemed by the employee who has given up his employer's rights. The second is that for the work done as an employee, he receives salary from his employer.

The author employee with a creative assignment may become the copyright holder at the end of the term for which, according to the contract, the rights are transferred (is the term used in Article 44 (2) of Law No 8/1996) or, if the term is not foreseen, on the expiry of a three-year period counted from the date of the surrender of the work.

The question is whether in this case the employee also benefits from the 40% flat-rate deduction. The argument against deduction is that the work was carried out in the performance of the service duties, respectively the creative assignment with which he was employed and for which he was paid by the employer. In fact, Article 44 (3) of the Law no. 8/1996 stipulates that upon expiration of the term for which the work is deemed to have been assigned to the employer, it is „entitled to claim to the author a reasonable royalty of the proceeds from the use of his work to compensate for the costs incurred by the employer for the creation of the work by the employee, within the scope of the service duties „.

The argument in favour of the right to benefit from this deduction is the silence of the law, the lack of the law of any exception to this effect in art. 70 of the Tax Code, which, in par. 2) governs three exceptions (only) from the right of deduction: in the case of heirs, the remuneration of the flat-rate and the compensatory remuneration for the private copy not benefiting from the deduction of the flat-rate in establishing the taxable income but of the amounts due to the collective management or other payers of such income. Another argument is added to it: in the previous regulation, in art. 57 of GD no. 44/2004, it was stipulated that the share of flat-rate expenses is not granted if the individuals use the material basis of the copyright beneficiary „„ while the Methodological Norms for the application of the current Tax Code, in Title IV, II, Section 4, paragraph 9, no longer contains such a provision. It is, moreover, evident that the previous Methodological Norms, by the quoted provision added to the law.

The authors of works devoid of originality

Apparently, the question of the originality of the works should be of no interest to the Tax Authorities. From the point of view of the Tax Authorities, since an author has done a work and claims copyright, and the author capitalizing on his work has earned income and paid the taxes due, the question of originality should be indifferent to the Tax Authorities. This is all the more so since, according to art. 14 of the Procedure Tax Code, income is subject to tax legislation, regardless of whether it is obtained from acts or deeds that meet or fail to meet the requirements of other legal provisions. In this case, this is the condition of originality!

The Tax Authorities is and must be interested in the issue of originality, because only the original works are protected and only in their case, the original works, on the occasion of exploitation, the deductions provided by art. 70 of the Tax Code and which, for the benefit of them, the author does not have to prove them. If the „work" does not fulfil the condition of originality, the income earned on it will be taxed, but when determining the net income, the expenses incurred and proven by the subject of taxation will be deducted for deduction. In other words, these „works" will be subject to deductions from the common law regime. The issue is not only of theoretical importance since the Tax Code defines copyright in art. 7.13 with express reference to the original works of intellectual creation, and the regime of favor is determined by the belonging to the category of original works protected by copyright, to the works of intellectual creation.

However, the Tax Code has a contribution to the originality of some works, following, unbelievingly, the French model. Thus, article 312 of the Tax Code, regulating the regime of second-hand goods, works of art and antiquities (governed by Title VII - Value Added Tax, Chapter XII - Special Conditions) establishes a special regime for certain categories of works of art subject to of trade. The text reminds the original of some plastic works made personally by the artist (paintings, collages, plaques, paintings and drawings, engravings, stamps, individual pieces of ceramics, statuary art or sculpture, but in the case of the last two and copies made by another artist than the author). In the case of tapestries, special arrangements are allowed for pieces made according to original models, provided that there are no more than 8 copies. In the case of copper enamels, specially executed pieces are manually executed in a maximum of 8 numbered copies and in the case of photographs a number of 30 signed and numbered by the photographer. And as you can see, there is a lack of concern about the original qualifications of works of fine art, which is in contradiction with the regulation in Directive 84/27 / the right of suite, which states that it reaffirms the principle of originality for bad plastic art works*" limited in number even by or under the guidance of the artist ... numbered, duly signed or duly authorized by the author ".*

The minor and under restriction authors

In copyright, the question is whether minors, discerners and forbidden persons have the quality of authors when they perform works in the sense of copyright law, but also that of works of no originality.

John Locke made a distinction between artisans and geniuses, and considered that special copyright protection should only be recognized for those who produce something essentially new, immaterial wealth that does not exist to them, minor authors (in the sense of worthless) who merely repeat endlessly what they exist, they and their work being deprived of sparkle that gives glow, so that the works of the latter should be subject to the common law regime. As far as minors and discerners are concerned, their quality is protected by the special laws in as much as it can not be proved that the work is the result of an act of intellectual creation made with the will to create, to make a contribution new to what exists, to alter the reality existing by its realization.

Our law does not operate on such criteria; on the contrary, it protects the works without subordinating the protection of any valuable condition. The only condition for the protection of works by copyright is originality, but this criterion is also relative and subjective. However, the abandonment of the criterion of originality is not possible.

Recently, there is also a discussion of the work done by animals, but it is difficult for them to admit that they could be protected by copyright.

Unknown authors (non-transparent and anonymous pseudonym)

The use of the work under anonymous or pseudonymous conditions does not raise tax issues, the author having the obligation to declare his income and the Tax Authorities to preserve the confidentiality of the information in his possession. The less so it does not raise the problem with the transparent pseudonym. The obligation to declare income for tax purposes is a general obligation for all income generators and if the anonymity or pseudonym is the process of avoiding tax liabilities, then the act would constitute the tax evasion offense.

Authors who make the work available to the public free of charge

There are also the category of creators who make their work available to the public free of charge. If they do not earn income, they will not have the status of taxpayers, because in copyright the owner of the patrimonial right over the created object (the work) does not give you tax obligations. Copyright derives from the fact of creation, the quality of a taxpayer in the valorisation of intellectual creation. In other words, the quality of the taxpayer is conditioned not by the realization of the object upon which the patrimonial right, the creation is exercised, but the realization of the incomes from the exploitation of the intellectual creation.

The law does not prohibit or can not prohibit the release of the work to the public free of charge, it can not prohibit the transfer of the patrimonial rights of the author free of charge, it can not intervene in establishing the price of the assignment or the license. But we do not believe that it is possible to exclude the tax authority's discretion, the right to decide whether acts and deeds of the ceding author express the reality, are not manifestations of bad faith, evasion of tax obligations.

The principle of freedom of management, applicable equally to natural and legal persons and obviously to all holders of intellectual property rights, implies that:

Taxpayers have the right to refuse to make taxable items (intellectual creation works in our case) to obtain income or taxable profit, dispose of their goods in the exercise of their right to dispose of, or to free the goods free of charge, to destroy them , abandon them, do bad business[42]. However, exceptions to this rule. It is the case of the falsifiers who can not alienate their goods free of charge (but which, in view of the moral right of disclosure, can not be forced to sell their works or to sell their works.) The moral right of the authors of works has, as is the case he does not make public his work, who does not reveal the created work, he is the author of the work, but he does not make any income and can not be taxed. And for no reason the author of the work can not be forced to make the work known to the public. He can not be forced to make income from the exploitation of his work. He can not be subjected to enforced execution by exploiting his patrimonial rights to his undisclosed work.

Taxpayers have the right to choose the path that generates the lowest tax burden. In the recent French doctrine it is stated that „if paying taxes is an honourable obligation, the good father and the good manager also have the duty to pay the lowest possible tax to choose the least taxable way[43]," and that „paying the highest taxes may be for some proof of holiness or heroism, but most will be convinced that it is rather a proof of foolishness and in no way a father's model of family worthy to follow[44]. „. But that was also the case two centuries ago in England, Adam Smith, whose arguments will be resumed and developed by US Supreme Court judges in a famous tax law ruling in 1935 (Helvering v. Gregory).

Taxpayers have the right, unconcerned by state authorities, to make mistakes, to do business or bad investments, to dispose of their money without profit and to oppose their decisions to the tax administration.

Authors with disabilities

In accordance with article 60 of the Tax Code are exempted from paying the income tax the individuals with serious or severe disabilities for the income from independent activities, realized individually or in a form of association.

The creator successors

Whether they are through acts between the living or the cause of death, they are secondary subjects of copyright and will be subject to taxation under the conditions of common law. There are, however, two derogatory rules.

a) First, the limited duration of their rights, which is 70 years from the date of copyright authors' death, a rule that knows some exceptions. Thus, in the case of works made known under the pseudonym (non-transparent) or without an indication of the author (anonymous), the duration of the rights is 70 years from the date of publication of the work, so that only within this time the heirs will enjoy the rights conferred by their authors. Otherwise, the fact that works are published under pseudonym or namelessly affects the rights of heirs only to the extent that they can not exercise moral rights whose exercise is not transmitted, including the right to name.

In the case of equivalent rights (Article 25 (2) of Law No 8/1996, the duration of the rights is 25 years, to the heirs of the holders of equivalent rights, which are transferred within the limit of this period.

For holders of related rights, the duration of the patrimonial rights is 50 or 70 days from the date of the performance or execution, and the fixation of its execution and publication (Article 102 et seq. Of Law No 8/1996) that the holders of related rights do not enjoy patrimonial rights for their performances and interpretations throughout their lives.

b) The second is the deduction from the gross income due to the heirs of the amounts due to the collective management bodies or other payers of such income. Whether the heir carries on his own rights to creations by his author or through a management body or other entity, the heirs do not have the right to a flat personal deduction (40%).

The tax payer

Tax laws have also introduced the „payer" institution, a person who acts on behalf of the taxpayer, but is subject to the same regime as the taxpayer, although he is not the tax payer. The payer is defined in art. 1.35 of the Code of Tax Procedure as „the person who, in the name of the taxpayer, is required by law to pay or to withhold and pay or to collect and pay, as the case may be, taxes, social contributions and taxes. It is also a payer and the secondary establishment forced, according to the law, to register as a payer of wages and salary income. „Examples of the payer: the publisher who holds the income tax at source and pays it to the budget on behalf of the author, or the secondary headquarters of a foreign production house in Romania. As regards the assimilation of the payer with the taxpayer, it follows from a numerous texts of the Tax Procedure Code, in which the terms „taxpayer" and „payer" are associated, a procedure used to exclude any doubt as to the regime to which they are subject.

Collective management bodies as „successors" of the authors without heirs

According to article 25 of Law no 8/1996, if there are no heirs, the exercise of patrimonial rights rests with the collective management body mandated during the lifetime by the author or, in the absence of a mandate, the collective management body with the largest number of members in the respective field of creation.

For this hypothesis we identified the following issues:

a) Collective management bodies exercise patrimonial rights in the absence of heirs, so they are not the rights holders. Who are the rights holders in this case? Who are the beneficiaries of the proceeds from the exploitation of patrimonial rights by the authorizing bodies? We should say that the members of the management body, but the beneficiaries should be indicated by law.
b) Exercising patrimonial rights and earning income from the valorisation of intellectual creations, who owes tax? The answer is that the people to whom the amounts thus obtained are distributed, not the collective management body (of course, we take into account the hypothesis of the lawful body that allocates these amounts to its members).

c) If the rights are exercised by a body other than that designated by the deceased author or by the body with the largest number of members in the respective field of creation, the amounts are distributed to the members of this body or to all creators or to all creators from the respective creative field? Equity tells us that the amounts should benefit all creators, but the problem needs to be resolved by law.

Related rights holders

Taxation of the income of the holders of related rights (performers, interpreters or executors, producers of sound recordings and producers of audiovisual recordings for their own recordings and broadcasters for their own programs and programs services) is above any right of appeal, only that individuals right holders are income tax payers, and corporate rights holders are corporation tax payers, so that it is impossible for them to apply their flat-rate deduction provisions of 40 % benefiting only income tax payers.

Individual related rights holders will benefit from a flat-rate deduction? Article 70 of the Tax Code refers to a deduction of 40% of gross income in order to establish the taxable income without distinguishing between the quality of the holder and art. 67 paragraph (3) of the Tax Code provides that „the proceeds of the exploitation in any way of intellectual property rights are derived from copyrights and rights related to copyright, patents, designs, trademarks and geographical indications, topographies for products semiconductors and the like „. Hence, the conclusion is that when the owner of the intellectual property right is an individual and he obtain income from the exercise of his rights, he will be taxed under the „benefit" scheme by receiving a flat-rate deduction of 40% of the gross income in establishing taxable income.

In the case of original databases (referred to in Article 8 letter b) of Law no 8/1996), which are copyrighted, they will be subject to the tax regime for copyrighted creations. And because the law does not distinguish, they will also benefit from a flat-rate deduction of 40% of gross incomes when determining taxable income. The duration of their protection is that provided in article 25 (the author's life plus 70 years for heirs). As the law does not regulate collective management in the case of databases, the collective management bodies will not be able to exercise the rights of the holders - authors if they have no heirs. For these databases, it is possible to choose the protection system as the holder can choose for the cumulative protection (copyright and / or sui-generis right).

Regarding the databases for which the Law no. 8/1996 regulates a sui-generis right (Articles 1221-1224), respectively, for databases which do not fulfil the condition of originality but represent databases according to the second sentence of art. 1221 paragraph 2 (2), i.e. those not protected by copyright, the duration of the rights of the manufacturers of databases shall be 15 years from January 1st of the year following its completion, substantial changes, quantitative and qualitative evaluation of the contents of the database data for which a new investment can be considered as allowing it to be assigned a lifetime protection period to the database resulting from this investment. However, this time can be invoked, according to the above-mentioned text, and by the originators of the database producers, when the manufacturer has an interest in doing so.

In accordance with article 7.13 of the Tax Code, the sui-generis rights (which protect the databases) belong to the large category of copyright (the law is not happy, but it is understood that their object is represented by the databases). Article 70 of the Tax Code (which also has an unfortunate wording) however regulates the determination of the income from intellectual property rights, which, as we know, includes industrial property rights, and the text we do not believe it can be restrictively interpreted, as referring only to copyright, related rights and sui-generis rights, although there are arguments in favour of this interpretation, in particular Art. 7.13 of the Tax Code which refers only to the rights regulated by Law no. 8/1996, and not those regulated by industrial property laws.

Of course, to benefit for a 40% deduction, the database maker must be a payer of income tax – an individual (we have seen that in the case of micro-enterprises, although they pay income tax, the deduction provided for authors-natural persons does not apply for them)

Persons exempt from the payment of income tax

Of those exempt from income tax, according to article 60 of the Tax Code are interested in the following:

serious or severe disabled individuals for the income obtained from self-employment or in a form of association (co-author of a work);

Individuals, for the income from salary income and assimilated to the salaries stipulated in art. 76 par. (1) to (3) as a result of the software development;

Individuals, for salary income and assimilated to salaries under art. 76 par. (1) - (3) as a result of carrying out the research-development and innovation activity defined according to GO no. 57/2002 regarding the scientific research and technological development, if cumulatively a number of three conditions established by art. 60 (3) of the Tax Code (applies to all persons included in the project team, within the limits of the expenditure allocated to the project and by drawing up separate payment states for each project).

The case of people working for software deserves a wider discussion.

According to article 60 of the Tax Code, individuals who earn income from salaries and assimilated to salaries, as a result of carrying out the activity of creating software do not owe income tax. This exemption is granted to Romanian citizens and citizens of the European Union Member States, the European Economic Area and the Swiss Confederation, whose diplomas are equivalent, through the specialized structures of the Ministry of National Education and Scientific Research, with the diploma awarded after the completion of a long- duration or diploma awarded after the completion of the first cycle of undergraduate studies (Article 1 (4) of the Joint Order referred to below). The text is impossible to interpret, with the benefit only of persons who earn salary income or assimilated to them. Consequently, if the program right belongs to the individual's author (either because he did it independently or under the clause in the employment contract, according to Article 74 of Law No 8/1996), the author is considered to earning the income from independent activities and consequently he will pay the taxes as a copyright owner, but once again is raised the problem of the 40% flat-rate deduction (referred to above).

The framing in the software activity is done by joint order of the Ministers of Communications, Education, Labour and Public Finance of the Work, Family, Social Protection and the Elderly, the Minister of Communications and Information Society, the Minister of National Education and Scientific Research and of the Minister of Public Finance[45].

The Tax Code contradicts its self regarding the software programs and fees for them, because on the one hand, they are naturally considered works and protected by copyright and includes them in the definition of royalties in art. 257 and article 7.36 par. 1) lit. c) And, on the other hand, by art. 7.36 par. 2) lit. b) And c*) considers that the payments made for software purchases intended to operate the program (i.e. use, n.a.) and those made for the full purchase of a copyrighted software or a limited right to copy it solely for the purpose of its use to the user is not royalties.*

Without denying the need for tax incentives to encourage important activities and the need to align with the practice of other states, we appreciate that the tax exemption provided by art. 60 of the Tax Code for the category of employees creating software programs seriously violate the principles of universality and equality in taxation.

10. Collective management and taxation of collectively managed rights

Both living authors and their successors can collectively manage copyrights and related rights. Collective management is, as a rule, optional. However, in cases expressly stipulated by law, collective management is mandatory and, when mandatory, is even a prerequisite for the exercise of rights for which the law imposes such a management mode. In other words, the patrimonial right of the author or the related right for which the law has instituted compulsory collective management can not be exercised individually, although the right is still individual. Independent whether collective management is optional or mandatory and regardless of whether a mandate contract has been concluded between the authors and the collective management body, the management body is a trustee of the authors, not a commissioner, even if the law stipulates that the body is entitled to commission for the activity which he submits.

The problem with these collective management bodies is whether they owe income tax and indirect taxes - VAT

If a collective management body is a legal entity and is a transparent tax entity[46] within the meaning of Art. 7 point 14 of the Tax Code, then according to art. 13 par. 1) lit. a) And art. 2 lit. j) of the Tax Code, the collective management body is not a corporate taxpayer, each owner of patrimonial rights of the author being distinctly taxed on the income he realizes.

The transparent tax entity, as defined in article 7, item 14) of the Tax Code is „any association, joint venture, joint venture associations, economic interest group, civil society or other entity that is not a distinct taxable person, each associate / participant subject to taxation in the sense of profit or income tax, as the case may be „.

According to article 58 and 59 of the Fiscal Code, are taxpayers and owe income tax the Romanian individuals resident , with the residence in Romania for the income obtained from any source in Romania and abroad, as well as non-resident individuals who are self-employed through a head office, are taxpayers and are liable to income tax permanently in Romania for the income attributable to the permanent establishment.

In the case of income earned abroad, taxpayers (whether residents or non-residents for the latter, but only if the income is earned through a permanent establishment in Romania), are obliged to declare them by May 25th of the year following that to achieve the income, the tax body issuing the taxing decision.

In turn, art. 67 of the Tax Code (Article 64 letter a of the Tax Code) provides that „the income from independent activities includes income from [45] The Order regarding the creation of software programs is issued by: Ministry of Communications and Information Society Nr. 409 of May 11th 2017, Ministry of National Education Nr. 4020 of June 6th , 2017, Ministry of Labour and Social Justice Nr. 737 of May 24th , 2017, Ministry of Public Finance Nr. 703 of May 16th , 2017 and was published in M. Of. no 468 of June 22nd 2017.

[46] The transparent tax entity may be an entity with or without legal personality. In the case of collective management bodies, Law no 8/1996, by art. 124, requires them to be associations with legal personality.

production, trade, services, income from liberal professions and income from intellectual property rights, realized individually and / or in a form of association, including related activities „ and that „ the proceeds of the exploitation in any form of intellectual property rights in any way arise from copyrights and rights related to copyright, patents, designs and designs, trademarks and geographical indications, topographies of semiconductor products and the like. „

It follows that in the case of transparent tax management bodies, they are not corporate tax payers, and income tax is due to the rights holders who actually make the income.

The solution imposing individual right holders administering their collective property rights is correct and if we consider the nature of civil legal relationship between the collective management body and the owner of the copyright or related rights, as regulated at this time in our right and for the legal form of the current organization of these management bodies in Romania[47]. This is because the collective management body is only a trustee of the copyright holder or related rights. Moreover, in the case of compulsory collective management, these bodies also represent holders of rights which have not given them a mandate (Article 123 paragraph 2) of Law no. 8/1996), in the latter case, we believe, in the presence of a legal mandate. However, as article 130 par. 1) lit. c) of Law no. 8/1996, the trustee concludes the legal acts on behalf of the rights holders, therefore on behalf of the principal, not on his behalf, so that the rights and obligations arising from the contract concluded by the trustee with third parties belong to the principal and, the third parties, respectively. The trustee must manage these rights and obligations that are assumed through the license to use the work (the right) under the concluded contract. Therefore, the amounts attributable to the principal in the distribution made by the collective management body that has the status of a trustee belong to the tenant, the collective management body (the trustee) having the right to its remuneration („commission", according to the Law No. 8/1996).

Unlike the mandate contract in which the trustee concludes contracts in the name and on behalf of the principal, the commission contract has as its object the conclusion of legal acts on its own behalf but on behalf of the principal. What distinguishes the mandate contract from the commission contract is that in the case of the mandate contract the representation is direct, while in the case of the commission the representation is indirect, even if it is sometimes stated that in the case of the commission contract we have to do with a mandate without representation. The commissioner's duty is to „do", not „give," the commissioner being a service provider.

10.1. Who is the „payer" of the income tax in the case of the amounts collected by the collecting management bodies in Romanian law?

Two issues that arise in relation to the person who holds and pays the anticipated tax: the first is the payment made by the user directly to the rights holder and the second the distribution of the amounts collected by the collective management body from the users and those obliged to pay the compensatory (fair) remuneration.

In the first case (the income is paid by the user directly to the right holder) there is no doubt: the user is the one paying the rightful remuneration to the right holder, he will withhold the amount due in anticipation (10% of the paid income) that will pay it to the budget. Subsequently, the right holder will make the annual tax statement, deduct (if he is entitled, the successors do not have the right to deduct) the flat tax rate of the total income, meaning 40% of the gross income, and pay the tax difference up to 16% net income. For example, a user has to pay to a right holder the amount of 100,000 lei. He will withhold 10% of the anticipated withholding tax and will pay the amount of 10,000 lei to the budget and to the holder the amount of 90,000 lei. The holder will draw up the final tax statement and will deduct 40% of the gross income, on the difference of 60,000 lei, will calculate the tax difference of 6%, meaning 3,600 lei representing the difference of tax payable. In this case, the holder of the right will pay in the amount of 13,600 lei.

The right holder may, however, agree with the user to pay the final tax of 16% on the payment of rights on the entire income, in which case the user will withhold and pay to the budget the sum of 16,000 lei.

In the second case, when the user pays the amounts due to the right holder of a collective management body, things are more complicated, the managing bodies being considered as income payers and having the withholding tax on income tax (for the anticipated payments, i.e. for 10% of the right holders' income) and to pay it to the budget, but the solution seems questionable to us.

Thus, according to art 72 of the Tax Code, for the income from intellectual property rights, the payers of the income, the legal entities or other entities that have the obligation to keep accounting records are also obliged to calculate, to withhold and to pay the tax corresponding to the amounts paid by detention at source, representing early payments, of the paid income.

The tax to be withheld is determined by applying the 10% tax rate to the gross income. The withholding tax shall be paid to the state budget until the 25th of the month following that in which the income was paid. Early payer presented are not required to calculate, withhold and pay the prepayment tax on earned income if they make payments to non-legal partnerships (joint ventures) as well as to entities with legal personality who organize and conduct its' own accounting, according to the law, for which the payment of income tax is made by each associate, for his own income.

[47] Implementation of the Directive no. 2006/115 of December 12th , 2001 on rental and lending right and certain rights related to copyright in the field of intellectual property could bring about amendments to Law no 8/1996, which makes possible the functioning of other forms of collective management bodies, not only of the type of transparent fiscal ones.

The latter appears to be, according to the tax law, the situation of the collective management bodies. For example: a user, a legal entity (a television company), submits to the collecting management body the amounts owed for the use of works. In this case, the user (the television company) will not withhold the 10% income tax on the amounts paid and the anticipated tax retention and payment (the 10% of the gross income) to be made by the collective management body. However, collective management bodies are not „income-paying" for the purposes of either common law or copyright law, and the qualification of collecting management bodies operating in our country at this date (March 31st, 2016) as „payers of income" right holders are wrong. This is because the Law no. 8/1996 clearly distinguishes between the payments to be made by the users of works (to the right holders or their agents - collective management bodies or other mandates) and the allocation of the amounts collected by the collecting management bodies to the right-holders (beneficiaries). Thus, article 130 lit. a) and lit. e) of Law no. 8/1996, stipulate, among the obligations of the collective management bodies:

- the obligation to develop methodologies for their fields of activity, including appropriate patrimonial rights, to be negotiated with users for the payment of these rights (by users), in the case of those works whose exploitation makes it impossible for individual holders rights (Article 130 letter a), and here is the mandatory collective management when the bodies act even on behalf of those who have not expressly given them a mandate;
- the obligation to collect the amounts owed by users and to allocate them among the right holders, according to the statutes.

Or to allocate funds collected by right holders does not constitute payment of income, such payment being made by users when management body is only a trustee of the holders rights in the name and on behalf of rights holders and not the collective management body.Of course, it would be otherwise if the collective management body were not a transparent tax entity and would have the legal form of a company with that object of activity when the company would act on its behalf and on its own, contracts for the use of works entrusted by right holders.

Of course, it would be otherwise if the collective management body were not be a transparent tax entity and would have the legal form of a company with that object of activity when the company would act on its behalf and on its own, contracts for the use of works entrusted by right holders.

The solution to this problem is important in cases where right holders have to collect revenues for the use of works in other countries, but also if non-resident rights holders have to pay remuneration for the use of their works in Romania because it can generate either double-taxation or non-taxable income. For example, foreign users would remit to collecting societies the amounts due for the use of works withholding tax on income on the occasion of the „payment" made to the revenue collecting body. That (foreign) body must remit the amounts received to the correspondent body in Romania, which in turn should distribute the sums to the right holders, but also withholding the tax. The reverse of this situation: a foreigner has to collect money from a user from Romania, between himself and the user interposing the management body in his country and the corresponding body in Romania. The amount of money will be remitted to the Romanian body which will also remit it to the corresponding body in the foreign country and will remit it because according to art. 72 par. 4) of the Tax Code, by making the payment to another legal person, can not withhold the income tax due to the author.

It should be noted that for those situations where income concerns residents and their income in Romania, which has to pay the tax in Romania, the problem is of importance only in terms of the (apparent) comfort it creates to the holder of the right to pay the tax by the collective management body. But also in this situation, the right holder has to complete the income statement and the final payment of the tax, because the managing body can only pay the anticipated income tax and within the limit of 10% of the tax due, pay the difference of 6% applied to the net income (i.e. after deducting the 40% flat rate tax to which the author, not other holders) is entitled, is made by the author.

10.2. Relevance of the form of organization in terms of VAT payment

The value added tax is, I recall, an indirect tax „invented" by a French engineer and jurist, Maurice Lauré, whom the author also regretted that he invented. This tax is borne by the final consumer of the product or service, the price of which is in fact included and which the collector body (the seller of the product, the service provider) pays to the budget. It is collected in cascade by each economic agent who participates in the economic cycle of making a product or providing a service that falls within the scope of taxation. After exercising the right of deduction, the taxable economic agents who participated in the economic cycle pay the VAT balance to the state budget. Commonly, the ratio of tax law (which is more complicated in the case of indirect taxes) is established between participants' successive cycle of production and service providers and consumer tax, on the one hand, and between these companies and state of the other. As it results from its name, VAT applies to the value added by economic agents. And the first point to make is that management bodies, as they do work now, are not economic agents and do not add value to a product that does not belong to them, the copyright law is clear in the sense that collective management bodies they are not rights transferees, and their proceeds are not their income but their copyright holders.

The issue is to know whether the collective management bodies, in the legal form in which they are currently regulated and operated under Romanian law according to the law of copyright, corroborated with the provisions of the Tax Code, are legally payable of VAT, respectively, if they are taxable persons (VAT) within the meaning of Article 269 of the Tax Code. Adjacent to this is the question of how intellectual creation work and valorisation of intellectual creativity are qualified.

The Tax Code, defining in art. 269, taxable persons (with VAT), dispose that any person who carries out in an independent manner and irrespective of place, economic activities, whatever the purpose or the result of such activity, is taxable person, including services and exploitation of tangible and intangible assets for the purpose of obtaining income with a continuity character.

As regards the transactions covered by the VAT, Article 270 of the Tax Code considers delivery of goods the transfer of the right to dispose of goods as owner, and art. 271 of the same code consider service rendering any operation that does not constitute delivery of goods.

11. Conclusions

How (ever) the transfer of rights to intellectual creation does not confer on the transferee the right to dispose of the work as a landlord (I have said: fallen in the public domain, the work remains the author and no one can approach it. Aristotle's work belongs to him, Picasso's paintings, even in a certain mood of other people belong to him, the musical works of G. Enescu belong to him and no one can get them and he can not have the works of others) it results from a fiscal point of view that all transactions in the transfer of rights of use for works must be regarded as supplies of services.

The solution is expressly stated in Art. 271 par. 3 lit. (b) of the Tax Code, which provides that is considered supply of services any transaction which does not constitute the supply of goods, including the transfer of intangible assets, whether or not the subject of a property right, such as: the transfer and / or assignment of copyrights, patents, licenses, trademarks, and other similar rights. It is noteworthy, however, that our Tax Code sometimes treats some works of art as assets that can be disposed of as an owner (see Article 312 of the Tax Code, special schemes for second-hand goods, works of art, collectibles and antiques).

Directive no. 2006/115 of December 12th, 2001 on rental and lending right and certain rights related to copyright in the field of intellectual property, by recital (6), stating that creative, artistic and entrepreneurial activities are largely carried out by independent persons and considering that the exercise of these activities must be facilitated by ensuring legally harmonized protection within the Community, considers that these activities, are mainly, services.

Or collecting management bodies, in the legal form in which they are governed and operates in Romania at this time, not forward and does not deliver goods that the transferees can dispose of as the owners and shall not assign themselves rights in works and not exploit them in fact, the works of intellectual creation (intangible assets), nor can they do so, and the amounts received by these bodies are not and can not be assimilated to their income.

This conclusion is also supported by Law no 8/1996, which states, among others, that:

- Collective management bodies are directly created by copyright holders or related rights, individuals or legal entities, and act within the limits of the mandate entrusted to them (Article 125 (2));
- the collective management mandate of property rights, copyright or related rights, is granted directly by written contract by the right holders (Article 129 paragraph 1);
- the exercise of collective management entrusted by the mandate contract can not in any way restrict the patrimonial rights of the holders (Article 134);
- the remuneration received by the collecting management bodies are not and can not be assimilated to their income (Article 134 (3));
- the collective management bodies may not have the purpose of using the protected repertoire for which they have received a collective management mandate (Article 129 (5));
- the management bodies have the obligation to authorize users of works, by non-exclusive license, in written form to use the protected repertoire (the works entrusted by the authors) in exchange for remuneration, to collect the amounts owed by users and to distribute them among the rights holders (Article 130);
- the amounts resulting from the placement of unclaimed and unpaid remunerations, in bank deposits or from other transactions carried out within the scope of the object of activity, as well as those obtained as damages or damages as a result of copyright infringement or related violations, are attributed and distributed to rights holders and can not constitute income of the collective management body (Article 134 (f));
- in the exercise of the mandate concluded with the holders of rights to the collective management bodies, no copyright or related rights or their use (Article 134 paragraph 4) shall be transmitted.

It cannot be considered that the collective management bodies (as they are organized and operate now in Romania) would be in the hypothesis regulated by article 271 par. (2) of the Tax Code (which provides that „when a taxable individual is acting in its own name, but on behalf of another person it becomes part of provision of services, it is deemed to have received and provided the services itself" because the essence of the mandate contract is to conclude acts in the name of the rights holder who mandated him and on behalf of the trustee, so not in its own name, article 271 paragraph 2) confers the status of taxable person (with VAT) to the person acting in its own name and for the account of another person.

It follows that the collecting societies do not deliver goods that the transferee can dispose of as an owner, do not provide services within the meaning of the Tax Code and can not be considered to act in their own name and for other persons account because under the mandate contract he acts in the name and on the name of the rights holder, so that in the form in which the collective management bodies are regulated and operating in Romania, they can not be taxable persons with VAT. Quality of VAT payers may have only authors, as far as creative operates independently and on a continuing basis and exploit their creations for the purpose of obtaining income on a continuing basis[48].

Another legal form of these collective management bodies, compliant and possible with the forms stipulated by the Directive (EU) No 26/2014 on the collective management of copyrights and related rights and granting multi-territorial licenses could eliminate the current state of affairs.

THE EFFECT OF LEVERAGE AND ECONOMIC VALUE ADDED ON MARKET VALUE ADDED

Kristína Jančovičová BOGNÁROVÁ*

Abstract

Economic value added (EVA) is a performance measure developed by Stern Stewart & Co.) that attempts to measure the true economic profit produced by a company. Such a metric is useful for investors who wish to determine how well a company has produced value for its investors, and it can be compared against the company's peers for a quick analysis of how well the company is operating in its industry. Market value added (MVA), on the other hand, is simply the difference between the current total market value of a company and the capital contributed by investors (including both shareholders and bondholders). It is typically used for companies that are larger and publicly-traded. MVA is not a performance metric like EVA, but instead is a wealth metric, measuring the level of value a company has accumulated over time. In order to maximise the value for shareholders, companies should strive towards maximising MVA and not necessarily their total market value. It is believed, that the best way to do so is to maximize EVA, which reflects a company's ability to earn returns above the cost of capital. The leverage available to companies that incur fixed costs and use borrowed capital with a fixed interest charge has been known and quantified by financial managers for some time. In this research the effect of leverage and EVA on MVA as the measure of shareholder wealth creation was analysed. Leverage and EVA have been used as the independent variables whereas MVA has been used as the measure of shareholder wealth creation. Correlation and regression methods have been employed to find out in what way financial managers can practice the effects of leverage and EVA to maximize MVA. The results showed that EVA and leverage have no profound impact on MVA of the selected Slovak companies.

Keywords: economic value added, total degree of leverage, market value added, degree of operating leverage, degree of financial leverage.

1. Introduction

Shareholder value creation can be attained through maximizing the market value of investors' wealth. Determining value and value drivers is crucial to evaluate an investment regarding whether it is sound or not. In this paper the leverage effect on market value added (MVA) and the effect of conomic value added (EVA) on MVA is investigated. Total leverage can be derived by multiplying financial leverage by operating leverage. It would be possible to forecast what impact the leverage will have on MVA as soon as the total leverage is determined. The outcomes of this paper could be valuable not only to financial managers but also to the managers those who are at all levels in a business organization. Furthermore, potential and existing shareholders can get to know the worth of their investments made in the organization.

The objectives of this paper are:

- To identify the association between leverage, EVA and MVA;
- To discover the effects of leverage and EVA on MVA.

2. The theoretical concept of EVA, MVA and leverage

2.1. EVA and MVA

The concept of EVA was popularised and originally trade-marked by Stern Stewart and Company in the 1980s. According to Stewart EVA is an estimate of the economic profit generated by a company. It considers the costs of all forms of capital (debt, as well as equity) and compensates all its capital providers accordingly. EVA is determined by calculating the difference between the cost of a company's capital and the return earned on capital invested, and multiplying it with the amount of capital invested in the company.

$$EVA_t = (r - WACC) * IC_{t-1}$$

where:

r = the return on the capital invested

WACC = the company's after-tax cost of capital

IC_{t-1} = the invested capital at the beginning of period t

This mesure quantifies the surplus return earned by the company. In those cases where a company is able to earn a return that is higher than its cost of capital a positive value for EVA is calculated. A negative EVA value is calculated when the cost of capital exceeds the return on the invested capital.

* PhD, Ing., University of Economics in Bratislava (e-mail: kristina.jancovicova.bognarova@gmail.com)

Alternatively, the measure can be calculated by comparing the net operating profit after tax with the total cost of capital invested.

$$EVA_t = NOPAT_t - Total\ cost\ of\ IC = = NOPAT_t - (WACC * IC_{t-1})$$

where:

$NOPAT_t$ = Net operating profit after taxes

If a company is able to earn NOPAT values in excess of its total cost of capital invested it generates a positive EVA figure. However, should NOPAT be insufficient to cover the company's total cost of capital, a negative value for EVA is calculated.

A company's total market value (MV) is equal to the sum of the market value of its equity and the market value of its debt. In theory, this amount is what can be taken out of the company when all shares are sold and debt is repaid at any given time. The MVA is the difference between the total market value of the company and the invested capital. The invested capital (IC) is the amount that is put into the company and is basically the fixed assets plus the net working capital.

$$MVA = MV\ of\ company - IC$$

From an investor's point of view, MVA is the best final measure of a company's performance. MVA is calculated at a given moment, but in order to assess performance over time, the difference or change in MVA from one date to the next can be determined to see whether value has been created or destroyed. EVA is an internal measure of performance that drives MVA.

The link between MVA and EVA is that theoretically, MVA is equal to the present value of all future EVA to be generated by the company.

$$MVA = present\ value\ of\ all\ future\ EVA$$

If the company is not operating at optimal levels of financial gearing, changing the proportion of debt relative to equity can lower the WACC, so that the capital structure is closer to optimal. This will also unlock value for the company as a whole, including the shareholders.

2.2. Operating leverage, financial leverage and total leverage

Operating leverage (OL) is a measurement of the degree to which a company incurs a combination of fixed and variable costs. The higher the degree of OL, the greater the potential danger from forecasting risk, where a relatively small error in forecasting sales can be magnified into large errors in cash flow projections.

Most of a company's costs are fixed costs that occur regardless of sales volume. As long as a business earns a substantial profit on each sale and sustains adequate sales volume, fixed costs are covered and profits are earned. Other company costs are variable costs incurred when sales occur. The business earns less profit on each sale but needs a lower sales volume for covering fixed costs. However, the business does not generate greater profits unless it increases its sales volume[1].

The percentage change in the earnings before interest and taxes (EBIT) relative to a given percentage change in sales is defined as operating leverage.

Degree of operating leverage (DOL) = % change in EBIT/% change in sales.

The equation can also be written as follows:

$$DOL = Contribution\ /\ EBIT$$

The answer is a factor equal to one (in the case of zero fixed costs) or greater than one[2].

Financial leverage (FL) is the degree to which a company uses fixed-income securities such as debt and preferred equity. The more debt financing a company uses, the higher its financial leverage. A high degree of financial leverage means high interest payments, which negatively affect the company's bottom-line earnings per share.

The percentage change in earnings per share (EPS) due to a given percentage change in EBIT is known as financial leverage. Degree of financial everage (DFL) = % change in EPS / % change in EBIT. The following equation can also be used to calculate DFL:

$$DFL = EBIT\ /\ PBT$$

where

PBT = Profit before tax

The answer is a factor equal to one (no interest) or greater than one[3].

The total leverage is the outcome of the multiplication of operating leverage and financial leverage[4].

$$Degree\ of\ total\ leverage\ (DTL) = DOL\ x\ DFL$$

or

$$DTL = \%\ change\ in\ EPS\ /\ \%\ change\ in\ sales$$

If a company has a high amount of operating leverage and financial leverage, a small change in sales will lead to a large variability in EPS.

3. Literature review regarding the link between leverage, EVA and MVA

Some studies have shown that, compared to other accounting measures, MVA has by far the best correlation with EVA (Stern 1993; Grant 1997). Further support for EVA has come from studies by Hall (1998), Gates (2000), Kramer and Peters (2001) and Hatfield (2002), while there has been some criticism,

[1] For example, a software business has greater fixed costs in developers' salaries, and lower variable costs with software sales. Therefore, the business has high operating leverage. In contrast, a computer consulting firm charges its clients hourly, resulting in variable consultant wages. Therefore, the business has low operating leverage.

[2] A DOL factor of 1.5 means that for every 10% change in sales, the operating profit will change by 15% (all other things being equal).

[3] A DFL factor of 1.5 means that for every 10% change in profit before tax, the EBIT will change by 15% (all other things being equal).

[4] A DTL factor of 1.5 x 1.5 = 2.25 indicates that the profit before tax will change by 22.5% for every 10% change in sales.

amongst others from Keef and Roush (2002) and Copeland (2002).

Irala (2005) also initiated a study on whether EVA possess a better explanatory power relative to the conventional accounting measures like earnings per share, return on net worth, capital productivity and labor productivity. The results supported that as compared to the other accounting measures, EVA has better explanatory power in predicting the market value.

Several other studies have been done by researchers by relating leverage and EVA with of MVA.

The concept of shareholder value creation was examined by Kaur and Narang (2009) by using EVA and MVA. For that study, 104 Indian companies have been used as sample and the findings reveal that EVA influences the market value of shares.

The correlation between EVA and MVA of 582 American companies was examined by Fernandez (2003) over 15 years from 1983 to 1997. The NOPAT had higher correlation with changes in MVA than the EVA for 296 companies in the sample whereas for 210 sample companies the correlation between EVA and MVA was found to be negative. In line with this, a study conducted on EVA-MVA relationship of 89 industrial companies in South Africa by De Wet (2005) found that EVA did not show the strongest association with MVA.

Pachari and Navindra (2012) conducted a study on the influence of financial leverage on shareholders' return and market capitalization of Automotive cluster companies in Pitahmpur. They found that there is no significant influence of financial leverage on shareholders' return and market capitalization.

Majumdar and Chhibber (1999) analysed Indian firms and found a significant negative relationship between the value of the firm and leverage. On the other hand, Abor (2007) collected data of Ghana listed firms and found that there is significant positive relationship between the leverage and the company´s market value. To the same conclusion came Odit and Gobardhun (2011) in a study of Mauritius firms. Adenugba et al., (2016) examine the relationship between financial leverage and firms' value, by using a sample of firms listed on Nigerian Stock Exchange (NSE) from 2007-2012. Data were sourced from annual reports of selected firms. The Ordinary Least Square (OLS) statistical technique was used for data analysis and hypothesis testing. The results indicate that there is significant relationship between financial leverage and firms' value and that financial leverage has significant effect on firms' value.

It is clear from this brief review of literature that researchers have given much emphasize to EVA in respect to shareholder value creation. By recognizing this necessity this study makes an attempt to investigate the relationship between EVA, leverage and MVA.

4. Research methods

Correlation analysis has been carried out to identify the cause-effect relationship between the predictor variables and dependent variable. Additionally, simple regression method has been used to find out the impact of leverage and EVA on MVA.

MVA has been used as the dependent variable whereas EVA, operating leverage (OL), financial leverage (FL) and total leverage (TL) have been used as independent variables.

Variables used in the analysis and their measurement are presented in table 1:

Variables	Measurement
Dependent variable
MVA	market capitalization – shareholders' funds
Independent variables
EVA	NOPAT – cost of capital employed
OL	gross income / EBIT
FL	EBIT / PBT
TL	financial leverage x operating leverage

In order to avoid multi collinearity and auto correlation issues, explanatory variables have been tested in four models rather than being tested in a single model. Based on the variables used in the study, the following regression models can be developed.

1. $MVA = \beta_0 + \beta_1 x_1 + \varepsilon$
2. $MVA = \beta_0 + \beta_1 x_2 + \varepsilon$
3. $MVA = \beta_0 + \beta_1 x_3 + \varepsilon$
4. $MVA = \beta_0 + \beta_1 x_4 + \varepsilon$

where: x_1 = EVA; x_2 = OL; x_3 = FL; x_4 = TL; β_0 = constant; ε = error term.

The key sources of data were financial statements consisting of balance sheets and income statements of 20 selected Slovak companies in a 5-year period from 2012 to 2016.

5. Results

In this section the results of the analysis are presented.

Table 2: Pearson correlation

	EVA	OL	FL	TL	MVA
EVA	1
OL	-0,501	1
FL	-0,398	0,879	1
TL	-0,401	0,914	0,973	1
MVA	-0,223	0,009	-0,219	-0,183	1

Table 2 demonstrates the existence of statistically insignificant relationship among the predictor variables (EVA, OL, FL and TL) and MVA, that means that that there is no significant relationship between EVA and MVA and leverage and MVA[5].

[5] The findings of the correlation analysis are in line with the findings of the study conducted by Fernandez (2003).

$MVA = \beta_0 + \beta_1 * EVA + \varepsilon$	0,102
$MVA = \beta_0 + \beta_1 * OL + \varepsilon$	0,029
$MVA = \beta_0 + \beta_1 * TL + \varepsilon$	0,045

As we can see from the table 3 that 10,2%, 2,9%, 11,9% and 4,5% of the perceived variability in the models 1, 2, 3 and 4 were demonstrated by the variations in the explanatory variables (EVA, OL, FL and TL) used in the study. Remaining 89,8%, 97,1%, 88,1% and 95,5% of the variations in the models were associated with factors which were not included in the models. These R^2 values suggest that there might be factors which may have greater explanatory power in predicting MVA. EVA and leverage have no profound impact on MVA. Furthermore it is clear that operating leverage has the least impact on MVA in case of the selected sample of companies.

6. Conclusion

This paper examined the association between EVA, leverage and MVA in the selected Slovak companies in the time period from 2012 to 2016. Pearson correlation and simple regression methods have been employed in the analysis. There is no clear evidence from the analysis to support the claim that the shareholders stand to gain by looking at EVA. Furthermore R^2 values reveal that the predictor variables used in the analysis have no explanatory power in predicting the changes in MVA. It is an indication that other factors are perhaps found to be better prognosticators of MVA.

One of the major limitations of this analysis is that the it is based on 5 years data. Only 20 companies were selected as the sample for the analysis. Therefore one can extend the study by examining a wider range of companies. Moreover, findings reveal that other factors are probably found to be better predictors of MVA rather than the explanatory variables used in this analysis. Hence, there is a big opportunity for more research in this field.

MEDIA MARKET OVERVIEW IN CEE COUNTRIES

Abstract

Every year, in every market and in any country, advertisers spend increasing budgets on advertising to influence consumer behavior. Finding the ideal marketing channel mix is a continuous challenge for every brand on every local market. This paper is aiming to analyze overall media investment in CEE region trying to find patterns of media mix based on economic context and local market status that supports media investment (internet and Facebook statistics, TV audiences). In the paper are used multidimensional methods like: principal component analysis and hierarchical clustering techniques. Thirteen Central and Eastern European countries are clustered based on 2017 data from Media Factbook. Two main patterns are described in the paper based on these data. The first one is characterized by high Internet usage, high Print and Digital advertising share. In terms of inverstment level, these countries have negative evolution of Net Market Spend per Capita in 2016 versus 2008 but high media market sizes. The second one is characterized by high out of home advertising share. In terms of inverstment level, these countries are splited in two subpatterns: one with negative and one with positive evolution of Net Market Spend per Capita in 2016 versus 2008.

Keywords: marketing mix, media market, clustering methods, principal component analysis, CEE countries.

1. Introduction

Every year, in every market, in any country, advertisers spend increasing budgets on advertising to influence consumer behavior.

Finding the ideal marketing channel mix is a continuous challenge for every brand on the market in every country. Permanently, the brand, marketing or sales managers are struggling about where they should invest, how much and how often they should reassess where to invest in order to get the most of it for their brands. The question even bigger is about what metrics they should use to determine which media channels get more investment. Every brand has its own judgement in choosing the right media channels mix considering brand attributes, targeted customer profile and of course, local market particularities.

In this paper we analyze overall media investment in CEE region trying to find patterns of media mix based on economic context and local market status that supports media investment (internet and Facebook statistics, TV audiences). This paper begins with a short review of the literature regarding the evolution of marketing. The second section is a general analysis of media market at European level based on data from Media Factbook (2016, 2017). In the third section, by applying clustering techniques we try to identify some patterns among CEE countries on media market statistics. Finally, in the last section we conclude our analysis with some recommendations for Romania media market.

2. Literature review

The evolution of advertisement dates back into the ancient times. Societies used symbols, and pictorial signs to attract their product users. Over centuries, these elements were used for promotion of products. In the early ages, these were handmade and were produced at limited scale for promotions. Later on, this phenomenon used and gained strength more intensively for promotional purposes. Today's modern environment, advertisements have become one of the major sources of communicational tool between the manufacturer and the user of the products. (Abideen & Saleem, 2011)

Over the years, practical experience has shown that marketing costs and market response are stongly correlated. This dependency should be acknowledged and extensively evaluated as the marketing costs can not be completely ingnored or mentained at a level too low as they could not influence anymore the sales. At the same time, there are always limits at the higher level, for which the resources become insufficient (S. Prutianu et al.,1998).

Naik and Peters (2009) compared the impact of various paid-for media, which is helpful to marketers in determining their overall media spend and its allocation across media. They proposed a new hierarchical model of online and offline advertising, incorporating within-media (i.e., intra-offline: television, print, and radio) and cross-media (online-offline) synergies and allows higher-order interactions among various media. They reach the optimal spending on each medium and the optimal total budget which is real helpful to marketers.

This mater of marketing resource allocation in media have been continuously investigated through many studies along time revealing important insights on the effects of within-media synergies on the overall budget and its allocation (Naik and Raman, 2003; Prasad and Sethi, 2009).

To derive more informative priors, Wang et al. (2017) pools data of similar brands within one category, and extends the model to a hierarchical Bayesian model that allows random effects of media and control variables for different brands. Sun et al. (2017) uses geo-level data instead of national-level data to estimate a similar hierarchical Bayesian model with the shape and the adstock transformations. In simulations, both approaches estimate the transformation parameters well with a much larger data set and derive informative priors to use when the model is applied to a single brand nation-level only data.

Recently, Dens, Pelsmacker and Gos (2018) have also investigated cross-media advertising synergy based on consumers' media usage in a a novel methodology, mixture-amount modeling. It allows to derive optimal media mixes that can be different for several types of media users. The authors provide a proof of concept by analyzing 46,852 responses to 92 beauty care advertising campaigns from 10,972 respondents from the Netherlands, Belgium, Finland, and Hungary. They analyze the impact of consumers' combined magazine, television, and Internet usage (i.e., how intensively they use media overall and the relative proportion of each individual medium) on their campaign-evoked brand interest, perceived brand equity, and purchase intention for advertised brands. The results suggest that different patterns of consumer media usage have different responses to advertising campaigns.

3. Media market analysis at Europe level

According to media fact book (2017), the CEE economy is expected to boost in 2017, after a healthy 2.9% expansion in 2016. A solid domestic economy and improving activity in the Euro area should fuel faster growth of 3.1%. Tightening labour markets, loose monetary policy and fiscal measures are contributing to a consumption spree in the region, which is being reflected in retail sales and confidence data. The impact on the CEE media markets' is still visible in most of the countries, different patterns being observed in terms of media spend / capita evolution vs. 2008 and also in terms of net media market size also.

Fig.1. Media Market Size Evolution

Czech Republic is the only country with media spend/capita strong positive dynamics based on positive economic trend and important media investment budget (1600 mil Eur).

On the opposite side, despite the positive economic evolution in Poland and massive media investment (above 1800 mil Eur), the trend is strongly negative being 19% below 2008. On similar decreasing trend are also Hungary, FYR Macedonia and Bosnia Herzegovina. But, below all, with relatively medium budget invested in media (200- 300 mil Eur), Serbia, Romania and Croatia are the most affected countries with significant drop (below -23%) showing that advertisers continue to be prudent with their media investments, given the current economic and political context.

With relatively small budget investment, Albania is the country with impressive gain vs 2008 while Bulgaria, Montenegro and Slovakia registered a marginal media investment increase, supported by a positive economic performance.

Considering media channels mix, TV continue to retain high shares of spending between 50% and 70% in most countries with significant outliers being Albania and Bosnia & Herzegovina where the TV share exceeds 70%, while at the opposite side is Czech Republic, Hungary and Slovakia (below 41%), where Digital is accountant for more than 30% of the total net media market.

Print retains over 15% of media market share in the Czech Republic, Serbia and Croatia. Radio generally has a low share throughout the region, with the exception of the Czech Republic (10%), Poland and Croatia both with 9%.

Based on 2016 Media Fact Book, the TV shares in the media mix tend to correlate with the ATS (average time spent viewing), with Albania. Romania, Bosnia & Herzegovina and Serbia having the highest level of ATS on commercial targets, while Slovenia and the Czech Republic are having the lowest.

All the countries in the region have an urban Internet penetration of over 60%, with half of them exceeding already 75%.

In terms of daily usage, the consumption map is quite heterogeneous with countries like Slovenia, and Romania having over 80% at urban level, and Bulgaria, Bosnia & Herzegovina and Albania with less than 60%.

Fig.4. General Facebook Statistics

The need for connection continues to grow in our region being supported by new and more affordable technologies, increasing the number of Facebook users. With the exception of Serbia (32%), the number of Facebook users amount to over 44% of the total population of each country. Also, Facebook users amount to more than 60% of the Internet users across all the countries in the region.

4. Patterns on media market

PCA is a technique used to reduce multidimensional data sets to lower dimensions, when all the variables used are quantitative. PCA is mathematically defined as an orthogonal linear transformation that projects the data to a new coordinate system (which is made by principal components) in order to obtain the greatest variance explained by this projection of the data.

Based on matrix of correlation (Annex 1), the following 7 uncorrelated variables were taken into consideration for analyzing patterns on CEE countries media market: 2016 Net market spend per Capita evolution vs 2008, %digital, %print, %OOH (out of home advertising), 2016 intenet urban reach, 2016 Facebook users of population, 2016 Facebook users of internet users. PCA is applied on these variables such that to analyse the correlation between them and to identify some patterns in CEE countries.

Table 1. Rotated Component Matrix (PCA)

	Component
2016 Fbk % of Population	.913	.229	.071
2016 Fbk % of Internet Users	.758	-.413	.015
OOH	-.069	.788	-.417
2016 General Internet Statistics Urban Reach	-.099	.644	.510
2016 Net Market Spend per Capita Evolution (%) vs. 2008	.030	.579	.000
Digital	.288	-.151	.858
Print	-.501	.019	.657

Source data: Own computations based on 2017 Media Fact Book, Romania

The projection of data on the first three principal components preserves 71.2% of the total inertia (25.1% for the first axis, 23.1% for the second axis and 22.9% for the third axis). On the first axis, the best represented variables on positive side are: 2016 Fbk % of Population, 2016 Fbk % of Internet Users and on the negative side is the spending on print channel. Therefore this component could be called Internet Challenge. On second axis, the best represented variables on positive side are: OOH, 2016 General Internet Statistics Urban Reach and 2016 Net Market Spend per Capita Evolution (%) vs. 2008 and on negative side is 2016 Fbk % of Internet Users. On third axis, the best represented variables on positive side are: spending on digital and print channels, 2016 General Internet Statistics Urban Reach and on negative side is OOH.

Ward method is a hierarchical clustering technique used to create homogenous groups with the minimum variance within the groups. By applying this technique on our data 2 clusters could be defined. Cluster 2 is represented by 4 countries: Hungary, Slovakia, Poland and Czech Republic and cluster 1 with all other countries.

Fig. 5. Projection of countries on the first three principal components

Source data: Own representation based on 2017 Media Fact Book, Romania

By representing the countries on the first three principal components we observe that countries from the first cluster have lower values for the third component (Fig. 5b.). Therefore we can conclude that in these countries Digital and Print have low share and OOH have high shares in media channel mix. Countries from cluster 2 have high shares for Digital and Print advertising and low values for OOH (Fig. 5b.) but also we can observe that they are countries with high percentages of Facebook users in total Population and in total number of Internet users (Fig. 5a.). Moreover this cluster could be splited into two subclusters. The first subcluster (Bulgaria, Slovenia, Montenegro, Macedonia, Albania) have with positive 2016 Net Market Spend per Capita Evolution (%) vs 2008. The second subcluster (Serbia, Croatia, Romania and Bosnia & Herzegovina) have negative 2016 Net Market Spend per Capita Evolution (%) vs 2008.

5. Conclusions

The question addressed in this paper was: which are patterns observed on CEE countries media market. We found that there are mainly two different patterns: one characterized by high internet usage and where Print and Digital advertising shares are very high. In these countries (Poland, Hungary, Czech Republic, Slovakia), the Net Market Spend per Capita had a negative evolution in 2016 versus 2008, even if they have the highest media market sizes. The second pattern is characterised by high share of out of home advertising (OOH) in media channel mix. These countries could be splited in two groups: one with Net Market Spend per Capita having a positive evolution in 2016 compared to 2008 (Bulgaria, Slovenia, Montenegro, Macedonia, Albania) and another group with a negative evolution in 2016 compared to 2008 of Net Market Spend per Capita (Serbia, Croatia, Romania and Bosnia & Herzegovina).

By analyzing all CEE countries, it is obvious that TV and Digital channels are having important impact. It is shown also that they continue to fight for dominance across all media markets in CEE, as TV is still holding strong on majority of countries (9) and Digital is the media channel with the most dynamic expansion, as mobile, social video and messaging apps will continue their developing trend. As smartphone use is continuing its strong growth, and the CEE developing economies hold a huge potential, mobile advertising revenues are expected to boost, supported by the fact that the share of web traffic coming from mobile devices is growing rapidly, accordingly to 2017 MediaFactbook.

The CEE media market size map is polarized in two segments: the first represented by the largest markets like Poland and the Czech Republic gathering yearly over 1.6 billion EUR in net value, medium markets like Hungary and Slovakia of over 310 million EUR, all 4 countries having digital share in media mix of above 25% and TV share lowest than 50% and the second segment consisting of the countries with less than 200 million EUR net investments.

Romania is a country with high potential as long as the media investements are high and internet penetration and internet daily reach in urban area offer good premises for attacking the media market through the digital channel.

PERSPECTIVES ON FAMILY FIRMS IN THE ROMANIAN ECONOMIC FRAMEWORK

Viorel CORNESCU[*]
Andreea STROE[]

Abstract

The paperwork focuses on emphasizing the increasingly significant role of family firms in the Romanian economic framework, by bringing into attention legislative matters, their advantages and disadvantages compared to other similar forms of organization (sole proprietorship (IF) and PFA (self-employed person)). The importance of FFs is indisputable, not only generally, from the economic point of view, but also in terms of the commitment shown to local communities, business responsibility, long-term stability and moral values. They are also a fertile soil for entrepreneurship as incubators for future entrepreneurs. Our goal is to capture their features, their evolution in time in the local framework, development tendencies, but also the peculiarities of their financial instrumentation. Their specific aspects in what concerns financial instrumentation of FFs may be the subject of future debates on proposals to improve the management of their work, to analyze their financial activity by highlighting the legislative aspects which are compared to similar forms of organization, by also assessing the evolution in time of family firms in terms of their importance within the economy. Therefore, the paperwork points out some of the key aspects and characteristics of such organizations which act as a balance in entrepreneurial development, along with the economic support of thousands of families, both from rural and urban environment.

Keywords: family firms, sole proprietorship, financial instruments, evolution, microenterprises.

1. Introduction

Family firms have gained great importance in economic practice, but also in specialized literature, especially in connection with firm's theories, with emphasis on their role and incorporation in management and entrepreneurship theories. (Beckard and Dyer, 1983). Family firms are often considered, in the light of their features, different from non-family firms, and their economic implications generated a significant academic debate. Family firms are established all over the world, having different shapes and sizes, from the smallest manufacturers to large multinational companies. Their features are different according to many variables (dimensions, organization of assets, legal forms, etc.), this thing explaining the contradictory points of view from specialized literature. Furthermore, we notice that the great majority of them are smaller than private non-family firms in what concerns the number of employees and the volume of sales and have a greater inflexibility in terms of the impact of new techniques and technologies. Typical family firm is less based on formal knowledge, is less involved in exports and has a low productivity compared to private non-family firms. Family firms can, by definition, take the liability only on the legal forms of the limited liability company, partnership or sole companies, according to the legislation of each country.

The researchers use different criteria to define family business, such as the status of assets, strategic control, the involvement of multiple generations in the business and the intention to keep the business in the family.

Some researchers such as (Lea, 1998) suggest that family firms should be defined by the fact that they are established by and for the need of a specific family, or under the explicit anticipation that future generations take over the business. Other studies such as Donckels and Frohlich (1991) and Lyman (1991) suggest more conservative approaches, stating that a person or a group of individuals whom are directly related to each other by ties of kinship should control 60% or in full a company in order to be classified as a family firm.

EC definition (2009) adopted by the European Union and by some multinational family business networks, such as the European Group of Family Enterprises (GEEF), Family Business Network International and Family Firms Institute (FFI), points out that a company can be considered a family firm if it fulfills the following conditions:[1]

I. The majority of the decision making rights are held by the natural person or persons (family) who established the firm, or who hold the share capital of the natural person or the capital of the spouses, parents, heirs;

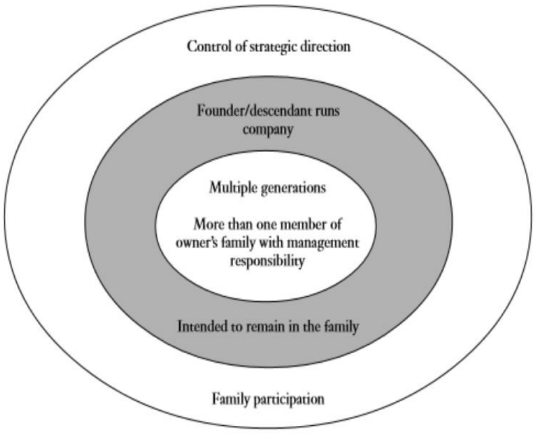
II. The majority of the decision making rights are indirect or direct;
III. At least a family representative is officially involved in the management of the company;
IV. The publicly traded corporations fulfill the definition of family firm, namely the person who established or purchased the firm (share capital) or family or descendants if they have mandated 25% of the share capital.

A very suggestive descriptive definition of family firms is suggested by the picture below describing the universe of such organizations.

Picture 1. The universe of family firms



Source: Family Businesses' Contribution to the U.S. Economy: A Closer Look Joseph H. Astrachan, Melissa Carey Shanker, 2003

The characteristic of family firm is that the transfer of ownership, when the case may be, is made to another member of the family, so that family plays an important role in the business management, and the impact of the generations on the business development is a significant one. Therefore, in addition to quantitative aspects of the business, we must also take into account the importance of intangible aspects.

Gartner (2001) questions the interconnection of entrepreneurships with the researches on the development of family firms. A recent research indicates that 80% of small partnerships have similar characteristics with those of family firms (Chua et al. 1999), such as the engagement of own financial resources or human capital. Entrepreneurship is a special case of strategic management, in the creation and renewal of organizations, a merge between opportunity and resources. Taking into account that an important part of new organizations is created by means of family involvement, families induce to entrepreneurial activities their values and aspirations. On the other hand, entrepreneurship requires an understanding of how family resources can be exploited and how family involvement can influence the type of attracted capital, organizational form of the enterprise and financial performances. Therefore, there can be noticed the possibility of a symbiotic connection between entrepreneurship and family firm.

Habberson et al. (2003) captures family firm as an interactive system consisting of individuals, a family and a firm, pointing out the synergy created by its familiarity and contribution to creating competitive advantages and wealth. The financial resources (capital raising), human resources (different organizational culture), technological resources (innovation) are meant to distinguish between family and non-family firms by meeting standard criteria of unity, inseparability and synergy. Christman et al. (2003) proves that the classification of Habberson can be applied more broadly by replacing the maximization of wealth by the maximization of the value as predominant goal of family firm. By introducing the concept of value determination policy (Christman et al.) shows how the Habberson's theory concepts can help explaining long-term survival and development of family firms.

On the other hand, Schulze (2003) points out the contribution of altruism and self-control, as entrepreneurial features that can help or raise difficulties within the company, the differences between trading companies and family firms being highlighted in terms of organizational conduct and performance. The altruism matter occurs when managers try to help third parties (i.e. children), thus encouraging avoidance, postponement of decisions or liberty, which cannot be controlled by means of economic initiatives. Therefore, these difficulties can be harder to solve than in a trading company.

The existent entrepreneurial research did not ignore family firms. Notwithstanding, they used very selective criteria which ignore the size and issues of family firms. Chrisman et al. (1998) paperwork explains that entrepreneurship is a special case of strategic management, where the risk, organizational renewal and innovation (Sharma and Chrisman, 1999) are strategy actions involving synchronization between opportunity and resources. Only few strategic decisions are made for pure economic reasons; the values and aspirations of top owners and managers also play an important role (Andrews, 1971).[2] In addition to them, while human calculation for new company establishment certainly takes into account profit and its determinants, the FFs also include goals which cannot be viewed only from the financial point of view. Therefore, family firms seek to meet family's economic needs, and the wishes of those establishing them to create, to build something and to add value, stability and security in the present and the future, to them, family and descendants.

Selznick (1957), believes that family business entrepreneurs are unique by trying to build enterprises which are also family institutions. The way the founders of family firms deal with the establishment and development of organizations to create family inheritances and sustainable economic value should be of interest for the entrepreneurship field. The perpetuation of such inheritances requires the firm to manage family succession, which, besides the need to replace the founding entrepreneur, often involves changes in strategy and / or structure.

Such changes could revive a novelty responsibility (Stinchombe, 1965), with deep implications for organizational survival and growth.

Tan and Fock (2001) show that the appointment of an entrepreneurial leader can be the key to success in family business succession. Researches suggest that a substantial proportion of new enterprises is created under family involvement. Families influence entrepreneurial activities by their values and aspirations. They must support intergenerational entrepreneurship in order to achieve their goal to create sustainable family inheritances. On the other side, entrepreneurial spirit requires an understanding of how family resources can be exploited and how family involvement can affect the type of targeted investment and the performance of shareholders at the beginning. Therefore, there can be a symbiotic relation between entrepreneurship and the research in family business field.

2. Specific features of IF compared to other forms of economic organizations

Let's see what is a family firm and what is the legal regime applied in Romania. Small entrepreneurs which want to carry out an economic activity together with the family, can choose the establishment of a family firm (former family association), currently regulated by Government Emergency Ordinance no. 44/2008.

In the process of setting up a family firm, the first requirement is the assessment of the conditions provided by the law on two aspects, both important, namely: 1. the persons who can become members; 2. the economic activity that can be carried out by this form of association. In what concerns the persons who can become members, the law uses expression "family members". The law also provides who the respective persons are: husband, wife, their children who have already turned 16 on the date of family firm authorization, relatives and up to fourth degree of kinship included; [Art. 2 para. (1) letter d) of Government Emergency Ordinance no. 44/2008].

The number of persons required for family firm establishment is of at least two. Once fulfilled these criteria, the first step for the establishment of family firm is the conclusion of an establishment agreement between the members and the appointment of a representative of the family firm authorized by means of a special power of attorney to manage the interests of the family firm.

The National Trade Register Office employs the following definition The firm of a professional, family firm consists of the name of the family or its representative plus phrase "Family firm".*

Family firm, in Romanian legislation, has the following restrictions in what concerns the scope of business: liberal professions or economic activities regulated by special laws, economic activities for which the law established a special legal regime, certain performance restrictions or other prohibitions, services provided under the freedom to provide cross-border services.

Under the regime of legal acts concluded for the performance of economic activities within a family firm, according to art. 29 and art. 32 of Government Emergency Ordinance no. 44/2008, they are concluded by the representative of the family firm and produce effects on all the members of it[3].

Under the legal regime of natural person's assets, the performance of economic activities within a family firm enables the establishment of dedicated assets. The members of a family firm can choose, by pursuing a specially regulated procedure in this respect, the dedication of a part of personal assets for the individual performance of economic activities. This part shall be subject to a special legal regime and shall be designated by term dedicated assets.

In terms of acquiring the capacity of trader, the option for the individual performance of economic activities, as a member of a family firm, leads to the acquiring of this capacity as of the registration with the Trade Register.

In terms of acquiring the capacity of taxpayer, the independent performance of economic activities within a family firm entails the existence of such capacity. Normative acts establish on the members of the family firm, on the self-employed person and on the entrepreneur, holder of a sole proprietorship, the obligation to pay certain taxes and fees, which can be classified in two main categories: general tax obligations (incumbent on all the members of a family firm) and special tax obligations (incumbent only on certain members of a family firm, as a result of their will, of acquiring the capacity of employer, of performing certain category of activities or of the activity scale, reflected in the turnover).

Other similar forms on which we can draw conclusions on the similarities and differences are sole proprietorships and PFAs.

Sole proprietorship (II) is a form of economic activity organized by a natural person entrepreneur, and the low cost of establishment is one of the advantages of establishing such an entity.

Self-employed person (PFA) is any natural person authorized to perform any type of economic activity permitted by the law, by using mainly its labor force (art. 2 letter i) of Government Emergency Ordinance no. 44/2008). PFA is insured under the national pension system and other social insurance rights and is entitled to be insured under the social health insurance system and unemployment insurance system, under the terms provided by the law. PFA is held liable for the obligations on the dedicated assets, if set up, and, in addition, on all assets, and in case of insolvency, it shall be subject to simplified proceedings provided by Law no. 85/2006 on insolvency proceedings, as further amended and supplemented.

Under Government Emergency Ordinance 44/2008 updated in 2014, family firms are treated alongside sole proprietorship and PFAs, not gaining legal status by means of the registration with the Trade Register Office. In order to note the advantages and disadvantages of all forms of organization, we hereby present a short compariso

Form of organization	-it consists of 2 or more members of a family -does not hold own assets and does not gain legal status by the registration with the trade register - the members of the family firm are considered natural person traders.	- does not gain legal status by the registration with the trade register -can employ no more than 8 employees, third parties, under individual labor agreement	-is entitled to perform any form of economic activity permitted by the law, by mainly using its labor force -can employ, as an employer, third parties under an individual labor agreement, concluded under the terms of the law and can cumulate the capacity of certified natural person with the capacity of an employee of a third party	-is a legal form of company, a certain form of legal entity, with limited liability before the law and its owners. It is a hybrid form of business with the features of both a partnership and a corporation -has legal status (law no. 31/1990)
Legal matters	- income and expenditures are distributed among members, according to the share of contribution, members pay income tax amounting to 16% on distributed net income (every member declares his share of income to the fiscal body) -the members of a family firm may simultaneously be PFAs or holders of sole proprietorship and can also hold the capacity of employee of a third party. -family firm cannot employ third parties under labor agreement.	-the natural person entrepreneur is considered natural person trader, can employ third parties under individual labor agreement, according to the law, but can also hold the capacity of employee of a third party - the costs of establishment and administrative costs are lower - owes health insurance contribution -it gains an annual cumulative income equal to at least 12 basic gross wages	-it is certified but, cannot cumulate the capacity of natural person entrepreneur holder of a sole proprietorship. -the costs of establishment and administrative costs are lower - PFAs can benefit from the achieved net income at any time, without distributing dividends, compared to SRL - the process of establishment of a PFA is much more simple and requires lower costs	-higher investments, the costs of establishment and management are higher than in case of the other form of organization - shareholders are bound to pay another 5% tax for dividends. It is the only legal way to take money out of the company (unlike PFA).

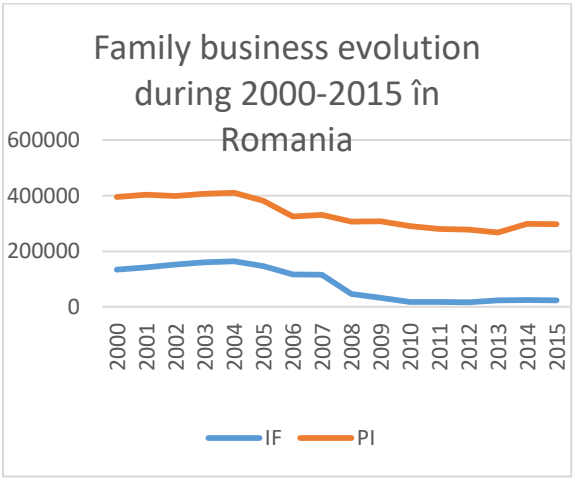
3. I.F. in Romania

In Romania, throughout the latest years, the number of family firms or sole proprietorships fluctuated depending on the market conditions. The incidence of entrepreneurial exploration or exploitation in what concerns the identification of opportunities, the adjustment of the strategies to market conditions, the reorganization of the resources was affected by the instable economic environment after 2007, by decreasing the number of IFs. It seems that a greater flexibility and adaptation has been achieved by IIs, the number of which remained stable in recent years, given the legislative conditions. The studies show that the involvement of the family in the management of the firm affects the ability of future generations to reach high levels of ambidextrousness, along with the fact that the opportunity can trigger a conflict within the IF and its settlement would influence the timeliness of its exercise. (Shepherd and Haynie 2009). This is a special approach that can be taken into account only for the supplementation of economic explanations, as follows:

Picture 2 The evolution of IF (family firm) and II (sole proprietorship)



Own source

It is noted that throughout 2000-2015 family firms had significant fluctuations. We associated this evolution with the increase of the number of self-employed persons, in order to create a clearer picture of the changes in the field. The number of IFs raised from 133,610 in 2000 to 142,537 in 2011, by reaching the peak in 2004 with a number of 165,236 due to legislative support (law no. 346 of July 14th, 2004 on the stimulation of establishment and development and on the priority for public procurement of SMEs). Since 2005 we have noted a downward trend which will lead to a drastic decrease of family firms to almost a third in 2008-2009 in the background of the economic crisis, which led to the bankruptcy of small companies with less flexibility to drastic market changes. The decrease continued, with a slight increase starting with 2013 where their number will be around 24.500. The number of self-employed persons was much more stable given the autonomy and unilateral control of the business and of the legislation that favored the economic problem, therefore their number fluctuated around 261,258 in 2000, up to 214,710 in 2007 and reaching 274,065 in 2015, this can also be due to the restriction of the activity of certain microenterprises or enterprises which chose the individual performance of an economic activity by being affected by the economic crisis. In 2013 in Romania operated almost 268000 of sole proprietorships, of which almost 244000 were self-employed persons and 24000 family associations. Compared to the aforementioned forms of organizations, the number of sole proprietorships had decreased significantly and constantly starting with the economic recovery period (in 2013 their number increased by 140000 compared to 2004). This is due almost exclusively to the fact that four of five family associations ceased their activity. The mass disappearance of family associations is partly due to legislative changes (since 2007 they have been registered as family firms), but probably also to the fact that once with the accession of the country to the European Union and the re-launch of credit market, financial resources that only trading companies with legal status could access became available. It is plausible to argue that many of the owners of dissolved family associations established limited liability companies, and the other passed to sole proprietorships. Current legislation entails the employment of third parties (outside the family) in addition to the owner, which in certain cases provides more favorable taxation conditions than in case of trading companies.

In 2016, the law which changes fundamentally the operation and registration of natural persons who carry out economic activities was published (more specifically self-employed persons PFA, sole proprietorships II and family firms IF). The law provides a maximum number of employees that such a person can have and a maximum number of scopes of business – NACE codes - that the person can carry out. In other words, essentially, natural persons can carry out economic activities as follows: individually and independently, as certified natural persons, as entrepreneurs and holders of an individual entity, as members of a family firm.

If we take a look at the legal background of SMEs supporting and at the role of EU directives in the supporting of entrepreneurship and microenterprises, we note a significant support. In this respect, the European Commission adopted the following principles: all new proposals which have impact on companies must be subject to rigorous researches on their potential impact on SMEs, the legislation can be different for microenterprises, small and medium-sized enterprises and large companies, in order to make sure that the created burden is divided proportionally between different types of company. In order to protect SMEs, certain support measures can be applied, decreased taxes and fees or even tax exemptions, in order to ensure a fair competition environment for all legal entities.

In Romania of the 2000s, the number of small enterprises increased, and survival statistics have improved as a sign that post-privatization "evolution" selection ended (Grabher & Stark, 1997). The adaptation ability of smaller business has improved considerably. General macroeconomic more favorable conditions also contributed to it (legislative stability, foreign capital flow, more accessible credits). These positive changes suddenly stopped during the economic and financial crisis. Global negative economic factors and the government's austerity measures – of which the introduction of flat tax and the fiscal tightening of flexible forms of employment – were the greatest danger and did not go easy with the SME sector, but as of 2012 the number of newly created enterprises exceeds the number of those which cease the activity, a fact that can be construed as a potential sign of recovery. These considerations can be broadly applied on sole proprietorships (independent and family firms), which are often treated separately in the statistics of enterprises. They do not have legal status, meaning that the assets of the enterprise and those of the individual/household are not separated, and the entrepreneur bears unlimited liability for his activities with all his assets.

Statistical evidence deals separately with entrepreneurial forms without legal status (independent enterprises and family firms) and publishes less information on them, although there are cases when the separation of microenterprises from individual entrepreneurial forms is not justified. From our data concerning the end of the 2000s, we can note for example that entrepreneurs flexibly choose between legal forms if concrete advantages motivates this fact. This happened in case of family associations, when their number decreased to one fifth in a period of only five years. Besides the changing of the related legislation of 2007 we assume that, following the accession to the European Union, many persons established small trading companies due to better opportunities to obtain financing, and other obtained individual entrepreneur certification, which, as of 2008, has offered a greater flexibility in the employment area. Family firms can be compared in terms of structure with microenterprises with a number of employees between 0-9, therefore we can hereby corroborate the evolution of family firms with that of the micro sector, so that to have an overall picture on the Romanian economy on this sector of small enterprises, some of them without legal status. Two important indicators which can guide us in our analysis are the following: the average number of employees and the turnover. Their reporting can provide us information on the average productivity of the respective sector. By taking into account the main economic activities, we conclude that the highest average number of employees was recorded in the wholesale trade sector in 2008 (403130), by reaching an upward trend until 2015 where values of 295674 are reached. The other sectors with similar growth are constructions, manufacturing industry and scientific and technical professional activities. The turnover has a discontinue evolution between 2009-2013 but does not record significant deviations, the fluctuations being related to legislative changes or the adherence to new forms of organization, the increase of the number of employees or liquidation of the company if we take into account post-crisis period 2008-2009. The sectors with a major turnover are manufacturing industry, wholesale and construction, last places being held by health and social care, respectively education. (15786154366 – manufacturing industry compared to 581440797, education 2015). The average of work which relates the turnover to the number of employees recorded significant values in 2008, respectively 2015 in what concerns constructions sector (RON 151,832 and RON 208,692), within this range the rate fluctuates by approximately 20-30%, being followed on the first place by the trade sector with a productivity of RON 218,577, respectively RON 329,487 in 2015. If we make a comparison with previous picture Evolution of family firms, we will notice the same slightly downward trend in 2008-2012, followed by a slight increase between 2013-2016, which explains the symbiotic nature of family firms.

4. Specific aspects regarding financial instrumentation

In order to support I.F. managers we will note certain specific aspects regarding their financial instrumentation, by making comparisons, from case to case, with the specific aspects of trading companies, from a general point of view. First of all, family firms use single-entry bookkeeping, with the possibility of using double-entry bookkeeping as of January 2015, trading companies use double-entry bookkeeping.

Single-entry bookkeeping is a real regime bookkeeping based on earnings and expenditures (with some exceptions, such as depreciation). The required accounting records are: Accounting journal and Inventory journal, which, as of March 1st, 2015, their registration with the tax bodies is no longer mandatory. The collections of the Receipts and disbursements journal shall include the following: the amounts collected from the performance of the activity, contributions in cash and by bank transfer performed on the start of the business or throughout the performance of the scope of business, the amounts received as bank credits or other loans, the amounts received as indemnities, the amounts received as sponsorship, patronage or donations, the amounts received as special support from non-reimbursable external funds (allowances), other collected amounts (such as refunds of taxes, fees and penalties).

The individuals who manage single-entry bookkeeping can use the following financial accounting forms provided by Order no. 170/2015 of the Minister of Public Finance, or only a part of them, according to the specific elements of the activity carried out: asset book, invoice – according to the provisions of the Tax Code, waybill, stock card, receipt, receipt for foreign currency operations, payment order, payment-collection order for the cashier's office, salary statement.

The registration of the income is based on the following supporting documents, such as: receipt, invoice, daily fiscal closing report, if electronic fiscal cash registers are used, the extract of the payment slip. The VAT payers shall also draw up the Sales journal where they will record the income earned. In case of VAT payers, the income, VAT excluded, are taken over from the corresponding columns of the Sales journal. The following elements are registered by the I.F. in the Receipts and disbursements journal, without representing gross income from a tax perspective: contributions in cash or RON equivalent of the contributions in kind performed on the start of the business or throughout the performance of the scope of business, the amounts received as bank credits or other loans from natural persons or legal entities, the amounts received as indemnities, the amounts received as sponsorship, patronage or donations.

Furthermore, not only operations in cash are recorded in the Receipts and disbursements journal, but also those performed through the current bank account. In the Receipts and disbursements journal, the transactions shall be recorded at the amount provided in the supporting documents, including the value added tax.

If the I.F. passes from the single-entry bookkeeping system to the double-entry bookkeeping system, this shall be achieved by taking over, based on the inventory and information on the receivables and debts, as initial balances, at the beginning of the financial year for which they chose to pass to the double-entry bookkeeping system. Unlike the double-entry bookkeeping system (usually practiced by the trading companies), single-entry bookkeeping consists of the following:

- simultaneous registration of an economic operation in two accounts;
- the creation of a logical link between the two accounts used in double-entry, operation called account correspondence;
- the practical-current representation of the double entry using value equality, called accounting formula.

We should note that beside the Accounting Journal which records chronologically all the financial operations and of the Inventory Journal which classifies into categories the assets and liabilities according to their nature, the following are also available:

The General Ledger where the movement and existence of all assets and liabilities are recorded on a monthly and systematic basis, by regrouping the accounts, which the draw up of the trial balance is based on, cash book, tax register. The balance sheet and the income statement are financial documents based on which the company's profitability is calculated, containing important information on profit, expenditures, assets and liabilities.

As shown, the accounting of family firms is a simpler one but grants us a lower degree of instrumentation of profitability elements, the main indicator taken into account being the income in reference to expenditures. Therefore, the main profitability rates that would give us an overview of the profitability of family firms are related to the accounting value (the value of receipts – the value of disbursements), existent inventories and costs rate. The main profitability indicator is the profitability threshold, namely the required sales volume where the profit generated by these sales covers the fixed costs of the business. The income remains the main indicator the tax of 16% (respectively 10 %) is related to, as a balance between collections and payments.

It is obvious that the option of the double-entry bookkeeping system provides more financial information and contributes to a greater flexibility of the organization. The double-entry bookkeeping system enables, for example, the purchase of a laptop by the registration of certain debts that are to be subsequently paid. The advantage of such a system is that the manager can have clear records of assets held, receivables and debts, respectively of the income and expenditures and can see on the basis of the accounting records, for example, what receivable he/she has to collect in relation to his/her customers. The disadvantage is that it involves a greater bureaucratic effort than the single-entry bookkeeping system.

What is to be taken into account is the fact that in both systems, the obligation of the economic entities refers to mandatory registers: Receipts and disbursements journal (chronological registration of all the amounts collected and paid, both in cash, and by bank accounts) and the Inventory Journal in case of single-entry bookkeeping the Accounting Journal and Inventory Journal, documents regulated as of January 1st, 2016 by Order 2634/2015 on accounting-financial documents, under the fulfillment of the accounting regulations in force. In both cases (double/single-entry bookkeeping), there is the obligation to perform the annual inventory of the assets and liabilities. From tax perspective, regardless the preferred option of accounting system, the annual net income shall be calculated according the provisions of the Tax Code, by filling in the Tax register, as the difference between gross income and deductible expenditures incurred for the purpose of gaining income.

Conclusions

Our goal was to present an overview of family firms, some of their features compared to other forms of similar organization (sole proprietorships, self-employed persons) so as to be given an exhaustive explanation on the place and role of family firms within the economy. We note that family firms are economic entities without legal status established by a natural person entrepreneur together with the family. The economic activities carried out by a family firm can be in the field of agriculture, industry, tourism, constructions, IT and trade. The legislative regulations they are subject to are different from those of trading companies, by being similar in terms of legislation to sole proprietorships and PFAs. In this respect, since 2008, a serial interruption has been registered in Romania, family associations being turned into family firms. The differences between them and other similar economic entities do not consist only in legislative changes on the organization form, fiscal obligations, taxes or modalities of accessing financing, but also in what concerns their financial instrumentation. The peculiarities of these documents are related to the supporting documents (Inventory Journal, Receipts and disbursements journal), to the regulations on single-entry bookkeeping system, the lack of mandatory reporting of NiRs (goods received notes) or mandatory registers. From this point of view, the calculation of the profitability in case of family firms is more difficult, the information being diminished compared to the case of trading companies which make available a balance sheet, an income statement or trial balance. The income remains the main performance indicator based on which the profitability threshold is anticipated, the coverage of expenditures and corporate tax (10 % as of January 1st, 2018). The possibility to pass to double-entry bookkeeping as of the establishment date (in case of PFAs) should be taken into account because of the access to more extensive information.

Furthermore, we should not forget that the IF represents an opportunity for thousands of families to ensure for themselves a decent economic existence, by being also an important factor for economic growth and development of some areas and localities of the country.

It is true that family firms are versatile, they start as small business cores and can be turned into real business conglomerates, therefore their importance should not be overlooked precisely from this trampoline perspective, a launch phase in support of small entrepreneurs who, in the beginning, need assistance and legislative conditions to support their development. As we have noted, the trend of microenterprises corroborated with that of the evolution of family and individual firms has been a stable one in recent years, although it faced some downs throughout 2008-2010. Even in a post-crisis time, a similar form of organization provided greater flexibility, fewer risks and higher degree of adaptability to the economic environment changes, and these things must be taken into account when we analyze the Romanian economic environment, with the fluctuations imposed by legislative coercions of recent years.

In other words, family firms can be the start-up engines of future business, by shaping the profile of an individual successful entrepreneur and even if their contribution to economic growth can be challenged, the perspective can be a positive one taking into account that the role of family firms is recognized at European level in niche economies and as developers of great businesses from the point of view of entrepreneurial ethics, sustained moral values and success through perseverance.

AGENT-BASED INTELLIGENT COLLABORATIVE MECHANISM

Adina-Georgeta CRETAN*

Abstract

This paper proposes a collaborative intelligent mechanism to support concurrent negotiations among organizations acting in the same industrial market. Each organization has limited resources and in order to better accomplish a higher external demand, the managers are forced to outsource parts of their contracts even to concurrent organizations. In this concurrent environment each organization wants to preserve its decision autonomy and to disclose as little as possible from its business information. The complexity of our negotiation model is done by the dynamic environment in which multi-attribute and multi-participant negotiations are racing over the same set of resources. We are using the metaphor Interaction Abstract Machines (IAMs) to model the parallelism and the non-deterministic aspects of our negotiation process.

Keywords: Negotiation model, web services, collaborative mechanism, dynamic environment, multi-agent systems.

1. Introduction

The advent of the Internet and more recently the cloud-computing trend have led to the development of various forms of virtual collaboration in which the organizations are trying to exploit the facilities of the network to achieve higher utilization of their resources. We try to provide support to these collaboration activities and we propose negotiation as a fundamental mechanism for such collaborations.

The concept of "Virtual Enterprise (VE)" or "Network of Enterprises" has emerged to identify the situation when several independent companies decided to collaborate and establish a virtual organization with the goal of increasing their profits. Camarinha-Matos defines the concept of VE as follows: "A Virtual Enterprise (VE) is a temporary alliance of enterprises that come together to share skills and resources in order to better respond to business opportunities and whose cooperation is supported by computer networks"[1].

In this paper we present how organizations participate and control the status of the negotiations and how the negotiation processes are managed.

The starting point in the development of this work was the goal to support small and medium enterprises that are not able or are not willing to perform alone a large contract since in this situation the association in a virtual alliance provides the opportunity to subcontract the tasks of the contract to other partners within the alliance. To achieve this goal, research was dedicated to the development of a model to coordinate the negotiations that take place within an inter-organizational alliance. Our research was focused on the topics of virtual alliances, automation of the negotiations and of coordination aimed to provide the mechanisms for coordinating the negotiations that take place among autonomous enterprises that are grouped in a virtual alliance.

Assuming that the nature of the roles that may be played in a negotiation are similar in multiple approaches, the number of participants involved at the same time in the same negotiation is considerably different.

Depending on the number of participants involved in a negotiation, we may distinguish various negotiation types: bilateral negotiation (one-to-one); one-to-many negotiation; many-to-many negotiation.

Taking into account the complexity of the negotiations modeled by multi-agent system, we can state that to conduct in an efficient fashion one or many negotiations that involve a large number of participants and to properly account for all negotiation dimensions, it is necessary to develop a coordination process that is defined outside of the specific constraints of a given decision mechanism or communication protocol.

The negotiation process was exemplified by scenarios tight together by a virtual alliance of the autonomous gas stations. Typically, these are competing companies. However, to satisfy the demands that go beyond the vicinity of a single gas station and to better accommodate the market requirements, they must enter in an alliance and must cooperate to achieve common tasks. The type of alliance that we use to define their association emphasizes that each participant to this alliance is completely autonomous i.e., it is responsible of its own amount of work and the management of its resources. The manager of a gas station wants to have a complete decision-making power over the administration of his contracts, resources, budget and clients. At the same time, the manager attempts to cooperate with other gas stations to accomplish the global task at hand only through a minimal exchange of information. This exchange is minimal in the sense that the manager is in charge and has the ability to select the information exchanged.

When a purchasing request reaches a gas station, the manager analyses it to understand if it can be accepted, taking into account job schedules and resources availability. If the manager accepts the purchasing request, he may decide to perform the job locally or to partially subcontract it, given the gas station resource availability and technical capabilities. If the manager decides to subcontract a job, he starts a negotiation within the collaborative infrastructure with selected participants. In case that the negotiation results in an agreement, a contract is settled between the subcontractor and the contractor gas station, which defines the business process outsourcing jobs and a set of obligation relations among participants[2].

The gas station alliance scenario shows a typical example of the SME virtual alliances where partner organizations may be in competition with each other, but may want to cooperate in order to be globally more responsive to market demand.

The collaborative infrastructure, that we describe, should flexibly support negotiation processes respecting the autonomy of the partners.

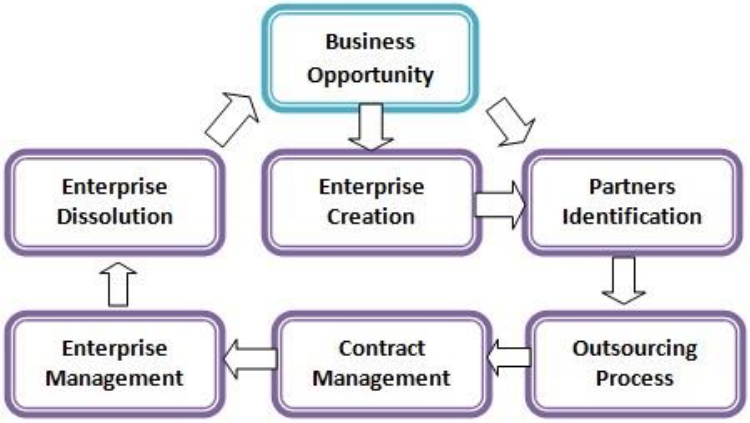
We are starting with a presentation in Section 2 of a VE life cycle model. Section 3 presents a formal interaction model to manage multiple concurrent negotiations by using the metaphor Interaction Abstract Machines (IAMs). Then, we are briefly describing in Section 4 the collaborative negotiation architecture.

The main objective of this paper is to propose an intelligent collaborative mechanism in a dynamical system with autonomous organizations. In Section 5 we define the Coordination Components that manage different negotiations which may take place simultaneously. Finally, Section 6 concludes this paper.

2. The main steps of the Virtual Enterprise life cycle

The life cycle of virtual enterprise is classified into six phases. The relevance in different phases is shown in Figure 1 and the statement for each phase is given as follows:

Fig. 1. Life-cycle of a virtual enterprise



a) VE creation

When a business opportunity is detected, there is a need to plan and create the VE, identify partners, establish the contract or cooperation agreement among partners, in order to manage the processes of the VE.

b) Partners search and selection

The selection of business partners is a very important and critical activity in the operation of a company. Partners search can be based on a number of different information sources, being private, public, or independent. The enterprise's private suppliers' list is a data repository that contains information about the companies that have had commercial relationships with this enterprise. This information composes an Internal Suppliers Directory (ISD). External sources include directories maintained by industrial associations, commerce chambers, or Internet services. This information composes the External Suppliers Directory (ESD). Another emerging solution is the creation of clusters of enterprises that agreed to cooperate and whose skills and available resources are registered in a common SME Cluster Directory (CD).

c) Outsourcing of tasks within a VE

In this stage of a VE life cycle, we can assume that a gas station company receives a customer demand. In this respect, the Manager of this company may negotiate the outsourcing of a schedule tasks that cannot perform locally with multiple partners of selected gas station companies, geographically distributed. The Manager can select the partners of the negotiation among the database possible partners according to their declared resources and the knowledge he has about them.

The outcome of a negotiation can be "success" (the task was fully outsourced), "failure" (no outsourcing agreement could be reached) or "partial" (only part of the task could be outsourced).

d) Contract management in the VE

In case the negotiation process ends in a successful, a contract is established between the outsourcing company and the insourcing ones. The contract is a complex object, which is based of trust in this coordination mechanism. Moreover, it contains a set of specific rules, such as penalties, expressing obligation relations between the participants.

In case of failure of a partner, the Manager will have to supervise if the obligations are honored (for example to oblige the partner to finish his work or to set penalties) and to modify the business process renegotiating parts of the work that have not been realized.

e) Management of the VE

A VE is a dynamic entity in which a new company may join or leave it. Members may need to leave for many reasons, when they change their activity or when they don't want any more to collaborate with the partners of the VE. In case of departure from the VE, the leaving partner may either notify all the partners. It also may leave without giving any information. The departure of a partner from the VE will have an important impact on ongoing contracts especially when this partner is an insourcer of an important amount of task.

f) VE dissolution - after stopping the execution of the business processes.

3. Building the Negotiation Model

In this section we propose a formal model to settle and to manage the coordination rules of one or more negotiations, which can take place in parallel. We will introduce the metaphor of Interaction Abstract Machines (IAMs) to describe the negotiation model. We introduce the Program Formula to define the methods used to manage the parallel evolution of multiple negotiations.

3.1. The Metaphor Interaction Abstract Machines (IAMs)

The metaphor Interaction Abstract Machines (IAMs) will be used to facilitate modeling of the evolution of a multi-attribute, multi-participant, multi-phase negotiation. In IAMs, a system consists of different entities and each entity is characterized by a state that is represented as a set of resources [4]. It may evolve according to different laws of the following form, also called "methods":

A1@...@An <>- B1@...@Bm

A method is executed if the state of the entity contains all resources from the left side (called the "head") and, in this case, the entity may perform a transition to a new state where the old resources (A1,…,An) are replaced by the resources (B1,…,Bm) on the right side (called the "body"). All other resources of the entity that do not participate in the execution of the method are present in the new state.

The operators used in a method are:

- the operator @ assembles together resources that are present in the same state of an entity;
- the operator <>- indicates the transition to a new state of an entity;
- the operator & is used in the body of a method to connect several sets of resources;
- the symbol "T" is used to indicate an empty body.

In IAMs, an entity has the following characteristics:

- if there are two methods whose heads consist of two sets of distinct resources, then the methods may be executed in parallel;
- if two methods share common resources, then a single method may be executed and the selection procedure is made in a non-deterministic manner.

In IAMs, the methods may model four types of transition that may occur to an entity: transformation, cloning, destruction and communication. Through the methods of type transformation the state of an entity is simply transformed in a new state. If the state of the entity contains all the resources of the head of a transformation method, the entity performs a transition to a new state where the head resources are replaced by the body resources of the method. Through the methods of type cloning an entity is cloned in a finite number of entities that have the same state. If the state of the entity contains all the resources of a head of a cloning method and if the body of the method contains several sets of distinct resources, then the entity is cloned several times, as determined by the number of distinct sets, and each of the resulting clones suffers a transformation by replacing the head of the method with the corresponding body. In the case of a destruction of the state, the entity disappears. If the state of the entity contains all the resources of the head of a transformation method and, if the body of the method is the resource T, then the entity disappears.

In IAMs, the communication among various entities is of type broadcasting and it is represented by the symbol "^". This symbol is used to the heads of the methods to predefine the resources involved in the broadcasting. These resources are inserted in the current entity and broadcasted to all the entities existent in the system, with the exception of the current entity. This mechanism of communication thus executes two synchronous operations:

- transformation: if all resources that are not pre-defined at the head of the method enter in collision, then the pre-defined resources are inserted in the entity and are immediately consumed through the application of the method;
- communication: insertion of the copies of the pre-defined resources in all entities that are present in the system at that time instance.

3.2. Modelling the Negotiation Process

According to our approach regarding the negotiation, the participants to a negotiation may propose offers and each participant may decide in an autonomous manner to stop a negotiation either by accepting or by rejecting the offer received. Also, depending on its role in a negotiation, a participant may invite new participants to the negotiation. To model this type of negotiation, we will make use of the previously defined particles and we will propose the methods to manage the evolution of these particles.

As we have seen, a characteristic of negotiation is its multi-node image, which allows parallel development of several phases of negotiation. A possibility to continue a negotiation is to create a new phase of negotiation from an existing one. In this regard, the Figure 2 presents the possible evolutions of a ph0 phase of negotiation described by the atom (s,ph0).

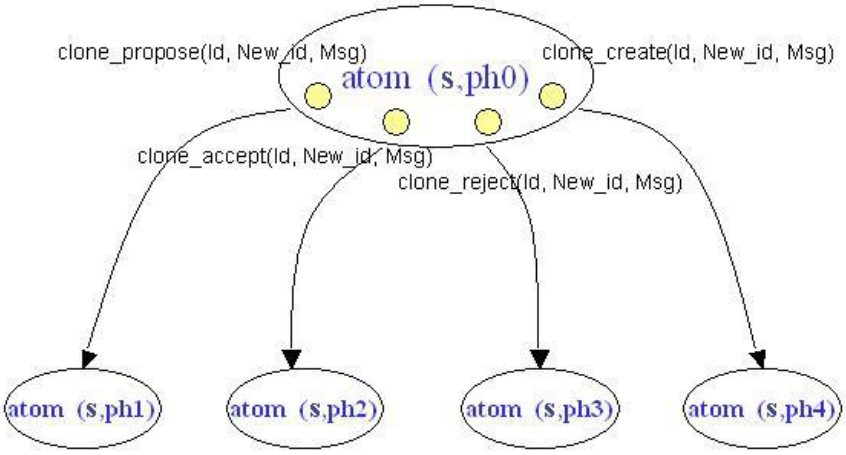

Fig. 2. Evolution of negotiation process by cloning an atom

In accordance with the aspects of negotiation for which changes are made, three new negotiation phases are possible:

- evolution of negotiated attributes and / or of their value from atom(s,ph0) to atom(s,ph1): a participant sends a new proposal thus achieving either the contraction of the negotiation attributes, or their extension, by the introduction of new attributes to negotiate;
- evolution of the negotiation status perceived by one of the sequences sharing the new negotiation phase: one of the participants accepts - atom(s,ph2) - or refuses a proposal - atom(s,ph3);
- evolution of participants and of dependences among negotiations by the evolution of the number of sequences sharing the same negotiation phase: a sequence can invite a new sequence to share a new phase of negotiation atom(s,ph4).

Through the use of the metaphor IAMs, the evolutions of the negotiation phases correspond to the evolutions at the atoms level. The evolution may be regarded as a process consisting of two stages: a cloning operation of the atom existent in the initial stage and a transformation operation within the cloned atom to allow for the new negotiation phase.

The cloning operation is expressed by a set of methods involving the particles event and these methods are used to facilitate the evolution of the negotiation.

We propose the following methods associated to the particles event to model the cloning of an atom where new message particles are introduced:

- The method Propose is associated to the particle event clone_propose(Id, New_id, Msg) and models the introduction of a new proposal (clone_propose), made by one of the participants to the negotiation.

This method is expressed:

name(Id) @ enable @ clone_propose(Id, New_ id, Msg)<>- (enable @ name(Id)) & (freeze @ name(New_ id) @ propose(Rname, Content))

The atom identified by the particle name(Id) is cloned. The new proposal contained in the particle propose(Rname, Content) will be introduced in the new atom name(New_id).

- The method Accept is associated to the event particle clone_accept(Id, New_id, Msg) and models the case when one of the participants has sent a message of acceptance of an older proposal (clone_accept).

This method is expressed:

name(Id) @ enable @ clone_accept(Id, New_ Id, Msg) <>- (enable @ name(Id)) & (freeze @ name(New_ Id) @ accept(Rname))

The atom identified by the name(Id) is cloned. The acceptance message contained in the particle accept(Rname) will be introduced in the new atom name (New_id).

- The method Reject is associated to the event particle clone_reject(Id, New_id, Msg) and models the denial of an older proposal (clone_reject) made by one of the participants.

This method is expressed:

name(Id) @ enable @ clone_reject(Id, New_ Id, Msg) <>- (enable @ name(Id)) & (freeze @ name(New_ Id) @ reject(Rname))

The atom identified by the particle name(Id) is cloned. The refusal message contained in the particle reject(Rname) will be introduced in the new atom name(New_ id).

- The method Create is associated to the event particle clone_create(Id, New_id, Msg). This method models the invitation of a new sequence (clone_create) made by one of the participants for sharing the newly created negotiation phase.

This method is expressed:

name(Id) @ enable @ clone_create(Id, New_Id, Msg) @ <>- (enable @name(Id)) & (freeze @ name(New_Id) @ create(Rname, Type))

The atom identified by the particle name(Id) is cloned, and a particle create(Rname, Type) is introduced in the new atom name(New_ id) that will further generate the occurrence of a new representation particle for the new sequence participating in the negotiation.

These methods are described in a generic way. Thus, new particles may be added depending on how the current sequence builds negotiation graphs.

By these methods of the event particles, the duplication of an atom has been modeled, in which new message particles are introduced. In the new atom, the representation particles for the current negotiation phase remain identical with those of the first atom.

4. The Collaborative Negotiation Architecture

The main objective of this software infrastructure is to support collaborating activities in virtual enterprises. In VE partners are autonomous companies with the same object of activity, geographically distributed.

Taking into consideration, the constraints imposed by the autonomy of participants within VE, the only way to share information and resources is the negotiation process.

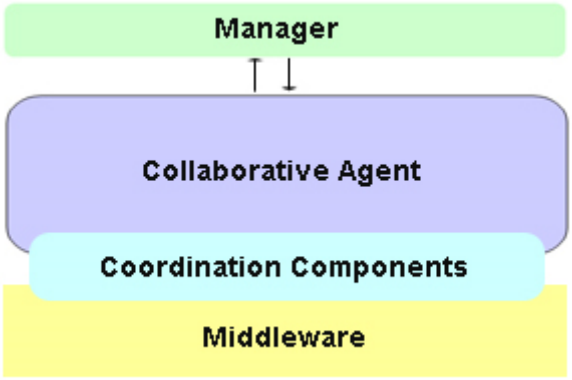

Fig. 3. The architecture of the collaborative system

This infrastructure is structured in four main layers[1]: Manager, Collaborative Agent, Coordination Components and Middleware. A first layer is dedicated to the Manager of each organization of the alliance. A second layer is dedicated to the Collaborative Agent who assists its gas station manager at a global level (negotiations with different participants on different jobs) and at a specific level (negotiation on the same job with different participants) by coordinating itself with the Collaborative Agents of the other partners through the fourth layer, Middleware[2]. The third layer, Coordination Components, manages the coordination constraints among different negotiations which take place simultaneously.

A Collaborative Agent aims at managing the negotiations in which its own gas station is involved (e.g. as initiator or participant) with different partners of the alliance.

Each negotiation is organized in three main steps: initialization; refinement of the job under negotiation and closing[3]. The initialization step allows to define what has to be negotiated (Negotiation Object) and how (Negotiation Framework)[4]. A selection of negotiation participants can be made using history on passed negotiation, available locally or provided by the negotiation infrastructure[5]. In the refinement step, participants exchange proposals on the negotiation object trying to satisfy their constraints[6]. The manager may participate in the definition and evolution of negotiation frameworks and objects[7]. Decisions are taken by the manager, assisted by his Collaborative Agent[8]. For each negotiation, a Collaborative Agent manages one or more negotiation objects, one framework and the negotiation status. A manager can specify some global parameters: duration; maximum number of messages to be exchanged; maximum number of candidates to be considered in the negotiation and involved in the contract; tactics; protocols for the Collaborative Agent interactions with the manager and with the other Collaborative Agents [9].

5. Coordination Components

In order to handle the complex types of negotiation scenarios, we propose five different components[10]:

- Subcontracting (resp. Contracting) for subcontracting jobs by exchanging proposals among participants known from the beginning;
- Block component for assuring that a task is entirely subcontracted by the single partner;
- Divide component manages the propagation of constraints among several slots, negotiated in parallel and issued from the split of a single job;
- Broker: a component automating the process of selection of possible partners to start the negotiation;
- Transport component implements a coordination mechanism between two ongoing negotiations in order to find and synchronize on the common transport of both tasks.

These components are able to evaluate the received proposals and, further, if these are valid, the components will be able to reply with new proposals constructed based on their particular coordination constraints[11].

From our point of view the coordination problems managing the constraints between several negotiations can be divided into two distinct classes of components:

- Coordination components in closed environment: components that build their images on the negotiation in progress and manage the coordination constraints according to information extracted only from their current negotiation graph (Subcontracting, Contracting, Block, Divide);
- Coordination components in opened environment: components that also build their images on the negotiation in progress but they manage the coordination constraints according to available information in data structures representing certain characteristics of other negotiations currently ongoing into the system (Broker, Transport).

Following the descriptions of these components we can state that unlike the components in closed environment (Subcontracting, Contracting, Block, Divide) that manage the coordination constraints of a single negotiation at a time, the components in opened environment (Broker, Transport) allow the coordination of constraints among several different negotiations in parallel[12].

The novelty degree of this software architecture resides in the fact that it is structured on four levels, each level approaching a particular aspect of the negotiation process. Thus, as opposed to classical architectures which achieve only a limited coordination of proposal exchanges which take place during the same negotiation, the proposed architecture allows approaching complex cases of negotiation coordination. This aspect has been accomplished through the introduction of coordination components level, which allows administrating all simultaneous negotiations in which an alliance partner can be involved.

The coordination components have two main functions such as: i) they mediate the transition between the negotiation image at the Collaboration Agent level and the image at the Middleware level; ii) they allow implementing various types of appropriate behavior in particular cases of negotiation. Thus we can say that each component corresponding to a particular negotiation type.

Following the descriptions of this infrastructure we can state that we developed a framework to describe a negotiation among the participants to a virtual enterprise. To achieve a generic coordination framework, nonselective and flexible, we found necessary to first develop the structure of the negotiation process that helps us to describe the negotiation in order to establish the general environment where the participants may negotiate. To develop this structure, we proposed a succession of phases that are specific to different stages of negotiation (initialization, negotiation, contract adoption) that provided a formal description of the negotiation process.

The advantage of this structure of the negotiation process consists on the fact that it allows a proper identification of the elements that constitute the object of coordination, of the dependencies that are possible among the existing negotiations within the VE, as well as the modality to manage these negotiations at the level of the coordination components.

The negotiation process involves several parties (for several bilateral negotiations), each having different criteria, constraints and preferences that determine their individual areas of interest[13]. Criteria, constraints and preferences of a participant are partially or totally unknown to the other participants. The job under negotiation is described as a multi-attribute object. Each attribute is related to local constraints and evaluation criteria, but also to global constraints drawing dependencies with other attributes[14].

In conclusion, the proposed architecture provides the following features:

- to define the negotiation process structure: participants, interaction protocol, negotiation protocol, tactics and coordination components, the negotiation object and the negotiation strategies;
- the modeling all negotiations for a gas station in the form of a set of bilateral negotiations, which the agent can operate independently;
- the modeling of the coordination among the negotiations based on a set of coordination components and the synchronization mechanisms at the middleware level.

Thus, we can say, that we have proposed an infrastructure that manages, in a decentralized manner, the coordination of multi-phase negotiations on a multi-attribute object and among a lot of participants.

Conclusions

This paper proposes an intelligent mechanism for modeling and managing parallel and concurrent negotiations. The business-to-business interaction context in which our negotiations take place forces us to model the unexpected and the dynamic aspects of this environment. An organization may participate in several parallel negotiations. Each negotiation may end with the acceptance of a contract that will automatically reduce the available resources and it will modify the context for the remaining negotiations. We have modeled this dynamic evolution of the context using IAMs metaphor that allows us to limit the acceptance of a negotiation to the available set of resources. The proposed negotiation infrastructure aims to help the different SMEs to fulfil their entire objectives by mediating the collaboration among the several organizations gathered into a virtual enterprise.

A specific feature that distinguishes the negotiation structure proposed in this work from the negotiations with imposed options (acceptance or denial) is that it allows the modification of the proposals through the addition of new information (new attributes) or through the modification of the initial values of certain attributes (for example, in the case of gas stations the gasoline price may be changed).

In the current work we have described in our collaborative mechanism only the interactions with the goal to subcontract or contract a task. A negotiation process may end with a contract and in that case the supply schedule management and the well going of the contracted task are both parts of the outsourcing process.

In order to illustrate our approach we have used a sample scenario where distributed gas stations have been united into virtual enterprise. Take into consideration this scenario, one of the principal objectives was related to the generic case and means that this proposed infrastructure can be used in other activity domains.

Regarding research perspective continuation, we will focus on the negotiation process and the coordination process taking into consideration the contracts management process. In this way the coordination can administrate not only the dependence between the negotiations and the contracts which are formed and with execution dependences of those contracts.

HISTORICAL COST ACCOUNTING OR FAIR VALUE ACCOUNTING: A HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

Valentin Gabriel CRISTEA[*]

Abstract

The two paradigms about the accounting valuation systems are discussed: historical cost accounting and fair value accounting. The advantages and disadvantages of the historical cost accounting and fair value accounting in the historical perspective are balanced.

Each of two estimation bases could not resolve all the problems. The value of the items presented in the financial statements is a key aspect, being more dependent on more evaluation systems, that may estimate and reproduce the exact reality of the entity.

In 2009, Bignon, Biondi and Ragot argue that the usage of FVA is limited by asymmetries of information, complementarities and specificities. In presence of these conditions, the evaluations based on fair value can endanger the reliability of accounts and introduce the risk of incorporating financial volatility into the accounts. They have chosen for the historical cost.

In 2008, Ronen considered the fair value as a methodology that encompasses different approaches for the estimation of exit values.

In real economy, the concept of physical maintenance of capital should prevail and, in it, the "original" series should be restricted to the "numeraire" values: cash and cash substitutes. The elements considered as "derivative" value are evaluated by means of the only reliable method: the HCA.

This would allow to define, in the most complex generalization, a mixed "system", where every entity could assess each items that are financial investments then evaluated according to FVA. Then, they are attributed to the first series, and the items belong to a 'physical combination ordered to the production of income'. Then, they are evaluated according to HCA.

1. Introduction

The fair value measurement has got a disputed position within the accounting regulatory committees and the accounting theory since 2008.

As it is known, the fair value measurement implies that financial assets and liabilities are measured at their „market value"[1] where the value under the theoretical assumption of a perfect, efficient and complete market that should therefore imply that the financial statements meet the needs of investors and creditors[2].

IASB proposed to use a model for measuring the value of the flows generated by the assets, if the market is imperfect and incomplete.

The fair value debate is before the financial crisis in 2008.

The analysis of the studies on accounting indicates the existence of critics between the effectiveness of the fair value measurement in time and the stability of the economic system.

In specific literature, there are two opposite central paradigms of evaluation: the Fair Value Accounting (FVA) and the Historical Cost Accounting (HCA).

1.1. Fair Value Accounting (FVA) versus Historical Cost Accounting (HCA)

By analysing the accounting literature, it seems that they are different because of the typology primary criteria used to choice between FVA and HCA are the different typologies of economic contexts and markets and financial reporting information.

By assuming that the market is perfect and complete, FVA measurement can continue to provide relevant information for investors and creditors.

Laux and Leuz, in 2009, said that adoption of HCA instead of FVA can not be fruitful in times of crisis.

The critics on fair value measurement do not translate in support of historical cost measurement. By assuming that the market is imperfect and incomplete, HCA measurement can focus on little relevant information to the management while the fair value measurement can provide a misinterpretation of the items of the balance sheet.

2. Fair Value Accounting (FVA) or Historical Cost Accounting (HCA): A Historical Perspective

The choosing of the model of the accounting evaluation has been debated more from traditional evaluation at historical cost to the evaluation at market values to justify the investment decision. The results are the notions as "accounting at market value" or "accounting at fair value".

The need of a fair value measurement for financial reporting appeared mainly from the investors searching better management of their share capital, thus resulting the choice of managers to the concept of shareholder value by maximizing profits. In this view, the managers are interested in increasing the market value of shares, increasing business value and the size of dividends.

Considering that the value may be more useful than the price, managers use evaluation alternatives, usually with favorable implications for the value of the entity's assets. There is a debate that the investors must have equal rights with the suppliers, employees, customers, community, not a coalition of interests.

The managers must search the entity's common wealth maximization, approaching thus the concept of stakeholder value, which regards beyond the monetary value, including a moral value[3].

The IASB conceptual accounting frameworks gives some evaluation bases: historical cost, current cost, realizable value and present value without indicating a preference for one or other of these evaluation bases.

According to IFRS 13, "Fair value is the price that would be received to sell an asset or to pay in order to transfer a liability from a common transaction between the market participants at the date of the evaluation."[4]

In 2009, Deaconu said that the fair value measurement provides better information and comparison on the current and future performance of the entity as it comprises a current information, offered by the market which facilitates comparability of the information[5].

Fair value measurement reduces the difference between the accounting value and the stock value for listed entities, it involves evaluating all or most of the elements of financial statements at amounts based on the capital market information.

Fair value measurement has a more universal character than the historical cost.

As the disadvantages of the fair value, Deaconu enumerated that it does not always provide reliable information because it is difficult to calculate by the staff entity without the contribution of an evaluation expert, especially in the case of unlisted entities for which the stock market does not give a clue.

The fair value creates difficulties in determining distributable income, if we consider that the new values of the assets, equity and liabilities are potential, latent and volatile values.

Fair value measurement provides a short-term vision on the financial situation of the entity.

The compared analysis of the evaluation bases of assets and liabilities based on the entity's financial position is valuated, proves that they differ in terms of credibility and relevance to the users of the information presented in the financial statements, lacking general applicability, and, it is difficult for the accounting standards and setters to satisfy the interests of all users.

At international level, fair value measurement raises a number of issues due to the diversity and complexity of individual cases of the economic reality to be translated.

If no evaluation is absolutely satisfying, the European accounting rules were targeted without specifying historical cost and the fair value, they were later updated so that they could not exclude historical cost combined with other evaluation bases, or using alternatives, thus reproducing the international norms.

The main idea of fair value measurement is that the entity's assets and liabilities are presented in the balance sheet at values close to those existing on the market.

In practice, fair value would be: utility value or the value of future cash flows, market value, replacement value, net book value. In view of international approaches there are debates about the content of the concept of fair value, the methods of obtaining and its applications as it is a much broader concept than the market value.

In 2010, Tournier claimed that the concept of fair value is assigned either the basic quality of evaluation, convention or accounting principle, or an application of the market value and not least an estimation and not a conclusion as with the market value, and an objective of the evaluation[6].

In 2003, Ristea stated that historical cost accounting is the accounting system accepted without reserves by the accounting profession thanks to the merit of being objective, being based on transactions already made and being generally understood by users.

The deficiencies consecrated to the historical are criticized, being considered that they are based on older principles generated by the needs of industrial enterprises, thus explaining the absence of recognition in the balance sheet structures of the derivatives. The historical cost measurement helps leaders to manage financial risks.

As the drawbacks of applying the historical cost evaluation model it is mentioned: the undervaluation or overvaluation of some elements in the financial statement, the real value of the items in the balance sheet and the profit and loss account. The current requirements of fidelity, imposed by the financial statements, is justified to evaluate all elements in the financial statements with the historical cost measurement or other evaluation bases.

The accounting research concentrates on the comparison between two approaches to accounting: the approach based on the principle of fair value and the approach based on the prudence and historical cost principles. The IASB led to the change of accounting measurements to the FVA, while the European legislation had focused on the Historical Cost Accounting (HCA) before IFRS adoption. Many researchers suggested that FVA standards in the financial reporting played a major role. The crisis shows the trade-off between relevance and reliability of accounting information in markets that are above all imperfect and incomplete.

In crisis situations, there is a gap between market value and real value of assets and liabilities appearing on the financial statement of firms.

In 2009, Bignon, Biondi and Ragot argue that the usage of FVA is limited by asymmetries of information, complementarities and specificities. In presence of these conditions, the evaluations based on fair value can endanger the reliability of accounts and introduce the risk of incorporating financial volatility into the accounts[7]. They have chosen for the historical cost.

In 2008, Ronen considered the fair value as a methodology that encompasses different approaches for the estimation of exit values. Ronen proposed to compare the fair value or the exit value of assets and liabilities with the use value of asset combinations[8].

Edwards and Bell, highlighting income, proposed to use ex post accounting income to evaluate performance on the base of current cost measures.

In 2008, Whittington shows that it is more important not to search for a theoretical and universally valid measurements method, but to define a clear objective and choose the measurement method that best answers that objective with reference to specific problems[9].

An argument against to the fair value measurement in financial reporting is that does not indicate the real and useful 'value' of the items of the balance sheet for the firms.

Besta suggested in the accounting system in Italy the Substitution-Cost Accounting, that belongs, to the main domain of FVA[10].

Paton, in 1922, found a strong ideological support in HCA. The historical cost is a basic criterion of evaluation of nearly all assets and liabilities. The historical cost measured exactly with the cash or cash substitutes ("numeraire") needed for buying (selling).

3. Conclusions

Each of two estimation bases could not resolve all the problems. The value of the items presented in the financial statements is a key aspect, being more dependent on more evaluation systems, that may estimate and reproduce the exact reality of the entity.

Problems arise when the estimation of the evaluation should be made at market value in the event of a market in periods of growth or decline, or in the absence of an active market.

Each situation involves professional judgment and the possibility of manipulation by the person making the necessary estimates.

In real economy, the concept of physical maintenance of capital should prevail and, in it, the "original" series should be restricted to the "numeraire" values: cash and cash substitutes. The elements considered as "derivative" value are evaluated by means of the only reliable method: the HCA.

This would allow to define, in the most complex generalization, a mixed "system", where every entity could assess each items that are financial investments then evaluated according to FVA. Then, they are attributed to the first series, and the items belong to a 'physical combination ordered to the production of income'. Then, they are evaluated according to HCA.

According to Wittington, we must define a clear objective and choose the measurement method that best answers that objective.

HISTORICAL COST ACCOUNTING OR FAIR VALUE ACCOUNTING FROM THE EARNINGS AND ASSET IMPAIRMENT PERSPECTIVE

Valentin Gabriel CRISTEA*

Abstract

This article studies the earnings and practice of depreciation of assets through the two accounting valuation systems: fair value accounting or historical cost accounting. It balances the methods used in each of the two accounting valuation systems: historical cost accounting and fair value accounting.

Many firms that did use value in use to arrive at their asset impairment loss will have declined a net realizable value figure as this would have been reduce than the value in use figure. If the firms had used net realizable value instead of value in use, this would have cause a higher asset impairment charge.

For the firms that use net realizable value for the purposes of determining the asset impairment charge this indicates that their net realizable value is higher than any calculated value in use figure.

In this way, that many firms report using more than one valuation method depending on the type of asset that is impaired and the results become difficult to indicate any conclusions based on the information available, despite the initial observation that value in use appears very used.

I claim that the use of fair value concept may have a different effect on the earnings quality for Romania because of less liquid or inactive markets. In this way, fair values will more probably be estimated by the use of valuation techniques which enables earnings management and could lead to lower quality of reported earnings.

Then, earnings under more fair value-based reporting system have less aggregate quality rankings for firms in Romania. I get the evidence that the extent of more fair-value-based other comprehensive income is negatively related to aggregate earnings quality for firms.

1. Introduction

The concept of asset impairment relates closely to that of an asset write-down[1].

Elliott and Shaw[2] in 1988, Walsh, Craig and Clarke in 1991, Elliott and Hanna in 1996, Jordan and Clarke 2004, Sevin and Schroeder in 2005, Andrews in 2006, Ball and Shivakumar in 2003, Watts in 2003, LaFond and Watts in 2008 claimed that the asset impairment loss recognition is linked to both the issue of earnings management and the principle of conservatism.

Trueman and Titman[3] in 1988, Walsh et al in 1991, Bartov in 1993, Basu in 1997, Burgstahler and Dichev in 1997, Healy and Wahlen in 1999, Shaw in 2003, Jordan and Clark in 2004, Sevin and Schroeder in 2005 staed that asset impairment constitutes a form of income smoothing in terms of managing the earnings.

Basu[4] in 1997, Ball and Shivakumar in 2003 obtained the fact that in the current financial reporting regime, earnings tends to be skewed towards loss recognition.

1.1. The fair value accounting of earnings qualities

Christensen and Demski[5] in 2003, Ronen and Yaari[6] in 2008 showed that earnings quality provide valuation relevant information and provide contracting-relevant information. The accounting information have two roles: informativeness and stewardship.

Ronen and Yaari accentuate that informativeness role appeares from investors' demand for information to predict future cash flows and assesses their risk.

In 1990, Watts and Zimmerman showed that he stewardship objective of accounting comes from separation between ownership and management in public companies.

We wonder: Is income growth the result of changing regulations related to asset depreciation testing?

2. The earnings and asset impairment perspective

According to IFRS 13, "Fair value is the price that would be received to sell an asset or to pay in order to transfer a liability from a common transaction between the market participants at the date of the evaluation[7]."

Nissim[8], in 2003, Hitz[9], in 2007, Ryan[10], in 2008, Fiechter and Meyer[11], in 2009, Chen et al.[12], in 2010, stated that the estimation of fair value (marking-to-model) creates opportunities for the exercise of management judgment which can decrease the quality of financial reporting.

Dechow and Schrand, in 2004, define that a high-quality reported earnings reflect actual operating performance, indicate further performance.

The majority of the studies on fair value accounting and earnings quality are oriented on developed, market-oriented countries.

Barth[13], in 1994, Ahmed and Takeda in 1995, Petroni and Wahlen, in 1995, Eccher et al, in 1996, Venkatachalam in 1996, Park et al., in 1999, Carroll in 2003, Khurana and Kim in 2003, Hassan et al., in 2006, Bhat in 2008, Goh et al., in 2009, Kolev in 2009, Song et al, in 2010, Bischof et al., in 2011, studied fair values of financial assets, while Barth and Clinch[14], in 1998, Aboody et al., in 1999, Richard Dietrich et al., in 2000, Easton et al., in 2003, worked on fair values of fixed assets. Moreover, Aboody et al.[15], in 1999, in their research, have given the existence of association between the changes in fair values of fixed assets and future operating cash flow and future earnings.

Hill[16], in 2009, underlined that the empirical results regarding predictive ability of fair values could not be generalized to more volatile market conditions and more subjective applications of fair value valuation.

Dhaliwal et al.[17], in 1998, Biddle and Choi, in 2006, Casta et al., in 2007, Chambers et al, in 2007, Goncharov and Hodgson, in 2008, Kanagaretnam et al., in 2009, Jones and Smith, in 2011, investigated fair value gains and losses through other comprehensive income.

Hitz[18], in 2007, pointed that change in fair value consists of an expected and unexpected component, so gains and losses from fair value re measurement could be correlated in time for some assets.

IAS 36 Impairment of Assets[19] claims that an asset is impaired when the recoverable amount of the asset is lower than the book value.

Then, recoverable amount is exact as the higher of net realizable value and value in use. In this view, value in use represents the budgeted discounted future cash flows expected from continued use of the asset.

Value in use has been the preponderent disclosed valuation method and this can appear to indicate a high degree of discretionary choice in terms of management's decision of the amount of an asset impairment charge.

Moses[20], in 1987, Strong and Meyer, in 1987, Beatty and Weber, in 2006, Cotter et al., in 1998, Zucca and Campbell, in 1992, Beattie et al., in 1994, Francis et al., in 1996, Peek, in 2004, Jordan and Clark, in 2004, Sevin and Schroeder, in 2005, Walsh et al., in 1991, Elliott and Shaw, in 1988 and Riedl, in 2004 outlined that there was a discretionary choice available to firms for fair value measurement to determinate the asset impairment loss.

Using the annual reports of the sample of 94 corporations in U.K., experts has analyzed to assess the preferred method of valuation used in the determination of an asset impairment loss.

Bonbright[21], in 1937, claimed that "the valuation method employed in order to arrive at the reported asset impairment loss is important as the decision is based on the deprival value concept".

Barth et al[22], in 1995, Bernard et al[23], in 1995, Hodder et al.[24], in 2006, Plantin et al.[25], in 2008, Sole et al.,[26] in 2009, Magnan[27], in 2009, Sun et al.[28], in 2011, emphasized that historical-cost-based reporting does not recognize changes in values until the asset is sold. Some empirical studies almost prove that the move towards fair value accounting leads to increased earnings. Barth, in 1994, underlined that financial statement volatility was not an indication of flawed financial reporting. Barth said that the uncertainty and timing of future cash flow is a complete financial reporting. Barth has found three possible sources of financial statements volatility associated with fair values: inherent volatility, estimation error volatility and mixed measurement volatility.

Practicing of the concept of fair value accounting, it involves recognition of economic losses as well as economic gains and less asymmetry of losses relative to gains[29].

Goncharov and Hodgson[30], in 2008, have empirically confirmed that unrealized fair value gains (losses) in other comprehensive income. They pointed out that that use of fair value concept may have significantly different effect on the earnings quality for Eastern European countries due to business entities in continental Europe rely to a greater extent on debt capital.

To resume, when analyzing previous research regarding the association between application of fair value accounting and earnings quality measures, we get the following conclusions: there is mixed and inconsistent evidence. There were previous research examines earnings quality using single earnings attributes or a subset of earnings attributes.

Fair value accounting is established by income approach. Then changes in fair values can be stated as gains and losses through net income or other comprehensive income.

Andrew[31], in 2009, claimed that the corporations had used net realizable value instead of value in use, this would have produced a higher asset impairment charge and lower reported earnings and asset values then has been stated.

Thus, we examine the influence of fair value gains (losses) through other comprehensive income and through net income on earnings.

Bad news are reflected by conservative earnings more quickly than good news. Thus, historical cost accounting causes timely recognition of losses than gains.

Historical cost accounting causes improves quality of accounting information in the context of corporate governance and loan agreements. Asymmetric recognition of losses relative to gains is defined as conditional conservatism.

3. Conclusions

I agree with Ball and Shivakumar that "defines loss recognition as arbitrary, not contemporaneously related to any particular event due to the arbitrary nature of bias in terms of reporting low book values and incomes unconditionally as a result of being conservative"[32].

Many firms that did use value in use to arrive at their asset impairment loss will have declined a net realizable value figure as this would have been reduce than the value in use figure. If the firms had used net realizable value instead of value in use, this would have cause a higher asset impairment charge.

For the firms that use net realizable value for the purposes of determining the asset impairment charge this indicates that their net realizable value is higher than any calculated value in use figure.

In this way, that many firms report using more than one valuation method depending on the type of asset that is impaired and the results become difficult to indicate any conclusions based on the information available, despite the initial observation that value in use appears very used.

I conclude that the use of fair value concept may have a different effect on the earnings quality for Romania because of less liquid or inactive markets. In this way, fair values will more probably be estimated by the use of valuation techniques which enables earnings management and could lead to lower quality of reported earnings. Some empirical findings from research support experts' predictions[33].

Then, earnings under more fair value-based reporting system have less aggregate quality rankings for firms in Romania. I get the evidence that the extent of more fair-value-based other comprehensive income is negatively related to aggregate earnings quality for firms.

I noticed that many studies on this topic are realized in common law countries such as US, United Kingdom or Australia and there is few research regarding fair value accounting in countries of Eastern Europe.

Abstract

With the increasing population since the existence of mankind technology has developed the use of resources which increased with development of technology and production and environmental destruction has been the result of this. The process of environemntal degredation, especially after the industrial revolution, was accelerated since the Second World War and become a global problem. It had a more important role in terms of sustainable development of intellectual property in arrangement to use resources efficiently and effectively to reduce the environmental damage and to increase the social wealth and to leave a clean world in the future generations. The green economiy thought, which in the light of sustainable development compress, expresses reconstruction of environmental activities differently in the thought of mainstream economy on the basis of green neworder eceonomics. The objective of this study is to investigate the environmental politicl inclusion of the green ecenomy is and examine regional and global results individually and in groups on behalf of both developed and developing countries.

1. Introduction

The ongoing consumption need since mankind's existence, the complexity of production relations with the development of societies, with the growing population and technology, it has reached another point in today's world. At its inception, the needs met in individual or small masses emerged from the economic activities of the individual as a result of population growth and the development of the societies, together with the social structure. The capitalist system, which develops inaccordance with the development and change of economic, political and social activities, it has been decisive in the shaping of social relations as the prevailing economic view that suggests an increase in consumption for individual and social well-being. Depending on this situation, it is necessary to increase the consumption of the source of individual wealth and increase the production to increase the consumption. The increase in production leads to economic growth. Countries that are in the struggle for economic growth will enter into competition and this situation has caused environmental damage due to increasing population, wealth and consumption need. The questions which come to mind at the same time is that How do the countries improve their level of development and the worsened environment as their welfare increases? or how to improve their prosperity levels without distorting the environment? have gained importance. On the other hand, developing countries are involved in production activities in order to converge with the developed countries and to increase their prosperity levels. However, these countries do not pay much attention to environmental activities as developed countries. Both developed and developing countries must implement some policies to reduce environmental degradation and leave a cleaner world for future generations as well as increase prosperity. In order to increase social welfare and prevent environmental degradation, the concept of sustainable development has emerged and the concept of green economy has been introduced as one of the most important complementary elements of sustainable development. Since the environment is the living space of all individuals on a global scale, each individual falls into this responsibility. In this context, the responsibility for the environment and the desire to research and put forth applied policies constitute the main objective of this work. The scope of the work will first be the study of sustainability and green economy concepts that are theoretically framed and the development of green economy policies in sustainable development in developed and developing countries. In the light of the policies implemented, the countries will try to explain what they can do differently, supported by the studies in the literature. Another aim of the study is to review the results obtained from the studies in the literature and to present different views on this subject. In addition, the work to be done later is to draw attention to the subject by holding a light.

1.1. Sustainable Development

The increase in production after World War II did not come to the forefront in terms of environment until the 1970s, but since 1970, economic growth has become a matter of importance along with the process. In particular, the fact that some biological species have come to the stage of extinction, the problem of global warming has come to the forefront, production and consumption have increased at a considerable rate, has become a subject that needs to be emphasized (Yalçın 2016, 751). Despite the increase in production, the continuing social problems are a sign of the need for the development of societies. The environmental damage caused by economic growth is another important aspect. Consequently, in order to solve the social problems aimed at the society, it has been both to maintain the development process and to reduce the environmental damage to the minimum level. In this context, for the first time, a conference was held in Stockholm in 1972 where environmental activities and economic relations were jointly addressed. The most important aspect of the conference is to see the world as one from the point of view of all individuals and to accept It is also an important event in the name of globalization. (Özcan 2007, 764).

The Stockholm conference is a sign that environmental issues are emerging along with developmental problems, as well as the global scale of these problems. It is also an important event in the name of globalization. The expression of environmental problems as not only a region or an entire country, but an entirely problematic problem is an important deterrent to globalization. In this context, the concept of sustainable development was first expressed in the World Protection Strategy Report prepared by the United Nations Environment Program (UNEP) in 1980 but became widespread after the use of the "Common Future" report prepared by the United Nations Environment and Development Commission in 1987. According to the report, it is necessary to meet today's needs without interfering with the needs of future generations (Kayikci 2012, 14-15). This situation has two important consequences. The first of these is to draw attention directly to environmental pollution. Secondly, expressing the ideology of development in a way will produce both a policy for the generation of future generations and a global environment to deal with a clean environment. The concept of sustainable development has an important character in terms of globalization. As a consequence, the Earth Summit in Rio, which aimed at rationally realizing sustainable development on a global scale long ago in 1992, focused on the concept of sustainable development at the Johannesburg Summit in 2002 and published a statement of 37 principles (Kayıkçı 2012, 14-15).

In the Common Future Report, the aims of development policies can be expressed as follows:

1. To increase growth by improving the quality of growth,
2. To meet basic requirements such as food, clean water, housing, health,
3. Determining a sustainable population level and enriching it by protecting it,
4. To take the environment into consideration when making decisions on economic policies. (Our Common Future 1987, 78-80

1.2. Green Economy in the Context of Sustainability

The green economy is one of the important parameters of sustainable development, while sustainable development is the link between environment and economy. Concepts such as green economy, green growth, environmentally friendly growth contribute to the integration of the idea of environment and economy in the sustainable development plan. The Green Economy Thought was launched by UNEP in 2008 and can be expressed as a system of production and consumption of goods and services that will sustain both present and future generations from environmental risks as well as sustaining increases in welfare for individuals in the long term. At the heart of the green economy is the use of efficient resources and the development of a healthier, livable environment, along with an increase in individual wealth. The understanding of capitalist economic growth is particularly influential in increasing environmental pollution through fossil fuel consumption. This situation, on the other hand, is making green environment policies more prominent in terms of creating a livable world. The implementation of green economic policies has an important role to play in governments and international organizations. The use of renewable energies, eco-friendly policies and green jobs, which are new areas of employment that will result from the healthy implementation of these policies, will lead to economic and social relations entering a new process.

Green economy gains importance that is important after 2012 Rio+20 United Nations Sustainability Conference. According to United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) green economy is a new growth strategy that eliminated ecological and environmental risks that is a new era for mankind for healthy living on the other hand increase individual welfare and struggle social equality (Özçağ and Hotunluoğlu 2015, 313).

A green economy idea has new green technologies, renewable energies, decreasing carbon emissions, incresing sources efficiency, new green jobs, reducing air pollution, claening water resources, increasing social equality with economic and social development. Green economy idea is a new world.

Market-based practices for environmentally friendly and green growth Yalçın (2016) are described under 3 headings:

- Taxes,
- Registration Permits,
- subvention on

Taxes are a different form of raising costs in the production process, while taxation leads to the creation of economic activity and the polluting producers to produce with more environmentally friendly methods by increasing their costs in the production process. While pollution permits are an application for pollutants producing on a larger scale, taxpayers are a suitable instrument for producers of smaller scale production. Today, about 90% of the tax revenues for the environment are derived from fossil fuels and emissions-generating vehicles. In this case, if the capitalist economic system is thought to encourage continuous production, environmental tax should also be encouraged for a greener world. Another application for the environment is subsidies. Subsidies are an important step in making the economy more environmentally friendly. The green economy is the most important instrument in the transformation period, which is the most important incentive foot, promoting environmentally friendly practices. However, even if subsidies are a source of problems in terms of effective resource use, environmentalist practices will contribute economically, socially and socially significant in terms of both current and future generations.

2. Green Economy Application Examples

Many countries in the world are implementing policies towards the green economy transition process. Among these, two of the leading countries are China and South Korea. In particular, South Korea has an important place in the name of environmentally friendly economy transition with long-term green growth strategies. Among the policies Korea implements are low carbon emissions, new and environmentally friendly engines, massive environmental friendly public investments in public transport, improved water quality in Jeju Island and seed quality enhancing practices for producers, public support for R & D applications is at the forefront in the low carbon production process in energy and other sectors. Taxes for environmental pollution, corrective measures for the market, and company regulations for environmental pollutants can be expressed in other measures taken (Matthews 2012, 354).

Choi also expresses that South Korea intends to reduce its dependence on climate change and energy dependence, raise its quality of life, and create a new economic structure with green technologies (Choi 2014, 5-8).Germany is another example with South Korea.

Germany's most important goal in the green economy transformation process is to use fossil fuel for renewable energy use. Germany, which has made nuclear energy use a policy goal before, has made the use of renewable and environmentally friendly clean energy a policy goal. One of Germany's most important policy goals is to reduce coal use and increase the use of renewable electricity (GGGI 2015, 55-57).

China is another green economy policy target. China is one of the world's leading countries with intense energy use and production activities. For this reason, China's policies are of great importance on an international scale. There are practices in the forefront of China to control energy consumption. Taxes for environmental pollution, corrective measures for the market, and company regulations for environmental pollutants can be expressed in other measures taken (Matthews, 2012: 354).

Another country that sets policy in the green economy process, the UK has set both its resource efficiency and a cleaner production process with low carbon emissions. However, international cooperation in the policy goal is the main element of the UK's advocacy (GGGI 2014, 86-87).

Again South Africa is a policy-making country in its green growth target. South Africa emphasized public support for the policy objective, emphasized emission reductions and high-tech products to be produced in the future (Yalcin 2016, 173-174).

Norway, on the other hand, set innovation as a policy target in the green growth process. Energy, petroleum, health, agriculture, tourism and maritime sectors in the human welfare and environment-friendly technologies with the research methods aimed to develop.

Brazil, on the other hand, aimed to reduce poverty (GGGI 2015,19), as well as reducing agricultural incomes and increasing productivity with pioneering practices in agriculture.

The Netherlands is an important example for the public and private sectors to cooperate in the green economy transition process. A project company named DBFMO (Design, Build, Finance, Maintenance and Operation) was established between the government and the private sector. A consortium has been established in practice with participation in other private companies and the investments to be made have been committed to reducing carbon emissions by at least 21%. This will ultimately result in low carbon emissions and a cleaner environment (GGGI 2014, 185-186).

Singapore is the first state to introduce a green plan in Johannesburg in 2002. Green plan suggests that more clean more green country and increase life quality, protect natural resources. One of the most important goal the plan is to create awareness about the cliamte change and environemntal regulations. Singapore Sustainable Development Commission create a new plan for 2020. “Blue Plan for Sustainable Singapore” was created in 2009. Plan includes long run goals like reducing air pollution, increasing energy efficiency, increasing life quality, limiting water consumption, increasing public transport (GGGI 2014, 141-142).

Costa Rica is one of the prominent countries to increase the environmental quality. Important policy of country is oil taxation. It is a plan for funding environmental activities. 60 percent of received taxes is funding for ecosystem services (GGGI 2014, 158).

Morocco is also policy aim about green economy. Morocco's most important policy for greeen economy is solar energy system. For cleaner economy is country's solar energy sources and solar energy sector investment has an important role. Morocco established Morocco Solar Energy Agenda (MASEN) to funding more effective and easy for solar energy investments. MASEN is a public investment. Masen is an important that show about the role of government to transition process of green economy (GGGI 2014, 165).

3. Conclusion

With the development of technology, the intense production increase that has taken place has destroyed the environment and the living problem became a global problem. From the 1960s onwards, environmental issues began to have an important place in international meetings. It maintains the idea of creating a more livable world and providing individual wealth prosperity as a means of capitalist economic thought through economic growth and development. In this direction, the idea of sustainable development for countries emerges. In order to leave a cleaner environment for both the present and future generations, policies have been formed to shape the economies through the idea of sustainable development. In this direction, countries are making efforts to transition to the use of renewable energies in their interests. While various policies are applied in the foreground countries in this study, various policies are applied in the transition period of green economy in many countries not included in the study. The aim of the work is to put out the prominent policies in the countries covered. As there will be no specific policy for each country, the policy applied in one country is not valid for other countries. Because the aim of each country first is to create a cleaner world in the name of the world in its own society and then the world. Each country will create its own policies for its own problems. The economic, social and financial structures of countries will play an important role when policies are set. Nevertheless, economic development continues to be a more developed society and aims to create the world. Therefore, sustainable development is a widely accepted idea at many points. However, it is not possible to say that all countries have fully participated in this idea or that this idea has produced appropriate policies. Some countries see development and industrialization policies in front of clean environmental policies. This situation causes the policies towards green economy to be delayed or prevented. However, environmental pollution is a global problem and in order to create a healthier environment, countries that do not have a program will also be able to make programs. Countries that cooperate with policies implemented by countries and implement policies based on green economy need to make suggestions on this issue. As the UK has suggested, international co-operation towards environmental pollution should be undertaken. On behalf of the environment, the activities of international non-governmental organizations should be increased and communities should be made aware of worldwide. The emerging new technologies must be environmentally friendly and it is important that the transformation of the industry 4.0 new technology, which is especially in the foreground worldwide, is in harmony with environmentally friendly policies.

Energy is something that all nations need. Renewable energy policies in particular have a very important place in the name of countries in the process of green economy transition. As a matter of fact, the process of transition from fossil fuel use to renewable energies is among the leading policies of many countries. The high rate of taxation of environmental pollution and the fact that the areas to be newly invested are environmentally friendly are important in the transition period to green economies. Innovation plays an important role in the green economy transition process, as some countries have set policy objectives as innovation. Innovation plays an important role especially in developing countries' high-tech product manufacturing processes. Using clean technology through innovation will contribute to the green economy transition phase. It will also contribute to the production of high-tech products by providing policy for developing countries' environmental pollution. The formation of this situation is of great importance in terms of the idea of sustainable development. However, public private cooperation plays a sıgnıfıcant role for implementing the afore-mentioned policies. The public sector should not be alone to pass on the private sector policies. There is a considerable need for government support, especially in developing countries where entrepreneurship and capital shortages are experienced. Public-private cooperation is a matter of issue in terms of environmental policies, and in our opinion, it has the most important place among the politics.

EXTERNAL TRADE OF ROMANIA – TEN YEARS AFTER EU ACCESION (2007-2016)

Florentina Viorica GHEORGHE*

Abstract

Advantages of the EU single market and the costs related to adaptation the Community context and requirements, the impact of the international economic and financial crisis and the difficulties in accessing EU Structural and Social Cohesion Funds are among the major factors that have influenced the economic evolution of Romania in the period 2007-2016, including the external trade in goods. There have been changes in the structure of Romania's external trade, determined, on the one hand, by the accession to the EU, and on the other hand, by the impact of the international economic crisis started in 2008.

The way in which the Romanian external trade has responded to the aforementioned factors is analyzed in this paper, on the basis of the following criteria: the evolution of specific indicators to the field of foreign exchanges of goods, in the year 2016 as compared to the year 2007; the magnitude of the economic downturn in 2009 and 2010 years as a result of the negative impact of the crisis; the decline recovery in years; resilient economic sectors. International comparisons are used in order to evaluate the position of Romania as against the neighboring EU Member States as well as its main EU trading partners in the context of the EU integration process.

Keywords: trade balance, deficit, export, import, European Union.

1. Introduction

The benefits and costs of the economic integration and participation in the international division of labour are well grounded in the specific literature, referring both to the static and dynamic effects, generated by the comparative advantages and by the better allocation of scarce resources, as well as, resulting from higher competition, larger scale economies, knowledge diffusion and technological progress.

In fact, the EU accession process has contributed significantly to the macroeconomic stabilization, trade opening, increased FDI flows, improved legal and institutional framework that have been the key factors for the economic success of the new EU member states, in the last decade (Zhelev&Tzanov, 2012).

Five years after the 2004 wave of the EU enlargement, the European Commission has announced that this contributes to unleashing the growth potential and increasing the resilience of the European economy by strengthening economic integration, fostering a more efficient division of labour and boosting EU competitiveness as a whole. (European Commission, 2009)

Romania's accession to the EU, more than ten years ago, on 1st of January 2007, marked the beginning of a new stage of economic development, focusing on the principle of economic and social cohesion, underlining the promotion of economic growth conditions, reducing regional disparities and ensuring high level of employment and a balanced and sustainable development.

From the external trade point of view, this new stage brought a number of advantages but also disadvantages, benefits and costs. Removing barriers to the free movement of goods and services should stimulate the creation of trade. In theory, this is beneficial for all Member States because it allows them to specialize in those goods and services that they produce relatively more efficiently. In this context, Romania's exports benefit from a market dimension over half million consumers but must face to a stronger competition, both as a price-quality ratio and as a technological level, respecting the new EU competition requirements. As far as imports are concerned, they increase the competitive pressure on domestic production.

The integration into the EU of a country like Romania that many years belonged to a different system than of the West European one, is difficult and will last for many years, due to the structural changes required (Iancu, 2010).

The changes made in the last 10 years in the Romanian economy are important and generally positive, but have been obtained under difficult conditions, marked by the market transition uncertainties and by the overlapping between the EU accession and the global financial crisis, at the end of 2008.

A review of Romania's economic development since 2007, primarily means the story of managing the impact of the global financial crisis and only to a lesser extent an assessment of the impact of EU membership itself. The Romanian economy passed through a complete "cycle of boom-bust-boom" in the last ten years. (Gabor Gunya 2017)

Undoubtedly, Romania's international economic relations in the post-accession period 2007-2016 were an important factor in directing the evolution of the country's external trade under the EU rigorous requirements, but also in the complex processes of globalization and increasing interdependencies between national economies. At the same time, these relations have played an important role as an interface in terms of capitalizing the potential of the national economy, on one hand and the opportunities occurred under the conditions of liberalizing external trade flows and increasing international competition, on the other hand.

The present paper analyses the Romania's international trade relations in the post-accession period 2007-2016, having as main objective the identification of the principal features, tendencies and structural changes of external trade, considered a potential factor for the sustainable development of the national economy, the benefits of integration and globalization, as well as bearing the costs and efforts they imply. The methodological approach of the research has an international comparative dimension, to highlight some similarities and peculiarities of the Romanian foreign trade regarding the tendencies of convergence and divergences manifested at EU 28 level.

2. Evolution of the external trade specific indicators before and after Romania's accession to the EU

In the ten years that followed the Romania's accession to the EU, the advantages and challenges of the membership have been partly overshadowed by the impact of the global financial crisis in 2008, which has had a strong and prolonged impact on the Romanian economy, in terms of GDP, imports and exports decline. However, the statistical figures show that exports increased 4.59 times and imports increased 4.61 times, in 2016 as compared to 2000, when the negotiations for the EU accession officially began. The value of imports of goods has always been higher than that of exports, which has led to the persistence of a weak trade balance. Romania's accession to the EU, practically, meant a (negative) trade balance of -114 billion euro in the post-accession period (2007-2016), compared to -47 billion euro during the pre-accession period (2001-2006). Romania's trade balance registered the largest deficit in 2008 when it reached the level of -23,5 billion euro, then it gradually decreased to -6 billion euro in 2014, afterwards increasing again to -10 billion euro, in 2016 (Figure 1).

An analysis of a country's trade flows gives us a measure of its degree of openness to the external market and its competitiveness in international trade. In the case of Romania, it is interesting to see not only the evolution of the trade relations with the EU but also the performance compared to the neighbouring countries, former communist ones, which were in transition at the same time with Romania and who subsequently became EU members.

International comparisons highlight the fact that Romania, although having a population, territory and potential higher than other EU countries, from the export point of view, it is underperforming. Thus, in 2016, Romania's export was lower 3.2 times than Poland's; 2.6 times lower than Czech Republic's; 1.6 times lower than Hungary's and 1.2 times lower than of Slovakia's.

Regarding the imports, their values were in 2016, 2.7 times higher in Poland; 1.3 times higher in Hungary and 1.9 times higher in the Czech Republic compared to Romania (Figure 2).

Source: Eurostat, New Cronos database

The existing gaps between Romania and the compared countries highlight, on the one hand, a relatively large pressure on the trade balance, respectively on imports and, on the other hand, a lesser use of the potential of the human, natural and material resources our country has.

If the negative trade balance, with higher or lower variations in different periods, was a chronic factor in case of Romania, there are also member states for which accession to the EU had a positive impact on trade balance. For example, Hungary, since 2009 (after 5 years of 2004 EU accession) and Poland since 2015 (after more than a decade), have managed to maintain an upward trend in the positive trade balance (Figure 1). In the case of Poland, a detailed analysis may be needed to identify the factors that have led to such remarkable evolution of the trade balance, considering that this country had a quite similar trade pattern as Romania up to 2011.

Countries having trade deficit fail to capitalize on imports by export efficiency and competitiveness. In these countries, foreign currency earnings resulted from export do not cover the corresponding expenditure, reason for which the exports cannot be considered as a source of currency for diminishing the negative current account balance and paying foreign debt.

According to Zaman, most experts believe that a country's persistent trade deficit is unfavourable and not proper to sustainable GDP growth, as trade deficit is a component of the current account deficit and requires external loans or sales of assets to finance the procurement of goods and services. Others consider as damaging only those deficits generated by the loans for financing current consumption to a large extent rather than financing long-term investments. As beneficial, and even acceptable are regarded those trade deficits supporting long-term investments, generate jobs, incomes and other investments as well as economic creditability. (Zaman, 2013)

The diversity of views on the impact of trade deficits is explained by the particularities and differences between national economies. There are situations where trade deficits and surpluses can be beneficial or completely negative depending on the concrete circumstances of each country. In the case of Romania, a country with an emerging economy and a relatively low level of development, the chronicity of the trade deficit with a long-term growth trend cannot be considered as beneficial.

The extent to which national producers are export-oriented is given by the share of goods exported in GDP. Although increasing over the pre-accession period, Romania's share goods exports in GDP is only around 30%, which is below the levels recorded by Bulgaria, Hungary and Poland.

The size of the economy is relevant in this analysis - countries with large territories and populations (Poland, Romania and Germany) are less dependent on the exports than small countries, such as Hungary, Czech Republic or even Bulgaria. However, in the case of Poland, which is larger than Romania, the degree of openness is higher by 11 percentage points (Figure 3).

The small market share held by Romania (0.37% in the world export in 2016), combined with the low share of exports in GDP clearly indicates the potential for increased trade gains, in the Intra-EU and Extra-EU areas.

Both imports and exports recorded higher growth rates in the pre-accession period (2001-2006) compared to the growth rate of 2007-2016, for most of the countries under review. In the case of Romania, during the pre-accession period the average annual growth rate of imports was higher than those for export (+4.4 pp). Contrary, in the 2007-2016 period, the average annual growth rate of exports is higher than for imports, with +2.5 pp (for most of the countries analyzed, Table 1). It is noticeable that the average annual growth rates of Romania and Bulgaria, Hungary and Poland, as well, are two to three times higher than the annual growth rates at EU level, both in 2001-2006 and in 2007-2016 (but not the average export per capita, for example).

Compared with GDP growth rate, the export and import growth were higher, with few exceptions, the most significant being in 2008.

2. Geographic orientation of the external trade flows

Given that Romania belongs in Europe, most of the trade is taking place with European countries, especially with the 28 EU Member States (75.1% of exports and 77.1% of imports in 2016), with traditional relations, propelled by intra-community factors of "trade creation".

On the other hand, the globalization process objectively extends the variants and opportunities for Romania's external trade to the non-EU area as well, which in some cases makes possible the manifestation of the growth trend of the extra-EU trade - for example, with Turkey, China, Russian Federation, USA.

In conclusion, depending on the national economic interests of each Member State, which can be met in different proportions by the extra-EU and intra-EU partners, we find that the degree of concentration of external trade with EU countries varies from one country to another and over time.

Generally, a problem to be elucidated is that of trade efficiency, if a business variant is more profitable in extra-EU or intra-EU area. In this case, criteria, principles as well as economic and financial considerations should prevail. However, there are situations e.g. geo-strategically or political group of interests, which may prevail over the economic and financial advantages of one or other of the alternatives.

In fact, no EU Member State conducts external trade exclusively with other EU Member States. On the contrary, there are theories that economic integration is a factor for promoting sustainable growth, which offers availability and potential not only for the development of intra-EU economic relations, but also for the creation of additional resources for extra-EU trade.

According to Eurostat, exports to the EU prevail in all member states, with the exception of Cyprus, the United Kingdom and Malta. In 2016, the value of the goods exported by the EU member states amounted 4860 billion euro, of which 64% were destined for other EU member states (intra-EU trade). In 2016, the largest shares of exports within the EU were recorded by Slovakia (86% of total EU exports), Czech Republic (84%), Luxembourg (83%), Hungary (81%), and Poland (80%). On the other hand, Cyprus (49%), United Kingdom (47%) and Malta (42%) were the only member states that exported more goods to non-EU countries than within the EU, in 2016. Romania is placed on the 9th position on export (as share in total EU exports) (Figure 4).

The largest shares of imports within the EU were recorded by Estonia (81.7% of total EU imports), Latvia (80.5%), Slovakia (80.2%), Czech Republic (79.2%), and Austria (78%). On the other hand, the Netherlands (47.1%) was the only member state that imported more than half of goods from the non-EU countries, in 2016. Similar to export, Romania is on the 9th position, as share in total import (Figure 5).

As the figures show us, the intra-EU trade shares varies between 41% and 85%, depending on the flow, which implies that integration is not only a "trade creation" factor but also a "trade diversion" ones, as a result of at least two elements of influence:

- integration stimulate the economic development of a country, which allows not only intra-trade growth but also creates a potential for trade with extra EU28 countries.

- the globalization process acts objectively in the direction of Romania's trade opportunities with the extra-EU countries, when the criterion of economic efficiency, understood by applying the win-win principle prevails.

In the top 10 export partners, the switch between the two top positions is notable, with Germany overtaking Italy in the post-accession period (Table 2).

Although the cumulative weight of the first 10 export partner countries declined by 3 percentage points in the post-accession period, the value of the exports made by the top 10 partners in the post-accession period is almost double that of the pre-accession period.

With regard to the top 10 import partners, there are no major changes, with the exception of the Russian Federation exit (as a result of the reduction in crude oil imports) and the increase in the share of imports from China.

In the top 10 export partner countries, we have only one third country - Turkey, while two third countries are included in the top 10 import partner countries, Turkey and China.

The largest Romania's trade deficit was registered with EU member countries. Analyzing the trade balance of Romania with EU partner countries is important in order to identify possible ways and priorities for reducing the pressure of the deficit. Among the EU partners, we distinguish:

- countries with which Romania has a trade surplus - in 2016, namely: United Kingdom (+953 million euro); France (+410); Sweden (+162); Croatia (+50);
- countries with which Romania has a trade deficit - Hungary (-2077 million); Poland (-1801); Germany (-1505); the Netherlands (-1313); Austria (-1033); Slovakia (-574); Belgium (-472); Czech Republic (-395); Bulgaria (-242); Italy (-239), etc.

The main challenge for Romania is the very large trade deficit with new emerging countries (including some neighboring countries), such as Hungary, Bulgaria, Poland, Slovakia, the Czech Republic and with old member states, Germany, the Netherlands, Austria, Belgium, Italy and others. Romania has to increase its exports to these countries and / or to reduce its imports in order to reduce the trade deficit.

To this end, the Romania's National Export Strategy 2014-2020 should be operational, granting a special attention to the policies, instruments and measures to promote exports with high value added and those for which Romania has a great potential, such as, for example, the food industry, agricultural products, etc.

3. Changes in the structure of exports, imports and balance of trade balance

The structure of exports after EU accession is significantly improved (Table 4), by increasing the share of higher value-added product groups, for example:

- During the period 2001-2006 the exports were dominated by textiles and related products (21.1%), machinery and equipment electrical; sound recording and reproduction apparatus and equipment (17.6%), common metals and their products (14.4%), mineral products (9.0%).
- In the period 2007-2016, exports included: electrical machinery, apparatus and equipment; recorders or reproducers sound and images (26.2%, +8.6 pp compared to 2001-2006), vehicles and associated transport equipment (15.6%), common metals and articles thereof (10.9%); and textiles and textile products (8.5%).

Focusing on a limited number of product groups - such as electrical equipment, mechanical devices and means of transport - indicates an export vulnerability in case of a possible reduction in external demand in certain economic circumstances. At the same time, a vulnerable aspect of exports is given by the relatively significant weight of vegetal, minerals and metals raw materials, to the detriment of the products with value added by their processing in the Romania.

Imports during the pre-accession period were directed mainly towards the needs of production (machinery, appliances, technologically advanced equipment, raw materials, and energy products) but also for the consumption of the population.

The main structural changes on import side refer to the significant decreasing of the mineral products and textile article shares while the electric machines, appliances and equipment, base metals and articles thereof, chemical products and agro-food products have increased their shares in total imports.

4. Technological structures of exports and imports

The relatively weak competitiveness of Romanian external trade is determined by the low degree of diversification of exports, as well as by the low volume of exports and imports of high technology.

Compared to the pre-accession period, the top 10 most exported product groups in the post-accession period are significantly different (Table 5), because:

- the share of the top 10 product groups (in terms of value) decreased from 49.1% in 2001-2006 to 38.6% in 2007-2016;
- the technological level of the top 10 products is higher - more products incorporate medium and high technology compared to the pre-accession period;
- foreign direct investment has helped improvement of the structure of Romanian exports, from a technological level perspective, but without equating the results of other neighboring Member States.

The large share of exports of high-tech products to the total exports of a country is the best indication that the country has a higher level of competitiveness and added value for exported products.

Exports of high-tech products tended to increase in the post-accession period compared to the previous period. However, if we take into account the annual evolution of the share of exports of high-tech products, in Romania, their trend is slightly decreasing starting with 2011, explained by the impact of some short-term factors, given that, from 2014, weights have seen increases over previous years. In absolute terms, exports of high technology products increased by around 7% in 2016 compared to 2015.

As far as the imported product groups are concerned, the technological level has also improved and contains less low tech products in the top 10 groups (Table 6).

In absolute terms, imports of high technology products increased, by about 6% in 2016, compared to 2015.

5. The impact of the global economic crisis and the resilience of exports

The global dimension of the crisis highlighted the high degree of interconnection between different financial, goods and services markets, and a rapid propagation of unfavourable negative effects of the crisis on the world's regions (Ghibuţiu, 2011). For instance, the size of the negative economic impact of the global economic crisis on the external trade generated a drop in the EU countries demand for imports from Romania.

The crisis has unequivocally drawn attention to the fact that the external opening of an economy, which relies on mutual gains in external trade, must be protected by providing a level of resilience that is necessary and sufficient to remain resistant to external shocks.

The evolution of Romania's international trade after 1990 was marked by the efforts for accession and integration into the EU. Unfortunately, the impact of the 2008 global economic and financial crisis overlapped the effects of the entry into the EU, which took place on 1st January 2007, making it particularly difficult (if not impossible) to define the influence of each event on evolution of the external trade since 2009.

The external trade during the 2007-2016 period was influenced by a mixture of factors, including:

- the advantages of the EU single market and the cost of accommodation with the context and the Community's requirements;
- the impact of the international economic and financial crisis triggered in September 2008;

- difficulties in accessing the Structural and Social Cohesion Funds, allocated by the EU.

After 2007, there have been changes in the structure of the exported and imported goods, determined both by the EU accession and crisis impact. Exports, except for the textile and based metals, increased in 2016 compared to 2007, even more than 3 times for goods such as vegetal products, fats and oils, animals; food, beverages, tobacco.

In the 2009 and 2010 crisis years there were no reductions in exports of live animals and animal products, food, beverages and tobacco, wood pulp, paper and cardboard, transport vehicles and equipment, optical and photographic instruments and apparatus , medical-surgical. These exports proved to be resilient to the shocks of the crisis, most of them being raw materials and semi-finished products offering the importers the possibility of further processing them and emerging from the crisis more quickly.

Exports of vehicles and transport equipment increased by +17.59%, while those of optical, photographic, cinematographic, medical and surgical instruments, watches, musical instruments, parts and accessories increased by 11.78%, which is explained by a favorable conjuncture for demand and relatively advantageous purchase price on the respective markets.

Groups of products with the highest export decline in 2009 (over the total export average decrease of -13.76%) were the following: animal products (-43.22%); based metals (-40.85%); chemicals (-25.07%); raw leather, tanned, fur (-15.53%); fabrics (-18.17%); footwear (-17.35%); articles of stone, plaster, cement, ceramics, glass (-17,12%); animal and vegetable fats and oils (-16.98%); plastics, rubber and articles thereof (-16.07%). These declines were a strong shock for several sectors of the national economy and emphasized the vulnerabilities of the "lohn" type production and export.

Reducing exports and imports for all SITC product groups had a positive effect on the trade balance, reducing the very large negative size of it, reached in 2007 and 2008.

Regard the recovering from the economic and financial crisis, exports have recovered much faster than imports. Thus, in the case of 14 SITC product groups, the level of their exports in 2010 was higher than those before the crisis, while the textiles and shoes groups needed two years to recover from the crisis.

6. The evolution of Romania's export competitiveness in an international context during 2006-2016

The post-accession period 2007-2016 represented a new stage for the export of Romania in terms of structure and evolution of its competitiveness in the world. In order to identify the main trends of competitiveness of Romanian exports on the SITC three-digit level, we used the UNCTAD primary data, in an international comparative context.

Positions won

We considered that changing Romania's position in the global export hierarchy by country, in the year 2016 compared to 2006, is a sui-generis export competitiveness indicator, depending on the number of positions won / lost in the world ranking. In other words, as Romania ascends into the world hierarchy, as a place or position, the higher the competitive capacity. Conversely, the more losing positions in the respective hierarchy, the lesser the competitive power in the respective group of exports.

In 2016, Romania was ranked 40th, climbing 14 positions compared to 2006 (54th place), in the hierarchy of exporting countries.

Table 7. Total Won (+) / Lost (-) positions by Romania in the world hierarchy of exports, on the main commodity markets, according to the volume of their annual value in the years 2016 and 2010 as compared to 2006

Years	Total positions won	Total positions lost	Total positions kept
2010	89	157	10
2016	150	98	8

Source: own calculation based on UNCTAD database (http://unctad.org/en/Pages/statistics.aspx)

Total number of positions won by Romania in the world export hierarchy, was more than 50% higher than that of the lost positions (150 positions won in 2016 compared to 98 positions lost in 2016), which practically reflects a favourable trend in the evolution of the export competitiveness in the post-accession period (from the view point of the number of won / lost positions).

The place of Romania's exports in the world hierarchy by countries is cuantified by a diversity of positions, depending on the range of each exported group of products.

Best performance of the products exported by Romania and some neighbour countries, in 2016:

Romania

Equipment for distributing electricity - 5th position in 2016 vs. 13th position in 2006

Maize (not including sweet corn), unmilled - 7th position vs 20th position in 2006

Maize (not including sweet corn), unmilled - 8th position in 2016 vs 6th position in 2006

Trailers & semi-trailers - 10th position in 2016 vs 12th position in 2006

Poland

Tobacco and Wood manufacture – 3rd position in 2016

Cereals, unmilled (excluding wheat, rice, barley), Structures & parts of iron, steel, alumini, Household type equipment, electrical or not, furniture & parts - 4th position in 2016

Television receivers, whether or not combined - 5th position in 2016 vs 3rd position in 2006.

Conclusions

The catching-up process advanced rapidly after accession, but developments were very uneven across the Romanian regions.

The analysis of Romania's international trade during the 2007-2016 period leads to the following analysis:

- the volume of foreign trade has increased throughout the period both on export and on import, with the exception of the year 2009, when the impact of the international financial crisis has declined, so that at present it can be said that the Romanian economy has a relatively high external exposure;
- as a result of traditional trade relations, but also of EU integration, exchanges

Romania's trade with EU countries account for around 70% of the total volume of foreign trade, in recent years there has been a tendency to intensify trade relations with the extra EU-28 countries;

- the largest chronic deficit is recorded by Romania's foreign trade, with some EU countries, especially with Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, France, Austria, etc., countries to which Romania's foreign trade is highly dependent;
- the structure of commodity exports of Romania is dominated by the low and medium technology level, with relatively low added value;
- analysis of competitiveness of exports of Romanian products (SITC two-digits), based on the positions won / lost in the hierarchy of world exports highlights the fact that Romania occupies relatively significant positions (among the top 15-20 exporters especially in products with relatively low processing level, generally being on the foreign markets "price-taker" rather than "price-maker ", in 2016, compared to 2001, Romania gained positions in the world export ranking, to 150 groups of goods and lost positions to 98 groups, which shows a favourable trend to increase the competitiveness of the trade Romanian society, extremely necessary, but still insufficient to reduce the gaps that separate us from the developed countries.

REFORM OF RULES ON EU VAT

Maria Zenovia GRIGORE[*]
Mariana GURĂU[]

Abstract

In January 2018 the EU has released two proposal designed to simplify the VAT system, specifically around reduced rates, and to reduce compliance costs of smaller businesses in respect of VAT.

The EU's common rules on VAT rates do not treat Member States equally. More than 250 exemptions allow several Member States much more flexibility in setting VAT rates than others. While these derogations are due to expire once the reformed VAT system comes into place, the rates proposal will ensure that all Member States have the same flexibility and a uniform structure in which to set their own VAT rates.

The second proposal is designed to make trading in other EU member states easier for smaller businesses. Currently, small businesses may benefit from generous thresholds in their state of establishment, but zero thresholds exist for non-established businesses, meaning higher compliance costs. The intended proposals will provide simplification measures (around invoicing, record keeping etc.) for businesses with a turnover not exceeding €2 million and will allow member states to apply thresholds to non-established businesses with a turnover not exceeding €100,000.

Keywords: standard rate of VAT, reduced rate of VAT, VAT registration thresholds, VAT compliance, VAT reform.

1. Introduction

The European Union Value Added Tax (EU VAT) applies to all member states. The current VAT system dates from 1993 and was intended to be a transitional system. The abolition of fiscal frontiers between Member States and the taxation of goods in the country of origin required common rules for VAT rates to avoid distortion in cross-border shopping and trade.

The second section of this work gives an overview of the VAT rates, VAT registration and VAT return, applicable this year in each Member States.

A definitive VAT system that works for the Single Market has been a long-standing commitment of the European Commission. The 2016 *VAT Action Plan[1] explained the need to come to a single European VAT area that is simpler and fraud-proof. Following the adoption of this Action Plan, the European Commission has made a series of proposals to work towards its completion.

In October 2017 the European Commission agreed on four fundamental principles (named "cornerstones") of a new definitive single EU VAT area:[2]

- Tackling fraud: VAT will now be charged on cross-border trade between businesses. Currently, this type of trade is exempt from VAT, providing an easy loophole for unscrupulous companies to collect VAT and then vanish without remitting the money to the government.
- One Stop Shop: It will be simpler for companies that sell cross-border to deal with their VAT obligations thanks to a One Stop Shop. Traders will be able to make declarations and payments using a single online portal in their own language and according to the same rules and administrative templates as in their home country. Member States will then pay the VAT to each other directly, as is already the case for all sales of e-services.
- Greater consistency: A move to the principle of 'destination' whereby the final amount of VAT is always paid to the Member State of the final consumer and charged at the rate of that Member State. This has been a long-standing commitment of the European Commission, supported by Member States. It is already in place for sales of e-services.
- Less red tape: Simplification of invoicing rules, allowing sellers to prepare invoices according to the rules of their own country even when trading across borders. Companies will no longer have to prepare a list of cross-border transactions for their tax authority (the so-called 'recapitulative statement').

In November 2017 the European Commission proposed new rules on administrative cooperation between Member States' administrations in order to fight VAT fraud more efficiently.

In January 2018 the EU has released a two-fold proposal designed to simplify the VAT system, specifically around reduced rates, and to ease the administrative burden and compliance costs of smaller businesses in respect of VAT. These proposals are detailed in the third section.

2. Overview and comparison of VAT in EU Member States

2.1. VAT rates in EU member states

Each member state's national VAT legislation must comply with the provisions of the Directive no. 112/2006 which sets out a number of general rules on VAT rates. Member States shall apply a standard rate, which may not be lower than 15%, but the Directive does not specify any maximum limit.

Because VAT rates has not been harmonised, every year the European Commission publishes the official list of VAT rates applied in each member state. Table 1 contains the list of VAT rates for 2018.

As we see in Graph 1 the country with the lowest standard rate of VAT is Luxembourg (17%) while Hungary is the country with the highest standard rate of VAT (27%). In 2018 the average standard rate of VAT in EU28 is 21.46%. In EU15 this rate is 21.67% while in EU13 the average standard rate of VAT is 21.23%.

With the exception of Romania, where the standard rate of VAT has decreased from 20% in 2016 to 19% in 2017, in EU Member States, standard rates have not changed in the last two years.

Regarding reduced VAT rates, the differences between Member States are significant: 10 states have one reduced rate, 16 states have two reduced rates, Greece has three reduced rates and Denmark is the single state which doesn't have reduced rate. The minimum reduced rate of 5%, value imposed by European Directives is found in Croatia, Cyprus, Italy, Lithuania, Hungary, Malta, Poland, Romania and United Kingdom. The highest values of reduced rate are found in Hungary (18%), Greece (17%), Czech Republic (15%) and Finland (14%).

These reduced rates of VAT are applied to different categories of goods and services like: food products, water supplies, pharmaceutical products, books, newspapers, hotel accomodation etc.

Over-reduced rates (under 5%) are applied only in five states: Spain (4%), France (2.1%), Ireland (4,8%), Italy (4%) and Luxemburg (3%), for goods and services as: food products, water supplies, pharmaceutical products, books, admission to cultural services, shows (cinema, theatre, sports), agricultural inputs etc.

A characteristic met among EU countries is represented by the parking rate. Member States which, at 1 January 1991, were applying a reduced rate to the supply of goods or services other than those specified in Annex III may apply the reduced rate to the supply of those goods or services, provided that the rate is not lower than 12 %. The parking rate is applied in five Member States (12% in Belgium, 13% in Austria and Portugal, 13.5% in Ireland and 14% in Luxemburg) for certain goods as: certain energy products, wine, agricultural tools and utensils, washing and cleaning products etc.

According to Title VIII, Chapter 4 of the VAT directive 2006/112/EC, the zero rate is applied by seven states: Belgium, Denmark, Ireland, Malta, Finland, Sweden and United Kindom for newspapers, supplies of pharmaceuticals, medicines, supplies of food products for human consumption etc.

2.2. EU VAT compliance

For businesses with an EU VAT registration, and providing taxable supplies of goods or services, there are a number of requirements to follow to ensure they are fully compliant with European VAT regulations. These rules are detailed in the VAT Directive. All member states of the EU must implement these VAT compliance obligations into their own laws.

Companies providing taxable supplies must obtain a valid, unique EU VAT number from their home country. If they are also buying and selling goods in another EU country, they may have to register there, too. This will give them a valid VAT number which they can record all transactions against. Businesses can also provide this number to their foreign EU customers to ensure they are correctly charged nil VAT on intra-community supplies of goods or services.

Table 2 contains a summary of the 2018 VAT registration annual thresholds for resident companies in the 28 EU member states. The great variations regarding the annual threshold for VAT registration represent a real trap for those who intend to develop their businesses in different Member States. The threshold varies from zero (Greece, Hungary, Malta, Spain and Sweden) till 85000 euro (UK), so the local advice is necessary even from first stages of a business start-up.

EU Member States are free to set their own calendars for VAT return reporting, as we see in Table no. 3. Countries typically follow the format below:

- Monthly reporting is the most common cycle.
- Quarterly reporting is the majority of other situations.
- Annual reporting is required in addition in certain countries (e.g. Italy). Other countries may only require a single annual return if there is very limited activity (e.g. Germany).
- On an activity basis which is very rarely allowed (e.g. France) for companies with irregular trading.

Irrespective of the period of submission, the mandatory information of VAT return are: chargeable VAT, deductible VAT, net VAT amount (payable or receivable), total value of input transactions and total value of output transactions.

3. Reform of rules on EU VAT

On January 18th of 2018, the European Commission made two proposals to improve the EU VAT system:

- Equal treatment of Member States in setting VAT rates;
- Elimination of foreign EU VAT obligations for small enterprises.

3.1. Equal treatment of Member States in setting VAT rates

At the moment, VAT rules agreed by all EU countries allow for two distinct categories of products to benefit from a reduced VAT rate of as low as 5% in each country. A number of Member States also apply specific derogations for further reduced rates.

The proposed definitive regime is based on taxation at destination instead of origin, as initially envisaged. Restrictive rules on the application of rates are therefore no longer essential to avoid distortion of competition.

The new rules will give all EU Member States flexibility to apply the following reduced rates to products and services:

- 2 separate rates to be set between 5% and the standard rate
- 1 rate to be set between 0% and the reduced rates
- 1 rate of 0%

The current list of goods and services to which reduced rates can be applied will be abolished and replaced by a new list of products to which the standard rate of minimum 15% must always be applied. This list will include products such as alcoholic beverages, gambling, smartphones, precious metals, consumer electronics, weapons, household appliances, tobacco products, fuel, petrol & diesel, weapons, passenger vehicles.

Synthesising, the difference between the current rules and the new rules is reproduced in the table below:

Current rules	New rules
System based on exceptions	System based on general rules
No uniform application of rules	Uniform application across the EU

To safeguard public revenues, Member States must also ensure that the weighted average of all VAT rates applied is at least 12%.

3.2. Elimination of foreign EU VAT obligations for small enterprises.

On 18 January 2018, the European Commission proposed exempting small enterprises (SMEs) from cross-border VAT obligation.

Currently, EU small businesses selling in their own country are exempt from VAT if their sales are below a set threshold. This threshold varies between member states, e.g. €10,000 in France; and £85,000 in the UK. However, when selling in other EU states, SME's must register and charge local VAT on the first sale. This imposes a VAT compliance cost on small companies and restricts the free operation of the Single Market for SME's.

The EU is now proposing:

- A €2 million revenue threshold across the EU, under which small businesses would benefit from simplification measures, whether or not they have already been exempted from VAT;
- The possibility for Member States to free all small businesses that qualify for a VAT exemption from obligations relating to identification, invoicing, accounting or returns;
- A turnover threshold of €100,000 which would allow companies operating in more than one Member State to benefit from the VAT exemption

4. Conclusions

Under the current EU VAT directive, Member States have the option of applying a maximum of two reduced rates, not lower than 5% to a fairly restricted list of goods and services, which are listed in Annex III of the VAT Directive. Examples of these categories include foodstuffs, water supplies, admission to sporting events and medical care.

Existing reduced rates and derogations will expire upon the introduction of the definitive VAT regime (still being negotiated), and at this time new harmonised and flexible rules will be introduced. In summary, these are:

- Standard rates must remain at 15% or above
- Member states may introduce two reduced rates between 5% and 15%
- Member states will be permitted to implement one zero rate
- A further reduced rate between 0% and 5% may be implemented

In addition to the above, the restrictive list of goods and services to which the reduced rate may apply will be removed, and in its place will be a list of the goods and services to which a reduced rate cannot apply (items such as alcohol, tobacco, smartphones, fuel, precious metals etc.).

The second proposed measure follows up on the VAT Action Plan towards a single EU VAT area[3] presented in April 2016 and the Plans for the biggest reform of EU VAT rules[4] proposed by European Commission in October 2017. Businesses trading cross-border currently suffer from 11% higher compliance costs compared to those trading only domestically. The intended proposals will provide simplification measures (around invoicing, record keeping etc.) for businesses with a turnover not exceeding €2 million and will allow member states to apply thresholds to non-established businesses with a turnover not exceeding €100,000.

These legislative proposals will now be submitted to the European Parliament and the European Economic and Social Committee for consultation and to the Council for adoption.

QUALITY SCHEDULING INDEX WITHIN PRODUCT'S LIFECYCLE AND THE MONDERN SOCIETY

George Cristian GRUIA*

Abstract

The purpose of this article is to provide a starting point for application of Quality Scheduling Index within the production process with an emphasis on the product lifecycle and a comparison with our society where due to demand there is an offer which should be in time, at the required level of quality and at the corresponding place of selling. The scope of the article is the expansion of the application of newly developed Quality Scheduling Index within several other branches of industry and an initial evaluation of its implementation. The article presents outputs of the author's yet not published research and work in the filed of management and economics of the industrial enterprise and wants to become a starting point of the implementation of Quality Schedulin Index in enterprises which want to innovate their production process and reduce costs and dead time of the products / services within their lifecycle.

Keywords: inovation, quality, management, production, lifecycle, Quality Scheduling Index.

1. Introduction

The Management of Product Lifecycle is aimed in driving all the particular areas, which have a direct influence on some of the life cycle stages such as maintenance, quality, information systems and costs - research, development, production management, etc. Among the life cycle management there are a number of methods and techniques with different approaches regarding the necessary data input and as well as the results we get from them. The common element is the valuable information supporting the management, which helps us make the right decision and choose the optimal way of solving the economic problem. Among the aforementioned methods belongs the design cost, LCA - Life Cycle Assessment, LCE - Life Cycle Engineering, LCC - Life Cycle Costing, WLCC - Whole Life Cycle Costs, PDM - Product Data Management, etc. Until now were created many tools, methods and techniques for managing the life cycle, but these tools are limited to the evaluation of certain selected specific tasks. The models have a number of assumptions and initial conditions, in order to allow universal applicability for a wide range of users.

We consider the following approach of using the product lifecycle stages for delimiting and showing the aplicability where newly developed Quality Scheduling Index can be used and/or these product lifecycle to be used as starting point for computing the necessary variables which are being used in the computation of Quality Scheduling Index.

This research is part of a greater project where based on the philosophy that all the necessary resources should be in place at the right processing table where at the specific, requested time should be processed without any or minimizing the delays (dead time) also the society should be organized so that our daily activities to be most efficient and to get the maximum output without overworking the worker / processing machine. An analysis is being made from a social – economic point of view where first the government should be working Just-In-Time, to be efficient and to become a model for other private companies from different domains, because after all, the processes can be divided in time and according to a manufacturing production line. However in this article only an initial overview of this idea is being presented.

2. Quality Scheduling Index and Product's lifecycle

The current article is based on the author's previous work, where Quality Scheduling Index (QSI) was developed[1] as an answer to the below Research Questions, which can be continuously updated to answer the actual market conditions:

- How can we achieve the desired level of quality of our services / products by using the available resources with the condition of minimizing the costs?
- Where should we consider the quality within the product lifecycle and with what costs?
- How can we optimize the production process from the quality, time consumption and indirect costs point of view?

These Research Questions are part of the author's yet not published work and due to article constrains we consider only some part of them in the present article. We will consider further the implication of Quality Scheduling Index within the production process and how can we use it within the product's lifecycle.

[1] Gruia George Cristian and Kavan Mihal „A New Managerial Tool For Scenarios In Scheduling", Global Economic Observer, Institute for World Economy of the Romanian Academy, vol. 2(2), (2014): 4-13

The Quality Scheduling Index was developed for small and middle size enterprises as a management tool which can be used in finding the optimum function of costs, time consumption and quality from different scenarios due to the request from several managers from different European companies. A survey was carried out in this sense and the result was the need from the market of such a tool which can show managers how to basically optimize and innovate the production process. I consider that managers should come together and decide about the next step in the company's future on the market and to do so they need scenarios:

- Optimistic;
- Most probably;
- Pesimistic

Scenarios are part of the selecting process of the right strategy for the required segment of the market.

In my opinion, managers in manufacturing companies can use the newly developed index, which can be implemented in different scenarios to help them decide which strategy to adopt on the desired market, according to their initial goals and budgets.

Innovation is part of the company's business model and each company should decide which innovation portfolio to adopt according to the competitive environment. As Davila (2012) considers in his book[2], I too consider that the right amount of innovation at the right time, can differentiate winners from the losers of the customers. Thus we will further consider that there are two types of strategies (Play To Win Strategy and Play Not To Lose Strategy), which companies must consider on a long term to achieve their goals. In the same sense in different studies it was considered that the innovation and development of the public sector[3] are also important in the good development of the state[4], and thus the area of applicability of my quality scheduling index can be broaden in the private as well as in the public sector.

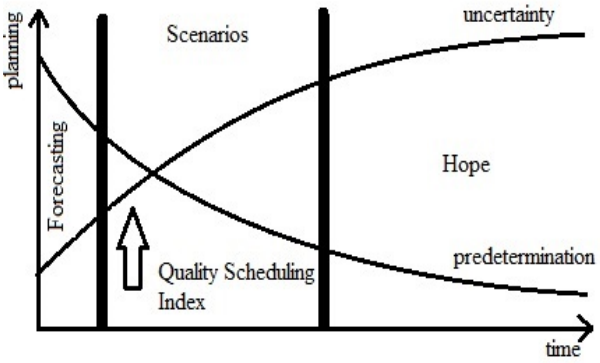
Based on my research, I can consider different scenarios based on different values of the index QSI. The main goal of the index is, based on the input data, to find the best value for obtaining maximum value for the requested quality level by the customers, with minimum production costs and time usage.

The level of quality is settled according to the utility level, different customers consider for the desired products. In collaboration with the marketing and CRM/CI departments, companies should find the needs and the problems of the customers and develop strategies based on different scenarios, which in turn are based on the computational values of the Quality Scheduling Index, for different levels of quality desired by different customer segments from different markets.

With the help of the Quality Scheduling Index, based on the operational output, different scenarios can be stated and some strategic decisions can be taken accordingly. The usage of the index is for the area in time when the level of uncertainty is bigger and the level of predictability is lower than in the area of planning based on forecasting, i.e. the area of planning based on scenarios for the development of new business strategies. This can be better seen from the figure 1 below.

Companies should use time and quality of time consumption in planning and deciding next steps for maintaining the same or better level on the market. With the help of the Quality Scheduling Index, one can improve the productivity of work within company and thus can produce better and faster outputs with the same inputs (resources, financial and non-financial).

Fig. 1 – Position of QSI in planning using scenarios



Source: Own contribution

We all know that productivity is the ratio between output and input, $$productivity = \frac{output}{input}$$ and if we know that the input is according to the standards (for e.g. the raw material is delivered in time, at the required quality standard imposed by us, the company, the people are trained and chosen by the HR department to work within our company according to our needs and financial resources and our equipment is advanced enough to perform well our manufacturing operations), the only way to improve the productivity of the company and our work is to increase the our output to the market. By output I understand either a bigger number of products (but which must comply with quality standards and not to overburden the machines and / or workers) or the same amount of products, but with better quality, thus to lower the rebute and the faulty products which will be refused by the quality audit. In the second case, the quality of the products is improved, thus the company reduces its time (and accordingly its costs) dealing with service, rework or maintenance of our products, when they broke. Also customers will recommend our qualitative products to their acquaintances and relatives and our market share will raise, qualitative products being one of our competitive advantages.

If we consider either two cases, we can increase the output of the company by organizing the resources on the production line to produce faster and better products, without any additional costs. That is why I have developed the Quality Scheduling Index which can improve the output of the company and in this way the management can use it as managerial tool to improve the productivity within the company and plan on larger time interval, than the one, where forecasting is used, in order to expand on other markets, destroy the actual competition and faster innovate the products in radical way, rather than semi-radical one.

A manufacturing company can thus better implement a radical innovation in either the technology or in the business model, or in both actually, by reducing the risk involved with this kind of innovation, because, now, after implementing the QSI on the production line, the time usage of the workers is without any "dead" time, the company doesn't lose money from this, nor uses additional resources than the one which are absolutely needed for the production process and can relocate these resources in the R&D department for next generation products.

However, without strong leadership and vision from the top management, the innovation is not likely to be achieved and implemented in the company's culture. The difference between the two possible types of strategy is given by internal as well as external factors of the company. Between the internal factors, we can recall:

- Technical possibilities
- Organizational abilities
- Success of the actual business model
- Finances
- Vision of the company

I can add to the internal factors, which drive innovation through the company, also:

- Innovation culture and willingness to improve the process within the product lifecycle, without any financial drive incentives---and this factor can be easily solved with the help of the QSI.

The index can be also used as part of the top management's vision of innovation the business model, by adding value to the produced final products, by increasing the quality and reducing the time spent with their production. Here by "reducing time", I consider reducing of the unnecessary time spent of the product on the production lines, reducing or even elimination of the waiting / dead time of the products from their technological processes and manipulation.

2.1. Scenarios and QSI

Whatever part of the innovation process we want to improve (business model or the technology), we should also increase productivity of the processes, by reducing the time spent with them and correspondingly the costs, and increasing the quality of the processes and of the products.

The success of the actual business model, as one of the internal factors which influence the choosing of the right innovation strategy, can be analysed from the productivity point of view. Managers must look at the processes and based on different scenarios, made from the data from the customers and suppliers, i.e. data from CRM and CI, they should improve the time spent in the factory with the production of their goods, but without reconsidering the quality level required by the standards on one hand (ISO 9001, 14 000, 18 000, etc.) but also by the customers, on the other hand.

I consider that a manufacturing small or middle size company can develop its innovation strategy based on scheduling the internal processes in a productive way. In other words the following main scenario mainframe should be maintained when dealing with a new scenario, as part of the future strategy:

1. Arrange the working areas with the corresponding tools in a greedy manner so that each worker can be accounted responsible for his work, if any fault will appear.
2. Prioritize the work according to the available resources and the main skills of the workers so that the time and quality can be maintained within standards.
3. Consider and arrange the machines in a parallel way in order to increase productivity and schedule the manufacturing operations with a focus on quality, time and their corresponding costs.
4. Deliver goods to the market and receive feedback from both the customers and workers in order to improve the process.
5. Adjust the short term and long term strategy of the company, based on the feedback and obtain approval from the stakeholders, with regard to the fulfilment of their needs.

Scenarios are very difficult to create and implement in a company, i.e. because when we talk about scenarios we should consider different points of view of the same problem in order for managers to come to a single generally accepted idea.

The scenario should take in consideration the companies outside environment as well as the internal one, which is responsible for production and shipment of the goods.

2.2. Product's lifecycle stages and QSI

We focus on improving the strategy, by managing the internal processes of the company in a productive time manner from the early stages of the product's lifecycle.

When talking about product's lifecycle we should consider the following stages:

- Introduction to the market – where after a R&D stage the new product is introduced based on customers' feedback and requirements;

- Growth – where our product is already known by some customers and due to its qualities and marketing campaigns, it acquires more visibility and more and more customers are willing to buy it;
- Maturity and Saturation of the market from our product – here all of the market targeted segment know our product and there is only a matter of time to buy it;
- Decline – where due to product's end of life or end of sale we or due to competition take out the product which became obsolete and replace it with a newly developed one.

A company can apply the QSI in the first stage by arranging the machines and working stations into a parallel way so that the required level of quality from the customer's feedback to be attained. Actually this first stage is connected to the last stage of our product's lifecycle if we choose to Decline our product to make room for the new one, which in most of the cases is done due to legal or ecological regulations or due to another competitor who developed a better product than ours and the only way to Win is to completely innovate and launch anew product.

In the second stage, where our product gets momentum and is being seen by more and more potential customers, QSI can be used to adjust the production costs and time used in production (even if our goal is to have them at minimum, due to some technical constraints some parts of our product might spend a higher time on a machine that others and this is due to the requirements of the desired quality level). However there levels of quality even if they are according to the norms can be lowered in order to minimize costs and thus get the product to more customers than before and this also can be done by adjusting the Quality Scheduling Index.

The Quality Scheduling Index is to be implemented into the production process as stated before, however this is in direct relation with the product's lifecycle because the desired level of quality should be at least the same with the initial requirements from the market, in all of the sales stages within time from introduction to the market until the decline, where we can take feedback from customer and adjust our index levels so that it answers the new requirements of quality.

As we all know, manufacturers are not willing to invest into a product to be more qualitative than the requirements from the market, because for an example a market is not mature enough and there is not enough money to cover the costs related with the 100% quality level ideally required by our market segment and that is why we can adjust our QSI if our strategy requires so based on an optimistic scenario. The management of a company can decide that in certain circumstances to prolongue the Maturity stage of the product's lifecycle by changing level of the quality up so some specific point, based on the research and feedback from the market. And this can be easily attained in the automated and semi – automated production stages, where a change of operation and machine processing can be done relatively fast in comparison with human operated working stations where we cannot do anything without a proper training and investment in long term positions. An example can be seen into the automotive industry where after a new model is launched and it acquires momentum from the market, the producers decide to innovate the product by changing the design of the headlights, which gives another boost in the sales, even if the technical functionality of the car didn't change and the previous and the new headlight give the passagers the same light on the road.

My QSI was developed as a management tool which can be applied and used to innovate the production line, which in terms, as shown above, influences the stages of the product's lifecycle.

2.3. What is Quality and EFQM?

Quality is always evaluated and determined by an entity, which can be: a person, a buyer, a customer. This evaluation process has a strong distinctive and personal character! For example the same "qualitative" product for a buyer, where costs are crucial, is different seen by a person who wants to buy that product no matter what the cost is, due to its features and because is an innovation / new thing on the market.

Quality is assessed primarily by the buyer - customer (agent)! He is paying the requested cost and therefore his opinion is authoritative and always right! There is an old saying that "Our customer is always right", which translates in different cultures in slightly similar ways, but the idea is the same.

Quality can be assessed by non-target agents - not just customers, but

- Manufacturers;
- Competitors;
- Creators;
- Service providers;
- Experts, valuers;
- Bureaucrats and clerks.

One can attribute the value of quality to things he does create or does not create:

- Quality of casting;
- Quality of service;
- Quality of process;
- Quality of environment;
- Quality of life;
- Quality of people, etc.

based on their observations, utility, use or consumption.

One can also evaluate and rate quality based on:

- Selection;
- Sorting;
- Classification;
- And predictions of corresponding use.

If there is no quality definition, then the quality cannot be measured! If something cannot be measured, it cannot be on purpose and efficiently improved.

In this sense we consider the newly developed index, i.e. Quality Scheduling Index, which evaluates the time consumption of each operation with regard to the quality of the work and associated with indirect costs. In order to apply this index in any manufacturing small or middle size company, a new methodology (standard) for its implementation was also developed with its evaluation scale, however this is part of the author's other published work[5].

For the sake of this study I will only mention the mathematical formula of the index, my purpose being to focus more on the managerial point of view and how we can extrapolate the philosophy behind the need of its creation to the modern society where time usage is critical and we should improve our daily activities, especially the quality of the time usage and the indirect costs associated with them.

$$QSI = \frac{\sum_{i=1}^{h}\sum_{k=1}^{f}(ew_{ki}E_{ki}y_{ik} + tw_{ki}T_{ki}z_{ik} + w_{ki}C_i)}{\sum_{i=1}^{h}\sum_{k=1}^{f}\frac{q_i}{tc_i * (E_{ki} + T_{ki} + C_i)}}$$

From the production point of view the improvement of quality of time usage and the indirect costs associated with it, we can use the index as showed above to improve the product's lifecycle stages, because every manager wants to develop its products with the minimum production costs, at the highest quality and in the fastest way possible, so that he can take the lead in the market with the innovation of the product.

For better visual aid we can use the European Quality Award Model, which was created as a reward for companies from public and private sector where the resources are scarce and according to their website[6] : "The EFQM Excellence Model provides a framework that encourages the cooperation, collaboration and innovation that we will need to ensure this goal is achieved."

[5] Gruia George Cristian and Gruia George "Sustainable growth with the help of Quality Scheduling Index", Procedia of Economics and Business Administration (2014)

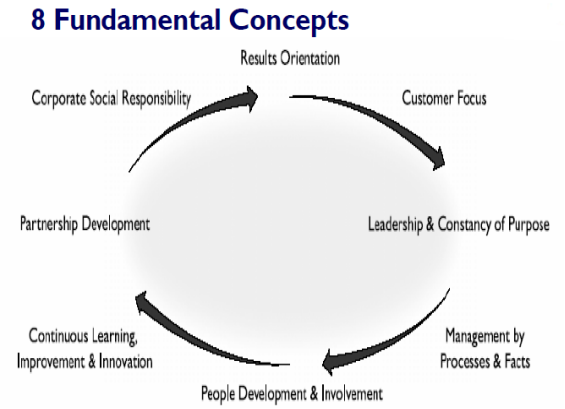
Figure 2



The scope of the article is not to explain nor to present the EFQM model and how it appeared, however I consider that the above figures are suggestive in my approach to integrate the QSI within the requirements and needs of the modern society. If we consider only partly Figure 1 we can state that the enablers (leadership, people, policy & strategy, partnership & resources, processes) give results which in turn help companies to learn from their outputs and further innovate. However the innovation cannot come without the 8 fundamental concepts from Figure 2.

3. Conclusions

In the above article I have presented a short result of the initial outputs of my work, where newly developed Quality Schedulin Index was implemented in the production phases of the product and its versatility was prolongued to the product's lifecycle by the empirical analysis and evaluation of the each of the phases of product's lifecycle.

There is still room for further research in this filed and I consider that the product's lifecycle and the newly developed QSI can further be applied in other disciplines where product or service can be divided in several production phases as well as lifecycle steps. The connection with the modern society is that due to the ever changing conditions on the market due to diversity and the multitude of choises a customer is bombarded from different marketing channels, including without doubt the social media, the time is "precious" as the old saying where "time is money". In this modern society where the amount of smartphones are almost the same as the number of people in the world, the time consumption and overhead costs associated with our daily activities must be lowered in order to remain productive and to answer the daily demand from the society to the individual.

One can read this study and check and evaluate if he/she can become better by using the same monetary and non-monetary resources, because this is the fundamental stone in my research: how can we improve the processes and products by using the available resources, because additional resources are scarce in today's market and investors are difficult to find and convices of our "innovated product" on the paper in order for them to invest and get the ROI as fast as possible.

If we look back at the 2008 economic crisis and check the social and economic status in several European countries, one can predict that the next cycle of the crisis will soon come, thus the option of using resources (money) as commercial or governmental loans is not a good idea as the next crisis might come sooner than expected and instead of Play to Win stategy we might Play Not to Get bankrupted strategy from different changes in exchange rates and interests or even governmental decisions due to social instabilities.

I consider thus that one individual should become better in everything what he/she does as long as they maintain a moral, ethic and legal code according to the country / region they live it and in this scope one can analyse their daily activities and improve the quality of time consumption, indirect costs in order to achive and innovate its processes. Starting from the individual level in time the modern society will evolve and we can even state that the human race can achieve intellectual and scientific progress faster than usual because we solve our daily requirements faster and better and we have more tme for innovation and developing new ideas and conceps.

ALTERNATIVE FUNDING THECNIQUES. COMPARATIVE ANALYSIS

Elena Mihaela ILIESCU[*]
Aurel PLETEA[]

Abstract

The main objective of this paper is to highlight the dynamics, diversity and especially the availability of an alternative financial market, developed outside of the traditional banking system, on online trading platforms, a market that can constitute an efficient solution, at the expense of entities open to fast funding, wide raging, with limited guaranties and minimum procedural and legislative formalities.

For this purpose, we shall analyze briefly the main alternative financing methods, both empirically and qualitatively, in terms of similarities and differences between the two of them, inclusively of the amount that can be employed in this process through different methods.

The current paper aims to be a practical guide meant to support those facing difficulties in obtaining financing for start-ups, implementing or/and developing business and entrepreneurship initiatives, and also a guide for those who want to be informed regarding the latest funding techniques. Another aspect to be considered is the legal framework in which this process takes place, because the regulation for these levers remains constantly behind the development process of new methods.

The classic financiers should also consider reviewing the lending policy as the amounts attracted and accessed through these alternative methods increase exponentially from one year to the other, the volume of sums involved surpassing each time the forecasts, making thus possible the transformations of these paradigms from the financial sector into preponderant financial funding's.

Keywords: alternative financing, venture capital, entrepreneurship, crowdfunding, peer to peer.

1. Introduction

Attracting the financial resources needed to start and develop business and entrepreneurship initiatives represented a permanent challenge for the promoters.

If initially accessing the external financial resources was the prestige of financial institutions, we have witnessed unprecedent changes in recent decades.

Drastic reduction in access to classical financial instruments, caused by the global economic-financial global crisis, the decline of trust in consecrated saving, investment and lending mechanisms, as well as innovations in digitals technologies have led to the emergence of alternative lending and investment methods.

A first step has been made by venture capitals and Angel Investors who implemented method considered to be unconventional for funding businesses, often start-ups.

Small investments, up to 100.000 euro designed to financially support a business until it starts generating its own income is included in the seed financing category. Business angel investments (the investors investing in start-ups in exchange for part of the business) usually use these seed financing[1].

This type of investment is generally used also for the financial capital offered to scalable start-ups that have great potential for development and which, until the time of the investment have registered spectacular growths. We are referring here to venture capital (private equity). Thus, business angel investments are regulated by Law no. 120/2015, with its subsequent regulations and amendments. The first private network investors in technological startups in Romania was TechAngels (http://www.techangels.ro). Also, the Venture Capital funds are represented in Romania also (Digital Catalyst Fund).

An important development has also been recorded in the alternative financing segment, made through the online platforms, outside the traditional banking system. These new unconventional financing sources, known in Romania as participatory financing or multifinancing, will manifest itself mainly in the form of investment of private equity through crowdfunding or peer to peer financing and its characterized by a collective effort of some investors who usually finance, usually online, various projects started by other people or companies.[2]

Globally, the first multi-funding platform was set up in 2001 by the American company ArtistShare, and the largest multi-funding project was "Star Citizen", a space-based video game for which they gathered in 2014 over $ 36 million[3].

Internationally, we can also mention other popular sites such as Kickstarter, Indiegogo or Crowdfunder, and in Romania, creştemidei.ro or potşieu.ro.

Peer to peer funding, however, is based on "person to person" lending and can be done for both entrepreneurs and individuals.

Among the platforms setup successfully for this purpose, we can mention: Zopa (the first company of its kind, set up in 2005 in the UK), Prosper, Lending Club, Bondora (established in Estonia, this platform facilitated the development of the well-known Skype).

Romania also ranks among the countries with a low degree of assimilation of new trends, with the volume of alternative financing amounting to 1.17 million euros, with the last position among the countries of South Eastern Europe. That is why the present paper has as its main objective the popularization of these new financing levers by highlighting the dynamics, diversity and especially the availability of an alternative financial market, developed outside the traditional banking system, on online trading platforms. Thus, this market can be an effective solution, for entities willing to use fast-paced, large-scale, low-guarantee and minimum procedural and legislative formalities financing. For this purpose, empirical data, published by the Cambridge Center for Alternative Finance in "The European Alternative Finance Benchmarking Report" (2014-2018) was used.

2. The dynamics of the main types of alternative financing

Alternative funding is a branch of financial services with an accelerated growth. If initially they were considered as alternative financing methods crowdfunding and peer-to-peer loans, later on other methods such as invoice trading and reward services were also included in the analysis. The volume of funding involved in these funding mechanisms increases significantly each year, from EUR 8,50 billion in 2013 to 32,77 in 2014, and 130,02 billion in 2015, reaching EUR 261,14 billion in 2016.

But, given the specificity of national culture as well as the level of different financial education from one area to another, from one country to another, for a complete and correct picture of this financial behavior, the amounts to be traded should be analyzed by geographical regions (Europe, America and Asia along with the Pacific area).

For each of these regions there is a country whose weight is overwhelming. Thus, for Europe, the largest share is held by the United Kingdom, in America the United States of America, and for Asia the largest share is held by China.

For our area of interest, which is Europe, UK had each year more than 70% of the amounts involved in such funding.

Globally, the area in which these mechanisms have been most used is Asia.

For each area, the graphical analysis reveals interesting aspects of the dynamics of the sums involved in this process.

Thus, America, the region that initiated this process and where alternative funding has the greatest experience, has come to suffer, with an increase of only 6% in 2016 compared to 2015 compared to previous growth rates of about 200%.

A similar phenomenon, but on a smaller scale can also be observed in Europe (limiting growth to 41% compared to much higher growth rates in previous years). This is due to the saturation of the financial market with such offers, the number of platforms offering such services rising each year, which is not always satisfying in terms of the quality of the services offered, having as proof the fact that a great share of platforms analyzed within the original study in 2015(regarding the 2013 and 2014) is no longer working. Another factor for the less accentuated growth is the emergence of cryptocurrencies (completely new technological platforms not regulated by financial markets) and which absorb a large amount of the sums needed for very large startup projects.

On a global scale, however, there is a steady increase in the amounts involved in the alternative financing mechanism.

The values involved in this process as well as the impressive annual growth rate indicate the imposition of these methods on the financial market, especially for small firms, based mostly on innovative business ideas, namely the startups which most often, the classic and unconventional funding systems (Angel Investors and Venture Capitals) ranks them at too high a risk.

These amounts are accessed through alternative funding methods grouped into three broad categories: crowdfunding, peer-to-peer (direct loans) and invoice trading. We will analyze them in detail, by category, in order of importance in the share of collected amounts.

Thus, P2P Consumer Lending, meaning the loans from individuals or legal entities accessed by a natural person, are carried out within web platforms specialized in such services. The financier knows only the project and not the beneficiary of the loan. Most often, this loan returns to the lender with a higher value, the borrower receiving also interest.

P2P Consumer Lending managed to accumulate EUR 696.81 million in 2016, accounting for 33.80% of the market for alternative financing methods, the average amount considered to be defining for this type of financing being EUR 10,000.

P2P Business Lending has the same features as P2P Consumer Lending, only this time loans are accessed by legal entities from individuals or businesses in order to fund a business.

In 2016, the accumulated amount was of EUR 349.96 million, representing 17.00% of the total alternative funding for this period, the defining amount for this type of loan being EUR 100.000;

Instead, P2P Property Lending is covered by risk, being loans from individuals or legal entities guaranteed by a property, which is not the case for the other two options presented above. Otherwise, the features are the same. The amounts accrued in 2016 by this type of funding were 95.15 million Euro, representing 4.6% of the total.

For the equity-based crowdfunding case, the necessary amounts are obtained through the sale of shares held by the company but, this mediation is carried out by those web platforms, eliminating thus other intermediaries, and with diminished commissions. The link between the investor and the creditor is greatly facilitated by the specialized online platform, without which it would be difficult for the two entities to get in touch.

In 2016, the amounts accumulated from this type of financing totaled EUR 218.64 million, or 10.60%, the average amount being accessed through this method being EUR 459,000.

The amounts involved in 2016 for Real Estate Crowdfunding alternative financing, meaning loans from natural or legal persons granted for real estate investments, amounted up to 109.45 million Euro, meaning 5.3% of the total.

At the same time, 9.20% of the total amount of alternative funding for 2016, meaning 190.76 million Euro, was covered by Reward-based Crowdfunding, a mechanism for financing people, projects or companies in exchange for rewards or products, but not in monetary form).

Invoice Trading, meaning the sale of invoices to be withdrawn at a discount value compared to their nominal value, in order to obtain rapid liquidity, accumulated in 2016 a total of 251.87 million Euro respectively 12.20% of the total alternative financing.

Debt-based investment funds, widely known as Debt-based Securities, have been used in the field of unconventional energy. Another feature distinguishing them from other types of alternative funding is the guarantee they provide to creditors as well as the reimbursement system of funding in annual installments and a large number of years. Although the amounts involved are not as high as in other cases (EUR 22.85 million), this type of alternative funding is worth mentioning due to the innovative nature of the technologies in which it is being invested and the way of reimbursement.

In addition to these techniques, there are a number of less useful methods, but their share is less than 1% of the total amount of money circulated.

All of these methods have as their main feature that they are operating on a web platform that links investors and borrowers. The mode of granting credits is much more permissive, depending largely on the creditworthiness of the borrower and on the pertinence of the project he is proposing to finance.

The risks to which the sponsor and the borrower are subject to having two components: the classic one, valid for both classical or unconventional loans and a specific one, determined by the characteristics of this type of credit intermediation. Thus, the borrower bears the risk of being exposed to the innovative ideas of the business he wants to initiate, since the innovative idea needs to be shared, at least in part, to convince potential investors. At the same time, the investor is no longer an expert in financial transactions, having to make a decision largely based on intuition and less on financial experience or good practices. There are few ways to guarantee the investment.

Another relevant aspect in the analysis of this sector is represented by the evolution of the number of web platforms involved in alternative funding mechanisms, especially for our area of interest, which is Europe. Thus, if at the beginning of the 2013 study the number was modest and distributed in only a few countries (UK - 65, Germany - 31, France - 33, Spain - 34, Netherlands - 31) in 2016, meaning a 3-year time span, the number of those benefiting from such platforms increased, the European countries having (with the exception of the former Yugoslavia and Albania) at least one such facility.

But the Eastern European countries have a sad record of 1 to 3 platforms, followed by the Baltic countries with 4 to 6 developed platforms, carrying significant amounts. Estonia, for example, is among the countries with high GDP per capita, ranking second, after the UK. In this country, the unprecedented development of communications infrastructure and Estonian support for web applications of all kinds, including in the public administration sphere, has played an important role.

3. Conclusions

The period following the global financial crisis has created the climate for developing alternative funding mechanisms, against the backdrop of growing distrust in classical or unconventional mechanisms. Also, as a result of this mistrust, surplus money that was usually aimed at savings or pension funds was reoriented to alternative savings / investments. It can be said that, alternative financing methods have been forced to emerge due to the need of both market forces - demand and supply of financing. The existence of new methods of promoting and using web platforms has facilitated and generated this new lending mechanism. It has benefited in particular to startups, characterized by innovative but also resource-poor ideas, as well as small investors, who thus have the opportunity to make advantageous savings.

The phenomenon has intensified, the significant increase in yearly interim amounts, requiring new financial regulations in the United States, Canada and Europe.

Also, in the last report of the University of Cambridge (The 3rd European Alternative Finance Industry Report, 2018, p.38), the increase in the institutionalization level is brought to discussion. In fact, this means increasing involvement of large players on the financial market in alternative funding mechanisms. Nominated are the pension funds, investment funds, banks, Venture Capitals and Angel Investors. Thus, classical funding methods as well as unconventional methods have transformed this competition of alternative methods into a means to reinvest their funds.

The difference consists of the interest they would have had if these amounts were offered in a classic credit for an innovative project and the much lower profit it would obtain by subscribing those funds within crowdfunding or peer-to-platform -peer.

Startups can therefore benefit from fast alternative funding methods, with few guarantees and less formalities. Lenders can benefit from higher earnings from these funding by replacing banks or investment funds with web platforms whose commissions are most often applied to the borrower.

The phenomenon seems to be a win-win situation for both investors and startups, which explains the explosive evolution of recent years.

As a result, the phenomenon can no longer be ignored by traditional players on the financial market, their lending policy showing a tendency to relax.

The growth limitation from 2016 can be explained through adjusting the banks and Ventures Capital companies lending policies, on the one hand, and by the emergence of cryptocurrencies, funding mechanisms for innovative, large-scale financial projects, not yet regulated (China and South Korea forbidding them as lending mechanisms) but extremely advantageous and at the same time risky both for startups and for investors.

All the information presented above as well as the prospects for market evolution, open the way for new research directions on this topic, especially since, for the time being, the complexity of the analysis methods is based on the limited database, given that the Cambridge Center for Alternatives Finance, the global benchmarking institution in this field, publishes annual reports from 2015, the time frame covered so far being only between 2012-2016.

THE USE OF BLOCKCHAINS. AN R APPROACH

Nicolae-Marius JULA[*]
Nicoleta JULA[]

Abstract

The cryptocurrency is a hot topic and understanding the blockchain is very important. Also, understanding what blockchain may lead to more decentralized services and applications to be used, not only in relation to financial applications. Today, blockchains can be used to for smart contracts, decentralized networks, governments and non-profit organizations, banks and even photography copyright recordings and smart contracts for music artists. Even World Economic Forum predicted that by 2015 about 10% of global GDP will be stored on blockchain technology. The blockchain technology cosists in creating a chain of blocks, validated with a hash function and under a "proof of work" concept, which limits speed of creating new blocks. The new technology is open source, but recently has attracted the attention of big software players, like Microsoft and other companies (BBVA, UBS). In this paper, we present a simple R implementation of a blockchain, containing a initial block, creation of each blocks (including hash and proof of work) and the creation of the chain. Data validation and the lack of so-called middle man, minimization of the fees, increasing the speed of transactions, security and anonymity provided by this technology are good arguments for ensuring the continuous development of the technology and its spreading in everyday activities.

Keywords: blockchain, cryptocurrency, R, proof of work, technology.

1. Introduction

1.1. History of blockchain

One cannot start an analysis about blockchain without mentioning its public debut: when Satoshi Nakamoto, whose true identity is still unknown, released the whitepaper Bitcoin: A Peer to Peer Electronic Cash System in 2008 that described a "purely peer-to-peer version of electronic cash" known as Bitcoin. Many years the two concepts (blockchain and Bitcoin) were seen together. Of course, without blockchain, there will be no Bitcoin, but blockchain technology is a lot more than just cryptocurrency: it has potential to impact every industry, from financial, manufacturing to education and evan creative arts.

It is worth mentioning that, from the beginning, the technology behind blockchain was offered as an open source. The term "open source" describes the practice of producing or developing certain finished products, allowing users to access the production or development process freely. Some specialists define the "open source" as a philosophical concept; others think it is a pragmatic methodology.

The most important aspect that blockchain brings to the masses is that it records important information in a public space and doesn't allow anyone to remove it, it's transparent, time-stamped and decentralized. Sally Davis, a reporter from FT Technologies states that "Blockchain is to Bitcoin, what the internet is to email. A big electronic system, on top of which you can build applications. Currency is just one". At its core, blockchain is an open, distributed register that records transactions between two parties in a perpetual way without needing third-party authentication. This creates an extremely efficient process and one people predict will dramatically reduce the cost of transactions. When entrepreneurs understood the power of blockchain, there was a surge of investment and discovery to see how blockchain could impact supply chains, healthcare, insurance, transportation, voting, contract management and more. It is estimated thatn early 15% of financial institutions are currently using blockchain technology.

It was in 2013 when Vitalik Buterin wanted to expand beyond the limitations found in Bitcoin technology and cretated the second public blockchain, called Etherum. The major difference between the two is that Ethereum can use other assets such as loans or contracts, not just currency. Ethereum launched in 2015 and can be used to build "smart contracts"—those that can automatically process based on a set of norms established in the Ethereum blockchain. This technology has attracted the attention of companies such as Microsoft, BBVA and UBS, who are interested in the potential of the smart contract functionality to save time and money.

Today, Bitcoin is just one of the several hundred applications that use blockchain technology. It's been a remarkable decade of transformation for blockchain technology and it will be interesting to see where the next decade takes us.

2. The use of blockchains

2.1. Validation

Presently, blockchain works on the "proof of work" concept, where a powerful computer calculation or "mining" is done in order to create a block (or a new set of trustless transactions). Currently, when you initiate a transaction, it is bundled into a block. Then the so-called "miners" confirm the transactions are authentic within that block by solving a proof-of-work problem—a very difficult mathematical problem that takes an extraordinary amount of computing power to solve. The first miner to solve the problem gets a recompense and then the verified transaction is stockpiled on the blockchain. Ethereum developers are interested in changing to a new consensus system called proof of stake.

2.2. Popular Use Cases of Blockchain

Notary

It is a fact that most records are stored on paper ledgers, but these can be tampered, lost, destroyed and so on. The data in blockchains cannot be tampered. Even the name suggests the two main components of the blockchain: a block and a chain. Data is stored in blocks and these blocks are all connected in a chain. The secure system is contained in the hash information from each block. In simple terms, hashing means taking an input string of any length and giving out an output of a fixed length. In the context of cryptocurrencies like Bitcoin, the transactions are taken as an input and run through a hashing algorithm (Bitcoin uses SHA-256) which gives an output of a fixed length. Every successive block will contain the previous block's hash. This is what binds them together.

Smart contracts

Usually, two parties can agree and sign a contract that legally binds them. For exemple, for renting or other services. What if one of the parties don't want to pay when the limit expires? Of course, there are legal ways to follow, but usually in a court the time lost is hard to compensate. So, the blockchain solution is to create a code that is deployed on both parties' computers. Also the banks of both parties should be part of this private blockchain. When the conditions are met, a trigger enforces the bank to make the payment:

Pseudo code of the smart contract between Person 1 and Person 2:

If today's date is 30th and rent is not paid then Transfer $500 from Person 1's account to Person 2's account

Digital Voting

Blockchain helps overcome the biggest issue with digital voting: security. The technology can make the votes anonymous and provide better security. The latest drop in voting turnout may be changed using this system.

Distributed Storage

We are heading to an era when storage is more and more seen as a cloud option. We do not discuss here about the pros and cons regarding cloud versus local storage options, but more and more people rely on internet services for their files. It is also a big issue with the privacy and more people start to care and demand security and privacy for their private files. Using blockchains, the data is stored descentralized, with high encryption

Other uses, as Ameer Rosic describes in the article from BlockGeeks, are:

The sharing economy

With booming companies such as Uber and AirBnB, the sharing economy is already a proven success. Currently, however, users who want to save a sharing service must rely on an intermediary such as Uber. By allowing peer payments, the block opens the door to interact directly between the parties - resulting in a truly decentralized economy.

An early example, OpenBasear uses the block to create a peer-to-peer eBay. One can download the app on the computing device and make transactions with OpenBazzar retailers without paying transaction fees. The "no rule" philosophy of the protocol means that personal status will be even more important for business interactions than is presently on eBay.

Crowdfunding

Crowdfunding initiatives, such as Kickstarter and Gofundme, are working in advance on the emerging peer-to-peer economy. The popularity of these sites suggests that people want to have a direct say in product development. Blockchains take this interest at the next level, creating potential venture capital funds with multiple sources.

In 2016, such an experiment, DAO based on Ethereum (Decentralized Autonomous Organization), generated a surprise of $ 200 million in just two months. The participants bought the "DAO chips", allowing them to vote on intelligent risk capital investments (the voting power was proportional to the number of DAOs they held). Subsequent hacking of project funds has shown that the project was launched without proper diligence, with disastrous consequences. Indirectly, the DAO experiment suggests that the bloc has the potential to introduce "a new paradigm of economic co-operation".

Governance

By making the outcomes fully transparent and available to the public, distributed database technology could bring full transparency to elections or any other way of polling. Intelligent contracts based on ethereum help automate the procedure.

The Boardroom application allows organizational decisions to be taken in block. In practice, this means that businesses' governance becomes fully transparent and verifiable when managing digital assets, equity or information.

Supply chain auditing

Consumers are increasingly keen to know that companies' ethical complaints about their products are real. Distributed records provide an easy way to certify that the history of the things we buy is genuine. Transparency comes with temporal marking of a date and location - for example on ethical diamonds - that correspond to a product number.

Provenance in the UK offers supply chain audit for a wide range of consumer goods. Using the Ethereum blockchain, the Provenance pilot project guarantees that fish sold in Japan's Sushi restaurants has been harvested sustainably by its Indonesian suppliers.

Prediction markets

The agglomerated screening of predictions about the probability of the event proves to be of a high degree of precision. The significance of the previous attitude cancels the unexamined disagreements that distort the judgment. Predicted markets that pay according to event results are already active. Blocks are a "crowd wisdom" technology that will undoubtedly find other applications in the years to come.

However, in Beta, the Augur Market Demand Demand offers bids to participate in the outcome of real-world events. Participants can earn money by buying in the correct prediction. Most of the shares purchased in the correct result, the bigger it will be. With a small commitment (less than one dollar), anyone can ask a question, create a market based on a predictable outcome, and collect half of all market-generated trading fees.

Protection of intellectual property

As is well acknowledged, digital information can be replicated infinitely - and widely distributed through the Internet. This has given global users a goldmine of free content. However, copyright holders have not been so lucky, losing control over intellectual property and financially suffering consequently. Smart contracts can protect copyright and automate the online sale of creative works, eliminating the risk of copying and redistributing files.

Mycelium uses blockchain to create a peer-to-peer music distribution system. Founded by British singer and songwriter Imogen Heap, Mycelium allows musicians to sell songs directly to the public, as well as to issue licensing samples to producers and to hold copyright for composers and musicians - all of which are automated by smart contracts. The use of blocks to issue payouts in fractional cryptocrats (micropayments) suggests that this case of use for the blockchain has great chances of success.

Internet of Things (IoT)

What is IoT? Network management of certain types of electronic devices - for example, monitoring the air temperature in a storage facility. Intelligent contracts make it possible to automate remote management. A mixture of software, sensors and networking simplifies the exchange of data between objects and mechanisms. The result increases system efficiency and improves cost monitoring.

The biggest players in the manufacturing, technical and telecommunication industries are fighting for IoT supremacy. Think of Samsung, IBM and AT & T. A natural extension of the existing infrastructure, controlled by current operators, IoT applications will run ranges from predictive mechanical maintenance to data analysis and large-scale automation systems management.

Neighbourhood Microgrids

Blockchain technology allows the acquisition and sale of renewable energy created by neighborhood microgrids. When solar panels produce excessive energy, smart contracts based on Ethereum redistribute it automatically. Similar types of intelligent contract automation will have many other applications as the IO becomes reality.

Located in Brooklyn, Consensys is one of the world's leading global companies that develops a wide range of applications for Ethereum. A project that they partner with is the Transactional Network, working with the distributed energy equipment, LO3. A prototype of a project currently in use, and uses smart deals from Ethereum to automate the monitoring and redistribution of microgrid energy. This so-called "smart grid" is an early example of IoT functionality.

Identity management

There is a clear need for better identity management on the web. The ability to verify your identity is the connection between financial transactions that occur online. However, remedies for the security risks associated with web trade are imperfect at best. Shared spreadsheets provide improved methods to prove who you are, along with the ability to digitize personal documents. Having a secure identity will also be imperative for online interactions - for example, in the sharing economy. Good reputation, after all, is the most important condition for online transactions.

The development of digital identity standards proves to be an extremely complex process. Apart from the technical challenges, a universal online identity solution requires cooperation between private entities and government. Add to this the need to navigate in the legal systems of different countries and the problem becomes exponentially difficult. Internet e-commerce is currently based on the SSL (low green block) certificate for secure web transactions. Netki is a startup that aspires to create a SSL for blockchain. After announcing a $ 3.5 million seed round recently, Netki expects to launch a product in early 2017.

AML and KYC

Anti-money laundering (AML) and know your customer (KYC) have a strong potential to adapt to the block of flats. Currently, financial institutions need to carry out a multi-step process for each new client. KYC costs could be reduced by customer checking within an institution and, at the same time, increasing the effectiveness of monitoring and analysis.

Startup Polycoin has an AML / KYC solution that involves transaction analysis. These transactions identified as suspicious are passed on to compliance agents. Another startup command develops an application called Trust in Motion (TiM). Characterized as a "Instagram for KYC," TiM allows customers to take an instant image of key documents (passport, utility bill, etc.). After verification by the bank, these data are stored cryptographically on the block of blocks.

Data management

Today, in exchange for personal data, users can use free social platforms like Facebook. In the future, users will have the ability to manage and sell the data generated by their online activity. Because it can be easily distributed in small quantities, Bitcoin - or something like that - will most likely be the currency used for this type of transaction.

The MIT Enigma project understands that user privacy is a prerequisite for creating a personal data market. Enigma uses cryptographic techniques to allow splitting of individual data sets between nodes and at the same time to perform bulk calculations across the entire data group. Data fragmentation also makes the Enigma scalable (as opposed to blockchain solutions where data is repeated on each node). A Beta release is promised in the next six months.

Land title registration

As registers accessible to the public, blocks can make all sorts of more efficient registrations. Property titles are a case in point. They tend to be susceptible to fraud, as well as costly and forced labor efforts for administration.

Several countries are building land registry projects based on blocks. Honduras was the first government to announce such an initiative in 2015, although the status of this project is unclear. This year, the Republic of Georgia has reached an agreement with the Bitfury Group to develop a block system for property titles. According to him, Hernando de Soto, the high-ranking economist and property rights attorney, will advise on the project. Most recently, Sweden has announced that it is experiencing a blockchain application for property titles.

Stock trading

The potential to increase efficiency in the stock settlement process makes the use of trading blocks strongly used. When running peer-to-peer, commercial confirmations become almost instantaneous (as opposed to taking three days for clearance). Potentially, this means that intermediaries - such as clearing houses, auditors and custodians - are eliminated from the process.

Numerous stock and commodity exchanges are application prototypes for the services they offer, including ASX (Australian Securities Exchange), Deutsche Börse (Frankfurt Stock Exchange) and Japan Exchange Group (JPX). The highest profile because the first known in this area is Linda Nasdaq Linq, a platform for trading on the private market (usually between companies that started to engage with investors). A partnership with the blockchain technology group, Linq, announced the completion of its first volume of transactions in 2015. More recently, Nasdaq announced the development of a block block test project for the proxy vote on the Estonian stock market.

3. A simple blockchain in R

The algorithm is detailed in the CorrelAid blog and describes a simple R implementation of a blockchain, containing a initial block, creation of each blocks (including hash and proof of work) and the creation of the chain.

3.1. Creating the BLOCK

At minimum, a block must contain: data, timestamp, index and self-identifying hash:

block_example <- list(index = 1, timestamp = "2018-01-05 17.00 MST", data = "Some data", previous_hash = 0,

    proof = 9,
    new_hash = NULL)

3.2. Hash

As stated before, a hash helps to ensure the integrity of a block by connecting it to the other blocks in the chain. A hash function takes something as an input and gives us a unique, encrypted output.

In the hash function, it is not included only the current information contained by the block, but also the hash of the previous block. This means, the algorithm calculates the valid hash only if it knows the hash of the previous block, which was created using the hash of the previous and so on. This ensures the sequntiality of the blockchain.

#Function that creates a hashed "block"
hash_block <- function(block)
block$new_hash <- digest(c(block$index, block$timestamp,
      block$data, block$previous_hash),          "sha256") return(block)

3.3. Proof of work

There is a need to control the maximum numbers of blocks that can be created (for example, in cryptocurrency this is due to value loss if unlimited number of coins cand be crated). To control that, a so-called “proof of work” is defined. The work that is to be done by the computer, for example – solving a mathematical problem, which should be hard to solve but easy to verify, is to be rewarded. In Bitcoin mining (which is the name of the problem solving for this currency) the reward is in Bitcoins. When a new block must be created, a computational problem is sent out to the network. The miner which solves the PoW problem first creates the new block and is rewarded in bitcoins (this is the way new BitCoins are actually created). This "lottery" of finding the new correct proof ensures that the power of creating new blocks is decentralised. When a new block is mined it is sent out to everybody so that every node in the network has a copy of the latest blockchain. The idea that the longest blockchain in the network (the one which "the most work was put into") is the valid version of the blockchain is called "decentralised consensus[1]".

As suggested in a blog regarding block creation, one can define a PoW like find the next number that is divisible by 99 and divisable by the proof-number of the last block:

library("digest") #Loading the hash-algorithm
Simple Proof of Work Alogrithm proof_of_work <- function(last_proof)
{
proof <- last_proof + 1
Increment the proof number until a number is found that is divisable by 99 and by the proof of the previous block
while (!(proof %% 99 == 0 & proof %% last_proof == 0 )){ proof <- proof + 1
return(proof)

3.4. Adding new blocks

First, one should define the start block, the first block in the chain:

Define Genesis Block (index 1 and arbitrary previous hash) block_genesis <-  list(index = 1, timestamp = Sys.time(),
    data = "Genesis Block", previous_hash = "0",

Now, adding blocks to the chain cand be done with a function like:

```
#A function that takes the previous block and optionally some data (in our case just a string indicating which block in the chain it is)
gen_new_block <- function(previous_block){
#Proof-of-Work
new_proof <- proof_of_work(previous_block$proof)
#Create new Block
new_block <- list(index = previous_block$index + 1,
    timestamp = Sys.time(),
    data = paste0("this is block ", previous_block$index +1), previous_hash = previous_block$new_hash, proof = new_proof)
#Hash the new Block
new_block_hashed <- hash_block(new_block) return(new_block_hashed)

3.5. Building the Blockchain

To build the blockchain, the algorithm should start with the first block, previously defined:

```
Create blockchain
blockchain <- list(block_genesis) previous_block <- blockchain[[1]]
How many blocks should we add to the chain after the genesis block
num_of_blocks_to_add <- 20
Add blocks to the chain
for (i in 1: num_of_blocks_to_add){ print(system.time(block_to_add <- gen_new_block(previous_block))) # Evaluate time it takes for PoW

[1] https://correlaid.org/blog/posts/blockchain-explained

    blockchain[i+1] <- list(block_to_add) previous_block <- block_to_add print(paste0("Block ", block_to_add$index, " has been added")) print(paste0("Proof: ", block_to_add$proof)) print(paste0("Hash: ", block_to_add$new_hash))

4. Conclusions

Blockchains are a revolutionary solution for a such variety of industries. The data validation and the lack of so called middle man, minimizing the fees, increasing the speed of transactions and the security and anonymity provided by this technology are good arguments for ensuring the continuous development of the technology and its spreading in every day activities.

TRENDS IN NON-FINANCIAL MOTIVATION POLICIES OF EMPLOYEES

Costin Alexandru PANAIT[*]
Nicoleta Georgeta PANAIT[]

Abstract

The main purpose of the paper is to identify the main non-financial motivation strategies, to emphasize their advantages and disadvantages, as well as to involve the management in achieving the motivational objectives within the organizations. Studies in the field have shown that there are a number of factors of great importance in motivating the staff that managers need to consider in improving the company's performance. Motivating human resources is not a simple process, it is complex and continuous and managers need to find the optimal mix for motivating and performance-oriented employee. Appropriate motivation of employees is the main purpose on which good management of a firm is based. Practice shows that poor leadership quality is the main cause of employee dissatisfaction that is unsatisfied with their work. Motivating staff means creating opportunities for individual and team goals, responsibility, recognition, reward, etc.

Motivation implies the totality of the internal and external motives of the personality, which condition the transformation of its development potential into real and functional psychological structures and is in itself a complex and cumulative psychological system. Most reward processes are based on philosophies and reward strategies and contain policy and strategy arrangements and contain policy arrangements, principles, practices, structures and procedures that are designed and managed to deliver and maintain the types and adequate levels of benefits and other forms of reward.

Keywords: motivation, performance, motivation strategies, employee, reward.

1. Theoretical aspects of lending

The motivation policy, regardless of where a person is active, aims to stimulate the employee to achieve performance. Motivation is what really causes people to work, and this has two major types of action on resources: financial and non-financial.

Researchers or academic colleagues such as Porter & Lawler, Naylor, Pritchard & Ilgen, Katzell & Thompson have experienced motivational models, later building analytics that are applicable to companies.

The strategy of motivating the human resource is one of the most important components of the organization that generates much and the evolution or deterioration of the economic situation. Also, organizational culture undergoes major mutations based on how the motivational system is built inside an economic entity and not only.

Financial methods such as salary, commission, bonus, bonuses, dividends, etc., are all forms of cash reward or the results obtained by the employee.

Although they are the most frequent forms of motivation, financial methods reveal major shortcomings in terms of motivation: on the one hand, in the perception of the employee, the respective amounts are entitled to what makes their motivating role very small, money clearly does not generate employee loyalty to the organization, (when the money is the only thing that keeps the employee connected to the organization they work in, the employee will leave the team at the first opportunity for a better offer, in Romania about 80% of the employees spend all their income from one month to the next , and when this occurs, the employer tends to blame the employer for not rewarding the employee's time and abilities in the right way). From psychological and social studies, it turned out that most employees did not retain more than 30 days the value of premiums/bonuses or successful commissions.The effects of financial motivation are strong, but they are not everything, which causes people to really work, not the magnification, but the motivation. Researches in this field have demonstrated the lack of long-term efficiency of financial incentive systems.

Motivation implies the totality of the internal and external motives of the personality, which condition the transformation of its development potential into real and functional psychological structures and is in itself a complex and cumulative psychological system.

Motivation should not be considered and interpreted as an end in itself, but served to achieve high performance, performance being a superior level of accomplishment of purpose.

The first and best-known need-driven motivational theory has been developed by American psychologist Abraham Maslow and is based on the concept of a "hierarchy of needs", according to the theory that needs can not be felt simultaneously by the individual but successively.

Clayton Alderfer recognizes that needs are in close relationship with motivation. At the same time his research does not find a strict hierarchy of needs comparable to that of Maslow. Alderfer classifies the needs in three great classes: necessities of existence, sociability and development.

Alderfer's model represents an attempt to increase the applicability of the theory of needs to organizational conditions (the theory of needs postulates that human beings have characteristic needs and that people can be motivated by giving them what they need in exchange for the effort they make, are motivated to meet their most important needs).

American psychologist David Clarence McClelland, in his reference paper, Theory of Needs, explained that in the general picture of the human psyche the needs occupy a prime place, which is why he leaned on the theories that the person's needs influence his actions, including at work. Thus, the American psychologist, although identifying 20 needs, focused only on three in explaining connections to the workplace, and these are the need to achieve, the need for association, and last but not least the need for power.

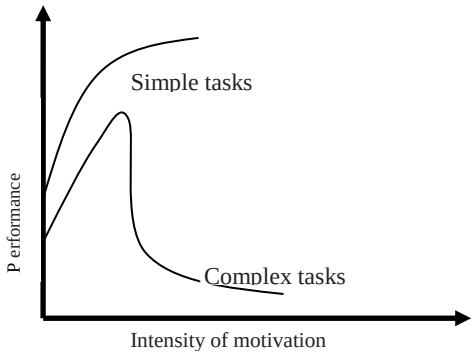
From these listed needs, the main thrust is the need for realization because it is closely linked to the individual and the other is linked to the individual's relationships with others. Also, people who have a strong need / personal desire to choose will choose the situations they can control and the results of their actions will depend on their abilities and training and less chance

2. Motivation-performance relationship

Psychological studies show that employee motivation within a company contributes to performance, but performance increases are not always directly proportional to the intensity of motivation.

The "Yerkes - Dodson" law demonstrates that increasing the intensity of motivation leads to improved performance only up to a critical area, after which, if the intensity of motivation continues to increase, performance is declining (chart 1).

Chart.no 1. Relationship between performance and intensity of motivation



Experimental research has shown that the critical area of motivation intensity varies depending on several factors: the simplicity/complexity of the task the individual has to accomplish, the degree of perceived difficulty of the task, the personality particularities of the individual, etc.

According to the graph, in the case of simple repetitive tasks, as the intensity of motivation increases, the level of performance also increases. In the case of complex tasks, increasing the intensity of motivation increases the performance but only to one point, after which a stagnation and even a decline begin. It is thought that too strong a motivation leads to the emergence of emotions, which in turn leads to a certain degree of disorganization, which prevents progress, even leading to regress.

The moment when the decline begins depends on the complexity of the task: a heavy task speeds up the occurrence of the inflection point and thus the occurrence of the decline, whereas in the case of simple, repetitive, routine tasks, this point appears very late or not at all.

Thus, the optimal motivational concept was introduced, namely the intensity of the motivation to achieve high performance. The motivational optimum is obtained by acting on two variables: on the one hand, the habit of individuals to perceive as accurately as possible the difficulty of the task (in which case the optimal motivation is obtained by an equivalence relation between the intensity of the motivation intensity and the degree of difficulty perceived) and, on the other hand, by manipulating the intensity of motivation to increase or decrease it, depending on the situation.

To achieve optimal motivation, a permanent combination of extrinsic positive motivation with intrinsic motivation should be considered, with the goal not only to increase performance but also to develop the human potential of personal life.

In this context, an important role belongs to the individual psychic particularities of the employees (emotivity, equilibrium, self-control, etc.), these being elements that can stimulate or, on the contrary, can brake the fulfillment of the tasks.

3. The importance of applying theories to organizations

Motivational theories highlight the fact that employees within any department within the company have different needs that need to be met and depending on their degree of achievement, so staff are more or less motivated to work for the achievement of goals, hence that important in the company is that the activities within the organization are as stimulating and why not as attractive for the employees.

In my opinion, at present, the most popular forms of motivation of employees in the Romanian companies are salary, work / work, position in the organization, career development perspectives, differentiated or delocalized work program, information possibilities on the company's objectives, financial situation development perspectives etc., how to solve problems, crisis situations.

Salary as a factor in employee motivation - improper use of this form of incentive, but also the exclusive use of this form of motivation will also have negative effects. In particular, in order to have a motivating effect and to increase the performance of the organization, it must necessarily be linked to the performance of the employee.

Position in the organization as a means of motivation - is about an intrinsic motivation, since this motivation is closely related to the direct relationship between the occupant and the tasks he / she has to perform. When it comes to enriching a post, this can often become a factor that motivates and leads to positive results, but negative effects may also occur in this case when the target is occupied by the position does not have the necessary skills or not has the necessary professional training.

Work itself / work done - In order for the activity to be motivating, the individual objectives of the job description must be built by the SMART type. Thus, they must be specific - they are targeted at a measurable, measurable, measurable area - or at least have a progress indicator. accessible - specific to those who realize them, realistic - as close as possible to the truth by using the available resources. measurable - specify the time when objectives will be met. In this context, I appreciate that only using this motivation is useful for motivating those who perform simple tasks. For those performing complex high-skill activities, several factors need to be combined.

Differentiated or delocalized work program - can be done in several forms - a flexible program with start and end time activities that vary according to the needs of the person's employee), weekly weekly program (involves running all weekly activities in fewer days, observance of the number of normal weekly hours), division of the job (contributes to the motivation of the staff by the fact that an employee can perform the duties related to the job together with other persons).

Information: The more employees know about what is happening in the firm, and especially how much they know about their work, the more they trust their work, and this affects their morale in a positive way. It is also important to ensure that they receive accurate and up-to-date information. Lack of information would reduce morale, and consequently motivation;

4. The importance of motivation management

In our century, the biggest challenge for managers is to build human resources departments capable of increasing employee productivity, yet leaving the primary idea of economic perceptions to lower costs and maximize profits.

This task will dominate the managers' work agenda and will ultimately make a difference between the competitive capabilities of organizations and their survival in the global economic environment.

Motivating human resources is not a simple process, it is a continuous and complex one, and managers need to be able to find the optimal mix to motivate and result-oriented employees.

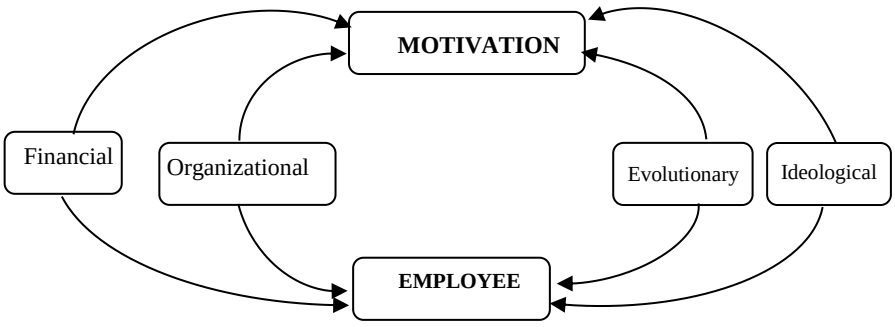
The motivation for work is, first of all, a personal matter, and it can be influenced by the policies and strategies of the organization. The manager believes that a company employee can motivate another, so he adopts the term "encouragement" instead of "motivation". Company managers are concerned with eliminating workplace dissatisfaction, improving working conditions, and providing as many facilities as possible to employees.

The manager understands the role of the human factor in achieving the desired economic performance and knows how to stimulate the entire collective of employees to effectively contribute to the achievement of the objectives without neglecting the staff's concerns for satisfying their own desires and needs.

The manager of the organization plays an important role in motivating employees; the ability to lead employees is one of the tasks the manager has and hence aims to permanently stimulate employees to do the best and to make the most of their capabilities to reach the organization's goals. An aspect of real importance is that in order to ask for and get the most out of employees, the manager is an example to them, in other words, the employees admire the person who leads them, and at the same time, they expect the hierarchical superior to or at the same time competent and responsive to their desires and suggestions.

The manager must also be involved in creating a team spirit in which each employee feels at ease, as a useful part of a whole. Collaboration between manager and employees increases staff motivation and therefore influences employee competence and performance.

Chart no.2. Motivational model



The successful manager is concerned with finding ways to motivate employees to get the job done. In this sense, they will have to be able to make their employees produce more, being interested in increasing the quality of their work and persuading them to spend less time recreating themselves and taking a long time thinking about the work and to their careers.

Once employees become motivated, they try to maintain that state; First, performance standards must be maintained at a high level (if you do not see when results start to be below the expected standards, people will think managers do not care about this). Secondly, another factor that is taken into consideration for the motivation of employees not to disappear is their morale, the mental state.

Maintaining performance: Following employees' motivation, it is useful to get the highest performance from them and maintain it at this high level. This is based on three elements: constant supervision (requires the manager to be constantly mindful of what is happening in the organization and the work of employees, to make sure what works well and make small adjustments where necessary - with as the mistakes are observed earlier, the more satisfied the world), periodic analysis of the situation (if the results of human labor are weak, it is not advisable for managers to react negatively to such situations, but to control, identify the causes that impede the achievement of the desired performance, it is important to identify the "culprit" and to agree with him an action plan to improve the situation), the review (the subjects to be discussed during the review are related to past performance, future plans, responsibilities). A periodic review of the results allows human resources to have an overview of their work, gives them a direction to follow, a feeling that they know where they are going).

5. Non financial motivation

In order to achieve optimal results, the manager is required to clarify from the outset the contractual relationships that are his projections regarding the financial or non-financial rewards and how they intend to use them. Many problems identified on the human resources component stem from the fact that managers do not know how to reward effectively the staff they coordinate.

The power of reward depends on the person who has the ability and the resources needed to reward employees.

Managers have a great reward potential, which is often exemplified by employees as follows: keeping or improving motivations, praise, recognition in front of others.

Rewards management is the process of developing and implementing strategies, policies and reward systems that enable the organization to meet its objectives by recruiting and selecting the necessary employees, as well as by properly motivating them.

In most human resource management theories, there are some aspects about the relationship between managers and employees: reward, recognition, appreciation, and last but not least benefits.

Relational needs. I am in correlation with the social needs component defined by Maslow, and the link with the work environment explains the need for individuals to come into contact, but also the social interaction that takes place in the workplace.

If it is based on the fact that maintaining good collegiality is an important aspect, it can be confirmed that the need for social interaction is an element that motivates employees in a company very much.

Development needs. It is the combination of Maslow's need for self-esteem and self-overtaking and refers to the need to be creative and to experience growth and development through the work done in the organization.

Most organizations recognize the need to use non-financial motivation methods. Non-financial methods are those forms of reward and incentive that do not involve direct payment of money to the employee. On the most important I will detail them in the following:

Expanding workplace activities involves the addition of additional tasks. In this situation, the employee desires to experience less repetition and monotony. When extending the workplace, the job itself remains essentially unchanged. With the expansion of the workplace, the employee rarely needs to acquire new skills to fulfill the additional burden. One possible negative effect is that the expansion of jobs can be viewed by employees as a requirement to do more work for the same payroll!

Rotation of jobs - involves moving employees through a range of jobs to increase interest and motivation. This method of rotation of jobs can have both advantages and disadvantages, on the one hand, it offers the advantage of solving the absence of staff, on the other hand it can generate a reduction in productivity because people are not familiar with the new task. Rotation of jobs often involves the need for further training.

Diversification of work - improving work tries to give employees greater responsibility by diversifying the work and complexity of tasks they have to do, while giving them the necessary authorities. This method creates the opportunity for employees to use their abilities to the fullest. Successful diversification of business requires almost always additional investment in employee training.

Teamwork and empowerment - involves ensuring greater control over professional life. Organizing the workforce in teams with a high degree of autonomy can achieve this. This means that employees plan their work, make their own decisions and solve their own problems. Teams are set targets to get and can receive rewards to do so. Teamwork is a popular way of organizing employees at work.

Compared to financial motivation, the non-financial one has a number of advantages: it has far more powerful effects, appealing to elements of emotional nature; costs less; has an effect over a longer period of time; is kept by the employee for a longer period of time; has positive effects on team cohesion; does not create resentment when the employer has to suspend it; creates loyalty to the company.

Non-financial motivation is the optimal solution for a number of situations naturally occurring in the company's activity. Below we can list a few:

Increase the company's productivity, as the financial situation does not allow for other employment or the additional payment of the existing employees;

Increasing the company's productivity in peak periods (especially in the service area);

Diminishing unjustified absences from the work program - with a clear impact on the company's productivity;

Developing the creativity, imagination and dedication of the staff in times of crisis of the organization;

Increasing loyalty to the organization and reducing departures - specific to sectors where finding qualified staff is difficult;

Improving the image of the company both internally and externally (supplier area);

Increasing the quality of products / services offered at no extra cost;

Increasing teamwork and improving the working atmosphere.

Non-financial motivation is a widespread practice in Western countries, especially in large companies. These strategies cover a wide range of stimulators, which can be divided into three distinct categories: employee / employee-related benefits, related to the company or related to the activity being carried out.

From my point of view the instruments of non-financial motivation are multiple and they can be constructed depending on the type of employee and type of organization. We enumerate the clear set of rules, respect for employees, but also respect for the bosses, relaxed work environment, atmosphere and right relationships between employees, the existence of personal development opportunities, but also career advancement prospects, team building activities to strengthen the spirit teamwork.

In the table below we have structured some non-financial motivation factors identified in different studies, broken down by category.

EMPLOYEE	WORK	ORGANIZATION
Possibilities to advance	Resources	Quality of service offered
Public recognition of merits	Features	Legality
Advantages in nature training	Tools	Economic Stability
Professional	Data	Defined objectives
Development	Ergonomics	Declared values
Information	Physical security	Mission
Affiliation	Systems of self-reliance	Competitive strategy
Professional realization	Autonomy	Fast decision making system
Identification with the organization	Responsibility	Consistency in decisions
State of mind	Flexibility	Clear communication
Trust in colleagues	Diversity	Transparency
Trust by colleagues	Efficiency	Accept the heroes
Personal goals consistent with the company's objectives	Utility	Leadership
Development	Level of stress	Ethics
Pride	Risk level	Social image
Security	Professional training	Human Resources Policy
Acceptance	Clarity of pregnancy	Employee status
Success		Supervision style
Recognition		Competitiveness
Satisfaction		Harmony
Work-life balance		Equity
Respect

4. Conclusion

It is increasingly evident that the organization, the company, can cope with the changes required by competitiveness and progress only by focusing the managers' efforts on the motivation and satisfaction of the employees.

Practice has shown that there are a number of factors of great importance in staff motivation and which managers always account for. These factors are defined as positive and negative. From the first category, among the positive factors (which maneuver correctly lead to motivation) are: the possibility of professional realization; recognition of personal value; opportunities for training and professional growth; incentive activities (free entry to courses, gymnasiums, participation in team-building, participation in volunteer activities); assigning responsibilities; interpersonal relationships and the most pleasant environment at work.

Among the most important factors that have negative effects on the motivation of the staff are: unpleasant ambience or excessive stress; very stable salary policy.

Appropriate motivation of employees is the main purpose on which good management of a firm is based. Practice shows that poor leadership quality is the main cause of employee dissatisfaction that is unsatisfied with their work. Motivating staff means creating opportunities for individual and team goals, responsibility, recognition, reward, etc.

Assuming responsibilities creates the possibility of achievements that offer the possibility of individual or group recognition, and recognition ensures.

AN EMPIRICAL STUDY ON PUBLIC DEBIT IN ROMANIA

Abstract

This paper states that public debt can be defined as an amount that a country owes to creditors outside themselves, but also to individuals, businesses and even other governments. The term "public debt" is used interchangeably with the term sovereign debt. The study presents a brief analysis of the evolution of public debt in Romania for the past years. The issue of public debt sustainability is an important factor in the development of policies aimed at reducing the volatility of volatile capital markets, the economic policy of Romania should be focused on the gross GDP growth. Public debt is sustainable when state authorities have the ability to repay public debt service to creditors without having to make future adjustments to budget revenues and expenditures. The public debt has a negative effect on economic growth, heavily indebted countries being exposed to the risk of capital outflows or of the rapidly deteriorating position of public finances in the context of an economic and financial crisis. Emerging economies cannot sustain the same debt level as a share of GDP, that countries with advanced economies can manage, but a much lower one, mainly because of the limited access to capital markets of the countries from the former category.

Introduction

The public debt is defined as how much a country owes to lenders outside of itself. These can include individuals, businesses, and even other governments. The term "public debt" is used interchangeably with the term sovereign debt.

Public debt usually only refers to national debt, but some countries also include the debt owed by states, provinces, and municipalities. Therefore, be careful when comparing public. Zaman G. argues that national and international financial institutions adopt a number of criteria by which countries can be categorized according to the size and dynamics of the existing debt.

The issue of public debt sustainability is an important factor in developing policies aimed at reducing the volatility of volatile capital markets. Public debt is sustainable when state authorities have the ability to repay the public debt service to creditors without having to make future adjustments to revenue and budget expenditures

1. Public Debt vs External Debt

Don't confuse public debt with external debt. That's the amount owed to foreign investors by both the government and the private sector. Public debt affects external debt, because if interest rates go up on the public debt, they will also rise for all private debt. That's one reason businesses pressure their governments to keep public debt within a reasonable range.

Economists consider that "the internal public debt represents the totality of the state's liabilities, coming from loans contracted directly or guaranteed by the state, from individuals or legal entities, in lei or foreign currency, on the domestic market, including the amounts temporarily received from the Treasury's sources" and "external public debt represents the total liabilities of the state, coming from loans on the foreign market, contracted directly or guaranteed by the state".

Moșteanu T, Postole M. A, Gherghina R., remarked that the link between the two types of debt can be influenced by political factors such as: large public investment projects involving the import of advanced technology. (Popa, 2010) appreciates that a country's external debt is made up of lending and borrowing operations received by a country or by private economic agents in that country in the international relations it carries out.

Pattillo argues that in the second half of the 1990s, decision-makers around the world have begun to admit that the high level of external debt contributes to curbing the development of a large number of low-income countries.

In the short run, public debt is a good way for countries to get extra funds to invest in their economic growth. Public debt is a safe way for foreigners to invest in a country's growth by buying government bonds. This is much safer than foreign direct investment. That's when foreigners purchase at least a 10 percent interest in the country's companies, businesses or real estate.

It's also less risky than investing in the country's public companies via its stock market. Public debt is attractive to risk-averse investors since it is backed by the government itself. When used correctly, public debt improves the standard of living in a country. That's because it allows the government to build new roads and bridges, improve education and job training, and provide pensions. This spurs citizens to spend more now, instead of saving for retirement, further boosting economic growth.

Governments tend to take on too much debt because the benefits make them popular with voters. Therefore, investors usually measure the level of risk by comparing debt to a country's total economic output, known as gross domestic product.

The debt-to-GDP ratio gives an indication of how likely the country can pay off its debt. Investors usually don't become concerned until the debt-to-GDP ratio reaches a critical level.

When it appears the debt is approaching a critical level, investors usually start demanding a higher interest rate. They want more return for the higher risk. If the country keeps spending, then its bonds may receive a lower S&P rating. This indicates how likely it is the country will default on its debt.

As interest rates rise, it becomes more expensive for a country to refinance its existing debt. In time, more income has to go toward debt repayment, and less toward government services. For more on how this occurred in Europe, see Sovereign Debt Crisis.

For the appreciation of a country's external debt, various indicators are used, reflecting the degree of indebtedness to the foreign currency and the currency effort it claims.

The indebtedness of a country vis-à-vis foreign countries is expressed by means of the indicators: absolute size of external debt, average external debt per capita, and ratio of external debt to gross domestic product.

The absolute size and average per capita external debt ratio is the amount owed to external creditors at any given moment, with no relation to the financial and currency potential of the debtor country and the timing of its reimbursement. The ratio between external debt and gross domestic product shows how much of the gross domestic product of the year considered would be needed to repay that debt. In Romania, the value of this indicator has evolved as follows:

The foreign exchange effort of a country's external debt is highlighted by the absolute magnitude of the external debt service, which is the annual payments made to the maturity of the contracted external borrowing plus the corresponding interest paid in convertible currency. In this respect, indicators are also used:

a) The external debt ratio, which expresses the share of external debt service (Sde) in the annual external income (VE) of the debtor country; R=(Sde/VE)x100;

This indicator shows the payment capacity of the debtor country and has several advantages as follows: highlights the role of exports in obtaining convertible currency; it is easy to compute and analyze; Highlights for a relatively short period (at most one year) the country's ability to honor the external debt service.

The evolution of this indicator in Romania is as follows:

b) Another indicator expresses the ratio between external debt service and debtors' income (Vd), ie government and public revenue, as well as government-guaranteed debtor income (Sde/Vd) x 100;
c) The ratio between the external debt service and the state budget revenue (VB), (Sde/VE) x 100.

This indicator shows the share of external public debt service in the budget revenues, so this indicator compares external debt with budget revenues during the period considered. It presents the disadvantage for countries with the non-convertible currency because external debt cannot be directly compared to internal income, but must be converted into a third-party currency, usually in the currency in which the external debt is expressed;

d) The ratio between the external debt service and the value of the official monetary gold reserves and the free currency of the debtor country. This indicator shows to what extent the external debt service can be covered by foreign exchange reserves and by other monetary values [Sde / (Rz Au+Valute)] x 100;
e) The ratio of external debt service to gross domestic product (Sde / PIB) x 100. It shows us the capacity of a state to bear its external debt;
f) Because the external debt affects the part of the gross domestic product for accumulation, then the ratio between the external debt service and the part of the gross domestic product for accumulation (Sde /A) x 100;
g) The remaining external debt (non-reimbursed amounts) can also be compared with the gross national product. This report shows the degree of indebtedness of the country. These comparisons are extremely useful to the decision-makers of debtor or creditor countries.

Romania has been classified by the World Bank in international statistics as a "less indebted" country, together with Poland, Croatia, the Slovak Republic, the Czech Republic, Estonia, etc. (while Hungary is classified as a "moderate indebtedness") One of the most important arguments was the worsening of sustainability indicators in correlation with other negative events, such as diminishing accumulation resources, decreasing domestic savings and investment rates, and increasing The fact that more than 90% of the country's gross debt is externally funded demonstrates the fragility of the national economy and the highest degree of dependence on external financing conditions for the collection of new resources.

2. Evolution of governmental public debt in EU

Evolution of governmental public debt in Romania, between 2005- 2016 As regards public debt in Romania, one must also take notice of the level of growth. In 2008 government public debt was 13.2 per cent of the GDP, and at the end of the year 2009 was 23.2 % of the GDP. On December 31, 2010, Romania recorded a government debt of 30.5 per cent of the GDP.

In 2011 public debt increased by 4.2 percentage, amounting to 34.7 percentage of the gross domestic product (GDP) as a result of the increase in economic growth of 2.5 per cent and the reduction in interest paid meant to attract loans, and a deflate greater than the forecast amount. At the end of the year 2012 government public debt was 51bn Euros, the payable debts being 14.4 bn. Euros, out of which 1.2 bn. Euros for the debt to the International Monetary Fund and the European Union. This was determined by the necessity to cover budget deficit and public debt buying into government. In 2012, according to Eurostat data, at the EU level, Romania was the fourth, only three member States recording a smaller debt: Estonia - 10.1 per cent of GDP, Bulgaria - 18.5 per cent of the GDP and Luxembourg - 20.8 per cent of the GDP.

In 2012, the government debt per every citizen was in 2012 of 2.500 euros, approximately double compared to 2008 when it represented only 1.400 euros. At the end of the first quarter of 2013, Romania's public debt increased by 0.9 percentage points compared to the same period of 2012, reaching the 38.6 per cent of the GDP and 0.8 percentages in the last quarter of the year 2012.

At the end of the first quarter of 2013 at the European Union level the situation is as follows: among the countries with the lowest public debt, there are: Estonia - 10% of GDP, Bulgaria - 18% of GDP, Luxembourg - 22.4 per cent of GDP, Latvia – 39.1% of GDP, Sweden - 40.4 per cent of GDP. While large public debt is recorded in: Greece – 160.3 per cent of the gross domestic product GDP, Italy – 130.3 per cent of the gross domestic product GDP, Portugal – 127.2.

In the long run, public debt that's too large can act like driving with the emergency brake on. Investors drive up interest rates in return for greater risk of default. That makes the components of economic expansion, such as housing, business growth, and auto loans, more expensive. To avoid this burden, governments must be careful to find that sweet spot of public debt. It must be large enough to drive economic growth but small enough to keep interest rates low.

Romania was among the EU countries with the lowest government debt in the GDP in the first quarter of the year. The rate slightly went down compared to the previous quarter, reaching 37.1%, according to EU's statistical office Eurostat.

The highest rate of government debt in the GDP in 2017, recorded at Greece the end of March, with 176.2%, followed by Italy, with 134.7% and Portugal, with 130.5%. At the opposite pole the lowest rates were seen in Estonia (9.2%), Luxembourg (23%) and Bulgaria (28.6%), followed by Denmark (36.7%) and Romania (37.1%).

Compared to the fourth quarter of 2016, the highest increase in the government debt ratio was reported in the Czech Republic, with 3.1 percentage points, followed by Luxembourg with 3 percentage points, and Croatia with 2.6 percentage points. Romania was among the countries that reported a slight decrease.

The baseline debt trajectory is higher relative to last year's DSA. 2 Despite a slightly lower-than-expected debt outturn in 2016 and a higher projection for GDP growth in 2017, gross public debt (including guarantees) is 0.2 percentage points higher in 2017 relative to the previous forecast (40.3 versus 40.5 percent to GDP) and 0.7 percentage points higher by the end of the projection period (44.2 versus 44.8 percent of GDP). This outcome is mainly driven by the higher expected budget deficits relative to last year's DSA. Under the baseline, which incorporates the most recent procyclical fiscal measures, the budget deficit is expected to exceed 3 percent every year until 2021, thus violating the 3 percent rule under the Stability and Growth Pact. The budget deficit does however gradually decline after 2018, reaching 2.9 percent of GDP by 2022 as absorption of EU funds improves and replaces capital spending financed directly out of the budget.

4. Conclusions

In the period taken into account, the level of national debt was found not to exceed the limit of 60% of GDP established by the Maastricht Treaty. Representing only 13.4 per cent of the GDP in 2008, at the end of the year 2016 the level of gross government debt is estimated at 38.4 per cent of the GDP, net government debt of 31.5 per cent of the GDP. At an estimated level of the estimated budget deficit of 2% of the GDP for t 2014, gross government debt level will reach 38.5 per cent of the GDP, while net government debt will be 32% of the gross domestic product GDP. For 2016, Fitch Ratings awarded BBB rating- for long term foreign currency debts and for long term national currency debts. At the same time, the agency makes a series of remarks regarding the macroeconomic situation of the country, such as reaching a structural deficit f 1% of GDP in 2017; curbing the gross public debt under 40% of GDP between 2016-2017; owning sufficient currency reserves and capital in the banking field; GDP growth in 2016 up to 2%, with a mild upward trend between 2015- 2016, which will cover the imbalance of the EU incomes.

The agency shall also makes a series of observations relating to macroeconomic situation of the country: a structural deficit of 1 percent of the GDP in 2016; maintaining gross government debt below 40% of the GDP in the period 2015-2016; possession of hard currency reserves and a capital in the banking sector sufficient; GDP growth in 2015 to 2 %, with a slight acceleration in the period 2015-2016, that he will be able to reduce the delay of the revenues from the EU.

There are also comments with respect to: low efficient activities within the state companies in the strategic areas such as transport and energy, as well as the lack of efficiency health and public administration sectors; increasing rate of non-performing credits at 20.9 %; possibility of a political instability degree as a result of Euro parliamentary and presidential elections in the year 2014. Moody's Rating Agency is the only one that has granted rating Baa3, keeping Romania in the category of countries with rating recommended for investors, while S&P granted Romania a BB+ both in lei and in hard currency.

For the period 2017-2018, we are expecting an increase in investments, decrease of budgetary expenditures, and a balance between the fiscal consolidation and the economic rebound, between economic and social.

To stimulate the economic growth in Romania, there were prepared an array of measures, such as: diminishing the overdue debts of the state budget, local budget and SOE's budgets; implementing the programmed "grants for youth" to decrease the unemployment rate; applying fiscal measure that should stimulate the activity of research, innovation and development; increasing the capacity of absorption of EU funds; supporting the economical investments.

Romania will have to take measures for sustainable development and reforming its economic and monetary policies, maintaining external balance, prioritizing export recovery and attracting foreign direct investment.

CUSTOMER EQUITY MANAGEMENT THROUGH CUSTOMER ENGAGEMENT: A CRITICAL REVIEW

Darina PAVLOVA*

Abstract

The current trends in business processes call for companies to operate in a highly competitive environment. Part of the changes observed is the increased focus on customer retention. The management of customer relations and the retention and expansion of the customer base are among the main tasks of any business. The concept of customer equity management provides opportunities for fulfilment of these tasks, but also monitors the financial well-being of the company. All this necessitates its implementation by businesses.The ability to preserve and manage the company's customer base is the application of the customer equity concept. This paper presents the opportunities for managing and increasing the value of customer equity through customer engagement. The research carried out tries to unify the conceptual framework of customer equity with the process of customer engagement resulting in the development of an integrated conceptual framework. Based on the proposed conceptual framework, the author draws the attention of managers not only to the analyses of the profitability from customers, but also to engagement of the entire customer base, regardless of its financial contribution to the well-being of the company. As a result, the intangible benefits from customers are regarded as an opportunity to increase the company's customer equity.

1. Introduction

The current trends in the development of the economy lead to substantial changes in the marketing approaches adopted by businesses. Recent decades have seen a shift from product to consumer-focused marketing. Already in 1996 the community was presented with the concept of customer equity, which has been established as the leading philosophy of marketers. At its core "customer equity" is seen as the total of the discounted lifetime values of the company's customers. This definition has different aspects, and depending on the scope of customers the authors may be placed inti two groups. The first one (Blattberg, Deighton (1996), Hanssens, Rust, Srivastava (2009)) define customer equity as the sum of discounted lifetime values of the existing customers of the company; the second group (Rust, Lemon (2004), Gupta, Zeithaml (2006), Leone (2006), Vogel, Evanschitzky, Ramaseshan (2008), Blattberg, Getz, Thomas (2001)) believe that customer equity should include the future customers of the company. As a concept, customer equity management studies and creates opportunities to retain the company's customers and increase the cash flows they generate in the long run. This, in turn, ensures the operation and prosperity of companies in the market. The fierce competition and the rapid adoption and imitation of products requires businesses to treat their customers in a special way so as to retain them, given that competitive advantages based on product features alone do not last long. In this regard, the management of customer relations and the retention and expansion of the customer base are among the main tasks of any business. The concept of customer equity management provides opportunities for fulfilment of these tasks, but also monitors the financial well-being of the company. All this necessitates its implementation by businesses.

On the other hand, the dynamics of changes in the market and in consumer needs and perceptions, accompanied by the rapid development of new technologies, have caused the emergence of the concept of customer engagement. Customer engagement is about creating a connection between the brand and the consumers. Customer engagement is the way the company creates relationships with its customer base, in order to encourage loyalty and brand awareness. This can be achieved through marketing campaigns, regular publications on the company's website, and promotion of the brand through social media and mobile and portable devices.

In this regard, of special importance is the integration of new consumer-centric marketing approaches, in particular customer engagement in the context of customer equity management. This is based on the inextricable link between customer engagement and the financial benefits it brings in the long-term, expressed by the value of customer equity.

This paper aims to present the fundamental importance of the concept of customer equity management for businesses, and to propose a conceptual model which integrates the new paradigm for customer engagement and could contribute to and further developed the theoretical achievements in the field of customer equity.

2.1. Customer Equity Management

Customer Equity Management as a concept requires a clarification of the term customer equity. Here above we presented two sets of views on this matter, from which we can summarize, that the main emphasis is on the value that customers generate in the course of their relationship with the company. The key difference in these views lies in the scope of customers. Customer equity is expressed either as a result of the relationships only with existing customers or as a result of relationships with both existing and future customers. In this regard, the author places the focus on existing customers and proposes a definition of customer equity, which draws from the views presented above and further develops and supplements them:

Customer equity is the value expression of current and future relationships with existing customers, which generate tangible and intangible benefits for the organization.

This definition is essential for the purposes of this paper, as the conceptual model developed for customer equity management aims to increase not only the tangible but also the intangible benefits for the company.

Central for the concept of customer equity is the assumption that customers are a major source of revenue for businesses. With this in mind, the focus is on the successful market performance of the company by maintaining effective relationships with its customer base in the long term. Guidance for establishing, maintaining and maximizing the benefits of these relationships is provided by the concept of customer equity. This concept may be presented as an innovative approach to retaining and acquiring customers, which leads to sustainable competitive advantages, enhanced market presence and increased market value.

The concept of customer equity is relatively new. It gained ground after 2000, when it was elaborated into a new management approach aimed at the successful long-term operation of the business (Blattberg, Getz and Thomas 2001, 111). The concept is based on the belief that the customer is a strategic value-generating resource, and that this value needs to be estimated, managed and maximized (Blattberg, Getz and Thomas 2001, 3-12). Customer equity management is a process that uses customer behaviour data and financial evaluation methods. It seeks to obtain the highest benefits from customers while their relationship with the company exists, and is based on the familiar concepts of customer lifetime value and customer life cycle, which it brings together in a new way. The application of this management approach requires integration of corporate strategies relating to products and consumers. This highlights one of the main contributions of the concept, namely the new insight into the efficient allocation of resources and efforts of businesses (Blattberg and Deighton (1996), Rust, Lemon and Zeithaml (2004), Reinartz (2005)).

In the literature there has been some controversy regarding the essential characteristics of the concept. According to Berger (2002), it lies in the basis of managing the value of relationships between customers and the company. Bayon,

Gutsche and Bauer (2002), in turn, regard the concept of customer equity as the optimal basis for consumer behaviour analyses. The two views combined regard customer equity as an expression of the expected future behaviour of the customers of the organization. This makes the application of the concept particularly important, as it may help build long-term relationships with customers and increase the value of the business, thus improving its market performance in the long run. These assertions are supported in publications by Pitt, Ewing, Berthon (2000), Flint, Woodruff, Gardial (2002), Slater (2009) and others, according to whom customer equity can be defined as a significant competitive advantage.

2.2. Cystomer equity management model

The essence and importance of customer equity for the company examined above raises the questions of its management and maximization. This paper is focused on an approach to customer equity management formulated by Lemon, Leone and Rust (2005). The authors put in the spotlight the customer life cycle and the possibilities to extend it. The approach presents customer equity management by analyzing consumer behaviour and defining the factors that drive customers to buy from a certain company both in the present moment and in the future. Lemon, Leone and Rust (2005) elaborated the concept of customer relationship management and defined the core values used to manage customer equity. This highlights the specific direction of this approach, namely the strong emphasis on consumers.

The value-based approach to customer equity management is based on an analysis of three stages of the customers' relationship with the company. The first stage is customer acquisition. This is the time when the customers form their opinions on the brand and the product before the purchase is made. In the second stage, after the purchase, the customers form an opinion on brand equity and value equity. As a result of these evaluations, the customers continue to purchase from the relevant company. The third stage is the analysis of the value of the relationship established between the organization and the customers, which is turned into relationship equity by means of specific marketing tools. Thus, the authors define the influence of three determinants on the long-term value of the relationship with the customers. According to the equity approach, an organization can retain and expand its customer base by creating value equity, brand equity and relationship equity. Therefore, customer equity depends on the effect of these three values (Rust, Zeithaml and Lemon 2000, 9).

The equity approach presents the mechanism by which each of the determinants leads to an optimal relationship between the company and the customer. These three equities act both individually and in concert, and define the customer lifetime value (CLTV), and their effect on all customers determines the value of customer equity. This makes their management an indispensible necessity.

Value Equity is the consumer evaluation of the value of the product/service, based on perceptions of spending and receiving (Rust, Zeithaml and Lemon 2000, 56).

Brand Equity is the subjective and intangible evaluation of the product beyond its objectively perceived value (Rust, Zeithaml and Lemon 2000, 56).

Relationship Equity is the association of the customer with a brand, outside the customer's objective and subjective evaluation of that brand (Rust, Zeithaml and Lemon 2000, 57).

In previous research the author has identified and acknowledged the impact of an additional determinant that affects customer equity, namely technology and equipment equity. Technology and equipment equity should be understood as the consumer attitude towards the technology and equipment used in the company's activities (Ivanov and Pavlova 2017, 89-99). This fourth equity determinant is included due to the dynamics of the modern technological environment in a marketing context, and the companies' effort to engage and involve customers in the manufacturing process. In addition, in an effort to distinguish themselves from other market players, companies use technology as an approach to distinction. Efforts are made by manufacturers to make consumers aware about innovations used in their activities, and to make manufacturing processes visible in order to establish a relationship of trust with customers and instil in them positive attitudes towards the company's operations, products and brands. With regard to this fourth determinant it has been noted that consumers are increasingly aware of the production facilities and practices of organizations, and that online communication channels provide an opportunity to engage customers in these processes by converting them from observers to participants in the modification of existing products and the creation of new ones.

As a result, the model created by Lemon, Leone and Rust (2005) is further developed and enriched with a fourth factor, which contributes to customer equity management (Figure 2).

The impact of these four key determinants on customer equity requires reinforcement. One possibility to influence customers by creating all four equities is through the application of a new consumer marketing approach, namely customer engagement.

2.3. What is Customer Engagement

The new marketing reality requires managers to analyze their customers not only in the latter's role as buyers, but also in their role as business partners. The partnership between the customers and the company is expressed in their contribution to the development of businesses as observers, promoters, participants and co-creators who interact not only with the brand, but also with other consumers and the media. This new view on customers and their behaviour is a consequence of the overall digitization, which requires businesses to seek ways to retain and engage both their actual customers and those who are followers and "friends" of the brand (Moran, Muzellec and Nolan 2014, 200-204). This approach improves the company's market performance and helps both to preserve and to increase its customer base. In this respect, the idea of customer engagement is of particular interest.

In marketing terms, customer engagement is seen in two ways: with a focus on the psychological engagement of the customer with the company and with a focus on consumer behaviour.

Some authors regard customer engagement as a specific psychological state (Gambetti, Graffigna & Biraghi (2012); Patterson, Yu, and De Ruyter (2006); Brodie et al. (2011); Calder, Malthouse and Schaedel (2009) and Mollen and Wilson (2010)). Hollebeek (2011, 780) defines customer engagement as a certain psychological state, motivated by the attitude towards the brand. According to Bowden (2009, 63-74), customer engagement is a psychological process which creates customer loyalty. Higgins and Scholer (2009, 102) outline this engagement as a state of preoccupation, participation, inclusion and involvement in something.

Some aspects of customer engagement are discussed in terms of behavioural manifestations of the consumers. Van Doorn et al. (2010, 254) focuses on the actions of customers with respect to the brand, beyond the relationships pertaining to the transaction itself. Similarly, Verhoef et al. (2010, 247) define customer engagement as a behavioural manifestation towards the brand or the company outside the purchase. Kumar et al. (2010, 297-310), in turn, support the views of Van Doorn, but consider the act of purchase as part of the essence of customer engagement. The authors also highlight other forms of engagement taking place after the purchase, which create value for the company: influence of customers on other consumers by sharing positive or negative opinions, attracting new customers through references and feedback provided to the company. On the other hand, Bijmolt et al. (2010) lay the emphasis specifically on three key behavioural manifestations of customer engagement: word of mouth (WOM) marketing, co-creation of products, and behaviour manifested in the filing of complaints against the company (such behaviour may occur at different stages of the customer life cycle).

Opinions exist which combine the psychological and behavioural perspectives in defining customer engagement. Vivek et al. (2012) focus on the customers' behaviour towards the company, but also recognize the emotional and cognitive elements of the engagement. Hollebeek et al. (2014, 154) define customer engagement as a positive relationship with the brand, expressed in the behavioural, affective and emotional activities of the customers in their interaction with the company.

This paper shares the view that customer engagement is a psychological state shaped by the brand, with has a behavioural expression. The behavioural expression of this engagement are all actions related to word of mouth marketing, references, feedback, search and dissemination of information about the brand/company, generation of product ideas, etc. The act of purchase is placed under the concept of customer equity, in terms of the financial benefits the customers bring to the company, and is excluded from the definition of customer engagement. This understanding of customer engagement aligns with the intangible benefits that customers generate for the company. This gives grounds to look for opportunities to manage and maximize customer by engaging customers with the company.

2.4. Maximising Customer Equity, an integrated framework

Customers generate profits for companies in two ways: directly – through their purchases, and indirectly through other actions such as references made before other potential customers, influencing current and potential customers on social networks, or providing feedback. Identifying the right customers who create value for the company and managing the relationships with them are key to improved financial results. A number of authors have explored in depth the various ways to maximize the value from customers, created by their regular purchases from the company. The concept of customer equity pays little attention to the indirect benefits from existing customers. In this regard, the author attempts to interlink the engagement of existing customers with the factors influencing customer equity as a mechanism for its maximization (Figure 3).

Customer engagement is expressed through four dimensions: participation of the customer in the process of creating new products, reference, sharing information about the brand and the company's activity (WOM), feedback on products and services of the company. It is important to clarify such actions are the result of established relationships between customers and the company.

In the context of customer equity management, customers who are engaged with the brand through the actions described above, outside the purchasing behaviour, are an important source of value for the company. Customers who participate as part of the creative team of the company in the creation of new products or improvement of existing ones contribute directly to the market success of the company. Those who carry out marketing by word of mouth, attract new customers for the company, as the personal reference is one of the most successful tools to induce interest in the brand. Customers who provide feedback to the company with reviews of the product, staff, service, supply or information are a valuable corrective contributing to the performance of the company. Customers who share positive information about the economic and non-economic activities of the company induce favourable consumer attitudes towards the brand. Everything presented thus far gives us reason to believe that this consumer behaviour affects other consumer and helps attract new customers for the business. The acquisition of new customers increases the value of customer equity.

On the other hand, each of these actions directly corresponds to the four factors that determine the value of customer equity. Customer involvement in product development strengthens the influence of the brand equity, value equity, relationship equity and technology and equipment equity, as it engages the customer in each of these aspects. The desire for references, feedback and sharing information about the company is also conducive to the formation of these values for customers. The creation of brand equity, value equity, relationship equity and technology and equipment equity, whose direct expression is customer equity, affects directly the retention of customers. It can be summarized that the engagement of customers strengthens their relationship with the company, which leads to long-term relationships. Maintaining the customer-company relationships in the long term has a positive impact on customer equity.

Based on the proposed conceptual framework, the author draws the attention of managers not only to the analyses of the profitability from customers, but also to engagement of the entire customer base, regardless of its financial contribution to the well-being of the company. As a result, the intangible benefits from customers are regarded as an opportunity to increase the company's customer equity.

4. Conclusions

In conclusion, we can say that the survival of any business depends on its ability to retain and increase its customer base. In this context, the ability to manage the company's customer equity is crucial. However, focusing only on the financial benefits from customers may limit the possibilities for customer equity maximization. In this regard, special attention has been given to the generation of benefits for the company by customers through their consumer behaviour, beyond the purchases they make, expressed through customer engagement. From the review made above it became clear that customer engagement is a concept whose definition cannot be accepted equivocally. In this paper it has been examined in terms of its aspects of emotional and behavioural engagement with the brand beyond the making of purchases. The dimensions of engagement presented here are interconnected both with the acquisition of new customers and the factors determining the value of customer equity. Product ideas generation, references, dissemination of information and feedback from customers are defined as activities that improve both the company's performance and the retention and increase of its customer base. In this respect, customer engagement is regarded as an opportunity to increase customer equity.

The author takes into account that future research in the following areas is needed:

- Testing the strength of the links between customer engagement dimensions and customer equity factors;
- Opportunities to engage the customers;
- Applying metrics for the level of the customer engagement.

ELEMENTS CONCERNING THE INSTITUTIONAL FRAMEWORK OF PUBLIC-PRIVATE PARTNERSHIP

Florina POPA*

Abstract

Studying collaborative relationships between the public and private sectors concurs to the knowledge of contribution in promote economic development, regeneration of urban and rural areas, through the participation of a wide range of actors belonging to central/local governments, private actors.

The institutional system where the public-private partnerships evolve, offers to governments, the possibility to make their contribution in drawing up sustainable agreements through creating new institutional structures that provide a framework conducive to coherent policies formulation and experience development in project management. The institutional framework of the public-private partnership develops regulatory instruments through which it exercises its influence in the development of partnerships.

The state establishes units of Public-Private Partnership type, their role being to make their contribution in solving problems regarding PPP - designing partnership projects in a wide range of areas and implementing their goals. These units can contribute with information in formulating national policies and practices, thus, supporting government in developing partnerships.

The paper presents aspects of the institutional framework where Public-Private Partnerships form and evolves and elements whereby it takes part in their development – the institutional instruments and Public-Private Partnerships Units - the opinions of different authors concerning the influence which the institutional framework exerts on public-private partnerships.

1. Introduction

The analysis of collaboration between the public and private sectors is important from the perspective of knowing the contribution made in promoting economic development, regeneration of urban and rural areas, in the context of the participation of a wide range of actors belonging to central/local governments, private actors.

Public-private partnerships are forms of co-operation between the public and, respectively, private sectors, in order to achieve infrastructures or services by that it assumes to optimize the experiences of the two entities. Their objectives belong to a wide range of economic and social activity, having political support and being the object of authorities' preoccupations at supranational, national, local level (McQuaid R.W. 2005, CEC-1996, Leach et al. 1994)[1].

PPP is based on a contract between the public and private sector through which the private sector contributes with financial resources and projects and the public sector is responsible for delivering services to the population, respecting the needs of individuals and contributing to standard of living rise. (UNECE, 2008).

2. Defining elements

Public-private partnerships evolve into an institutional system of which governments makes their contribution to accomplish sustainable agreements, by: creating certain institutional structures that provide a framework favourable to coherent policies drawing, transparency, fair distribution of risk, leading towards sustainable development and clarity of legislation regulation. (Delhi, V. S. K., Palukuri, S. & Mahalingam, A., 2010).

Scott (2008) defines the institutions as "symbolic frameworks that create shared meanings and controls that provide order to social action"[2]. Governments, through their authority, may impose different structures such as rules, regulations and procedures (Scott, 1987), which become means or instruments whereby they pursue to implement the objectives formulated (Scott, 1995; Henisz et al., 2012)[3].

In the Guidebook on Promoting Good Governance in Public-Private Partnerships, institutions are defined as "the bodies setting formal rules (property rights, rule of law etc.) while taking into account informal constraints (beliefs, traditions and social norms) that shape human interactions"[4] (UNECE, 2008).

The institutional framework of which public-private partnerships are developed is oriented towards the formation of new institutions and the development of experience in project management (UNECE, 2007). The institutions may be formal - legal and regulatory frameworks, coherent policies, institutions conducive to public-private partnerships (such as PPPs Units with coordinating role) and informal - forums where the public and private sectors meet to clarify the misunderstandings that may arise in the projects. A favorable institutional framework that emphasizes transparency and public interest, contributes to increase accountability and a better understanding of partnerships.

Schematically, the institutional framework of public-private partnership is expressed in Figure no. 1:

3. Institutional regulatory tools

Various authors demonstrate in their studies the influence that institutional framework exerts on public-private partnerships (Delhi et al., 2010), through regulatory instruments, called by Mahalingam et al. (2011) "institutional capacities": "legitimization, trust and capacity"[1]. A delimitation of the institutional environment is achieved by this arrangement and the institutional capacities favourable to PPP development are highlighted.

"Legitimacy is a generalized perception or assumption, that the actions of an entity are desirable, proper or appropriate, within some socially constructed system of norms, values, beliefs and definitions"[2](Suchman, 1995). The willingness of public and private actors to engage in PPPs is encouraged by formal specific relationships. It is characteristic of PPPs because private sector actors are involved, in services delivering, which are provided by the public sector. (Jooste et al., 2011).

Mahalingam (2011)[3] shows the ways whereby governments can ensure the legitimacy nature:

- existence of clear reasons for drawing up Public-Private Partnership agreements;
- orienting the political will towards encouragement of the formation of PPPs;
- formulation of effective communication strategies, by governments, whereby to ensure all stakeholders information.

"Trust is a disposition and attitude relating to the willingness to rely on the actions of other actors under the condition of contractual and social obligations, with a prospective for collaboration"[4] (Smyth & Pryke, 2008). Sitkin (1995) and Zucker (1986)[5] note the mutual consolidation of trust and formal relationships that influences cooperation in a partnership.

"Capacity to undertake PPPs will strengthen the ability to structure and govern PPP projects, being essential for PPP development"[6] (Mahalingam, 2011). It calls on the public partner, the adoption of new roles, the acquisition of experience and qualification in many areas, leading the government policies directions, namely[7] (Mahalingam, A., 2011):

- building the capacity of public sector to know the internal structure of PPP; providing certain professional training programs such as workshops; knowledge of the project; providing a rough guide;
- ensuring some risk-allocation and financing procedures, for the efficient management of PPP projects;
- increasing the potential of the private sector by tenders development under competitive and cooperative conditions.

A schematic representation of institutional capacities is presented in figure no. 2.

In order for a public-private partnership to be successful, it is important the existence of an appropriate and stable institutional framework that avoids arising unforeseen risks for private investors in partnership projects.

4. Public-Private Partnership Units

In order to solve PPP problems, project and implement their objectives, the state intervenes establishing public-private partnership units, the definitions given to this notion highlighting the role and contribution which they make in the achievement of these agreements:

- "Any organization designed to: promote or improve PPPs [...]; [and] has a lasting mandate to manage multiple PPP transactions, often in multiple sectors."[8]. (World Bank and PPIAF, 2007)
- "Any organization set up with full or partial aid of the government to ensure that necessary capacity to create, support and evaluate multiple public/private partnership agreements is made available and clustered together within government" [9]. (OECD, 2010)

- "A PPP unit is a public entity (government, public/private corporation, or nonprofit) that supports other government agencies to procure projects through a PPP process; it is not the procuring agency"[10]. (Istrate E. and Puentes R.)

PPPs units have a continuous character and support the government in procuring public-private partnership projects in a wide range of areas or specific areas. In relation to PPPs, which relate to the outsourcing of government provision of public goods and services, the PPP unit is "a way to delegate operational responsibilities regarding the provision of government services"[11].(Istrate E. and Puentes R.)

PPP units can support governments by setting up and supplementing information, policies and practices formation at national level, in the field of PPPs (for example, Partnerships British Columbia din Canada; UK Treasury's PPP Policy Team in the United Kingdom). These units can be established and coordinated with the actors involved in the PPP program at different governmental levels: federal, central, departmental, sectoral or ministerial. Much of the PPP units are set up in the Ministry of Finance or Treasury. (Randolph, S. 2010)[12]

Units constituted at federal-level coordinate the governmental levels (state, local) and those constitued at central level coordinate PPP units within ministries. Examples of such PPP Units are found in various countries of the world, at different levels, central or federal:

- Ireland`s Central Unit PPP coordinates the Interdepartmental Group on Public-Private Partnership formed of all PPP Units existing in different ministries and representatives of other agencies, with concernments in this direction (Istrate E. and Puentes R., 2011)
- PPP Units located in a resort ministry, often, in the department responsible for infrastructure policy, such as: Danish Enterprise and Construction Authority of the Ministry of Business and Economic Affairs (OECD, 2010).
- PPP Units represented by corporations, for example, The German national PPP Unit, Partnerships Germany (ÖPP Deutschland AG) - PPP Units in Germany constituted as mixed corporations (Istrate E. and Puentes R., 2011, Bernhard Müller)[13]. The form of PPP Units establishment in corporations is reasoned by the political independence, high flexibility to changes on the PPP market, enhancement of possibilities for experienced labour force attraction (Ed Farquharson in Farrugia, Reynolds and Orr, 2008)[14], regardless of form; the sources of funding derive from the public budget (government, agency, ministry).

Through their functions, PPP Units support the government in overcoming the difficulties it faces in accomplish some programs regarding PPP (World Bank and PPIAF, 2007), such as: weak incentives in procurement field, low coherence at governmental agencies level, lack of qualification and experience, insufficient information. To this end, PPP Units intervene through various actions, to remedy the governmental level-related problems regarding the PPP proposals, such as:

- Overseeing the selection of PPP projects PPP Units can follow project proposals regarding compliance with the evaluation criteria of the required documentation to prove the eligibility of the projects. (OECD, 2010).
- Following the fulfillment of criteria set up in a project. (World Bank and PPIAF, 2007).
- Participation through assistance and guidance in case of insufficient experience for PPP coordination. Due to the complexity of public-private partnership contracts, the role of the public sector is to monitor the private sector consultants to ensure the achievement of the general public interest. By holding the required qualifications, a Public-Private Partnership unit can provide support to the public sector, through the experience of specialists who have had concerns in the field, to streamline the processes of PPP procurement and make negotiations more effective. (Ahadzi M. and Bowles, G. 2004; World Bank and PPIAF, 2007; Monteiro, R., S. 2005; Emilia Istrate and Robert Puentes, 2011)
- Contribution to the reduction of transaction costs as well as the timing of making documentation for PPP procurement contracts, both for the private sector and the government. The variety of governmental laws and regulations, different from one state to another, leads to high costs of transaction in making PPP agreements. The PPP Units contribute, by developing standardized documentation, to guide public partners in managing PPP contracts and contract compliance with standardized principles and public interest.
- Dissemination of information regarding the opportunities to get involve in Public-Private Partnerships with the government. In both the developed and developing countries, the PPP Units can serve as instruments to encourage the interest of investors, private partners, to engage in PPP, by providing information concerning the PPP policies, programs and future opportunities (for example, Flemish PPP Knowledge Center provides information about the PPP policies and possibilities of their development) (World Bank & PPIAF, 2007)[15]. An increase in the success of PPP Units may result in a grouping of the PPP Unit, based on the functions they perform in:[16] (Farrugia, Reynolds and Orr, 2008)

- Review Units – performs quality verification and expresses its views on potential PPP projects;
- Service Agencies have additional functions to the quality control one;
- Exelence Centers provide information concerning the research achieved on PPP and the experience of the best practice in the field.

The above reveals that the Public-Private Partnerships Units operate in various ways to overcome the problems that the state encounters in making Public-Private Partnership agreements. The complex nature of the PPP projects, the lack of experience required to manage PPPs, that may lead to difficulties in their correct assessment and to inappropriate risk sharing, are arguments for setting up PPP Units towards assist governments with the development of the capacity to address the PPP projects, complying with the public interest.

The role of the PPP Unit undergoes changes, diminishing along the way, due to the maturing of PPP programs during their evolution period and to the experiences gained by the governmental agencies.

5. Conclusions

Public-private partnerships have emerged as a result of the problems that the public sector faces, in terms of high costs, required both by delivering certain infrastructure services and by the maintenance of the existing ones such as damaged schools and hospitals, water treatment systems, modernization of public infrastructure. Through partnership, the public sector aims to increase efficiency, attract and use additional resources, towards carrying out various activities.

Infrastructure development plays an important role in economic growth and poverty reduction, a phenomenon that has generated a steady increase in demand for investment in this area. Public-private partnerships are one of the key elements for improving service delivery and diminishing existing gaps, the transfer of development, maintenance and operational risk to the private partner, representing in the long run, a real potential for achievement of certain superior quality results over the traditional ones.

Building internal policies needed for PPPs, leading projects towards cost streamlining, exchanging experience and good practice between states and within states among different administrative levels is a significant factor of development some viable, effective projects that meet citizens' needs.

PUBLIC DEBT - THEORETICAL CONSIDERATIONS

Petre POPEANGA*
Carmen BRAGADIREANU

Abstract

The article presents a point of view regarding the public debt management, in theoretical terms, characterized by a critical analysis both economically, financially and socially. Public debt has been, is and will be a topic of real interest for every society and for many of them it may be considered a way to modernize the mentality even of the population.

Public debt management is a process that is closely linked and dependent on monetary and budgetary policy and involves the involvement of all those who have a say or can influence the transformation of these issues.

Public debt management requires a permanent improvement through from the perspective of reforms which take place in the state administration process.

Keywords: public debt, public expenditure, taxes and duties, indirect taxes, direct taxes.

1. Introduction

The concept of public debt, this macroeconomic financial instrument present since ancient times in all the more or less developed socio-political systems, has led and still leads to strong disputes and even doctrinal controversies regarding the definition but, most of all, its sizing in a unitary manner.

In our opinion, there are two or even three reasons for these disputes in which all the great economists of the world have been and continue to be engaged.

The first category motivates the position of denial – up to exclusion – of the need for loan, on the grounds that it is not moral to transfer to future generations the today's effects of faulty financial management due to an unjustified lack of predictability in the programming of funding sources for future projects that generate budgetary remaining expenditures, at some point, without these resources. Promoters of this theory still exist today, but the idea has emerged since the 17th century.

In his Fifth book of "The WEALTH of NATIONS", published on March 9th 1776, Adam SMITH vehemently pleads against the very idea of public debt, stating that "...financing of public expenditure from taxes and fees or from selling government guarantees could become an activity generating public debt, which", says the author... "diminishes the effects of productive workforce in favour of nonproctive workforce".

In his work "On the Principles of Political Economy and Taxation", another important economist, David RICARDO, with more moderate opinions regarding the need for public debt, states: "The choice between financing through indirect taxes or debt - that is, future taxes - would be irrelevant to the real evolution of the economy, what matters being the actual levies made by public sector on the company's available resources."

The reluctance to use the loan as a financial instrument, but without excluding it, was also manifested by some contemporary economists.

Without denying the idea of external loan as a leverage of financial management, Henry KAUFMAN noted, however, that "...nobody was able to explain either to taxpayers or to their elected representatives why the loan today will be tomorrow's expenditure, that will diminish the funds for other programs".

In the same register, Paul A. SAMUELSON, winner of Nobel Prize for Economics in 1970, was asking himself, in his reference paper "Economics",: "...is it normal that the entire population bears the interests due to some persons, private creditors, through taxation?"

However, the one who violently attacked the idea of indebtedness of states, especially underdeveloped ones, was Karl MARX.

Although he did not directly address public debt as macroeconomic activity, Karl Marx was mentioning in "Das Kapital", his reference work: "...after they robbed the "BLACK" continent in order to support capitalism in England, its countries will be in such a shortage of resources that they will soon be forced to borrow and they will do it, usually also from the robbers".

The second category of economic analysts consists of those who not only accept the idea of public debt as an instrument of macroeconomic management, but also recommend it as a lever for the development of a state, conditioned by the use of resources attracted in this manner only into programs which bring added value.

Thus, claim the supporters of this theory, the level of transfer of additional budgetary obligations

* Professor Emeritius, PhD, Faculty of International Relations and Administration, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (e-mail: petre.popeanga@gmail)

 Romanian Court of Accounts, Bucharest (e-mail: carmen.bragadireanu@yahoo.com) generated by the loan is much diminished due to the subsequent economic effects of the investments financed by it.

Significant in this regard is the equivalence assumption, promoted by David RICARDO, who accepts macrofinancing from both internal sources through indirect and external taxes, by loans, provided that the level of public sector leverage on the real financial resources of the company is balanced.

The dilemma tax or loan generated a third category of analysts, the moderates, who are supporters of a balanced system combining the two, based in particular on Ricardian theories. Today, the situation has not evolved much and how could we better explain the acidity of the remark of the British economist John Maynard KEYNES who, in connection with this or perhaps not only, states ... "all action people who think to be immunized against intellectual influences are in fact enthralled by some ideas of a few defunct economists".

These doctrinal differences have generated a vacuum of information in the area or, more correctly, they have not yet allowed to set a common definition for public debt, nor a common way to express its real dimension. And this is due to the fact that international norms of accounting representation in this area have not yet been established and institutionalized at international level.

2. Content

In his work, "Dette publique et deficits", the French teacher Jaques Le CACHEUX mentionned in this regard that..."at the moment, at international level, there are no unified public accounting rules that can be followed by all countries".

Paradoxically, this state of uncertainty still persists, considering that the need for loans has also seen – on the background of a certain economic stagnation – an unprecedented increase in the post-recession history, having as main effect the increase of budget deficits, a situation that imposed the adoption of decisions limiting both their size and the level of public debt.

For the purpose of the above and without limiting the scope of examples, we can consider as significant the provisions of the Treaty of the European Union, signed in Maastricht on 7 February 1992, which set out a series of very rigorous criteria for the sizing of the maximum levels of the main macroeconomic indicators, including those for the budget deficit and public debt.

At the same time, the international financial institutions were those who, in a certain way, had to define the main financial instruments in a way as accurate as possible but also acceptable for the borrowing countries, starting with the need to assess future creditors using unitary criteria.

One of the major financial institutions, namely the International Monetary Fund, in one of the protocols annexed to the Treaty of the European Union signed in Maastricht, defines the budget deficit as follows:..."the difference between the total government expenditure, including interest on public debt, but excluding its reimbursement and the total revenue, including tax, non-tax and asset transfers, but excluding loans".

3. Conclusions

The public debt is defined very briefly, being, in our opinion, "...the need for loan, at a certain moment, of a government", an understandable situation considering the creditor quality. I avoided the term "loan shark", although I confess that I would be terribly tempted to use it, considering that a treaty like the one signed in Maastricht introduces a definition for an important financial instrument without taking into account the fact that each Member State of the European Union has some specificity, a certain degree of development and thus a greater or lesser need for external loan.

Is it possible that, at this level, the famous remark from the not less famous work "The General Theory of Employment, Interest and Money", where John Maynard KEYNES was saying that ..."the set of consequences on public debt will not be the same if the economy (of a country n.a.) is experiencing a state of expansion or recession" was unknown?

Is it possible that, at this level, is was not known the fact that, unlike other unions, the European Union is a structure that unites primarily nations and not countries, and that each of its states has the capacity to preserve its identity and independence, including in its own economic space? Hard to believe, but also harder to accept, given that the analysis of some of the generous goals of the United Nations, especially those aimed at social progress and the improvement of the people's standard of living, reveal a perpetual endemic regression.

Considering this, we believe that, first of all, efforts should be intensified in the doctrinal space, in order to adopt rules for the implementation of macroeconomic policies that take into account the economic, social and even political realities of every country of the world!

THE COUNTRY RISK REFLECTED IN THE CDS QUOTATIONS

Mădălina Antoaneta RĂDOI*
Alexandru OLTEANU

Abstract

We know the fact that, with the rapid growth of the economic, political and financial instability, country risk analysis has gained an increasingly important role in the practice of international financial institutions. There have been developed a number of country risk assessment models used by companies that are looking to penetrate new foreign markets or who want to protect and minimize their investment losses, including macro-financial models, econometric models, models developed by the Standard & Poor's and Moody's rating agencies etc. However, one of the indicators that measure the perception of a country among investors is the CDS (Credit Default Swap) price. By using this tool, an investor will be compensated if the debtor goes bankrupt and as such the lower the CDS price is, the lower the perception of that debtor's bankruptcy risk is. The purpose of this article is to present the impact of the increase or decrease of CDS quotations on a country's loan costs.

Keywords:country risk, country rating, derivative instruments, risc de tara, Credit Default Swaps (CDS).

1. Introduction

In order to understand how country risk is reflected in the evolution of CDS prices and, implicitly, on a country's loan costs, we will need to explain the two concepts, namely country risk and Credit Default Swaps (CDS) - a financial derivative instrument used to cover the default risk.

Country risk is defined as "the risk of exposure to a potential loss of an actual asset / business as a result of the occurrence of economic, political or social events that are, from a certain level up, at least partially, under government control in the host country and not under the control of the owner of the asset / manager of the company"[1]. If the government cannot control an unfavourable event, but only its impact, then the possibility of the event occurring is a country risk. The country risk concept was originally applied only to government loans and was then extended to government-guaranteed private loans, private non-government guaranteed loans, foreign direct investment, and even foreign portfolio investment.

In order to penetrate an international market, any company needs to know the economic, financial and social-political situation in the host country that will allow it to determine the level of the country risk. In emerging markets, however, there may be major economic or political changes, causing short-term changes in the level of the risk associated with the market or country in question. As such, the country risk assessment will be conducted whenever an event leading to rating degradation occurs in order to adopt those strategies to reduce potential or actual losses.

A worsening of the economic or political situation in the host country does not always lead to a degradation of the country rating. A country is downgraded to an inferior risk class only if the disruptions recorded in the economic or political environment act long-term and the economy of the host country is not able to cope with them.

Uncertainties about global economic growth, the state of the international financial system, and the deepening of geopolitical tensions have led to a deterioration in investors' confidence in emerging economies, which can be reflected in the rapid foreign capital outflows of these economies and the increase in the cost of financing them.

As far as political risks are concerned, they will continue to be a major concern in 2018. Among the areas with advanced economies, Europe is the one facing the greatest political uncertainty. During 2017, the European Coface political risk indicator[2] increased by an average of 13 points for Germany, France, Italy, Spain and the United Kingdom. If major political turmoil continues, at a scale similar to that of the British referendum, European growth could slow down by an average of 0.5 points.

Political risks in developing countries are higher than ever, driven by so-called "social" dissatisfaction and increased security risks. CIS (because of Russia, with a score of 63% out of 100% in 2016) and the regions in North Africa / Middle East (Turkey and Saudi Arabia both having a 62% score) show the greatest risks among the major emerging economies. The increase in the political and social frustrations in South Africa is partly responsible for downgrading its assessment to Class C, in a very poor growth context.

Security risks, including terrorist attacks, conflicts and loss of human lives are a new factor in determining the political risk indicator in emerging countries. As expected, they reach the highest ratings in Russia and Turkey.[3].

Concerning Eastern Europe, Poland is threatened by unprecedented political and possibly economic sanctions on the part of the European Union for erosion of the rule of law, while the billionaire leader of the Czech Republic has failed to form a majority government. In the case of Romania, the ruling party has removed its third prime minister in about a year. One of the risks to Romania's governance indicators is the uncertainty caused by the justice reform, which has attracted public protests and criticism from EU Member States. From this point of view, Romania risks losing some of the allocated European funds and being politically marginalized from the European institutions.

Coface has conducted a country risk assessment for some countries, concluding:[4]:

- Spain climbed to level A3, while Iceland and Cyprus (where capital control risks are down) are now being assessed at A2 and B respectively.
- Countries in Central Europe continue to improve their ranking among the 160 countries rated by Coface. Estonia (A2), Serbia (B) and Bosnia-Herzegovina (C) have all experienced improvements in terms of business, and economic growth in these countries is reaching comfortable levels. Bulgaria (A4) has confirmed its recovery, due to moderate growth and further consolidation of the banking sector. Romania is at the A4 level, but according to Coface, some of the weaknesses are slow bureaucratic and legal processes, corruption, low public revenues and tax evasion. The macroeconomic developments in Romania, the improvement of country ratings by the three US rating agencies: Standard & Poor's, Moody's and Fitch Ratings at investment grade (low investment risk), but also the regional risk perception by investors led to the reduction of the CDS quotations of our country to 100 basis points.
- Greece was assessed at B level, its weak points being: high levels of public debt, tax evasion, poor banking portfolios, social tensions fuelled by fiscal austerity, mass unemployment and weak public institutions.

The most accurate assessment and positioning of country risk is very important for a company's decision-making system. Knowing the level of risk of a country and the premises underlying its change in time provide economic operators with greater certainty and the possibility of adopting adequate measures to reduce the risk exposure of their international operations[5].

The country risk concept is differentiated as investment or lending risk depending on the system of indicators and the time period. As regards credit risk, according to the ISDA conventions, it takes the following forms: bankruptcy or insolvency, bankruptcy of a company with which the reference entity is in close relationship, non-payment of the interest / coupon at maturity, debt restructuring, debt extinguishing, accelerated repayment of the obligation, downgrading of the rating class, acquisition / merger.

Credit risk transfer instruments include credit derivatives that can be defined as a "class of financial instruments the value of which derives from the market value due to the credit risk of a private or government entity, other than the counterparties involved in the derivatives transaction related to the credit risk"[6]. This definition highlights the role of credit derivative instruments in trading the credit risk of a particular entity by two parties that may not have any commercial or financial relationship with that entity the credit risk of which is being traded.

The term "credit derivatives" was first used in 1992 by the International Swaps and Derivatives Association (ISDA), an institution that developed and published in 1994 the standard form (template) of the Master Agreement, as well as the main regulations regarding these contracts, valid worldwide[7].

One of the credit risk derivatives traded on OTC (over-the-counter) markets is also the Credit Default Swap (CDS) contract.

Unlike insurance contracts concluded for 1 year (or year fractions), credit derivatives offer protection over longer periods.

The first CDS contract was introduced by JP Morgan in 1997 as a way for the banks to protect themselves against their exposure to large corporate loans they made to their clients.

These contracts are the most used in credit risk management, and are bilateral contracts where regular fixed payments (or only one premium in the credit default option case) are made to the seller for protection in exchange for the payment the seller will make in the event of a credit event specified in the contract. Usually the premium is quoted in base points multiplied by the nominal value. The support asset (reference asset) of the contract may be a single financial instrument (e.g. a bond) or a toolbox.

The credit default swap can be used to transfer credit risk exposure to another party. For example, banks may use this contract to trade the credit spread for bonds issued by private entities or governments without having these instruments.

The maturity of the contract must not be the same as that of the reference asset and in most cases it is not. In case of default, the contract is considered completed and the protection seller will calculate and pay the buyer the default payment.

The flows that take place during the performance of the contract are:

- Regular payments (premium leg) of the protection buyer: base points of the nominal value;
- Payment received by the protection buyer in the case of the occurrence of a credit event (protection leg): the nominal value of the bond × [100 - the price of the bond after the occurrence of the event specified in the contract].

As a result, the payoff of this tool is binary.

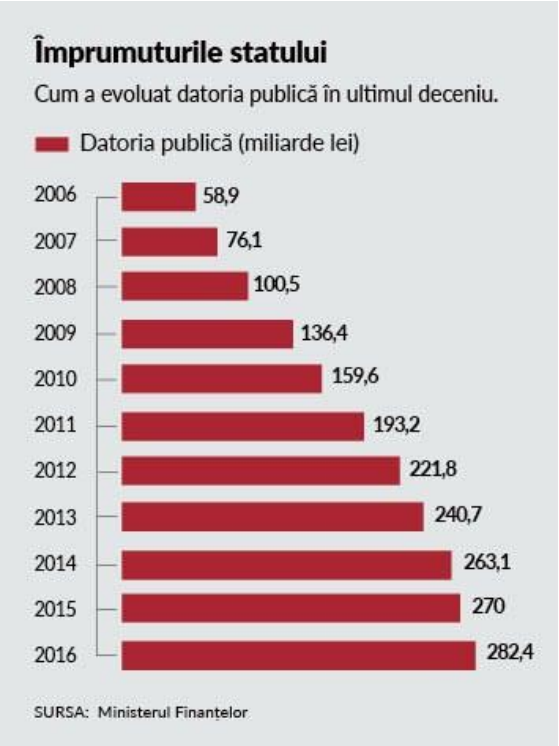
The CDS price on the derivatives market is called spread. Credit default spreads or default risk insurance pricing reflects the perception of the risk associated by the investors with an entity's issued credit, and when it is bought by international investors, it also reflects the perception of the country risk. CDS represents the cost of reinsuring a country's debt against loan restructuring or the cessation of payments. The level of CDS influences the cost of external financing, and if it becomes lower, the state can borrow funds at lower costs, while local banks can attract cheaper credit lines from parent banks.

It should be remembered that, although CDS is used by investors to cover against credit risks, speculators use them for risks to which they are not directly exposed. The global financial crisis raised the first questions about the speculative use of CDS. An EU regulation to decrease speculation on debt derivatives, which came into force on November 1, 2012, could affect the borrowing ability of countries with small government debt markets such as Poland, Hungary, Lithuania and the Czech Republic. Hedge funds are extremely present in CDS transactions in these emerging markets, through the so-called "directional transactions". If funds believe that the economic situation will deteriorate, they buy CDS, and they expect an improvement, they sell. These transactions are made without the investor needing to hold bonds for which to sell or buy the CDS.

2. CDS with exposure to Romania

A representative indicator for the country risk analysis is the public debt, which is the direct effect of the cumulative budget deficits from previous periods, which must be financed by loans. In an analysis of the German investment bank Berenberg, Romania was likened to the "Eastern European tiger", as the country's development after the crisis that started in 2008 was remarkable, by reducing the budget deficit from 5.6% of the GDP in 2008, to 2.6% in 2015, 2.41% in 2016 (RON 282.4 billion according to Chart 1), 2.887% in 2017 and with an average annual growth rate of 3.6% from 2000 to this day, while the EU average is 1.2%. In 2017, Romania recorded an economic growth of 6.7%. However, capital inflows are vital to adequately stimulate the transition from an economic growth driven by the increase in aggregate demand to an economic growth driven by the long-term growth of aggregate supply, by significantly improving the performance of production factors.

Chart 1 - Romania's public debt in 2006-2016



Although 2017 ended, in the case of Romania, with a budget deficit of RON 24.3 billion, or 2.88% of the GDP, under the annual target of 2.96% of the GDP set by the ruling coalition, this was achieved by:

- the significant reduction of investments that were down by 10% in 2017 compared to the previous year;
- the reintroduction, in September 2017, of the excise over-duty of 7 eurocents / litre which generated revenue for the budget;
- blocking the payments of authorizing officers (meaning their exclusion) after December 27, 2017;
- dividends paid to the state budget by state-owned companies that could have been used for investments.

Fitch Ratings financial assessment agency also states that "The budgetary target was reached by realizing only half of the planned capital expenditures. Tax cuts have reduced the ratio between revenue and the GDP to one of the lowest levels in the region, while the gradual increase in the minimum wage, public sector wages and pensions has increased basic spending". Investments, including capital expenditures, as well as expenditures related to development programs financed from domestic and external sources, decreased by about RON 3 billion, respectively 3.2% of the GDP versus 3.9% of the GDP in 2016.

The December 2017 financial stability report of the National Bank of Romania shows that "the continuation of an expansionary fiscal-budgetary policy is likely to put pressure on the cost of financing the budget deficit and implicitly on the medium-term public debt sustainability. The contribution of the public deficit to financing needs rose to 3% of the GDP in 2017, from 2.4% in 2016 and 1.4% in 2015, amid the deepening of the budget deficit starting in 2016. Continuing this development could put pressure on the level of public indebtedness in the future". According to the European Commission, the structural budget deficit reached 3.3% of the GDP in 2017, rising by 3 percentage points in two years. In 2018, the budget will continue to deteriorate, with Romania risking to return to the EU's excessive deficit procedure, from which it had exited in 2013, according to Fitch estimates, but remains below the 40.9% average of the BSE rating.

Public debt can fuel economic growth only if the total amount of debt-generated income is higher than the total debt balance. If the public debt grows as a result of the financing of the current budgetary expenditures, there will be negative medium and long term effects in the economy. This increased public debt will soon turn into a higher financing cost for our country. The country risk will be felt in the prices of treasury bonds and CDS. An economy that is in great need of financing will face restricted access to primary markets and high interest rates.

Romania's public debt increased in Q3 2017, compared to Q3 2016 by RON 25.4 billion (5.5 billion euros) but decreased as a share of the GDP compared to the reference period, by 0.6% according to Eurostat, the statistical office of the European Union. The ratio between the public debt and the GDP increased to 38% at the end of 2017, from 37.6% in 2016, indeed under the target of 60% of the GDP agreed at the European level by the Maastricht Treaty. Mainly, extending the maturity of the public debt led to a decrease in the refinancing risk. Public debt is mostly contracted in the medium or long term (94% of the total, being equally attracted from the domestic and foreign markets). Although public debt is at a sustainable level of 38% of the GDP, things may worsen in the years to come, given that the state will accrue significant debt as a result of higher public pensions and wages. In any case, a large deficit is not recommended in a period of economic growth, as in a possible recession period, it will increase greatly, which will lead to an exponential increase in public debt. Prior to the crisis, public debt was below 15% of the GDP, but in the years to come, government revenue dropped significantly as the economy was in recession. As such, deficits have reached record levels of over 7% of the GDP (RON 36.4 billion added to public debt in one year - 2009).

At the EU level, there is also a decline in public debt versus the GDP, both in the euro area (from 89.7% to 88.1%) and in the EU28 (from 82.9% to 82.5%) compared to the third quarter of 2016. At the end of the third quarter of 2017, debt securities accounted for 80.3% of the euro area and 81.4% of government debt of EU28. Credits accounted for 16.5% and 14.5% respectively, and the currency and deposits accounted for 3.1% in the euro area and 4.2% of the government debt of EU28.

In recent years, there has been a gradual improvement in risk perception, with the costs at which Romania contracted loans on the international capital markets decreasing. The cost of insurance against the default risk reflected in credit default swaps quotations has reached 100 basis points, and Romania continues to be seen by foreign markets as a low-risk placement compared to other European countries. The CDS reflects the evolution of investor perception and the degree of mistrust in a particular issuer, becoming one of the most visible indicators of a country's ability to finance its capital markets in the years of crisis. CDS is traded on the financial markets, so its price may have significant fluctuations, depending on the status of the debtor concerned and the international financial environment. It has become the focus of public attention during the peak of the financial crisis in 2008-2009. When the CDS price drops, not only the state can borrow at lower costs, but local banks can also attract cheaper credit lines from parent banks.

The link with bank loans is due to the fact that interest rates at which local banks contract external loans are determined by both the reference interest rates in euro, Swiss dollars or francs (LIBOR and EURIBOR) and by the perception of external financial markets of Romania’s country risk, expressed through the CDS quotation the subject of which are the bonds issued by the Government.

As a result, banks increased customer interest rates due to the worsening of the perception of the country risk, thus no longer having access to cheap financing from parent banks. From our point of view, there is no direct relationship between the CDS quotation and bank financing cost, but only a theoretical one.

As a result of the latest financial crisis, the specialized literature the price formation mechanism on public debt instruments markets gained greater attention, which showed that the investors' perceptions of a country's economic status may significantly affect sovereign financing costs. For policy makers, it is important to assess how the prices of government bonds and CDS contracts are being formed, as it allows a good understanding of how the evolution of fundamental factors and investors' perceptions is translated into quotations on the financial markets.

"Traditionally, the assessment of public debt instruments is based on the interest rate and liquidity risk, but the sovereign debt crisis has brought the default risk back into focus, as evidenced by the sustained growth of the trading activity on the market of the CDS associated with securities issued by euro area Member States. Under these circumstances, it is not surprising that many quantitative analyses come to the conclusion that the pricing of these instruments is closely linked to developments in the CDS markets. However, other authors demonstrate that the causal relationship takes place in the opposite direction"[8].

According to the financial stability report drafted by the NBR, "during the year 2016 there is a relatively stable dynamics of the CDS quotations in the emerging countries in the CEE region, including Romania, as compared with the development of indices for countries such as Spain or Italy. The impact of the vote on Britain's exit from the European Union has been amplified in the case of CDS quotations for Portugal, Italy, Ireland, Greece and Spain, largely determined by the negative perception of high levels of public debt, given the potential implications on the architecture of the European Union. Thus, on the day of the Brexit referendum, the risk associated with the sovereign exposures of Spain and Italy increased by 29% (29.3 base points) and 25% (35 base points), while the CDS quotations of Hungary and Poland registered increases of 14% (21.2 base points) and 10% (8.3 base points) respectively. Market quotations for the sovereign risk associated with Romania marked a temporary increase of 20% (25.4 base points), returning in the beginning of July 2016 to the average trend recorded this year.

The cost of sovereign debt financing issued by the Romanian state recorded a synchronous evolution with the observed trends in other countries in the region. In this sense, the gap between the yields of the Romanian and German government securities recorded a slight increase between April and June, after which, following the decision of the British citizens to leave the European Union, it decreased significantly. The similar evolution of the region's differences, observed both in terms of level and magnitude of the fluctuations, reveals that the determinants were of a global nature and therefore the effects were similarly felt".

As regards the January-September 2017 period, according to the December 2017 Stability Report of the NBR, "CDS quotations related to sovereign debt instruments issued by the Romanian state remained relatively stable, with the exception of a slight decrease in the first two months of the year. In August and September, there was a slight volatility, caused by the temporary tensions in the domestic political environment, as well as by the US Federal Reserve's announcements on the increase in the monetary policy rate"[9].

Conclusions

Although the sovereign CDS' market can anticipate the changes of a country's rating, this information is not always conclusive, because on the one hand the spread of CDS with exposure to a country was floating, the rating of the country stood still, and on the other hand CDS can be used for speculative purposes, as was the case of Lehman Brothers.

Lehman Brothers bankruptcy, caused by overexposure to securitized instruments with sub-prime base assets, has created tremendous pressure on AIG (a company that sells CDS for insuring against bankruptcy of banks, funds or companies) both through the clearing channel of CDS' protection on Lehman Brothers and through the destabilization of the securitized real estate market. It was estimated that, in 2008, the total of Lehman Brothers' credit risk swaps amounted to USD 400 billion, while the total of the bonds covered was USD 150 billion, the difference being purely speculative.

In addition, CDS derivatives being traded on the OTC market (the unregulated market OTC – Over the Counter) add even more uncertainty to the system. However, CDS reflect the evolution of investor perceptions and the degree of mistrust in a certain issuer, becoming in the crisis years one of more visible indicators of a country's ability to finance its capital markets.

Deutsche Bank has ranked among the most 49 risky countries in terms of the likelihood of their governments defaulting. According to this ranking, Romania rank 20th with a margin of 130 basis points between selling and buying prices of CDS in the global market. The bigger the difference is between the buying and selling quotations of the CDS, the government securities of that country are considered more risky. It should be remembered that the most difficult year for Romania, in terms of risk of default, was 2009, when our country registered a margin of 626 points.

In the case of Romania, the cost of the default risk insurance reflected in the five-year CDS quotations dropped to 94.88 points in September 2017, our country being perceived as risky as Hungary (94.64 basis points), but more risky than Poland (54.88 basis points) or the Czech Republic (37 basis points). The best borrowers are Norway and Sweden with 14 points.

The general benefits of derivatives are that by securing risk in international or domestic transactions, financial institutions have the opportunity to invest more easily in different assets or markets and thereby benefit from increased leverage. In this way, derivatives contribute to increasing the liquidity and efficiency of markets.

TEN YEARS AFTER THE GLOBAL CRISES - EXPORTS RECOVERY AT REGIONAL LEVEL IN ROMANIA

Artur-Emilian SIMION*

Abstract

After ten years of the global financial crises, which peak in Romania was 2009, the negative impact on exports and imports of Romania are still in place for some Romanian counties. The scale of the impact highlights the strong connections between the national economy and the economy of the other EU countries, which have suffered during the crisis because of falling demand for imports from Romania.

The good export recovery is not a favorable thing for those counties who focused theirs exports on primary products, products based on natural resources and low-technology products. These exports lead to the decrease in foreign exchange earnings and implicitly the potential of endogenous growth at the county level, mainly due to deteriorating terms of trade.

The paper is focused on Romanian exports recovery analysis, taking into account the impact of world financial crisis, which started in Romania in 2009. A special attention is paid to the recovery of exports at the regional level and to the importance of the structural changes of Romanian export, occurred in 2017 compared to 2008. Also, in this article are analyzed the concentration of exports at county level, the main partners on export, the share of the first 10 partners and evolution of export per capita at the counties level. The trade balance is used to classify the counties in: net exporters (export>import) and net importers (import>export).

Keywords: county exports, imports and trade balance, exports recovery, export per capita, export partners and top 10 exporting compnies.

JEL classification: F10, F31

1. Introduction

The crisis started in 2009 showed that external openness of an economy, which is based on reciprocal earnings from international trade, should have a high level resilience of national economy, necessary and sufficient for resistance against possible strong external shocks. At country level, Romania's exports showed a good resilience, thus, in 2010 (one year after the crisis) exports increased by 10.8% compared to 2008; after ten years, in 2017 the export growth rate was 85.7% compared to 2008.

Analyses of this paper are focused on the period 2008 - 2017 (2008 being the first year before the crisis of 2009 and 2017 is the last year for which data is available at this level of detail) and will be detailed at county level. In order to create a clear picture of international trade in goods of Romania, at the county level, over a ten years period (2008-2017), this article will present and analyzed the following statistical data: growth rates of exports, imports and trade balance FOB / CIF in the period 2009-2017 compared to 2008 at the county level, the main export destinations and structural changes occurring in 2017 compared to 2008, the share of the top 10 exporting companies at county level and the trade balance in 2017 at the county level (counties classification in net importer or net exporter). All these indicators will provide a synthetic image of the profile and orientation of Romania's counties international trade.

2. Brief literature review

Sustainable regional development is closely linked to regional demand (exports) to achieve a high level of competitiveness and specialization. Export is considered a major contributing factor to regional growth but also a source of developing economic and social inequalities in territorial profile.

In Romania there are several reference papers on this topic, but the level of detail of the data at the county level is limited in comparison with the present paper. Among these papers we can mention "Endogenous regional economic development: the case of Romania" - Zaman, Gh. and "Structural developments of Romanian export" - Zaman, Gh., Vasile, V.

Another important article on this topic, published on „Romanian Journal on Economics" in 2015 is „Regional aspects of economic resilience in Romania, during the post-accession period" (Zaman Gheorghe, Georgescu George), which is focused on the issue of regional resilience to the economic crisis impact in the case of Romania, taking the county as territorial unit of observation. Also, the article "A new classification of Romanian counties based on a composite index of economic development" (Zaman Gheorghe, Goschin Zizi) provides a good starting point for this article.

3. The evolution of international trade of Romania in the period 2008-2017

3.1. The export growth rate in the period 2009-2017 compared to 2008

The export growth rate in the period 2009-2017 compared to 2008, at the county level, had different values from one county to another. Thus, the counties of Arges, Buzau, Calarasi, Gorj, Ilfov, Suceava and Tulcea have shown a strong resilience on export, export growth continued in the period after the crisis. An atypical county is Cluj, which after the crisis recorded high growth rate on exports (+ 121.7% in 2011 compared to 2008), in 2012 registering a high decrease of export (- 16.7% compared to 2008), mainly because of cessation activity of a major producer and exporter of mobile phones. Another atypical county is Giurgiu, which after the crisis recorded positive rates of exports (+33.2% in 2011 compared to 2008), in 2013 registering a high decrease on exports.

Counties such as Alba, Arad, Bihor, Bistrita-Nasaud, Botosani, Brasov, Caras-Severin, Dambovita, Ialomita, Iasi, Maramures, Salaj, Satu-Mare, Sibiu, Teleorman and Timis had a relatively good resilience export; thus in 2010 the export exceeded the 2008 level for these counties. Instead, for the counties Bacau, Braila, Bucharest, Constanta, Covasna, Harghita, Hunedoara, Mures, Neamt, Prahova and Vrancea the export exceeded the 2008 level only in 2011. The Dolj county returned to pre-crisis export value only in 2012, with the launch exports of a large car manufacturer.

Table 1 – Export resilience (Recovery time in years)

Recovery time	No. of counties	Weights in 2008	Weights in 2017	Counties

Inconstant resilience	3	3,8	2,9	CJ, TR and VS

There are still 7 counties for which exports from 2017 are below those recorded in 2008: Braila (2017 compared to 2008 -40.1%), Constanta (2017 compared to 2008 -4.4%), Galati (2017 compared to 2008 -27.8%), Giurgiu (2017 compared to 2008 -16.1%), Mehedinti (2017 compared to 2008 -26.7%), Tulcea (-18.0% in 2017 compared to 2008) and Valcea (-26.5% in 2017 compared to 2008).

Also, there are 3 counties with inconstant resilience: Cluj, Teleorman and Vaslui. The export of these counties exceeded the values registered in 2008, but in the period 2008-2017 they have recorded both increases and decreases from one year to another.

The share of export for top 10 counties in total exports increased in 2017 compared to 2008 from 64.6% in 2008 to 66.6% in 2017. The highest increases in weights (in percentage points pp) had recorded the following counties: Alba +2.4 pp (climbed from position 19 to position 7 in the top) and Arges +2.3 pp (it has kept his 3rd position in the top export). The biggest rise in the top recorded Suceava, which has climbed 11 places from position 37 to position 26 in the top and Alba which has climbed 12 places from position 19 to position 7 in the top. The biggest drop in top was recorded for county Valcea, which lost 10 places, from position 17 in 2008 to position 27 in 2017 (-1.1 pp). The largest decreases of the weights (in percentage points pp) were recorded by the following counties: Constanta -3.0 pp (form position 4 in 2008 to position 10 in 2017), Galati -2.5 pp (form position 6 in 2008 to position 16 in 2017) and Bucharest that registered a large decrease of the weight in total export (-1.9 pp) and, though, it kept its leading position on export.

Counties like Galati and Olt came out of top 10 in 2017 compared to 2008, giving way to the top 10, in 2017, to Ilfov and Alba counties.

The share of top 10 exporting companies at county level in 2017 exceeded, in most cases, 50% of total exports at the county level, which indicates a strong dependency of exports at the county level by a few big exporting companies, the major part of them being foreign direct investment affiliates and subsidiaries of multinational enterprises.

For counties like Galati, Olt and Mehedinti, the share of top 10 exporting companies in 2017 exceeds 90%.

3.2. The export partners

While in 2008 the main export destination was Italy for 21 counties, in 2017 only 15 counties still had Italy on a first position on export. Instead, Germany exceeded Italy in 2017 compared to 2008 and has become the main destination for 18 counties on exports in 2017, compared to only 12 counties in 2008. This shows an increase of exports dependence, on county level, of demand in the German market. Other partner countries on a first position on county export in 2017 are: Norway (2 counties), France (one county), United Kingdom (one county), Marshall Islands (one county), Netherlands (one county), Poland (one county) and Turkey (one county).

In 2017 Italy and Germany were in the top 10 export destination for 42 counties, France for 39 counties and UK for 37 counties.

The top 10 destinations for counties' exports are mainly countries from European Union (87.4% in 2017). There are counties in 2017 that have no extra EU country in the top 10 export partners: Arad, Bihor, Cluj, Harghita, Maramures, Satu Mare, Timis and Bucuresti. These counties are, with one exception (Bucuresti), in the center and east part of Romania and the exports orientation is explained by the proximity of European Union countries, which offer more opportunities and choices for Romanian exports.

3.3. Exports per capita

Depending on the export per capita in 2017 and export dynamics in 2017 compared to 2008, counties are divided into 4 categories (Figure 5):

- Category 1: counties with export per capita higher than the national average and export dynamics in 2017 compared to 2008 higher than the national growth rate;
- Category 2: counties with export per capita higher than the national average and export dynamics in 2017 compared to 2008 less than the national growth rate;
- Category 3: counties with export per capita less than the national average and export dynamics in 2017 compared to 2008 higher than the national growth rate;
- Category 4: counties with export per capita less than the national average and export dynamics in 2017 compared to 2008 less than the national growth rate.

Based on these criteria resulted in the following:

- in the first category there are 7 counties, with a total export share increasing from 30.9% in 2008 to 42.8% in 2017; dynamics of export per capita in 2017 compared to 2008 are: Alba 450.5%, Arges 165.7%, Arad 157.8%, Brasov 187.5%, Ilfov 134.6%, Sibiu 140.5% amd Timis 114.7% (Figure 6). This category corresponds to developing counties.

– in the second category there are only 2 counties, with a total export share dropping from 22.7% in 2008 to 19.3% in 2017; dynamics of export per capita in 2017 compared to 2008 are Bucharest +78.0% and Olt +30.2% (Figure 7). This is an atypical category, which contain 2 counties with an export per capita above the national average in 2017, but with a lower growth rate.

Source: own calculation based on data of Romanian National Institute of Statistics; see annex for counties' codes.

– in the third category there are 11 counties, with a share of total exports slightly up from 10.7% in 2008 to 12.8% in 2017; dynamics of export per capita in 2017 compared to 2008 are: Bacau 96.4%, Bistrita-Nasaud 130.6%, Buzau 153.1%, Caras-Severin 187.5%, Dolj 222.8%, Hunedoara 99.8%, Iasi 184.1%, Maramures 144.7%, Salaj 111.0%, Suceava 321.2% and Vrancea 113.5% (Figure 8). The third category contains counties with export per capita less than the national average and export dynamics in 2017 compared to 2008 higher than the national growth rate.

– in the fourth category there are 22 counties, with a share of total exports drastically decreasing from 35.0% in 2008 to 23.2% in 2017; however dynamics of export per capita in 2017 compared to 2008 are increasing in counties such as Bihor 94.5%, Botosani 83.8%, Calarasi 43.2%, Cluj 50.1%, Constanta 1.4%, Covasna 44.3%, Dambovita 91.7%, Gorj 61.3%, Harghita 25.3%, Ialomita 80.4%, Mures 38.9%, Neamt 42.3%, Prahova 84.8%, Satu Mare 68.4%, Teleorman 18.7%, Tulcea 2.1% and Vaslui 26.2%. The rest of the counties recorded large decreases in 2017 compared to 2008: Braila -27.1%, Galati -13.9%, Giurgiu -13.5%, Mehedinti -12.9% and Valcea -15.4% (Figure 9).

These counties had an export per capita less than the national average and export dynamics in 2017 compared to 2008 less than the national growth rate; the common features of these counties are the low level of economic development.

3.4. Import and trade balance

Although exports had a high resilience to the crisis, it had a limited impact on GDP because, in the quantification of contribution to GDP, the net exports are taking into account (difference between exports and imports), but also because they involve usually an increase in imports (reflected in the import content of exports), which limit the contribution of international trade to economic growth.

The share of the top 10 counties in total Romanian imports slightly decreases in 2017 compared to 2008 from 75.7% in 2008 to 74.5% in 2017. The biggest drop of the share (in percentage points pp) was recorded in Bucharest (-8.0 pp). However, it kept the leading position among the top counties on import with around 30% of total imports of Romania in 2017. Significant increases of share, in 2017 compared to 2008, recorded the following counties:

– Arges +2.4 pp (dynamic 2017/2008 was +117.83%); it climbed three positions in the top, from position 7 to position 4;

– Arad +1.6 pp (dynamic 2017/2008 was +113.0%); it climbed four positions in the top, from position 10 to position 6;

– Timis +1.5 pp (dynamic 2017/2008 was +69.2%); it climbed one position in the top, from position 4 to position 3;

– Ilfov +2.4 pp (dynamic 2017/2008 was +82.1%); it kept his second position in the top.

Besides Bucharest, significant decreases in the share of the total import in 2017 compared to 2008 recorded the following counties:

– Galati with -1.3 pp (dynamic 2017/2008 was -25.9%); it fell six positions in the top, from position 8 to position 14;

– Constanta with -2.0 pp (dynamic 2017/2008 was -15.6%) fell five positions in the top, from position 3 to position 8.

In the 2008-2017 period there was a huge drop in the external trade deficit of Romania (dynamic 2017 / 2008 was -44.9%), from -23.5 billion Euro in 2008 to -13.0 billion Euro in 2017.

At county level, the largest contribution to reducing the Romanian external trade deficit had Bucharest (31.8% of reduction), with a decrease in the external trade deficit from -15.3 billion Euro in 2008 to -11.9 billion 2017 (dynamic 2017/2008 was -21.9%). Another important contribution to decrease the Romanian external trade deficit had county Timis, which passed from trade deficit to surplus (from -0.3 billion in 2008 to positive trade balance of +1.3 billion in 2017).

Some counties had positive external trade balance in 2008 and this increased in 2017, as follows: Arges county from +0.35 billion Euro in 2008 to +1,39 billion Euro in 2017 (dynamic 2017/2008 was +301.0%) and Alba county from 0.12 billion Euro in 2008 to +1.05 billion Euro in 2017 (dynamic 2017/2008 was +753.8%).

From classification of counties based on the trade balance in 2017 resulted 24 net exporting counties (with a positive external trade balance of +6.83 billion Euro in 2017 compared to only +0.07 billion in 2008) and 18 net importing counties (with a trade deficit of -20.4 billion Euro in 2017 compared to -23.36 billion Euro in 2008).

4. Conclusions

Although Romania's total exports has shown a pretty good resilience, there are still counties who have not exceeded exports from 2008 nor in 2017. The share of the top 10 exporting companies and top 10 countries of destination for counties export over 50% in 2017, for almost all counties, reveals a strong dependence of counties exports by a few big exporting companies (in majority with foreign capital) and several destination countries (mostly from European Union). However, the increase in external demand for products of a county, according to the basic Keynesian theory, contributes to its economic growth.

The positive external trade balance at the county level may have a positive impact on the economic development of the county if the exports refer to high technology products. If this positive trade balance is based on exports of raw materials and semi-products, under conditions of low imports, it will have a negative impact on sustainable economic growth of the county in question (immisering exports). The most counties that have kept the positive external trade balance in the 2008 – 2017 periods are in this situation.

The counties with negative external trade balance must act to reduce the external trade deficit in the medium and long term. However, a negative trade balance deficit may have a positive impact on sustainable economic development if it is based on the high-tech products imports, local assimilated through technology transfer.

Also, the analyses from this paper revealed that, after ten years of the global financial crises, which peak in Romania was 2009, the negative impact on exports and imports of Romania are still in place for some Romanian counties. The trade concentration on a few countries, mainly from European Union, points out the strong connections between the national economy and the economy of the other EU countries, which have suffered during the crisis because of falling demand for imports from Romania.

YIELD AND RISK - THE BASIC COORDINATES OF SOCIO-ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS

Emilia Cornelia STOICA[*]
Mihaela SUDACEVSCHI[]

Abstract

Public policies are implemented through larger and smaller public programs and projects that have to comply with very strict governance conditions. Evaluating the net benefits generated by public programs or projects allows for the identification of the cost-effective ones in order to select them. For this purpose, a lot of indicators, mainly the Net Present Value (NPV), both in financial and socio-economic terms, as well as the recovery period, are being constructed, the probabilistic modeling of which provides the information needed to determine the public spending performance, public expendityres financing the national economy development.

Development and implementation of the public programs are faced with risks, their prediction being a complex approach. For the identification of risks, a wide range of values of indicators involved in risky actions is assigned so that probability appraisal of the occurrence of those risks can be made, including their impact upon environment and / or community. The mix of the probability of producing the risk and its impact leads to the identification of most of its manifestations, so that we can retain to evaluate the program only the significant risks.

The paper also presents the most important criteria for the selection of the development programs / projects, focusing on addressing economic and social benefits, expressed in monetary terms. The cost-benefit analysis that must accompany any public project proposal will identify both its utility for the intended community and externalities, positive and / or negative, that will be a factor of impact upon the NPV.

Keywords: yield, risks, socio-economic development, appraisal, Net Present Value (NPV).

1. Introduction

The analysis of the impact of the projects implemented in the economic and social environment for which they are conceived reveals important differences (gaps) between the information contained in the project and those obtained after its implementation. The risks generated by these gaps can produce significant negative effects and should therefore be estimated as accurately as possible, to prevent its being necessary to propose treatment methods for disposal or only reduction.

The gaps that may appear in socio-economic assessment have different causes, but most of them are produced by underestimating the costs and overestimating the benefits to be considered in the cost-benefit analysis underlying any feasibility study. To assess the level of risk in a project, statistical laws of functional distribution of sources of error are used: normal law, beta law, Gamma law, which are applies to available information, which also implies a risk.

There are several methods of risk management, most of which are of a quantitative nature, generally of a high degree of complexity, such as scenario analysis; sensitivity tests - Current Socio-Economic Net Value, etc. Qualitative analysis is a simpler, descriptive method and is therefore used for small-scale projects.

2. Methods of evaluation of macroeconomic development programs and projects

The assessment of macroeconomic and sectoral development programs can be achieved (* * * , 2011) by using several methods, such as:

- cost-benefit analysis, which calculates the net benefit (the sum of the results minus the sum of costs, expressed in updated monetary values), which provides information on the performance of a program. This analysis involves the observation of the impact of the actions proposed in the program concerning the most important aspects of economic and social activity. Currently considered a basic element for designing and evaluating any public program or project, this method involves the use of techniques for updating and estimating economic and social risks involving sophisticated statistical-mathematical models, as:
- multicriterial analysis, which seeks to satisfy multiple options simultaneously, each of these options being aimed at achieving a specific objective. The approach of this method requires the estimation of each set of option - impact - objective, the determination, generally by probability calculations, of the coefficients for each criterion, etc. ;

− the cost-effectiveness analysis is intended to be a simpler version of the cost-benefit analysis because it attempts to propose to achieve the objectives specified in the program or project with lower costs. However, using this method raises a number of issues if the results are to be the basis for making public policy decisions. Thus, some social aspects can be ignored; also, if the impact of proposed actions on the economic and social environment is not analyzed, negative externalities can occur which can not be ignored by the responsible public authorities. In addition, if certain costs are not taken into account, it may be possible to see an important difference between the estimated output of the program or project and the actual one that will compromise that policy;

− the development of macroeconomic, statistical and mathematical models that use databases containing medium and long-term variations of macroeconomic indicators describing developments at national and supra-national level - for example across the Union European or Eurozone. For the information produced by these models can also be used at lower levels: local, regional, microeconomic, they can be introduced as exogenous sizes in the models specially designed for those levels.

In the wide range of methods and techniques used to evaluate public programs (Le Maître – Sétra, 2014), two are most commonly used: macroeconomic scenario-based methods built on probabilistic estimates and methods based on the introduction of a lump-sum premium that expresses the risk in the discount rate of all financial and social sizes, denominated in monetary terms.

The selection of programs according to the criteria previously formulated by public authorities takes into account the foreseeable sensitivity in the different macroeconomic scenarios, which will be estimated for the main components of the net present value (NPV).

In the macroeconomic scenarios, the initial stage is represented by the probabilistic distributions of the indicators describing the added value gain achieved through the implementation of the proposed program.

3. Definition of the risks

A public program or project presents and substantiates the proposal to carry out an activity that will improve the characteristics of the economic, social, natural, technical environment, etc. In order to achieve the established objective, the program or project will allocate resources, use appropriate mechanisms and achieve results that should lead to the goal expressed in public policy. During the implementation period of the program / project, the risks may appear to disrupt the operation according to the program or project provisions and the ex-ante analysis of these risks is intended to diminish and even eliminate the effects of these risks, hence the importance of knowing them.

In the category of economic risks, two different categories are distinguished: systemic and non-systemic risks. The former are macroeconomic risks that affect the newly created national level (which can be expressed by the macroeconomic indicator Gross Domestic Product (GDP) or similar indicators, National Income (VN), Gross Global Product (PGB) or Net (PGN)

− non-systemic risks are those risks perceived as belonging to the assessment inability of those conducting the assessment operation. They may be confronted with insufficient information on macroeconomic and social indicators, the use of non-performing or inadequate software for high issues, the lack of reliable information on the evolution of the macroeconomic indicators, etc. ;

− systemic risks are generated by its functioning, as described by macroeconomic indicators, such as GDP and other assimilated ones. If they vary, it is expected that the level of development and, implicitly, the quality of life of the community will vary accordingly. In this respect, both public institutions and other organizations involved in macroeconomic forecasting activities elaborate several scenarios on the development of the economy as well as its main sectors.

All evaluations are based on the components of the internationally recognized macroeconomic indicator: GDP per capita at purchasing power parity (PPP). Considering the components of GDP formation, ie Gross Value Added (excluding asset depreciation) and net indirect taxes (involving fiscal policy coupled with commercial policy), it will be possible to follow the behavior of the community towards the potential of national gains, balancing the risks detected to achieve these earnings.

For this purpose, two statistically determined quantities are computed and compared based on the multiannual macroeconomic information: the hope of the key indicator (in this case, the NPV) :

E (NPV – NPV equivalent = the risk premium that the collectivity would agree to bear in order to avoid the risk, where E (NPV) = NPV hope, and the NPV equivalent = current, net present value of a risk-free program / project in the sense that the NPV is not dependent on macroeconomic developments, ie GDP variation, which shows the equivalence with the preference of the community not to face risks.

3. Methods of risk assessment

- Scenario-Based Methods

Within each scenario, input and output financial flows are calculated to determine the net value of the value added, then the updated utility expectancy is calculated using the risk-free rate to calculate the NPV equivalent.

- Beta-based methods

Beta methods consist of computing the updated value of the macroeconomic indicators and their components retained in the program by completing the discount rate with a program / project specific risk premium, followed by the ways of applying the algorithm used for the scenario method.

The variation of the utility of the community in a certain economic and social environment, determined at the date of evaluation, follows two situations:

- without implementation of the project, so that only the foreseeable evolution of the current environment will be predicted. This situation is the reference situation, to which the analysis of the differences and, implicitly, of the benefits and risks generated by the proposed development project will be reported;
- the situation in which the project is being put into operation: the updated value of the equivalent NPV project is added to the existing wealth;

The updated sum of the annual community collectivity sampling values, calculated for the assessment period, will follow the same algorithm:

- without implementing the project, considering only the current year's (Ct) fuel wealth;
- the situation in which the project is put into operation, when the random gains obtained in the current year through project implementation are added to the random gain of the reference situation.

When the community has a risk aversion, the equivalent NPV is less than the hope NPV, in the sense that it would prefer to obtain a certain gain (NPV equivalent), rather than the uncertain gains that the risk situation would bring. The difference between the NPV's certainty and the expectation of NPV is what the community is willing to pay to avoid the risk, and this quantity is defined as a risk premium.

This risk premium is the product of the community's aversion to risk and is calculated by the actual value of the correlation between the annual benefits of the project and the wealth obtained by the community through its implementation in that year, a correlation that is quantified by the covariance of these two statistical variables.

As a project is most often aimed at replacing or completing an already existing service offer, the socio-economic assessment will attempt to estimate the cost-effectiveness of a project by comparing two situations obtained in a future context: one where the project is not realized (reference option), the other is the project. In the next sequence, the change process will focus on the clear definition of the overall macroeconomic context or the "baseline scenario", and the option to improve it by implementing the selected program / projects.

It should be noted that the baseline situation can not be confused with the present situation, this being the most probable situation that would occur in the future period in the absence of the project.

At the same time, the option to implement the program / project will predict in detail the most likely situation that would occur in the presence of the project.

4. Socio-economic assessment compared to financial evaluation (Waaub Jean-Philippe, 2012)

While the financial assessment only examines the financial effects of the project operator, the socio-economic assessment (* * * , 2015) compares, for every each major category of actors, the impact of the chosen version of the project version for which it was chosenthe impact of the project version for which it was chosen with the reference project.

In addition to commercial goods and services - which can be valued through market prices - included in the financial evaluation, respectively the commercial expenses and revenues related to the project, the socio-economic evaluation also looks at the value of the non-market goods and services produced by the project. Known as externalities, these positions are initially quantitatively assessed, as is customary in social, environmental and economic disciplines.

Also, with regard to costs, it is the question of determining the full cost, which entails evaluating both total costs, including investment costs, operating, maintenance and renewal costs, as well as the monetary estimation of negative externalities regarding the social and economic effects of human resources policy review, etc.

In terms of benefits, it is imperative to predict revenues and the monetary outlook of positive externalities what can happen with the time saved by economic agents, the gains in the safety of people's lives, or reducing the number of injured people, improving the environment and quality of life, social and economic ones by increasing the abilities of the population, decreasing morbidity, etc.

The socio-economic evaluation aims to synthesize, as far as possible, all the financial and non-financial effects of the project under evaluation.

Net present value (NPV) is defined as the sum of the updated benefits minus the sum of the updated costs. This aggregation involves the translation, wherever possible, of the impact of non-commercially-expressed monetary amounts, which should be as standardized as possible in order to achieve the fair comparability of programs / projects involving such sizes. This standardization involves the establishment of calculation conventions and the choice of reference values, also called tutelary values, the valuation conventions being based on the type of impact considered.

The most important factors for establishing the socio-economic profitability of a program / project - quality of life, competitiveness, biodiversity, etc. - will be able to be analyzed due to the monetary units being expressed in terms of NPV-SEs.

This indicator, the Socio-Economic Net Present Value (NPV-SE) of a project, is defined as the difference between the current amount of the benefits obtained through the project implementation and the current amount of estimated costs for realizing those revenues.

In the process of selecting the programs / projects proposed for achieving an objective of socio-economic development of the collectivity, several statistically developed indicators are used which present the essential aspects required for the acceptance of a public-funded approach. These indicators will highlight:

- the program / project profitability or benefit for the company: the net present value in financial or socio-economic terms;
- the liquidity, respectively the speed of recovery of the invested funds, expressed in the recovery period, also under conditions of updating;
- the risks faced by initiators of the program / project, which are very diverse, both financially and in terms of the usefulness of the community.

In terms of cost-effectiveness, public projects have a distinct feature compared to private ones: their profitability will not only take account of the possibility of realizing a monetary profit but social benefits for the community due to the project during its entire duration. These benefits can be expressed by raising living standards, education, etc., but they are difficult to express monetary, but NPV-SE needs to evaluate them as accurately as possible to present the benefits of implementing a public project.

In this respect, for the public programs / projects, which propose the realization, including the financing of public services, to provide the decision makers with reliable selection criteria, two indicators are calculated which express the net present value (NPV), meaning financial NPV (NPV-F) and socio-economic NPV (NPV SC):

- NPV-F is defined, from the financial investor point of view, by aggregating the updated cash flows with the discount rate set for the enterprise implementing the project. This discount rate is generally considered equal to the weighted average cost of capital - which is calculated as the average weighting of the debt and the share of equity in project financing, in current monetary units, ie the year considered.
- NPV-SE represents the collectivity's profitability requirements and, in this case, takes into account, in addition to the financial flows expressed in units of currency in the constant prices of the reference year, non-commercial costs and benefits, also expressed in monetary units , updated at the rate set by the public authorities.

NPV, and even NPV-SE, are used as criteria for selecting programs / projects, considering their absolute value without uncertainties, as the risk premium perceived by the community and the socio-economic beta[1] is included in the discount rate, which refers to the variation in macroeconomic development, expressed in GDP per capita.

However, many other risk factors, both exogenous and endogenous, are emerging in the project, such as the timing of the planned activities, the variation in the prices of the resources employed, the different evolution of the labor market, the mortgage market, etc., without takes into account the predictive errors of macroeconomic indicators that may arise from these factors.

In the best case scenario, by conducting a risk analysis or sensitivity analysis for several possible variations of macroeconomic aggregates and factor prices, the discount rate can be estimated and thus determine the value of the NPV-SE, considered a cost-effectiveness criterion for selecting programs / projects.

The profitability of a program / project can also be analyzed using its management rate, ie NPV reported to the invested monetary unit, showing under the same financial update terms the classification of projects in terms of budgetary implications.

Conclusions

Although the two profitability indicators: NPV-F and NPV-SE can be calculated for each program / project, they are rarely used at the same time. If, due to the scrupulous decision of the decision-makers, its are analyzed in the same work, several situations should be pursued: both positive, both negative, positive and negative, but in all situations, the interpretation of profitability, and therefore acceptance of the project, being different, thus:

- if both NPV-F and NPV-SE are negative, ie financially, but also as an impact on the social life of the community, its implementation does not improve, on the contrary, it causes unnecessary expenditure, and the project must be rejected;
- if both NPV-F and PSE are both positive, it is assumed that the program / project brings improvements to economic and social life, without compromising the financial balance of the community;
- more controversial situations arise when the two indicators are different:
- if NPV-SE is positive and NPV-F negative, it means that the project can bring benefits to the community, but the costs involved can not be supported solely by public funds. However, it is necessary to reconsider all the costs and sources of funding available to mobilize, including, in the case of the EU Member States, Community subsidies;
- if both indicators are negative, it is recommended to reject the program / project, at least in the form presented, although the analyzes made on the foreseeable developments of the communities and the economic environment may be the subject of some relevant proposals.

The general formula of the NPV of an investment involves using at the denominator of the discount rate,

[1] The "beta" coefficient represents the risk of the sector and the company considered; mathematically, it is measured by the dispersion of the profitability of the company around the average profitability, Source : Cléon 2018, http://rfcomptable.grouperf.com/dictionnaire/comptable_financier/navigation.php?lettre=a whose essential function is to make comparable economic flows occurring at different times.

Due to the importance of the discount rate for determining the profitability, liquidity and risk of a program / project, whether public or private, its sizing requires some clarification:

- the public discount rate is unique and applies uniformly to all public investment projects taken into account and to all sectors of activity. Deviations from this principle would lead to the systematic acceptance of significant inconsistencies in the allocation of public resources;
- the discount rate is a rate calculated without the risk premium. The risk review should not be incorporated by an implicit increase in the discount rate. The risk must be treated for each project together with the quantitative and pricing estimates that are appropriate to it.
- the discount rate is a real rate, in the sense that the values used for its calculation will be expressed in constant prices, generally based on the reference year;
- the update rate, estimated for the entire life of the program / project, decreases over time for long-term assessments;
- this rate should therefore be subject to periodic revisions to avoid a different estimation of developments in macroeconomic indicators: GDP variation, long-term interest rate trends, demographic variables, labor productivity, demographics, etc.).

ON THE POSITIVE CORRELATION BETWEEN EDUCATION AND GDP IN ROMANIA

Sandra TEODORESCU[*]

Abstract

The present paper is a part of a post-PhD research entitled Assessment on the impact of education on the macroeconomic development in Romania, as compared to other EU member states. The survey starts with a short overview on the history of education and macroeconomic development in Romania, starting from the 19th century. The paper presents contextual data, indicators as well as the outcome of the research, conducted in order to identify and analyze the impact of education on the macroeconomic development in Romania. The study is based on linear regression models and, respectively, on double log regression models. The purpose is to analyze the relationship between a set of educational indicators as predictors and Gross Domestic Product as a dependent variable.

Keywords: formal education, macroeconomic development, statistical analysis, regression models, GDP.

JEL Classification: C15, I25, P46

1. Introduction

Formal education occurs in a structured, systematic and controlled environment where students are learning together with a trained, certified (preschool, primary, secondary or tertiary) teacher, professor or lecturer of the subject.

Etymologically, the word "formal" is derived from the Latin formalis which means "official", "organized", therefore, formal education is official education. Philip H. Coombs[1] defined formal education as the hierarchically structured, chronologically graded education system, running from primary school through the university and including, in addition to general academic studies, a variety of specialized programmes and institutions for full-time technical and professional training. Formal, official education includes social managing and evaluation, centered on the development of self-assessment capabilities learned within the formal education.

Formal education is extremely important because it provides access to cultural, scientific and artistic values, to literature and scientific knowledge as well as to social and human experience, having a critical role in shaping the students' personality, according to society and individual needs. Investing in human resources, i.e. in education, training and healthcare systems, is aimed at improving the professional and scientific abilities of trainees as well as at increasing their adaptability to cope with structural economic changes and the technological progress as well as efficiency.

Below, I intend to show that formal education plays a key role in improving living standards, leading to prosperity.

2. Defining Contextual Indicators And Models Applied

To analyze the impact of education on Romania's economic growth, statistical data provided by EUROSTAT and World Bank are processed in order to understand specific indicators. The three models applied are the following: simple linear regression, simple and log-log regression, as well as multiple regression.

Using available data, we obtain the general linear model presented below:

$$y_j = b_0 + bx_j + \varepsilon_i, j = \overline{1,T} \quad (2)$$

where T is time in years.

The model is used (i) to analyze the relationship between two variables, i.e. a dependent variable - Education and, respectively, an independent one – Economy, as well as (ii) to assess the relationship

[*] Associate Professor PhD, Faculty of Economics and Business Administration, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (e-mail: tsandra@xnet.ro)

[1] Philip Hall Coombs (1915-2006) was a program director for education at the Ford Foundation; he was appointed by President John F. Kennedy to be the first Assistant Secretary of State for Education and Culture; he worked for UNESCO and served as vice-chair and chair of the International Council of Economic Development between the two variables during a given period of time (2001-2015).

For the analysis of panel data to be further developed, we get the following general linear model:

$$y_{ij} = b_0 + bx_{ij} + \varepsilon_{ij}, \quad i = \overline{1,N}, \qquad j = \overline{1,T} \quad (3)$$ where N shows the correlation between countries and T is time in years.

To interpret correctly the parameters, namely the impact of education on economic development, we use logs for variables, i.e. semi-log or log-log regression model

$$y_j = b_0 + blnx_j + \varepsilon_j, j = \overline{1,T} \quad (4)$$

and, respectively

$$lny_j = b_0 + blnx_j + \varepsilon_j, j = \overline{1,T} \quad (5)$$

using natural logs and the real value of the dependent variable, and, respectively, natural logs for both variables x_j and y_j.

If linear regression uses variables we want to predict, i.e. dependent variables, logistic regression enables you to calculate predicted probabilities using a factor variable (i.e., categorical variable), which should be included in the model as a series of indicator variables regression. The logistic regression algorithm is developed to determine what class a new input should fall into. One of the nice properties of logistic regression is that the sigmoid function outputs the conditional probabilities of the prediction. A sigmoid function is a mathematical function having an "S" shaped curve, and is bounded differentiable real function that is defined for all real input values and has a positive derivative at each point. The logistic function has this further, important property, that its derivative can be expressed by the function itself. The advantage of this model is that we are not really restricted to dichotomous dependent variables and that it can be developed into one unified model.

Using the same data, we obtain the following linear multiple regression model:

$$y = b_0 + b_1x_1 + b_2x_2 \ldots + b_px_p + \varepsilon \quad (6)$$ where p represents the number of predictors used to explain or predict the other variable y.

3. Description of the Contextual and Specific Indicators Used

The specific, educational indicators we analyzed are the predictors, i.e.[2]:

6. School life expectancy (SLE) is the total number of years of schooling (primary to tertiary) that a child can expect to receive, assuming that the probability of his or her being enrolled in school at any particular future age is equal to the current enrollment ratio at that age. School life expectancy shows the overall level of development of an educational system taking into account the years of schooling.
7. Total public expenditure on education (TPEE) refers to combined public, private and international expenditure on education, i.e. funding by the government or education expenditure by educational institutions, as well as private expenditure.
8. At least upper secondary educational attainment, age group 20-24 years (USEA)- % (ISCED 3) the indicator is defined as the percentage of people aged 20-24 who have successfully completed at least upper secondary education. This educational attainment refers to ISCED 3. The indicator aims to measure the share of the population that is likely to have the minimum necessary qualifications to actively participate in social and economic life. It should be noted that completion of upper secondary education can be achieved in European countries after varying lengths of study, according to different national educational systems. It reveals the efficiency of national strategies and policies in the field.
9. Tertiary educational attainment, age group 30-34 years, (TEA) % - the indicator is defined as the percentage of the population aged 30-34 who have successfully completed tertiary studies (e.g. university, higher technical institution, etc.). This educational attainment refers to ISCED 5-6 and reveals the distribution of the respective share of population. The indicator helps us draw conclusions on the quality of human resources, being a part of the Education and Training 2020 (ET 2020) framework for cooperation. It shows the share of 30-34 year olds with tertiary educational attainment, with a view to achieving the strategic objectives under the ET 2020.
10. Employment rates of recent graduates (ERRG)- % presents the employment rates of persons aged 20 to 34 fulfilling the following conditions: first, being employed according to the ILO definition, second, having attained at least upper secondary education (ISCED 3) as the highest level of education, third, not having received any education or training in the four weeks preceding the survey and four, having successfully completed their highest educational attainment 1, 2 or 3 years before the survey. The indicator is calculated based on data from the EU Labor Force Survey.
11. Employment by educational attainment level (EEAL), annual data, age class-15-64 years, tertiary education per thousands shows the percentage of a population aged between 15-64 that has reached a higher level of education and holds a qualification at that level, being employed. It reveals the efficiency of labor policies and is used at international level.

[2] Source: EUROSTAT

12. Population by educational attainment level (PEAL), sex and age -% highlights the share of the population having completed at least upper secondary education, age class 15-64 years.
13. Enrolment rate (ER) % is expressed as net enrolment, which is calculated by dividing the number of students of a particular age group enrolled in all levels of education by the size of the population of that age group[3]. It is widely used to show the general level of participation in and capacity of education.
14. The broadest indicator of economic output and growth is the Gross Domestic Product or GDP[4], expressed in million of Euros, which represents the dependent variable.

To illustrate the impact of education on the medium and long term, the relationship between variables was considered as asynchronous (for example, there is a 12 year gap between GDP and the Enrolment rate).

3.1. Analysis Of Correlations Between Educational And Macroeconomic Indicators

The analysis of the sample correlation presented below clearly illustrates the moderate relationship ($r_{PIB;Chelt_ed} = 0.62$), and, respectively, the strong relationship between GDP and the rest of indicators, except for the Employment rates of recent graduates, which is the best example for an inverse correlation ($r_{PIB;Grd_angajare} = -0.42$).

Table 1. Correlations. The highlighted correlations are strong for p < .05000 N=8

3.2. Estimation Of Regression Equation

Based on statistical data for 2001-2015, linear regression equations, and, respectively, log-log equations showing the relationship between GDP and each predictor were developed, illustrating strong correlations, along with the analysis and the regression model (see Appendix).

3.2.1. The impact of School life expectancy on GDP

According to Europe 2020 guidelines included in the most important strategic document drafted and promoted by the European Commission for the next 10 years, which defines education as one the top priorities and the factors that could lead to economic growth within the EU, Romania should reduce school drop-out rate (PTS), age class 18-24 years, down to 11.3% until 2020, and, respectively, increase tertiary education attainment rate, age class 30-34 years, up to 26.7%. The goal is difficult to achieve due to high school drop-out rates, age class 18-24, i.e. one child in 5 leaves primary school (17%) and 50% of students leave secondary school and fail to pass the final exam. Although reforms were implemented to improve access to education and ensure quality education, further measures should be applied and major investments should be made in this sector, to cope with the challenges faced by these vulnerable categories.

Based on the regression model presented in Table 1 (Appendix), the following linear regression equation illustrating the relationship between the dependent variable GDP and the independent variable School life expectancy was developed:

$$PIB = 102259 * Speranta\_sc - 1427211 \quad (7)$$

after normalization (standardized independent variable value – 0 and dispersion value – 1) we obtain:

$$PIB = 0{,}376719 * Speranta\_sc \quad (8)$$

The coefficient of determination denoted $R^2(\%) = 14\%$, indicates that School life expectancy influence on GDP values is of 14%.

At the same time, we obtain the following log-log equation:

$$lnPIB = 4{,}71454 * lnSperanta\_sc - 1{,}18165 \quad (9)$$

(2.512) (7.00)

$$R^2 = 0{,}28$$

[3] Source: INS, TEMPO Online
[4] Source: EUROSTAT - for variables 1)-7) and GDP

In comparison with other EU member states, Romania's School life expectancy was 16.9% in 2012, according to EUROSTAT, above the UK – 16.6%, but below Sweden – 19.9%, Denmark – 19.3%, and Germany – 18.2%.

The log-log regression equation (9) shows that a 1% increase in School life expectancy leads to a 4.71% GDP growth during the analyzed period. In the future, we can predict a 17% increase in School life expectancy, above Denmark (19.3%) and almost equal to Sweden (19.9%), leading at the same time to a 109.63% increase in GDP.

3.2.2. The impact of Total public expenditure on education on GDP

According to EUROSTAT, Romania's GDP was 27% of the average EU GDP per capita (EU-28) in 2015, being the second poorest EU member state, above Bulgaria (22.8%). Romania's Total public expenditure on education accounts for 4.1% of the country's GDP, as compared to an average of 4.7% in Eastern Europe and, respectively, 5.4% in EU.

Since 2005, secondary and tertiary education has received more money than preschool or primary education. The education sector is strongly interconnected with public expenditure, since private funding accounted for 0.12% of the country's GDP in 2010, as compared to 0.82% in EU.

According to the UNICEF survey[1], currently, approximately two thirds of public spending on education targets two fifths of rich people (65.8%), and only 9.9% - poor people. At the same time, 61.2% of public expenditure on education targets urban educational facilities, despite efforts to reduce the gap between urban and rural areas. The two examples presented above show that there are major equality issues and that significant investments should be made to eliminate this gap between rich and poor people (for e.g., inclusive education policies).

In other words, if Romania were to progressively increase its investment in education between 2015 and 2025, i.e. from 4.1% to 6% of the GDP, economic growth would increase from 2% to 2.7% - 2.95%. On the other hand, boosting our average PISA scores would also lead to economic growth (the impact of quality education on economic development).

$$PIB = 7{,}86 * Chelt\_ed + 75075{,}27 \quad (10)$$

$$R^2 = 0{,}5$$

and, respectively,

$$lnPIB = 0{,}484558 * lnChelt\_ed + 7{,}493406 \quad (11)$$

Thus, the equation (10) shows that Total public expenditure on education influence on GDP values is of 59%. A 1% increase in Total public expenditure on education would lead to a 0.48% increase in economic growth, while a 20% increase in Total public expenditure on education would trigger a 9.23% increase in GDP.

3.2.3. The impact of At least upper secondary educational attainment on GDP

This indicator aims to measure the share of the population that is likely to have the minimum necessary qualifications to actively participate in social and economic life. In 2015, it reached 82% at EU level, i.e. Croatia – the highest rate - 95.7%, followed by Ciprus – 94.3%, and Ireland – 92.7%. In Romania, it is 79.7%, which is close to the EU average.

$$PIB = 91901 * Cel\_putin\_liceu - 6987316 \quad (12)$$

and, respectively,

$$lnPIB = 21{,}5066 * lnCel\_putin\_liceu - 81{,}9073 \quad (13)$$

Regression analysis indicates that At least upper secondary educational attainment influence on GDP values is of 11%. A 2.3% increase in the number of students graduating from secondary schools to reach EU average would lead to an 84.3% increase in GDP.

3.2.4. The impact of Tertiary educational attainment on GDP

This indicator aims to measure the share of the population aged 30-34 who have successfully completed tertiary studies. It hit 38% in 2015, at EU level, as compared to Lithuania, which held the leading position, i.e. 57.6%, followed by Cyprus - 54%, and Luxemburg - 52%. In Romania, this area experiences an upward trend, i.e. 25.6%.

$$PIB = 19449 * Cel\_putin\_fac - 123466 \quad (14)$$

$$R^2 = 0{,}069$$

and, respectively,

$$lnPIB = 1{,}187959 * lnCel\_putin\_fac + 8{,}526990 \quad (15)$$

$$R^2 = 0{,}20$$

According to the regression equations developed based on EUROSTAT data for 2004-2015, Tertiary educational attainment influence on GDP values is of 6.9%. A potential 12% increase in Tertiary educational attainment to reach EU average would probably lead to a 60% increase in GDP.

3.2.5. The impact of Employment rates of recent graduates (economically active population) on GDP

According to EUROSTAT, in 2015, the percentage of economically active population[2], age

[1] Cost of Non-Investment in Education in Romania, UNICEF and MEN study

[2] The percentage of economically active population class 20-64 years, in Romania, was lower (66%) than EU average (70%). The government target is to reach 70% until 2020[3]. As for the economically active population, age class 30-34 years, the percentage (78%) is higher than EU average, i.e. 77.7%, for the age class 25-29 years – above EU average (72.1% as compared to 72%), while for the age class 15-19 and 20-24, the percentage is below EU average.

$$PIB = 532 * Grd\_ocupare - 519003 \quad (16)$$

(906) (1321651)

and, respectively,

$$lnPIB = 2{,}44745 * lnGrd\_ocupare - 5{,}78455 \quad (17)$$

$$R^2 = 0{,}10$$

The equations show that Employment rates of recent graduates influence on GDP values is of 41%. A 1% increase in the economically active population would lead to a 2.44% increase in GDP, while a 10% increase would probably trigger a 26.27% increase in GDP.

3.2.6. The impact of Population by educational attainment level on GDP

According to the OECD survey[4], the public returns to tertiary education are substantially large, i.e. thousands of dollars (on average across OECD countries, the net public return on an investment in tertiary education was, in 2011, 91,036 dollars for a man), not to mention the new jobs created, and the economic development fueled by innovation. Moreover, European Commission's Europe 2020 strategy[5] shows that almost 16 million new jobs will be created until 2020 for young graduates, while unqualified jobs will decrease by almost 12 millions. As a result, the need to invest in higher education is obvious, since the modern society relies on education as a source of economic growth. In addition, life satisfaction level is strongly influenced by education, the survey showing that the gap between graduates and non graduates is 18%.

In addition to these benefits, higher education helps students learn to think more critically, being focused on developing students as individual thinkers in search for the best solution, establishing thus the basis for more social and economic growth. Inclusive education is very important because it supports coherent and sustainable development at social and economic levels, solving the issues faced by all social categories with the help of qualified people.

and, respectively,

$$lnPIB = 1{,}804858 * lnPopulatia + 7{,}518492 \quad (19)$$

(1.55) (3.88)

$$R^2 = 0{,}14$$

The regression equation (17) shows that Population by educational attainment level influence on GDP values is of 7%.

The log-log regression equation (19) illustrates that a 1% increase in the number of graduates would lead to a 1.8% increase in GDP, during the analyzed period. A potential 20% increase in the number of graduates would probably lead to a 39% increase in GDP.

3.2.7. The impact of Enrolment rate on GDP

As for the benefits of investing in education, the same survey[6] shows that one additional year of schooling increases earnings by 8-9%, reduces the probability of being unemployed by 8% and the probability of bad or very bad health or suffering from a chronic long-standing disease by 8.2%. Secondary school graduates earn more than primary or college graduates, i.e. by 25%-31%. Tertiary level graduates earn more than secondary school graduates, i.e. by 67%. The increase in the number of tertiary level graduates from 13.6% to 19%, in 2025 would lead to an approximately 3.6% increase in GDP. Even a slight increase in the number of secondary school graduates, i.e. from 58% to 59.7%, in 2025 would generate a 0.52% increase in GDP.

According to the same survey, at macroeconomic level, one additional year of schooling leads to an average 12.1% increase in GDP.

$$PIB = 18480 * Grd\_sc - 996358 \quad (20)$$

and, respectively, the log-log equation:

$$lnPIB = 4{,}54648 * lnGrd\_sc - 7{,}13556 \quad (21)$$

(3.50) (14.7)

$$R^2 = 0{,}15$$

The 0.47% coefficient of determination shows that Enrolment rate influence on GDP values is of 47%.

The log-log equation (21) can be interpreted as follows: a 1% increase in the enrolment rate would lead to a 4.54% increase in GDP, during the analyzed period. An alleged 10% increase in the enrolment rate would lead to a 54% increase in GDP.

Conclusions

To analyze the impact of education on Romania's GDP, research using statistical methods to determine specific economic and education indicators was conducted, i.e. based on EUROSTAT data. The analysis presented in this paper clearly illustrates the important role of skilled workforce on economic growth, i.e. the influence of specific educational indicators on GDP values. Thus, increasing levels of educations reduce the probability of being unemployed and increase earnings, which could lead to economic growth.

In conclusion, I believe that, in a constantly changing world, the achievement of the key goals concerning education, included in Europe 2020 strategy as well as in national policies, such as encouraging learning, reducing school drop-out rates, and improving skills, could make our dream that Romania would achieve smart, sustainable and inclusive growth come true.

Abstract

A learning organization must be constituted in a dynamic environment of constant changes, prepared to engage and interact in systemic and systematic way with the context in which it operates. The present work intends to analyze the importance of organizational learning and their contribution to the performance of an organization from the perspective of the Organization as an open changing system, as well as emphasize its direct link with organizational theory.

Resumen

Una organización que aprende debe estar constituida en un ámbito dinámico de constantes cambios, preparada para relacionarse e interactuar de manera sistémica y sistemática con el contexto en el cual funciona. Con el presente trabajo se analiza la importancia del aprendizaje organizacional y su contribución en el desempeño de una organización desde la perspectiva de concebir a la organización como un sistema abierto en constante cambio, así como enfatizar su vinculación directa con la teoría Organizacional.

1. Introduction

Nowadays, companies are developing in a more competitive national and international economy, with increasing demands of productivity, where the laws of the market force them to deepen and to change strategies and policies, to plan, to create and to innovate, to have capacity of adaptation, speed responsiveness and sensitivity to anticipate future needs and be able to survive and develop in a complex and increasingly competitive environment. The level of performance to remain in the desired position, is based on the capacity that companies have to interact and respond to the environment from the macro and micro perspective, therefore it is in function of the context.

In the world scenario, processes of change are increasingly dynamic, where structures, forms, instruments and means are being renewed. It is imperative that companies and institutions are constantly updating models, systems, processes, procedures, technologies and personnel according to their own internal characteristics and the requirements of the environment in which they perform themselves to learn to renew themselves through the learning capacity that they are going to develop every day.

Considering the above, in the present article the concept of organizational learning is approached first, under the conceptualization of several authors, with the purpose of obtaining a better understanding of the concept and in order to explain the operation and main dimensions. Lastly, the article proceeds to empirical testing, discussing the results and ending with the conclusions and with the presentation of some limitations and implications of the study.

2. Approach and delimitation of the problem

This academic work emphasizes the identification that organizations have the need to face a changing world, and for this, managers must have an open, participatory, proactive mentality, with a focus on the development of human resources as a fundamental part of the same. As the changes happen in a vertiginous way in which performance and organizational learning become fundamental pillars to overcome adversities and have the character of overcoming the economic and social effects that cross organizations.

3. Objective of research

To analyze the importance of organizational learning and its contribution to the performance of an organization (Performance), in order to determine its degree of importance.

4. Research questions

Will organizations through the application of learning achieve a renewal and revitalization that will allow them to survive in a globalized environment?

What is the importance of learning in organizational performance?

5. Opportunity and research relevance

For the preparation of the present work, a review was made in the theoretical and empirical literature, with the existing scarce information on the performance applied to organizational learning.

6. Research method

The development of this article has a qualitative analysis approach, which considers the empirical revision of literary and scientific sources. It selects the information in order to consider one that can give an emphasis in answering the problematic raised. It is considered an analytic - descriptive study of an exploratory nature, because it "analyzes how a phenomenon and its components are manifested" (Hernández, 2000 p.259) of organizational learning and organizational performance.

7. Theories of organizations, the main approaches to organizational theories.

7.1. The situational or contingency approach

This approach describes administrative organization based on situations outside of business, the environment and technology. It focuses its attention on the external environment of the company, giving importance to what happens outside the organization, before focusing on the internal elements of the organizational structure (Lawrence and Lorsh, 1987).

7.2. Theory of human relations

Its main precursor is George Elton Mayo. Its central idea was to modify the mechanical model of organizational behavior and replace it with another that takes into account the feelings, attitudes, motivational complexity, among other aspects of the human being. It was basically a movement of reaction and opposition to the classical theory of administration. The theory of human relations arose from the need to counteract the strong tendency towards dehumanization of labor, initiated by the application of rigorous, scientific and precise methods to which workers were forced to submit.

The lack of economic rewards significantly impacts the motivation of workers. Factors, such as recognition, group acceptance, status, prestige, leads to unwanted behaviors of people, which leads to better wages (Chiavenato, 2003).

7.3. Theory of systems

This emerged with the works of the German Ludwig Von Bertalanffy, published between 1950 and 1968. Systems theory did not seek to solve problems or to try practical solutions, but to produce conceptual theories and formulations that can create conditions of application in the empirical reality. Hence, two concepts are deduced: purpose or objective and globalism or totality.

This theory contemplates the environments and interactions of the organizational structure, whose differential nature lies in its own organization, with certain internal balances, feeding and conservation modalities. It also revolutionized existing administrative approaches. It conceives of companies as social systems immersed in systems that interrelate and affect each other. It also rethinks the challenges of redesigning and rethinking organizations with new mental models and different tools for doing so (Lilienfeld, 1991).

8. Organizational learning

Organizations learn as they practice what they do and this makes them perform better. And it is through the learning of its people that it makes them better (Muñoz, 2003). It is said that "learning is defined as a process whereby repetition and experimentation make over time tasks performed better and faster, and that new opportunities are experienced on a permanent basis in the operational areas" (Castillo, 2013: 124).

The term "organizational learning" first appeared in a publication by Miller and Cangelloti (1965). The authors, based on Contingency Theory, proposed the "adaptation-learning" conceptual model to explain why only some institutions survive the demands of their environments over time (Garzón, 2008). Organizational learning is intimately inspired by the conceptions of Argyris and Schon (1978) and Senge (1993). The latter highlights four disciplines in business thinking: Personal dominance, mental models, building a shared vision and team learning (Larrosa, s.f.).

As a consequence, it can be said that organizational learning is intimately linked to personal and organizational performance through knowledge and development of situational learning. During the daily work different situations arise, of which, the organization and the worker are generating knowledge. Individual and collective learning becomes, in this context, the object of management for the organization and, at the same time, the organization becomes an object of learning. An organization learns when at least one person not only improves his or her individual task or function, but because of this improvement, other people in the organization change the way they work (Meijer et al., 2002).

The capacity for organizational learning is characterized by establishing what it is known, where is that knowledge, how it can be used it and improve productivity; In the same way, what aspects should be taken into account in organizational learning, how organizational learning is conceptually and operationally developed and how they influence organizational performance (Garzón, 2008). This depends on how the organization uses the results obtained in the practices of improvement of personnel, production, organization and control and with it establishes new forms of action for the improvement of organizational performance.

Organizational learning faces at least four mega trends that pose new challenges. They are trends related to the transformation of technology, the market, social and environmental regulation, the meanings of values and cultural symbols, which necessarily modify the content and organization of the work of the people in the organizations (Leonard and Palomares, 2003) (Garzón, 2008). Slater & Narver (1995: 63-75), assume that learning facilitates change and guide towards improving performance. Garvin (1994: 19-29) defines it as a process that takes place over time and leads the acquisition of skills that result in increased performance. Likewise, the results of Bontis, Crossan and Hulland (2002: 437-469), affirm that there is a relationship between organizational learning and its performance.

Organizations capable of intensifying and streamlining the relationship between individual and collective learning are called learning organizations (Meijer, et al., 2002). A learning organization is one that has acquired the continuing ability to adapt to change. Organizations, just as individuals learn. All organizations learn deliberately or not. It is a fundamental requirement to continue its existence (Kim, 1993). The direction of learning should be focused at the micro level and at the macro level. At the micro level depends on the path of innovation that has followed the organization. At the macro level, the direction is to upgrade towards products and services with greater knowledge and therefore added value, incorporated (Mertens, et.al. 2005).

Learning ability is to make learning efforts translate into competitiveness. If capacity is defined as closing the gap between intention and expected outcome, the concept implies innovation, albeit in a much more grounded form, since not every innovation leads to a competitive outcome (Dosi et al. 2000). Nowadays, it is imperative to accelerate learning in organizations in order to stay on the path to success, so it is necessary for organizations to focus on learning to unlearn what has been learned previously, since changing environments require of a rapid adaptation response by the organization.

The acceleration of the learning of new knowledge and skills has also led to the acceleration of the destruction of knowledge and skills, displaced by the former. Individuals and institutions need to renew their competencies more frequently than in the past, because the problems they face change more rapidly (Lundvall, Archibugi, 2001).

In addition, an organization also learns if it has knowledge of what goes on outside of it. Its benefits can be an advantage to the competition if it obtains excellent information and takes advantage of it (Chiavenato, 2001). External learning processes are based on the analysis of external information, from the behavior of competitors, customers and the rest of the organizations, the market or the political economy, among others. They are based on the acquisition and internalization of the outside, information that transforms in knowledge through the process of learning, and integrate it in the knowledge of the organization.

For the aforementioned, it is concluded that learning in organizations is determined both internally and externally. Its results depend on how much is learned from the practice, within it, as well as the handling of information that can be obtained from the environment. Once exposed the most important concepts about learning, it is described the contributions of some theories that have contributed to the generation of organizational learning. This is in order to have a better understanding of the impact on performance within organizations.

8.1. Contextual elements that contribute to the application of organizational learning

8.1.1. A culture of learning

As it is known, the set of beliefs, norms, habits and values frame a distinctive image of a society, which allows identifying characteristic features that strengthen the appropriation of elements that make it up, and is manifested in activities that generate value.

8.1.2. An environment for learning

The consolidation of this culture of learning requires the creation of an environment in which trust, empowerment, shared information and valuation of human talent are constant in the development of activities.

8.1.3. Open and shared communication

The formation of an environment for learning with the aforementioned characteristics should be complemented with the key of all interaction and communication. Sharing relevant information between hierarchical levels and areas of work creates a more objective picture of the needs, opportunities and threats to be addressed.

8.1.4. A scalar integration of its members

The flow of information is enriched thanks to the shared work between each collaborator, team, area and organization as a whole, which is called scalar integration.

8.1.5. A reason for growth

The need for an organization is aimed at meeting financial, commercial, and productive and market objectives, etc., to achieve them in an unpredictable environment. Environmental factors, both internal and external, become the reason for growth. In this regard, talking about learning capacity involves taking into account the contributions of employees to the company, who are generating maturity in their actions, as long as the organization is concerned to involve them in a culture to create, assimilate, disseminate and use the old and new knowledge, within the procedural and operative dynamics of the workdays.

As it can be observed, human talent is the focus of organizational learning, since it is the source that brings knowledge, experiences and behaviors to develop the company's competitiveness (Chavez, 2013).

9. Organizational performance

Performance is a feminine name of English origin that stands for realization, representation, interpretation, fact, achievement. The performance in an organization is based on the capacity it has to adapt and capitalize on internal and external key factors of the environment in which it operates. It is also related to the set of results obtained by an organization. Performance or organizational performance is based on observable results in the real scope of execution and depends on the system, organization and established methods, as well as its relationship with the environment; therefore it is based on the context (Brethower and Smalley, 1998). Profits are made outside the organization, within which there are only costs (Drucker, 1985: 123).

What happens between the design of the strategy and the results achieved has to do with organizational performance. Performance becomes a process of vital importance for organizations, and is sometimes viewed as a human management responsibility in which other business processes are not involved. However, when it goes deeper into this approach, it is recognized that performance is everything that happens from the moment of the strategic formulation to the last contact of the collaborator with what it should do, being the sum of everything, the expected result (Kaufman, et al. , 2004).

Organizational performance is a function of the behavior of external and internal factors of the organization. Tidd (2001) argues that the complexity and uncertainty of the environment affect the internal factors of the company. The better the internal factors match the environment, the better the performance. Thus, because the organizational structure is one of the internal factors of the company, it is better to identify structures suitable for specific environments than to look for a single structure to apply it in any context. Li and Atuahene-Gima (2001) argue that organizational performance and innovation, within internal factors, are linked to contingent factors in the environment.

Chamanski and Waago (2001) argue that organizational performance is related to the behavior of internal factors that vary with the age and the life cycle of the company and the type of industry. Damanpour and Evan (1984) argue that changes and uncertainty in the environment stimulate changes and innovations in the strategy and / or organizational structure. Likewise, they affirm that in order to obtain a high organizational performance it is necessary to implement in a balanced way, the technical innovation and the administrative innovation, which will help maintain the balance between the technical system and the social system of the company.

From the perspective of organizational performance this can be measured in terms of internal and external factors that are keys to the organization. According to Gopalakrishnan (2000), organizational performance can be defined on the basis of different factors, including: a) efficiency, related to inflows and outflows of resources; b) effectiveness, related to business growth and employee satisfaction, and finally, c) financial results, related to the return of assets, investment and profit growth. Tsai (2001) evaluates the management of innovation and its relation to organizational performance, taking into account the number of new products introduced and the return on investment, respectively.

Bernardez (2007) states that because organizational performance depends on internal, rational or informal, factors as well as on external factors, customers, market, technology, alliances and competition, it is necessary to consider for evaluation and improvement, three dimensions which are: The design and analysis of organizational structure (rational), the design of organizational dynamics (open) and analysis of (natural) organizational culture. Based on what was previously written about performance from the perspective of performance and organizational performance, it is possible to study it through organizational theory, because it studies both the internal functioning of organizations and their external functioning, in relation to the environment in which they operate.

10. Performance characteristics

1. Organizational focus: Organizational development (OD) takes the organization as a whole so that change can actually take place
2. Systemic orientation: It is oriented towards the interactions of the various parts of the organization, labor relations between people and organizational structure and processes.

3. Change agent: The DO uses one or more agents of change who are the people who play the role of stimulating and coordinating change within a group or organization.
4. Problem solving: The DO not only analyzes problems in theory, but emphasizes solutions. Through action research, the DO is dedicated to solving real problems.
5. Experimental learning: It means that the participants recognize through the experience in the training environment the various problems that they must face in the work.
6. Group processes and team development: The DO is based on group processes such as group discussions, confrontations, intergroup conflicts and cooperation procedures.
7. Feedback: The DO seeks to provide feedback and feedback to participants to base their decisions on concrete data.
8. Situational orientation: The DO procedure is not rigid or immutable, but situational and contingency oriented. It is flexible and pragmatic and adapts the actions to adapt them to the specific and particular needs previously diagnosed (Bennis 1973).
9. Performance is a very interesting democratic and participatory alternative for the renewal and revitalization of organizations.

11. The organization as an open system

From the perspective of the contingency approach, the structure and functioning of an organization cannot be understood apart from its interaction with specific situations or factors of the environment or context with which it operates (Bedard, 2003). Given that it is an open system, the organization is in constant interaction with the surrounding environment as established by systems theory, and must therefore be focused on such situations so that a social, economic and technological imbalance does not unbalance it, in such a way as to lead the organization into chaos.

The representative authors of this approach have sought to identify the external environment variables that have the greatest impact on organizations and to establish the relationship between these variables and the structure and functioning of the organization (Castillo, 2013). In this variant, it was considered pioneering Joan Woodward, an English industrial sociologist, whose research focused on 100 British manufacturing companies whose aim was to identify differences in their design and organizational structure. With the detailed analysis, it was found that structural variations and success of the company could not be explained to the industrial sector to which they belonged, neither for its size nor for the personality of the managers.

On the contrary, from a critical perspective on the precepts and principles proposed by Taylor and the scientific administration, the author noted that the structure of the organizations were more associated with the technology or methods and manufacturing processes that they used, with that I consider the existence of Three categories: production technology in small units and lots, technology in large quantities or mass production and production technology in permanent process (Castillo, 2013).

With this, it is emphasized that each organization has its own internal characteristics that make it different, that is why each one must look for its own adaptability, not at all to generate a change in the systematization of its processes would mean an increase in its productivity, when by its Own internal and external characteristics in what should establish a change that generates an increase of the performance or the performance of its workers (Castillo, 2013).

Conclusions

Organizations must have their own organizational designs adaptable according to the particular characteristics of each one, considering at all times their interactions with key performance factors at macro and micro levels. The level of performance desired by an organization implies becoming a learning organization, so that from the acquired learning can develop the ability to adapt to the context in which it works, even in turbulent situations.

This implies that the functionality of an organization must focus on a systemic approach so that, from the perspective of being an open system, it can best capitalize on internal and external key performance factors that allow it to position itself in a place apart, with levels of productivity capable of positively impacting the profitability of the same, the satisfaction of its staff and stakeholders that are part of its context.

Organizational learning is considered to be directly related in systems theory. Therefore, a series of strategies considered emerging by organizations should be established in order to generate competitive advantages, with the main focus being that organizations are immersed in a highly changing world.

In order to develop organizational learning, various activities must be established to acquire study, assimilate and transmit information through individual, group and organizational experiences, behaviors and processes. As a result of these actions, it allows learning, adapting and changing in the face of a turbulent, volatile and unexpected business environment.

In the staff of these organizations, there is a better development of abilities to obtain really desired results, since sharing knowledge among the work members, enriching their performance skills.

In the current context, organizational learning is highly correlated with performance. It is a strategy that allows organizations to be competitive, as they tend to improve the value of a result, the cost of the tasks, the implicit activities and the process of the resources to achieve it, recommending its application. Learning alone does not guarantee effectiveness in the results, even with this one, the results can be negative. This is of great importance for all organizations to learn through their experiences in order to grow to be more competitive at local, regional, national and global levels

Discussion of results

With the above, it is presented a horizon of performance of the organizations profiled to look for the desired performance from an organizational learning platform. The way in which the latter has been approached, does not present the different models and their main learning variables that an organization could use according to its nature and current context, so that the impact can be of importance and actions can be developed "Ad hoc" to the organization. More practical analyzes about organizational learning and their contribution to organizational performance should be developed.

Once the present study has been carried out, it can be said that learning does not always increase the efficacy of the learner (Huber, 1991: 90). Although it is true that learning does not always improve the effectiveness of the learner, it is a key factor as and organization, since it is not only composed of one, which allows to improve its performance within the market in which it competes.

HUMAN CAPITAL IN ROMANIA - BETWEEN CAPITALISATION AND DISSIPATION - A RETROSPECTIVE APPROACH OVER THE LAST CENTURY

Abstract

A century of human capital evolution in Romania, from the labour market perspective, meant the transition from the strictly quantitative approach, namely from the labour force / labour resources (due to the emergence of the unemployment phenomenon, but also the industrial relations development) to the integrative human capital one (tangible and intangible) in which skills (professional and those so called „soft") and lifelong learning are associated with technology transfer while decent and efficient employment becomes conditionality to company efficiency. The labour market was developed as the most regulated market, highly dependent on the business environment and labour demand in number and/or skills. Being related to technological transfer human capital becomes a factor of performance and development through its three dimensions: quantitative (indicators that quantify employment and labour), qualitative (the efficiency of labour as production factor and the comparative advantages of education) and behavioural (aspects of industrial relations), in both micro and macroeconomic approach. The paper aims to present the evolution and main peculiarities of the human capital in Modern Romania during the last 100 years, focussed on economy profile - competitive / market oriented (1918- 1947 and after 1989) or centralized (1948-1989). How much we gain and lost in preserving, valuing and efficient allocation of the most valuable asset of a nation? Finally, looking forward to economic, social and societal challenges we are desingning some benchmarks and select few relevant policy recommendations for responsible and accountable management of this wealth of the nation.

Keywords: human capital, labour market, education for labour market, efficiency, wealth of a country.

1. Introduction – Conceptual development of human capital in Romania

At the end of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth, the workforce was strictly considered a classic production factor, predominantly structured according to the Taylorist system and valued us such. From the perspective of human capital and of the labour market performances, Romania has experienced an accelerated process of integration in Europe. International Labour Organisation (ILO) work regulation directives created the framework for countries' labour market modernisation and its equilibrium and it was also in the concerns of the decision-makers after Modern Romania settlement in the new borders (after December 1918). The need for matching the educational system with the labour demand was mentioned for the first time in 1921: "adapting the schools to the local needs of the work element, depending on culture, age, gender, and profession, which alone accommodates and produces results, enlightening the working mass so that it can respond to the economic and social needs of time" (BMOS1920-1921, p.410).

From the labour market perspective, a century of human production factor evolution, meant the transition from the strictly quantitative approach, namely from the labour force concept to the integrative one i.e human capital (tangible and intangible). From quantitative approach – i.e number of employed persons and unemployed as main determinants of the labour supply demand, we are considering in the present also skills (professional and those so-called „soft") and adaptability potential - lifelong learning. Because competitiveness is the main conditionality for a sustainable company development, from the human capital perspective, the technological transfer is associated not only with matched employment but also with decent and efficient employment The human capital becomes a factor of performance and potential for development through its three dimensions: quantitative (indicators that quantify employment status and labour force), qualitative (the efficiency of labour as production factor, i.e productivity and the comparative advantages of education i.e skills mismatch) and behavioural (aspects of industrial relations i.e work conditions, social dialogue etc), at both micro and macroeconomic approach.

In Romania, the statistics of labour resources were recorded starting with the 1927 edition of the Statistical Yearbook and included indicators that could characterize the labour market at that time (number of collective agreements, number of the participating employees and the activity of public placement offices). Other sources of data for labour statistics were the Labour Bulletins (published by the Ministry of Labour since April 1920). Some data series are incomplete or discontinued because of various conjunctural facts (the World Wars), factors involved in the evolution of official statistics at national and European level (changes in methodologies for calculating indicators, coverage and definitions), as well as the ability to highlight new aspects belonging to the universe of labour (quantitative expression of labour emerged in different periods).

Nowadays, the indicators that measure human capital and the labour market are diversified, reflecting to a greater extent the attributes of the human factor of production - active and inactive population, unemployment, placement, collective labour agreements, international migration, employed population by activities of the national economy, earnings and graduates of all levels of education. Population and Housing Censuses are also important data sources. There have been organised seven Censuses since the Great Union. Censuses have made an important contribution to shaping the human capital development chart by producing data on the active and inactive population by gender, age group, level of education, socio-professional categories, occupational groups and activities of the national economy.

The recording of the labour market data in the various sources presented above was made according to a reasonable logic of the international regulations imposed by the ILO, which Romania ratified and transposed into national legislation, through its own legislative framework.

During the last century, the labour market functioning in Romania, the human capital activation and efficient capitalisation were strongly influenced by the property on land and assets and of the production modernisation process but maintaining significant and increasing market segmentation. The performance of companies is assessed, among other things, by the volume of exports, the efficiency of production factors and to some extent on the ownership of capital. Foreign direct investment, labor productivity and the export of high-tech products were and still are some of the major factors in strengthening an efficient business model in emerging and less developed countries.

Foreign investments in Romania have been an important source of economic and social development with a strong influence on the political life of our country. Over time, foreign direct investment has been an efficient way to offset the domestic deficit of financial resources and to support the economic growth. It played a significant role in terms of introduction of recent technologies and knowledge as background for productivity gain, competitiveness increse, job creation boosting, the promotion of modern management systems, etc.

Globalization and the creation of single market on regional level, such as the EU, play a key role in the dynamics of the component national economies, increase interdependence, generate both positive externalities (i.e. trade intensification) and negative (higher vulnerability on crises periods with negative effects on social, financial and economic sectors). From this perspective, the paper also highlights some significant elements related to the employment and human capital capitalisation in foreign-owned firms.

2. Main pillars in the development of human capital

2.1. Romania's labour force potential between 1918 and 1947

2.1.1. Establishing the unique labor market of Modern Romania, at the beginning of the XX century

The Great Union in 1918 brought along an active population of about 10.5 million inhabitants, unevenly distributed in the territory.

The characteristics of the organization of the labour market and the structure of employment in each province are summarized as follows:

a) In Bessarabia there were the so-called "Zemstvele" of crafts, implemented by the Russian administration (BMOS, 1923). They ceased to function at the time of the Great Union, which led to chaos in the Bessarabia working life. Thus, in 1923, the Law of Enlargement in Bessarabia of the Law on the Organization of Crafts, Credit and Labour Insurance of 1912, in force in the Old Kingdom, was adopted. Regarding the structure of the professions, the population of Bessarabia had the following characteristic: 75.7% farmers, 7% workers in industry and manufacturing, 6.3% workers in trade and 11% other activities (BMOS, 1919, p.28);

b) In 1900, the structure of occupation by economic branch in Banat was as follows: 71.7% agriculture, 11.8% industry, 3.7% gold and 12.8% other activities. Other information presented in the same Statistical Bulletin shows that, in Banat, the agricultural workers were the best paid, out of all the Romanian lands north of the Carpathians (BMOS, 1919, p.28);

c) Transylvania was also a specialized in agriculture territory, with 71.4% of the active population working in the sector. The following activities were important: industry (11.9%), servitors (3.8%) and trade (2.1%);

d) In Crişana-Maramureş, 70% of the total active population of 820.6 thousand persons worked in agriculture, 11.8% in industry, 3.9% were servants and 2.9% in trade and credit;

e) Since 1914, the economy of the Old Kingdom was predominantly agrarian, being dependent on the import of industrial products and technologies. Participation in economic life, or "collective effort" (Gusti D., 1938), was characterized at that time by two indicators: the active population and the passive population. The table below shows the structure of the population in terms of participation in economic life, according to the 1930 Population and Housing Census.

The active population had a significantly higher share in rural areas than urban ones (60.5% vs. 50.2%). The explanation may come from the almost exclusive occupation of rural people in the agricultural sector. Agriculture was, in those years, the most developed economic sector and absorbed a significant amount of labour resources. Agricultural exploitation was carried out on small-scale units, but also on a large scale, attracting a large workforce. Territorial analysis shows that the provinces with the highest degree of rural development were Bessarabia, Oltenia and Transylvania. In Moldavia, Bucovina and Muntenia, the active population exceeded 20% in urban areas, while in Bessarabia and Oltenia, only one in ten active people were living in urban areas. From the point of view of the human potential, the richest province was Muntenia, with 22.3% of the total population and 21.8% of the active population of unified Romania. However, the highest rate of activity was recorded in other provinces: Oltenia (62.5%) and Banat (62.2%).

Regarding the structure of employment by economic sector, in Romania 78.2% of the active population worked in agriculture and 7.2% in industry, these being the most developed sectors of the economy.

In Muntenia, workers in transport activities were more numerous than in the rest of the country. Most of the trade workers were in Bucovina and Muntenia. The highest developed economic sectors were agriculture, mining, transport, metallurgy, food and textile industries.

Industry was the second important branch in all provinces, with an employment rate ranging from 3.2% in Bessarabia to 11.2% in Banat. Public institutions were the third important economic sector, given the legislative and administrative development that Romania continued in that period.

Romania's economic development after the Great Union was primarily based on industry, by encouraging the exploitation of national resources. Following the increased interest in oil extraction, Romania was the first country to produce crude oil, in 1875 with 275 tonnes and in 1858 with 475 tonnes. In 1937, it was ranked no. 6 in the top oil producers, but with a ratio between domestic consumption and production of only 22.5%, the difference being reflected in exports (Lupu M.A. et al, 1974). Thus, although Romania was the leading producer, it was just a supplier of raw materials, fuel for the capitalist countries and the chemical industry failed to grow to the extent of expectations based on the high availability of the primary resource on the national territory.

Foreign capital exceeded 2/3 in the wood industry, 3/4 in the metallurgical industry and over 90% in the sugar, oil, gas, electricity and water industries.

These developments are associated with massive immigration flows after the Great Union i.e. the settlement of over 500 thousand foreigners (about 3% of total population), especially in large cities, which deepened the segmentation of the labour market between the sedentary population and the newcomers. The majority of Romanians spent their lives in rural areas, being employed in agriculture, while in urban areas the foreign bourgeoisie increased. Foreign capital also grew in small-scale firms in the trade and services sector. Over 90% of the enterprises were controlled by foreign capital while the labour force was a national majority (Gusti D., 1938, vol. III, p. 227).

In the statistical data sources, labour force was not identified for enterprises with foreign capital in the analysed period. However, considering that most large enterprises were based on foreign capital, the figure below shows the number of the Romanian and foreign labour force in the mining and metallurgical holdings in Transylvania during 1924-1936.

Figure 2 Number of the Romanian and foreign labour force in the mining and metallurgical holdings, in Transylvania area, 1924-1936

According to the same source, the Romanization process in the mentioned industries was accomplished by promoting national engineers in leading positions. Nevertheless, through the still dominant positions of foreign capital in the main industrial branches and against the backdrop of protectionist laws, Romania's economic development was far from its real potential. These realities have decisively influenced the structure and economic potential of Romania on property forms, with direct impact on the involved labour force. Although, as mentioned before, statistical sources do not provide information about the labour force in firms controlled by foreign capital, it is well known the tendency to violate the rights of workers and the restraint of rights and freedoms. The cultural differences between employers and employees, the lack of information on the actions of foreign entrepreneurs and the difficulties encountered by the latter on the labour market have led to the conclusion that there was a need for reform of social relation.

In the 1920s, major changes took place, the new labour market systems were implemented in Romania, including the establishment of employment offices and the legislation of collective labour agreements. At the same time, following the recommendations of the ILO, the prevention of unemployment was also in discussion.

2.1.2. Labour force potential - between activation on the labour market and migration

In international context, Romania ranked the first in 1930 in terms of activity rate, being one of the most dynamic countries in Europe. Thus, our country surpassed states such as: Russia, Bulgaria, France, Germany, Switzerland, England, Hungary and Norway. Many of these states had a more advanced economic status than Romania, but they had a much smaller share of the active population. Romania had an activity rate of 58.4% as against Switzerland 47.6%, Hungary 46.0%, Japan 45.3% and United States of America 39.8%. (Statistical Bulletin of Romania, 1938, p. 112).

International migration also represented a particularly important aspect in Romanian society at that time. To avoid imbalances between demand and supply on the labour market, it was adopted the 1925 Migration Act (Gusti D., 1938, Romania's Encyclopaedia, Vol. I, p.595). In the explanatory memorandum of this law, the issue of migration from each historic province was presented, showing that this fenomena was not so intense in the years before Great Union. A single article in the Law of Passports from 1912 was enough to regulate the migration flows in the Old Kingdom (Labour Bulletin, 1925, p. 220), which was then a country of destination and origin for workers of Balkan origin who migrated on the short term (Gusti D., 1938, Romania's Encyclopaedia of Romania, Vol. III, p.77).

The Migration Act from 1925 provided protection measures for the transport and shelter of migrants in the country of destination, especially in the context of massive repatriations at the time. After 1926, both emigration and immigration recorded significant decreases because of the post-war restrictions imposed by all states. Another important aspect was that the balance of international migration in Romania was negative until 1930, and from 1931 to 1937 the number of immigrants exceeded the one of migrants. Regarding the migration of the repatriated people, Romania was an immigration country, the number of persons repatriated to our country being 7.8 times higher in 1926 and even 10 times higher in 1935 and 1936. In the years following the economic crisis, efforts were made to ease the national labour market by placing unemployed Romanian workers in the industries in France. Dimitrie Gusti believes that this placement would have been unfavourable to the labour market because it would have officially recognized Romania's inability to use its labour resources. A measure taken by the Romanian state during this period was of active social inclusion of native persons by stimulating employment in enterprises. Many of the foreigners looking for low-skilled jobs have been repatriated. Those with key positions in enterprises or specialists have been maintained. At the same time, the state began to take measures in the education system, supplementing the number of professional schools and introducing merit scholarships abroad (Gusti D., 1938, Romania's Encyclopaedia, Vol. III, p. 78).

2.1.3. Labour market imbalances during interwar economic crisis

Due to the process of industrialization during 1920s and 1930s, comparing with other European countries, Romania was not much affected by the economic crisis of 1929-1933. It was mainly affected by the economic development cycle, faster in the early 20s, and then, starting with 1927, on a slower curve of growth, with some industries which have entered a period of stagnation. However, this evolution, which is inherent in the development of Romanian economy, overlaps with the effects of the economic crisis. From the labour market perspective, signs of disequilibria were registered starting with 1927 when, because of the stagnation in some industrial branches, the number of placements sharply dropped compared to the previous period.

The total number of unemployed in 1927 picks up around 20 thousand persons and decrease until late 1929. During crisis, the unemployment problem became more intense, being registered the largest number of unemployed in the period (49.4 thousands in 1931) (Gusti D., 1938, Romania's Encyclopaedia, Vol. III, p. 61), with an increase in the number recorded in the autumn and winter months. Subsequently, it decreased from 39.2 thousand in 1932, to 17 thousand in 1935 and 12.1 thousand in 1937.

Source: Gusti D. (1938) Romania's Encyclopaedia, Vol. III, p. 77 for period 1922-1937 and Labour Bulletin 1941, p. 116 for year 1940

On industries, the situation is different. The unemployment incidence was higher in forestry in the beginning. Afterwards, several economic activities were affected more and more: metallurgy, mining, fuel industry and trade. Factories were strongly affected starting with 1929, as well as constructions.

2.1.4. Labour relations development

The increase in the number of employees due to industrialization at the beginning of the 20th century led to the need to regulate the employment relationships between employers and workers through the collective labour contracts. Its implementation was considered a remarkable success of the workers' movement. For two decades, the contractual arrangements between the employers and the employees were based on negociation process at the company level.

A short historical overview underlines the main steps in social dialogue development:

a) In Romania, the first written source of the collective labour contract was the Orleanu Law of 1909. This law suppresses the right to associate and to strike for employees in public enterprises from industrial, economic or commercial sectors. In 1912, it was adopted the Law on the Organization of Crafts, Credit and Labour Insurances, which regulated the apprenticeship contract, the employers' regime, the craftsmen, the workers, the factory workers and the workers, the guilds, corporations, insurance against illness, accidents, old age insurance and invalidity insurance from sickness, contributions, working day length. This law abrogates the Law on the Organization of Crafts of March 5, 1902.

b) The achievement of the Great Union demanded by itself a modernization of the "relations between capital and the employees", for the integration of Romania in Europe (BMOS, April 1920-March 1921). Countries such as France, England, Germany, Hungary, Belgium, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Spain, Portugal and Turkey were already covered by the labour contract, and Romania needed to align with this trend. In 1920, the Labour Disputes Act was adopted. This was the first law applied on the entire territory of Romania and opens the series of legislative projects that will compose the Labour Code. The law introduced the compulsory conciliation or arbitration procedure for strikes or labour disputes. Arbitration decisions often materialized in collective labour agreements. Subsequently, the 1929 Labour Contract Law regulated the following types of contracts: the apprenticeship agreement (between the apprentice and the employer with a maximum of 4 years), the individual labour contract (between the employee and the employer, with special provisions regarding individual work contracts of industrial and commercial officials), team contract (between several employees and a single entrepreneur), collective labour agreement (between one or more group entrepreneurs or associations thereof and, on the other hand, professional associations or employee groups).

Data provided by the 1941 Labour Bulletin show that in 1920 most collective agreements were concluded in the food industry, i.e. 18.3% of their total, but almost three quarters of the participants were in the extractive industry. Since 1922, commercial companies have been leading in the agreement of these contracts, but almost half of the participants were in the metallurgical industry.

In 1930, the coverage of collective labour contracts at national level was insignificant, of only 0.4%, but the breakdown by industry was high differentiated. Thus, in extractive industry, 46.1% of the active persons were under collective agreements. In other industries, the percentages were much lower: 6.3% in the chemicals industry, 4.3% in the transport industry and 3.7% in the food industry. The scarcity of information and statistical data doesn't allow a wider picture of the industrial relation development in the period, but we can underline the emerging initiatives to modernise the work conditions and to develop some good working relations on company level. Also, the strikes and other collective or individual conflicts registered at courts or mediated, and the legislative framework proved the social partners involvement in labour market modernising.

With the outbreak of the World War II, the issue of labor organization in peacetime compared to wartime work was tackled. In peacetime, three aspects were concerned: tradable production, competitiveness and specialization of the workforce. In wartime, the first two aspects were in some respects irrelevant because all efforts were mainly for war industry development. The working time was regulated according to "war needs", the work payment was associated with subsistence wage, all effors were oriented to fuel the war industry in several forms: establishing quantitative limits for imported and exported goods and taking part in compulsory, requisitioned labour.

2.2. Human capital valuation in the centralized economy 1948-1989

2.2.1. Labour market reorganisation

After the World War II, under the centralised economy period (of the socialist regime), the unemployment disappeared. It was assumed that all people are social responsible to graduate at least the compulsory education and afterthat to be employed during lifetime. The full employment was considered as a success of the centralised economy, but employment efficiency measured by overemplyment remains as a forbidden discussion issue. Data on unemployment, job vacancies were no more available, therefore interrupted and will resume in the period after 1990.

The main peculiarity of the period was the higher rate of activity in the rural area compared to the urban one. In 1956, for example, 64.3% of rural residents and 49.7% of the urban ones were active in the labour market. Ten years later, due to high industrialisation process and internal migration from rural to urban areas, the rural activity rate dropped to 57.9% and in 1977, it declined by 6.8 percentage points (census data). The activity rate in urban area remains as average under 50%, partially explained by the increasing of compulsory initial education period (from 8 to 10 and, for a brief period before 1989 events, to 12 years)

Of the two categories of population by participation in the economic activity, the inactive population showed the highest volatility among the residence environments in the three censuses of this period. In 1956, nearly two-thirds (60.9%) of inactive people were distributed in rural areas, and in 1977 their proportion dropped to 55.2%. This change can be explained not only by internal mobility to urban areas and old cities development, but also by the urbanization of Romania, through changing the rural localities in small cities. The share of active (employed) persons in urban areas increased from 35.0% in 1966 to 42.4% in 1977.

Between 1950 and 1989, the structure of employment in the main activities of the national economy has some peculiarities. It is important to underline that the rate activities at that time were considered as the shares of active population in total population.

Most branches (industry, agriculture, transport, education and health) recorded the highest rate of activity at the end of the period. The public sector experienced a peak in employment at the beginning of the period, and the minimum was reached after 1985. Trade and construction peaked at the end of the 1970s.

In agriculture, the mechanisation of the working methods, by technological transfer, has partially released the workforce, being oriented to processing, construction and transport industries. At the same time, the education system was focused on vocational training and technical domains, ensuring the necessary graduates (employees) according to the specific emerging activities. This was an example of good practice in adapting the education system to the needs of the labour market, so necessary for the extensive process of industrialisation and for the proper valuing and capitalisation of domestic human capital.

The deepened process of industrialization is seconded by the capital centralisation, by the firm's dimension increasing. If in 1950 most of the enterprises (73%) were small and medium, of less than 500 workers, in 1968 highest share was of the large enterprises of over 1000 workers (39.0%). At the same time, the concentration of the labour force has increased. In 1950, there were 1136 enterprises with 549.3 thousand workers, and in 1968 there were 1104 enterprises with over 2.4 times employees (1335.5 thousand workers) (General Directorate of Statistics, 1969, p. VII).

Romania's economic growth and the engagement of a large production capacity due to industrialization led to the need of an increasing number of employees on newly created jobs. Official statistics (General Directorate of Statistics, 1969, p. X) show that 3.9% of the total number of employees hired for the first time between 1961 and 1967 were graduates of higher education, 10.3% were graduates of secondary schools (technical schools and technical schools of foremen or other medium-sized schools), 18.3% were graduates of professional apprenticeship schools and the remaining 67.5% had elementary school. Economic development and labour force allocation were reflected in the five-year plans, giving prerequisites for expanding the most efficient economic sectors, depending on existing natural and labour resources (Romania's Geographical Encyclopaedia, 1982, p. 107). The annual growth rate of the employed population was of 0.48% in the period1965-1975, and of 0.56% in 1970-1975, based mainly on the employment policy promoted at that time focused on increasing women participation on the labour market. During the third five-year plan (1976-1980), this growth rate decreased to 0.5% because of the drop in the share of the active population in the total population from 47.8% in 1975 to 46.6% in 1980. This may be approached positively because it directly reflects the intense process of automation of the main economic sectors but also negatively through the aging of the population.

The effort to industrialize and diversify the processing activities, although mainly based on extensive growth, has also resulted in sustained increases in labor productivity. The average annual growth rate of the industrial workers' productivity was of 8.5% in 1951-1968, of 7.9% in 1961-1968 and of 8.2% in 1966-1968 (General Directorate of Statistics, 1969, p. XII),

2.2.2. Education for labour market

As stated previously, the industrialization of Romania increased demand for specialized workers, diversified range of professions for economic development, including increased demand for trainers and teachers to prepare the workforce needed. Therefore, the education system was centered mainly on education for the labor market, the evolution of the students enrolled in fields of science and levels of education being constantly adapted to the development requirements specified in the five-year plans.

Starting with 1950, the data on the education system in Romania and the number of graduates of all levels of education were available. The development of formal education and the gradual increase of the average number of years spent in school had significant potential benefit on the labour market, where the demand for qualified staff was growing. During the whole period 1949-1989, the most graduates were those of lower secondary education, with an increase from 55.6 thousand in 1949 to a maximum of 526.7 thousand in 1979. Upper secondary education gradually developed, the number of graduates increasing from 100.1 thousand in 1967 to 170 thousand in 1978 and 200.9 thousand to 1986. Education statistics show that tertiary and upper secondary education have had about the same level until 1971, when the number of university graduates became more numerous.

2.2.3. Wage policy

The official data show an inconsistent evolution of the average annual growth rate of earnings, both net and gross.

Source: Authors' calculation, based on National Institute of Statistics, Earnings – annual series

The highest annual growth rates were registered in 1957 (13.2% for net earnings and 12.8% for gross earnings), while the lowest rates were registered in 1987 (0.6%) for both types of earnings.

The efforts for industrialization were secondated by wage austerity and inneficient wage policies. The full employment policy was not correlated with economic development and technological transfer, registering many situations of lack of correlation with the efficiency indicators of the human factor allocation. Labor remuneration was mainly aimed at maintaining a minimum standard of living, rather low compared to the level in other countries of the communist bloc (CAER/Comecon- Council of Mutual Economic Assistance). Decoupling wages from job content and work performance was more pronounced in the 80s when the effort to reimburse the loan from the International Monetary Fund for industrialization was emphasized.

Moreover, the wage and salary scales (both vertically on the level of education and horizontally on the professions) were administratively established. Individual performance was poorly remunerated, and only apparently was determined by technological criteria, productivity, quality of work, etc. The practice of exception in work payment favored some categories of employees, the differentiation criteria being mainly those related to the political attachment and preservation of the interests of the elite of the communist leadership, both at company level and at national level.

Increasing in-work-poverty, precarious working conditions and scarcity of consumer goods on the market has fueled discontent (lower perfoemance at workplace) and intensification of emigration (official for some ethnicities - Germans, Jews) and illegal for Romanians. Wage policy pushed up labor inequities, increasing income gap by developing and maintaining a rich communist elite and at subsistence level of the most employees, with social polarisation. In fact, during this period, the labour market was rigid, practically did not work on efficient allocation principles, and was mainly based on the quantitative principle of labour participation.

In the last decade of the analyzed period, labor remuneration reform allowed employee participation in the ownership by distribution of "companies' shares". Basically, it was a hidden form of taking over of a part of individual labour incomes, available to companies for financing current activity.

2.2.4. Industrial relations development

By the nationalization of enterprises in all productive sectors, industrialization policy, centralized planning of economic activity and, last but not least, the collectivization of agriculture, state ownership was quasi-total and industrial relations were managed by the state through trade unions, which partically did not have any functional role in regulating imbalances and at alleviating the inequities created on the labour market. Also, the social dialogue was formal, trade unons being another appendix to (unique) communist party.

Complete leverage of the market economy was missing, such as the demand and supply law, or free competition on the labour market. Against the backdrop of high social discontent (generated by both inadequate earnings and improperly working conditions and deprivation of social rights), lack of interest in performance, since 1987 there have been brutal social strikes interrupted by the police state and later culminated in a general discontent that led to the events of December 1989.

2.3. Human capital – a multidimensional production factor during 1990-2018

2.3.1. A general overview

From the perspective of labour market developments, the period 1990-2018 is characterized by several pillars:

a) Preaccession period – up to 2007 – labour market deeply reform to accommodate with competitiveness and performed industrial relation development. Most relevant evolutions are considered the following:

- Association of privatisation, economic restructuring and reform, labor force reallocation with layoffs, respectively the boost of unemployment between 1991-1992; in generally in 1990 around 20 percent of the employment was considered overemployment, as result of full employment policy during the communist regime;
- The sharp decline in real wage earnings between 1993-1995, because of reduced demand for labour (companies' reorganization was seconded by the loss of external markets and exports decreasing) and hyperinflation; asymptotic and poor performance of labour;
- Chronic emigration (about 150 thousand people in the first two years after the 1989 event) and increased migration for work flows;
- Steadily devaluation of human capital by education performance decreasing, increasing skills mismatch and incapacity to regulate through the TVET system or lifelong learning;

− Labour market inadequate reform and delayed industrial relation consistent reorganisation; lower performance of supporting mechanisms and policies for managing imbalances;

− Unionism level decreasing and imbalanced negociation power of the social partners

− Preparing for European integration, which included a negotiation chapter dedicated to social policies and employment;

− Reform of labour market specific indicators and methodologies of official statistics surveys, according to the requirements of the EU;

b) Post-accession period, characterised by crisis managing and continuing labour market reform for better responds to economic challenges – economic relunch and increasing performances, including sustainable development measures and quality of work and active social inclusion. Some initiatives are continuing the last period efforts for labour market efficient redesign and consolidation and others are related to different forms of efficiency:

1. Developing the model of human capital management; awareness and operationalization of the shift from labour force / labour resources to human capital - after 2000, including the transition from POSDRU (2007-2013) to POCU (2014-2020);
2. Managing the employment crisis following the 2008-2009 financial crisis, whose effects are still obvious on the labour market;
3. Ongoing wage and associated fiscal reform – redesign the wage scale, social contributions, etc.;
4. A spatial development of the labour market, adapting both the new challenges of labor mobility for workers and models of local business development.

2.3.2. Main developments of labour market indicators

After 100 years from the Great Union, Romania, with a resident population of 19.6 million inhabitants on 1 January 2017, shows heterogeneity of the active population at the territorial level, much more pronounced. Although it is the smallest in size, Bucharest-Ilfov region has the highest population density among all development regions (1256 inhabitants/km^2) and the active population registered in the second quarter of 2017 was almost 60% of the resident population aged 15 and over. At the opposite end, the West Region has the lowest density of 56 inhabitants/km^2, with a population of 1.8 million inhabitants, and a 49.7% activity rate. The highest rate of activity of people aged 15 years and over was recorded in the North-East region. Rates with an activity rate below the national level of 56.6% were Centre, South East and West.

The qualitative aspects of human capital and the reconciliation of the professional and competence profile with the demand on the labour market are highlighted by the structure of employment on education levels, labour productivity and the skills mismatch.

In 2004, 72.9% of people with higher education were working in the secondary sector, while in industry and construction only 23.9%. The share of people with higher education in the service sector declined in the year of accession to the EU (2007) and three years later it falls again to 74.6%, to reach 78.2% in 2016. This means that people with higher education are more likely to be employed in the tertiary sector of the economy. The share of people with secondary education in the primary sector has continuously increased between 2004 and 2013 and afterthat, in 2016 decreased by 2.8 percentage points compared to 2013. These persons are distributed evenly between the other two sectors, in 2016 working in the secondary sector 36.4% and, respectively 46.5% in services. People with a low level of education are working mainly in the agricultural sector due to the supply of low-skilled jobs. Fewer people with primary education work in the tertiary sector (12.6% in 2004 and 12.1% in 2010, the trend in recent years is rising to 17.2% in 2016), but more and more work in the secondary (14.4% in 2004, 14.8% in 2007, 15.3% in 2013 and 21.6% in 2016). This unfavourable dinamics of educational level profile in employment is mainly a result of the local economic distruction i.e. the effect of both factors - the (cheaper) import annihilates the opportunities for small domestic businesses development and because of labor migration for workers (especially for financial advantages).

The skills mismatch in formal education as against the labour market demand is highlighted by the structural employment deficit, the dynamics of vacancies vs. the unemployment rate and the demand for training for new qualifications and competences, including those integrated in the "soft skills" category. This demand has changed substantially, asymmetry through educational supply has been deepened, both as a quantitative and qualitative deficit. Moreover, the deficit on the labour market is cronicised for some strategic professions (health care specialists, engineers in high-tech industries, IT specialists etc) and is struggled by the annual migrant's contingents (graduates or young or middle-aged people already on the labour market), the stock of people outside the Romanian labour market surpassing 4 million workers.

The labour productivity per employed person was 2.9 times higher in 2014 (60.4 thousand lei / person) than in 2004 (23.6 thousand lei / person). (National Institute of Statistics, Statistical Yearbook 2017), but remains at second lowest level in EU. The activities of the national economy where labour productivity stagnated during this period are agriculture, forestry and fishing, public administration and defence, social security in the public sector, education and health. Real estate activities were the most efficient as their productivity increased 6.4 times in 2014 compared to 2004 and by 125.7 times compared to 1995. Other activities with important evolution of labour productivity are the cultural ones, the repairs of the goods in household and other services, professional, scientific and technical activities; administrative and support service activities.

To summarise for the whole analysed period, agriculture remains the lowest productive activity. Public administration and cultural activities undermined average productivity by 1998, and then outweighs average productivity per person employed level. Since 2010, trade's productivity remained significantly lower than the national average level. Moreover, low-skilled jobs have become more and more automated; the need for cognitive abilities and craft skills has decreased, while the demand for digital and communication competences is constantly expanding.

2.3.3. Labour market imbalances

The labor market imbalance, measured by the unemployment rate, ignored during the communist period, has been a preoccupation for political decision-makers after the transition to a market economy. The maximum number of unemployed persons (paid and unpaid) was registered in March 1994 – almost 1.3 million people. In June 2008 only 337.1 thousand people were registered as unemployed.

The legal framework of unemployment was reflected in the distribution of paid and unpaid unemployed persons

Meanwhile at the beginning of the period there were paid around 80-90% of the total unemployed persons, the same share of about 80% was represented by unpaid unemployed people in the year 2017. The proportion of paid and unpaid in total has been overturned starting with the year 2002, when the dedicated law has restricted the access at payment for unemployed people.

Currently two unemployment rates are registered in the official statistics. One is the registered unemployment rate and the other refers to the definition of unemployment according to ILO and is provided by Labour Force Survey (ILO Unemployment rate). Since 2004, the Labor Force Survey has highlighted a higher rate of ILO unemployed than those officially registered. The largest difference between the two rates was 2.4 percentage points in 2007 and respectively 266.5 thousand unemployed. There were two exceptions to these gaps; in the years 2002 and 2010, the registered unemployment rate was at the same level as the ILO unemployment rate.

Source: NIS, Tempo online, SOM103A and AMG157A

The evolution of unemployment does not capture:

- the human capital, which, being unable to be employed in decent jobs in Romania (good working conditions and supportive payment), is being used in other markets (as EU workers or labor migrants in non-Eu area). Their employment model is primarily multiannual and in many cases, they become permanent immigrants in host countries;
- people involuntarily leaving the labor market who have not found re-employment solutions after long-term unemployment

All these potentially active persons are present in Romania and, together with NEETs, are important resources of unused human capital

2.3.4. Employment and jobs' quality in FDI sector

As Romania's integration into international structures (NATO, EU) increased the interest of foreign investors for our country, the stable framework created, and the opportunities offered by geographical location, the low cost of labour and the availability of primary resources are the main conditions which led to an increased role of foreign capital in Romania.

In general, the presence of foreign firms has a positive impact on the economy, notably through its influence on foreign trade activity. The degree of similarity between the areas of interest of foreign capital in Romania at the beginning of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the 21st century is quite important for the historical perspective of its role in valuing human capital. According to the statistical data, 50% of the foreign capital is interested in industrial sectors, of which the processing industry, especially processing of crude oil, rubber and plastics, hold a high share. Foreign capital being well integrated in economic value chains are mainly focused on export activity- export of manufactured goods for final consumption or export of intermediate products for production.

The main push factor for FDI inflows in Romania was and remained the lower labour cost as against in the origin country of the capital.

Source: INS, NBR

Some specialists in labour market consider the FDI firms as an opportunity, an alternative solution to higher unemployment or labour migration. The comparative advanteges in FDI firms (higher wages and better working conditions) were not able to reduce or reverse the labour mobility flows, which underlined the limited potential of this employment option. However, the employment growth, higher productivity and relatively better incomes of domestic workers in firms with FDI should not be ignored.

FDI firms are using superior technology, have access to larger product markets than companies with Romanian capital, are well integrated into the value chain of production, etc. Data recorded an increase of the employment in the foreign trade companies by 30% in 2016 compared to the year before the accession of Romania to the EU (2006). Nowadays, FDI companies perform about 80% of Romania's total export of goods, based on an average of 25% of total employment.

Source: INS, NBR

Capitalization of human capital in FDI companies is therefore not only employment in quantitative terms, but primarily high-quality employment. The evolution of the employment rate in FDI companies is higher than the dynamics of the total employment rate in the period 2003-2016, the number of employees in FDI firms increasing from about 12% of the total number of employees in the economy in 2003 to over 20% in 2016. As for FDI distribution on industries, investors are oriented towards productive branches with high growth potential and profitability.

3. General comments and results

Every period has its own specificities regarding the labour market and human capital evolution. Therefore, we identified some specific pros and cons policies, according to the general framework of both types of economy: market oriented (1918-1947 and after 1989) and centralized one (1948-1989).

1. Market oriented economy in 1918-1947

Pros:

- Romania's membership in ILO conducted to modernisation of labour market policies and regulations;
- Romania had a developed economy, in which the population was employed, and the work was equally diversified and specialized in professions, the education system being adapted to the labour market needs.
- Protectionist policy produces effects on different areas: labour force, industrial production, resources, and especially external trade. The protectionism allowed: national resources to develop and create added value through goods and services for the benefits of Romanian citizens first of all, as well as for export; increasing the share of Romanian capital in certain economic activities considered strategically important. To some extent also support the native experts to be employed in technical and top staff position.

Cons:

- Massive immigration after the Great Union deepened the segmentation of the labour market; in rural areas people were employed mostly in agriculture, while in urban areas the foreign bourgeoisie developed;
- Compared with other European countries in the interwar period the national labor market is characterized by a small number of employees, and a low dynamic of institutional reform, even if there was a principled alignment to organizational requirements of the labor market, according to ILO recommendations. Practical business application of measures to reform the labor market has been sporadic and / or delayed. Compared with other European countries in the interwar period the national labor market is characterized by a small number of employees, and a low dynamic of institutional reform, even if there was a principled alignment to organizational requirements of the labor market, according to ILO recommendations. Practical business application of measures to reform the labor market has been sporadic and / or delayed. Protective policy was a common practice of the interwar period that led to unequal development of national labor markets, restricted labor movement and delayed industrial relations modernization. Foreign firms promote their own employment models, tailored to specific requirements, not always adapted to the ILO's modernization recommendations (Vasile, 1995)
- The Romanian economic nationalism, manifested in the interwar period, was characterized by: trade protectionism, substitution of imports (with tendencies towards economic autarchy); controlling and restricting external economic relations;

2. Centralized economy 1948-1989:

Pros:

- It was assumed that all people who graduate a form of formal education enter the labour market, the full employment was considered.
- Industrialisation and urbanization increased activity rate and diversified jobs, based on technical progress.
- Rational use of labour force in the context of efforts to mechanize production processes with effects on increasing labour productivity.
- Development and diversification of production and external trade, creating and preserving specific external markets, trading partners and goods.

Cons:

- The labor market was rigid, strictly regulated by the administrative allocation of labor force, which led to over-employment in some industries, and the inadequate (egalitarian) pay policy reduced the quality of work and did not stimulate performance.;
- There was a lack in applying the international regulations specific to the labour market, which were transposed in national legislation or some regulations were only formal (trade unions activity);
- The efforts for industrialization were followed by a period of wage austerity, mitigating the dynamics of the efficiency of the use of labour factor and an intensification of legal emigration for some ethnic groups and illegal emigration for Romanians. In addition, wage policy was accentuating the social polarization, with the development of a category of regime favours.
- The nationalization of enterprises in all productive sectors, centralized planning of economic activity, and the collectivization of agriculture – all led to the impossibility to support free business initiative or cooperation with foreign companies from outside od Comecon.

3. Market oriented economy during 1990-2018

Pros:

- Labour market deeply reform and consolidation, managing the supporting mechanisms and policies for managing imbalances;
- Reconsider industrial relations, social partners' reorganisation and social dialogue development and consolidation;

- EU accession, which brought along important well-known advantages for national economy the labour market opening for Romanian workers;
- Re-opening of the national economy to both FDI and external trade relations strengtening with EU trade market, with all the benefits provided by them: access through imports to technology with higher performances, high-qualified jobs, new directions for industrial restructuring with new products and services development, access to new external markets (including extra-EU ones) and diverisfying external trade partners, increased productivity at national level, etc.

Cons:

- The economic reform from early '90s was associated with layoffs, respectively the increase of unemployment;
- The sharp decline in real wage earnings between 1993-1995, due to reduced demand for labour and hyperinflation; asymptotic and poor performance of labour;
- Chronic external mobility for work, associated with low efficient policies for returning migrants;
- Devaluation of human capital because of skills and qualification mismatch; increasing gaps on skills and competences between (new) jobs demand and labour supply (graduates);
- Long-term effects on the labour market of the 2008-2009 crisis, i.e. structural and qualitative employment crisis.
- Employment chronic deficits of specialists in health care system and high level of migration flows of the graduates from upper secondary and university education;
- A very high trade market integration with EU area and increased vulnerability of export in the crisis period.
- The dependency of national exports on companies with foreign capital.
- Peference for imports into domestic consumption of goods and imports' pressure on similar or substitute national products, even with lower price but not enough developed in terms of marketing and sometimes quality, with negative impact on national companies' development.

4. Conclusions

From the information presented in this paper, it can be concluded that each period in the historical path has brought its contribution to the evolution of the human capital and the labour market. Further evolutions may follow in the context of the new global challenges of digitalization, competences development in response to technological transfer in the business environment and day-by-day life of individuals. E-employment and multi-year labour mobility and the shaped model of labor - leisure time sharing are current realities that bind to labour relation modernization and of labor market redesign for a higher level human capital capitalisation. The needs of the labour market shall be met by structural reform and increasing performance in education, through decent employment, and aditional on-the job-training in enterprises for special competences, etc. The discrepancies between the education supply (graduates) and the labour market demand are ultimately materialized through loss of human capital and of potential business added value. Moreover, because of jobs skill mismatch and/or uncorrelated wages with payment expectation of the potential new entrants, the inactivity after graduation increase the NEETs level. This became the most important imbalance in the labor market in Romania along with the in-work-poverty increasing trend and the promotion of less-favored wage policies for higher productivity.

The historical evidence shows the high potential of human capital lost mainly by labour mobility and more recently by increased NEETs contingents. Human capital is the most important potential asset of Romania and policy-makesrs should focuss political priorities to both education and decent jobs. Also, the completion and application of policy instruments, the methodologies for monitoring the insertion of the graduates shall be a priority at national level.

Nowadays, to face the future, there is a need for a more in-depth analysis of the skills that Romanian employers consider important for the success of their companies and therefore for better fitting of the educational and training supply to those requirements, for periodical upgrading of the occupational and vocational training standards and of the curriculum.

The trade relations and quality of the goods offered by Romanian capital on external market stimulate the human capital in terms of performances. To increase companies' competitiveness level, investments for technological renewal must be made in all industries and labour force is the main driver for value added growth. A close permanent correlation between educational and the labour markets could redesign the labour supply to respond in more flexible way to modern life main challenges: inclusiveness, digitalisation, quality of life.

ASPECTS REGARDING THE PROMOTION OF ECOTOURISM TO CONSUMERS

Mirela-Cristina VOICU[*]

Abstract

The environment is a key factor for the success of the tourism industry. If we consider nature a product of the tourism industry, it is obvious that the product will no longer be purchased by consumers, if it begins to have a low quality. This is why all stakeholders of the tourism business should be aware of the importance of preserving the environment and natural resources. Hence the need to promote and stimulate ecotourism consumption.

Ecotourism combines the pleasure of discovering and learning about fauna, flora, and spectacular cultural sites with educational accents, environmental, and local community benefits. Ecotourism that is properly designed and managed leads to a balance between nature conservation and the need for tourism development.

Due to growing demand, the eco-tourism market is becoming more and more diverse, so for businesses operating or seeking to operate in this market the need to know the behavior of ecotourists is becoming increasingly important in order to „manipulate" more efficiently both the ecotourist and his experience. Thus, understanding the needs and attitudes of ecotourists who spend their holidays in protected areas can contribute to the development of tourism marketing strategies and plans. In this context, the following paper reveals some important aspects regarding the characteristics of ecotourists behavior together with solutions that marketers can apply to stimulate the consumption of ecotourism.

Keywords: tourism marketing, consumer behavior, ecotourism, sustainable marketing, green marketing.

1. Introduction

Tourism specialists are assigning the emergence of alternative forms of tourism, such as sustainable tourism, cultural tourism, adventure tourism, ecotourism, etc., to the significant negative impact of mass tourism on the environment, the economy and the socio-cultural elements of society. Among the forms of alternative tourism, ecotourism is distinguished as an option to mass tourism leading to an economic development using and protecting the natural resources of an area.

The environment is a key factor for the success of the tourism industry. If we consider nature a product of the tourism industry, it is obvious that the product will no longer be purchased by consumers, if it begins to have a low quality. This is why all stakeholders of the tourism business should be aware of the importance of preserving the environment and natural resources. Hence the need to promote and stimulate ecotourism consumption.

Ecotourism combines the pleasure of discovering and learning about fauna, flora, and spectacular cultural sites with educational accents, environmental, and local community benefits. Ecotourism that is properly designed and managed leads to a balance between nature conservation and the need for tourism development.

Demand for ecotourism appeared also due to changes in the behavior of tourists who began to focus towards more individualistic, intense experiences, and as a result the consumer feels "enriched", at the expense of mass tourism. Thus, understanding the needs and attitudes of ecotourists who spend their holidays in protected areas can contribute to the development of tourism marketing strategies and plans.

2. Ecotourism and its current prospects

The tourism industry is one of the main driving forces of the global economy, playing an important role in regional and tourism destinations development. A successful tourism activity can generate significant external exchanges, population employment and many opportunities for local communities. However, despite the benefits, mass tourism has a negative long-term impact, causing environmental and socio-cultural degradation. In the process of finding solutions to balance the negative and positive effects of mass tourism, ecotourism, a symbiosis between environmental conservation and the maintenance of tourism as a profit-generating industry has been developed.

Two categories of tourism activity can be delimited. First, there is mass tourism that represents the activity of a large group of people looking for a replica of their own culture in an organized setting. In other words, mass tourism is the traditional travel in which tourists are visiting places that have a certain link with their culture (the same country or a similar country). The second form of tourism is called alternative tourism, representing tourism activity carried out in a sustainable manner. Ecotourism is one of the socially and environmentally benign alternative forms of tourism, representing, according to The International Ecotourism Society, that form of responsible tourism carried out in natural areas that protects the environment and improves the living standards of the local population.

Ecotourism is that segment of the tourism industry that attracts environmental conscious individuals, having a low impact on the environment and at the same time contributing to local economic activity. Also, ecotourism is a sustainable alternative to mass tourism involving:

- Traveling to a natural area with a traditional culture;
- Profit reinvested in local environmental protection activity and in the involvement of the local population;
- Assimilation of the principles of biodiversity conservation by the local population and tourists by minimizing the impact of visitors and promoting the education of tourists;
- Visiting relatively protected natural areas to enjoy nature.

Since the 1980s, ecotourism has become one of the fastest-growing segments in the tourism industry with an annual growth rate of 5%, reaching 5-10% of the global tourism market[1].

The main principles underpinning ecotourism are represented by:

- Non-destructive use;
- Protecting and restoring biodiversity;
- Promoting environmental sustainable development;
- Education and awareness;
- Direct economic benefits for the local population, combating poverty;
- Health and well-being for all parties involved.

Figure 1 shows how ecotourism integrates into the wider tourism market. Thus, ecotourism is a segment of tourism carried out in natural areas alongside adventure tourism, camping and wildlife tourism. In addition, ecotourism is linked to cultural and rural tourism, distinguishing itself to a certain extent from tourism developed in natural areas.

Among the ecoutourism activities we can include[2]:

- adventure activities such as rafting, canoeing, equestrian tourism on pre-arranged routes, bicycle trips on arranged trails, etc.);
- guided trips/hikes;
- trips for nature (flora, fauna) observation;
- trips for nature conservation activities;
- trips to local communities (visiting cultural objectives and traditional farms, watching traditional cultural events, eating traditional food, buying traditional non-food products etc.).

Activities that are carried out in nature but have a clear negative impact on the natural or socio-cultural environment cannot be considered as being ecotouristic activities. Ecotourism focuses on local culture, wildlife adventure, volunteering, personal development, and the assimilation of a new way of living on this vulnerable planet.

Ecotourism is not a marketing plan and it is not a scenic journey in nature, it is an approach that creates a variety of high quality tourism products, environmentally friendly or environmentally sustainable, economically viable and socially and psychologically acceptable.

The ecotourism product varies between two extremes, represented on the one hand by products focused on various elements of an ecosystem, such as the wolves of the Zarnesti reservation or the bisons within the various reserves in Romania (Slivut-Hateg Bison Reserve, ”Valea Zimbrilor” Bison Reserve etc.), and on the other hand, by products covering the whole ecosystem from a certain area (holistic products).

Romania's ecotourism potential is significant if we take into consideration the fact that our country is the only European country in which 5 (alpine, continental, panonic, steppe and pontic) of the 11 European biogeographical regions can be found, the (still!) low level of natural resources exploitation compared to other European regions, 47% of the country`s territory is represented by natural and semi-natural ecosystems with a great diversity of flora and fauna reflected by the 783 identified types of habitats in 261 analyzed areas across the country with 3700 plant species, of which 23 are declared nature monuments, 39 are endangered, 171 are vulnerable and 1,253 are rare together with 33,792 species of animals. In Romania there are 28 major protected natural areas of national interest represented by the Danube Delta Biosphere Reserve, 13 national parks and 14 natural parks, the total area of protected natural surface in Romania (excluding Natura 2000 sites) covering over 7% of the terrestrial area of the country. Along with the natural environment, Romania benefits from a rich original and authentic ethnographic and folkloric potential[3].

Despite the important tourism potential represented by various natural resources and the cultural heritage of our country, ecotourism is still under-exploited due to poor local cooperation, poor development of infrastructure for ecotourism activities carried out in the protected areas, poor promotional activities, rather limited and undiversified offer, poor staff training in the field, etc. In addition, ecotourism is an area almost unknown to Romanian travel agencies[4].

Forecasting studies show that in 2020 there will be 1.5 billion international tourism travels and Central and Eastern Europe will exceed the volume of tourism services in Western Europe. In this respect, strategic investments in tourism are being made in Romania, concentrated mainly in the Prahova Valley and Poiana Braşov, on the Black Sea coast and in the Danube Delta. Business development in tourism will, however, depend on the quality of the natural environment, representing a priority for managers and marketers from tourism companies[5].

And if we take into account the World Tourism Organization's forecasts on tourism trends within the timeframe spanning up to 2020, according to which the number of tourists concerned about environmental protection will increase, we can consider ecotourism to have a spectacular evolution during the next period. Taking this into consideration, we can conclude that studying tourists' behavior should be considered an extremely important activity by ecotourism operators. By understanding the reasons and their impact on the intentions of ecoutourists, operators can develop better offers for specific tourists' needs, and at the same time manage more effectively the relationship between product development and the environment of the ecotourism destination. Also, beyond sightseeing, opportunities for other forms of ecotourism support can be identified, such as volunteering and making donations. And last but not least, consumers can be persuaded to choose an eco-tourism product through adequate promotion.

3. Ecotourists and their behavior

According to specialists, the most important feature of ecotourism and, by extension, of ecotourists, is the protection of natural resources. Ecotourism emphasizes on the sustainable development of the environment and a responsible behavior towards the environment is a mechanism for environmental conservation. The environmentally responsible behavior of tourists contributes to limiting or preventing the destruction of the environment . Thus, behaviors such as volunteering within an environmental conservation association, adherence to ecotourism principles, and consumption of local products can give us an idea of who is a "true" ecotourist and who is not . Ecotourists are those tourists who are guided in the travel choices and their participation in those trips by the principles of ecotourism. The current ecotourist cherishes nature and a clean environment, and at the same time understands the local population and its culture. The ecotourist has a sustainable lifestyle even when traveling.

Ecotourists are individuals who show increased intellectual curiosity and seek to enjoy in depth the experience offered by the destination, being, according to some studies, mainly women , having a medium age and a high level of education and income. Also, the ecotourist is an experienced, more aware and active traveler in terms of environmental protection preferring individual tourism or in groups of up to 25 people and low-capacity accommodation. Ecotourists are individuals who visit a natural area with the intention to observe, learn and experience nature.

Also, according to studies conducted in this field in which the premises of Maslow's theory on the hierarchy of needs were applied, it is clear that the future intentions of ecotourists are motivated to a significant extent by higher needs, such as the need for self-esteem or the need for personal development (fulfillment).

On the other hand, there are marketers who consider that tourists engaged in ecotourism range from "real" ecotourists ("hard" ecotourists) to occasional tourists visiting a destination to experience something new or fashionable ("soft" ecotourists). For "hard" ecotourists, the satisfaction of participating in ecotourism activities and environmental observation has a much greater significance than the satisfaction derived from the high level of services offered, unlike "soft" ecotourists where the situation is reversed. Clearly, in this context, the approach of different ecotourists categories must be done on the basis of different marketing strategies, which does not necessarily imply the creation of sustainable tourism offers.

There are also opinions that argue that ecotourists can be divided into two groups: "born ecotourists" and "made ecotourists". "Born ecotourists" are those visitors who have an internal predisposition to in-kind travels, while "made ecotourists " are those visitors who are not familiar with this type of tourism but can be involved in ecotourism through an effective marketing activity. This classification points to the fact that even tourists unfamiliar with ecotourism can participate in eco-trips and can thus be called eco-tourists. In addition, the likelihood of identifying themselves with the concept of ecotourism will increase.

Experts in the field even argue that there is little evidence to suggest that the notion of ecotourist is qualitatively different from that of a mass tourist in terms of motivation to choose ecotourism over other forms of tourism.

The Master Plan for National Tourism Development in Romania 2007-2026 states that the number of foreign ecotourists who visit our country ranges from 10,000-25,000. Also, in 2014, the vast majority of tourists accommodated in the accommodation facilities of the Ecotourism Association of Romania - AER members (data from a number of 15 hostels) came from Romania (55%), Great Britain (13%), Germany (7.3%), France (3.5%), etc. with an average stay of 2.41 days/tourist. In the same year, the majority of tourists participating in the programs offered by AER members (data from a total of 20 tour operators) came from Romania (22.5%), Germany (21.4%), Great Britain (21.1%), Austria (3.0%), Belgium (5.6%), Switzerland (2.5%), Hungary (2.0%), etc.

In our country, however, a passive and casual ecotourism is practiced by "mass tourists" as part of a holiday with different objectives. Thus, the categories of tourists visiting Romania's national/natural parks are represented by: weekend tourists, tourists practicing religious tourism, tourists practicing sport fishing, mountain tourists, adventure tourists, researchers, pupils, students (scientific tourism), cyclotourists, etc. The vast majority of Romanian tourists are not interested in adopting a sustainable lifestyle or in supporting tourism products in this category.

4. To do's in marketing regarding eco-tourists' behavior

The marketing applied in the field of ecotourism falls within the category of social marketing, given that in practice this approach is an attempt to mediate between tourists' preferences and the long-term interests of the host community. In the category of tools and strategies commonly used to boost sustainable tourism consumption, such as eco-tourism, we can usually find rewards, eco-certification, awareness and educational campaigns[6].

The success of marketing in ecotourism is reflected not by the number of tourists visiting a particular destination but by the level of consumer satisfaction and their intention to return in the future[7].

Information is essential for the success of the ecotourism industry. In order to choose the destination to which they want to go and the various services they wish to purchase (accommodation, transport, activities and routes, etc.) consumers need information. On the other hand, in order to develop a sustainable tourism-oriented consumer behavior, organizations from various relevant sectors need to carry out a sustained marketing activity aimed at educating the public on environmental conservation and ecotourism. Communication technology is so advanced these days that environmental education, the content and spirit of ecotourism can be easily propagated in the online environment, on TV and in the press.

Also, the marketing activity in this field should be focused on the development and promotion of holistic ecotourism products. In this regard, an essential component must be integrated into ecotourism products represented by consumer learning opportunities varying in intensity and formality, from suggestive signs to lectures and printed materials containing, among other things, aspects related to the impact of tourists' behavior on the visited ecosystem, with a transformative effect on their behavior. In addition, the process of informing and educating consumers on the environmental consequences of tourism consumption will be centered on the tourism product. In other words, it is important to focus on promoting specific positive consequences of the consumption of certain ecotourism products and the negative consequences of the consumption of alternative non-responsible products rather than a presentation of the consequences of tourism consumption in general[8].

Information is particularly important in the process of ecotourism product consumption, providing it through professional or local guides, informative leaflets, explanatory maps, etc. is ensuring the ecotourist's high satisfaction and increased likelihood of returning to the destination and, moreover, recommending the destination to other consumers. Of these, the use of guides is especially distinguished by the fact that they fulfill multiple roles in the ecotourism product consumption (information provider, behavior model, etc.). Using the services offered by a tourist guide in ecotourism can increase the awareness, knowledge, the formation of positive attitudes and participation intentions of ecotourists. Travel guides should be considered key intermediaries between ecotourists and the environment, having a significant role in shaping consumer behavior.

Information also covers specific aspects of the activity of entrepreneurs which are providing ecotourism services. They need to consider effectively delivering messages explaining the objectives of their environmental policies to help consumers better understand the idea behind the entrepreneur's green activity or to build a good reputation and an environmental profile for the company. In addition, it is a good idea for managers of such organizations to remind consumers of their social responsibility to protect the environment, beyond the pursuit of satisfying their personal needs and desires[9].

While research in the field highlights the negative impact of the lack of information about the visited destinations on consumer behavior, however, a simple increase in the level of information will not cause significant changes in consumer behavior, taking into account that, paradoxically, the ecotourism offer is much more expensive and often considered as being rather uncomfortable in relation to mass tourism[10]. Along with passive information whose role is to inform about the overall impact of tourist behavior on the environment, it is necessary to include those elements that trigger consumer feedback. These elements can take the form of incentives to reward the tourist for his expected sustainable behavior, or the form of experiences designed to create social norms for the expected ecotourist behavior. People's involvement in activities with a direct impact on the destination ecosystem, such as, the greening campaigns organized in certain tourist areas stand out amongst the social experiences with great effect on consumers. These campaigns can be organized with the help of environmental associations, school ecoclubs and tourism associations.

On the other hand, feelings are a key element of consumer buying and consumption experience, with an impact on how they evaluate tourism products. Positive feelings testify to the benefits of consumed products/services. In the context of tourism activity, destinations generate positive feelings for tourists and genuine experiences create positive impressions. Tourists' experiences are to a certain extent related to the expectations regarding the destination they are visiting, and after the visit they will remain with memories. This experience influences tourists on a cognitive and emotional level, which leads to a positive behavior towards the environment. Marketing research specialists have noticed that changes in tourists' behavior are related to the knowledge and affection regarding tourist destinations. From this point of view, we can affirm that tourists' overall experience has an impact on their attitude towards ecotourism and, consequently, towards environmental behavior. A satisfactory ecotourism experience, the perceived value of the tourism product and the involvement in various ecotourism activities can lead to an increasingly responsible behavior towards the environment, as well as an increase in concern and sensitivity to environmental issues.

Changes in individual behavior regarding the environment can be initiated through eco-education, and personal experience and participation in environmental protection can promote responsible behavior towards the environment. In this sense, it is useful to organize actions to support ecological clubs, including the ones in the vicinity of protected areas in order to form ecological mentalities, leading ultimately to the participation in ecotourism actions and promotion of the ecotourism phenomenon.

Also promoting ecotourism can be done successfully even through ecotourists. Taking into account that tourism in general and ecotourism in particular are regarded as social phenomena, it is considered that once ecotourists adopt a certain sustainable behavior, they share it within the group of friends/acquaintances they belong to[11].

The transformation of the tourists' behavior into ecotourism behavior is an extensive and long-lasting process and in its development many actors must be involved - the administrations of protected areas, county, municipal and communal authorities, the school inspectorate and schools, tourism services providers from the areas near the ecotourism objectives, tourism agencies, etc.

On the other hand, bearing in mind that the basis of ecotourists' motivation is a superior need, ecotourism operators will have to develop marketing strategies aimed at a long-term relationship with them.

5. Conclusions

The real challenge for eco-tourism marketing is not primarily to develop a strategy to attract as many tourists as possible, but rather to educate tourists in the spirit of responsible consumption, consumption that follows the principles of sustainable development. To this end, it is necessary to introduce elements such as guided activities, leisure facilities development, maintenance of destination's environmental quality and providing an authentic ecological experience.

Also, the ultimate goal of any tourism marketing activity should be to protect the environment of the tourist destination through a positive interaction between all involved, resource managers, tour operators, local population and tourists.

THIRD-COUNTRY MIGRATION TO THE EU: BETWEEN NORMATIVE EUROPEAN FRAMEWORKS AND NON-EUROPEAN IMMIGRANTS' PERSONAL EFFORTS

Demir ABDULLAH *

Abstract

European leaders' rhetoric on third-country migration ranges from a discourse extolling the benefits of a United Europe, to one upholding Europe's repute as a bastion of fundamental human rights, to yet another one out of which the continent emerges as a repressive fortress. Third-country migration not only engages the EU's efforts, but also those exerted by non-EU immigrants towards integrating and becoming more open to their European host culture. This paper will be focusing both on the EU's commitment to honing its third-country migration policies, as well as on the non-EU immigrants' potential and limitations when it comes to their assimilation/integration into EU countries, in particular, Romania.

Methodologically this paper uses the content analysis of European leaders' discourses and also the qualitative analysis of data collected from 40 interviews carried out with non-EU immigrants into Romania. Another methodological tool will consist in an analysis of official EU documents. What will be pursued is the way in which the EU official documents reflect the shared interest proved by European leaders concerning the immigration processes. It will touch upon how the integration processes reclaims on the one hand permanent exchanges between the host European society and non European immigrant and on the other hand sustained efforts from these two parts in order to meet their needs and recognise their limits, in terms of economic, professional and social resources.

1. Introduction

Cultural diversity represents an element based on which the EU defines itself. The unity within diversity that is specific to the EU now represents, despite the cultural differences, the unity between EU members, and it crystallizes due to the values that are shared at the collective level such as the respect for human rights and for fundamental liberties, for democracy and for the rule of law. These values generate in turn, through the processes of socialization, European attitudes and behaviours. On various occasions, European leaders remind people about the values that stand at the basis of the EU, but also about certain moments that have configured the union: freedom, solidarity and diversity; Magna Carta, The Bill of Rights, The French Revolution, the Berlin Wall.[1] In turn, in Article I-2 from the Treaty that was constructed to be a Constitution for Europe but which was taken over by the Treaty of Lisbon, it is mentioned that: "The Union is founded on the values of respect for human dignity, freedom, democracy, equality, the rule of law and respect for human rights. These values are common to the Member States..."

In the attempt to describe and explain heterogeneous human societies from a cultural point of view, a series of concepts have been put forward among which: pluralism and assimilation. Pluralism asserts that multicultural states have accommodation at their basis, in other words the practicing of interaction between people from different cultures[2]. On the other hand, assimilation develops based on a project that favours cultural homogeneity around a national culture and identity, cultural differences being annulled[3].

The processes of immigration of non-European citizens have determined important debates within the EU regarding its role but also its resources in articulating a coherent and adequate policy regarding the extra-Community immigration. The debates that have taken place especially within the context of the refugee crisis from the last few years (over 2,5 million asylum requests have been submitted in the 2015-2016 period)[4], also emphasize the shortcomings of the EU in offering both immediate and long-term answers regarding the waves of immigrants from third countries. On the other hand, the extra-Community immigrant is confronted with a double challenge: on the one hand the demands on the European job market and on the other the European cultural values, which most often are fundamentally different from their fundamental baggage of traditions and values.

Social integration, in the broader sense, represents a social process that presupposes interactions between the side that is integrated and the side that is integrating, the final purpose being of establishing a functional relation between the two sides.[5] According to the specificity of the sides that are being integrated (individuals, groups, communities, social subsystems) the integration can be professional, urban, and societal. In a restricted sense, when one treats the relation between an individual and the medium where the integration is taking place (group/community/society), one should distinguish between systemic and social integration. Systemic integration presupposes the learning of the rules of the game whether it is about the new living context (political and civic integration) or about language, without which economic integration cannot take place. Social integration, on the other hand, presupposes from the individual who is being integrated that they be aware of the differences specific to other individuals who come from other cultures and that they establish interactions with the latter, interactions based on acceptance and permanent exchanges. These interactions between individuals belonging to different cultures specific to plural societies, represent the basis for the formation of new identities, different from the ones that the individuals had before being integrated in the new social structures. At an ideal level, for an individual to function in the new social structure where they decide to integrate, the two types of integration should complement each other: on the one hand respecting the rules from the host society and learning the language of communication (systemic integration) and on the other hand accepting the cultural differences and configuring a new identity based on the already existing one (social integration).

In the demonstration of this paper we will take into account the fact that the process of integration presupposes a permanent interaction between the society that integrates and the extra-Community immigrant who is integrating with the purpose of developing a functional relation between the two sides. In the first part we will analyse how the EU has treated extra-Community migration in its normative system. To this end, we will diachronically present the main documents (communiqués, reports, decisions, etc.), which translate the preoccupations of the European leaders regarding extra-Community migration but also the analysis of certain debates form 2015 on the topic of migration and asylum. The second part of the paper will concentrate on the content analysis of the data obtained as a result of conducting 40 structured interviews with non-EU immigrants from Romania, carried out during October 20017 – February 2018 in Bucharest with women and men between the ages of 18 and 65, of different professions and levels of education. The content analysis focused on the human and professional resources that the non-EU immigrant is willing to invest in order to integrate but also on the professional and cultural limits that hinder their process of integration.

2. A Fortress Europe Versus a Responsible, Sympathetic Europe, True to the Values That It Is Founded On

After the crisis triggered by World War II, the markets were experiencing the need for workforce, so that this is the moment that also marks a process of territorial mobility for the citizens of a country onto the territory of another country. Thus, the immigrants who were coming from southern EU countries but also from countries outside the EU, were responding to the need for workforce at the regional and international level, and on the other hand they were responding to the personal need of improving one's own and/or their families' living conditions. The immigrants preferred countries where the living conditions were superior to the one from their country of origin. As a result, the immigrants from former European colonies received with open arms the new migratory policy and immigrated to Europe with their families. After the boom of the previous years, a series of changes intervene namely, the 70s bring the petrol crisis and imbalances on the workforce market, materialised in high unemployment rates. Western and Northern Europe impose new conditions for immigrants from the south and for those outside the continent. Not only does the number of immigrants decrease, but the policy regarding migration changes as well. The societies become more and more plural, and the workforce market becomes more flexible and specialised. Were immigrants ready for the new specialisations that appeared on the job market, for the new plural societies? Unlike in previous years, for an immigrant to integrate in the new society, work was no longer sufficient, moreover, not any type of work. Beside these aspects, the process of immigration also involves the immigrant's willingness to adapt to the new plural societies, in other words to socialise in accordance with the values of plural societies. With the arrival of the 80s, the economy becomes increasingly globalized, the job market increasingly specialized and societies increasingly plural. The Communist block from Eastern Europe, with countries encapsulated inside their borders, is disconnected from the circuit of migratory movements from within or from outside the EU. However, the end of the 80s marks a landmark given by the implosion of the Communist regime from Eastern Europe. After the terrorist attacks from 2001 but also after those that took place on the European continent, migratory processes become an independent variable of the security equation, determining states and transnational structures to adapt their migratory policies to new challenges.

The cooperation within the EU regarding migration can be understood in relation to functionalist and intergovernmental theories that explain and describe the process of European integration. Functionalists and neofunctionalists [6]put forward the idea that the federation/confederation would be a coherent form of functioning for the EU, by creating inter-dependencies with the EU at the economic and political level, by having a close cooperation between the national and the supranational. According to this perspective, European cooperation in matters of migration is a must since the states have limited capacities to control immigration. Inter-governmentalism[7] explains the cooperation within the EU as a response to external stimuli but also to certain political constraints from within the states. The engine of cooperation from the intergovernmentalist perspective is represented by the freely consented agreements, the constant debates between the representatives of the states and the institutional forms are more permissive and more flexible than the transnational ones which are specific to the functionalists. Extra-Community migration represents in this intergovernmental optics both an external challenge for the EU and a problem that appeared as a result of the constraints at the level of internal politics.

The debates in the past few years from the European Parliament regarding migration and asylum are divided, in certain cases finding themselves at opposite ends.

On the one hand, what is being shaped is a union true to its own principles, a sympathetic, responsible, moral Europe that has political stands and policies that are adapted to the crises triggered by the humanitarian catastrophes from Syria and other countries that have been permanently marked by wars. This type of responsible, sympathetic, moral Europe fits more with the model proposed by the functionalist theories.

The commissioner for Migration and Home Affairs, Dimitris Avramopoulos considers that only a responsible, unified, sympathetic Europe can be the solution for the extra-Community migration phenomenon[8].

"The answer to these challenges is definitely not 'Fortress Europe'… When it comes to Migration and Home Affairs if we do not move together as a Union, we will not move at all…More solidarity is needed and this is possible only if Member States trust each other and assume also their responsibilities…Being there, as a United Europe for people who face persecution and danger in our inflamed regional environment is not only a moral responsibility for Europe, but a real promise for Europe's position in the world."

Malin Björk considers in turn that articulated, community oriented and responsible actions are nothing more than a logical extension of a Union that is true to the values on which it was founded.[9]

"[T]he response to the catastrophes in the Mediterranean is about what kind of societies we are building for the future. Are we going to turn people against each other – as the PPE just did – or are we going to have politics, economics, social and human rights that actually bring us into the future together? That is the choice we have to make. That is why the Council conclusions, I would say to Mr Tusk, are nothing less than shameful because they do not focus on saving lives and opening this continent to people seeking refuge. Instead they focus on keeping people away. Therefore the response of this House is especially important."

Guy Verhofstadt emphasises in turn the importance of cooperation with the purpose of finding European solution, to "European problems".[10]

"The Commission has, in fact, taken a stance that is absolutely necessary because it promotes the interest of all, rather than focusing on single Member States, and that is what we have to do to tackle this problem. We cannot continue to say it is only the Italians who have to do their job; we cannot say it is the European Union which is at the source of this problem. What we need is a European solution to a European problem".

Cecilia Wikstrom reminds us about the moral responsibility that Europeans have towards people from other continents who are confronted with threats, violence and the lack of resources:[11]

"To give asylum to people who run from wars, conflicts and human rights violations, this is not about generosity. It is a duty that the 28 Member States have taken upon themselves to respect by means of international rights. The EU has succeeded in building a Monetary Union. We are now on the verge of building a Union of Energy. When are we to build a Humanitarian Union as well?"

On the other hand, another series of discourses contain messages that translate the hiatus between "them", extra-community citizens, and "the others", European citizens. These discourses propose as a solution a fortress Europe which "protects" Europeans against the wave of refugees and extra-Community immigrants and which considers that each Member State has the freedom to decide on the number of immigrants/refugees it can receive within its territory. The prevalence awarded to national states and not to supranational structures, positions this perspective of a fortress Europe closer to the intergovernmental theories. This type of discourse presents the EU as a community of citizens that has to be "defended", "protected", a community that does not have the necessary resources to be able to respond to the demands of the immigrants and refugees from its borders.

Kristina Winberg, for example, considers that each Member State should have the freedom to decide regarding the immigrants/refugees who enter its territory.

"I support the principle that each Member State should have the unconditional right of deciding who comes on its territory and who does not. We must first of all protect the population against terrorism and each country must be able to protect its democratic system, its system of social care." [12]

The prevalence of national states over transnational structures is reflected in the discourse the MEP Udo Voight as well:

"…the supranational principles should not be imposed on the rights of Member States. Refugees should not endanger the systems of national states."[13]

Jussi Halla-aho considers that economic resources are limited and that a better solution would be an approach that is more realistic and more concentrated on the needs of the EU Member States.

"The question is: can Europe indefinitely afford, economically or socially, a massive influx of people for whom the European labour market has very little to offer?"[14]

Nigel Farage[15] associates immigrants/refugees from third countries with disaster and considers that closing the borders can be a solution for European citizens to be safe.

"[I]f the message is that anybody that comes will be accepted, we are headed for disaster."

3. The European Normative Frame That Translates The Eu Interest Regarding Migration And Asylum

The EU has gone through several stages that translate its interest to respond to the challenges that have been generated by the processes of extra-Community immigration. A first stage was that which would last until 1986 when the policy regarding the extra-Community migration in the EU was mainly a responsibility of the national governments which, as a result of dialogue, decided upon the security measures at the EU borders, the movement of goods, capital and individuals. The year 1986 marks the second stage when one could notice a tighter communication between EU governments, this being evidenced by the constitution of the Ad-hoc working group regarding immigration. The year 1993 marks a third stage regarding the community efforts to treat immigration as a phenomenon that is of common interest for the EU states, as it can be observed from the Maastricht Treaty. Pillar III presupposes an intergovernmental communication with the purpose of offering European citizens protection in a space of security and freedom. Among the objectives included in Pillar III one also finds combating illegal immigration, border safety, and asylum policy. In order to achieve these desiderata, what was needed was cooperation between governments whose efforts were complemented by the activity of supranational structures such as the European Commission and the European Parliament, which were consulted regarding certain issues. The Treaty of Amsterdam marks the beginning of the fourth stage of the EU attempts to treat European problems such as immigration and asylum in a communitarian way. This is also the reason why the policy regarding migration and asylum is included in the communitarian pillar I. The EU Council decides that starting with 2005 decision-making regarding EU policies in relation to legal immigration will be done by means of voting with a qualified majority[16].

In Dublin, in 1990, the EU states signed the intergovernmental accord through which they decided that only one member state is responsible for the examination of an asylum request according to which the asylum-seeker receives or not the residence permit[17]. In the case where the asylum-seeker does not fulfil the criteria, the state's refusal is valid for the other states as well. There were seven years needed for this accord to become compulsory.

In 1999, EU leaders participated at the Tampere Summit in Finland where they established lines of action for a communitarian response to the phenomena of non-EU citizen immigration. The necessity of a communitarian approach was needed since the immigration of non-EU citizen had increased in frequency and intensity, and it could not be treated in isolation or avoided. Among the lines of action a first step that was established was that of harmonising national legislations and of creating a common European system regarding immigration and asylum. To support these desiderata it was necessary to have partnerships with the immigrants' countries of origin and of transit but also to revise the EU policy regarding the rights and obligations of non-EU immigrants. The principle that they started from was that a coherent integration policy can only be created if third country immigrants who have a legal residence permit on the territory of Member States benefit from rights comparable to those enjoyed by European citizens[18].

The EU continues in the same direction of consolidating its policy so that, domains that regard asylum and migration are transferred to the communitarian pillar I (from the intergovernmental pillar III) along with the Treaty of Amsterdam. The Laeken Summit from December 2001 reaffirms the necessity of a common policy in terms of immigration, especially regarding data exchange, managing migratory fluxes, establishing common norms for receiving and reuniting a family, as well as programmes for fighting against discrimination and racism.[19] In 2003, the Council of the European Union publishes three directives in matters of immigration and asylum.[20] The first, entitled the Directive regarding the minimum standards for reception, emphasises the necessity to adjust the legislation for the creation of a common European system for asylum, in other words a legal system that would clarify the common minimum condition for the reception of asylum-seekers. The second directive has as a purpose to clearly establish the necessary steps for immigrants from third countries, who are legally settled in EU countries, to reunite their families. The third directive proposes a set of criteria based on which a non-EU immigrant can obtain the status of long-term resident within an EU state, but also the residence conditions in other Member States (not the same as the ones that have awarded residence). The Dublin Regulation II[21] of 2003 returned to the decisions regarding the 1990 intergovernmental accord in order to clarify which Member State has the assignment to treat the asylum requests presented by a citizen of a third country. To avoid overlaps and abuses it was reaffirmed that only one Member State is responsible for the examination of an asylum request. Moreover, another Regulation entitled Dublin III was signed in 2013 in order to adjust the ambiguities which appeared as a result of the application of the provisions included in the previous regulations.[22] The year 2003 is a prolific one regarding common decisions in matters of migration and asylum, so that at Thessaloniki, in June, the leaders who gathered at the European Council reaffirmed the necessity of developing a common European policy regarding asylum and migration. It was reiterated that a European frame cannot be functional without the states assuming responsibility for the implementation of integration strategies for immigrants. Furthermore, it was established at Thessaloniki that each year the European Commission will present a report with the purpose of monitoring the progresses but also the shortcomings of the EU policy regarding extra-Community migration.[23] In 2004, the European Agency for the Management of Operational Cooperation at External Borders (FRONTEX)[24] was created. FRONTEX has aimed to secure the act of immigration but also the EU borders. Among the actions undertaken we have technical assistance and expertise given to states that have external borders and which are directly confronted with illegal immigration. For example, according to statistics, between 2015 and 2016 the Agency managed 2,3 million people who were trying to illegally cross EU borders. [25] Despite the Agency's intentions to secure the act of immigration in and of itself, illegal routes towards the EU are increasingly used and risky for immigrants,[26] with 2030 people losing their lives just at the beginning of 2017.[27]

The Hague Programme adopted by the European Council in November 2004 reaffirms the need of a higher coordination of Member States but also of the EU initiatives regarding the process of integrating non-

EU immigrants.[28] It is decided that clear action principles are needed since they are necessary both in future policies but also in evaluating the steps that the states and the EU will take in the efforts of integrating non-EU immigrants. Within the same programme, the Commission is also invited to present a plan regarding legal migration until the end of 2005. A first step to this end is the Commission's publication of the Green Charter regarding the manner in which economic migration was treated. The Commission emphasises the necessity of a direct proportionality between the admission procedures for immigrants and the measures taken by the EU and the Member States with the purpose of integrating them. The Council for Justice and Home Affairs adopted in 2004 the fundamental common principles regarding integration, principles that have as a central pillar the promotion of fundamental rights, of non-discrimination and of equal chances. Thus, the Council established a set of principles of action which ascertain that: integration is a dynamic, bi-directional process of reciprocal adaptation from behalf of all immigrants and residents of Member States; integration involves the respect for the fundamental values of the European Union; workforce occupation represents a key part of the integration process and is a central point for immigrant participation, for the contributions that immigrants bring to the host country and to make these contributions visible; fundamental knowledge regarding the language, history and the institutions of the host society is indispensable for integration; allowing immigrants to acquire this basic knowledge is essential for their good integration; efforts in the field of education are vital for training immigrants, and especially their descendants, to become active members of society; immigrants' access to institutions, as well as to private goods and services, in a manner equal to that of national citizens and non-discriminatory is a vital element for a better integration; the frequent interaction between immigrants and citizens of Member States is a fundamental mechanism for integration; forums for information exchange, inter-cultural dialogue, education regarding immigrants and their cultures and stimulating living conditions in urban areas intensify the interactions between immigrants and citizens of Member States; practicing different cultures and religious is guaranteed by the Charter of Fundamental Rights and has to be defended as long as these practices do not enter in conflict with other inviolable European rights or with national laws; the participation of immigrants in the democratic process and in formulating integration policies and actions, especially at the local level, supports their integration; the inclusion of policies and actions regarding integration in all policy portfolios and at all levels of government and relevant public services represents an important factors in forming and implementing public policies; the development of some clear objectives, indicators and mechanisms of evaluation is necessary to adjust policies, to evaluate the progress regarding integration and to exchange information more efficiently.[29] Member States are encouraged to integrate The Basic Principles in their integration policies, but each state had the freedom to manage their actions in accordance with their priorities. In 2008, the European Parliament voted the Blue Card directive for immigrants with higher professional qualification, with the purpose of proposing more flexible conditions for obtaining the paperwork for citizens from third countries who had a legal work contract in a EU country. This represented a step in the promotion of integration based on the immigrant's skills, on the capitalisation on his/her potential.[30] A year later, the EU proposed two more instruments namely the European Integration Forum and the European Website on Integration.[31] The Stockholm Programme[32], published at the end of 2009, replaces the Hague Programme and defines in its seven chapters the direction regarding immigration and asylum for the next five years. The emphasis is directed towards a Europe of citizens, secure, protective and responsible. The Council proposes policies regarding integration focused on immigrant participation, on respecting their rights but also policies for combating illegal immigration. In 2011, on the occasion of the presentation of the European agenda for the integration of immigrants from third countries, the Commission mentioned that the EU had fulfilled the actions provided by the Common agenda for integration from 2005. Furthermore, the EU considers that a new European policy is needed for the integration of immigrants from third countries, a policy that takes into consideration access to work places, a better cultural insertion, and more flexible procedures for awarding citizenship. The Commission thus proposes integration actions through participation, more actions at the local level but also the involvement of the immigrants' countries of origin. They also tried to bring out the professional and cultural resources of immigrants, to this end immigration being approached as a means of capitalising on the migration's potential both from an economic and cultural point of view.

The number of refugees and extra-Community immigrants has increased more and more as a result of the war in Syria, of the Iraq conflict, and of the African humanitarian crises. After the tragic events from the Mediterranean Sea from 2015, the European Commission presented the European Agenda on Migration[33] where one can find immediate actions but also medium and long-term ones regarding migration and asylum. Among the immediate actions we can name: tripling the capacities of the Frontex, activating an emergency mechanism to help Member States that are confronted with an unexpected influx of immigrants, a European system for permanent relocation and military operations in the Mediterranean Sea with the purpose of combating human trafficking. In regards to medium and long-term structural changes, the EU has proposed: reducing economic stimulants for illegal immigrants, saving lives and securing external borders, a solid policy regarding asylum, and a new policy regarding the domain of legal migration.

In February 2016, the Commission presents a Report[34] regarding the actions that the EU undertook in accordance with the duties taken on within the Agenda, namely the re-establishment of order on the Eastern Mediterranean and Western Balkan route, the support offered to states for controlling unregulated migration, the actual access to asylum procedures for people who need international protection, decision regarding the access points and transfer points. The European Council from March of the same year concluded that there is a need to reform EU policies, in other words more attention needs to be given to humanitarian problems and efficiency needs to exist regarding asylum policies. The EU considers that its instruments are limited and decides to adequately equip itself especially in crisis situations in order to ensure an equitable treatment of immigrants from third countries. It is mentioned that it is important to look at the immigrants' potential, at their contribution to the economic and cultural development of the EU. The new instruments aim at a higher order, assuming solidarity and responsibility at the level of all Member States. The Commission's Report[35] from April proposes a set of actions meant to make the EU actions for migration and asylum to be more efficient, actions that have to be centred on the real causes of immigration and on the capacity of attracting talents and skills. It is emphasised that without ensuring participation and support for integration in the community where the immigrant resides, the immigration and asylum policy remains void of content. Among these actions we can mention: a sustainable system and more clarity when deciding which Member State has the responsibility of examining asylum requests, a new regulation regarding common asylum procedures, combating unregulated movement, a new mandate for the EU Agency for Asylum, combating illegal immigration and ensuring the protection of the immigrant.

In September 2017, the Report was presented regarding the progresses recorded after the implementation of the actions decided starting with 2015[36]. Better results were recorded at the level of managing borders, at the level of reception points (hotspots) which allowed the registration and the taking of the digital fingerprints of all immigrants at arrival, the transfer mechanisms, more solidarity among EU states. One could be observe that efficiency in the area of migration and asylum policy is directly related to solidarity and to a better coordination between the actions of Member States. Also in 2017 there were a series of documents representative for the Commission that were presented such as "Migration on the Central European route", "A new approach regarding the collaboration with countries of origin and of transit regarding cooperation in matters of migration", "The renewed plan of action of the EU regarding the return policy", "The protection of migrant children". As it was presented in the discourse regarding the "State of the Union" as well, it is necessary for the efforts in the domain of migration to continue coherently and sympathetically, by maintaining the spirit of reason which has consecrated the foundation of democracies since, as state by Jean Claude Junker: "Europe is not and it must never become a fortress. Europe is and has to remain the continent of solidarity where people who are running away from persecution can find refuge"[37].

4. The Efforts Made By Turkish Immigrants To Integrate Themselves In The Romanian Society

Previously, we have succinctly emphasised the efforts made by the EU to manage the institutional, organisational and administrative shortcomings in its policy regarding extra-Community migration but also the efforts made regarding the integration of extra-Community immigrants. This paper also focuses on the efforts made by immigrants in the process of their integration. The social and systemic processes of integration are not unidirectional. In order for a functional relation to exist between the side that is being integrated (the non-EU immigrant in the present case) and the side that is integrating (EU states), both sides suffer changes and make efforts. There are cases where the immigrant is not open or he/she resists the efforts made by the host societies in offering them the possibility to exercise social, cultural, economic, civic and political rights, according European and international treaties. Conversely, despite the openness proven by the immigrant towards learning, developing social relations with the citizens of the host society, the latter might treat the former as second-rate citizens even though they hold professional and social skills.

This part of the paper is dedicated to the attempt to point out the potential, skills, limits but also the efforts made by Turkish immigrants in Romania. I conducted fieldwork during November 2017-February 2018, during which I interviewed Turkish immigrants who reside in Bucharest, Romania. The interview guide followed: the reasons for which Turkish immigrants decided to choose Romania, the efforts made by Turkish immigrants to become integrated, the professional and cultural resources that they have, the representations that they have about democratic values, the relation between the efforts made and their desire to become Romanian/European citizens.

I have interviewed 43 people out of which 13 women and 30 men, with an average age of 38. Out of these, 24 have undergraduate studies, 8 have post-graduate studies, 8 have a high school education and 3 a middle-school education. Out of the 13 women, 7 have undergraduate and post-graduate, 4 have a high school education and 2 a middle-school education. In regards to professional mobility what can be noticed is an ascending vertical mobility for 15 of those interviewed who had a student status in Turkey and who became teachers, tourist agents, administrators of their own businesses in Romania. Maintenance of the professional status was found with 25 immigrants, maintenance of the status but a change in the professional role for a teacher who becomes a businessman and three situations descending vertical professional mobility for two female teachers and one female student who have change their status to homemakers.

The reasons for which Turkish immigrants decided to emigrate are as follows: for 50% of them the causes were related to work, the rest of them for studies and to reunite their families, with only one case for the accumulation of a cultural experience. 10 of the 13 women who were interviewed immigrated to be with their families while only two men had as a reason to reunite their families. Over 50% of the immigrants consider that they chose Romania because it is a "virgin" market, "better for making a lot of money", "cheap", "with cheap workforce", "freer". Another four of them consider that they chose Romania because education here is "more qualitative" than in their country, "better" but also "cheaper". One of those interviewed considers that he wants to teach Romanian Turkish language and culture, while another one states that he chose Romania in order to learn Romanian language and culture. 3 of those interviewed consider that Romanian is a "safe" country where they feel secure, where "the society is freer" than the one in Turkey. Only five of the informants chose Romania because it is a European country and a member of the EU.

7 of the Turkish immigrants hold Romanian citizenship, 1 is a German citizen, 1 is a French citizen, 18 wish to obtain citizenship, while the rest do not have this in mind. A 44 year old man, the administrator of his own business, does not wish to have Romanian citizenship although he has been living in Romania for 24 years. Another case is that of a 44 year old man who, after living in Romania for 22 years with a residence permit, considers that he would like to apply for Romanian citizenship.

The analysis will concentrate on the efforts that the Turkish immigrants are making in order to become integrated. To this end, what I will examine is whether they did or did not attend Romanian classes, whether they use another language for communication beside Romanian and their mother tongue, whether they develop friendships with Romanian citizens, whether they get informed, whether they have reading and writing skills in Romania. I will also examined the representation that Turkish immigrants have about the EU but also about democracy given their intention of obtaining citizenship in a country that is a member of the EU. I will also analyse the relation between the efforts the immigrants consider that they are making and their level of integration.

Regarding the number of those who did or did not attend Romanian classes, 21 attended such classes, 3 of them intend to do this while the other 19 did not attend any classes. Some of those who did not attend Romanian classes consider that they can manage to communicate in Romanian at a basic level since they learnt with the help of friends. 8 of those who wish to obtain citizenship did not take classes to learn Romanian, and one of them has citizenship without taking such classes. 5 of those who attended such classes consider that they were useful not just for speaking correctly in Romanian but also for understanding Romanian culture.

15 of those interviewed do not have friends in Romania, out of which 5 are men while 10 are women. Those who have friendships with Romanian citizens participate in different activities with them as follows: business, sport, eating together. Only two of the 43 state that they frequently visit with Romanian families and that they participate at various Romanian holidays at the invitation of their Romanian friends. The number of women who do not succeed in establishing social relations outside of their family is higher than in the case of men, with only three of the 13 women having Romanian friends. It should be noticed that neither of the informants knows or has ever turned to the social networks that are offered by specialised institutions that deal with refugees and immigrants.

Although a significant number have higher education, 24 of the immigrants who were interviewed do not write in Romanian while 30 of them do have the habit of reading books, journals, or news websites. Of the 13 who state that reading is one of their preoccupations, 3 read specialised books, 3 read fiction, while 7 read the news in order to be informed. A particular case is that of a woman who holds a PhD and who declared that she does not read specialised books, fiction or media articles. 20 of them have English skills that allow them to communicate with other individuals.

Regarding the question "What does the EU represent?" the answers were extremely diverse. 2 of the informants do not know what EU means (both are students), for another 3 the EU does not represent "anything special". For one of them, the EU has a negative connotation since it is associated with "trickery" while for another it is associated with "social aids". For the majority, the EU is associated with democracy, freedom of movement, freedom, equality, safety. Two of the responders consider that the EU is a space of multiculturalism, while another two see it as a space of peace and security. Neither of the immigrants offered a clear definition of the EU, admitting that the information they have about the EU is from friends or from TV.

Democracy has some of the most diverse connotations for the Turkish immigrants. If a 23 year old woman considers that "democracy is everything", at the opposite end are five other informants for whom it does not represent "anything" since it "does not exist". 7 of those asked consider that democracy represents "rights" for citizens and "law", in the sense of a functional justice system. Democracy is associated with "morals" for one of the immigrants while for another it is associated with "the freedom to do anything". A 45 year old woman considers that in any democracy it is important for people to trust the institutions. For the other participants in the study, democracy is freedom, equality, brotherhood, an education superior to the one in their country, and "clean politics". It can be noticed that the majority of the immigrants have fragmented representations about what democracy is or about how a democratic system functions, with representations formed either as a result of informal conversations with friends, or after watching some TV shows. Neither of those interviewed offered a more complex description of what democracy means.

In regards to the question "Do you think that you are making enough efforts to integrate?" 30 answered no, 3 said that they were trying although they thought that it was not enough, while 10 appreciated that they are making/made efforts. 28 consider that they are in the process of integration, 10 are well integrated, while 4 have a lower level of integration.

According to the analysis above it can be concluded that:

The reasons why immigrants decided to settle in Romania determine the path of their integration. In other words, the majority of the immigrants decided that Romania is a country where they can develop businesses. To this end, they learnt Romanian in order to develop the skills for a basic verbal communication. English is often used as well complementing the gaps in their knowledge of Romanian. The immigrants learnt the rules of the game in order to support and consolidate their businesses and investments. They respected the rules imposed by the political decision-makers, they adjusted to the working norms of the institutions and to the economic mechanisms in Romania. All of these ensured a systemic integration for the Turkish immigrant.

Regarding the social integration, the following specifications can be made. For Turkish immigrants socialization takes place mainly within the immigrant group that shares the same values and customs. A 44 year old male informant considers, for instance, that religious traditions and values are being lost in Romania. A small part of those interviewed develop durable friendships with Romanian citizens outside the immigrant group. Conversely, it can be observed that despite the fact that they conserve they identity founded on traditional and religious values, they do not completely reject or resist developing relations with Romanian citizens or with citizens belonging to other ethnicities. Their social integration is not done with the same rhythm as the systemic one. This can be observed especially in the women who decided to immigrate in order to be with their husbands and who frequent Romanian socialization mediums to a lesser extent than the men.

Despite their wish to obtain citizenship and to enjoy the possibility of travelling and getting to know the EU, the immigrants do not make efforts to reach their objectives. The preparation of the citizenship test does not automatically constitute a step towards the social and systemic integration of the immigrant. One notices the need of a permanent socialization, of an availability to learn. The immigrants have not read books for general knowledge that would help them to better understand European and Romanian culture, they do not get informed lest in a small degree about political and civic culture, and about the democratic principles. This is disproportionate to their level of preparation with the majority, as aforementioned, having undergraduate and post-graduate studies.

5. Conclusions

The integration process of non-EU immigrants has raised questions regarding the European capacity, institutional resources and mechanisms for managing the extra-Community migration in general and the migration crisis of the past few years in particular. The paper has presented the main stages that the EU went through in its attempt to manage extra-Community migration, which has been considered, since the Treaty of Amsterdam, as being a European problem which needs a communitarian response. The communications, the common decisions, the documents produced starting with the 90s translate the EU's interest for the extra-Community migration, but also the shortcomings that the Union is trying to overcome. On the other end of the spectrum, the extra-Community immigrant who aims at integration is confronted with economic, cultural, normative and social challenges. As it was mentioned in the first part of the paper, the social integration can complement the systemic integration for the purpose of a functional relation between the immigrant and the host society that is integrating him/her. The fieldwork that was done pointed out, as a result of the qualitative analyses of the data obtained, that the Turkish immigrants in Romania are well integrated from a systemic point of view, by having language skills that ensure a basic communication, by respecting the economic rules and those of the institutions with which they enter in contact. Regarding social integration, which is more profound, what prevails is the base identity, which is founded on religious traditions and values. Even though there is no evident resistance from the Turkish immigrant towards Romanian and European values in general, they do not make efforts to become integrated in accordance with their desires.

The integration process represents a bi-directional relation which is wished to be functional. In the case where the efforts for change to not come from both sides, the relation will not be functional, and there will be imbalances between the part that is being integrated (the immigrant) and the part that is integrating (the European society)

CHALLENGES OF THE KNOWLEDGE SOCIETY: EXPLORING THE CASE OF QATAR

Fethi. B Jomaa AHMED[*]

Abstract

Qatar's Permanent Constitution and National Vision 2030 constituted the turning point in Qatar's transition towards knowledge society. Articles 22-49 of Qatar's Permanent Constitution together with the 4 pillars of Qatar's National Vision 2030 explicitly refer to the importance of knowledge acquisition, production and dissemination, and promotion of human socio-economic development. Qatar has remarkably invested in education, human capital, R&D, and ICT. Institutions such as Qatar Foundation (QF) and its entities like Qatar National Research Fund (QNRF), Qatar Science and Technology Park (QSTP), in addition to Qatar University and ictQatar are in the heart of Qatar's knowledge society construction. Moreover, Qatar has capitalized in importing existing organizational capacity, faculty and staff, and accumulated reputation of a number of eminent global higher education institutions such as Georgetown University, Texas A&M University, and Weill Cornell Medical College. Despite many years of substantial investments in human capital, ICT and the relevant infrastructures, Qatar's transition toward knowledge society is facing serious challenges. These challenges relate to reform and development of education and training to make knowledge as a principal driver of growth, diversification of the economy to ensure endurance of adequate revenues to fund projects, resolve the expatriate and workforce issues to ensure excellence and efficiency, efficient management of growth and uncontrolled expansion to avoid duplication of works and waste of recourses, good governance across government and private sectors and projects to cope with modernization, balancing between modernization and preservation of traditions in responding to the convergent impacts of globalization, balancing the needs of current generation and the needs of future generations, and sustain the environment. The aim of this paper is threefold: Outline the main features of Qatar society, highlight the status quo of Qatar knowledge society and explore the major challenges for it.

Keywords: Knowledge Society, Qatar, Tradition, Modernization, Challenges.

Introduction

Qatar has emerged as a renowned country for its remarkable achievements in education, human development, economy, media and politics despite its relatively small geographical and population size. In recent years, Qatar has become eminent to the international community because of hosting the 2022 World Cup, having Al-Jazeera Agency Networks, its humanitarian support to victims of war and conflicts zones including Syria, Yemen, Libya, Sudan, and for its successful mediation and conflict resolution efforts particularly in the Middle East such as resolving the conflict between Djibouti and Eritrea, Sudan and Chad, also the internal conflicts between Sudan and Darfur opposition, the Palestinian Authority or more specifically Fatah and Hamas in Palestine. Few decades ago, the state and society in Qatar were traditional in values, social, political and economic institutions. The country's economy was solely depending on hydrocarbon resources and almost all projects were funded from oil and gas revenues. However, the enormous transition took place since the ratification the Permanent Constitution in 2004 and the approval of the vision 2030 in 2008. The case of Qatar is worth investigating to understand how the country is transitioning from traditional society to dynamic knowledge society and economy and analyzing key challenges ahead. This research is descriptive and analytical however; it includes some normative perspectives as the author uses the participant observation method to incorporate some insights from his work experience as a full time employee of HBKU for more than 4 years also for working almost two academic years as an Assistant Professor of Sociology with Qatar University. The author has also been participating and attending several knowledge production and dissemination events in Qatar. The significance of this study stems from the being quite comprehensive in terms of the scale of topics covered, most updated in terms of data, and original in terms of referring to primary sources and references. Therefore, this paper begins with analyzing the main features of Qatar traditional and modern socio-cultural, economic and political setup. It then investigates the challenges to Qatar's evolution toward knowledge society. The author concludes that Qatar's development to knowledge society is crippled with major challenges however the country got what makes it succeed essentially the political will, National Vision, economic wealth, right infrastructure, institutions in place, and the human capital.

Country Profile

In this part of the analysis it is important to provide a concise overview on Qatar's geography, history, socio-cultural, political, demographic, and economic background. Qatar is a relatively small peninsula located in the midst of the western coast of the Arabian Gulf with some islands namely Halul, Shira'wa, Alashat. The total area of Qatar is approximately 11,627 sq. km and it shares a land border with the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia to the South and maritime border with Bahrain, the United Arab Emirates and Iran. It occupies a strategic location in the central Arabian Gulf near major petroleum deposits. (Hukoomi n.d.; Al-Sharqawi 2013, 189) Qatar was inhabited since 4000 BC. The origin of the name is uncertain, but according to some references it dates back at least 2,000 years since the term "Catharrei" was used to describe the inhabitants of the peninsula by Pliny the Elder (1st century A.D.), and a "Catara" peninsula is depicted on a map by Ptolemy (2nd century A.D.) It was ruled by the Ottomans for 4 consecutive centuries until 1915 then it became a British protectorate from November 3, 1916 until it gained independence on September 3, 1971 during the rule of the former Emir Sheikh Ali bin Abdullah Al-Thani who is a decedent of Al-Thani family which ruled the country since 1868 A.D. The Al-Thani family descents from Al-Ma'adhid who are from Tamim clan, which is a branch of the tribe of Wahba. They migrated from Najd region in Saudi Arabia and settled in Qatar peninsula (Al-Sharqawi 2013, 196-198; Hamdan 2012, 111-113; Central Intelligence Agency n.d.) Qatar society traditionally consists of nomadic Bedouin tribes, Indian and Iranian trading families clustered in villages of Doha, Al-Wakra, Al-khor and Al-Zubara. The inter-tribal relations were unofficial and based on personal relationships between the tribe-chiefs who enjoy absolute power. The Qataris are simple, easygoing, kind people who engaged in farming, hunting, fishing, pearling and trade. Their social and cultural values such as tolerance and generosity are rooted in the Islamic tradition. They are family oriented people, consanguinity and arranged marriages are widely practiced, segregation of males and females in education and work places is enforced, and respect of kinship ties and the elderly is widely observed. Before, the discovery of oil and gas Qatar was a poor small nation; less than 35,000 people, which receives financial aid from Great Britain in return for protection. However, after the discovery of oil in 1939 and the establishment of Qatar Petroleum Company which started exporting oil in 1949, as World War II interrupted oil production, the society undergone remarkable changes. These changes could be attributed to the huge positive impacts of oil and gas revenues on the welfare of the people, the increase of the government investment in improving the infrastructure and funding development projects, and the flow of migrant laborers who were recruited from many countries including India, Iran, Palestine, Egypt, and the Philippines to work in the oil and gas industry, construction projects and in other government and private sectors in addition to foreign investors who found the country safe, stable and promising for making business and maximizing the profit. Among the significant changes in the Qatari society is the empowering of women to study, work and lead. The generous scholarship for those Qataris who are interested in studying abroad whether in the Arab countries or in Europe and America and the knowledge and skills they brought to the country. The two significant factors that have been driving the changes in the country are the high integrity and political will of the leaders and the huge investment in human capital in general and in education, healthcare, and innovation in particular. This is what made Qatar enjoys prominent positions in human development, literacy, diplomacy, and humanitarian works at the regional and international levels. For instance according to the data provided by the World Intellectual Property Organization (WIPO) in 2016, Qatar filed 142 application for intellectual property 48 of which have been granted, submitted 690 patent applications, lodged 3,328 trademark submissions and the top Patent Cooperation Treaty Applicants in 2017 are QF with 10 applications and QU with 3 applications (Hamdan 2012, 25-51, 104-159, 179-183; Weber 2014, 63-65; WIPO n.d) As of 1 February 2018, the population clock indicated that Qatar has a population of over 2.7 million with a gender distribution of over 2 million males and approximately 0.7 million females. The total population includes 11.6% or approximately 310,000 Qatari and 88.4% non-Qatari mainly male immigrant workers who arrive in Qatar on work visas without their families, making the country number 143 in the world and the population growth rate estimated at 2.27%. Qatar is a young society, the median age of population is 33.2 years, and more than 25% below 25 years, over 70% below 55 years, only 1% above 65 years and the life expectancy rate is 78.9 years. Over 99% of the population lives in Doha city and suburb on the eastern side of the peninsula with a considerable community clustered in Dukhan and Al-Khor villages. Arabic is the official language in Qatar and English is commonly used as a second language. Islam is the official religion of the State of Qatar and the Islamic Law (Sharia) is the principal source of legislation. The Qataris are generally conservative Sunni Muslims but there are other religious groups living in Qatar namely Christian, Hindu and Buddhist. Public spending has witnessed and increase in the pace of the economic development to achieve Qatar National Vision 2030, therefore Qatar earmarked 3.5% of GDP for public spending on education. The youth literacy rate is above 98% of the total population and the unemployment rate is 0.3%. (Hukoomi n.d.; Ministry of Development Planning and Statistics n.d.; Al-Sharqawi 2013, 189; World Economic Forum 2016; Central Intelligence Agency n.d.) Historical sources indicate that the founder of the Al-Thani monarchy in Qatar was Sheikh Muhammad bin Thani who officially ruled the country from 1868 to 1876 and died in 1979. While investigating the political history of Qatar, one cannot overlook Sheikh Khalifa bin Hamad Al-Thani who was born in 1932, took power on 22 February 1972 and ruled the country until 1995. Perhaps he could be considered as the real founder of the State of Qatar because of amending the Provisional Constitution, forming the first Council of Ministers, establishing the different government structures such as the Ministries, Shura (consultative) council, and the Audit Bureau. He also expanded and strengthened Qatar's foreign diplomatic relations and increased the number of agreements and contracts with oil and gas international corporations such as OMACO, Standard Oil of Ohaio and Elf Equitaine. It is also very important to mention the great contribution of His Highness Sheikh Hamad bin Khalifa Al-Thani, the Father Emir, who ruled Qatar from July 27, 1995 to June 25, 2013. Many observers view HH Sheikh Hamad as the father founder of modern Qatar. He is directly credited with many of the huge changes in almost all aspects of the Qataris life particularly education, socio-economic, political, and media that occurred through his visionary and outstanding leadership. It is worth mentioning that the Permanent Constitution of the State of Qatar and Qatar National Vision 2030 were drafted, ratified and came into effect during his rule. Moreover, in a unique act in modern political history especially in the Middle East, HH Sheikh Hamad peacefully abdicated on June 25, 2013, and transferred power to his son the current Emir His Highness Sheikh Tamim bin Hamad Al-Thani who became the 9th Emir since the beginning of the rule of Al-Thani. (Hamdan 2012, 111-126, 155; Weber 2014, 63) Qatar is one of the world's most dynamic and fastest growing economies. According to the official figures, the Qatari economy grew by 2.2% in real terms in 2016 reaching QR796.2 billion (approximately US$219 billion) and the IMF projects an overall 2.6% GDP growth for 2018. With its US$124,900 GDP per capita in 2017, Qatar ranks as the wealthiest nation of the almost 200 countries in the world. Qatar booming economy enabled the country to invest in general infrastructural development and mega projects in line with Qatar National Vision 2030. Few examples could be cited here including US$11 billion for Doha International Airport, US$5.5 billion for new Doha Port, US$25 billion for Doha Rail and US$45 billion for Lusail which is considered as 'Qatar Future City'. Qatar's industries include natural gas, crude oil production and refining, ammonia, fertilizer, petrochemicals, and steel reinforcing. Despite the dominance of oil and gas sector, other non-hydrocarbon sectors such as manufacturing, financial services and construction has grown by 5.6% or QR21.4 billion (approximately US$0.66 billion) to reach QR400 billion (approximately US$110 billion) in 2016. Oil and gas revenues stood as QR132.9 billion (approximately US$36.5 billion) in 2016 comparing to QR170.6 billion (approximately US$47 billion) in the previous fiscal year, recording a decline of 22.1% due to the decline in oil and gas prices. In addition, public revenues fell by 12.2% or QR161.2 billion (approximately US$44.5 billion) public expenditures increased by 11.6% in order for the government to ensure continuity of public projects and infrastructure to realizing Qatar National Vision 2030 in human, social, economic and environmental development. The low oil and gas prices, the decline in public revenues and the rise in public spending caused a budget deficit of QR49.858 billion (approximately US$14 billion) comparing to approximately US$1.6 billion budget deficit in previous fiscal year. However, Qatar sovereign wealth fund (SWF) currently stands at US$335 billion that backs Qatar's booming economy and society. (Ministry of Development Planning and Statistics n.d.; Qatar Central Bank 2016, 21-48; IMF n.d.; Weber 2014, 64)

1. Key Constituents Of Qatar's Knowledge Society

It is important for any investigation on Qatar's evolvement to a dynamic knowledge society to bring into limelight the key foundations, institutions, stakeholders, and partners, and highlights their role, efforts, and contributions to the transition to a knowledge society. These constituents include the Permanent Constitution of the State of Qatar, Qatar National Vision 2030, Qatar University (QU), and Qatar Foundation for Education, Science and Community Development (QF) and its entities, and ictQatar.

2. The Constitution of the State of Qatar

The Provisional Constitution of Qatar was issued on April 2, 1970 and thus the first Council of Ministers was formed on May 28, 1970 however the amended version was issued and came to force in the Sate on April 19, 1972. (The Permanent Constitution of the State of Qatar 2004; Hamdan 2012, 116) During the rule of the Father Emir His Highness Hamad bin Khalifa Al-Thani, a constitution committee was formed by an Emiri decree in July 1999 and submitted the draft of the constitution in July 2002. The Permanent Constitution of the State of Qatar passed the referendum on 29 April 2003 with 96.6% majority votes. It was ratified on 8 June 2004, and came into effect on 9 June 2005. (The Permanent Constitution of the State of Qatar 2004; Hamdan 2012, 122; Al-Sharqawi 2013, 69-71) The new constitution establishes the main foundations of the community, accomplishes the people's participation in decision-making and guarantees their rights and freedoms. It includes 150 articles that regulate all aspect of life in the country pertaining to rights and duties. For instance, articles 22, 24, 25 and 49 explicitly refer to the right to education and emphasize on the role of the state in promoting sound education, fostering and encouraging scientific research, helping disseminate knowledge in addition to making general education compulsory and free of charge. It is worth mentioning in this context that while article 21 focus on preserving the family, supporting its structure and protecting women, children and the elderly, article 23 refers to the state's obligation to foster public health, provide the means of prevention of disease and epidemics and promote cure. Ensuring the public welfare, raising the standard of living and insuring fundamental freedoms such as freedom of expression, freedom of scientific inquiry, freedom of media, and freedom of worship are guaranteed by articles 28, 47, 48 and 50. It is essential to note that articles pertaining to citizens' rights and liberties cannot be amended. (The Permanent Constitution of the State of Qatar 2004)

3. Qatar National Vision 2030 (QNV)

QNV was published in July 2008. It is based on the guiding principles of the Permanent Constitution of Qatar besides it has emerged from intensive consultation across Qatari society. The Vision defines broad future trends and reflects the aspirations, objectives and culture of the Qatari people. It provides a framework within which national strategies and implementation plans can be developed. The Vision rests on four pillars which are (a) Human development to enable its people to sustain a prosperous society, (b) Social development to build a just and caring society based on high moral standards and capable of playing a significant role in the global partnership and development, (c) Economic development of competitive and diversified economy capable of meeting the needs of, and securing a high standard of living for all its people, for the present and future, and (d) Environmental development that maintains balance and harmony between economic growth, social development and environmental protection. In this Vision, Qatar has explicitly indicated the need to shift from the reliance on hydrocarbon revenues to knowledge production activities particularly education, research, patenting, intellectual property, peer-reviewed science and engineering papers and media. In summary, the Vision outlines how Qatar will use the vast revenues from its substantial hydrocarbon resources to transform itself into a modern knowledge-based society. The vision regards the people of Qatar are key to achieving its aim, and the plan places developing human capitals as the fundamental priority for the next 15 years. The Vision is being implemented in a series of five-year strategic plans. The strategic plans will help the nation to realize the Vision by setting and prioritizing concrete goals with time-bound targets. It will also articulate the necessary processes, stakeholders' roles, and the expected standards which are needed to deliver on the Vision. (QNV 2008, 1-2, 10-34; Weber 2014, 61) It has been stated in the introduction of the second Qatar National Development Strategy 2018-2022 that the Strategy builds on the achievements of the first strategy 2011-2016 and focuses on attaining eight objectives which are; (a) focus on people because they are both the means and target of development, (b) ensure clarity of national priorities included in the strategy, (c) ensure clarity and realistic identification of goals and expected results, (d) ensure clarity in roles and responsibilities in executing programs and projects, (e) strengthening the relationships between the different strategies and executive plans and the allocated budget, (f) improving the mechanisms of monitoring and follow up, (g) develop and modernize the administration particularly in the financial, human resources, technology and legislative sectors, and (h) design a comprehensive communication strategy which includes a coordination mechanism in each sector and in between the sectors and all stakeholders engaged in executing the strategy. The strategy consists of 15 chapters beginning with the achievements and lessons learned from the first strategy covering almost all areas of sustainable development such as education, health, human capital, culture, sports, administration, infrastructure, environment and diversifying the economy. (MDPS 2018)

4. Qatar Education System

Traditional education in Qatar before the 1950s was based on few schools and informal classes (kuttab) offering religious, Qur'an reading and reciting, and Arabic language lessons. Traditionally trained teachers usually conduct these classes at mosques or at home. Some families have sent their children to pursue their traditional studies abroad mainly in Egypt and Lebanon. Qatar's modern education system officially began in 1951 by establishing the Ministry of Ma'arif (education) by which the state became directly responsible and involved in supervising and developing it from all angles, in addition to allocating substantial budgets. The education system is guided by three principles; protecting the heritage of the Muslim nation, preserving the Arab-Islamic identity of the people, and developing the education system and curricula through benefiting from the modern era achievements in technology and educational methods and techniques. Modern public schools and relevant infrastructures were built in the 1950s and 1960s. For instance, the first school for boys established in the school year 1952-1953, the first school for girls established in the academic year 1954-1955, and adult and illiteracy education began in 1954. The first secondary school for boys began operating in 1961 and the first secondary school for girls started operating in 1965. The tertiary education system began with the establishment of the College of Education in 1973 with a vision to place education as a priority in the country's expansion. In its first year, the College enrolled 57 male and 93 female students. The primary, secondary and vocational education has remarkably expanded throughout the years because rapid demographic growth and the government support and spending on education infrastructure, employees and development. For instance, the government covers costs of schooling in public schools and provides textbooks, stationary, health services, electricity and water free of charge and. The Supreme Education Council (SEC) founded in 2002 and the Emir of the State himself oversees it. SEC is the highest educational authority responsible for the education policy, planning, development and enforcement. It includes three executive departments that are the department of education, the department of evaluation, and the department of higher education (Hamdan 2012, 199-207; Al-Sharqawi 2013, 203-206; Powell 2014, 258-259)

5. Qatar University (QU)

Due to the country's rapid development and need to provide additional areas of specialization, Qatar University (QU) was founded in 1977 as the national institution of higher education in Qatar. It became the home of four new colleges namely College of Education, College of Humanities and Social Sciences (currently named College of Arts and Sciences), College of Sharia, Law and Islamic Studies (currently became two colleges; College of Sharia and Islamic Studies and College of Law), and the College of Science which later became part of the College of Arts and Sciences. Thereafter, the College of Engineering was founded in 1980, the College of Business and Economics in 1985, the College of Pharmacy in 2008, the College of Medicine in 2014, and the College of Health Sciences in 2016. The university is also the home of more than 15 research centers which strive to make an impact on a global scale. These research establishments include Gas Processing Center, Biomedical Research Center, Qatar Mobility Innovation Center, Center for Sustainable Development, Social and Economic Research Institute, and Gulf Studies Center. QU currently boasts a population of over 20,000 students, and an alumni body of over 40,000. It also employs over 2,000 local and international highly experienced teaching and research faculty. QU faculty members are not only engaged in teaching, research and student care, but also contributes actively to the needs and aspirations of society and present their expertise in the media. In 2003, the University embarked on an ambitious Reform Plan to increase the efficiency of its administrative and academic processes, and promote quality education. To this end, a university-wide Strategic Plan 2010-2013 was launched focusing on efficient and effective services, and research, leading to the establishment of the Office of Academic Research in 2007, which oversaw a growing number of high-profile satellite research centers. Community service also became a large focus, and many facilities and services were enhanced and expanded upon, to meet the needs of the public. Qatar University has recently launched its five-year strategy (2018-2022) 'From Reform to Transformation'. This strategy is aligned to Qatar National Vision 2030 and seeks to promote excellence in four key areas of education, research, institution, and engagement with a view of occupying an outstanding position in the map of excellent education providers at the international and regional levels. (Hamdan 2012, 207; Qatar University n.d.)

6. Qatar Foundation for Education, Science and Community Development (QF)

QF was founded by His Highness Sheikh Hamad Bin Khalifa Al Thani, the Father Emir, and his wife Her Highness Sheikha Moza bint Nasser in August 1995. QF is the largest private non-profit organization in Qatar dedicated to helping shape the future of the Qataris through advancements in education, research & development, and community development. The foundation aims at making Qatar a vanguard for productive change in the region and a role model for the broader international community. Through its wide range of activities and institutions, the Foundation promotes a culture of excellence and furthers its role in supporting an innovative and open society that aspires to develop sustainable human capacity, social, and economic prosperity for a knowledge-based society. It is worth emphasizing that the Sidra tree (Ziziphus spina-christi) in the logo of QF symbolizes the essence of the vision and mission of the organization. The Sidra is a native tree, which could be found throughout the country, especially in northern and central Qatar. It grows in the wild and flourishes in the harsh and arid climate. With its roots bound in the soil and its branches reaching upwards toward perfection, it is a symbol of solidarity and determination. The Sidra tree's deep roots regarded as a strong anchor, connecting contemporary learning and growth with the country's culture and heritage. Poets, scholars and travelers would traditionally gather in the shade of the Sidra's spreading branches to meet and talk. This aspect of the Sidra tree's role is reflected in QF's commitment to education and community development as well as being a naturally healthy and comfortable place at which to gather and exchange knowledge and opinions. The tree's fruit, flowers and leaves provide the ingredients for many traditional medicines, which reflects QF's science and research objectives. The branches of the Sidra tree represent the diversity of QF today. The leaves, flowers and fruits equate to the individual lives that the tree nourishes, with the fruits going on to produce seeds that guarantee sustainability and a healthy future. Hence, the Sidra tree is perhaps the most prominent tree in Qatar and it certainly occupies a special position in the hearts of the Qatari people that is why it stands out as the perfect symbol for the vision and mission of QF. The foundation is the largest organization in Qatar and it consists of around 50 entities. (See examples in Table 1) QF Education City is a 2,500-acre campus launched in 2003 and today it is the home of Hamad Bin Khalifa University (HBKU), eight of the eleventh International Branch Campuses (IBCs) of worldly renowned universities such as Georgetown University, Texas A & M, Weil Cornell Medical College in addition to several research establishments. The attempt to circumscribe all QF entities is not the purpose of this paper hence few key entities will be introduced here. (Qatar Foundation n.d.; Al-Sharqawi 2013, 216-217; Hamdan 2012, 207; Powell 2014, 269)

6.1. Hamad Bin Khalifa University (HBKU)

HBKU was founded in 2010 with a vision to be an innovation-based entrepreneurial university leading in education and research, solving critical challenges facing Qatar and the world. HBKU today has five colleges; College of Islamic Studies, College of Science and Engineering, College of Law and Public Policy, College of Humanities and Social Sciences, and College of Health and Life Sciences. In addition to a number of research institutes and centers including Qatar Biomedical Research Institute (QBRI), Qatar Environmental and Energy Research Institute (QEERI), Qatar Computing Research Institute (QCRI), Qatar Cardiovascular Research Center (QCRC) and the Research Center for Islamic Legislation and Ethics (CILE). The University offers 17 programs such as multidisciplinary PhD in Genomics and Precision Medicine, and MA in Digital Humanities and Societies. HBKU employs 75 faculty members and enrolls over 625 students from 57 nationalities, 41% of them are Qataris. QSience.com, which is an open access academic journals platform, initiated by QF and was first launched on 13 December 2010. It signified QF commitment to disseminate research to the widest possible international knowledge seekers. The pioneer publications were in the fields of medical studies and practice particularly cardiology and heart disease treatment. Articles have to be submitted online and every article is rigorously reviewed by international experts. QScience has become a part of HBKU Press and it is today the online home for a growing range of peer-reviewed open access journals that publish the latest research and reviews in Medicine and Bioscience, Healthcare, Social Science, Islamic Studies and Engineering. QScience has more than a dozen of affiliated peer-reviewed journals such as Global Cardiology Science and Practice, Journal of Emergency Medicine, Trauma Acute Care, Qatar Medical Journal, Near and Middle Eastern Journal of Research in education, Religions, and QScience Connect. QScience journals have won the recognition of renowned international data bases such as PubMed Central and the premier full-text database of medical articles. This means that all articles published on the database will have a much higher visibility among the global research community. (Hamad Bin Khalifa University n.d.; QScience.com n.d.)

6.2. International Branch Campuses (IBCs)

Qatar has invested substantially in attracting the best international higher education institutions to open branches in Doha. Comparing to GCC, Qatar differ immensely in the scale of investment, the number of universities and the variety of programs offered. In the period from 1998 to 2012 Qatar entered into agreements with 11 international prominent higher education institutions from USA, Canada, UK, France and the Netherlands. These universities aim to prepare students for employment as well as for global citizenship by emulation of global principles and norms adapted to local or national contexts of Qatar. QF Education City hosts eight branch campuses; six American universities, one from UK and one from France. The IBCs offer specializations and programs such as medicine and health sciences, engineering and applied sciences, IT and design, foreign affairs, journalism, and tourism and hospitality. (See Table 2) These institutions bring their own principles, personnel, and student culture. Some researchers noted that the investment in inviting IBCs have been oriented mainly to Western models without sustained reflection on and tackling all of the contextual condition needed to implement and sustain them. (Ministry of Education and Higher Education n.d.; Hamdan 2012, 123; Powell 2014, 259- 270)

6.3. Qatar Science & Technology Park (QSTP)

QSTP was inaugurated in 2009 and it is located in QF Education City as a part of QF R&D and incubator for technology production development in Qatar. The park fosters an innovation and entrepreneurship ecosystem in Qatar that works to accelerate commercialization of market-ready technologies to realize Qatar's national diversification drive. It focuses on four overarching themes; Energy, Environment, Health Sciences, and ICT. QSTP is a leading institution committed to investing in new technology development programs, creating intellectual property, enhancing technology management skills, and developing innovative new products. QSTP does not only support the economic and human development objectives for Qatar through incubation, funding, training, and mentorship, but also increasingly becoming a recognized regional and international hub for applied research, innovation, development, and entrepreneurship. QSTP has developed a smart partnership with a variety of stakeholders including QF research institutes and the private sector to accelerate product innovation, encourage new product and services development, and boost the commercialization of scientific research. QSTP is a free zone that hosts more than 50 local and international companies such as ExxonMobil, SIEMENS, AIRLIFT, MEDI, Vodafone and QNB. It offers various benefits to local and international entities including 100% foreign ownership, operate as a local company or as a branch of a foreign company, hire expatriate employees, tax-free, duty-free import of goods, equipment and tools into the free zone, and unrestricted repatriation of capital and profits. It provides two types of funds: (a) Product Development Fund: funding for small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) and startups that develop products and services relevant to the local market needs, and (b) Tech Venture Fund: provides an opportunity for tech founders and entrepreneurs to source seed-stage capital when they are first embarking on their journey. Besides, QSTP work on student development and exposure to see what's happening on the other side of the world; discover their potential, open up your horizons and meet people who disrupt the world and enhanced peoples' lives by organizing students' innovation trips for instance trips to the Silicon Valley, the world's leading hub for innovation and technology development, and engage the students in a summer training program provided by the European Innovation Academy (EIA). (QSTP n.d.)

6.4. Qatar National Research Fund (QNRF)

QNRF was inaugurated in 2006 and it has reached cycle 11 for funding. It is currently located within the premises of QSTP in Education City. QNRF's vision is to enable research and development excellence in Qatar in order to achieve a knowledge-based economy. It aims to foster original, competitively selected research in engineering and technology, physical and life sciences, medicine, humanities, social sciences and the arts. It encourages dialogue and partnership, and currently focuses on optimizing resources, encourage innovative research, and is moving from predominantly investigator-driven research to mission-driven research. QNRF provides funding for research projects in three main areas; Research, Capacity Building and Development Programs, and K-12 Programs. Under each area QNRF funds various research program projects, initiatives, competitions and awards comprising the National Priorities Research Program (NPRP), the Thematic and Grand Challenges Research Program (TGCRP), Technology Development Fund (TDF), Undergraduate Research Experience Program (UREP), Qatar Research Leadership Program (QRLP), National Scientific Research Competition, and Managing Award. Submission for research fund is open for local and international researchers and organizations. For example, the NPRP funding award is up to four years where funds for a one year project may not exceed US$200,000, US$400,000 for a two year project, US$600,000 for a three year project and US$700,000 for a four year project. For example QNRF awarded over US$53 million of research grants to investigators in Qatar in 2012. Among the completed researches DeSIGN: Guided Practice for Sign Language which is an educational software application for deaf and hard-of-hearing students, which provides guided communication practice using sign language. The DeSIGN tutor utilizes a knowledge-tracing algorithm to adapt its tests to the learning level of the students. Another successful research was about wind and wave studies in Qatar where for the first time, fine detail about the wind and wave conditions around the coast of Qatar has been recorded. By arranging the most sophisticated equipment available on the edge of a 500-meter pier extending into the Gulf. This replaced the very poor models to track winds and waves and helped marine life and the offshore oil and gas industry, and renewable energy initiatives. (QNRF n.d.; Weber 2014, 77-78)

6.5. World Innovation Summit for Education (WISE)

WISE was initiated by QF under the leadership of Her Highness Sheikha Moza bint Nasser in 2009 and thus the first WISE was held in Doha from 16-18 November 2009. It is an international, multi-sectorial platform for creative thinking, debate and purposeful action. The WISE community is a network of education stakeholders; from students to decision-makers, coming from about 200 countries who share ideas and collaborate to seek creative solutions to solve challenges facing education. WISE has become a global reference for innovative approaches to modern education. While WISE leaders recognize the gap between the technology and healthcare sectors and education where the latter is lacking innovative approaches in both policymaking and in the classroom, they envision education as the key to addressing the toughest challenges facing communities around the world today. These challenges particularly include eradicating poverty, resolving conflicts peacefully, eliminating inequality and injustice, reducing unemployment, enhancing environmental sustainability and be ready to respond to future challenges. Therefore, WISE is a response to the necessity of revitalizing education and providing a global platform for the development of new ideas and solutions. Since 2009, WISE continues to generate fruitful dialogue and productive partnerships. The WISE research reports produced in collaboration with recognized experts from around the world, address pressing global education issues and reflect the priorities of the Qatar National Research Strategy. It is important to emphasize that these timely, comprehensive reports feature action-oriented recommendations and policy guidance for all education stakeholders, offering concrete, improved practices in specific contexts such as school leadership and collaborative professionalism, design thinking, apprenticeship, disability, early childhood education, and migration. The Reports are available on the WISE website and through the mobile application in addition to a limited number of printed editions in English and Arabic. (WISE n.d.; Hamdan 2012, 199-200) The 9th edition of WISE took place on 14-16 November 2017 in Doha under the theme 'Co-Exist, Co-Create: Learning to Live and Work Together'. A large number of educationists and opinion makers from around the world have participated in the summit to address important education challenges in times of disruption and economic uncertainty stemming from conflict, mass migration, growing inequality, on-going, rapid technological change and other forces. The 2017 WISE Summit was an opportunity to rethink and reorganize the way learning is delivered in an age of disruption. Participants explored and discovered several topics that are shaping the future of teaching and learning including the impact of artificial intelligence on education, transforming roles of teachers and leveraging social entrepreneurship for innovation. The summit has also had several discussions on changing mindsets toward migrants, reimagining higher education in the connected world, the impact of nudging, connecting private and public actors and strategies to build future knowledge societies. Challenges in education also present opportunities to break down old assumptions and bring forth the new ideas that are paving the way for positive disruption. With the topic of co-existing in a changing world, developing skills, attitudes and values to shape tomorrow, the conference explored the role of innovation in education to cultivate values, behaviors and attitudes. It addressed complex challenges, advance cultural cohesion and nurture global citizenship in the rapidly evolving world. The second pillar of co-creating knowledge societies; transitioning from knowledge economies to knowledge societies, examined strategies, policies and practices to empower individuals to become highly skillful innovators who can drive economic development, contribute to social good and design our future world. The final pillar of the program is learning to learn: New perspectives and practices in teaching and learning. It aims to discover new and emerging teaching and learning approaches that help learners develop relevant cognitive, social and emotional skills to live and work in an age of disruption. WISE summit 2017 highlighted that the pace of scientific and technological development continues unabated. Constant advances in artificial intelligence, automation and biotechnology have the potential to dramatically overturn long-held assumptions about what it means to be human. (Varghese 2017)

6.6. World Innovation Summit for Health (WISH)

WISH was incepted in 2013 as a global healthcare community dedicated to capturing and disseminating the best evidence-based ideas and practices. It is a solution-focused establishment which aims to create and disseminate world-class, evidence-based content and knowledge, face the most pressing global healthcare challenges, and influence healthcare policies locally and globally. Its core values include collaboration, mutual trust and respect, generosity (sharing and giving) and transparency at all times. WISH has held three summits since its inception; in 2013, 2015, and 2016, and the fourth summit will be held from 13-14 November 2018. More than 1,000 leaders and healthcare delegates and experts from over 100 countries have attended previous summits including more than 50 ministries of health that oversee healthcare policy for more than 2 billion people, and representatives of major international organizations such as the United Nations, the European Union, the Carter Center, the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation, and the Rockefeller Foundation. (WISH n.d)

6.7. Qatar Foundation Annual Research Conference (ARC)

QF began organizing its ARCs in 2010 with a vision that research and innovation are the keys that unlock discovery's doors to strengthening societies and achieving the most ambitious goals. It has become a platform where aspiration, expertise, and pioneering spirit meet, where challenges become opportunities to improve lives, and where drive and direction come from the templates of inspiration, Qatar National Vision 2030, and the Qatar National Research Strategy (QNRS). Therefore, each ARC represents a unique yearly opportunity for knowledge sharing and partnership to boost Qatar's research and innovation agenda. The Conference usually take place in March of every year at Qatar National Convention Center (QNCC) in QF Education City in Doha. This year ARC'18 is the 9th edition and it was held from 19-20 March 2018 under the theme 'R&D: Focused on Priorities, Delivering Impact'. It endeavored to pursue the vision of developing Qatar into a leading center for research and development excellence and innovation. ARC'18 featured thought-provoking panel discussions and technical presentations, where leading experts shared constructive experiences and innovative approaches aimed at addressing critical issues facing Qatar and the region. Her Highness Sheikha Moza bint Nasser, Chairperson of Qatar Foundation, and Her Excellency Sheikha Hind bint Hamad Al Thani, Vice Chairperson and CEO of Qatar Foundation, together with other government ministers and dignitaries, and about 2,600 delegates from Qatar and around the world have attended ARC'18. In order to consolidate the management of all QF research development and innovation (RDI) activities into one executive position, H.H Sheikha Hind announced the establishment of a nationally-focused Research, Development and Innovation (RDI) Council which consist of government representatives, RDI stakeholders from the nation's key sectors, and experts from academia and industry. The Council is tailored to the specific needs of Qatar while drawing on international examples of best practice. It will be led by Dr Richard O'Kennedy and it aims to bring together the stakeholders to provide direction and guidance on all RDI efforts, ensuring alignment to national priorities in order to contribute to major national RDI decisions collaboratively. (Qatar Foundation ARC n.d) The ARC'16 could be a another illustrative example which is worth mentioning here. It was held at QNCC from 22-23 March 2016 under the theme 'Investing in Research and Innovating for Society'. ARC'16 emphasized that strategic investment in research and development is instrumental for the future of Qatar and global society. More than 2,000 people including dignitaries, senior officials, and delegates have attended the conference. Her Highness Sheikha Moza bint Nasser, Chairperson of Qatar Foundation, addressed the conference and highlighted that the Arab world's investment in research and development is minimal compared with the Western countries and Eastern Asia. She considered this as a dilemma, which requires immediate action and explained how QF plays a significant role in responding to the necessity of building Qatar's knowledge base society. ARC'16 is a showcase of how this is being produced and supported within QF from the breakthroughs made by its research institutes, to the enabling effect of QF R&D entities Qatar National Research Fund (QNRF) and Qatar Science & Technology Park (QSTP). According to its organizers, the conference was a magnet for the national, regional, and global research community, and a platform for strengthening the chain connecting the many vital elements that progress basic research to innovation. It also provided researchers from all over the world with the tools that will enable them to share knowledge and inspire future generations. ARC'16 also showcased exemplars of pioneering research and impactful innovation developed within QF, such as Masarak which is an intelligent traffic monitoring and navigation application developed by Qatar Mobility Innovations Centre (QMIC), tenant of QSTP, in partnership with the Ministry of Municipality and Planning. the QF R&D's Best Innovation Award is usually awarded to the winner during the conference. The Award winner was Dr Adnan Abu Dayya, Executive Director and CEO, QMIC for his innovative project on tailored technology which is designed to make roads safer, while providing the basis for a homegrown technology-based industry built around intelligent transport. The value of this project lies in addressing national mobility strategies, supporting mega-projects, creating economic value, and eventually creating a high-tech export industry. ARC'16 also included the winner of QF R&D's Best Research Project Award, presented to Dr Shehab Ahmed from Texas A&M University at Qatar for his work in developing power electronics and systems for integrating renewable energy into Qatar's power grid. In this way, ARC'16 exhibited how the pursuit and creation of innovation is being embraced at all levels and ages across Qatar, within an ambitious research and innovation culture that develops the human capacity required for success. Experts participating in ARC'16 largely agreed to the concept that 'excellence breeds excellence', emphasized on the need for having enough high-quality talent to execute innovation that can be transformed into economic value, and stressed on the globalized nature of research and innovation as well as its trans-sectorial and disciplinary nature that requires collaboration and partnership at the local, regional and international levels. ARC'16's audience where representatives from QF member HBKU and its three research institutes namely QBRI, QCRI, and QEERI. They explained the exchange of knowledge can address Qatar's Research Grand Challenges and propel Qatar's knowledge-based economy. The integration of the annual QNRF Forum with ARC'16 crystallized the research funding entity's development and achievements in the 10 years since its establishment and visualized the way ahead for the research that emanates from, and is catalyzed by, QF and Qatar. ARC'16 has manifested an investment in research and innovation that brings the future into ownership. (Qatar Foundation 2016)

7. iCTQatar

The ictQatar Strategy is to actively leverage ICT to support the realization of Qatar's overall national development goals and position Qatar as a leading knowledge economy enabled by ICT by 2015. It has achieved 100% in three objectives; double the ICT Workforce, Double the ICT sector's contribution to GDP and Achieve Wide accessibility and effectiveness of all key government services. Qatar rank 2 globally after Singapore in government prioritization of ICT and effective use of ICT in government. it has almost reached 100% of households and businesses in broadband penetration, and the telephone fixed line and mobile cellular telephone subscribership and users exceeds 175 telephones per 100 persons. ictQatar has progressed immensely in content digitization and creation by converting printed material to digital content and publish them online and creation and publishing of born-digital content. It has been working on attracting, promoting and exposing of young talent to the digital content realm. ictQatar has also contributed to laws and regulations by initiatives such as ICT Regulatory Framework, Consumer and Digital Rights Laws and Green ICT Policy Instruments & Guidelines. (ictQatar Strategy n.d) in 2016 ictQatar was merged with the Ministry of Transportation to form the Ministry of Transportation and Communications (MOTC). MOTC's main focus was the Qatar Smart Nation program (QSNP), a 5 year USD1.64 billion initiative launched to develop Qatar's ICT infrastructure, and transform Doha into one of most connected cities globally. QSNP aims to harness technology and innovation to improve quality of life and help drive sustainable economic development across five priority sectors: (a) Transportation Objectives: Seamless mobility, searchable city, universal access, and safe journeys, (b) Logistics Objectives: Connected logistics, digital workplace, dynamic delivery, and empowered recipients, (c) Environment Objectives: Sustainable resources, digital urbanization, environment stewardship, and connected farming, (d) Healthcare Objectives: Healthcare on-demand, extended care, seamless hospitals, and connected wellness, and (e) Sports Objectives: Active nation, augmented game experience, competitive athletes, and connected fans. Individual government agencies including the Ministry of Interior, Ministry of Finance, and Ministry of Municipalities and Environment continue their respective "digitization" strategies, as part of Qatar's E-government 2020 objective.

Total ICT spending in Qatar stood at US$1.9 billion in 2016, with expected growth of 10% in 2017, largely due to increase in the government's requirement for ICT services including Smart City Solutions, Cyber Security, E-commerce, E-Education, E-Health, Financial Technology and E-Government Solutions. (Export.GOV n.d.)

8. Challenges Of Qatar's Knowledge Society

Qatar's transition toward knowledge society is facing grand challenges. In the following paragraphs, the author focuses on key challenges to Qatar knowledge society:

8.1. Education and training

Qatar spends 3.5% of its GDP on education, the Permanent Constitution explicitly emphasize on sound education and innovation in research, and the National Vision 2030 deals with education as power and the prime drive for human capital building and future prosperity. However, there are numerous challenges that face Qatar's endeavors to achieve world-class education, training and cultural enhancement. Qatar aspires to realize its national vision in full by having its people highly educated and capable of driving the different aspects of life toward knowledge society. The education system has to encourage analytical and critical thinking, as well as creativity and innovation. It has to promote social cohesion and respect for Qatari society's values and heritage, and advocate for constructive interaction with other nations. The Qataris need to put more efforts in knowledge application to Qatar society, and knowledge production particularly innovative research that is needed for the economy. The unsustainable population growth, which is principally caused by the influx of migrant workers and their families and children, requires offering quality education opportunities and services and the necessary funds, human resources, and infrastructures. One of the challenges which is related to this, is preserving the native language in all skills as Arabic is the official language of instruction at public schools and universities. However, English language use is growing and it is a requirement for some courses of study. While textbooks are written in modern standard Arabic, most teachers in Qatar speak an Arabic dialect such as Egyptian and Syrian. This has affected the Qatari student language abilities and perhaps created more burden in speaking and using the standard Arabic language in knowledge acquisition, production and dissemination. The declining interest in mathematics and science in Qatar's schools and colleges and the low graduation rates and decline in enrolment in science and engineering based specialties in the universities lead to severe shortage of highly skilled Qataris is also a challenge for the transition to knowledge society. Moreover, there is a challenge in providing the necessary communication, coordination, exchange, and synergetic relationships among the between the higher education institutions because they work independently without strong coordination and there are no mechanisms of collaboration to improve the quality in educational programs, research and other areas in addition to the absence of accurate data and information on education and training. This has created duplication of efforts and has reduced the effectiveness in education businesses. Furthermore, Qatar has invested billions of dollars in attracting worldly renowned universities to open branches in Doha and prepare the Qataris for the job market as well as for being global citizens. There are some challenges in this regards including Qatar's ability to combine or integrate the IBCs and the national higher education institutions to make it a successful and sustainable path for the future of higher education and science in Qatar. This challenge has much to do with removing the attitudinal and structural barriers before education and knowledge management. Another challenge is also the accessibility of IBCs higher education especially for members of migrant families, taking into consideration some gender related issues and sensitivity, and the tenuous roles assumed and fixed-term contracts provided to expatriate university professors and researchers. Supporting the IBCs to establish a robust scientific environment in their niche area of expertise for the future wealth and well-being of Qatar society is also one of the significant challenges. Creating a break in the casual link between work and reward where students expect reward without necessarily having to work hard to attain it is a challenge especially in view of the fact that expatriate teachers and university professors might compromise the academic standards and tolerate such attitude because of fear from bad feedback from students which could potentially lead to nonrenewal of contracts. Qatar spent enormous amount of money on the education infrastructure such as new university and school buildings, libraries and laboratories but the challenge now is to spend more on teachers professional development and welfare. Qatar is investing remarkably in training programs to the extent that almost all government employees are required to attend training, professional development programs, workshops, seminars, and short courses. These training programs are narrowed in their scope to cover very specific skills instead of a long-term apprenticeships that qualify the trainees for the knowledge society. (Ministry of Development Planning and Statistics 2018, 173-174; General Secretariat for Development Planning 2008, 13-16; Weber 2014, 64-77; Powell 2014, 256-266)

8.2. Economy diversification

Oil and gas are obviously depleted resources and their prices have been sharply declining in recent years inflicting heavy losses of revenues and consequently crippling the government capability in funding projects and creating uncertainties for national planning since the economy is essentially fuelled by hydrocarbon wealth. These two factors urged Qatar leaders to plan for developing the infrastructure by using the most advanced technology and production methods in the existing oil and gas fields, creating new sources of renewable energy, diversification of economy, and encouraging recycling projects and systems to gradually reduce the dependency on hydrocarbon recourses. Moreover, Qatar lacks crude natural resources that are used in construction such as building roads, bridges, airports, and ports which absorb substantial portion of its budget to import them. For example, in April and May 2016, Qatar spent more than QR436 million (approximately US$120 million) on import of construction material. As it has been explained above, Qatar spends over US$2 billion on consuming ICT goods and services, however producing the required ICT that provide all what the economy needs in general remain one of the challenges. The private sector is also facing some challenges such as lack of policies that limit its ability of to enter the domestic market and compete and grow in it efficiently and effectively. Besides, while there are numerous numbers of banks and financial institutions in Qatar, entrepreneurs and small and medium business projects are facing difficulties and obstacles in securing finance for their new projects and economic activities. Moreover, the work environment, business and investment opportunities are dominated and monopolized by the public sector, giant companies, and business tycoons. Therefore, this unhealthy situation needs to be changed to enable the private sector and SMEs to play an essential role in contributing to the economy and achieving sustainable development. It is also important to highlight the lack of regional coordination and the state of competition between the GCC countries in the activities of organizing international exhibitions, civil and commercial air transport, aluminum production, iron, basic petrochemical products, and plastics. These challenges have become so complex because of the recent GCC crisis. (Ministry of Development Planning and Statistics 2018, 81-122; Secretariat for Development Planning 2008, 24-29; Weber 2014, 67-68)

8.3. Expatriates and workforce issues

Qatar's population is rapidly growing due to a sharp rise in the number of expatriate workers in the local labor market. These migrant short-term contract workers are critically needed for the immense urban development, and large-scale investment projects. This situation has led to a large increase in the ratio of expatriates to locals in the labor force, and a particularly sharp and unanticipated rise in the numbers of low and unskilled workers. More than 95% of these expatriates are concentrated in the private sector. The state is the primary employer of Qataris and only 0.5% of them work in the private sector. This situation made Qatar unique in the world in that over 86% of its population consists of foreigners and fostered institutional disorganization, lack of employee commitment, and the continual loss of the country's specific knowledge. It is obvious that the imbalanced composition of the population and in the disequilibrium in the structure and force of the labor market is affecting Qatar's transition toward knowledge society. Consequently, Qatar must determine a suitable size and quality of its expatriate labor force. It must weigh the consequences of recruiting expatriate workers particularly the potential negative impact on national identity, against the anticipated economic benefits that accrue from an increase in the numbers of foreign workers in the total labor force. Hence, the challenge here is how to choose a development path that is compatible with the targeted size and quality of expatriate labor that are determined by Qatar's leadership and people. The other challenge is how to up skill the Qataris in general and the females in particularly and develop their capabilities to engage in the labor market especially in the private sector in addition to linking education to training. Preparing sufficient numbers of qualified Qataris to meet the demands of the job market particularly in the private sector remain a challenge. (General Secretariat for Development Planning 2008, 7, 18; Ministry of Development Planning and Statistics 2018, 193-195; Weber 2014, 64-74)

8.4. Growth and uncontrolled expansion management

Qatar is moving in rapidity toward creating a solid ground for knowledge society. It has expanded immensely in economic activities and development projects. However, on one hand there are speed limits and on the other expansion has been described as uncontrolled. The over speed and uncontrolled expansion is potentially depleting the resources and burdening the economy particularly in view of the sharp decline in oil and gas revenues, the increase in the budget deficit, and the current Saudi-Led blockade since June 2017. These factors are derailing the country from achieving its targeted objectives and potentially lead to severe problems such as rapidly rising prices of goods and commodities, financial vulnerabilities, low and stagnant labor productivity, deterioration in project quality and completion, and environmental damage. Therefore, the challenge is how to develop and grow at a pace that is consistent with the realistic expectations of sustainable improvements in livelihoods and in the quality of life. It must target growth rates that are compatible with its capacity for real economic expansion. (General Secretariat for Development and Planning 2008, 6)

8.5. Good governance

While investigating the major challenges that face Qatar's transition toward knowledge society one can conclude that the weak governance system is the most challenging as it is almost seen in public and private sectors, and across areas and development projects. Good governance requires building strong and efficient administration and organizations, clarity and accuracy of roles and obligations, recruitment of qualified employees who possess the right skills to provide excellent services and use the infrastructure efficiently. It also entails amendments of existing acts, legislation and enactment of new modern laws in different fields such as labor, immigration, private sector, environment, business and investment, and education, and patent. Providing relevant and accurate statistics and information databases in all fields are extreme importance to any planning, policy making, research and development efforts. Enhancing transparency in all affairs and the culture of continuous evaluation and improvement is also critical to moving toward knowledge society. (Ministry of Development Planning and Statistics 2018, 81-102; 173-251)

8.6. Balancing modernization and preservation of traditions

Preservation of cultural traditions is a major challenge that confronts Qatar knowledge society in a rapidly globalized and increasingly interconnected world. The rapid economic and population growth have created intense strains between the traditional and contemporary features of Qatari life. Current professional work patterns and pressures of competitiveness sometimes clash with traditional relationships that are based on traditional values such as trust and loyalty to kinship and friendship ties. Furthermore, the deep-rooted social values highly cherished by society, such as generosity, and tolerance, have been challenged by the globalization of greater freedoms, wider choices and advancing individualism and personal interests that accompany economic and social progress in the modern world. For instance the American branch universities in Qatar brought their culture and educational methods and exert a strong cultural impact on the country through their graduates who are very competent in entering the work force. Yet the challenge is how to be faithful to the QNV and balance between, or possibly integrate, the qualities of modern life with the country's values and culture to ensure smooth transition toward knowledge society. Should Qatar respond positively to this challenge, its modernization approach could be an exemplary model for other societies to follow particularly in the GCC region. (General Secretariat for Development Planning 2008, 4; Weber 2014, 63)

8.7. Balancing the needs of this generation and the needs of future generations

Qatar's sustainable move toward knowledge society requires a process to meet the needs of this present generation without compromising the needs of future generations. Compromising or threatening the rights of future generation to enjoy the natural resources is injustice. Therefore, the challenge is how to avoid the depletion of non-renewable and create new sources of renewable wealth. There are some sub-challenges related to this challenge most importantly the ineffective use of financial returns from hydrocarbon revenues especially that they are declining due to drop off in oil and gas prices. In addition, the overly aggressive economic development that could lead to economic overstress and risk, tipping the environmental scales irreversibly. Hence, the major challenge here is choosing the development path that carefully balances the interests of the current generation with the interests of future generations. (General Secretariat for Development and Planning 2008, 5)

8.8. Environmental sustainability

The population rise, urban expansion, and industrial activities in hydrocarbon and petrochemicals are the main factors that affect the environmental biodiversity and cause depletion and waste of natural resources, and climate change. Qatar is world's highest per capita CO2 emissions for its energy production over population reaching 40.46 tons per capita per year. It is generally admitted that any sustainable development approaches should not sacrifice the protection of environment on the account of the economic development. Development models often have negative effects on the natural environment. Environmental degradation can be reduced through investment in advanced technologies designed to minimize the damage caused by economic projects. Monitoring the sources of pollution such as the emission of carbon dioxide coming from the hydrocarbon and petrochemical industries, the huge number of means of transports, and dust coming from the construction projects as well as from the desert. Even with Qatar's best efforts, it is impossible to entirely avoid harming the environment, given a development model that primarily depends on hydrocarbon, petrochemicals and heavy industries. Qatar is already committed to enforcing international standards for environmental protection when designing and implementing its industrial projects. It is also committed to making its future path of development compatible with the environmental protection and conservation requirements and best practice. However, Qatar's efforts in protecting the environment is insufficient because it is a part of the Gulf region, which somehow forms one ecological system that is affected by the practices and activities of every country in the region. Thus, the challenge is how Qatar can do more and put better efforts to preserve the environment and encourage all of the Gulf States to make the environment paramount and effectively collaborate in protecting and conserving it. Qatar has also to address the challenges related to sustainable management of the natural resources particularly water and the sources of renewable energy such as the solar energy. (General Secretariat for Development Planning 2008, 8-9, 30-33; Ministry of Development Planning and Statistics 2018, 122, 282-283)

Conclusions

Qatar is a small country in geographical and population size but it is centrally located and equidistant from Europe, Africa and Asia. Despite its small size, Qatar enjoying a good position world's politics, media, economy and is steadily becoming a hub for quality education and international conferences. The discovery of oil and gas fields, together with the quality of leadership especially since the post-independence era have immense impact on the transition from traditional Bedouin tribal community to modern society. The late H.H Sheikh Khalifa Bin Hamad Al-Thani, the Father Emir H.H Sheikh Hamad Bin Khalifa Al-Thani and the present Emir of the State H.H Sheikh Tamim Bin Hamad Al-Thani will be remembered for their immense contributions to Qatar's development and prosperity. The ratification of the Permanent Constitution in 2004 and the launch of National Vision 2030 in 2008 have laid the foundation for Qatar's transition toward knowledge society. They have also mandated the government agencies, education and research institutions to be the engine that creates and drives the change. Qatar University, which is the national university of the country, is promoting excellence in education and scientific development of the Qatari society. It is steadily becoming a hub of modern education with excellent teaching and research records, highly qualified local and international staff, and graduates. Qatar Foundation for Education Science and Community Development is the largest organization in Qatar with a higher objective of 'Unlocking Human Potential'. The large scale investment in knowledge production and dissemination positioned QF to be a globally leading organization for excellence and innovation in research and development that brings enduring benefit to people that transcends sectarian and geographical boundaries. QF has proven its potential as the key driver of research, development and innovation through its large number of entities namely HBKU which offers diverse modern interdisciplinary programs. The IBCs of worldly renowned universities which are producing highly qualified graduates. The QSTP and QNRF that stand at the heart of knowledge production. In addition ARC, WISE and WISH which are very important platforms for knowledge dissemination locally and internationally. Besides, ictQatar made enormous efforts toward Qatar's transition toward knowledge society particularly through digital inclusion, digital content ICT human capital, modernization of the legal and regulatory framework and telecommunications infrastructure. The construction of knowledge society obviously takes time but what could expedite the transition is the ability to identify at least the main challenges and take the appropriate action to overcome them. This research has identified eight major challenges. These challenges relate to reform and development of education and training, diversification of the economy, resolve the expatriate and workforce issues, and efficient management of growth and uncontrolled expansion. Another set of challenges lays in good governance, balancing between modernization and preservation of traditions, balancing the needs of current generation and the needs of future generations, and sustain the environment. The possible impacts of this research is the value that it could bring in exploring Qatar's development from traditional to modern knowledge society. It also provides the most up-to-date data and information about Qatar's knowledge society constituents and their role and contributions. The analysis of the specific key challenges could also be of great value to political leaders and policy makers in Qatar. Besides, the research could potentially contribute to the study of knowledge societies cases and challenges especially in the GCC and Middle East region. This research is an attempt to explore the case of Qatar within the means, time frame and scope of the research. Therefore, future researches could focus on the systematic evaluation of Qatar's achievements toward becoming knowledge society since the launch of the National Vision 2030. Another study could address Qatar's response to challenges in transitioning toward knowledge society. Other imminent researches could address fundamental questions including how do Qataris acquire information and transform it into knowledge? does ICT empowered the Qataris to enhance their livelihood and contributed to the social and economic development of their community? To what extend has the state guided and coordinated its legislative, executive and judicial branches and empowered businesses, nonprofits, academia, other non-state actors to enhance the knowledge society?

THE WEST AND THE LIMITATIONS OF LIBERAL INTERNATIONAL ORDER IN THE POST-CRISIS ERA

Iñigo ARBIOL OÑATE*

Abstract

Recent geopolitical and economic pressures are putting into question the sustainability of the post-1945 liberal international order, as currently conceived. These turns of world politics have vanished the dreams of the liberal international order's regulating and integrating the entire world economically and politically. Instead, we find ourselves in a moment of transition, and if the leading countries of the existing order do not remedy this, we are moving towards a new order that might not be based on the set of western interests and values that shaped the international order in 1945 and 1990.

This article aims to analyze the evolution of two elements. Firstly, it examines some of the pillars on which the international liberal order was built and how their erosion, in the post-Cold War years, has conditioned the future of the liberal international order. Secondly, it explores the impact of the assumption of two false premises since the end of the Cold War until now: the existence of a unique (and American) interpretation of political liberalism for the 21st century and the indissolubleness of the economic and political sides of liberalism.

Keywords: liberal international order, post-Cold War politics, U.S. foreign policy, transatlantic relations.

1. Introduction: The Cold War context of the liberal international order

"The United States has the opportunity and, I would argue, the solemn responsibility to shape a more peaceful, prosperous, democratic world in the 21st century. The story of the 21st century can be quite a wonderful story. But we have to write the first chapter."[1]

W. J. Clinton.

Since 1945, the United States and its allies have exported their values and interests through the formation and preservation of a liberal international order. There is a consensus around the idea that although the United States and the countries of the West have sometimes taken incoherent actions, their values have prevailed as the dominant global regulatory principles for decades.

This article argues that the postwar order is under significant stress from a geopolitical and an economic perspective, owing to western countries' miscalculations in their strategic policies.

First of all, the construction of a minimum conceptual framework is certainly required. In principle, an international order is defined by a set of rules and institutions that regulate the actions of the key actor in the international system. Ikenberry defines it as a set of "governing arrangements between states, including its fundamental rules, principles, and institutions" (Ikenberry 2001,23).

Post-1945 liberal international order constitutes a complex mix of multilateral institutions and a global trading system, both governed by western values. Understanding 'liberal' in its philosophical sense, coming from the conception of the political theory of Hobbes and Locke, the order includes free market and fundamental individual political rights. According to these liberal norms, sovereign states could resolve their political and economic differences and enjoy a shared prosperity. Institutions such as the United Nations, the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund or the World Trade Organization, as well as many regional organizations like the ASEAN or NATO, were designed to guarantee the western actions and principles' leadership. The logic behind this system was that openness, through economies, societies and open policies defended by a collective security network, would contain the Soviet Union. The ideologists of this system of containment hoped that when the ideological dichotomy of the Cold War ceased, these principles could be extended to the whole world.

While the Cold War as a global system did not determine, even in its heyday, everything that was happening in international relations, it did influence most of the global issues. At its core, there was an ideological competition between capitalism and socialism, with each side dedicated to sustaining and expanding its socio-economic system through certain forms of political and economic governance. It was a bipolar system of zero-sum, in which none of the main protagonists foresaw a lasting commitment with the other and whose intensity transformed its nature into dangerous, given the intention of both parties to destroy the opponent (Wright 2017, 4). With the end of this conflict and the dissolution of the Soviet bloc, an almost euphoric wave of optimism swept over the western political world. Shawcross described the triumph of politics and reason as: "There was a belief that […] much of the world could be put to right […], [and] reason, not politics, might prevail" (Shawcross 2000, 31). In relation to the consolidation of the liberal international order, there was a consensus, certainly naive, both in conservative and progressive positions, that peace could reign in a "new world order" based on Western values (Hyland 1999).

2. Post-Cold War and the management of hegemony

Inspired by a Wilsonian fervor and seeking to end civil wars and to put limits on governments that massively violated the most basic rights of their citizens, a new policy was adopted. This was reflected in the early nineties' U.S. national security strategies and in the European Union first Common Foreign and Security Policy, and publicly expressed by the U.N. Secretary-General, who declared the triumph of morality: "We are clearly witnessing what is probably an irresistible shift in public attitudes toward the belief that the defense of the oppressed in the name of morality should prevail over frontiers and legal documents" (Scheffer 1992, 4).

Concentrated on a Kantian peace, the United States, and its allies, consolidated the post-1945 international relations framework, expanding the core community of liberal democracies and advocating for a free-market system. The members of this core community acted as promoters of democracy, confident in the success of transatlanticism and the globalization of its ideological pillars. An excellent example of western confidence in the transformative capacity of democracy was the management of China's entry into the World Trade Organization. During a turbulent decade regarding intra-state conflicts, the world witnessed the beginning of the implementation of the new world order. It expanded the scope of the liberal international order and ensured the globalization of a set of economic and political values. The optimism of the West about its transformative potential led to expanding the concept of westernness, with the case of Eastern Europe as paradigmatic. Parallelly, concepts such as "transatlantic relations" became key elements for the image of a prosperous West, creative and united. This optimism led countries like the United States to acquire new strategic concepts in their strategies, revaluing Cold War time mechanisms such as NATO or the OSCE.

Academia on both sides of the Atlantic was for more than a decade devoted to explaining the nature of this period. Some scholars described positively how the US-led liberal international order was becoming the basic architecture for international politics, and how its norms gained sympathy around the world. Anti-interventionist scholars, like Bacevich, argued that successive post-Cold War administrations adhered to a well-defined strategy of openness, motivated by the imperative of economic expansionism and fostering an open and integrated international order (Bacevich 2002, 79). Other authors were recurrently accusing this order of being an imperial or unipolar hegemony not capable of replacing the Cold War containment with an effective and attractive new basis for its foreign policy. Todd argued that at a time when the rest of the world was discovering that it could get along without American and western leadership, rising leaders were experiencing a growing sense of accord and becoming more boldly defiant toward unilateralism (Todd 2003).

Whether strategies to maintain U.S. and western hegemony were implemented through unilateralism or re-enforcement of the international order mechanism, the hope of the 1990s that so naively led some to declare the end of history (Fukuyama 1993), rested on two false premises: the existence of a unique (and American) interpretation of political liberalism and the indissolubleness of economic and political liberalism.

2.1. The western vision of the world order

The first false premise lies in the mistaken belief that there was a single vision within the West about the management of global issues, in terms of both values and objectives. The culminating moment in which the falsehood of this premise manifested was 9/11. With the adoption of a global anti-terrorism policy, the Bush administration found itself in a situation into a situation famously described by Robert Kagan. He described how Western nations no longer shared a common vision of the world. Especially, he argued, regarding the utility of power and the morality associated with its use. Kagan argued that Europe and the U.S., as major elements of what we call the West, had developed fundamentally different views about what the world was like and how it should be (Kagan 2004).

It is true that for a decade, this emerging division in the interpretation of the present and future of the liberal international order was seen by many as an opportunity to debate and confront opinions and policies. Behind that discussion, there was confidence that emanated from a common concept of the West and trust on the transatlantic bridge firmness. Nevertheless, the end of the Cold War clearly marked the beginning of a transatlantic discussion. Some opted to live by values expressed through norms, and some others by a chaotic unilateral use of what Nye called hard power (Nye, 2005). The political expression of this duality was the division over the intervention in Iraq, decided by President Bush and supported by Prime Minister Blair and President Aznar.

More than a decade after the implosion of the western solid cohesion, the relationships between Europe, the United States and other western allies, such as India or Japan, are now turning more unfriendly and distrustful than ever. Low-level politics, the disappearance of the ideological debate, the substitution of political deliberation for populism, and the absence of strategic priorities are leading towards an erosion and a possible dissolution of the post-war consensus that globalized in the nineties and made the idea of a worldwide extension of the liberal international order possible.

Western governments, which have led the international order for seven decades, have been clumsy or reluctant to recognize this. As Thomas Wright expressed it, "the world had become much more nationalist and competitive" (Wright 2017), and divided westerners have turned their attention to this change. For some scholars and policy-makers, the conclusion is even worse. Despite disagreements between the United States and its allies for decades on how best to support liberal democracy abroad, the idea of permanent engagement as the only possibility for the liberal international order has remained alive. Nevertheless, many argue that this is no longer an undiscussed truth for leading western countries.

One of the consequences of this lack of commitment is the loss of leverage over the rest of the international system actors. As a result of abandoning a common set of priorities, some of the basic political foundations have been put at stake, resting undefended. Liberal democracy, probably one of the most fundamental principles of the international order exported by the West, is facing its most serious crisis in decades. A recent report produced by Freedom House explains how democratic basic tenets, such as guarantees of free and fair elections, the rights of minorities, freedom of the press and the rule of law, are at risk around the world. The report shows how non-western regional powers have taken advantage of the retreat of leading democracies to escalate repression at home and to export their anti-western influence abroad, compromising the future credibility of multilateral institutions and the commitment of western countries to defend their order.

On top of that, from trade or security disputes to climate change, national interests have re-captured primacy. We can provide some examples of this as the Brexit assaults a pure western macro-project: the EU; the triumphant populisms in the European and American elections, which make us wonder whether the democratic nature of our system is no longer un-mutable; the rejection of the TTIP and TPP and the attempt to revert NAFTA, which separates the political and economic faces of liberalism; and finally, yet importantly, the United States opening a selfish and short-minded rationale of why it should remain the global stability provider if the costs of maintaining that order are much larger than the benefits.

Some authors, such as Legvold, explain how, on one the hand, the negative perception of the globalization by the constituencies of the western liberal democracies have paved the way for public lack of commitment for the liberal international order (Legvold 2016). On the other hand, the possibility of challenging the status quo without facing the consequences has created a vacuum of power exploited by others. Conley has recently edited a good collective work describing how the Obama administration projected globally after the 2008 crisis, through a perhaps diffident and excessively multilateral foreign policy agenda, which Trump is minimizing. He refers to the existing situation as a new Cold War, with the participation of Russia, but also China, Iran, North Korea, etc. (Conley 2018). Others, like Westad, claim that while current international affairs continue being challenging, "they are a far cry from Cold War absolutes" (Westad 2018). It is true that frequent Cold War parallels come to our minds and remnants of the bipolar period are familiar to us, but the bases of international affairs have changed. If we want to draw parallelisms, we are much closer to 1871 than to 1963. What we are witnessing is probably a collective dereliction that falls as part of an end of an interregnum.

Trying to identify concrete expressions of how the West is facing consequences in the form of challenges to its dominant position, Grygiel and Mitchell have worked with the term "probes". These are described as aggressive measures against "the frontiers of the rival power's influence, where its interests are less pronounced, its power is at its farthest projection and its political clout at its weakest" (Grygiel and Mitchell 2016). Some examples of probes are the Russian intervention in Ukraine, the Chinese actions to expand its control over the South China Sea, the North Korean missile tests or the Iranian support to its proxies in Iraq, Syria, Lebanon or Yemen. The intention of these probes is to test the power and resolution of the United States (and Western allies like the EU or Japan). These movements have created conflictive situations that avoid direct military clashes, but ultimately seek the revision of the existing regional order.

In the case of China or Russia, although the motivation is shared, not all of these probes share the same strategy. On the one hand, Chellaney accurately identifies China's unilateral attempts to alter the regional status quo as an undisputable large threat to the international order (Chellaney 2018). What China has achieved in the South China Sea, says the author, "has significantly more far-reaching and longer-term strategic implications than, say, Russia's annexation of Crimea" if we analyze it in relation to its presence in Djibouti, Gwadar or the Maldives, examples of the effort to project Chinese blue-water components, clearly antagonistic to the US Navy traditional hegemonic role (Poulin 2016). On the other hand, Russian actions, while interfering in Western-dominated areas such as Crimea, are not only about territory, as they primarily pursue to contest the existing order. Putin observes the West-dominated set of rules and power distribution as a challenge to a self-perceived Russian role in the world. The interference in the US 2016 elections, the violation of fundamental principles of international law, the use of military and covert actions in Ukraine or Georgia, or its massive involvement in the Syrian war to uphold Bashar al-Assad's regime have clearly qualified Russia as a revisionist country, a large-enough actor, in the words of Haass, with "few if any qualms about overturning the status-quo" by whatever means it judges necessary (Haass 2018). Notwithstanding the difference, these and other decisions, are sending the message that defiant unilateralism does not necessarily meet with strong reactions from the Western powers.

As these regional strategies are turning successful, the capacity of the West to maintain control of the international order reduces, and with it, the applicability of the values and norms that the US and its allies have traditionally protected.

2.2. Political and economic convergence

The second wrong premise behind western assumptions at the end of the Cold War was the assumption that economic integration would also stimulate political convergence globally. Thirty years after the instauration of the "new world order", economic and political liberalism have not proven to be indissolubly linked. Indeed, today rising powers in regions that were primarily targeted by western economic policies are actively seeking to review the distribution of power in their respective regions, trying to impose themselves by weakening the United States and its western allies.

Instead of contributing to consolidating the post-1945 liberal international order, the inclusion of non-western countries in in the order's economic mechanisms created the opposite result. New economic mechanisms, inspired by the ones consolidated by the western bloc before, were featured, this time characterized by an anti-western character. Again, the undisputable examples of this are Russia and China.

On the one hand, after the U.S. won the Cold War, attention on Russia dropped and the United States and its allies continued engaged and vigilant, but they lost an opportunity throughout the period that Russia needed to overcome the enormous economic challenges of transforming itself in a market economy. The call for a Russian economic integration and dependence, such as in the field of energy production and distribution, did not bring Russia closer to the international economic mechanisms, but instead, it created a regulatory vacuum that was very soon identified by Vladimir Putin, who utilized it to lead the Russians back to the old days.

On the other hand, Chinese billionaire initiative "Belt Road Initiative" (BRI), presented as the Chinese Marshall Plan, seeks to connect Asia, Europe and Africa by forming a complex network, using roads, harbors, railways, airports, transnational electric grids and pipelines. It constitutes an alternative investment solution that challenges the existing hegemony of the liberal western financial institutions, such as the World Bank or the Asian Development Bank. By promoting infrastructures, trade and new alliances at different levels, it develops a powerful parallel mechanism, outside the western orbit of control.

Luft brilliantly explains how for more than a century, the West has been trying to open China to the rest of the world and to integrate it with the global economy. For most of this time, China "held the door tightly closed, resisting foreign influence. The roles are now reversed as China attempts to mesh its economy and culture with the rest of the world". The BRI is China's mechanism for "withdrawing from its role as the United States' banker, shifting its capital expenditures from bonds to bridges, from IOUs to BTUs" (Luft 2017). By succeeding in this initiative, the BRI could stand firm as the organizing principle of a new Chinese grand strategy for the 21st century.

In face of these realities, leading western governments, and specifically the United States, are not responding by rethinking the initial strategy of economic liberalism inspiring political liberalism. Instead, confused by internal opposition and lack of strategic leadership, they are proposing counterproductive protectionist measures, like the ones being adopted by the Trump administration. This lack of American engagement will essentially allow others to disrupt the liberal international order, politically and economically, and to shape the future of global governance in ways that may be detrimental to western interests.

Conclusions

It is very likely that the United States and its allies will remain the most powerful countries for coming decades, but the electoral and political polarization may cause significant stress on the U.S.-led liberal international order. This order has survived important challenges over the past half-century without fatal damage, but now we are witnessing the unfolding of the consequences of two wrong premises of the 1990s. On the one hand, the emerging powers, mainly Russia and China, have provoked tensions in the international order getting ready to occupy the political and economic spaces that traditionally stronger states have abandoned or neglected.

While further analysis should be focused on foreseen Russian and Chinese actions' catalytic potential to accelerate the collapse of the order, it is required to continue evaluating the extension and the long-term effects for the members of the combined West, because of their important policy implications. The US traditional allies, like Germany, Japan and Australia, crucial pillars of the liberal international order, are confused and make their own calculations about how long they can count on the United States for political and military support. Parallel to the lack of internal coherence and reliance, an increasing number of non-western governments have lost confidence in the western rules-based system, drawing up their own containment plans.

Attempting to minimize or temporarily neutralize any challenge requires a radical turn from current trends of western disengagement. Coalitions' pooling resources to confront common adversaries is probably the only way to keep the balance of power and maintain the basics of nowadays international order for at least a couple of decades. It seems eminently feasible as European countries feel overwhelmed and exposed to Russia's aggressive national security policy implementation. Same in Asia, where most of the former allies, and not only Japan or Korea, feel equally intimidated by China. Even in the Middle East, taking into account the complexity of the Iranian-Saudi power battle, a Western joint venture would clearly improve, at least, the stabilization of the region.

Precisely because the future of the liberal international order is unclear, the United States and its allies have a strategic decision to make about committing the resources and running the risks. Both are required to confront the revisionism of the liberal international order.

The U.S.-created system of alliances has been the cornerstone of the order for seventy years, but the attitude and nature of U.S. and western leadership will have to change to prolong the current order, developing strategies for future shared engagements and the enforcement of rules, while creating fair mechanisms to accommodate the rising powers, is the only possibility.

THE AZERBAIJANI OFFICIAL State DISCOURSE ON THE ARMENIAN-AZERBAIjANI CONFLICT: BLOCKAGES TO PEACE

Lavinia BADULESCU*

Abstract

The intractable conflict between Armenia and Azerbaijan, the first in a series of inter-ethnic wars to arise in the final years of the Soviet Union, has lasted for three decades and has gone through several violent episodes inflicting widespread death and destruction. Against the background of a long period of tried-and-failed resolution attempts, the conflict has led to the fostering of grievances, prejudice, long-lasting societal trauma and victimhood. Starting from these considerations, this paper seeks to emphasize the way in which, in the official state discourse, the Azerbaijani leaders concentrate mainly on their own traumas and victim status. This type of discourse sets off a unilateral solution to the conflict, considered the only right option, thus preventing any dialogue with the Armenian side, and implicitly any resolution of the conflict. From a methodological perspective, I have selected several official speeches belonging to the Azerbaijani leaders between 1994-2016 and held at various national and international forums. The content analysis of the Azerbaijani official speeches will be complemented by the data collected through semi-structured interviews with Azerbaijani experts in the field of International Relations during a field research to Azerbaijan. The paper concludes that trauma and victimhood as reflected in the official Azerbaijani state discourse function as blockages to peace and hinder any changes in the way Azerbaijani leaders represent the conflict and its resolution.

1. Introduction

The Armenian-Azerbaijani conflict over Nagorno-Karabakh (NK) is an intractable conflict that has been lasting for three decades despite the various peace-making attempts undertaking by the international community for its resolution. Amidst occasional and violent flare-ups, this conflict represents a constant threat to the security of the state actors involved, of the encompassing regions and of the international system.

The specialized literature on the Armenian-Azerbaijani conflict abounds in political and legal explanations for its intractability as distinct from the psycho-social ones which have been less an object of scrutiny. Notwithstanding, this conflict contains a great share of psycho-social motivations[1] among which collective trauma and victimhood considered by scholars as having the potential to revive ancient animosities and to make the emotional issues in a conflict become as important as the real issues as stake.[2] Within the framework of an intractable conflict both sides seek to demonstrate that they are the only legitimate victim and suffered more. Thus a sense of collective trauma and victimhood is an inseparable part of the official discourse of the conflicting parties.[3] This paper seeks on the one hand to emphasize the way in which, in the official state discourse, the Azerbaijani leaders concentrates mainly on their own traumas and victim status, and on the other to point out the implications of such a discourse on the peace attempts. For this purpose I have selected the following 17 official speeches belonging to the Azerbaijani leaders between 1994-2016 and held at various national and international forums: President Heydar Aliyev's speeches at the United Nations General Assembly (UNGA) 22/10/1995 and at the Millennium summit 7/09/2000; Heydar Aliyev 's appeal to the Azerbaijani nation on the occasion of the third anniversary of the Khojaly "genocide", 25/02/1995, and the speeches held at the commemoration ceremonies dedicated to the victims of Khojaly, 26/02/1995 and 26/02/2002; President Ilham Aliyev's inaugural speeches from 2003, 2008 and 2013; President Ilham Aliyev's speeches at the official opening of Crans Montana Forum 23/06/2011, at the opening of the Guba genocide memorial established with the support of the Heydar Aliyev Foundation 18/09/2013, at the opening of a new settlement for 632 displaced families in Agdam 6/08/2014, at the opening ceremony of the 3rd Global Baku Forum 28/04/2015, and at the opening

1.1. Brief overview of the Armenian-Azerbaijani conflict over NK

NK region - lying within Azerbaijan's borders, and mainly inhabited by ethnic Armenians - received the status of an autonomous oblast (NKAO) within Azerbaijan Soviet Socialist Republic (SSR) in 1923. On February 20, 1988, the governing body of NKAO voted in favor of the region's unification with the Armenian SSR. This attempt at secession was rejected by Azerbaijan and further led to a war that had devastating material and human consequences. More than 20.000-30.000 lost their lives and hundreds of thousands of others became refugees and internally displaced persons. Furthermore, during the conflict, grave human rights violations and destructions occurred, which left the societies traumatized. The full-scale war between Armenians and Azerbaijanis ended in 1994 with the signing of a ceasefire agreement in Bishkek when Armenia had full control not only over the NK region, but also over seven adjacent regions such as Agdham, Qubadli, Jabrayl, Zangilan, Kalbajar, Lachin and Fizuli. At present, there are no diplomatic relations between Armenia and Azerbaijan, while the NK, together with the seven adjacent regions are under Armenian control.

Since the signing of the ceasefire agreement, the two countries have embarked on a long peace process for finding a solution to the conflict, but without any positive results. The Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe's Minsk Group (OSCE MG), co-chaired by France, the Russian Federation and the United States, has been mediating the conflict between Armenia and Azerbaijan since its creation in 1994. However, all their proposals have been rejected one by one by the parties.

The most significant achievement of the peace process are the so-called Madrid principles introduced by the OSCE MG at the 2007 OSCE Madrid summit. They contain: (a) the return of the territories surrounding NK to Azerbaijani control; (b) an interim status for NK providing guarantees for security and self-governance; (c) a corridor linking Armenia to NK; (d) future determination of the final legal status of NK through a legally binding referendum; (e) the right of all internally displaced persons and refugees to return to their former places of residence and (f) international security guarantees, including a peacekeeping operation.[4] Although under discussion since 2007, Armenia and Azerbaijan have not yet signed them.

Against a backdrop of more than two decades of tried-and-failed attempts at resolution, the violations of the ceasefire agreement gradually intensified, and the conflict embarked on an escalation phase. Although there have always been ceasefire violations, these started to be more prominently reported as from 2014. For instance, in early August 2014, deadly clashes took place along the Line of Contact (LOC) described at the time as being the bloodiest episode since the signing of the ceasefire in 1994[5]. The situation escalated again in November 2014, when an Armenian Mi-24 military helicopter was shot down by Azerbaijani armed forces[6], a novelty for the way in which skirmishes used to take place along the LOC. The ceasefire violations continued in 2015 as well, starting with January. These resulted in 12 victims and 18 injured and were catalogued by the OSCE MG as recording "the highest number of confirmed victims in the first month of a year from the 1994 ceasefire agreement."[7] In the context of increased violent incidents, the co-chairs of the OSCE MG emitted several declarations throughout the first months of 2015, soliciting the parties to respect the terms of the 1994 ceasefire agreement and restart the official peace talks for solving the conflict. They also recognized the deterioration of the military situation on the LOC and the violent trend that continued simultaneous with the 2014 deadly clashes. Nevertheless, April 2016 marked the most serious escalation of the conflict, which "brought Azerbaijan and Armenia the closest they have been to all-out war in NK since the 1994 truce[8]." Although this episode might be included in the cycle of occasional flare-ups characterizing the conflict, it was unprecedented in its intensity, the type of armament used and the human loss[9]. The OSCE MG strongly condemned the outbreak

2. The Azerbaijani official state discourse

The Azerbaijani leaders represent the conflict with Armenia in terms of "invasion", "aggression", "occupation of Azerbaijani territories" and of the number of "internally displaced persons/refugees" resulted from the "ethnic cleansing" perpetrated by Armenia:

"For more than seven years now the aggression of the Republic of Armenia against Azerbaijan has been going on, with the aim of annexing the Nagorny Karabakh region of our country. Armed formations belonging to Armenia have occupied more than 20 per cent of the territory of Azerbaijan. More than 1 million citizens of our country, who are now refugees, have been evicted from the occupied territories and are now living in tent camps in the most difficult circumstances" (Heydar Aliyev, UNGA, 50th session, 22/10/1995);

"Armenia's aggression against Azerbaijan, the aggression which brought countless calamities to millions of people is the main destabilizing factor in the Southern Caucasus. During this aggression, the Armenian armed forces have occupied 20 percent of the territories of Azerbaijan, conducted ethnic cleansing and forced one million Azerbaijanis to leave their native homes" (Heydar Aliyev, Millennium summit, 7/09/2000);

"Armenia continues its aggressive policy against Azerbaijan. As a result of this policy and the policy of ethnic purge, 20 percent of our lands are still under occupation. One million Azerbaijanis suffering from the policy of ethnic cleansing cannot yet return to their lands" (Ilham Aliyev, inaugural speech, 24/10/2008).

Moreover, in the official Azerbaijani state discourse, the conflict with Armenia is put forward as being "the most painful problem" and "a severe blow" that ever happened to Azerbaijan in its history. In his inaugural speech from 2003, President Aliyev stated that "The conflict with Armenia is the most painful problem of our country" whereas in his speech at the official opening of Crans Montana Forum in Brussels on 29 June 2012, he emphasized that:

"One of the main problems after the restoration of independence was the occupation of our lands by Armenia. This dealt a severe blow to us. This dealt a severe blow to the security and cooperation in the entire region. Nagorno-Karabakh is internationally recognized historical territory of Azerbaijan which Armenia has occupied. Armenia has conducted a policy of ethnic cleansing on these Azerbaijani lands. In general, 20 per cent of our land is currently under Armenian occupation."

As resulted from the above-mentioned excerpts, Azerbaijani leaders have built a victim-type discourse centred mainly on the Armenian "aggression" and "occupation" of Azerbaijani territories and the human consequences it caused among a significant category of Azerbaijani people labelled as refugees and internally displaced persons. Thus, Azerbaijani leaders' representations of the conflict are made through the victim status perspective they claim directly. Azerbaijanis consider themselves victims of both a policy of occupation and ethnic cleansing committed by Armenia. Furthermore, Azerbaijani leaders attribute the causes of their people suffering exclusively to the Armenian enemy. This essentialist view encountered in the official Azerbaijani discourse assign all the blame on Armenia and excludes any situational factors.[11] Thus the Armenian side becomes the main guilty and solely responsible for the situation Azerbaijan is confronted with. This type of discourse serves as the basis for building a common reality in which the victim status is attributed solely to the Azerbaijani side which considers itself as having suffered the most. The same way of representing the conflict with Armenia centred on the victim status of Azerbaijan was also noted in the semi-structured interviews I applied to several Azerbaijani experts. The interviewees constantly resorted to formulations such as "we are the victims", "Armenians have occupied our territories" or "we still suffer because of the occupation."

The victimhood experiences of Azerbaijanis are connected to the traumas they suffered during the conflict and which are always inserted in the official discourse. Among these, Azerbaijani leaders refer mainly to one particular episode which took place in Khojaly on the night between 25-26 February 1992. This is described by Thomas de Wall in his book Black Garden. Armenia and Azerbaijan through Peace and War as being the most violent and bloodiest during the active phase of the conflict causing a great number of civilian deaths.[12] The Khojaly episode is represented by the Azerbaijani leaders as being a "genocide", "a crime against humanity", and "a massacre." For highlighting the gravity of this traumatic experience, the pain and injustice it entails among Azerbaijanis, but also the evil nature of the Armenian enemy, Azerbaijani leaders use superlatives among which "the bloodiest page of our history", "the most horrible act of savagery", "one of the most brutal terror acts" and detail the "Armenian atrocities":

"Three years have passed since the genocide in Khojaly which is the bloodiest page of our history. This genocide is the most horrible act of savagery and a *crime not only against the Azerbaijani nation, but also against the whole humanity" (Heydar Aliyev to the Azerbaijani nation on the occasion of the third anniversary of the Khojaly "genocide", 25/2/1995);*

*"The Khojali massacre is a tragic page of our history as well as one of the most brutal terror acts in the history of mankind ... The Khojali tragedy is a bloody page of the Armenian policy of ethnic cleansing and genocide against the Azerbaijani people ... The Azerbaijani government, citizens and diaspora abroad take a lot of measures for informing the world community about the massacre: books are being written, research is being made, the massacre is being discussed in the parliaments of different countries and international organizations ..." (Heydar Aliyev, ceremony dedicated to the third anniversary of the Khojali victims, 26/02/2002);*

*"I would like our guests to know that our country and people have also been faced with a major humanitarian catastrophe. In the early 1990s, as a result of Armenia's military aggression against Azerbaijan, 20 per cent of our land was under occupation. As a result of this occupation and the policy of ethnic cleansing, more than one million Azerbaijanis became refugees and IDPs in their own land ... Innocent people were killed. A war crime was committed against our people – the Khojaly genocide. As a result of genocide in the town of Khojaly, 613 civilians were killed, including 106 women and 63 children. All these Armenian atrocities have been documented" (Ilham Aliyev, opening of the Fifth Baku International Humanitarian Forum, 29/09/2016).*

The official discourse surrounding the Khojaly trauma is characterized by an emotional style that includes feelings of pain, injustice, sorrow linked with Azerbaijani collective memory of past trauma and negative representations of Armenians. This specific trauma is evoked not only at the national anniversaries commemorating this event, but also in every official speech of the Azerbaijani leaders on the Armenian-Azerbaijani conflict and its resolution where it is presented as the most important traumatic event in the history of Azerbaijan's history, beyond any comparison with any other violent event, and which has created immeasurable suffering still with an impact on the lives of today's Azerbaijanis. The memory of this past trauma and the experience of loss triggers strong emotions and its successive reply in the official Azerbaijani discourse reactivates and reinforces the pain associated with it. The following speech of President Heydar Aliyev encompasses these elements:

*"Throughout its history the Azerbaijani people faced a lot of tragedies. One of them is the Armenian aggression lasting for six years, which caused a lot of losses, including victims and occupation of our territories. But the Khojaly massacre is the most tragic of all. The Khojaly genocide committed by the Armenian aggressors is one of the most brutal events ... one of the most cruel tragedies in the history of the mankind ... We suffered a lot. However, the murder of the innocent people, including women, children, the old and the sick was the most tragic event of the six-year war. The Khojaly tragedy demonstrated the real ambitions of the Armenian aggressors. The Azerbaijani people was stabbed in the heart in that horrific night. It still hurts us ... The Khojaly tragedy is a source of sorrow for us" (Heydar Aliyev, ceremony dedicated to the third anniversary of the Khojaly "massacre" 26/02/1995).*

From the above-mentioned excerpt, it can be seen how the Khojaly trauma is transformed in a symbol of national pain. Furthermore, to stress the national pain associated with this traumatic experience, the Azerbaijani leaders always insert in their speeches the sudden and unexpected uprooting of those who have become displaced and who are called "refugees on their own lands." Thus, the plight of Azerbaijani displaced people represents for Azerbaijani leaders a living proof of the suffering of their nation:

*"Speaking about humanitarian issues, I want to say a few words about our most disturbing problem of course. Azerbaijan has been faced with a humanitarian catastrophe for 20 years. For 20 years, the internationally recognized ancestral lands of Azerbaijan in Nagorno-Karabakh and surrounding seven districts have been under Armenian occupation. This occupation continues. Azerbaijanis have been subjected to a policy of ethnic cleansing. All the Azerbaijanis have been driven out of Nagorno-Karabakh and surrounding districts. Currently, the world's biggest number of refugees per capita is registered in Azerbaijan. We have over a million refugees and IDPs who can't return to their homes because of the ongoing Armenian aggression" (Ilham Aliyev, opening of the Second Baku International Humanitarian Forum, 4/10/2012);*

*"We suffered from occupation as almost 20 percent of our territories is still under occupation and more than one million Azerbaijanis became refugees and internally displaced on their own lands. We suffered from ethnic cleansing, from Khojaly genocide, which is recognized already by more than 10 countries, and this process continues" (Ilham Aliyev, opening ceremony of the 3rd Global Baku Forum, 28/04/201);*

*„We have been subjected to an injustice. About 20 per cent of our land is under occupation. More than a million refugees and displaced persons are suffering from this conflict. Armenia has conducted a policy of ethnic cleansing against us and committed the Khojaly genocide" (Ilham Aliyev, reception of the heads of diplomatic missions and international organizations of Muslim countries in Azerbaijan on the occasion of the holy month of Ramadan, 8/06/2016).*

The plight of the Azerbaijani displaced persons was also highlighted by the Azerbaijani experts I interviewed. The majority shared that the most disappointing aspect of the Armenian-Azerbaijani conflict was the situation of the displaced who have been banished from NK and the surrounding regions and who can't return there thirty years later. One example of latent solidarity sensed among the interviewees is the following:

*"I have never been in Nagorno-Karabakh, but I know people from there and I have this connection with them. If they are suffering, I am suffering too. They are my compatriots. They suffer … how could I be happy with this? (R.G., November 2012, Baku).*

The Khojaly trauma has been reproduced through discursive and commemorative practices throughout generations and transformed into a central collective trauma with repercussions on the daily lives of Azerbaijani people. This past trauma falls into the category of "chosen" traumas, a term originally coined by Vamik Volkan to refer to the shared mental representations of past traumatic events that have caused a large group to face serious assault, suffer loss and experience helplessness, shame and humiliation at the hands of a group. According to the author, the term "chosen" reflects "a large group's unconscious choice to add a past generations' mental representations of an event to its own identity."[13] Also, the "chosen" trauma is encoded in the collective memory of the victimized group who remains with psychological wounds that they transmit over generations as it is the case of Azerbaijanis and the Khojaly trauma. Furthermore, as evidenced by the above-mentioned excerpts of speeches, the Azerbaijani leaders choose to remember and emphasize only their own trauma, with little regard towards Armenians' own suffering, thus reproducing the "egoism of victimization."[14] This tendency has further led to competitive victimhood claims, that it is the assertion of a group that it has been subjected to greater suffering than the adversarial group.[15] Bearing on the severity of their respective sufferings, Azerbaijanis claim that they have endured more harm and injustice than Armenians as well as minimize and even question Armenians' past traumas:

*"The Khojaly tragedy occurred in front of the whole world. In other words, we are seeing it not as some sort of a myth, such as the totally unfounded myth of the "Armenian genocide", but on the basis of real facts. Videos, photos and testimonies of eye-witnesses – this is the truth and reality. But for some reason certain people don't want to see this, while others try to portray Armenians as victims" (Ilham Aliyev, the opening of the Guba genocide memorial established with the support of the Heydar Aliyev Foundation, 18/09/2013).*

This conflict-supporting discourse centred on trauma and victimhood shape at its turn the way in which Azerbaijani leaders envision the resolution of the conflict. They endorse a solution of the conflict that takes into account the "unjust" situation the Azerbaijani state is confronted with due to the "occupation" of its territories and the displacement of a large category of its population. According to President Ilham Aliyev:

*"From the perspective of international law, Nagorno-Karabakh is an integral part of Azerbaijan … we want our lands back. We want the lands of our ancestors back. We are right in our wish. Justice and international law support our position. Therefore, the situation of neither peace nor war cannot last any longer" (Speech at the opening of a new settlement for 632 IDP families in Agdam, 6/08/2014);*

*"I have repeatedly expressed my thoughts on this matter. There is no change in our position, and the people support and endorse this position. This conflict must be resolved within the framework of Azerbaijan's territorial integrity. There is no other way … We want the issue to be resolved so that our lands could be freed from occupation and Azerbaijani displaced persons could return to their ancestral lands" (Speech at the official reception on the occasion of the Republic Day, 27/05/2016).*

Thus, the Azerbaijani leaders support "only" a solution based on the territorial integrity of Azerbaijan while other options are out of the question. From an Azerbaijani perspective, the resolution of the Armenian-Azerbaijani conflict "must" start from the following considerations: the illegal occupation of Azerbaijani territories and the necessity of respecting the rules of international law. The official discourse on this topic sets off a unilateral solution to the conflict, considered the only right option, thus revealing inflexibility and lack of compromise as shown by the way the Azerbaijani leaders formulate their arguments:

*"Nagorno-Karabakh is native Azerbaijani land, an integral part of Azerbaijan. The whole world recognizes Nagorno-Karabakh as an integral part of Azerbaijan. Azerbaijan's position is unambiguous, based on justice and historical truth. Our historical land of Nagorno-Karabakh is an integral part of Azerbaijan from both political and legal points of view. Any concessions on the issue of territorial integrity are out of the question … Azerbaijan's territorial integrity is not in any doubt and the conflict must be resolved only within the framework of territorial integrity … the truth, justice and international law are on our side" (Ilham Aliyev, inaugural speech, 19/10/2013);*

"For a peaceful solution to the issue Armenia must vacate the occupied lands. There is no other option … Our territorial integrity is not, never has been [14] According to John Mack, "the egoism of victimization" refers to the tendency of an ethno-national group, as a direct result of its own historical trauma, to exclusively concentrate on its own sufferings and to not show any empathy towards the sufferings of another group. For further details see John Mack, "The Enemy System" in The Psychodynamics of International Relationships. Vol. I: Concepts and Theories, ed. Vamik D. Volkan, Julius A. Demetrios and Joseph V. *and never will be the subject of negotiations. This conflict must be resolved within the territorial integrity of our country. There is no other option" (Ilham Aliyev at the meeting of the Security Council under the President of Azerbaijan, 2/04/2016).*

The same idea of justice associated with the resolution of the Armenian-Azerbaijani conflict has been noticed during the interviews with Azerbaijani experts. The interviewees have constantly resorted to formulations such as: "the situation is unjust", "the situation is unacceptable", "we want justice" or "we will never accept our territories to remain in Armenia's possession." Furthermore, they underlined that "Azerbaijan is the victim country because its territories are occupied" and therefore, from this perspective, "Armenia must do the first step in the peace negotiations and show good will in solving the conflict by liberating the occupied territories." The Azerbaijani experts also underscored that "Azerbaijan, even from the position of a victim country, was able to compromise and offer to NK the highest level of autonomy within the territorial integrity of Azerbaijan." This would imply that "Azerbaijan reached its compromise limits and now it's time for Armenia to show the same compromise capacity so as to achieve a symmetry in the mediation process." In this sense, the interviewees proposed that "a good start would be the withdrawal of Armenian troops from two or three occupied territories, if not from the all seven." This perspective appears also in the official Azerbaijani state discourse:

*"The Armenian armed forces must first withdraw from Nagorno-Karabakh and other occupied lands. The most acceptable option here is a phased settlement. We have repeatedly spoken about that. Only a gradual settlement can bring about a solution to the issue" (Ilham Aliyev at the official reception on the occasion of the Republic Day, 27/05/2015).*

The official Azerbaijani discourse directs the public towards a very specific set of emotions such as anger, pain, fear, bitterness, injustice which constitutes the dominant emotional style for representing the Armenian-Azerbaijani conflict and its resolution. From an Azerbaijani perspective, it seems unfair for the country which sees itself as the unjustly harmed party to make any further concessions that would benefit Armenia. This is a typical reaction employed in cases of intractable conflicts where making concessions is viewed as unbearable on the one hand because of the ongoing sense of victimhood and on the other because the negotiation partner is perceived as responsible for the unjustified suffering and pain within the current conflict.[16] Hence, reaching a negotiated solution against the backdrop of such a reaction becomes difficult to conclude. Azerbaijan's self-presentation as the only legitimate victim, with focus on the unjust harm and atrocities perpetrated by the Armenian enemy seen as an illegitimate perpetrator, leads to the shaping of an official Azerbaijani discourse of victimhood which supports the deepening of division and mistrust between the conflicting parties, the fostering of negative intergroup attitudes and contributes to the continuation of the conflict. In turn such an official discourse trapped in a circle of collective past trauma and victimhood creates a barrier to the development of a constructive dialogue with the opponent and to the peaceful resolution of the conflict since it sustains the dynamic of confrontation and the promotion of escalation.

3. Conclusions

The Armenian-Azerbaijani conflict over NK is an intractable conflict that has been lasting for three decades entailing long-lasting societal trauma, widespread death, destruction and victimhood. The Armenian "occupation" of NK and the seven surrounding regions, which make up some 20% of the country, together with the mass population displacement it has caused represent a traumatic experience for Azerbaijanis as reflected in the official Azerbaijani state discourse. The Azerbaijani leaders choose to concentrate in their speeches only on their own traumas and victimhood status, showing no regard towards what the Armenian enemy has suffered at its turn in the past. Among the traumas remembered, the 1992 Khojaly episode with its "open wounds" plays a central role. The constant reprisals of the traumatic experiences lived in the past at the hands of the Armenian enemy reinforces a deep sense of victimhood among Azerbaijanis. As shown by the official selected speeches and the semi-structured interviews, Azerbaijanis claim their own group as being the only legitimate victim of the conflict. This understanding serves as the basis for building a common reality where the attribution of the victim status exclusively to one sole party, to the one which considers itself as having suffered the most, is done by negating the losses the Armenian enemy has registered in the past and minimizing its suffering. This type of discourse sets off a unilateral solution to the conflict based on the territorial integrity of Azerbaijan and considered as the only right option, thus showing reduced willingness for compromise. Hence, trauma and victimhood as reflected in the official Azerbaijani state discourse hinder any changes in the way Azerbaijani leaders represent the conflict and its resolution and serve as a blockage to peace, thus contributing to the protraction of the conflict.

ISSUES AND ACHIEVEMENTS REGARDING THE STRATEGY OF INCREASING THE PROCESS OF LOCAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Constantin BRĂGARU*

Abstract

In the last years local development has undeniably became one of the dominant elements for productivity growth strategy employment, human welfare, entrepreneurship promotion, obtaining human capital and income increase.Assuring sustainable development for a specific region is a complex process in the measure in which this process is subjected to some factors which cannot be controlated by a local, regional, or national administration.The entire post-revolution and post-accesion experience, cumulate with good policy making transfered by Romania to European Union, proves that private public partnership is a viable solution for successfully solving some communitary problems, public interests starting with social services and complex social-economic development projects including infrastructure projects.

The present paper focuses on sustainable development and the specific objectives that Romania intends to achieve in order to reach a new model of development that is capable of generating high value added, is interested in knowledge and innovation, and aims to improve the quality of life in harmony with the natural environment.

The paper also analyzes the process of local development that Romania started in 2000 with the financial support of United Nations Development Programme - "Romania within the framework of Local Agenda 21" and continued within Regional Operational Programme 2007-2013 and now,2020-2030.

Introduction

Current policies cannot anymore focus mainly on their short - term impact but they have also to be more forward looking as well as more consistent between each others.Economical development is a must in the terms of a powerfull and accelerated process of globalization which has surrounded the entire world. Therefore local authorities must find good strategies in order to improve the production of goods and services. In the process of sustainable development management effectiveness of protected areas is an important indicator of how well protected areas are conserving biodiversity. This is critical as most nations use protected areas as a cornerstone of biodiversity conservation. The introduction of the concept of sustainable development in recent policy-making has been a major turning point for our societies over the last two decades. Given the complexity of the concept of sustainable development, my intention in writing this paper was measuring what counts for the well-being of both present and future generations. I was inspired in treating this matter by the importance of the global need to identify the most suitable solutions and strategies in order to mantain life on this planet, by promoting human well-being through managing natural resources without hurting biodiversity. Decisions human made that influence biodiversity affect the well-being of themselves and other. We only have one planet it's not like we have a spare one in the backyard! In the past decades there was written a lot of specialized literature regarding conservation and sustainable use of diversity of species, habitats and ecosystems on the planet. Therefore I have related my paper to some of them in order to improve my study on sustainable development through conserving environment and socioeconomic development. Official statistics are well equipped because of both the commitment to impartiality and the diversity of the available expertise to provide the robust statistical tools – and in particular statistical indicators – which are required to adequately assess the implementation of current policies. Even if the current set of EU sustainable development indicators is still largely imperfect, a proactive approach like the one followed by Eurostat has increased the profile of official statistics and may help to shape future policies on the basis of a more rigorous assessment of the current situation.

1. Sustainable development. Definition. The EU Strategy for Sustainable Development (SDS)

Sustainable development has been defined in many ways, but the most frequently quoted definition is from Our Common Future, also known as the Brundtland Report[1]:

"Sustainable development is development that meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs. It contains within it two key concepts:

- the concept of needs, in particular the essential needs of the world's poor, to which overriding priority should be given; and
- the idea of limitations imposed by the state of technology and social organization on the environment's ability to meet present and future needs."

1.1. Issues and concerns specific to Romania

A series of aspects of the implementation of sustainable development principles are not featured by the Strategy for Sustainable Development of the European Union: problems that have been overcome by the countries at the core of the EU many decades ago and thus are no longer object of priority concerns. In Romania's case, certain indicators (e.g. the structure of property in agriculture, access to drinking water and sewage networks, energy efficiency and resource consumption per value unit of final product, the quality o professional training, etc.) are still only slightly over the average level of developing countries. This section is dedicated to clarify such problems that must be solved in parallel and simultaneously with the effort to meet the norms and standards of the European Union.

Meeting the objectives of the Romanian National Strategy for Sustainable Development could be affected negatively by the interference of internal and external factors. Some of them can be foreseen, although their impact is difficult to evaluate and predicted quantitatively or placed in time.

However, prospecting the causes that could generate such issues and the solutions to diminish their effects is absolutely necessary. The following can be regarded as main endogenous risk factors:

- incoherence and inconsistence in economic policies caused by political instability and/or by ignoring the principles of sustainable development, independently of the composition of the parliamentary majority or the doctrines of political parties;
- delays in the implementation of an improved decision-making system and failure to induce responsibility within the public institutions for the results of the policies promoted by them, failure to improve the efficiency of impact assessment and of the use of monitoring and evaluation techniques;
- formalist, inefficient cooperation of public institutions with the private sector (patronates), professional associations and social partners in the elaboration and implementation of public policies and the measures for increasing competitiveness based on the rise of labour productivity and the productivity of resources, or the promotion of export activities to insure macroeconomic equilibrium;
- clientelistic selection of priorities in the allocation of public funds away from projects with potential for major, long-term, positive socio-economic impact and positive, neutral or at most minimal impact on the environment, based on competent evaluation of the report between financial effort and effects, on medium-long term;
- delaying efforts for a substantial increase of administrative capacity, of the potential to generate projects eligible for financing from the point of view of economic, social and economic efficiency, and to execute such projects within established terms through feasibility studies; delaying such measures could reduce the degree of access to EU funds and the possibility to cover the current account deficit;
- inconsistency and limited efficiency of policies oriented towards the continuation of the dis-inflation process, which could have a serious negative effect on macroeconomic equilibriums and sustainable economic growth;
- the lack of capacity to anticipate extreme weather phenomena resulting from climate change (prolonged periods of drought, floods) and to take measures to limit their potential effects on agriculture and on food prices;
- the tendency for increase of consumer debt and of imports for current consumption;
- the increase of income decoupled from productivity growth as a result of populist policies exercised during pre-electoral periods;
- delaying the implementation of adequate measures to reduce energy intensity significantly and to tap alternative sources of oil and gas supply, which could put under risk economic activities and private consumption;
- inefficient use of public funds destined to primary and continued human resource formation and to stimulate R&D activities which represent key areas for sustainable development. Among the external risk factors to be taken into account are:
- the amplification of upward trends in oil, natural gas and uranium prices, that can generate serious effects on inflation and energy security;
- uncertainties regarding foreign investors on emerging markets that could be caused mainly by the increase of the foreign deficit and the unpredictability of the fiscal policy, with negative effects on the volume and quality of investment in the productive sectors of the economy, and on the coverage from this source of the current account deficit;
- increasing the cost of foreign financing as an effect of the possible decrease of the country rating, which may have undesirable effects on the exchange rate of the national currency and on the inflation rate; Regarding the precise identification of risk factors and for the management of crisis events, we recommend:
- the formation of a roster of risk evaluators and specialists in crisis management to be inserted in decision support structures,
- the development, through foresight exercises, of instruments for the prevention, management and dilution of crisis effects;
- integrating, on the basis of professional competency, of Romanian specialists in EU expert networks for crisis management;
- preparing contingence plans and portfolios of solutions in anticipation of system vulnerabilities and their potential effects in crisis situations.

2. Sustainable growth: structural change and macroeconomic balance

The current strategy starts with the premises that the achievement of accelerated growth in the long run in all three essential components (economic, social and environmental) is not just one of options possible, but the essential condition for the gradual reduction of the gaps between the levels of quality of life in Romania and the EU within the shortest possible timeframe, and for the insurance of real cohesion at national and EU levels.

Entering the common market of the European Union, the improvement of the business environment and of 53 the conditions for competition, the consolidation of the private sector and its contribution to the formation of the gross domestic product, the rise of the rate and quality of investment are encouraging factors that favour the continuation of growth. Annual GDP growth rate of 5.6-5.8% between 2007-2013, of 4.8-5% between 2015-2020 and 3.8-4.3% in the 2021-2030 period constitute feasible operational targets, close to the estimated GDP levels for each period.

Insuring long-term performance for the Romanian economy imposes, in consequence, the adoption and implementation of active, coherent policies and of effective instruments that shall allow substantial improvements in the administration and valorisation of current potential in certain key domains that determine sustainable development in conditions of market competition. Without substituting the existing development programmes of Romania, the current Strategy proposes a focalized vision towards attaining long-term objectives that transcend current timeframes through the perspective of sustainability principles stipulated by the Directives of the European Union and the main tendencies observed at the global level.

Insuring the sustainability of energy and material resource consumption in the long run, based on the realistic evaluation of the support capacity of natural capital. It follows that there is significant potential for the reduction of energy consumption, mainly through the rise of energy efficiency in the manufacturing and service sectors, and the reduction of the considerable technical losses in the residential sector. According to the national Programmes regarding energy efficiency, it is foreseen that primary energy intensity could be reduced by 2020 at 0.26 TOE/1000 Euro GDP relative to 2013 (0 .34 TOE / 1000 Euro of GDP). It is foreseen that relevant primary and secondary EU legislation will evolve towards setting more ambitious objectives and more strict regulations, in conformity with the Lisbon Agenda.

From the analysis of the evolution of the Romanian manufacturing industry in recent years, it results that in energy- and materials intensive sectors (steel industry, oil refinement, chemicals, building materials – typically polluting industries which provide around 25% of total production) resource productivity is in decline as a result of increased intermediary consumption. Compared to the year 2000, the total resource consumption in the steel industry increased by 48% while value added decreased by 2.6%. In the oil industry, a 12.4% increase in value added demanded a 50% increase in resource consumption. In 2005, total resource productivity in the steel industry was of only 0.18, in the downstream oil industries of 0.34, and of 0.55 over the entire manufacturing industry. Similar examples of decreasing resource productivity relative to value added can be found in agriculture and forestry. In this cases also, it can be assumed that significant improvements can be obtained within a reasonable timeframe by promoting policies to stimulate technological modernization and the increase of the share of products with high processing levels destined both to local consumption and for export. Perfecting, in a first stage, a series of voluntary agreements with the patronates (as it is already in practice in some EU countries) and adopting regulation that will shift some of the labour tax burden on the consumption of material resources and energy, could motivate economic actors to take measures for the increase of resource productivity, which would result in a positive impact on costs, competitiveness and the sustainability of resource use. Taking into account a considerable future increase in the import of primary energy and materials resources, it is necessary to elaborate a specialized strategy for the diversification of supply sources as well as for insuring their security through longterm agreements.

The gradual modernization of the macro-structure of the economy in correspondence with social and environmental needs The increase of services share in the formation of the Gross Domestic Product from 48.8% in 2006 to 58-60% in 2013 and 70% in 2020 (the current average level of EU-25) and the qualitative upgrade of services, will also determine the increase of economic efficiency and of competitiveness in the other sectors of the economy, with positive social effects on the vertical mobility of the workforce and of the level of qualification and compensation in domains such as R&D, financial services, computer science, management training, consultancy and expertise, etc. This will contribute directly to the growth of total productivity of resources used by the economy as a whole, considering that the services sector shows a typically higher ration of gross vale added over intermediary consumption, then those typical for agriculture, manufacturing or building. The adjustment of inter-sartorial structures will take pace particularly through the stimulation of priority development of those sub-structures that realize high value 55 added with lower resource consumption, especially through the use of renewable or recycled resources. In industry, the accent will fall on the endowment with technologies of high and medium complexity and on the introduction in own production of technologies with an high synergy that could bring a significant contribution to the growth of the volume and value concentration of exports. Eco-efficiency and the use of the best available technologies (BAT) will become, in a higher measure, essential criteria in investment decisions, especially for public procurement. The most profound changes will probably take place in rural areas through the replacement of archaic structure, of the production practices and the appearance of the Romanian village, while preserving its local identity and specific culture. The development of the organic agro-industry, engaging local communities in activities of environmental rehabilitation and conservation, their direct partnership in the preservation of monuments and historic and cultural sights, insuring access to basic social and community services, the reduction and elimination of poverty, the improvement of communications and of market relations, will contribute to the gradual relief of urban-rural disparities in the quality of life. Considering the demand for development preserving regional profiles, of the need for optimum absorption of co-financing resources from EU sources and of the need to attract supplementary investment particularly for the modernization infrastructure for the provision of urban services, for the support of agriculture activities and for transport, increased effort is critical for the creation and permanent update of a portfolio of viable projects accompanied by professional pre-feasibility studies, that benefit from the active support from all decision factors and the local communities.

3. Raising labour productivity and the occupation rate

The level of labour productivity over the entire economy (GDP/employed person) as well as at sector and enterprise levels (gross value added/employee) is still vastly inferior in Romania compared to EU levels. The relatively low level of Romanian wages, particularly in the lower end of the scale, is explained precisely by this productivity gap reflected, in approximately the same rapport, in the quality of employment and the volume of taxable income. The slow renewal of the technology base, the low quality of infrastructure, chronic under-financing, the weak contribution of local R&D, the low performance of products and services offered on the market, the insufficient capacity for adaptation to the global market, were the main causes that hinder not just labour productivity but also the productivity of resources in monetary terms. Although in recent years the rhythm of labour productivity growth in Romania, especially in he processing and building industries, has been higher then the average EU rate, the difference of levels remains very high. Since resource productivity (the productivity of resources in monetary terms) and labour productivity are the main factors of efficiency and competitiveness and, implicitly, of the sustainability of economic and social development, significant administrative and financial efforts must be undertaken to remedy the present situation and attain the current benchmark of the EU. the urgency of such measures 56 is underscored by the unfavourable demographic developments, worsening in the case of Romania. In the same time, it is necessary to improve the rate of occupation of the potentially active population that, between 2002 and 2006 was of 57.9% only in Romania compared to the EU-27 average of 63.1% for the same period. Through investment in human capital, an occupation rate of over 62% is estimated for 2013, with the tendency of constant improvement for the following periods (up to 64-65% in 2020).

4. Improving the quality of micro and macroeconomic management

In the following period, a qualitative improvement of economic management will be necessary at all levels - from regional to enterprise level, to insure the efficient, complete use of capital resources available and to attract new, supplementary financing sources for investment in the endowment with modern technology, in the formation and superior qualification of the labour force, in scientific research, in technological development and innovation. In as much as the sustainable growth of the gross domestic product is determined by the evolution of value added achieved by economic agents, the extension of effective management is crucial for all key points of activity in each unit producing goods and services: administrative, technical, technological, financier, logistic, commercial, and the administration of human resources. In this respect, the establishment of specific performance criteria for public sector managers is essential, along with encouraging the application of exacting standards in the private sector through engaging the responsibility of stockholders and administration councils in monitoring management performance in conformity with the minimum standards established for the increase of value added, competitiveness and profit. It is also envisaged to re-evaluate the policies for the amortization of physical assets in correlation with technological progress in each domain of activity, in order to prevent technical depreciation of the capital that typically generates major consumption of energy, materials and labour resources, with negative effects on competitiveness. The implementation of multi-annual, medium-term budgets as standard practice for firms is necessary to insure the existence of a long-term vision regarding the development perspective and the formulation of efficient investment policies, and the adaptation of the production volume and structure to anticipated market trends.

5. The government is promoting public-private partnerships (PPPs)

As a new channel for attracting foreign investments to Romania, which last year reached a post-crisis high of EUR 4 billion. The new PPP law comes roughly seven years after the private sector and public authorities struggled with different, flawed legislation.

Investors are waiting for the publication of the implementation rules for the new PPP law no 233/2016, which was approved at the end of 2016. Legal experts said that the new rules should promote functional partnerships between public bodies and private players, and it might take additional time for the authorities to learn the ropes when dealing with such initiatives. Representatives of foreign investors in Romania suggested that pilot PPP projects should be launched first. The government has not yet announced any such projects.

The new legislation can accommodate various PPP structures without overregulation and provides clear separation from the scope of the new concession and public acquisitions legislation.Going deeper into the provisions that interest investors, the new PPP law includes two structures for project development.

There are PPPs of a purely contractual nature, where the PPP agreement is concluded between the public partner, the private partner and the project company, which is wholly owned by the private partner. And there are the PPPs of an institutional nature that involve cooperation between the private and public partner within the project company, which is held jointly by the public and private sector, and becomes party to the PPP agreement after its registration.

Although the current center-left government claims that major PPP projects will be financed from Romania's planned wealth fund, it is still too early to say if this initiative is feasible considering that the fund is still in the design stage. Public authorities aim to turn the Sovereign Fund for Development and Investments (FSDI) into the main financing engine for the construction of roads, hospitals and industrial assets. The fund should reach EUR 10 billion in size, according to recent statements by policymakers.

Legal experts say the new law is more versatile because it provides more financing mechanisms for public and private partners involved in such projects.

Under the new law, the investment costs of the project can be funded entirely by the private partner, or by both partners. For the public partner, the source of funding is, however, limited to EU grants consisting of post-accession non-reimbursable funds and the related national contribution. The public partner may also choose to provide contingent mechanisms, for example guarantees to the project lenders, or to grant various rights to the project company, such as the right to collect user payments, as well as concession, superficies or use rights over the assets used for the project.

Foreign investors are waiting for the application norms of the new PPP law before starting to think about projects that could be developed in partnership with the state. However, the state will have to provide clear guarantees that it will fully comply with the requirements of such contracts, as financial risks could emerge, for instance in the case of projects that run for decades.

Madeline Alexander, chair of AmCham Romania's EU funds, public procurement and PPP committee ,said that the application norms of the new law should allow the local authorities to use PPPs for local infrastructure development as well as to expand on the regulatory framework concerning treatment and management of PPP fiscal risks.

AmCham Romania represents over 400 American, international and Romanian companies that have invested over USD 20 billion and created around 250,000 jobs locally.

Meanwhile, French investors have identified several public sector infrastructure sectors, including roads and hospitals, as fields in which PPPs could work.

However PPP is not a wonder solution for solving the problem of necessity of great investments. In Romania the most often problem in public and private area is deficitary legislation who doesn't oficialy sustain the fundamentation of PPP. Another fundamental proposal in what regards local development aims the establishment of an interior rulment at local level. In the organization and function of all Institution that leads to good preparation activity and local development implementation projects. Most of the times projects are blocked in their way of organizing as financing application leading to limit situation like: a heavy analisys of documentation to send for note, transmiting in useful time some essential information.In conclusion we can synthesize two directions for development local communities. The first one is writing financing European and national projects and the second is creating necessary important elements like: local development strategies well elaborated, structurated and prioritized, qualified staff for writing project implementation and elaborating development strategies.

Conclusions

Current developments are in many respects not sustainable because limits on the carrying capacity of the earth are being exceeded and social and economic capital is under pressure. Although it has been stated repeatedly that change is necessary, results are limited. The recent progress regarding climate policy shows that states are capable of converting the necessary political will into rigorous policy interventions, which combine leadership, vision and concrete measures. The Sustainable development strategy should contribute to further change to avoid irreparable damage and to create a future of prosperity, equity and well-being.

The Sustainable Development Strategy deals in an integrated way with economic, environmental and social issues and lists the following seven key challenges:

- Climate change and clean energy
- Sustainable transport
- Sustainable consumption and production
- Conservation and management of natural resources
- Public health
- Social inclusion, demography and migration
- Global poverty

Local authorities must elaborate overarching strategy in order to set out how we can meet the needs of present generations without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their needs. The next programming step should be to develop a strategy, to examine the country context, various stakeholders and their interests, and, among other factors, the nature of potential interventions.to help ensure that resources dedicated to the program achieve the mission.s stated objectives. Defining a strategy involves developing an approach that can maximize impact on democratic development. The Sustainable Development Strategy constitutes a long-term vision and an overarching policy framework providing guidance for all members of EU policies and including a global dimension, with a time frame of up to 2050. By tackling long-term trends it serves as an early warning instrument and a policy driver to bring about necessary reform and short-term policy action. There should make full use of balanced Impact Assessments in policy making at national level. The four focus areas relating to long-term goals in some crucial areas like: shift to a low-carbon and low-input economy; protection of biodiversity, air, water and other natural resources; strengthening the social dimension; and the international responsibility dimension of the SDS are broadly welcomed.

The local authority must give higher priority to tackling current unsustainable trends in the use of natural resources and the loss of biodiversity. Better integration of biodiversity considerations into other policy areas such as climate change, transport, agriculture and fishery is crucial, as well as considering better the value of ecosystem services. Also, climate financing is central to combating climate change, and a significant increase in additional public and financial flows is needed in order to assist developing process.

The social dimension should be better highlighted through improving labour market policies, social and education systems. The economic crisis has exacerbated inequalities and risks. With current and expected job losses, unemployment is clearly one of the biggest concerns. The hardest hit are young people, low-skilled workers and those who have been unemployed for a long time. A balanced approach to combining flexibility and security together with comprehensive active inclusion strategies and integration activities is not only crucial to support all those affected by the crisis, including the most vulnerable, but also to limit losses in human capital and to preserve future growth potential. It is vital to carry on improving the labour market policies, to review social system and further develop the education system to meet the challenges in all regions. Job creation efforts should strengthen the ability of workers to adapt to changing market conditions and prepare workers to benefit from new investments in the areas of green technology and green jobs.

Sustainable development should be seen in a global context. Many of the challenges can only be solved in international cooperation. The people of the developing world are hardest hit by the effects of climate change and land degradation. The loss of biodiversity will affect both the developing and developed world, the poorest being the most severely affected. Sustainably managing ecosystems and strengthening biodiversity policies is a basis for food security and an integral part of the fight against poverty and hunger. The global demand for natural resources is increasing, and this affects the developing countries even more than the developed world.

The strategy of local communities for sustainable development could focus on the European Union's long-term goals in the following areas incoordination withother cross-cutting strategies:

- contributing to a rapid shift to a safe and sustainable low-carbon and low-input economy, based on energy and resource-efficient technologies and shifts towards sustainable consumption behaviour, including sustainable food patterns, and fostering energy security and adaptation to climate change.
- intensifying efforts for the protection of biodiversity, air, water and other natural resources and food security, and more focus on integration of biodiversity concerns into policy areas.
- with potential negative impact on biodiversity such as parts of the common agricultural policy, the common fisheries policy and transport policy.
- promoting social inclusion and integration, including demographic and migration aspects, and improving protection against health threats.
- strengthening the international dimension and intensifying efforts to combat global poverty, including through fair and green growth, and addressing population growth and its impact in terms of increased pressure on natural resources.

COMMUNICATION COMPETENCE IN ROMANIAN AND A MODERN FOREIGN LANGUAGE IN THE ROMANIAN PRIMARY EDUCATION CURRICULUM: SIMILARITIES AND DIFFERENCES

Norica Felicia BUCUR[*]
Oana Rica POPA[]

Abstract

The communication competence is essential to any human activity or interaction and, consequently, it represents a priority for any educational activity. The Romanian National Curriculum is focused on developing key competences for lifelong learning (LLL), and, thus, the communication competence, which is circumscribed to the curricular area Language and Communication, is given paramount importance as it covers both Romanian (as mother tongue for most of the students) and one (two) modern foreign language(s). Our paper aims at analyzing the official curricular documents which regulate the development of the communication competence in primary school, both in Romanian and one modern foreign language (English in our case, as it statistically covers most of the Romanian student population), as, during this stage, the foundations for LLL key competences are being laid. By means of our analysis, we expect to point out to how similarities and/or differences in syllabi for Romanian and for the modern foreign language, respectively, interact positively, and thus contribute to developing effective communication competence, or negatively, by following parallel paths, disregarding the supposedly common goal. The results of our documentary analysis are accompanied by qualitative research (interviews with practitioners at this level), so as to identify continuity/ lack of continuity between the objectives listed in the official documents and the teaching practice. Our conclusions point to the fact that, if methodological suggestions in the syllabi were followed and if both primary school teachers and foreign language teachers were aware of the similarities and differences between learning the mother language and a modern foreign language and explicitly or implicitly acted so that they raise their pupils' awereness, then both communication competences could be successfully acquired.

1. Introduction

Curricular documents are meant to ensure equality of chances for the students enrolled in any educational system. The quality of these documents, as well as other important variables such as the teachers' competence and experience, the availability of necessary resources, class size etc. influence the achievements to be attained by the students at the end of each grade or at the end of each curricular stage. As compared to the variables aforementioned, the syllabi are standardized, usually being drafted at central level, by national authorities in charge with regulating compulsory education and this is also the case for Romania.

Since the 2012-2013 school year, in Romania, the enforcement of the legal provisions included in the 2011 National Education Act have led to multiple changes that affected all educational levels. As a consequence, the preparatory grade became part of the Romanian compulsory education period, being included in the primary school education, and the syllabi covering this stage became competence oriented, attuning to the 8 key competences recommended by the European Parliament and the Council of the European Union (2006/962/EC). This reform has been progressively introduced and, in June 2017, the first generation of students benefiting from these curricular improvements graduated primary school education.

So as to offer a multidisciplinary and/or interdisciplinary perspective on education (there are subjects that share certain formative objectives), the subjects to be studied in the Romanian primary education, as well as those making up the lower and higher secondary education curricula, formally belong to seven curricular areas: Language and Communication, Mathematics and Natural Sciences, Man and Society, Arts, Physical Education and Sports, Technologies and Counselling and Guidance. As far as primary education is concerned, the curricular area Language and Communication may comprise the following subjects: Romanian language and literature, mother tongue for minorities, one modern foreign language and one optional subject. Moreover, considering the 2006 Recommendation of the European Parliament and the Council of the European Union, the curricular area Language and Communication in the Romanian primary curriculum encompasses 2 key competences: communication in the mother tongue and communication in foreign languages. The EU document (2006, p. 5) specifically points to the close relationship between the skills necessary to communicate in the mother tongue and those necessary to communicate in a foreign language: 'Communication in foreign languages broadly shares the main skill dimensions of communication in the mother tongue: it is based on the ability to understand, express and interpret concepts, thoughts, feelings, facts and opinions in both oral and written form (listening, speaking, reading and writing) in an appropriate range of societal and cultural contexts (in education and training, work, home and leisure) according to one's wants or needs.'

In Romania, minorities are permitted to study in their mother tongue (e.g. Hungarian, German, Ukrainian, Slovakian etc.), and the optional subject included in this curricular area at this educational level is allotted 0-1 hour per week (an optional subject belonging to a different curricular area might be preferred), so, given the wide range of possibilities, it is worth mentioning at this point that our comparative analysis will focus on Romanian, as mother tongue, and English, as foreign language, because this combination is the most likely to occur according to current statistics (Romanian Statistical Yearbook, 2016, pp. 316-318). Therefore, our paper will closely examine the official curricular documents which regulate the communication competence in Romanian and communication competence in a modern foreign language (English), respectively, so as to point out to similarities and/or differences. In part one, we briefly outline the main theoretical approaches to first language acquisition and learning a foreign language, emphasising the common ground and the particularities related to young learners. Then, the second part deals with methodology and research findings, and the final part presents the conclusions of our investigation, introducing possible solutions for the problems that have been identified.

2. First Language Acquisition vs Learning a Foreign Language. The Young Learner

Does first language acquision resemble learning a foreign language? Although we might be tempted to give a simple 'yes' to this question, individual characteristics (e.g. age, motivation, the learning context etc.) represent important variables, which need to be taken into account. Thus, the question may change into a complex equation, whose result is influenced by the values acquired by the variables.

Diachronically, several theoretical perspectives have attempted to shed light on how human beings acquire their mother tongue and subsequently learn a foreign language (Cameron, 2001; Lightbown&Spada, 2006; Pinter, 2006; Brewster, Ellis & Girard, 2010). Thus, we have various views arising from different schools of psychology (behaviourist, innatist, cognitive-developmental, social-interactionist, connectionist) offering insight on the process of first language acquisition, which have directly influenced the theory of foreign language teaching and learning. For behaviourists, language development is closely related to the formation of habits: one acquires habits of correct language use in the first language through imitation, positive reinforcement and practice, and we transfer these abilities into the second language, using mimicry and memorisation. The innatist perspective explains language acquisition starting from the assumptions that the same universal principles (Universal Grammar) underlie all human languages and that, since birth, human beings are equipped with the ability to discover and correctly apply language rules. In line with Piaget's theory, the cognitive-developmental view emphasises 'the close relationship between children's cognitive development and their acquisition of language' (Lightbown&Spada, 2006, p. 19), thus pointing to the graduality of the process of first language acquisition and foreign language learning, respectively. The importance of human social interactions is underlined in the social-interactionist approach, focusing especially on 'the way language is modified to suit the level of the learner' (Brewster, Ellis & Girard, 2010, p. 18); accordingly, the adult/teacher is able to devise tasks which would both support and challenge the learner to advance to the next stage. Connectionists consider that human beings are born with the ability to learn and argue that exposure to language help learners develop 'connections', which favour generalizations and learning.

Research into first language acquisition and learning a foreign language has demonstrated that language proficiency is gradually achieved, in four stages: (1) working out the rules about how the language works; (2) generalising these rules across a group of similar instances; (3) overgeneralising – using rules where they are not appropriate; (4) using language items correctly. Simply put, the processes characterising language acquisition in one's mother tongue and a foreign language are very similar, whereas the learning conditions are very different (Brewster, Ellis & Girard, 2010, pp. 19-20). Thus, when acquiring our first language we 'are literally bombarded with language all the time' (House, 1997, p.7), whereas when learning a foreign language the context is formal in most situations and the learners are already equipped with language learning skills, building upon their own experience in language learning: less one-to-one interaction is received; the input may be from a much reduced number of sources; there might be a different motivation for learning etc. Consequently, the amount of effort and time we spent on acquiring the communication competence in our mother tongue and a foreign language is not similar, leading to a gap, which is eventually predictable.

Therefore the real challenge when learning and teaching a foreign language is to be aware of both the similarities and differences that exist between the students' mother tongue and the target foreign language, so that the best possible level of proficiency could be achieved.

Due to the special focus of this paper on the primary curriculum, the age variable should be given some consideration. If for first language acquisition, there seems to be a critical or sensitive age for learning one's mother tongue (cases such Genie and Victor of Aveyron might support this conclusion), as far as second language acquisition is concerned, more conclusive evidence is necessary, since both advantages and disadvantages may be identified when the age factor is at stake (Marinova-Todd, Marshall and Snow, 2000; Scovel, 2000; Shrum and Glisan, 2000; Singleton, 2001; Singleton and Ryan, 2004; Ioup, 2005; Dewaele, 2009; Singleton and Muñoz, 2011). On the one hand, researchers agree that it is easy for those who start studying a foreign language in secondary school to catch up with those who do this in primary school, because the former use more efficient learning strategies, are based on complex conceptual knowledge and are more aware of the importance of foreign language proficiency. On the other hand, those who benefit from an early start could exhibit better phonological skills, be more positive about learning a foreign language, multilingualism and interculturality, have better literacy skills in one's mother tongue and foreign language(s) (Johnstone, 2001), provided a foreign language curriculum is developed and human and material resources are allotted.

By becoming aware of the similarities and/or differences that exist between the mother tongue and the foreign language, both the primary school teachers and the language teachers might get valuable insight, and, as a result, be able to improve the efficiency of the classroom activities. Competence in one's mother tongue and competence in a foreign language share the same receptive and productive skills: listening, reading, speaking and writing. They differ only in complexity as young learners are in the process of acquiring formal literacy skills in their mother tongue and these skills are to develop throughout the early school years.

3. Methodology

Our research is both quantitative and qualitative. Quantitatively, we perform a documentary analysis of the official curricular documents in force for Romanian, as mother tongue, and for the modern foreign language in primary education (English, in particular), trying to identify similarities and differences in point of structure and content. The qualitative part of our paper is made up of interviews with practitioners teaching at this curricular stage, as we attempt to identify whether there is continuity/ lack of continuity between the objectives listed in the official documents and the teaching practice. Specifically, we used a biographical-narrative inquiry, conducted by semi-directive interviews, comprising 4 questions: (1) Based on your own experience, to what extent does communication competence in Romanian influence the development of the communication competence in English with students in primary education? (2a) (for English teachers) What are the difficulties that you face most often in teaching English to primary school students / primary school students face when learning English? How can we overcome these difficulties? (2b) (for primary education teachers) What are the difficulties faced most often by the teachers who teach English at primary school level/ by the students learning English in primary school? How can we overcome these difficulties? (3) Given the small number of classes allotted in the primary education curriculum (1 class per week for the preparatory, 1st and 2nd grades, 2 classes per week in 3rd and 4th grades, respectively), can the specific competences listed in the syllabi be successfully acquired? (4) What similarities / differences could you identify in the way students learn to communicate in Romanian or in a foreign language / English? Eight subjects (4 primary school teachers and 4 English teachers), from Prahova County and Bucharest participated in the interviews. Primary school teachers have between 14 and 31 years' experience in teaching at this school level, whereas the English teachers have between 13 and 17 years' experience of teaching this subject in secondary education, and between 5 and 8 years' experience of teaching English to primary school students. They are either certified teachers level 2 or level 1, the highest possible qualifications for teachers in Romania at this moment. Therefore, both their experience and qualifications recommend them, as they could provide an informed opinion on the topic of our research. The interviews were conducted in Octomber- November 2017.

Although our paper employs both quantitative and qualitative instruments, it is necessary to acknowledge the limits of our research, as, in order to get more weight, the interviews could have been accompanied by a questionnaire-based survey. Nevertheless we had neither the time nor the material resources to do it.

3. Research Findings

Documentary analysis. The syllabi for primary education have a unitary structure. Developed to comply with the curriculum design centered on competences, they include: a short introduction; general competences further divided into specific competences, progressively developed for each curricular cycle, accompanied by examples for learning activities; learning content and methodological suggestions.

Obviously, this structure is used for Communication in Romanian (CR) for preparatory, 1st and 2nd grades, Romanian Language and Literature (RLL) for 3rd and 4th grades, respectively, as well as for the Communication in a Modern Foreign Language (CMFL), for preparatory, 1st and 2nd grades, and a Modern Foreign Language (MFL), for 3rd and 4th grades, respectively, all the syllabi targeting the formation and development of communicative competence. Our comparative analysis focuses on the structural elements of the syllabi.

The short introduction represents a mission statement, as:

- it focuses on developing communication competences, by reference to European recommendations for learning the mother tongue / the modern foreign language, with an extra detail for CMFL / MFL (a unique sylabus regardless of the foreign language chosen, thus emphasizing the focus on communication skills);
- it refers to the achievement profile of the primary school students, correlating cognitive aspects with communication skills and attitudes, by turning to its best account the experience of primary school students;
- it points to the flexibility of the syllabi, embodied in the freedom given to teachers to adapt their approach and activities to the characteristics of their students;
- it emphasizes that learning is a personal experience of the student (the constructivist approach to learning).

The general competences (GCs) (four general competences corresponding to the number of key skills – listening, reading, speaking and writing) are designed so as to represent milestones of the students' achievements. In the syllabi for the two disciplines, GCs are described very much in tune with the approach used in the mission statement:

- GC 1 – reception of oral messages in familiar (CR) or various (RLL) communication contexts; reception of oral messages in simple communication contexts (CMFL / MFL); for CR and RLL, the progression of the competences is achieved by extending the areas of the communication contexts;
- GC 2 – expression of oral messages in various communication situations (CR / RLL) and in common communication situations (CMFL / MFL);
- GC 3 – reception of written messages in familiar (CR) or various communication contexts (RLL); reception of written messages in simple communication contexts (CMFL / MFL);
- GC 4 – writing messages in various communication situations (CR / RLL); writing simple messages in common communication situations (CMFL / MFL).

One could easily notice that the the GCs are more complex for the mother tongue as compared to the modern foreign language, and this is a perfectly normal situation (see section 2 of this paper). GCs are allotted more or less specific competences (SCs) as we can see in the table bellow:

Table 1. Number of specific competences coresponding to general competences

GC	CRL			RLL		CMFL			MFL
	PG	1st grade	2nd grade	3rd grade	4th grade	PG	1st grade	2nd grade	3rd grade	4th grade
1	4	4	4	5	5	3	3	3	3	3
2	4	4	4	5	5	3	4	4	3	3
3	4	4	4	6	6	1	1	1	3	3
4	3	3	3	5	5	1	1	1	2	2

The same different degree of complexity could be identified when comparatively analysing the specific competences for the two disciplines. Moreover, the complexity gradually increases from the basic acquisitions stage (preparatory, 1st and 2nd grades) to the development stage (3rd and 4th grades), which does not necessarily materializes in the number of SCs, but in the content provided. For example, GC 2 for the CMFL / MFL (expression of oral messages in common communication situations): although the number of specific competences to be achieved is smaller (3) for the 3rd and the 4th grades as compared to 1st and 2nd grades (4), the learning objectives become more complicated, progressing from reproducing and participating in games, expressing simple requests / offering short and simple information (CMFL) to requesting/ offering information about various, but familiar contexts (e.g. numbers, prices, expressing time, home, family, people, customs), participating and presentating activities in interactions, as well as describing characters, objects, home etc.

Learning activities serve as examples, teachers having the freedom to develop their own activities, more tailored to the specific conditions (particularities of the students, school, existing resources etc.). These activities are designed to help teachers create tasks so that specific competences could be developed, the students' experience could be exploited and appropriate teaching approaches that would create meaningful contexts for students could be integrated. Following the ascending trend identified earlier, the learning activities examples in the syllabi increase in complexity progressively, from one stage to the other, from one grade to the next one.

The contents are presented as suggestions of topics representing a pool of resources, a list of possible skills that could help develop SCs. For CR, the contents are grouped by areas: oral communication (listening, speaking, interaction), reading, writing, building blocks for communication, with increasing complexity from one grade to the next. The content areas proposed for CR / RLL / CMFL / MFL represent a selection of the items listed for achieving communicative competence in the mother tongue / a foreign language in the European Parliament recommendation on the reference framework for key competences for lifelong learning. For example:

- in the CR syllabus, for the oral communication area, the content Word. Sentence / Utterance materializes as follows: using new words in the appropriate utterances (preparatory grade), to using new words in appropriate contexts (1st grade), introducing new words in one's own vocabulary (2nd grade);
- RLL groups the suggestions refering to content in the following areas: language functions, text, language variability and communication in various contexts;
- CMFL labels as contents speech acts, from the simplest ones in the preparatory grade (e.g. greeting acquaintances), to more complex speech acts (simply introducing oneself) in the second grade and suggestions of contexts, from the most familiar ones in preparatory grade to more and more complex and comprehensive in next grades;
- MFLM divides the contents into the following areas: suggestions of communication contexts / vocabulary, functional grammar, variability and regularities of language.

The avoidance of metalanguage is mentioned in all the syllabi, thus emphasizing the ultimate goal, which is the development of communication competence.

A strength of the syllabi is the existence of consistent methodological suggestions, whose main objective is to support and guide teachers in their practice. Thus these methodological suggestions provide hints as how to approach the disciplines in question in order to:

- develop the communication competence, first by structuring it during the fundamental acquisitions stage and subsequently consolidating it;
- maximize interdisciplinarity, by making connections between all disciplines present in the curriculum framework (especially between CR / RLL and CMFL / MFL, since both are part of the same subject area);
- create authentic contexts for communication that would entail reflection and learning, contexts that would make students explore real communication situations.

A special place is dedicated to assessment suggestions, which should be performed in such a way so as to allow the teacher to obtain information about the progress of each student, in relation to specific competencies, as a reference point for adjusting teaching strategies.

The syllabi we examined also include:

- examples for using an integrated approach (CMFL);
- a list of authors (as suggestions for textbook authors) and examples of successful activities (RLL);
- methodological guidelines comprising real examples, structured to suit the targeted competences (listening, speaking, writing) (CMFL);
- specific sugestions for the various modern foreign languages (English, French, Italian, Spanish) that can be studied, comprising examples of best practices and lists of useful resources (websites, songs, stories), recommended topics (MFL).

Interviews. The first question highlights the common opinion that all those who were interviewed share (both the primary school and English teachers). Thus, they agree that the communication competence in Romanian influence to a large / very large extent the communication competence in English, identifying intuitively that a high level of the skills acquired in the students' mother tongue enhances the skills they acquire in a foreign language, especially for primary school students, as 'the communication competence is, at this age, a form of networking and is mainly about producing and interpreting messages. The two competences definitely influence each other' (primary school teacher, 31 years' experience).

The second question shows that teachers face a lot of difficulties:

- insufficient material resources – 6 responses (varied teaching materials are necessary, and teachers usually end up paying for them out of their own pocket, the school does not provide anything – primary school teacher, 30 years' experience; technology is badly needed to be able to do listening or other actities that require a computer and a video projector – English teacher, 17 years' general experience in teaching English, 6 years' experience in teaching English in primary education; I noticed that listening activities keep students' interest up – primary school teacher, 25 years' experience) ;
- textbooks are not age appropriate and contain insufficient activities (3 responses);
- lack of continuity of English textbooks from one school year to the next (2 responses)[1];
- the high number of students per class, which does not favour working in groups / teams (5 responses);
- insufficient number of classes per week for the fundamental acquisitions stage (1 class per week) (2 responses);
- sometimes lack of discipline in the preparatory grade (1 response): the young students are not used to the school rules and routines – English teacher, 17 years' general experience in teaching English, 6 years' experience in teaching English in primary education;
- introducing grammar concepts in English before they are taught in Romanian (4 responses); apparently, our respondents blame it on the disparity between the syllaby of the two disciplines: "the English teacher teaches the verb 'to be' when the student has no idea of the concept of verb or its inflectionary forms" – primary school teacher, 30 years' experience;

[1] In Romania, textbooks are free for students aged 6-16. The teachers are expected to choose the textbooks and the school is supposed to provide them. Nevertheless, this is partially true, because teachers have to choose from the textbooks available in the school (students return the textbooks every year so that the next generation should use them).

"grammar concepts are first studied in English" – English teacher, 13 years' general experience, 5 years' experience in primary education; "I had to teach the noun in English and the students didn't know what a noun is in Romanian" – English teacher, 14 years' general experience, 8 years' experience in primary education.

Only two of the teachers we interviewed (both primary school teachers) suggested solutions to overcome the difficulties they identified, both of them emphasizing basically the same point: "English could be better taught by the primary school teacher in charge of the respective class" – primary school teacher 25 years' experience; "the English teacher should attune activities to young learners' characteristics and thus be able to capture and maintain their attention during activities, mainly using game based methods" – primary school teacher, 31 years' experience. These opinions suggest the importance of the age factor, which seems to be especially taken into consideration by primary school teachers with a lot of experience in working with students at this level. Similar problems and solutions have been identified in previous research (Singer&Sarivan, 2010; Bucur&Popa, 2013). As these problems have arisen in our research, we assume that practitioners find it difficult to adhere to the philosophy of the Romanian curriculum, even if its basic principles are included in the syllabi in force. Maybe some prefer to stick to traditional teaching, disregarding the methodological guidelines and examples in the syllabi, continuing to negatively influence learning.

The teachers who were interviewed were skeptical about the young learners' possibility to successfully acquire the specific competences listed in the syllabi for CMFL / MFL by reference to number of hours allocated. There was one totally affirmative answer to this question, the rest of the answers were only partially affirmative or negative: "Yes, but with difficulty" – English teacher, 13 years' general experience in teaching English, 5 years' experience in teaching English in primary education; "It's difficult in the first three school years, as there isn't enough time to cover the items in the syllabi. If parents don't help young learners at home, they forget what they learn till the following week, and I have to do a lot of revision every time." – English teacher, 17 years' general experience in teaching, 6 years' experience in teaching English in primary education; "Yes, but it's really difficult. We need 2 hours per week from the very beginning" – English teacher, 14 years' general experience, 8 years' experience in primary education; "Yes, but only for the specific competences comprised in the syllabus for CMFL, which basically focus on getting familiar with the foreign language" – primary school teacher, 25 years' experience; "They cannot be achieved because English is perceived as a less important discipline due to the number of hours allocated"- primary school teacher, 31 years'experience). One answer definitely points to the teacher: "Yes, if the teacher is well prepared. Thus the optional class could easily be allocated to the foreign language." (primary school teacher, 30 years' experience). To a certain extent, the general opinion is that the number of English classes per week should increase, especially for the fundamental acquisitions stage, from 1 hour to 2 hours per week, so that the young learners could be given the possibility to acquire the specific competences listed in the syllabi. This opinion may be justified, given the fact that the communication competence in a foreign language is one of the key competences, and the appropriate approach should be selected so that success could be guaranteed. Nevertheless, due to the limits of our research, we cannot tell whether the solution to this problem is to increase the number of classes per week or to change the teaching approach.

It was not really simple for the teachers we interviewed to point immediately to the similarities and differences on how young learners learn to communicate in Romanian or English. They gave it some thought and they provided the following answers in reference to the similarities:

- young learners are better at oral than written communication in both languages;
- both types of competence focus on achieving elementary communication skills;
- both can be developed through constant exposure as well trained receptive skills can trigger better productive skills in the future*;*
- texts are followed by the same types of exercise for both disciplines.

As for the differences, they mentioned the learning context (informal for Romanian, formal for English) and the active vocabulary ("the Romanian vocabulary items are more related to everyday life, the young learner's everyday experience, whereas English vocabulary topics serve didactical purposes, to some extent disregarding common communication needs" – primary school teacher, 31 years' experience).

4. Conclusions

As the findings of our documentary analysis show, we could say that the syllabi we examined are drafted according to European recommendations and recent theoretical approaches, structured so as to support the development of effective communication competences. Both syllabi for Romanian as a mother tongue and those for the modern foreign language share a common ground so that they could interact positively, and thus maximize the achievements of primary school students, as far as their communication competences are concerned. The higher degree of complexity for CR and RLL as compared to CMFL and MFL is perfectly understandable, as learning a mother tongue differs from learning a foreign language from many points of view, as we could see in the second section of this paper.

Nevertheless, there is a long way from intention to implementation. Some of the teachers we interviewed describe a different reality, which seems to have a life of its own, somehow independent, parallel with the intentions set out in the syllabi. From the list of problems identified during the interview, the most worrying seems to be the so called 'mismatch' between the grammar concepts to be taught. According to the results of our documentary analysis, the two disciplines are correlated if we take into consideration their common goal – developing the communication competence. Furthermore, the syllabi explicitly mention that metalanguage should be avoided. We could only conclude that either teachers do not know the contents of the syllabi or they ignore them, using more or less valuable materials as reference points to design their teaching activities.

As for the difficulties faced by the young learners during English classes, the answers qiven by our interviewees indirectly point to teachers' activity. Thus, the young learners' low interest in class activities could not only be explained by the large number of students in a classroom, but also by the teacher's using inadequate ways of organizing students. On the other hand, some teachers even suggest that there is need for extra-curricular activities to complement compulsory English classes, which prove to be insufficient. However, this insufficiency may not be strictly related to the lack of proper resources, but also to the rigid way, strictly traditional approach to teaching that some English teachers still use.

Consequently, as we indicated in a previous paper (Bucur&Popa, 2013), methodology still has the main role to play and can tip the scales in favour of successful / unsuccessful teaching / learning. The syllabi we analysed comprise methodological suggestions, which, if closely followed, could possibly result in young learners' being able to reach the competence levels set for the end of the 2nd and the 4th grade, respectively. So, hypothetically, the methodology-related problems could be easily solved, if teachers carefully read the syllabi and became aware of the needs and particularities of young learners. Nevertheless, the other problems are more complicated as they are directly linked to the availability of material resources. The weaknesses of the Romanian primary education system (and not only) are well known: large number of pupils per class, the overused and outdated textbooks, the lack of audio-video devices in classrooms, no available funds for realia, posters and other useful teaching materials, and the list could continue.

To conclude with, the primary education syllabi for Romanian as a mother tongue and the modern foreign language could mutually give support to one another. It is up to the teachers involved in teaching these disciplines to fully benefit of the advantages that arise and turn them to the best account for the sake of their pupils.

THE PROCEDURE OF ACTS OF ADMINISTRATIVE LAW

Crina Alina DESMET[*]

Abstract

The end of the twentieth century and the beginning of the 3rd millennium is characterized by a comprehensive process of transformation in all fields of human society, and all of these mutations must be subject to specific rules, principle of legality being an essential requirement of the rule of law. National legal order of each country is influenced by international and supranational legal systems, due to the trend of globalization of the world, without necessarily be negated the interdependence, according to national laws in that State, as a signatory of the some international conventions, has met certain obligations, including on the adoption of legal norms corresponding to the commitments. We can say that we are witnessing a process of convergence between administrative law in the Member States of the European Union and european administrative law, to further develop. We appreciate that, given the fact that Romania has taken the Community acquis, it is obliged to implement in national law the General principles of administrative procedure outlined at this level. Starting from the reality that the administrative procedure is vast topic and cannot be analyzed exhaustively in a single work, we try to present further, without going into details, the main topics of our research subject. Thus, we considered that it is necessary to achieve short considerations about the principles, but also administrative proceedings, by analyzing the stages and characters of it. We also reviewed briefly the administrative divorce procedure compared to the notary procedure, two elements of novelty introduced by the new civil code. On the other hand, we have presented arguments supporting the need for codified rules of administrative procedure, systematic methods used, and attempts to achieve this task. Basically, we can say that in our legal system is highly topical theme and presents a particular relevance in the context of attempts made by the legislature, since the year 2000, for the purposes of codification of the rules of administrative procedure.

Introduction

The executive activity carried out by the state administration bodies is, as a whole, a complex activity. For this reason, it represents a true process. The characteristic of a process of this activity is emphasized especially with regard to the administrative acts or decisions, whose formation, application and verification is presented as an ensemble of operations that are in a logical and necessary sequence.

The administrative process can be defined as the ensemble of the activities (acts and deeds) carried out by the state administration in fulfilling its attributions. The administrative procedure is the form or the ensemble of formalities performed by the state administration bodies for the organization of the execution and the concrete execution of the laws and of the acts subordinated to them, acts that may emerge from the state administration or from other subjects of law. On the other hand, the administrative procedure also represents the totality of the legal norms regulating the form in which the executive activity is fulfilled[1].

In the specialized literature[2] the notion of (judicial) procedure receives several meanings. In a broad sense, it includes: norms that show which bodies are called to perform a certain activity (organizational norms); what responsibilities each body has (competence norms); what acts or operations are fulfilled by the bodies or by the persons participating in an activity (procedural norms). This last meaning, narrowed, is also the acception that we understand to use for the notion of administrative procedure.

The administrative procedure characterizes the totality of the concrete forms of the executive activity, because all the volitional activities of the administration have to fulfil a minimum of formalities. It is done in specific and different ways in the case of legal acts, of technical-material operations, deeds, and within it the procedure of the administrative acts or the decisional procedure is the most important category of the administrative procedure. The decisional procedure may be a non-jurisdictional procedure (for instance:invention patent procedure) and also a jurisdictional procedure (for instance, the procedure for resolving pension revision claims).

By analysing the administrative process and procedure, it is necessary to offer more clarifications.

A first clarification is that we have to give the notion of administrative procedure its narrowed meaning, understanding by it all the formalities that can compete in the fulfilment of the executive activity. Indeed, we cannot consider the entire executive activity itself as being the administrative procedure itself, as we would erase any difference between the content of this activity and the formalities to be carried out for its fulfilment.

A second clarification refers to the demarcation between the administrative procedure and the administrative procedural law[3]. The procedure is the form of performing the activity and the administrative procedural law represents the ensemble of the norms regulating the form in which the executive activity takes place.

A third clarification refers to the distinction between the material administrative law and the administrative procedural law, in the sense that the former regulates the content of the executive activity and the latter the form of carrying out this activity.

Lastly, it is also mandatory to note that to each concrete form of executive activity corresponds certain procedural form.

The administrative procedure has some characteristics that distinguish it, in particular from the civil procedure, in that:

- the judicial procedure is regulated by law (code), while the administrative procedure can also be regulated by normative acts subordinated to the law, some issued including by the state administration[4];
- the judicial procedure has a less complex character compared to the administrative one, the latter being made up of an ensemble of very different procedures (for instance, in the matter of sanctioning contraventions, patenting inventions, approving projects for normative acts);
- the administrative procedure is triggered most of the time ex officio, whereas the judicial one is triggered only with the notification of the Courts of Law by the parties to the dispute, prosecutor, other bodies provided by law;
- the court orders are not revocable, and by their pronouncement the Court of Law divests itself related to the settlement of the dispute, while the vast majority of the administrative acts are revocable.

By comparing some principles of the administrative procedure with the judicial procedure we note that:

- the principle of non-contradiction is a basic principle of the non-jurisdictional administrative procedure, compared with the principle of contradiction, whichgoverns the activity of the Courts of Law and involves at least two parties with contradictory, butprocedurally equal interests, while the executive activity presupposes subordination;
- the principle of non-publicity consists in the fact that the administrative bodies are not obliged, as well as the courts of law, to act in front of those who want to assist to the performance of their activity or who are interested in issuing the administrative acts;
- the principle of unavailability consists in the fact that the passive subjects of the administrative report cannotbenefit from the creation, modification, abolition and realization of these reports because of their subordination, compared to the civil process in which the parties have the possibility to benefit from the object of the dispute, of its extent and means of defence in the process.

Along with these principles, in the administrative procedure there are some common principles with the judicial procedure, such as the principle of legality, the principle of equality before the administration, the principle of the right to defence, the principle of the active role of the administration. The stages or phases of the administrative procedure are, in general, the stages that are being covered, in their existence, by the administrative acts, namely the preparation, issuance, execution and the control of the administrative acts.

The relation between legality and opportunity of administrative acts is a complex one, the link between them leading to ensure the best conditions for the issue and the accomplishment of an act validly[5]. The best solution is one in which the administrative act is legal and appropriate. Its legality evokes that the Act meets the letter of the law, and the opportunity it represents his conformity with the spirit of the law[6].

1. The decisional administrative procedure

The decisional administrative process can be defined as the totality of the actions required for the preparation, adoption, performance and control of the decisions or of the administrative acts. These actions may consist of prior documentation, debate and deliberation on the decision projects, on the activities of control of the execution, etc. The decisional administrative process comprises the ensemble of the formalities governing the decisional process. The administrative acts, in order to produce valid legal effects, must be issued in compliance with certain forms. The totality of the forms necessary in order for an act of administrative law to produce legal effects represent the procedure of drawing up that precise act[7]. This procedure consists of technical-material operations, also called procedural acts.

The decisional administrative procedure can be simple or complex. It is simple when, in order for the manifestation of the will contained in legal acts to take effect, the law does not require the accomplishment of a special procedure. The procedure is complex when the formalities are special in order for the administrative act to produce valid legal effects.

The notion of simple procedure and complex procedure do not identify with the notion of simple administrative act or complex administrative act. In the case of simple administrative acts, through the mere manifestation of will, valid legal effects occur, regardless of the complexity of the procedural forms. In the case of complex administrative acts, their elaboration procedure does not necessarily imply the contest of special technical-material operations, but the contest of several manifestations of will, which together produce valid legal effects (for instance, the administrative act commonly issued by several administrative bodies is a complex act). Thus, a simple administrative act can be drawn up after a complex procedure, or a complex act can be issued after a simple procedure. Therefore, the notion of "complex administrative act" does not identify with the notion of "complex administrative procedure" of drawing upthe administrative act, the latter notion being more extensive than the former[8].

The procedural forms can be classified according to several criteria[9]. According to their importance for the validity of the act, we distinguish essential and non-essential forms. According tothe exterior form of the procedural forms, we distinguish between written and non-written forms. The breach of the provisions regarding the essential procedural forms draws the sanction of the legal act, but not as an effect of these forms, but as an effect of the law, which aims to guarantee the regularity of the procedural forms in ensuring the validity of the legal acts.

According to the stage when they intervene, related to the moment of the establishment of the legal act, we distinguish procedural forms from the preparation stage (for instance, opinions), from the elaboration stage (motivation), from the execution stage (summons) and from the control stage (the control minute).

Performing an analysis on stages, in terms of legal consecration, of the procedure of the administrative acts or decisions, some clarifications are required regarding the manner of legal regulation. From the start, it should be made clear that the essence of the regulation of the administrative procedure is the administrative act, since it represents the most important concrete form of executive activity.

The preparation stage of the decision did not benefit from unitary regulation at the level of all administrative acts. In general, each issuing body or its hierarchically superior body developed its own methodology concerning the preparation of projects of legal acts, in particular normative ones. However, it was necessary to unify and coordinate the legal regulation of the preparatory stage of the projects of normative legal acts, elaborating in this respect the "General methodology of legislative technique regarding the preparation and systematization of the projects of normative acts" approved by Decree no. 16/1976. This methodology was applicable to the main projects of normative acts of our state and has undergone implicit changes, and also aims the acts of the state administration. The methodology in question also applies to individual acts, as it results from the provisions of art. 111 of the aforementioned Decree, which shows that the technical methods and procedures established for the normative acts are also applicable for the elaboration of the acts, which, without having a normative character, take the form of a decree or a government's decision, "per a contrario", the acts which do not have a normative character can only be individual acts, which, in the given case, are presented in the form of a decree or of a decision. The same decree regulated, at the same time, the operations that make up the decisional process, such as documentation[10], or the procedural formalities, such as the single opinion[11], being repealed by Law no. 24/2000, republished in 2004.

The adoption stage of the administrative decisions has been and is regulated in a different way, usually by the organizational and functioning norms of the respective bodies (thus, for instance, the decisions of the local councils are issued on the basis and in view of the performance of the law, with the vote of the majority of their members, being signed by the counsellorwho leads the meeting and countersigned by the secretary[12].

The regulation is different, since the specificity and the variety of the administrative bodies determine different ways of adopting the decisions, although some general rules may emerge, for instance, in the case of the collegiate bodies, where the principle of collegiate management determines that a decision is always adopted with the majority of the votes cast.

Sometimes, to the general requirements of the organic laws one may add special requirements from these laws or from special laws. Thus, for the category of the county councils, the permanent delegation was established, which decided on the issue of the current activity of the plenum[13], and other regulations establish, for instance, the period of time during which a body is obliged to solve a request addressed to it.

The execution stage is regulated by norms specific to each body, due to the particularity of the activity to be performed. There are also general provisions applicable to the execution in a field or branch, such as the execution of the contravention sanctions[14], or the forced execution procedure, common in the field of material or patrimonial damages[15].

The control stage is differentially regulated by category of bodies and by specific regulations on areas or fields of activity. Thus, local councils monitor and control the activity of counsellors, of the mandated empowered persons of the state. Also, the Mayor guides and controls his own apparatus. In some cases, the hierarchical administrative appeal in the matter of controlling the lawfulness of administrative acts is consecrated. Regarding the specific aspects of the control, special regulations intervene, such as in the case of the Mayor's control over the way of collecting and spending the sums from the local budget of the administrative-territorial units.

In the case of the jurisdictional administrative acts, the regulation of their preparation and issuance framework is made in a thorough manner, as they are aimed at solving a dispute. Thus, the administrative-jurisdictional procedure is complemented with the regulations of the civil procedure code, as it was the case with the activity of the former County Pensions Committee, insofar as they correspond to the objectives of the body's activity.

Sometimes there is the possibility of alternating the administrative procedure with another procedure, for instance the legal one, the body having a right of option, for instance in the case of the evacuation of the persons who occupy without a Lease Agreement an area from the state housing stock (which is in the administration of a company), evacuation that can be ordered either by the decision of the competent local council or based on the decision of the Court of Law.

The administrative procedure, once established, is mandatory, the state body being unable to choose another procedure in the fulfilment of its attributions. Thus, the legal practice decided[16] that it is unacceptable the action by which the local council should also ask the court to oblige the defendant to demolish the construction after issuing a decision ordering the demolition of the built building, without the prior administrative authorization. This is because Decree no. 545/1958 (abrogated) authorized this body, on the basis of its own acts, to proceed to the demolition of the built buildings without prior authorization, and the opposition of the one concerned by this measure was not such as to affect the enforceability of the demolition act.

The decisional administrative process and procedure have a number of principles, among which an important place is represented by the principle of legality in preparing and adopting the decisions. In terms of the decisional process, this principle is based on the provisions according to which the legal norms can be elaborated only by the bodies provided by the law[17] and under the conditions provided by the law.

From a procedural point of view, all bodies must comply with those formalities that ensure the validity of the legal acts.

In the general methodology of the legislative technique it is shown that the elaboration of normative acts by all the state administration bodies is done in compliance with the principle of the supremacy of the law, the normative acts being elaborated only on the basis and in the execution of the laws. The normative acts of the state administration cannot add to or contravene the principles and provisions of the laws, the decisions and ordinances on the basis of which they are adopted.

Of course, some principles of the administrative law, characteristic of the executive activity, are also reflected in the decisional process.

Thus, the principle of collective leadership is illustrated in the decisional activity by the fact that the approval of the projects of normative acts is done by the leadership bodies and through the provisions that specify that the solution of the possible disputes regarding the projects of normative acts is also done by the state bodies' leadership.

Together with the general principles there are also some methodological principles or legislative technique principles. Among them, we mention the principle of mandatory documentation in the case of drawing up projects of normative acts, the principle of the obligatory observance of the stages and their succession in drawing up projects of normative acts, the principle of organizing and coordinating the normative activity by the Legislative Council.

The decisional administrative procedure has also a number of common principles, most of them with the principles of the administrative procedure. The principle of the official procedures, according to which an administrative body self-notices and invests itself in the issuance of legal acts, is illustrated by the fact that the central bodies of the state administration can issue, even in the absence of an express mandate, orders, instructions etc. when a higher-level act (law, decree) denounces inferior acts which would ensure them an uniform application. The principle of non-publicity, according to which the administrative activity is not meant to be publicly known, in respect with some of its aspects, is illustrated by the fact that the activity of preparing the decisions, the projects of normative acts, is secret. It becomes public only by being subjected to the public debate of more important projects of normative acts or by adopting acts, followed by their publication. The phases of the preparatory stage are generally devoid of the principle of publicity.

2. The necessity of the codification of the administrative procedure

In the executive activity, together with the material norms, an important role is played by the procedural norms. The procedural norms regulate the various forms of performance of the executive activity, such as legal acts (and in their framework the administrative, civil or labour law ones) as well as the other concrete forms of activity.

The procedural norms to be observed by the administration are contained in the various regulations, either with a general character (such as the General Methodology of Legislative Technique), or in the organic regulations (for instance, Law no. 215/2001) or in special regulations (for instance, Ordinance no. 2/2001, Law no. 554/2004, Ordinance no. 27/2002), without being reunited in a unitary manner. Therefore, in the executive activity one feels the lack of systematization of the legislation, in the sense of a material and procedural codification of the most important norms regulating the content and the form of this activity.

In the specialized literature it has been thought that the impossibility of administrative codification, of a material and procedural nature, is due to the numerous norms governing this activity, to the diversity of legal rules and to their relatively stable character. However, the legislator expressed concern that a series of regulations would make a partial codification of certain aspects of the executive activity, especially through some special laws, which[18] did not eliminate the need to codify all the norms concerning the state administration[19].

With the same acuity, it is also necessary to draw up a code of administrative procedure, similar to those existing in several states. In this sense, we consider that "The General Methodology of Legislative Technique" was a first step in regulating the preparatory phase of the decision, although it has undergone multiple implicit changes, implying however a unified regulation of the other stages of the decisional process. The procedural norms, together with the regulation of the competence, should include rules with a general character related to the organization and functioning for the entire state administration and rules on the formalities of the administrative acts, all put together in a unitary codification.

Our legislation has a number of gaps related to the preparatory procedure; it does not establish as general rules the obligation to hear the parties before issuing the acts, the obligation to motivate the administrative acts and does not regulate strictly the hierarchical administrative appeal, which can be exercised in an unlimited manner at the time being.

A codification would offer many advantages, among which we mention the existence of a unitary concept underlying all regulations, the avoidance of repetitions and contradictions from the administrative regulations, the simplification and reduction of the number of existing procedures, and a stronger defence of the law and of the citizenship rights.

The decisional codification should encompass the most general rules of law applicable to all administrative acts, as well as specific procedural rules applicable to certain administrative acts, such as jurisdictional acts. It should indicate the conditions of validity of the legal acts, as well as the main stages of the decisional process. Within this codification, special rules of procedure, such as those concerning the setting and monitoring of taxes and fees, rules on finding and sanctioning contraventions, receiving and solving claims, complaints, notifications and proposals, currently contained in separate[20]normative acts, might be reunited. The programmed character of a part of the legislative activity implies, among other things, the development of its law and its regulatory technique in the direction of the codification of the administrative procedure[21].

The project ReNEUAL Code of administrative procedure of the European Union, drawn up at the initiative of the network of research on administrative law of the European Union (ReNEUAL), watch to ensure transposition of the constitutional values of the EU European settlement of the administrative procedure relating to the administrative implementation of the Union's legislation and policy. The project was unveiled in front of the European Parliament and the European Parliament Resolution of January 15th, 2013, which require the European Commission to submit a proposal relating to the administrative procedure act of the European Union[2012/2024(INL)]. Therefore, the project has great opportunities to become soon the law of administrative procedure of the EU. From this perspective, its influence over national legal systems will be a remarkable one, at least in procedures involving joint implementation of european law.

For Romania, which unfortunately does not have a law of administrative procedure, the code can be a model of good administrative practice and administrative law principles relevant to public administration and for administrative courts, given the fact that the project is based on these practices and principles at european level.

The Romanian Government approved in a landmark ruling, the theses of the future prior Administrative Code of Romania. Theses issues must indicate issues to be resolved by the future Administrative Code relating to incomplete provisions and sometimes contradictory, contained in the 18 regulations, which currently covers Central and local administration. By developing such a Code of administrative law of public administration, it will be better understood by officials and citizens. The Romanian Government's intention to unify the legal framework codes in the field of public administration, through the administrative code and the code of administrative procedure, has been wanted since 2001, in the programmes of Government and legislative programmes. Currently, the priority of the Government on the drafting of codes, as the main instrument for the simplification of the legislation, it is reiterated in the strategy for strengthening public administration 2014-20120 approved by HG. 909/2014, and in the strategy for better regulation 2014-2020, which was approved by HG. 1076/2014. In the year 2011, was completed a first draft of the Administrative Code, which, starting in 2014, is updated in terms of taking into account both the legislative changes which have occurred, and the new proposals for the amendment of some normative acts that are in various stages of elaboration.

3. Administrative divorce procedure and the notary procedure

Regulated in art. 375-378 of the New Civil Code, the procedure in question implies that both spouses file application for divorce together at the Registrar, respectively the Notary Public, from the place of marriage or last spouses' common dwelling. At the Notary Public, the application for divorce may also be filed by an Empowered Agent, with an authentic Power of Attorney.

The territorial competence is alternative, being the choice of the spouses. The proof of the last common dwelling of the spouses is done with identity papers, ownership documents or contracts for the handing over of the use or, when this is not possible, by authenticated declarations on their own responsibility, given by both spouses.

The spouses are given a 30-day period of time for reflection and upon the expiration of the deadline the spouses must present themselves personally and the Registrar, respectively the Notary Public, must check if they are divorcing and if their consent is free and willingly.

The 30-day period of time is prohibitive and is calculated on days off. According to art. 5 par. (2) of the Instructions regarding the execution of the divorce proceedings by the Notaries Public, elaborated by the National Union of Notaries Public from Romania, the deadline cannot be extended, but according to par. (4) the Notaries may grant a longer deadline, taking into account the possibility of the spouses to be present and with the consent of the spouses.

It is not expressly provided for, but it results from the provisions of art. 375 par. (2) of the New Civil Code that when there are minor children the Notary will request within the 30-days period of time a social investigation regarding the joint exercise of the parental authority and the establishment of the children's home.

According to art. 229 par. (2) lit. b) of Law 71/2011, the report of the psychosocial investigation is drawn up by the guardianship authority. If from the social investigation report results that the spouses' consent in these two respects is not in the interest of the child, the Notary Public issues a provision of rejecting the application for divorce and guides the spouses to address themselves to the Court of Law (Article 376 paragraph 5 of the New Civil Code).

The question arises whether it is the Notary Public the one who assesses if from the data of the social investigation report results that the consent of the spouses would not be in the best interest of the child or whether this should be determined by the guardianship authority.

The best solution would be for the spouses to specify from the beginning at which of them they have settled the child's home in order for the tutelary authority to indicate in the report's conclusions whether the spouses' consent is in the best interest of the child.

According to art. 264 of the New Civil Code, in the administrative procedures concerning him/her, the hearing of the child who has reached the age of 10 years old is mandatory. The hearing of the child is done within the given period of time.

If, for solid reasons, the psychosocial investigation has not been carried out or the minor who has reached 10 years old has not been heard, the Notary may grant a new deadline, but only with this motivation.

In the case where the spouses insist on divorce, a Divorce Certificate is issued, without making any mentions regarding the spouse's fault.

The spouse's agreement on the surnames to be worn after the divorce, the exercise of the parental authority by both parents, the establishment of the children's home after the divorce, the way of keeping the personal relationships between the separated parent and each of the children, as well as the determination of the parents' contribution to the cost of raising, educating, teaching and professional trening of the children will be authenticated by the Notary and will be mentioned in the Divorce Certificate.

The marriage is considered to have been dissolved at the date of issuance of the Divorce Certificate (Article 382 paragraph (3) of the New Civil Code).

When the application for divorce is filed at the City Hall where the marriage was concluded, the Registrar, after issuing the Divorce Certificate, makes the due mention in the marriage act.

In the case of submitting the application to the City Hall where the spouses had their last common dwelling, the Registrar issues the Divorce Certificate and immediately sends a certified copy thereof to the City Hall where the marriage was concluded, in order to make the mention in the marriage act.

If the divorce is established by the Notary Public, the Notary issues the Divorce Certificate and immediately sends a certified copy of it to the City Hall of the place where the marriage was concluded, in order to be mentioned in the Marriage Act.

A problem related to law interpretation arises if the spouses with minor children reach an agreement on divorce, the name to bear after divorce and joint exercise of the parental authority, but they do not agree on establishing the children's home, how to preserve personal relationships between the separated parent and each of the children, or on the parents' contribution to the costs of raising, educating, teaching and professional training of children.

According to art. 375 par. (2), in conjunction with art. 378 of the New Civil Code, if all these conditions are not met, the application for divorce is rejected. However, from the provisions of art. 376, par. (5) and (6) of the New Civil Code, results that the Notary Public will issue the order to reject the application for divorce and will direct the spouses towards the Court of Law if they do not agree on the name and joint exercise of the parental authority, solving the claims of other effects of the divorce on which the spouses do not agree upon being within the competence of the Court of Law.

Different practices of the Notaries will be outlined.

Some notaries will consider efficient art. 375 par. (2) of the New Civil Code, which provides that the divorce can be established by the Notary if the spouses agree on all the above-mentioned aspects, and the failure to fulfil the conditions leads to the rejection of the request.

Other notaries will proceed to the systematic interpretation of the Code and will establish the divorce also in the absence of the agreement on other matters than those expressly mentioned in art. 376 par. (5), leaving the dispute to be settled by the Court of Law, according to par. (6) (opinion also shared by Professor Flavius Baias in the New Civil Code - Comments on articles, published by C. H. Beck Publishing House).

The rejection of the application for divorce is made by a provision issued by the Notary Public or by the Mayor. Although the Code provides that the Registrar issues the order to reject the application, the Methodology on the unitary application of the provisions on civil status approved by the Government's Decision no. 64/2011 provides, in art. 178, that the Registrar draws up a report proposing the issuance of a rejection proposition by the Mayor.

The provision must be reasoned in the sense of mentioning the reasons for rejection and not the arguments in this respect.

As the rejection provisions are not subject to appeal, it will be difficult to unify the notary practice for situations where the spouses have not reached an agreement on the establishment of the children's home, how to keep personal liaisons between the parent and each of the children, or the parents' contribution to raising, education, studies and professional training of children.

The abusive refusal to establish divorce through the consent of the spouses gives rise to the right to material and moral damages (Article 378 paragraph (3) of the New Civil Code).

Conclusions

In his research on bureaucracy, Max Weber was talking about the depersonalization that must exist in the functioning of the administration. Its tasks must be accomplished with the help of the rules and regulations with which it is endowed. The transmission of orders and the gathering of information take place in a hierarchical way, the intervention of each participant being carried out strictly within the framework that is reserved by the formal arrangements underlying the functioning of the bureaucratic institutions, thus achieving a high degree of efficiency, precision, as well as a great predictability of the results.

Also, in fulfilling its tasks, public administration must demonstrate political neutrality and correctness and impartiality towards citizens.

The features of the administration have the gift of transforming the activity of the public administration into one based on a series of automatisms. In fact, the German sociologist Maw Weber compared the effects of the appearance of bureaucracy on modern societies with the effects produced by the emergence of cars on the economic life. The public administration is, in Weber's opinion, a machine, an efficient tool, without personality, at the service of the society and political leaders.

What are the effects that the existence of these automatisms has on how bureaucracy is fulfilling its task?

We have to mention from the beginning that the state can complete its tasks only to the extent that there are institutions dedicated to them and the related procedures (routines).

We can easily understand that without the existence of the army the state would not be able to protect us from foreign aggressions, as it could not ensure order in the absence of justice and of the police.

The multitude of the other services that the state and other public authorities provide to the population is also based on the existence of specialized institutions.

However, the mere existence of institutions is not enough. It is also necessary to specify the concrete forms through which their tasks are carried out.

First of all, we are talking about the effectiveness of the administrative approach. The situations with which a civil servant or a public institution is confronted in its day-to-day work are numerous and the existence of standard procedures is likely to increase its performance, especially since the cases are often the same. Moreover, sometimes the lack of a methodology may lead to the impossibility of performing administrative tasks. Similarly, the absence of predetermined procedures by the founding authority or by the hierarchically superior one could lead to some ad-hoc occurrences, which would leave room for arbitrariness in the functioning of the public administration.

Second of all, as mentioned earlier, one of the fundamental principles of a modern public administration is neutrality and impartiality towards customers (citizens). This principle is all the more important because the financing of the administration's activity is made out of public money. From here it results that procedures are necessary in order to ensure that the beneficiaries of the administration are treated equally, impartially.

Last but not least, politicians, as well as civil society, must exercise a certain control over public administration. This would be very difficult if each public institution or each clerk would work according to their own rules and methods.

Also, as every field of social life, public administration also has to improve its functioning, it must progress, keep pace with the evolution of the society, with the evolution of physical or social technologies, in a word of the new needs of the communities which it serves.

It is obvious that, in order to optimize the functioning of an institution, it must first be identified what does not work properly, in the absence of unitary procedures, this arrangement would be equivalent to looking for the needle in the haystack. Moreover, once discovered, new administrative solutions can be implemented more easily in the case of an institution that functions unitarily.

Certain events or historical developments have favoured, in turn, an increased emphasis on the strict statement of the way in which the tasks of public institutions or of those working within them must be carried out.

Towards the end of the nineteenth century in two of the most important European states, namely France and Germany, for different reasons, was developed the issue to exclude the role of rules and procedures from the activity of the administration. In France, this was related to the establishment of the rule of law after the abdication of Emperor Napoleon III. At that time many considered the bureaucracy responsible for the repeated slippages of France towards authoritarian regimes and argued that a more rigorous legislation could eliminate the liking and arbitrariness of the French administration, and the state of law being thus more protected, in Germany the main reason was the mobilization of national energies to meet the great goals that faced the German people: "unifying the country and including it among the great powers."

Everyday life illustrates the widespread trend in the public opinion of using the term "bureaucracy" predominantly with negative connotations.

Thus, the administrative procedures are the first to be accused of all the evils that are attributed to the functioning.

Indeed, the slowness with which certain tasks are accomplished, the obtuseness, the resistance to change and, last but not least, the waste of resources can all be related, in one way or another, to the existence of these routines.

Building a modern and efficient public administration, stable and responsible, is an essential objective for any democratic state.

In a society, such a goal can only be achieved with the help of appropriate administrative institutions and by allocating important resources to this goal.

Abstract

A disease caused by a bacteria over 35,000 years old according to paleomicrobiology research, is currently a challenge for all public health systems. Tuberculosis was declared by World Health Organisation one of the world's priorities in a joint effort to eradicate it by 2050. Despite the medical knowledge about the disease, analizing it from a sociological and anthropological point of view could generate a better understating of the disease, it's social factors and the complexity of the context. Being the leading cause of death among the socio-professionally active population, with approximately 2 million deaths annually, prior to the establishment of certain control and surveillance measures, it is necessary to we understand the social factors and the costs of the disease, elements that increase the risk of infection / death, and what are the needs and services to be addressed. Among the "costs" a patient faces, we can list: long-term and many adverse effects, the high risk of abandonment to resume income-generating occupation, the risk of developing antibiotic resistance, lowering family incomes, entering the vicious circle of poverty by lowering family incomes and increasing vulnerability.

In the following, a series of information on national and international contexts, behavioral, sociologycal, antrophologycal and medical therapies and theories of TB are presented, in the desire to identify the main social factors belonging to the universe of the field of study. At the same time, a great emphasis is placed on risk factors, on the needs of TB patients but also on vulnerable groups. By understanding the whole social, economic, cultural and medical context, new directions of study and new recommendations for practitioners in this field can be outlined in the prevention, control and surveillance of a contagious disease.

1. Introduction

Although tuberculosis is curable and case management is relatively simple when access to healthcare is easy, often the illness is fatal to poor people in rural and urban environments in developing countries. (Farmer apud Ember, 2004) Beyond the clinical and medical aspects, questions arise about the economic, social, family, organizational aspects of the disease universe. At the same time, an analysis is needed between the aspects of anthropology, medical sociology and other social disciplines in order to explain and identify certain patterns in tuberculosis in Romania.

The sociologist and anthropologist Paul Mason, following several researches conducted between 2010-2015, proposes a dynamic social model, an explanatory model of the descriptive and explicative factors and explanatory elements of the disease, disease which is over 95% in developing countries. This model addresses health problems, taking into account the social, cultural and historical factors to understand human health and disease experiences through an interpretative and critical approach. Although the proposed solutions are at an individual level, they are at the intersection of a cumulus of factors that ultimately lead to the public health system.

1.1. Global TB cotext

Analyzing the "Global TB Report 2016" published by the World Health Organization, based on the data reported by each monitored country as well as estimates of unreported cases, the global situation in 2015 was as follows:

- 10.4 million new cases, (56% men, 34% women and 10% children, with 1.2 million (11%) cases of HIV-TB coinfection;
- 480,000 cases with antibiotic-resistant forms: rifampicin resistance (RR), isoniazid resistance and rifampicin (TB-MDR), and finally resistance to all line I and II drugs, the latter form (TB-XDR);
- 1.4 million deaths due to illness, plus about 0.4 million deaths among HIV-TB people. All these statistics place tuberculosis first in terms of deaths from infectious disease and among the top ten causes of death worldwide.

1.2. Tuberculosis in Romania

Regarding the fight against TB in Romania, progress has been observed over the last few years in terms of country indicators and the infrastructure has developed as a result of international funds for TB issues: Global Fund to Fight HIV, TB and Malaria, EEA and Norwegian Funds, World Bank funds as well as other international donors.

Due to the international support, the PNPSCT has made a remarkable increase in the detection and treatment of the disease with some notable results, such as:

- Increase in detection of cases above international targets of 75%;
- Decrease in population incidence from a historical maximum in 2002 to 142.2 per 100,000 inhabitants to 79.9 in 2012;

- Increased therapeutic success rates, usually over 80% for all forms of susceptible tuberculosis and implicitly a decrease in the number of deaths caused by the disease. (PNPSCT, 2016)

The World Health Organization, according to its mission, is defined as an international forum for the role of a "guardian" of global public health and working globally to achieve the maximum potential in terms of the safety and health of the population. GLC is a mechanism, a WHO structure, made up of international specialists who oversee the implementation or facilitate the access of troubled countries to TB-MDR case management. GLC, through its missions, provides technical assistance, expertise, assessments of the status of reforms as well as easy financial mechanisms. (WHO, 2000)

According to the report of the last mission to assess the TB-MDR, conducted by the World Health Organization (GLC) in May 2016, tuberculosis remains a public health problem in Romania and continues to be a threat with all the progress has been made in the last 20 years. From the data collected, it can be noticed that during the last decade, the figures have been steadily decreasing. The incidence of TB among the population, at 100.00 inhabitants, decreased from 142.2 (30,985 new and recurrent cases) in 2002 to 71.7 in 2015. Also, the TB mortality rate (excluding HIV-TB coinfections) fell to 5.7% in 2014.

The critical issues raised by the GLC mission are related to the increase in the number of resistant MDRs but also to other challenges, including the lack or reduced number of kits for rapid testing, the incomplete or non-existent treatment for patients with resistant forms, the deficiencies in the system as long-term hospitalization and higher per capita costs, control of ineffective infections at hospitals and laboratories, which increases the risk of infection of healthcare personnel, lack of control over treatment (DOT) in ambulatory, poor medical and social services coverage high risk of non-adherence, lack of prevention and education activities among vulnerable groups, lack or low number of staff and specialized and non-specialized medical personnel.

According to the National Control Strategy TB 2015-2020, in Romania, the categories that are at high risk of developing the disease are LTBI persons, children under 5, HIV-infected persons (especially those untreated), consumers substances (especially drugs) and people suffering from other conditions (silicosis, diabetes, cancer, kidney disease, autoimmune diseases, etc.). There are also certain categories of population with a higher risk for the general population to contact / develop the disease:

- Close contacts of a person with contagious TB;
- People migrating from areas with high levels of TB;
- Groups with high levels of TB transmission: homeless, injecting drug users (IDUs), HIV-infected people (HIV);
- Those working with people at high risk for TB in establishments or institutions: hospitals, shelters for homeless people, correction units, elderly homes, residential homes for HAVs, etc.

In developed countries, even if the number of cases is decreasing, TB directly affects vulnerable groups with low socio-economic status, substance users, people in high-impact regions, the elderly and all those living in institutions: dormitories, asylums, prisons , hospitals, day centers, etc. (Grange apud Ember, 2004)

Considering the contagiousness of the disease but also the increase in the number of patients with antibiotic-resistant forms, the lack of medication needed for them, the lack of psychosocial support and the bureaucratic and inadequate legislation for these cases, tuberculosis remains a threat to public health (both in Romania and international level). As regards the control of bacillus infections, there are a number of universal recommendations that can prevent transmission or infection. One of the most common recommendations is to ventilate the spaces and allow the penetration of ultraviolet rays to penetrate the rooms. Ultraviolet are the most effective form of destruction of these microbes and UV lamps are the most effective equipment for controlling TB infections in the health system.

2.1. Tuberculosis in Antropology

In the fight with the disease / illness, depending on the cultural specificity, at the individual level there may be problems at the somatic, mental and / or suffering level for reasons of "fate" and / or "misfortune". While individuals are confronted with these problems, the medical system has to cope with troubles related to work, finances, etc. All these aspects intervene and can be addressed separately or integrated in their complexity. (Hahn and Ember, 2004)

A common critique of disease / illness dichotomy is that both are localized or experimented on an individual level, but they cannot be analyzed without context. For this reason, researchers make a direct correlation between these individual sufferings and issues related to processes, events, social order, public health issues and / or inefficiency of health systems. (Waitzkin apud Ember, 2004)

As historians have shown that epidemics are social events that beyond the medical aspects require understanding of the social systems through which disease has multiplied, the anthropological studies of emerging infections seek to explain and understand how these epidemics are integrated into economic relationships and anchored in systems social. Social relationships shape exposure to risks, transmission, and susceptibility, which causes epidemics to cause pathogenic social relationships. (Ranger & Slack et al., 2004)

Anthropologist R. Shrestha-Kuwahara dedicates an entire chapter on tuberculosis to the Encyclopedia of Medical Anthropology, in which he reviews the main studies and researches in the field analizyng the subjects as a whole. Starting from this synthesis, the author tells us that transmission of TB, disease development and treatment take into account many complex factors from the biological and social sphere. By identifying and examining how these factors, anthropologists and sociologists by applying different methods and approaches to disease and their factors, have contributed to understanding correlations in structural, behavioral and socio-cultural TB control. (Shrestha-Kuwahara, 2004)

Historically speaking, Shrestha-Kuwahara has gathered data demonstrating the existence of the disease since antiquity by discovering bacilli in mummies in Egypt dating back to 5,400 years ago. There is also archaeological evidence, through the study of bone DNA, which demonstrates the transmission of disease through migration from one continent to another, a phenomenon also described during the discovery of the American continent of the middle Ages. Anthropologists and sociologists have discovered that over time there have been numerous references to TB through art, thus discovering that the approach has undergone distortions over time: from a romantic way and the copying of paleness by nobility to associating disease with poverty, misery and immorality. From the seventeenth century to the nineteenth century, progress has been done in understanding pathology and clinical manifestations, understanding the social, economic and political context, and improving public policies by stating here the control of eating, improving sanitation and living conditions, patient isolation in the sanatorium and going to pasteurization of milk to avoid the transmission of M. bovis bacilli. (Shrestha-Kuwahara, 2004)

Until recently, the hypothesis of researchers in the field was that tuberculosis occurred 10,000 years ago with the domestication of animals and the occurrence of mutations in M. bovis DNA that could then be transmitted to humans, but with the research of the field of paleomicrobiology M. tuberculosis DNA was found to be more than 35,000 years old, being a much older pathogen than previously believed to have occurred long before the sedentarisation processes of the populations. (Stone Apud Burke, 2011)

Between the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries there have been recorded major advances in TB control. In 1882 Robert Koch discovered M. tuberculosis, the bacillus responsible for the development of the disease, and who will also be called the Koch bacillus. In 1940, streptomycin was discovered, a powerful antibiotic that progressed in treating the disease, but developed very fast resistance. In the 1950s, the principle of a treatment scheme involving the combination of several antibiotics was introduced and a few years later was discovered the isoniazid, the antibiotic "miracle" and very effective when administered in the right schemes. In the presence of streptomycin and isoniazid are still antibiotics basic treatment regimens throughout the world only important findings are antibiotics line II and Group V, antibiotics used for treatment of resistant forms of TB-RR or MDR-TB and have adverse effects for all patients (hearing loss, partial loss of vision, jaundice, liver failure, renal failure, etc.). (Davis and Shrestha-Kuwahara, 2004)

With the discovery of these treatment regimes, social scientists have begun to study other social dimensions, addressing issues of compliance or adherence to treatment, behavioral studies that have shown the importance of patients' rights to be involved in treatment decisions but also causal analyzes, social relationships, or cultural factors. Since 2000, the WHO has introduced a new concept regarding the relationship of TB patients with the community in an attempt to empower local authorities and communities to better respond to patients' needs and to counteract the DOTS strategy of discontinuing treatment. At the same time, there are new directions of study regarding the increase in the number of cases with resistant forms, as well as concerns about opportunistic HIV-TB infections. (Rubel & Moore and Shrestha-Kuwahara, 2004)

In order to see improvements in tuberculosis control, it is necessary to place this disease in the social context and actions should be extended to spheres related to social inequalities, improving education and developing a patient-centered treatment paradigm: are the services necessary for the patient, complementing the medical treatment? The chapter on TB issues in the Encyclopedia of Medical Anthropology makes a review of all social and cultural research into TB control, opening up a series of topics that require further analysis of the search behavior of healthcare, adherence to treatment, stigma, the structure of health programs, and the supplier-beneficiary relationship. (Rober and Buikstra apud Burke 2011) The failure to explain the social context has become the biggest limitation in tuberculosis control as a result of the change in the prevention paradigm of the 1940s, where control means adequate housing, richer nutrition, and living conditions improved and replacing them only with drug treatment with antibiotics has changed reporting mode. (Lonnroth apud Burke, 2011)

According to medical definitions, tuberculosis is a disease that mainly affects the lungs but is not limited to this organ but can also occur in other organs and parts of the body. The route of transmission of the bacillus is the air way and thus through coughing, sneezing, saliva, sang, a contagious person releases through aerosols TB germs that can survive for a few hours if they have a favorable environment. By ingesting these germs a healthy person becomes infected and the human body can respond by encapsulating bacilli and keeping them latent throughout their lives. In the second situation, under conditions of immunosuppression and / or successive infections, the bacillus finds a favorable environment thus developing active tuberculosis. Symptoms of the disease are persistent cough, fever, night sweats and weight loss, and by being similar to other diseases, the time of diagnosis can be postponed for several months, which can lead to infection of others. WHO estimates that a patient can infect between 10 and 15 people within one year. (WHO, 2017)

Although TB is a contagious disease, it is not easily transmitted. WHO guidelines show that only one-third of people exposed to bacilli become infected over a long period (several hours or days). There is a very high risk of transmitting the infection between the diagnosis and the negative (the patient is no longer contagious), which usually lasts for two weeks. Any person who comes in contact with an infected person by inhalation of bacilli may become infected, but the likelihood of developing the disease varies from person to person and takes into account, first of all, the immunological level of the disease. Infected but not developing disease is called LTBI and is a latent infection with TB that is not symptomatic and is not contagious. WHO estimates that about 20% of the world's population is infected with latent TB and the probability that these people develop lifetime disease is 10% (1 in 10). (WHO, 2017)

Homeless people, drug users, HIV-positive people, vulnerable groups as a whole viewed from a systemic perspective are a consequence of social changes that have dismantled the welfare state, which has contributed to increasing social inequalities and rising poverty . In this way, tuberculosis reappears as a public health problem in developed countries, countries where this problem was believed to have been eradicated. (Draus apud Blake, 2011)

2.2. A new explanatory model - Mason Model

The conceptualization of elements of sociology and medical anthropology offers useful methods in examining the dimensions of public health at the expense of the biomedical paradigm, by recognizing cultural experiences as central forces shaping human interactions. In this way, TB researchers can develop new models of understanding health, illness, treatment, with new skills in understanding the sociocultural dimensions that impact on TB patients, thus contributing to the development of new procedures to reduce diagnostic time, increasing the efficiency of the services offered, and ultimately stopping the contagious disease. (Mason, 2015)

Mason thus presents a model of seven key concepts that highlight the social dimensions of tuberculosis through anthropological and sociological approach, conceptions emerging from the conceptualization of the three levels of analysis: personal, interpersonal, and structural. (Mason, 2015)

As regards the individual level, it is worth noting that illness is not just a diagnosis, but rather a sum of social experiences that the patient faces during the illness. At the conceptual level, the disease can also be seen as an interruption of the biography in the sense that for a period of time the patient is self-employed as a pause, in a difficult moment of life, moment that influences his social relations, the level of income, daily activities and quality of life. (Mason, 2015) The seven key concepts presented by Mason can be summarized as follows:

Stigma. As noted above, TB is a curable disease but in most current societies, simple diagnosis with TB can place patients in a social vulnerability due to stigma towards disease / sickness. Effects are difficult to quantify and foresee but can be manifested by the resilience of certain suspects in going to a medical check or resisting diagnosis, decreasing or lack of adherence to treatment, social isolation, and obviously, in extreme cases, suicide.

Biographical interruption is a concept that explores how patients with chronic (or long-lasting illness such as TB) develop, analyze and reinterpret their past, present, and future in narrative form. This method generates valuable information about the personal, social and adaptive processes through which a person with a chronic illness lives.

Medicalization. In the biomedical paradigm, all social and physical problems are seen as biological in nature, thus there is a medical treatment for any problem that has arisen. With the discovery of antibiotics, anti-TB treatment has changed its approach from treating patients to nursing homes and providing social support by involving the community in patient issues to an individualistic approach where the patient is responsible for healing by self-administering the treatment.

Treatment oversight opens up a new perspective on ethnographic and cultural studies, which are considered to be the best way to measure the quality and effectiveness of the DOT.

Gender is very important in the broad context of tuberculosis discussion because it correlates with the results in terms of active detection, diagnosis, treatment and adherence to it. The link is more to how gender is built socially by virtually influencing lifestyle and behavior in accessing medical services, behaviors that directly influence life expectancy.

The technological imperative opens a new subject in the social sciences about the use of technology and how much it helps us. Living in a technology paradigm is often considered to be the most efficient methods, but studies have shown that there are situations where technology is only used for it, even if it does not bring any extra information. This is the case for clinical trials conducted in India, which are still used, although the inefficiency of these technologies has been demonstrated, consuming resources without scientific justification.

The human body or body in front of TB refers to the link between the risks of developing tuberculosis and latent TB infection. One third of the population lives with latent TB (LTBI) and public health policies should take into account the reduction in risk factors that can turn the infection into disease.

In outlining this model, Mason also reviews the main theories that can explain the phenomena and processes in the field of tuberculosis. As far as sociology and health sociology are concerned, the concepts of health and disease terms are related to cultural factors, such as medicalization, dominant discourse, individualism, media, victim's blame, system blame, social control and surveillance. Starting from this conceptualization, it is worth mentioning that it is necessary to understand how general information about disease is built as a constructive social construct based on social, economic, political and cultural interactions. As regards social parks on health and illness, tuberculosis as a field of study has shown close links with topics such as class and social status, social inequality, gender, marginalization, social exclusion or ethnocultural history. (Mason, 2015)

Going into the structuralist and organizational area, studying tuberculosis can not exclude analyzes and research on the way in which health structures are organized and functioning. The organization of systems is directly influenced by social values regarding social and individual responsibility, prevention versus treating a disease but also the way in which the economic environment influences the medical act in practice. From here, complex comparisons or analyzes can be made to demonstrate the links between basic medical coverage and certain indicators such as infant mortality, maternal mortality at birth etc. (Mason, 2015)

The last dimension related to TB is concerning the patient travel and how it addresses the disease, the role of sociologists being to answer a number of questions such as: what is the link between the social class and the health of a person? What are the social forces that predispose some people to develop TB? What is the social response to this disease? But the individual one? Also, answers to other questions regarding patient categories are needed, including diagnosed patients, latent TB patients and also patients with active but non-detectable TB. (Mason, 2015)

3. Conclusions

In order to see improvements in tuberculosis control, it is necessary to place this disease in the social context and actions should be extended to spheres related to social inequalities, improving education and developing a patient-centered treatment paradigm: are the services necessary for the patient, complementing the medical treatment?

The conceptualization of elements of sociology and medical anthropology offers useful methods in examining the dimensions of public health at the expense of the biomedical paradigm, by recognizing cultural experiences as central forces shaping human interactions. In this way, researchers can develop new models of understanding health, illness, treatment, with new skills in understanding the sociocultural dimensions that impact on TB patients, thus contributing to the development of new procedures to reduce diagnostic time, increasing the efficiency of the services offered, and ultimately stopping the contagious disease. IRAN AND INDIA BETWEEN REGIONAL GOVERNANCE AND GLOBAL CHALLENGES

Irina ERHAN[*]
Silviu PETRE[]

Abstract

In a intimately interdependent global environment where one's prosperity depends on the contacts realised with others, isolating one government or community is not only improbable but dangerous because the respective government might go rogue and in peril to be colonised by the most radical elements of its own nation. Such might be the case of Iran if US and other important players toss away JPCOA. Instead of playing according to a zero sum antagonistic logic, Washington might find neighbors of Iran and employ them so as to forge a partnership with Tehran. As such, a friendly Islamic Republic could a solution to many of the problems in the Middle East.

Present study focuses hypothesis around a central questions: "Are two civilisational-states such as India and Iran able to start an alliance in order to fill the power void looming across their borders where an unstable Pakistan and a revanchist Afghanistan may very well fail after the pull out of the international peacekeeping force?" subsequently a second question comes to fore: "Why is there no Iranian-Indian alliance up until now?"

This article argues that India may play an appeasing role towards Tehran ambitions due to geographical proximity and civilisational needs. If they establish a common ground, both republics may work together towards shouldering regional evolution in the AfPak cauldron. Furthermore, the article aims to use Robert Keohane's regime theory applied to the area mentioned above.

Keywords: Iran, India, Afganistan, Pakistan, instability, regional governance, cooperation.

Introduction

Possessing vast natural riches, an expanding workforce along with a booming market one can bet on, India represents for Iran one of the most viable options in the South-East Asian wider area to initiate mutually beneficial partnerships, on medium and long term.

Present study focuses hypothesis around a central questions: "Are two civilisational-states such as India and Iran able to start an alliance in order to fill the power void looming across their borders where an unstable Pakistan and a revanchist Afghanistan may very well fail after the pull out of the international peacekeeping force?" subsequently a second question comes to fore: "Why is there no Iranian-Indian alliance up until now?"

Following the post 1990 events and bearing in mind that both states had a similar cultural and civilisational path, our study has the purpose to identify the strategic motivation behind the Indo-Iranian arrangements and take into consideration the constraints as well as the gap between them.

Additionally, despite many diplomatic attempts on different matters, mutual relationships have shown only ad-hoc goodwill; that is why we found it necesary to describe and explain foreign affairs goals of these two nations, in order to better understand the root causes against establishing a full strategic partnership.

Our research interprets the chosen case study in light of Robert Keohane's regime theory. We will examine each country regarding five dimensions, inspired (but not in exactly the same manner) by the Copenhagen School writings on security: politics, military, economy, social, and civilisational. Each dimension is presented in a different order for each of the two countries. We do not follow a rigid template but an natural unfolding of arguments.

The first part of the article is dedicated to theoretical issues. The second one, split in other two subchapters, reveals some mirror-images showing the interest of each side towards the other, while the third offers the conclusions along with the actual phase of bilateral development.

1.1. Globalisation as seen through regime theory

Nowadays, globalization is a proof of modernization and evolution all around the world. Namely that each state becomes closer towards all the others and they return the favor in kind. Which is false! Globalization may set the stage and embolden the actors to get acquainted but just like between individuals, does not say to you whom you should be friend with. When analysts quote Nye and Keohane's collocation <complex interdependence> they seem to forget the complex dimension[1]. Those two classical authors position themselves against the statocentrism of neorealism and take into consideration both perspectives: interdependence may ease anarchy, fostering greater cooperation but at the same time, it might also encourage bad activities (banditry, human traffic, prostitution, proliferation of small arms or nuclear technology on the black market). All of the above mentioned compound the illegal side of connectivity[2][3].

Given these arguments, we believe that institutional liberalism possesses the most generous explanatory power. Even if other schools of thought may be more accurate in sectorial domains, liberalism's emphasis on mutual dependence remains today's best guidance in IR.

1.2. An economic-centered view about interdependence between states

Postwar American social sciences were heavily tributary to rational choice theory which postulated that individual actions are motivated by personal interest, always searching for the maximum gain with minimal costs. Their endless pursuit of personal welfare can be pinpointed on a map full of rewards and punishments.

International Relations theory didn't miss such trend. Both realists (who became neorealists) and liberals (having updated their earlier premises) derive from rational choice studies and games. While Kenneth Waltz's pioneering neorealism witnessed a world of egotistic states each fearful of the others, Robert Keohane foresaw a milder approach. Although agreeing to the Waltzian starting point about states wanting to survive above anything else, he considers that such survival is dependent on going beyond 'the jungle of suspicion'(in JFK's words)[4] and learning how to cooperate. Therefore, political groups learn to forge path of dialogue which, in the end is assumed by international regimes, arrangements crafted to mitigate conflict, find common grounds and facilitate the accumulation of prosperity.

Regimes have been defined as : "a set of mutual expectations, rules and regulations, plans, organizational energies and financial commitments, which have been accepted by a group of states" by John Gerard Ruggie, credited with having invented the formula, and as "sets of implicit or explicit principles, norms, rules and decision-making procedures around which actors' expectations converge in a given area of international relations" in Stephen Krasner's slightly more elaborate formula[5].

Descending from general towards concrete:

"Principles are beliefs of fact, causation, and rectitude.

Norms are standards of behavior defined in terms of rights and obligations.

Rules are specific prescriptions or proscriptions for action.

Decision-making procedures are prevailing practices for making and implementing collective choice[6]."

However, in order to establish such regimes and afterwards to offer principles, rules and decisions, nation-states are poised to find common grounds in what Keohane calls issue-areas ("sets of issues that are in fact dealt with in common negotiations and by the same, or closely coordinated, bureaucracies, as opposed to issues that are dealt with separately and in uncoordinated fashion[7]")

Once established, international regimes may be regarded as institutions in their own right with the role to lower the transaction costs of negotiating shared interests. Here is starting point of Waltzian neorealism. Whereas the former finds cooperation pegged to the wishes of a hegemon, Keohanian institutionalism believes that collective arrangements are the ones which last the most.

From Keohane moderately pessimistic of human affairs, we assert that interdependence is more intense than states or international regimes can contain. Even though governments choose mutual regimes and treaties in order to obtain common goods, their societies have a dynamic of their own and often goes beneath established norms, seldom generating common bads or externalities. Let's take for example weapons transfer. The majority of world states try to exert their needs for profit (if they are sellers) and security (if they are clients) through legal procedures, like UN Arms

To set the records strait and responds to those critiques who painted his liberalism as a naive overoptimistic Hegelian march towards peace, Keohane explained that: „My theory has nothing to do with the view that commerce leads necessarily to peace; that people are basically good; or that progress in human history is inevitable – all propositions sometimes associated with liberalism (..) My liberalism is more pessimistic about human nature and more cautious about causal connections running from economics to politics than some versions of classical liberalism; and I have never been a supporter of the "Washington Consensus" in its strong neo-liberal form." Trade Treaty (ATT) signed in 2014[8]; however, in spite of their presumed fair intentions, large quantities of arms and ammunition end up in the hands of guerilla or mafias. The explanations are either governments' inability to control the supply chain, either double-standards[9].

2.1. The worldview of Iran

Being the end point of several factors (ideology, religion and spirituality, perception of warfare and threats, regime survival and the consolidation of its regional posture), Iran's national security strategy has come of age after walking a thorny path, from Ḫomeynī's slogan "Nor East, nor West, only the Islamic Republic" up to the favorite saying of the incumbent Supreme Leader - "Show them death [namely the other nations] and they will settle with a fever!"

Shaped by the policies and actions exacted by other great powers, Iranian diplomacy unfolds on traditional parameters with clear penchant for soft power, employing cultural attitudes and values to achieve its essential goals.

At first sight, Iran seems to have channeled its energy towards Middle East where it finances and provides ideological assistance to all sorts of resistance movements within the Islamic world and also through intensifying efforts on behalf of the Shia minorities across the area; all set-up under the noble banner of protecting <the oppressed> against the <oppressors>.

On the other hand, besides the mentioned actions, the routine of Iranian diplomacy is geared up for defensive, so as to protect the regime against what is perceived to be American&allied endeavours to invade or impair the revolutionary regime, or other objectives related to the prestige of the former Persian Empire.

However, a more profound analysis must go beyond reductionism and take into account the porousness of frontiers, the increased conflicts in the neighbourhood, and last but not least the multiplication of political and socio-economical crises at the global level. With all of these in mind, Iran hopes it will return to international diplomatic society, whereas the latest nuclear agreement might boost Tehran's regional perception.

When the Soviet Union fell apart, Iranian interests created the opportunity to highlight a regional framework based on diverse contacts with states from Caucasus, Central Asia, and South-East Asia, some of them sharing either common threats with Iran: terrorist and extremist Sunni groups; either linguistic, cultural and religious proclivities[10]. More so, the Constitution of the Islamic Republic describes in a crystal clear manner the foreign policy paths in regard to: the neighbors of Iran; those nations with a Muslim majority, as well as towards the third world[11].

At the same time, Iranian strategy towards its closest neighbours, Central Asia and India is nourished by several factors (economic, social, cultural and security), to the extent those just mentioned states are conceived as investment & consumers markets and, most of all, they can alleviate the ring of isolation Trump administration might superpose over Tehran movements.

According to the ancient Persian vision of geography, Iran remains embedded into the Middle East, Central Asia and Caspian area, that is why its foreign policy is always preoccupied to identify opportunities to be a part on the vast chessboard of a multipolar world.

As Iran is engaged in the transition from a rather rigid, fossil-fuel based economy towards a pro-market one, heavily linked to the global capital, Tehran needs to solve its nearby issues in order to further invite other actors.

Within this logic presented above, a state like Afghanistan poses significant problems to the extent it generates instability by being a traditional hub for drug traffic and a meeting point for jihadi fighters coming from everywhere.

From the standpoint of Iran, Afghanistan sends an open invitation to political expansion, given that the latter's official language emerges as a version of tehrānī dialect[12].

[12] In Western linguistical and political official documents, darī is held to be "Afghan Persian", a shade of the Persian language but spoken in Afghanistan.

One of the advantages Tehran brings to the fore is its absence from all sorts of alliances and other regional agreements, which provides the former with a certain detachment and neutrality when dealing with the nearby border conflicts.

By and large, the interest showed by the Islamic Republic towards India might be explained through the intention to get closer to governments that have a friendly relationship with the United States and Israel in order to assert its own cause or even determine Pakistan to change its approach towards Tehran.

2.1.1. Political dimension

According to Jalil Roshandel, Iran's rapprochement towards India started to increase since 1990s as a part of the 'Look East policy' promoted by Tehran, underpinned by a mutual desire to initiate a strong connection within the Central Asian and Caspian geographic complex. In order to achieve such a plan, Afghanistan had to be drawn in a 'tripartite strategic partnership' (2003) which would have allowed a transit corridor to Iranian and Indian goods towards Central Asian and Caucasian republics[13]. Furthermore, both Tehran and New Delhi would have a pretext to exert and increase pressure over Kabul and Islamabad.

By identifying three stages in the Indo-Iranian relationship, namely 1947[14] - 1989[15]; 1990 - 2001[16]; 2001 – present day, C.Christine Fair asserts that their bilateralism remains complicated, each side being influenced by different links and entanglements with the wider international system.

Thus, if prior to 1971, when India has won the war with Pakistan, Iranian attitude towards India was rather prudent due to Tehran proclivity in regard to Karachi (Islamabad)[17]; after 1971 Iran changed the agenda and put India up on its list of priorities[18].

The implosion of the Soviet Union has offered both Iran and India the opportunity to cooperate on common projects in Central Asia, as both of them were interested to curtail terrorist activities and organised crime in that geographic area[19].

As such Iran has found in the South Asian nation a partner eager to cooperate and all of that in a testing time when Tehran had just finished a bloody war. The Islamic Republic had few supporters in its struggle to Iraq, which left Iran poorer and more isolated in the end.

On one hand, the beginning of the war against terrorism in 2001 has allowed Iran as well as India to act in a much more organised framework against Sunni militants, creating a manueuver space in Afghanistan. On the other hand, including Iran into the 'Axis of Evil' proved a turning point for Iranian foreign policy, determining Tehran to start persuading different states in order to take it out of isolation, India being one of them[20].

Nevertheless, when it was found out that Iran was developing a secret nuclear program and Tehran started to make certain mistakes in its foreign policy, India – itself once a target of the international forum due to nuclear ambitions- has voted again Iran at the AIEA. New Delhi considered that another nuclear neighbour would not have been in its own interest. Moreover, the previous links between Iranian nuclear scientific community and AQ Khan, the father of Pakistani atomic arsenal, have been a strain to the progress of Indo-Irani relations[21].

Politically speaking, the visit of Iranian president to India (15 to 17 February 2018) has not produced any spectacular results, as India continues to be dependent on the larger strategy announced by Trump administration with regard to JPCOA. Thus, up to this point, any agreement perfect between the two Asian governments are insufficient to take the dialogue to the next level, whereas New Delhi pipes to Washington's tune[22].

All in all, worth mentioning is the fact that after Rouhani's visit, Iran and India have identified several common goals, such as supporting the Palestinian cause. In this regard, Tehran greeted New Delhi's position at UN after United States has declared Jerusalem to be the capital of Israel[23].

2.1.2. Military dimension

The vision of a 'strategic partnership' between Iran and India has been improving since 2003 with the visit of Iranian president Moḥammad Ḫātamī in India. The head of the Islamic Republic has been honored to attend India's Republic Day, event which was labeled to be one of substance, according to several pundits. By signing of the 'Delhi Declaration' and 'Roadmap for strategic cooperation', were created the premises for a future military synergy mutually and profoundly beneficial as India helped train Iranian navy personnel and afterward performed common exercises while Iranian technicians mended Soviet style military equipment operated by the Indian armed forces[24].

Interested in Indian know-how in military affairs, purchase of weapons and assuring bilateral experience exchange on intelligence, Iran has oriented its strategy in a way to institutionalise a strategic dialogue and create together with India a working group dedicated to combating terrorism and drug traffiking. Tehran has seen in New Delhi a potential provider of conventional military equipment, therefore a MoU (Memorandum of Understanding) appeared in 2001 that offered the legal framework for Iran to buy military telecommunication gear, anti-tank rockets and spare parts. All in all, the military and intelligence coordination is constrained by the pressure from Washington and Tel Aviv, both of them insisting on New Delhi not to sell Tehran maritime hardware which might affect their regional security[25].

In summary, if Iran hopes to have a much closer relationship with India, the latter desires to keep the balance straight, so as not to break the ties either with the United States or Israel. The formality of their relations was revealed when several Israeli diplomats were victims of a terrorist attack in New Delhi (13.02.2012): shortly after Indian diplomacy did not wait too long and launched allegations with regard to a possible Iranian involvement whereas Iran refused to assist the police investigation in finding the perpetrators[26].

2.2.3. The economic dimension

The visit of the Indian prime-minister Narendra Modi (in 2016) in Tehran should be seen as a manner the international community is rediscovering Iran after the latter agreed to sign JPCOA. At first the event seemed, as usually, concerned on bussiness issues. However the bilateral agreements signed showed a desire to deepen economic relations.

As a proof, Iranian media hailed the importance of India on the Asia subcontinent and praised it to be the third economic power of the world in 2030. Some of the most important newspapers in Persian published headlines announcing that Iran and India "intend to challenge China in Central and South Asia" through the port Čābahār, set in the Iranian province Sīstān-o-Balūčistān. Also, the two actors made the promise to boost the maritime commerce between Persian Gulf, the Sea of Oman and the Indian Ocean[27].

The Memorandum of Understanding signed between India, Iran and Afghanistan for the development of the mentioned Iranian port along with the operationalisation of a transport and commercial corridor through Afganistan appear to ease the access of Iranian products to the Indian market. As a source of inspiration from what was once known as the 'Silk road,' all three states became aware that a corridor would allow the growth of economic potential and, last but not least, the improvement of political and security links between them.

According to the Iranian perspective, the development of Čābahār bears crucial importance also to India, given the fact that the port should become a direct rival for the Pakistani port of Gwadar, which has already been a beneficiary of Chinese investments. The matter did not escape public analysis, the Iranian news website Enteḫāb.ir was highlighting that India needs more than ever energy and connectivity projects with the Persian space, a terrestrial hub for many countries in Central Asia, Russia and Europa[28].

Another Iranian online platform, "Dīplumāsī-ye īrānī" advised India to reconsider the rhetorical tone towards Iran and its neighbors from Middle Eastern, given the former dependence towards fossil fuels and for the Iranian import market[29].

A third opinion, presented by the Iranian news agencies "Irna" and "Fars" have reported this high visit from the mutually beneficial perspective, perceiving India as the second most important client of Iran with regard to oil after China. In this respect, by signing the three party MoU, president Ḥasan Roūḥānī considered it "more than an economic document" but a "message for each of the three countries involved that they may dare to open new international routes[30]."

Taking into consideration not only financial reasons, but also geopolitics, by getting friendly with India, Iran has the chance to find new investors in infrastructure and outdistance itself from Chinese presence on the Iranian market. Although Tehran posseses unrefined oil, it still needs refineries as those already in function are either technologically outdated either abandoned. In this regard, Indian oil refining infrastructure adapted to a low sulfurous environment might prove attractive. Iran sees India as a partner when comes to exploring and development of oil and gas wells; now in China's upper hand[31].

To conclude, Ḥasan Rūḥānī's visit to India (February 2018) was described in beautiful words about 'historical ties' but without any major contracts signed. Energy was sidelined on the bilateral agenda given Washington's announcement about reinforcing once more sanctions against Tehran. However, a victory concerned the Čābahār with India signing contracts on 18 months[32].

Considering the Peace pipeline Iran-Pakistan-India, Tehran has not abandoned the project which would bring not only financial gains, but also the reputation of having solved through diplomatic means the historical conflicts between the Southasian neighbours. At the time of writing this research, three impediments prevented us to complete the project: 1) the first concerns Tehran's claim to modify the price of oil each three years; [33] 2) American pressure and the perspective to reimpose sanctions; 3) Pakistan not being able to fulfill the agreement signed in 2009 and complete its sector of the pipeline. Thus India backed down and chose to negotiate energy contracts on bilateral basis with Tehran and Islamabad[34].

2.2.4. Social dimension

With regard to the social dimension of security, Iran has identified in India a great provider of pharmaceutical products, which tends to have an edge in comparison to the Western ones[35]. More so, due to geographical shorter distance, medicines can be delivered to Iranian pharmacies much faster[36].

2.2.5. Cultural dimension

Iranian official news agency, 'IRNA' noted that the interest of both states go far beyond political borders, and that Iran treats India as a great 'world civilisation' where the Persian language has been used as official idiom for around 700 years[37].

Sharing a common linguistic DNA, which derive from the Indo-Irani stock, Iran as well as India nurtured vast empires which shaped the culture of a modern nation nowadays.

Experts took notice of a Persian influence upon Indian subcontinent even before the advent of Islam, since the rule of Cyrus the Great. After the Arab conquest, many Zoroastrian worshipers[38] fled to Indian territories to escape the Muslim banishment of their cult[39].

Another cultural meeting point is the parsi[40] community in India. By no means large, it represents one of the most important communities there, especially because it succeeded in maintaining vivid contacts with the Zoroastrians[41] in the Iranian cities of Kerman and Yazd. People with Persian origins, Parsis used an archaic language, the Avesta in their religious rituals and continue to cherish the preislamic glory of the Persian dynasties[42].

At the same time, it is important to mention that in India lives a 14 million strong Shia community which can trace the beginning since the first century of the Sunni-Shia schism[43].

In contemporary India, the shia community speaks Urdu with Arabian-Persan alphabet. Its members value formal education and they are fully integrated into the Indian mainstream but at the same time they keep the juridical duodecimanical tradition

Bearing such cherished advantages, Persian language has come to be known as <the language of diplomacy and politeness>. regarding the line of ᶜAlī and preserve the right to use and update the sacred text of their cult[44].

Through clerics and seminaries organised in Qom and Mašhad, Tehran maintains a close relationship with Shia community in India. Such cultural practices keep alive the flame of Shiism and strengthens transnational networks so as to connect Shia believers across the map[45].

2.3. Indian worldview with regard to Iran

2.3.1. Cultural dimension

With a history of over a millennium, Indo-Iranian relations have drawn the geography of a common heritage, thus linking South Asia to the Pamir plateau and further on towards larger Eurasia. Their durability predates political relations between the two centers of civilization. Just like in the previous part, Indian interests towards their Iranian counterparts shall be treated on five dimensions: social, political, economic, military and environmental.

According to Jawaharlal Nehru, in his 'Discovery of India':

"Among many peoples and races who have come in contact with and influenced India's life and culture, the oldest and most persistent have been the Iranians. Certainly, the relationship precedes even the beginnings of Indo-Aryan civilization, taking their common roots, that the Indo-Aryans and the ancient Iranians split and took different ways[46]."

The long essay written in prison by India's first prime-minister does not consider Persian influence in South Asia only from ancient times, but acknowledges it to have been continuous and pervading all cultures:

"In India this Iranian influence was continuous, and during the Afghan and Moghul periods in India, the court language of the country was Persian. This lasted right up to the beginning of the British period. All the modern Indian languages are full of Persian words[47'48]. "

Further on, between VIII[th] and X[th] century AD Iranian migrants came to India where they became Parsees. With a number of more than 114.000 during the earlier stages of the XX century, nowadays they diminished.

XVIth century proved to be a period of Renaissance not only for Europe, but also a creative momentum due to the quasi-simultaneity of Safavid and Mughal Empires. As long as Shia doctrine was promoted in an aggressive manner, many nobles and intellectuals left the Shahs' rein and found refuge at the tolerant Mughal court where some of them gained high esteem[49]. According to the historian of Middle Ages Irfan Iqbal: "the sectarian divide could not prevent the intellectual interchange between the scholars of India and Persia; and for this the generally tolerant policy of the Mughal Empire deserves recognition[50]."

Architectural wonders such as Taj Mahal, Fatehpur Sikri or Humayun's Tomb in New Delhi along with many other Persian modeled gardens are a testament of the successful synthesis between the two civilisations[51].

Taking advantage of the Silk Road, many Indian merchants established themselves across Central Asia up to the Caspian Sea[52]. Even if today such communities are in a small number as compared to the past, their remnant have acquired an archeological importance, such is Ateshgah, the Fire Temple at the outskirts of Azerbaijan's capital, Baku.

2.3.2. Social dimension

However, from societal point of view, Iran is important to India for several reasons: a) India has the world's fifth Shia community, therefore any sign from Tehran has to be felt in South Asia; b) even Indian expats in Iran does not surpass 60 family or so (mostly Sikhs) [53], New Delhi has to take care of the widest diaspora on the globe, 15-16 million[54], with many working in the oil rich countries in the Gulf region and Libya. Therefore, instability in the Middle East would not be desirable for Rashina Hill. It is a well known fact that in 1990, with the outbreak of the first Gulf war against Saddam Hussein's invasion of Kuweit, Indian air force was sent to lift from the ground 100.000 Indian citizens employed in that area[55].

2.3.3. Economic dimension

Starting from the natural cultural influence between Persic Gulf and South Asia, Indo-Iranian economic interactions came as a plus to stylistic affinities. On the other hand, the intensity of trade and industrial contacts has been influenced by political raison d'etat.

During the seventeenth century, India was Iran's main trading partner. According to a study, the value of their trade was the equivalent of 32 metric tonnes of silver. Safavid Iran was interested in four main products originated from Mughals: textiles, indigo, sugar, and spices. Many Gujarati merchants lived in Isfahan, as witnessed by different Western travelers like Jean Tavernier[56].

In modern times, after 1950, Indo-Iranian economic relationships focused on oil and technology. With Pahlavian Iran's great oil reserves, the Shah was aiming to modernize its society in a fast pace, and India was an opportunity with its technology and expertise. On the other hand, India's mammoth economy needed oil for it increasing domestic consumption[57]. Bilateral investments between the two countries have a tradition of their own. In 1965, Chennai Petroleum Corporation limited was created between the government of India, and National Iranian Oil Company. In December 1966, Madras Fertilizers Ltd was another landmark in common enterprises. Ten years later one could witness the birth of The Irano-Hind Shipping Company, a joint venture with 51% Iranian capital and 49% Indian[58].

Today, bilateral relations still evolve around energy matters. In the fiscal year 2016-2017, trade was estimated around $12.89 billion, with India importing $10.5 billion worth goods, mostly crude oil[59].

At the moment of our writing, three core issues were essential for the agenda of Indo-Iranian economic ties, and all of them reffer of geopolitics: a) the access to Farzad-B oil fields; b) the completion of Iran-Pakistan-India pipeline; c) the development of Chabahar port.

In 2008, a consortium of Indian companies headed by ONGC Videsh Ltd discovered a vast reservoir of natural gas in the Persan Gulf that was called the Farzad-B gas field. After the UN embargo against Iran due to its nuclear program, Indian companies took a step back. Since 2016, when the sanctions were lifted, the same consortium wanted a comeback, but they cannot settle an offer satisfactory to National Iranian Oil Company. Moreover, recent developments didn't help negotiations as Tehran signed an agreement with Russian company, Gazprom in May 2017. At the beginning of 2018, both nations indulge in a blame game and take retaliatory measures against each other: whereas India cut the import of gas by a third to 415,400 barills per day (bpd), Iran has cut by one-third the time it gave to Indian refiners to pay for oil they buy from it[60].'

The port Chabahar is Iran's only oceanic port with a coastline to the Gulf of Oman. If developed to its full potential, the port allows India to avoid Pakistan and better connect to Central Asia. In May 2016, India and Iran signed an agreement on this matter followed by president's Rouhani inauguration of the first phase in November 2017 surrounded by the officials of 17 countries. New Delhi strategists hope that Chabahar should prove a serious competitor for the Pakistani port Gwadar. 'Reducing the Pakistani blockage regarding India-Afghan connectivity is central' to the enterprise, considers Indian analyst Harsh Pant. According to Afghan Chief Executive Abdullah Abdullah, "Afghanistan used to rely only on one transit road, which was through Karachi. That is not the case anymore. [Now] it's [also] through Chabahar[61]." India endeavors to help Afghanistan's reconstruction by limiting Afghan dependence to Pakistani goods. As a matter of fact, New Delhi send 15.000 tonnes of wheat to Afghanistan in October 2017 through Chabahar, and from than on the transport went to Zaranj, an outpost city at the Irano-Afghan border. The maritime pivot has to be linked to Zaranj-Delaram highway in Afghanistan, completed by India in order to attract Kabul in its area of influence[62].

The geopolitics of pipelines has, instead, an opposite stake: to link India and Pakistan in a wider corridor of energy which could fade their growing economies desire for supplementary energy. IPI (Iran-Pakistan-India) and TAPI (Turkmenistan-Afghanistan-Pakistan-India) are two major avenues pursed by India's Look West grand strategy. IPI was blueprinted in 1989 by Iranian and Indian diplomats didn't have an impressive evolution, especially after 2009 when Indian pulled back from the project due to US pressure to stop Iranian nuclear program. Instead, Washington proposed Manmohan Singh an alternative with TAPI. However, after Iran signed the agreement with P+5, India could follow both infrastructural projects[63].

2.3.4. Military dimension

Taking into consideration our arguments with regard to Irano-Indian military conundrum, their links in this matter are rather shy, oriented only on political and economical matters.

In 1983 both states have established a Working Group for defence matters to further the personal contacts between their militaries. New Delhi Declaration (2003) seemed to have unveiled a period of strong cooperation mainly in defence logistics (India would have refitted Iranian Soviet style T-72 tanks and MIG-21 jets). In March the same year Indian and Iranian navies conducted their first joint naval exercise in the Arabian Sea[64].

In the aftermath of Rouhani visit to India (February 2018) the common Declaration stressed out the threat of terrorism and the subsequent need to cooperate in this matter, especially on the Afghan front[65].

It is fair to think that in the near future, intelligence jointness seems more realistic than the military one; given that fact that Indian defence industry is still obstructed by bureaucracy and the national armed forces still rely on imports, and that a reenactment of international sanctions against Tehran might prove prohibitive to any further arms transfers.

2.4. Political dimension

It remains to the political level to synthesize the historical relations between two venerable civlisations and walk those steps necessary to implement the economic imperatives. Whereas during the sanctions era, India had to bend to structural pressure and bandwagon along the American side, now, with the warming up, New Delhi and Tehran can make the most of it and establish a functional and durable interdependence.

Past experience is not absent and may serve as a guide to further action[66].

The two pillar of Indo-Iranian most recent rapprochement are Modi's visit in Iran in 2016 followed by Rouhani coming to South Asia late February 2018. Synthetising both Joint Communiqués we find that both parties acknowledged the New Delhi Declaration from 2003 as the founding document of their collaboration, enumerated a wide range of items of mutual interest and expressed: "their determination to build a strong, contemporary and cooperative relationship that draws upon the strength of the historical and civilisational ties between the two countries, leverages their geographical proximity, and responds to the needs of an increasingly interdependent world. They were also of the view that their governments must enable and encourage utilisation of the emerging opportunities to the maximum possible extent in all areas of bilateral economic and commercial cooperation, in particular connectivity and infrastructure, energy, and trade & investment." (2016)[67] and acted towards "Wide-ranging and constructive discussions on bilateral, regional and multilateral issues were held in a cordial atmosphere." (2018)[68]

Repeated promises about Afganistan ("Both sides stressed that the interests of peace and stability in the region are best served by a strong, united, prosperous, pluralisitic, democratic and independent Afghanistan while supporting the National Unity Government in the country. They stressed out the significance of strengthening India-Iran-Afghanistan trilateral consultations and coordination, including by suitably supplementing their cooperation on Chabahar.") spell the mutual desire to shoulder regional governance.

To return to theory, Indian elites try to craft their entanglement with Tehran in the language of interdependence and define a regime based on < mutual expectations, rules and regulations, plans, organizational energies and financial commitments >.

However, one must not think that it is all about pragmatism. Even though India's diplomatic behaviour did not pinpointed the promotion of democracy like US

[66] Postwar Indo-Iranian diplomatic ties begun in 1950 and passed through several phases. From a strictly structural/ neorealist perspective, both countries were part of different alliances with rather antagonist needs. While Nehruvian India styled itself as champion of non-aligned world, Iranian proclivities looked for the friendship of the United States and enlisted itself into CENTO, also known as the Baghdad Pact (1955-1979; a NATO inspired arrangement made up of Turkey, Iran, Iraq, Pakistan and the United Kingdom with the purpose of checking the expansion of the Soviet Union). Apart from that, Indo-Iranian relationship was somehow strained by the particular moves within the Greater Middle East. Whereas the Shah maintained a close dialogue with Pakistan, Nehru's close friendship with Nasser, an enemy of Muslim dinasties, could not further the rapprochement between Tehran and New Delhi. did, still, Indian public opinion, pundits and decisionmakers shy away from the theocratic leanings of the Islamic Republic in the words of analyst Subhash Agrawal: "If we could find a substitute for energy, we would walk away from them. India doesn't want to be with Iran, but who is there to give us oil? We would never choose to have a relationship with this type of unstable and reactionary regime[69]."

Probably it would be unreasonable to conclude that these are the impressions of all important actors on the Indian stage, but we wonder how will India's external behaviour evolve when Hindutva nationalists will express an intolerant opinion towards Muslims both at home and abroad!

Conclusions

Iran's geographical position as a bridge between Central Asia, Middle East, and the Persic Gulf allows it to bet on regionalism in order to detect those strategic opportunities concerning the state with which Tehran has maintained historical, linguistic, and cultural connections.

Assuming the regional power status, Iran cannot even conceive being discarded out of the big players table; therefore, following this logic India can be counted as an emergent global power which Iran is eager to become friend with. Oriented on becoming a part of different regional cooperation formulas, Iran has identified India as the partner of choice based on three levels: politically, New Delhi might soften its sour relationship with the United States; economically it is able to receive Iranian fossil fuels; militarily- offering assistance and provide conventional equipment, and last but not least, cultural, given the previous linguistic, historical and civilisational affinities. Also, in spite of Iranian efforts to strengthen its friendship with India, New Delhi takes a prudent line, dictated by the dual rhetoric coming from Washington and Tel Aviv.

To return to the theoretical part and to Robert Keohane's theory or regimes, we may say that Tehran and New Delhi are on the verge of establishing an international regime pending the pressure of the global hegemon- the US and its allies. Up to this moment, principles and norms offer hope in this direction; what is lacking is substantial decision-making which would help the alliance between those great nations to use their shared civilisational roots in order to create an oasis of civility upon the Afpak conundrum.

THE EUROPEAN UNION VERSUS THE RUSSIAN FEDERATION

George GRUIA*

Abstract

The article is part of a comprehensive social, juridical and economic study that seeks to find solutions to the current geopolitical situation where the Russian Federation has expanded its territory using force without the consent of the Kiev government or EU member states on Crimea. This situation, in conjunction with the Syrian refugee crisis, with the political crisis on the government formation in Germany, with the Brexit, with the establishment of Austria's controversial government, the sanction of Poland by the Council of Europe and, last but not least, with the problems facing the formation of the new inland government may and should be analyzed together and is one of the purposes of this study, which will be partial analyzed and presented in this article. The author wishes to open a constructive scientific discussion with the academic bodies empowered to properly inform the civil society and not only without favoring any of the parties involved in this issue, namely: the EU states (Germany, Austria, Poland, and Italy) and the Russian Federation. The author presents the results obtained by the EU in conjunction with NATO's actions in Eastern Europe.

1. Introduction

The unprecedented peace and stability that Europe is crossing at the end of the 20th century and the beginning of the 21st century is due to the existence of the European Union. It is the European Union which has generated not only a high level of economic development on the continent, but also a new approach to security, based on the peaceful settlement of disputes and on multilateral international cooperation through community institutions. Of course, the United States has played a crucial role in ensuring European security, both through its support for European integration and NATO's security engagement with Europe. In contrast to these positive developments in the west of the continent, in other parts of Europe, and especially in the Balkans, a series of crises emerged after 1990 in the context of the geopolitical resettlements that followed the end of the Cold War. An essential feature of these was that they often took place within and between states. However, the experience of the period 1990-2004 has shown that no state, not even a superpower like the US, can approach global security issues by itself. Against this background, after 1990, and especially after 1998, the European Union has given new impetus to efforts to strengthen security and define the defense dimension at European level. The development of a common foreign and security policy also included the idea of defining a common defense policy explicitly mentioned in the Treaty of Amsterdam. At the same time, the European Union has been increasingly concerned about the completion of its internal institutional reforms, especially in the context of enlargement, as well as the finalization of the political debate on the future of Europe. Being a global economic actor, the EU participates fairly substantially on global security mechanisms, even if the concrete forms of such involvement are not yet clearly specified. As a result, international stability can now be conceived only by multi-level cooperation at the international community level, and especially through institutionalized dialogue, by increasing the involvement of large international organizations in defining world security. The globalization, manifested by the accentuation and liberalization of the global flows of goods, services, capital and information, has meant that internal and external risks can be mutually generated and reinforced. Against the background of an increase in the complexity and unpredictability of international threats, the improvement of the international security environment requires that internal crisis management measures be better coordinated and that the strategic information exchange between the involved states should take place in real time. As a result the state and its decisions are influencing directly the public and private sector, especially the business environment[1]. Since September 11th 2001 and March 11th 2004, more than ever, the risks to the international security environment and first of all to the proliferation of terrorism and weapons of mass destruction are to be tackled through flexible

2. Political situation in EU

2.1. Political situation in Germany

For more than 100 days, Merkel has been trying to form a government - first with liberals and ecologists, now with social democrats. For her, there is no discussion of collaboration with the right-wing extremists in the ranks of the AfD party (Alternative for Germany). Uncertainties about the new governmental formula in Germany are coming to an end after the Social Democratic Party (SPD) approved the new government coalition agreement with the Christian Democrat Union, led by Angela Merkel. Two-thirds of the German Social Democrats voted for the agreement. SPD sources say most left-center members voted in favor of prolonging the coalition with the Christian Democrat Union. Out of over 366,000 SPD members casting their vote, over 66% voted for the new CDU agreement, which means continuing the big coalition between the two parties. The members of the Social Democratic Party (SPD) have been called to rule whether they support or not the prolongation of the coalition with Angela Merkel's party. The Christian-Democratic Union and the Social Democrat Party have concluded a new government agreement, negotiators agreeing on the division of key ministries, one of the last obstacles to the formation of the new government. Angela Merkel says the agreement provides the basis for "a good and stable government," while Martin Schulz thanked the Christian Democrats for accepting difficult compromises. Under the agreement, the SPD would lead six ministries, including Finance and Foreign Ministries. At the same time, the Christian-Democratic Union convenes the National Conference to approve the governmental agreement with the Social Democrats. This is one of the last obstacles to resolving the five-month political deadlock in Germany. The Christian Democrats' Conference takes place after the German Chancellor has announced who will be the members of the new cabinet. Merkel's ally, Annegret Kramp-Karrenbauer (AKK), general secretary of the party, will also vote. Kramp-Karrenbauer is seen as Merkel's successor. Being dubbed the "mini-Merkel," the 55-year-old prime minister of Saarland has visions similar to those of the Chancellor, but not entirely. It is often referred to as "AKK", and is similar to Merkel for both ideological and character-related reasons. "AKK" will follow Peter Tauber, 43, who resigned for health reasons, one of the critical voices in the CDU, after disappointing results from the latest legislation. Merkel's formation won the election, but with a low historical score of 32.9%. After being a 12-year chancellor and leader of the CDU for 18 years, Merkel's authority is declining in the party, and nominations for the new Cabinet come as an answer to the need for new people.

2.2. Political situation in Austria

The Austrian People's Party, headed by young Sebastian Kurz, ranked first in the general election in October 2017, with 31 per cent of voting options, following an anti-immigration and right-wing program. At 31, Kurz became Chancellor and thus the youngest national leader in the world and in the history of Austria. The People's Party will ally with the Social Democrats or the Liberty Party (far-right). He's always a few steps in front of everyone: this is how the new Austrian chancellor likes to present himself. Angela Merkel, head of the government with the longest experience in the European Union, said that "the young political star did not become Chancellor only because of his almost bold self-confidence. Sebastian Kurz has an instinct for populism and is willing to ally with partners who scare others. Its coalition with the right-wing populist FPO, a front ally of the Front National Party in France, gives rise to emotions in Western chancelleries. “Kurz wants more regional decisions and is not willing to offset Brexit's effects for the EU by providing additional amounts from wealthy states such as Germany and Austria. In addition, the young chancellor criticized Merkel's position on the "distribution of refugees on quota basis" and pleads for "an end to the sanctions against Russia" imposed following the annexation of Crimea. At the same time, the Austrian official has re-interpreted his sympathy for Hungarian Prime Minister Viktor Orban and other eurosceptics with extremely tough positions against refugees as "building bridges." Since 2015, Kurz has been remarked in the relationship with our country, when he was a Foreign Minister, demanding a reform of the social systems in the European Union, being dissatisfied with the fact that the Austrian state pays a child allowance of 160 euros for the child of a Romanian who works in Austria, although in Romania this allowance is much lower. Kurz then explained that for two Romanian children, whose parents work in Austria, the Austrian state offers about 300 euros a month, and "the sum almost corresponds to an average salary in Romania". His proposal had no chance of winning in Government and Parliament, but the young Kurz did not give up on the idiom. Earlier this year, the Vienna press reported that Austria paid nearly 250 million euros in one year as allowences for the EU citizens working in the country, but left their families and / or children at home. Sebastian Kurz, along with Labor Minister Sophie Karmasin, drafted a bill to cut off these allowances from January 1st 2018, and adjust them according to the level of living in those countries. The goal is an annual savings of 100 million euros to the state budget of Austria. It remains to be seen if the new Chancellor will accomplish this desideratum, especially as he is in the governing alliance with the far right Liberty Party.

2.3. Poland sanctioned by the European Commission

Immediately after it came to power in the fall of 2015, the Law and Justice Party (PiS, conservative) who is governing and has a majority in the two chambers of the Warsaw legislature, initiated a series of judiciary reforms considered by the Commission European as a threat to the rule of law. The PiS justifies these reforms by the need to end a "caste" of magistrates, considered PiS heirs of the communist regime and many of them being corrupt. As a sign of protest, thousands of people went out on the streets repeatedly, demanding the cancellation of these changes along with notifying Bruxelles. In this regard, the Community Executive has launched an unprecedented procedure against Poland, which could lead to the suspension of Warsaw's right to vote in the EU. After months of warnings, the European Commission has launched a lawsuit against Poland that has not been used so far and can go as far as depriving that country of its voting rights within the European Union. In this regard, the EU executive has announced that it is triggering the activation procedure of Article 7 of the Treaty of the European Union, often qualified as the "nuclear option" among possible sanctions within the Union. "I have a hard heart to activate" this article, said Commission Vice-President Frans Timmermans. According to Timmermans, within two years, 13 new laws allowed the government to "significantly interfere" with the judiciary system, adding that Poland received a three-month deadline to respond to the reported concerns. However, the procedure initiated against Poland is complex. In the first instance, Article 7 allows the "establishment of a clear risk of serious breach" of EU values, including the rule of law, requiring the opinion of a qualified majority of 22 EU Member States. But possible sanctions, such as the withdrawal of voting rights, can only intervene in a second phase, which, in order to trigger, would require a unanimous vote of member states, except the one targeted. And unanimity does not seem possible. Hungary, has announced it will oppose vetoing the EU's action against Poland. Hungarian Deputy Prime Minister Zsolt Semjen said that "Polish-Hungarian friendship and the Hungarian government's commitment to treaties force us to take an attitude in all the fora against the measure decided by the European Commission." Meanwhile, European Council's President Donald Tusk said that "Poland is perceived today as a force of disintegration in this part of Europe and that is why I think it is important to end the destruction (...) of Poland's reputation." In turn, European Commission's President Jean Claude Juncker stated that "we will not break all bridges with Poland" and "we are not in war with Poland," but that "it is a difficult day for Poland but also for the EU ". In the context of the EU being aware that a suspension of voting rights remains a theoretical threat, Brussels is considering new instruments: the idea of making access to European structural funds conditional on respecting EU values and decisions is already being circulated. In a press release issued by Warsaw announced that he "regrets the European Commission launched the procedure provided for Article 7 of the Treaty on European Union", a decision which he considers "political and not legal." Also, Warsaw declares its willingness to inform the representatives of the Commission of the aspects of the legislative process aimed at reforming the judicial system in Poland. Polish Justice Minister Zbigniew Ziobro, in his turn, said he had "calmly" received the decision of the European Commission, stating that "Poland is a country that respects the rule of law" and that its country "will play a significant role in Europe and the European Union only if it has efficient and functional courts."

2.4. Elections in Italy

The situation is worrying after the right-far right wing coalition ranks first on the legislatures recently held in Italy, but without the absolute majority, while the populist 5-star (M5S) movement became the first party in the country. But none can get the majority and the crisis deepens in the Peninsula. To make a fair analysis, the political crisis situation in Italy must be viewed from two perspectives: that of Italy's policy and from the perspective of the European Union. "From the point of view of Italian politics, a crisis that has the marks of a blockage has been reached. There are three large party groups or party coalitions at the moment who said they would not make alliance with each other and even if they would make the alliance we have no guarantee given their incompatibilities that these alliances will work. A solution to this blockage would be a government of technocrats chaired by the President of the Republic, which would have the task of keeping Italy in its current state and triggering early elections in one year. Such a solution, however, is an anti-democratic solution" the international policy analysts say. This government will have to lead Italy, and in a year to draft a new law so that general elections to be scheduled next year. But in fact this kind of solution is not democratic in the sense that it respects in a way what is happening in politics in Italy. If such a solution is taken, it means that any vote in a country of the European Union that is not convenient can be suspended and that would create a political reality unrelated to popular vote, which is not democratic . At this point, it is very hard to predict that any solution will lead to the expected results. Any groupings of two parties or groups of parties put together to make a coalition does not give any guarantee given the incompatibility between them, and the technocrat solution is an anti-democratic solution. At the same time, a possible alliance between the far right North League, which took 18%, more than Berlusconi's party, Forza Italia, and the populists from the 5 Stars Movement would lead to a profoundly anti-European populist government in the the third economy of the European Union after the withdrawal of Great Britain.

Regarding this, these parties declared through their leaders that a referendum is needed for Italy's exit from the EU, which in fact means a desire to bring Italy out of the European Union. At a time when in some important EU countries there is this conception of leaving the union, and Italy will be the third economy after Britain's outflow from the EU, the project risks not to be working. Here we do not refer to Austria - where it is a right-wing government and is a small state as a weight. We speak of Italy, which is the third country in the European Union. From this point of view, the project will be affected at the level of the functioning of Italy and of the European Union. At a political level, things are far more serious, because this political crisis has come to an important European Union state, and that means somewhere is wrong. This is a way of thinking about politics, especially since in Italy we have a spectacular comeback of Berlusconi, who has now become one of the most pro-European parties of Italy and which was until yesterday in the past. With regard to the Romanians in Italy, where more than 1.5 million people live, the pressure is huge. It will directly affect them, because Bucharest's policies to attract Romanians abroad are completely ineffective against the policies of extremist or populist parties. According to these aspects, the current EU policy will make migration within the Union increasingly difficult. All the policies of attracting Romanians who have gone abroad, declared by any government in Bucharest, are totally devoid of efficiency. Extremist or populist parties in Europe will send Romanian citizens back home. The public atmosphere that is created in these states will put pressure on Romanian citizens, not to return, but not to go to such proportions in different states as well. And Europe, through its populist tendencies to go to the far right or left, will make migration within Europe increasingly difficult. It is not about mass expulsions but about building an atmosphere that is becoming more and more unfavorable. This will be the policy that will stop the Romanians, and not only the Romanians, from leaving their country, but there aren't also any measures to favor those who return to the country.

3. The Russian Federation's policy towards the European Union

I will present the situation from the Russian Federation in the following points, due to facility of reading the presented study:

- The Russian Federation

The Russian Federation is a semi-presidential federal republic. In accordance with the Constitution, the President of Russia is the head of state, as well as a multi-party system with the executive power exercised by the government, led by the Prime Minister, who is appointed by the President, with Parliament's approval. Legislative power belongs to the two Chambers of the Russian Federation. A room is called the State Duma (Russian Dyma), which is made up of 450 elected deputies for five years. The second room is called the Council of the Russian Federation (Russian Federation of Societies) consisting of 170 senators. Since gaining independence after the collapse of the Soviet Union at the end of 1991, Russia faced serious problems in its efforts to build a political system to follow after nearly seventy-five years of Soviet domination. That conflict reached a climax in September and October 1993, when President Boris Yeltsin used military force to dissolve the parliament and demanded new legislative elections. This event marked the end of the first constitutional period in Russia. The current constitution of the Russian Federation was adopted by national referendum on 12 December 1993, replacing that of the Soviet period - the RSFS Constitution of 12 April 1978. This fundamental law was passed by popular vote after the constitutional crisis of 1993 was resolved by force.

- The History of Russian Constitutions

The first Russian Constitution was promulgated on April 23, 1906, on the eve of the opening of the first State Duma. The Constitution solemnly affirmed the emperor's emperor, including the Tsar's supremacy over the laws, the church, and the Duma. The new constitution defined the purpose and supremacy of the law on Russian subjects. It reconfirmed the granting of human rights as promised in the October Proclamation, making them subordinate to the rule of law. Define the composition and purpose of the State Council and the State Duma. The State Duma in the Russian Empire and the Russian Federation is the lower house of parliament. It is also the term that designates the advice of the boyars of the first Russian rulers – The Boyars' Duma, or city councils of the cities - Duma the City. The dummy name comes from the Russian word думать (dumat), "think". The existence of the Duma was interrupted by Peter the Great, who transferred his functions in 1711 to the Senate of Leadership. The conditions that a person has to fulfill to become president are determined by the Russian Constitution. The president must be a Russian citizen (he may be naturalized), he must be at least 35 years old and must have lived in Russia for at least 10 years before the election[2].

a) Period of 1993-1996

The struggle for power in post-Soviet Russia and the type of economic reform culminated in the political crisis and the bloodshed of autumn 1993. Yeltsin, who was the supporter of a radical reform, had to cope with the strong opposition of the parliament. Confronted with the outright opposition to his decrees and the possibility of making him accused, Yeltsin "dissolved" the Parliament on September 21, as the Russian Constitution did not give him such rights, and ordered the organization of new elections and a referendum approves a new fundamental law. A new constitution was approved by a referendum in December 1993, which turned Russia into a presidential republic. The new opportunities for enrichment offered by the Russian economy in the last decade of the 20th century and the first years of the 21st century have been exploited by a number of Russians: those in leading positions of Communist Party leadership and technocrats, heads of the KGB, Komsomol, leaders of major union enterprises, and others like them. Some of them secretly liquidated the accounts and assets of their organizations and transferred them to foreign banks, or turned them into investments in their own name. They have set up banks or businesses in the country, taking advantage of positions in the power structure to win government contracts, obtain cheap credit, and supply state-subsidized preferential prices as well as sell their products or services to over-valued prices. The privatization process has been affected by deep corruption right from the start. The Westerners were advising for a swift liquidation of the planned Soviet economy to make room for "market economy reforms," but were shortly disappointed with the emergence of the "oligarchs" and the huge power conquered by them. There have been voices who have called this wave of enrichment by fraud "nomenklaturist capitalism." If the oligarchs were at the top of the enrichment pyramid, drug traffickers and organized crime leaders - the powerful Russian Mafia - were at the base.

b) 1996 Presidential Election

At the start of the electoral campaign, it was thought that Yeltsin, who was recovering after a series of infractions and sometimes had a strange behavior, had little chance of being re-elected. At the beginning of the election campaign, Yeltsin's popularity was almost zero. Meanwhile, the Communist Party had gained a strong position in Parliament after the elections of 17 December 1995[3], and its candidate, Ghennadi Ziuganov, enjoys strong support, especially in rural areas and small towns. Yeltsin changed his team of advisors, called his daughter Tatiana Diacenko to a key post and named Anatoli Ciubais as head of his electoral team. Ciubais, who was not only the head of the president's campaign, but had also been the architect of the privatization program, used his control of privatization as the main tool in the presidential campaign of reelection. In the spring of 1996, when the president's share of popularity was extremely low, Yeltsin and Ciubais recruited a team of leading Russian financiers and oligarchs from the press who funded the campaign with $500 million, although legally the limit was only $3 million. The same people provided Yeltsin with space for electoral advertising and favorable articles on all national televisions and newspapers. The image created by the press was that of a decisive choice between the reformist Yeltsin and Ziuganov, the adept of the "return to totalitarianism." The oligarchs have even made it clear that the country is threatened by civil war if the election is won by the communist candidate. The tactics of Yeltsin's team proved to be well-chosen. In the second round of the presidential election, Yeltsin won 53.8% of the votes, while Ziuganov only 40.3%, 5.9% of the votes were canceled. In August 1999, Yeltsin suddenly surrendered Prime Minister Sergei Stepaşintot and proposed Vladimir Putin as prime minister. Yeltsin said he considers Putin his successor to the position of president of the country. After Putin's victory in the December 1999 parliamentary elections, Yeltsin was confident enough in his first minister to deport six months before his mandate on December 31. Putin thus became interim president, giving him the chance to become the candidate with the most chances of winning in the presidential election of 26 March 2000, which was won by Putin.

c) Putin administration, from 2000 to the present

In August 2000, the Russian K-141 Kursk submarine was damaged by an explosion of its own torpedo, an accident that caused it to sink into the waters of the Barents Sea. The Russian authorities organized an attempt to rescue the crew, but it was all in vain. This failure has severely criticized the government, military authorities, and President Putin personally. On October 23, 2002, the Chechen rebels took hostages to all the spectators and actors of a Moscow theater. More than 700 people were hostages in what was called the Hostage Crisis in the Moscow Theater. Three days after the start of the crisis, commandos of the Russian Special Forces invaded the building, and the rebels were shot dead. After the end of the theater crisis, Putin renewed his promises of stunning Chechen insurrection. President Ahmad Kadirov, who had been elected eight months earlier in Russian-controlled elections, was assassinated in a bombing. The crisis of the hostages from the Beslan School followed, during which the Chechen rebels took over 1,300 hostages, especially children. Under these circumstances, in March 2004, popular support for the war in Chechnya fell to only 24%. As a result of the confrontation with the oligarchs, Putin's regime managed to take control of the most important means of mass information previously held by the richest Russians. Putin has reached the country's leadership at a favorable moment: after the devaluation of the 1998 ruble, which has increased demand for goods produced in the country, and in the context of rising oil prices. Thus, many Russians attribute to the president the merits of economic recovery, and Putin won the presidential election in 2004 without having a controversial candidate that would cause him serious problems. There are analysts who say that nowadays many Russians regret the dissolution of the Soviet Union in 1991. In an election speech, Putin said that the dissolution of the Soviet Union is "a national tragedy on an enormous scale," of which "only elites or nationalists of the republics had gained."[4] In 2005, the Russian government replaced the subsidy system, still in force since Soviet times, to public transport, heating homes or other utilities for socially vulnerable groups with pecuniary payments. This reform, known as "monetization," was very unpopular, and caused a wave of demonstrations in various Russian cities. It was the first major manifestation of popular dissatisfaction since Putin came to power. Reforms have greatly reduced government confidence, but President Putin's popularity remained high. Putin's international prestige suffered an important blow to the West during the 2004 presidential election disputed talks in Ukraine. Putin visited Ukraine twice before the election to prove his support for the pro-victory candidate Victor Yanukovych, who fought the opposition candidate, Victor Yushchenko, a pro-Western liberal. Putin congratulated Yanukovych for the victory before announcing the official results and made statements against the recount of votes in the second round of voting won by Yanukovych under the assertions of defrauding the vote.

Finally we shall not forget about the Crimea crisis in 2014 started after President Viktor Yanukovych's departure from power, following the anti-government protests of 2013-2014. The triggering factor was the repeal of the law on languages with regional status through which several languages used in Ukraine, including Romanian, were removed from official use. The actors of the tensions are on the one hand the Russian-speaking groups wishing for Crimea to join Russia and, on the other hand, groups of Ukrainians and Crimean Tartars who support the Euromaidan movement. Integration of Crimea into the Russian Federation is the process of incorporating Crimea into Russia. The integration stipulated in Article 6 of the Crimean Arrangement Agreement with Russia will last until January 1st 2015. The integration of Crimea into Russia was organized and carried out quite quickly by the leadership of Russia. On March 27th Russian Education Minister Dmitry Livanov announced that all Crimean graduates will receive a Russian model attestation. During April, the Central Bank of the Russian Federation created the Crimean Bank in the region and passed the financial sphere from the Ukrainian administration to the Russian one, stopping the activity in the region of a number of Ukrainian banks. The official currency in the region became the Russian ruble. Since August 11, the Crimean civil status offices have been operating under Russian law, issuing Russian certificates. The vast majority of the international community did not recognize the Republic of Crimea and Sevastopol as part of Russia. Many of the world's states have openly denounced the referendum and the annexation, and continue to regard Crimea as an administrative division of Ukraine. It should be noted, however, that some states have recognized the referendum and the remaining ones have kept their opinion neutral. Resolution 68/262 of the General Assembly of O.N.U. arguing that Crimea and Sevastopol remain part of Ukraine, gathered 100 votes for and 11 against, 58 others abstaining, and 24 out of 193 member states did not vote because of abstention. The 100 countries that voted in favor of Ukraine account for about 34% of the world's population, the 11 that were counter for about 4.5%, the 58 who abstained represent about 58%, and the 24 absences represent about 3.5%. On October 31st the Government of the Russian Federation established a free economic zone in Crimea.

4. Conclusions

In Germany, the Christian-Democratic Union convened the National Conference, and approved the governing agreement with the Social Democrats, and the agreement, according to German officials, provides the basis for "a good and stable government".

The UCD National Conference will also vote for the appointment of Merkel's ally Annegret Kramp-Karrenbauer (AKK) as party general secretary. Kramp-Karrenbauer is seen as Merkel's successor, dubbed the "mini-Merkel".

The Austrian People's Party, headed by young Sebastian Kurz, ranked first in the general election, following an anti-immigration and right-wing program.

At 31, Kurz became Chancellor and thus the youngest national leader in the world and in the history of Austria. The People's Party will ally with the Social Democrats or the Liberty Party (far-right).

Sebastian Kurz has an instinct for populism and is willing to ally with partners that scare others in the West.

Immediately after it came to power in the autumn of 2015, the Law and Justice Party (PiS, conservative), governed and majority in the two chambers of the Warsaw legislature, initiated a series of judiciary reforms considered by the Commission European as a threat to the rule of law.

As a protest against these, thousands of people went out on the streets repeatedly, demanding the cancellation of these changes along with Bruxelles notification.

The EU executive has announced that it is triggering the activation procedure of Article 7 of the Treaty on European Union, often qualified as the "nuclear option" among possible sanctions within the Union.

Hungary, has announced it will oppose vetoing the EU's action against Poland.

The situation in Italy is worrying when the right-far right wing coalition is in the first place in the recent legislative reforms, but without the absolute majority, while the populist 5-star (M5S) movement became the first party in the country. But none can get the majority and the crisis deepens in the Peninsula.

At this point in Italy there are three large party groups or party coalitions who have declared that they will not make alliance with each other and even if they make an alliance there is no guarantee given their incompatibilities that these alliances will work.

A solution to this blockage would be a government of technocrats chaired by the President of the Republic, which would have the task of keeping Italy in its current state and triggering early elections in one year.

With regard to the Romanians in Italy, where more than 1.5 million people live, the pressure is huge. It will directly affect them, because Bucharest's policies to attract Romanians abroad are completely ineffective against the policies of extremist or populist parties.

Vladimir Vladimirovici Putin is a Russian politician, a former member of the CPSU. He is currently the third president of the Russian Federation for the third time. He became interim President of Russia on 31st of December 1999 after President Boris Yeltsin resigned and then won the presidential election in 2000. In 2004 he was re-elected for a second term, which lasted until May 7th 2008[5]. Because of the Constitutional limit, Putin was unable to run for a third consecutive presidential term in 2008, but after the victory of his successor, Dmitri Medvedev, in his presidential election, Putin was appointed by the prime minister of Russia. Putin held this position from May 8th 2008 to March 4th 2012. In 2012 he became president of the Russian Federation for another six years - following the amendment of the Constitution.

Prior to the presidential election on March 18, 2018, who will almost certainly bring the fourth presidential mandate, Vladimir Putin, in his speech on the state of the nation in front of the reunified parliamentary chambers, said that: Russia has developed a new range of nuclear weapons which are invincible and can not be intercepted by the enemy.

This was a message of patriotic pride, but analysts also notice it as "a very aggressive warning to those who do not regard Russia as a world super-power."

New nuclear systems - can not be intercepted, and a "new cruise missile can reach anywhere in the world. It flies at low altitude, is difficult to spot, and is invincible in front of any interception systems. "

Another feared weapon would be a long-range rocket launched from submarines that could target a nuclear warhead. And a number of states of the world are struggling to get this perfect weapon, "rocket-hypersonic".

Russia has developed these weapons in response to the US anti-missile shield, whose elements are also installed in Romania at Deveselu.

Western analysts appreciate Putin's speech as an "electoral campaign" for the patriotic pride of the Russians. It is a way of telling Europe, the United States, and somehow to the Russian population that the only language the West understands is the language of force. To conclude the political crisis on the government formation in Germany, with the Brexit, with the establishment of Austria's controversial government, the sanction of Poland by the Council of Europe and, last but not least, with the problems facing the formation of the new inland government and and must be analyzed together in order to see the overall picture and how the world leaders are changing Europe and the world and how the history repeats itself in the same manner as the economic crisis from 2008 can repeat itself in the few following years to come. The final conclusions each can draw and as stated above, the authors will use this initial analysis in its own project, but due to the limitations of the article only initial analysis was presented above.

REFLECTING ON THE ROLE OF PHYSICAL EDUCATION: BETWEEN NECESSITY, WELLNESS AND RECREATION

Maria LULESCU*

Abstract

Physical education has known during its long contribution to the human history both a continuation of old thinking such as mens sana in corpore sano, as well as new ideas, meant to support the role of children and adults in a changing environment. Major contributions about its role nowadays have discussed the relation with human metabolism and fitness (Drăgan 1978; Cheța and Mihalache 1989) while recent contributors explore its role in multi-cultural educational environments (Bronikowski in Hardman and Green 2011, Howie și Pate 2012). At present, schools and universities have adapted their curricula to turn physical education in a tool able to do more than simply stimulating the body and the mind work together: from a reduction of sedentary activities and focus on depending on computer to an active component of everyday lifestyle. The purpose of this paper is to explore current trends in the approach of higher education institutions, students and teachers to combine physical education as a summum of activities leading to wellness and recreation for the all actors involved.

Keywords: physical education, fitness, wellness, recreation.

Introduction

The role of physical education is known to mankind for millennia. In ancient cultures, and especially in the Roman Empire, as well as in Greek cities, leaders, philosophers and physicians were constantly concerned with improving the conditions of a healthy mind in a healthy body. Adrian Dragnea[1] presents in his volume how ancient Greeks looked at physical education and sport: for instance, the concept of harmony, suggestively expressed by the "kalos kai agatos" (a beautiful and good man), including Plato who develops the concept. Aristotle was also to discuss that the lack of balance between physical and intellectual education will determine a negative impact on the child, the future responsible and active citizen. This heritage has been passed to other cultures on the European continent, to many generations adopting the old dictum 'mens sana in corpore sano.' Such a concept allowed young people be prepared to bring their contribution to the society, and for athletes and military have a good physical condition before confrontations with other competitors or rivals. In the modern era, such concerns were to allow focused efforts to correlate the activity in educational areas with the results of performance in a professional career.

According to Dragnea, Jean Piaget discussed the role of cognition for a learner as a stage-structured process, while Ivan Pavlov presented associated learning as depending on neural cortical activation. More recent contributions continued in the early 20th century up to this day when scientists and teachers debate and work on new areas of research, such as neuroscience. Furthermore, results of extensive surveys conducted in the last decades indicate that in the context of substantial changes of demographics and multicultural spectrum, exercise contributes to a diminution of stress factors, reducing obesity and dementia for both young and mature generations. This paper tries to look at the effects of physical education for young adults, highlighting its connection to metabolism. Secondly, physical education is explored in terms of a need to be embedded in work and learning, while the third section presents its benefits as wellness and recreation. The final section is one devoted to Conclusions, where I try to sum up ideas taken for key specialists, as well as possible options for future projects and research.

1. Physical Education and Metabolism

Ancient European cultures have acknowledged the contribution of physical education in the existence of children and adults. Physical exercise, including many types of activities, has been acclaimed as a successful method to combat high blood pressure, obesity, cardiovascular diseases, and various psychological disorders. It has also been seen as a way to lead a healthy life, preserving the energy and contributing to an active role in society. However, in practice, many adults in developed countries practice less and less physical exercise, starting from an early age, despite encouragement provided by schools and educators. The current trend of having children at home after school, more often than not playing on a computer than outside, generates its own negative impact. The attraction to online media, and activities excluding a long or serious physical exercise becomes practically widespread in many families. In addition to that, parents are too busy during the week, as well as in the weekend, to play with their children or perform physical exercise as a type of entertainment. In their solid and detailed study focusing on metabolism, Dan Chețа and Natalia Mihalache explore changes associated with metabolism, with an impact on the life of various individuals[2]. Taking into consideration the physical effort, the two researchers suggest that this is far from representing only a certain physical activity using the human organism. Far from turning into it into a torture, the two authors refer to physical effort connected to relaxation, with a variable intensity, and reaching high performance only for those able to undertake and enjoy it. They also discuss various patterns, as related to age: while children often engage in physical exercise including climbing, running or jumping, adults usually prefer walking if not involved in more active forms of physical exercise such as swimming, tennis or football.

In an article published in 2000, Edward F Coyle[3] explores the physical activities and processes changing the functions of the human body. Data from various studies mentioned in this paper also take into discussion the role of a healthy diet. Moreover, the American specialist debates on how "[t]he metabolic and mechanical stresses of physical activity stimulate many healthy adaptations in numerous tissues and organs" (513S). He also discusses the determinants of metabolic stress of physical activity, which cover, in his opinion, factors such as the type and intensity of exercise, the level of physical fitness, nutritional factors, and environmental factors.

A good control of weight is a major motivation to attend physical activities every day. Although the metabolism is largely influenced by genetics, becoming more physically active helps one's body to have an efficient response to calories-burning. Exercising not only burns calories during a physical education session, but it also sustains a higher metabolic rate. The result is that the individual can burn more calories during one day. From over 50% to almost 70% calories, depending on age, genetics, lifestyle and gender, are burned by the body in producing hormones, breathing and blood circulation. This is known as basal metabolic rate (BMR), and it can vary from one individual to the other. Regular exercise as well as spontaneous activities ranging from running on the treadmill to getting up to switch the TV remote control can also contribute with an average of 20% to 30%.

In order to improve one's BMR, using physical exercise as a means to prevent various potential affections for the future adult requires establishing short term and medium term objectives, such as losing weight, serum lipids levels, lower blood glucose levels and prevent potential complications. The increase of smooth muscle mass enhances energetic metabolism and the production of anti-inflammatory cytokines. In additional to overall benefits for one's balance of life and work physical activity, the regular and diversified involvement in physical routines triggers positive immunologic responses with an anti-inflammatory effect. Physical education and physical activities are known to work as factors increasing the immunology of cells, with a visible impact on the physiological mechanism and contributing to one's motor flexibility and neuroprotection of the nervous system. When defining the amount of physical activity or routine, an important interrelationship exists between the total dose of activity and the intensity of each particularly planned and delivered activity. Dose defines the total amount of energy expended in physical activity, while intensity refers to the rate of energy expenditure during such activity. Intensity can be described in absolute or relative terms. Absolute intensity shows the rate of energy expenditure during exercise and is usually measured in metabolic equivalents or METs, where 1 MET equals the resting metabolic rate of about 3.5 ml $O2 \cdot kg1^{-1} \cdot min^{-1}$.

Both for healthy individuals, as well as for patients suffering from nervous illnesses, physical activities determine a strengthening of immunity, together with the development of movement, cognitive and functional independence abilities. In the last decades, several studies took place, in order to explore the physiological benefits brought by physical activity to the immune system. For patients or individuals who are recommended to follow physiotherapy through physical activity, a positive effect on the immune system was observed, including an improved cells flux, the identification of the antigen, and the reparation of damaged tissue. Dragnea (2002) underlines in his extensive contribution that: "Physical exercises have numerous beneficial effects on the organism, reason for which they are recommended as means to prevent diseases at the level of all systems and organs of the body (prevention), as well as in the process of rehabilitation, recovering after various diseases (therapy)."[4] Those effects are noted for all humans, no matter their age, including healthy individuals or those with a particular illness.

2. Physical Education as Necessity in Work and Learning

In his extensive and well-structured volume, Ioan Drăgan[5] presents the correlation and interdependence of work and physical education. According to him, and other specialists conducting research at that time, work has a certain pattern for any human being: the individual is capable of a good performance for a certain while, followed by a diminution, while for another individual this fluctuation may not have a similar ascending and descending curve. In his view, although there are differences, research undertaken for subjects involved in work showed that starting working after a short break determines a better performance, allowing the person to increase again his/her results. He also discusses the role of physical education in terms of prevention: physical activities contribute to a lower risk of neurosis and other associated psychological disorders or dysfunctions. This is the very reason for which athletes seldom experience depression or similar affections.

In a recent study dedicated to the impact of physical education on patients with mental disorders by Elisabeth Zschucke, Katharina Gaudlitz, and Andreas Ströhle[6], the authors present significant correlations between mental health and physical activity. They present results of physical exercise leading to an impact on panic disorder, post-traumatic stress disorder, generalized anxiety stress disorder, social phobia and other disorders. Howie and Pate also acknowledge in their study that there is a correlation between physical activity and cognition: "The overall findings continue to be positive; as PA increases, cognitive function and academic achievement generally increase."[7]

In the current European context, most countries experience dramatic changes in terms of demographics, with a considerable increase of the number of senior citizens compared to working adults. According to sociologists, such a change is the result of lower birth rates on the one hand. Many adults get married considerably later than their parents' generation, and have children after turning 40 or 45. Because of this, it is vital to educate adults and senior citizens to continue physical exercise while working and after retirement. Physical activity and exercise training have risks that must be considered when recommending regular physical activity for the general population and for individuals with cardiovascular disease. Fortunately, several strategies are recognized as effective at reducing risk when recommending physical activity. Walking, the most popular activity and the standard example of a moderate-intensity activity, is a low-risk activity.

It is necessary at this point to indicate what kind of measurements can be performed to find out the contribution of physical education, or physical activities carried out outside physical education classes. Physical activity is defined by specialists as movements of the human body generating the contraction of skeletal muscles, which increases the consumption of energy level above the basal level. Physical activities cover the following categories: occupational, home chores, free time and transportation. Physical activities can be measured in METs (an acronym standing for metabolic equivalent). One MET represents the amount of oxygen consumed by one person per unit of body weight during 1 minute of rest. As a standard, one met equals 3,5 ml oxygen used during one minute, and nowadays there are numerous calculators (including online versions), which present the variation of mild activities, such as reading or writing, to moderate options (walking, gardening etc.) to very intense ones (cycling, running, or skiing).

Teaching physical education involves multiple decisions about the planning, carrying out, and evaluation of learning motor skills. This decision-making base develops from knowledge concerning factors that influence motor skill learning.

Teachers of physical education can benefit from developing knowledge about how various factors influence instruction as well as knowing how and why learning happens because of their involvement in teaching skills. It is vital to remember that teaching and learning have a close relationship. Effective teaching supports and nurtures learning. Better learning, even lifelong learning, happens when a teacher is able to establish the most appropriate environment for students to learn skills adapted to their individual needs. For teachers of physical education, their knowledge and experience comes for years of studying motor learning, correlating their findings with those of other peers, and taking the lessons from practice back into teaching methods. Michal Bronikowski observes in this sense that "a sport coach's role is to lead his/her pupils to a certain level of competency in the area of a specific sport, focusing on skills and technique, whereas a PE teacher should concentrate on the overall holistic development of motor (motor development), cognitive (moral, social and intellectual development) and behavioural patterns (attitudes and habits) [8]".

Taking a systematic approach to teaching and learning, Adrian Dragnea presents the motor characteristics depending on age[9]. He then focuses on effort as part of physical education and sport, detailing its dynamics, the coordination of the effort by the instructor in a class of physical education versus one training in sport and concluding with its general characteristics. He links the general lines of physical education classes with specific information about training in sport, the selection of youngsters fit for this area, as well as the role of the physical educator and trainer.

In this context, encouraging students from different backgrounds and abilities to attend classes of physical education is a must. In addition, numerous European and international agencies plan and deliver projects aimed to show that physical activities outside the classroom have major benefits for any professional. Moreover, activities during the classroom combined with those outside it support young adults to socialize and minimize their dependence on electronic media. Evidence from higher institutions curricula and academic practice demonstrate that the combination of such activities with a healthy diet and diminution of coffee, sweets and alcohol supports the integration of young people in a fast-changing professional environment. The increased energy demand for everyday tasks requires those living with physical disability to improve cardio-respiratory fitness. To maintain health, 20-40 minutes of aerobic exercise is recommended three to five times a week. Individuals participating in exercise can rate the intensity of this exercise from very easy to extremely difficult. Teachers needs to adapt their strategies to support those who might say towards the end of the class "I feel I cannot do it any longer." An open and friendly environment, and the support of other students will provide a suitable learning medium for those of different physical abilities. Adjusting rules, using adequate equipment and provide short breaks or low-paced routines will also sustain effectiveness. In particular, there is a need to focus on physical activity promotion efforts via organizational (e.g. work sites and communities) and legislative policy changes, rather than just on the individual level. Teachers cannot work only in a bilateral system of relationships; their efforts with the students, and the engagement of students in physical activities in universities and outside them can reach sustainability if multiple sectors of society get involved: health agencies and professionals, sport organizations, and community or youth centres, to name a few.

When students are expected to attend structured activities, they need the tools to engage in them. Such tools of active participation in physical education are movement skills. Students need to be able to walk, run, jump, throw and catch with confidence. Unlike other educational activities where reading or responding to tasks can be fail to engage the whole classroom, the physical education classroom makes everyone act as on a public scene. Few, if any, children and youth would voluntarily and intentionally put themselves in a situation where their lack of skills is publically on display for others to view. The opposite is also true: students who feel competent in their abilities and have acquired basic skills, are much more eager and willing to participate in activity. Physical education is the only subject that specifically aims to equip students with the movement skills necessary for voluntary participation in activity both during the school day and after school.

3. Physical Education as Wellness and Recreation

Nowadays, wellness is a familiar concepts and it crosses the boundaries of gym or spa centres. However, its definition varies, according to specialists placing an emphasis on one element or the other. In general, researchers agree that wellness transcends the area of health, that it is a rather self-directed approach encompassing a holistic vision.

The National Wellness Institute defines six major areas, according to the diagram below[10] as defined by Bill Hettler:

The key dimensions of wellness are:

- Occupational: referring to one's personal satisfaction derived from work. It relates to both gifts and skills used by individuals in their professions in activities that are seen as gratifying;
- Physical: this dimension recognizes the necessity of regular physical activity, including learning about diet and nutrition;
- Social: it refers to the role of the individual in the community, as well as the relationship between people and nature;
- Intellectual: it concerns one's creativity, the engagement in mental activities. It covers activities in the classroom and beyond the classroom, keeping one's curiosity and challenging the mind with creative tasks;
- Spiritual: describing one's search for meaning in life, as well as the harmony of the individual in the universe;
- Emotional: this dimension refers to emotions and the acceptance of one's feelings, keeping a positive attitude throughout one's life.

To follow wellness and have results, physical activities can be accumulated gradually. For instance, two 10-minute bicycle rides to and from class and an alert 15-minute walk to the post office or bank office. Wellness specialists recommend to choose activities which are seen as enjoyable and that do not interfere with the daily routine. Recent data also indicates that regular physical activity, regardless of intensity, makes everyone healthier and protect people from many chronic diseases. Physical fitness has several components, many related to health and more specifically to sports or other similar activities. The five components of fitness most important for health are: cardiorespiratory endurance, muscular strength, muscular endurance, flexibility and body composition (the proportion of fat and fat-free mass). To reach good results in fitness sessions, trainers and specialists recommend to work based on short-term adjustments, with the aim to get long-term changes. For example, when running, the breathing and heart rate will increase during exercise, and the body learns to pump more blood. Although people differ in terms of fitness and performance, they can get particular types of training and amounts of routines that work in a rewarding manner. In fact, this leads to the progressive load of exercise over time. Ideally, a fitness programme combines an active lifestyle with a well-structured physical programme to develop one's fitness.

In order to achieve maximum results from physical education seen as a wellness general goal, people need to know that this implies sometimes considerable changes. As a result, people need to accept that certain behaviours and attitudes are problematic and that they have to take action in order to improve the quality of their life. People need to have a good knowledge of themselves, and then to decide to take appropriate action. As a final step, good practice and long-term results appear if individuals become able to monitor their performance, assess their activity and adjust the plan for the coming period. Social habits may also act as support to one's motivation: if students have a community or group of friends interested in health, physical education and wellness, they will become better motivated towards durable outcomes. In addition, specialists advise young people to select one aim and follow it for a certain while, and once they feel on a safe track in that respect, they can add another aim to their list, and follow it until completed. The main idea behind this logic is that trying to change everything in one's life is so stressful, that it may obviously lead to failure. Taking moderate steps but staying focused is a tactic leading to better results.

The most common advice is to practice daily with in moderation since this contributes substantially to good health. The starting point is to assess one's physical activity profile, and build on it. As practice attempts are made, the results are assessed, reflected upon, modified, and refined over and over again with persistence and perseverance until eventually, automation is achieved. Students can be encouraged to assume roles of responsibility by taking out, distributing, and putting away equipment, leading warm-ups, and even assuming the role of a referee during a classroom competition or game.

In what concerns recreation, this is generally associated with structured group activities which are meant to benefit both individuals and group/communities. Such activities clearly depend on team spirit, skill development and enjoyment. Depending on age, skills and interests, people are attracted to sports, as well as creative activities. Sometimes, they could choose a combination, for instance dance. Some researchers consider that due to the changes of lifestyle of many adults, young people tend to spend less time playing in a group or in an outdoor environment than a couple of decades ago. However, with the rise of new sports and games, certain teenagers or young adults have more opportunities than their parents when those were young. Leisure or recreation participation can also be a resource for adolescents to cope with stress in their lives. Participation in recreational activity has been associated with decreased anxiety and depression, improved self-esteem, decreased psychological stress and reduced drug use.

Physical activity and personal engagement in satisfying leisure activities need to be a focus towards wellness throughout life. Their importance does not diminish with age, disability or chronic illness. While chronic conditions and health deficiencies may present challenges as we grow older, by using planning and creative thinking, modifications can (and should) be made to make activities accessible and enjoyable. Exercise programming should be monitored regularly and may change, based on an individual's progression, stabilization or improvement. In addition to various documented health benefits, such as decreased blood pressure, increased insulin sensitivity, and improved cardio-respiratory endurance, participating in physical and leisure activities tend to decrease isolation and increase inter-personal and community socialization, integral facets of independent living and quality of life.

In the light of those mentioned above, European countries directed their efforts to improve the physical education. One of the promising current lines is the European Framework of Quality Physical Education (EFQPE) adopted in February 2018[11]. The document establishes and presents the concept of Quality Physical Education, its aim and role. It also refers to the idea of "physical literacy", and "physical educated person". The document is the first version setting standards in five learning areas: movement literacy; health-enhancing physical activity; health consciousness beyond physical activity; self-awareness and self-management and finally problem solving and constructive thinking.

Conclusions

Recent research investigating the relationship between activity and mental health has found a clear interdependence between physical activity and good mental health. Participation in movement activities can reduce anxiety, stress, and depression.

In today's world, health and well-being are regularly discussed and remain a priority for the educational system, no matter what country or continent we think of. Although schools and higher education institutions cannot be expected 'to do everything at once', they can continue to provide opportunities and experiences that contribute positively to the health and well-being of all students. There are numerous outcomes that contribute positively to students and youth's well-being that can be realized through participation in a quality, daily physical education schedule.

[11] European Framework of Quality Physical Education, http://www.eupea.com/health-conscious-future-oriented-life-management-key-competence-2/, accessed 20 February 2018

Successful programmes can be implemented by teachers, but good results for the future generation depend on accepting new practices, learning from the experience of other European countries and engaging in research able to provide new tools for long-life learning. Observing the role of wellness in the current experience of a busy adult, with a longer career than that of previous generations, teachers and universities can adopt tasks, adjust curricula and work with other organizations interested in the well-being of their citizens.

Arguments presented in this paper support a combined approach versus physical education, benefiting from the new direction set by the European Framework of Quality Physical Education. In practical terms, schools and universities will continue to focus upon a reorientation of their curricula and structuring of all study programmes to correspond to the needs of the 21st century. Research need to go hand in hand in hand with practice, and governmental policies be complemented by actions undertaken by community organizations.

REDRESS AND CRIMINAL DEVIANCE IN USE OF DRUGS AND PSYCHOTROPIC SUBSTANCES IN ROMANIA

Bogdan MARINESCU*

Abstract

In Romania, the approach to assistance to drug users had an incoherent evolution that ranged from a medical approach to drug-intensive psychiatric drug use since the 1990s, focusing on detox services and only exceptionally on methadone substitution, to a system integrated assistance.

Accordingly,"until 1999, the addicted persons had many relapses/relapses due to the lack of all therapeutic treatments (eg socio-vocational center and therapeutic communities) and the fact that, following diagnosis, consumers were not entitled to assistance free medical service"[1].

In 2000, the first strategic response from the Ministry of Health emerged to meet the needs of assistance in this field, namely the National Health Program of the Ministry of Health (Program 8), which led to the development of pilot sections for treatment within some psychiatric hospitals, and a first methadone maintenance center. Thus, in addition to the medical perspective, the development of the principles of harm reduction is envisaged. The lack of a complete therapy unit leads to a large number of relapses, and the recovery of patients is often impossible. Starting with 2004, the system of integrated medical, psychological and social assistance of drug users was established. By GD no. 1093/2004, the 47 Drug Counseling and Prevention Evaluation Centers (6 in Bucharest and one in each county) became territorial structures of ANA (National Antidrug Agency)[2] and, since 2005, according to the standards of the National System of Medical, Psychological and Social Assistance to Consumers drugs[3], coordination of consumer assistance and general management of each case across different services.

1. Risk and prevention of relapse

Reducing use of drugs and psychotropic substances is part of the process a dependent person goes through in an attempt to quit consumption or reach moderate / controlled and less harmful consumption. Reducing may occur after a day, a month or years after stopping the consumption of the substance the person has become dependent on. The trigger factors of relapse may be multiple or just one.

Risk of relapse and prevention of relapse. Reducing is being tried to be prevented by certain therapeutic techniques. If this form of psychosocial support that would follow the medical stabilization period did not exist, the medical treatment of the problem of consumption would have failed the failure and would be a negative conditioning factor for the following attempts to implement the change[1].

The response of the community service network to the return of former injecting drug users who have served a custodial sentence. According to the study carried out by the National Anti-drug Agency and the National Administration of Penitentiaries in Romania's penitentiaries in 2006, it appears that:

- the prevalence of illicit drug use in Bucharest is 5.9% in the penitentiary;
- Lifetime prevalence of illicit drug use by educational level is 24% for those without primary education, 20.3% for those with upper secondary education and 15.1% for those with gymnasium / studies professional / 10 classes;
- the distribution of consumers by type of consumption is 22.3% individually and 77.7% in the group, most frequently, the group being made up of 3 persons[2].

The addiction service system envisaged to be developed in Romanian prisons is described in the Joint Order of the Ministry of Health and Family and the Ministry of Justice no. 898/725/2002 no. 898/2002 on medical and educational measures applied to drug addicts in penitentiaries.

In the Common Order no. 898/2002 does not provide services for former consumers to be released. Only consumers who continue or initiate a penitentiary assistant are covered by the Order.

There is a risk of not considering a prisoner as a former consumer, perhaps he is an active consumer, but denies it because of the stigma, the humiliation he might be subjected to or the fact that he would not be able to explain the existence of the drugs in a carceral environment. Thus, the detainee who is an active consumer but is a consumer, is not considered in the population to whom the service network is addressed and which provides bio-psycho-social assistance in the penitentiary.

In the case of inmates who are indeed former injecting drug users, there is a risk of relapse after release, as evidenced by the experience of injecting drug users who have had several episodes of detention and as many retreats closer or farther release.

An institutional response to this risk category that comes to meet and prevent the risk of relapse is almost inexistent. We say almost because they are services that respond to the need to prevent relapse to former consumers, but only at their request and if they are aware of the existence of such services in the community.

In this regard, we propose that there is a need for a return risk management offer to meet former injecting heroin users who have been deprived of their liberty and returning to the community.

We believe it is useful for our work when talking about drug use to make a few points about the causes of the criminal behavior of drug-using people and, in particular, juvenile offenders.

The important weight of youth in the contemporary structure of contemporary society as well as its ever-increasing contribution to the different spheres of economic, social and spiritual life reinvigorates older and newer discussions and controversies regarding the status and role of this highly mobile age group creative. Youth is a social category subject to different bio-psychic and socio-cultural determinations, but individualized through a range of age, thinking, skills, mentality and behaviors.

The phenomenon of adolescent deviance, known as juvenile delinquency, is now manifested in our country with increased intensity. Criminal statistics, made up of specialized social control bodies, which have begun to be presented to the public, are revealing in this respect, demonstrating an increase in the frequency of delinquency committed by minors and young people in the period following the December 1989 revolution and, increasing the severity of these crimes.

Our intention is to present and highlight, in a scientific way, the causes and conditions that generate and favor the criminal behavior of minors.

In most cases, in the field of social inadaptability, behavioral disorder and personality, the phenomenon of juvenile delinquency involves a series of complex problems that cannot be highlighted and solved only from the perspective of a single discipline. That is why our effort has been placed on a multidisciplinary approach, assuming the approach of societal, psychological, psychiatric, pedagogic, criminological - to the motivations and causes of juvenile delinquency behavior from different angles, in order to be able to offer a meaningful and appropriate answer to the question: "Why are young people violating criminal rules?". To properly answer such a question, detailed studies are needed on the individual features and social variables that characterize the life situation of minors and young people, as well as on the etiological mechanisms of delinquency.

This problem of particular scientific and practical complexity tends to become increasingly a priority direction of sociological, psychological and criminological research being imposed both by the necessity of improving the criminal policy measures, meant to prevent and diminish the anti-social manifestations among the young people, and the need to identify and adapt effective educational solutions.

The necessity and usefulness of a complex study in this field is all the more necessary, as nowadays, as a result of the anomalous situation existing in our country, part of the moral and legal norms suspended their functionality, contributing to a hesitant oscillation of the conduct of the young deviators between educational and regulatory contradictory norms.

Therefore, the importance of these specifications is determined by:

- increasing the number of offenders, as well as diversifying the crimes committed by minors;
- the need to establish a methodology and method involved in the investigation of juvenile delinquency in order to identify the peculiarities of juvenile offenses, the factors that contribute to the orientation of minors towards behavior that is inconsistent with the law and the conditions for preventing and combating the criminality of minors;
- changing and completing legislation in the field.

The experience gained by non-governmental and governmental organizations through their programs of information, education, support, guidance, counseling and practical involvement in preventing and intervening in solving cases where children are victims of various forms of neglect within the family and the society in which we live, and the fact that many young minors fall prey to drug use and crimes, so that many of them get into re-education and penitentiary centers for minors and young people as a result of the crimes they commit, justifies once again the importance of addressing the phenomenon of social delinquency.

Derived from Latin the Delinguere and Juvenis, this notion designates "the set of deviations and violations of social norms, legally sanctioned by minors."[3] The term deviance was first used in 1938 by American sociologists Sellin as "the set of behaviors against norms behavior or institutional order"and by

[3] Mitrofan, N., Zdrenghea, V., Butoi, T. (1992): Judicial Psychology, Publishing House and Press "Iansa" SRL, Bucharest, p. 267

Merton, who considered deviance to be "a normal reaction of normal people in abnormal conditions[4]."
According to the Sociology Dictionary (Zamfir, Vlăsceanu, 1993), deviance is "any act, conduct or manifestation that violates the written or unwritten norms of society or a particular group[5]."

As a special form of social deviance, juvenile delinquency defines "the whole of the conduct of minors and young people in conflict with the norms of social co-existence accepted and recognized in a society[6]." This legal concept is useful as it allows us to avoid the ambiguity of other definitions but simplifies perhaps too much complexity of the phenomenon. By violating the social norm, delinquency is a sociological approach; in the fact that it implies the violation of criminal law, being a subclass of crime or criminality, juvenile delinquency is in the legal and criminal field involved in the detection, deferment of justice and prevention. The delinquent act is ultimately the product of the action of an individual, of a personality, the phenomenon calls for a psychological or even psychiatric approach.

Referring to people in an age-class normally enrolled in schooling, juvenile delinquency is also a psycho-pedagogical problem. The accents of analyzes vary, depending on the angle of approach. As a distinct form of deviance (of criminal nature), juvenile delinquency is a complex phenomenon, defining the set of conduct in conflict with the values protected by the criminal norm.

From the above it is explicitly stated that the term "juvenile" (juvenile delinquency) refers only to the age group of the minority. The legal perspective cannot be used to distinguish between the specifics of the juvenile delinquency and the peculiarities of adult crime and the criminality, so when it comes to juvenile delinquency we need to know in what sense do we use this notion and if we use it to designate a behavior that is dependent on the official competence of the criminal system. If, from the normative point of view, the undesirable character can be (but does not mean that it is) an essential condition of the criminality, it implies that it is also a condition of the facts as such.

The undesirable nature of the facts imputable to a teenager is also the product of a general perception of the public about the notion of offense which must necessarily fall within the scope of the law and be sanctioned. This collective reaction ignores the significance of the violation of the norm for the teenager. An incriminated flight, for example, "vagabondage" is often a normal behavior, based on multiple motivations related to conflicts with family, educators, or the temptation of adventure typical for the adolescent period.

Therefore criminal career of a young man does not resemble the adult, his actions illegitimate or illegal due to the fact mistakes made by educator and not some so-called antisocial motivations of the young offender. These minors, for the most part, are neither cruel offenders nor stranded marginal elements, but simply drifting children, lacking the educational benefits of a favorable family environment.

A number of authors consider that the specific features of delinquency consist mainly of:

- violation of laws and legal prescriptions prohibiting the commission of certain actions;
- manifesting behavior contrary to moral rules and social cohabitation;
- conducting an anti-social action that jeopardizes the safety of institutions and social groups, creating a sense of fear and insecurity among individuals.

2. The phenomenon of juvenile delinquency

Even if the offense appears to be a legal phenomenon governed by the rules of criminal law, it is fundamental, a social phenomenon that occurs in society, with negative and destructive consequences for the security of individuals and groups.

A delinquent behavior, according to Sutherland[7], has the following characteristics:

- Has a number of negative consequences, by damaging the interests of the entire society;
- subject to prohibitions or constraints formulated by criminal law;
- presents a deliberate antisocial intent following a destructive purpose;
- the deed is legally proven and sanctioned as such.

Depending on these characteristics, delinquency is "a particularly complex phenomenon, including a number of aspects of statistical, legal, psychological, sociological, prospective, economic and cultural dimensions"[8].

- the statistical dimension highlights the state and dynamics of delinquency in time and space;
- the legal dimension highlights the type of legal norms violated by antisocial acts and deeds, their social danger, the severity of the damages produced, the ways of resocialization of the delinquent persons;
- the psychological dimension that highlights the personality structure of the delinquent individual and the normal individual, the motivation and mobs of committing the offense, the offender's attitude towards the offense committed;
- the sociological dimension centered on the identification, explanation and social prevention of crimes and crimes in relation to multiple aspects of inadequacy, disorganization and deviance existing in society and the forms of social reaction to different crimes;

- the economic dimension highlights the direct and indirect consequences of material and moral crimes;
- the prospective dimension highlights trends in the future of delinquency.

"Social deviance means non-compliance, deviation or violation of social norms and rules. So deviant behavior is <atypical> behavior that moves away from the standard position and transgresses accepted norms and values and recognizes within a social system[9]. "

Deviance can manifest itself in one of the following forms of individual or group behavior[10]:

- moral deviance in the form of one or more violations of the moral norms accepted by a particular community, the norms of the global society and the deontological rules of a particular profession. All persons committing immoral facts which are not criminal because of their low social danger fall into this category and the situation of minors who commit immoral acts that do not meet the constitutive elements of a crime (the category of "under moral danger", "pre-delinquent ");
- functional deviance consisting of deviations from the rules and standards of the specialty (techniques) of the exercise of a certain profession or occupation; these are rules of competence. It may consist of disciplinary misconduct or manifestations of incompetence or inability to pursue an occupation or profession;
- the criminal deviance which includes all the facts provided by the criminal law committed, even if the circumstances in which they were committed or certain age characteristics, or the mental state of the authors or potential participants are legal causes for the elimination of the criminal character of the deed or responsibility criminal offense of perpetrators. We include here the criminality of adults (persons who have passed the age of civil minority and have committed acts that constitute the constitutive elements of a crime) and juvenile delinquency (of minors aged between 14 and 18 who have deliberately dealt with a deed constituting the constitutive elements of a crime) ;
- the deviance of juvenile offenders with behavioral disorders made up of all the deeds committed by juveniles who, due to their age, are not criminally responsible or have committed the act without discernment. Only protective measures can be taken against them.
- the deviance of mental aliens that encompasses the totality of criminal law committed by irresponsible people due to a pathological condition that seriously affects their discernment.

3. Determinants of deviant behavior

The factors that determine juvenile delinquency can be divided into two main categories: internal factors, individual factors and external, social factors.

The first category includes the neuro psychic features and structure, the particularities of the personality in training.

In the second category are socio-cultural, economic, socio-emotional and educational factors within the micro and macro groups of the human groups in which the child and the young person must gradually integrate from the family[11]. "The inclination towards deviance and the adoption of criminal behavior results from" meeting "the different factors for each case.

In juvenile and juvenile delinquency groups we find a relatively large number of cases with serious deficiencies in their psycho-intellectual development, reduced intellectual capacities that prevent, in particular, anticipating the consequences and implications of the actions taken.

In the view of Mitrofan, the minor offender presents a series of specific features[12]:

- lives longer at present, his actions being carried out in a supportive manner under the tyrannical pressure of present impulses and needs;
- low criticism of thinking;
- the difficulty or inability to anticipate mentally the unavoidable consequences of the offense;
- the absence of emotions and selfless and sympathetic inclinations;
- mild inhibition;
- lack of "conditional brakes" underlying the inability to control and overcome the tendencies and impulses that push him to antisocial acts;
- increased suggestiveness.

Minor delinquencies are characterized either by insufficient affective maturation or by various states of affective disorder. Insufficient maturation is characterized by:

- lack of affective autonomy, which leads to increased suggestiveness;
- insufficient development of affective self-control, related to insufficient knowledge and ability to control emotional reactivity;
- Poor development of emotions and superior feelings, especially moral ones.

In the category of affective disorder states are included:

- states of affectional frustration and feelings of frustration;
- affective conflicts;

- affective instability;
- affective ambivalence;
- affective indifference;
- the absence of emotions and altruistic and sympathetic inclinations.

Stoian characterizes the juvenile delinquent as: "lacking anxiety, especially those caused by the feeling of guilt that does not exist at all; has a great ingenuity in his constant endeavor to dissimulate, to defend himself through lies, to take precautionary measures against everything he could take by surprise; mastered by vivid self-esteem, proves remarkable faculties in adapting to new situations, in organizing negative actions; unbelievable resistance to pressures of any kind, intimidation, reprimand - using magistral technique of despising silence; obvious emotional maturity[13]. "

Research on the juvenile delinquent has highlighted that it is characterized by: a level of immaturities characterized by the following: insufficient self-control, impulsivity and aggressiveness, underestimation of mistakes and dissociated or antisocial acts committed, indolence, indifference and contempt labor, egocentric tendencies, the absence or insufficient development of higher social motives and ethical-moral feelings, the desire to achieve an "easy life" without work.

4. Family and deviant behavior

One of the most important functions of the family is the education and training of young people with a view to their optimal integration into life and social activity.

Studies of juvenile delinquency have shown that the atmosphere of disorganized families, lack of parental authority, control, and their affection, as a result of divorce, have led children to adopt social and antisocial acts.

Also, there are some families that, although organized, are characterized by accentuated conflicting states that can be of varying intensity and can extend over different periods of time. In these families, because of their great sensitivity, children receive and live intensely any "event" interfered with by their parents.

The main effect of conflicting interpersonal relations within the family on the personality of children is the devaluation of the parental model and the loss of the possibility of identification with this model. Often children who feel strongly the influences of the family conflict run away from home and seek to find different groups of belonging which, in turn, can be antisocially oriented. Children's home run is associated with the lack of purely extra-family supervision with great delinquent potential.

Also, the excessive severity, with many rigidities, with interdictions sometimes lacking in brutality, with all sorts of deprivations, leaves its mark on the process of forming the child's personality. Keeping a child in a hipper sever climate gradually drives serious changes into one of the most important dimensions of personality - it's about the attitude-relational one - translated into phenomena of apathy and indifference to what it needs to do or to the relationship with others. In the face of the over-hater and hyper aggressive parent, the child has no alternative but blind obedience, unconditional in relation to his requirements and claims, the personality is not delayed. There are also super protective parents who have simply invaded the child with affective investment, but not assuring educational treatment can lead to delinquent conduct, mostly explained by low resistance to frustration. The research also confirms that there is a correlation between delinquent conduct and schooling level, meaning that juvenile delinquents usually have a very low level of school education.

Conclusions

It can be said that the level of juvenile delinquency of a country sufficiently reflects the interest and capacity of this society to resolve the difficulties of raising and educating younger generations and at the same time warns of the gravity and extent of tomorrow's crime.

The teenager of these troubled times faces difficulties and multiple situations of conflict in the course of his integration into the social and legal field. At the microsocial level, preventive programs should aim at revitalizing the educational and social control functions of the main social institutions: family and school. Measures taken in the family area consist of economic support (for example, the increase of current childcare allowances) or in free counseling through family counseling cabinets within social welfare networks. The school in turn asks for a rethink of its role and system of functioning. The steps taken in this area have been small, perhaps due to the financial difficulties in recent years.

Organizational changes and changes to the ideas and principles under which school activity is guided are promising ways to prevent delinquency through school.

In this context, we mention the mentality of some of the teachers who cannot build a healthy school climate that is conducive to getting closer to the pupils he should find his replacement with responsible attitudes in terms of education. No less important is the organization of services with specialized staff (psychologists, social workers, etc.) within schools with the task of identifying and treating those students with serious behavioral and understanding disorders.

At the individual level, the re-education and re-socialization measures in the institutionalized environment (re-education centers, medical-educational institutions, minors' reception centers) and measures for social reintegration of juvenile offenders become essential. This process of social reinsertion of former delinquents is experiencing difficulties in psychological terms, the success being not only ensured by the correct behavior of the former criminals but also by the society that receives them and should have an integrative action. To ease their way into life, it is not enough to be offered only a job, but also the opportunity to be successful at socio-emotional level. This is because the spectrum of social stigmatization frightens the ex-offender ever since its detention and is one of the major psychological barriers to its total reformation.

The juvenile delinquency as a whole is nothing but the consequence of the lack of moral support offered by the adult, the lack of protection and care received in the family, the failure of the activity of moral education received in school, etc. A delinquent minor is, in fact, a victim and not a culprit aware of the responsibilities imputed to him. He does not have the awareness of his inadequacy to normative requirements, experiencing a social experience different from that of the adult. For this reason, juvenile delinquency appears as an effect of the lack of responsibility of the family, the educators, the factors responsible for forming the young man's moral conduct.

Improvement of the prison regime for minors sentenced to imprisonment is also required, in the spirit of European rules, taking into account the experience of other developed countries.

Finally, it is recalled that in recent literature, the role of the community (local or neighborhood) in preventing crime and supporting educational and training actions at the family and school level is becoming more and more frequent. The UK model of community intervention with the help of agents specializing in reporting and resolving confidential sector issues (street children, playgrounds, sports grounds, pollution, road quality, promptness of social services, families with difficulties, unemployed, accommodating those released from penitentiaries and re-education centers, finding workplaces) can be successfully applied in our society as well. Far from being frightening in size, juvenile delinquency in drugs is steadily increasing, but significant in the antisocial character of its human and material components.

CONTEMPORARY ISSUES RELATED TO ILLICIT DRUG TRAFFICKING AND CONSUMPTION TARGETING THE NATIONAL SECURITY OF ROMANIA

Bogdan MARINESCU[*]

Abstract

A serious social problem is drug use, which is very widespread all over the world. Drugs are a terrible problem whose seriousness becomes more visible every day. Problems caused by drug abuse and illegal trafficking are among the most serious problems faced by the world today but also threatening future generations. After the First World War, drugs began to be consumed on a large scale. Up to the end of the 30s, they were legal. Their marketing over time has led to enormous profits outlaw, making drugs an invaluable source for the black market. Scourge illicit drug trafficking from South America and the Middle East comprised the whole the planet. Governments have begun to allocate more resources to the fight against drugs, but the processes were slow because the problem was very complex. The impact was very high among young people who out of curiosity, terrible or solidarity with the entourage, have begun to consume. The Romanian society was caught by surprise by this drug scourge, coming out so very serious problems both in justice and in the medical world. Weak reactions and untrained authorities have favored the phenomenon of drug abuse that has come to be devastating. Drug use is a high-risk activity. Optimism and illusion of maintaining self-control is also dangerous because it affects reasoning. The drug consumer becomes not only an unfortunate person, but also a social problem. Changes made by traffickers are evident in street-related lawsuits: thefts, arsonists, assassinations. We are all affected in some way by drug trafficking. The extent of the problem current narcotics outweighs the concerns of the police forces and the medical world, constituting a threat to the economic and social order of the world.

Keywords: Illicit, drugs, trafficking, consumption, national security.

1. National security

In our society, the issue of drugs is growing and the most affected are young people and their families. The consequences of drug use in Romania are disastrous. In a simple enumeration these would be:

- Decreasing the productive potential of the country
- Decreasing the defense potential of the country
- Decrease in population (through juvenile mortality and birth decrease)
- Increase the crimes and criminals
- Increased the number of young prisoners
- Increasing risks to national and individual safety

In this case, State intervention is necessarily required by some measures, such as:

- Fighting drug entry:

– Trolls and any means of transport crossing the territory of Romania shall be followed and supervised by the employees of the Ministry of the Interior, through the authorized personnel, by stages, until leaving the country.

– more efficient control in customs

- Detecting drug traffickers
- Fight against corruption
- Therapeutic measures:

– Simultaneously with the fight against drug trafficking it is necessary to take effective measures for the treatment of drug addicts, such as: establishment of free treatment centers, assistance of the patients to healing and their social reintegration

– involving the Church in its areas of competence

– drug addicts are no longer treated as delinquents, but as epidemic diseases.

- Fighting drug trafficking and treating drug addicts as a state policy

Risks to national security can be potentiated by: increased dependence on some hard-to-reach vital resources; persistent negative trends in demographics and mass migration; the high level of social insecurity, the persistence of chronic deprivation and the widening of social differences; the fragility of the civic spirit and the difficulties of manifesting civic solidarity; poorly-developed and insufficiently protected strategic infrastructure; poor condition and low efficiency of the social assistance system and population health insurance; organizational shortcomings, insufficient resources and the difficulties of adapting the education system to the requirements of society; low expertise, inadequate organization and precariousness of resources allocated to crisis management; insufficient engagement of civil society in debating and solving security issues.

If the Southeastern European space remains a potential provider of instability, both due to the political and economic situation of the former Yugoslav Federation states and to the amplification of the spectrum

Unconventional risks to regional security, the Black Sea area is at the same time an opportunity and a source of risk, interfering with two strategic axes, namely:

[*] Lecturer, PhD, University of Pitești - Faculty of Education Science, Social Science and Psychology (e-mail: marinescub@gmail.com)

The Black Sea - Mediterranean Sea, respectively the southern flank of NATO, an area of strategic importance for the North Atlantic Alliance, mainly affected by cross-border risks; Black Sea-Caucasus-Caspian Sea - transit space for Central Asian energy resources.

Active engagement in the process of ensuring security through the promotion of democracy, the fight against international terrorism, drug trafficking and live meat, as well as combating the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, is an imperative for Romania's security policy and is the fundamental condition of participation of our country to the benefits of globalization, the exploitation of the opportunities presented by the international environment and the effective counteraction of major risks and threats.

In this context, a decisive role is played by international police cooperation, which will be a unique platform for the exchange of data and information in the prevention and combating of cross-border crime. At the same time, we believe that, in the near future, we need to re-evaluate the Romanian security system and to unify our efforts in the secret service community, along with setting priorities in a changing world of threats.

If Samuel Huntington (2004) considered that future wars might be related to the answer to the question "who are you?" Than "what are you doing?" Or "on whose behalf are you?"[1], The responsibilities of our country should not be limited only to design and adapt security policies in the context of globalization. It is now necessary for the new national security policies to aim at a more pronounced pro-active dimension, to focus more on integrated prevention of high-risk phenomena.

2. Globalization of risks

Globalization of risk has imposed and requires a much more sustained and concerted effort on behalf of all member states of the European Union to prevent and combat illicit trafficking and illicit drug use.

Globalization is either a source of benefits for the developed world, or a source of insecurity for developing ones. For this reason, it is necessary to develop assistance and other forms of regional involvement of developed countries in support of developing countries.

It can be said that globalization means more than remodeling the global economy. It reorganizes international policies and security issues at the same time as it allows many contradictory events to happen in the world at the same time: some states lose power, while others earn it; some groups aspire to the quality of nation, most possess it, and others, like the European Union, develop complex forms. Far from being an anachronism, state competence today is an important asset. The nation-state retains its importance as a political and economic actor, and the national interest is maintained and amplified, and it must be defended by strategies appropriate to the historical period.

In this chapter, we would like to draw attention to the importance of the process of globalization of risks to the phenomenon of trafficking and drug use, viewed from the point of view of national security and security.

3. The impact of globalization

Globalization is viewed by many specialists as an eminently economic phenomenon, involving a growing interaction or integration of national economic systems, by increasing international trade, capital flows and investment. At the same time, however, a rapid increase in cross-border social, cultural, technological and, last but not least, military cross-border exchanges can be highlighted as part of the phenomenon of globalization. At the same time, there is also a globalization and internationalization of the terrorist phenomenon, drug trafficking, organized crime in general.

Globalization, as a phenomenon, involves the multitude of interdependencies of economic, political, cultural, social, military, etc., which are established on a wider scale among the states of the world. As a result, globalization manifests itself and generates effects both in terms of national defense, public order and national security, as well as on the degree of economic and political stability of a state.

The impact of globalization can be seen in the tendencies of disappearance of the state's physical boundaries and the emergence of other types of borders, usually invisible and other. Changing traditional borders as a result of globalization will lead to essential changes in the perception and conception of national security as well as the role of the national state in this context.

4. The concept of globalization

Globalization denotes the unitary world system, which means that, to a certain extent, we will look at the world as a single social, cultural, economic, etc. order. This development is the essence of globalization, which embraces various forms of manifestation: the universalization of science; global trade and financial flows; transnational enterprises; mass media present globally; Internet; world-class tourism and social migration movements; frictions between cultural spaces; intensive use of the environment; international crime[2].

Under the inter-human relational relationship, globalization means compressing distances through new technologies (third-generation mobile communications, the Internet), interconnecting and increasing mutual dependencies, integrating financial and commercial markets, finding solutions to some global issues, developing transnational identities. In this context, globalization will encompass all spheres of human existence and will constitute the model of society to which humanity will have to participate in its entirety[3].

Overall, globalization has broader meanings than the remodeling of the world economy. It is also reorganizing international politics and security issues. At the same time, globalization manifests itself as an internal, contradictory process that, on the one hand, opens up new possibilities for state development and, on the other hand, emphasizes existing problems or challenges new ones. On a global scale, the implications of the globalization process on state security are manifested in the context of the stability of the national economy[4].

The internal engine of globalization is identified in capitalism and technology, in the actions and policies of states and markets, or in features of modernity[5].

As a strict term, globalization signifies the multitude of socio - social transformations registered today by mankind, expanded on an integrative scale and generated by the impact of transcontinental financial - monetary flows on the characteristics of social interactions. Globalization of problems involves global policies and strategies to address common issues for the whole of humanity.

5. The effects of globalization

The phenomenon of globalization is a future stage of the general process of political, economic and cultural development of mankind. For now, it is difficult to speak with some certainty about the long-term effects of the globalization process on the international community, but even now, it is clear that the process of globalization has both a positive and a negative impact. The positive side of this process is that it will increase the interaction between countries, which in turn opens new possibilities for the development of human civilization, especially in the economic sphere. Increasing trade, investment and technology exchanges between different regions, facilitating people-to-people contacts, familiarizing themselves with cultures of other peoples are certainly beneficial to mankind.

Along with this, globalization also presents new challenges. Many hazards have a regional or even a planetary nature: ecological and technological catastrophes, transnational crime, international terrorism, etc. The uncontrolled expansion of dubious quality cultural patterns damages the national and cultural traditions of the peoples, threatening their originality.

The intensification of the globalization process also presents some dangers for national economies. At the same time, due to the uneven distribution of the benefits of globalization, the negative aspects of this process will particularly negatively affect developing countries, so that they can stay away from progress or even outside. Increasing interdependence in international relations generated by globalization brings new aspects of the notion of "national and international security." The number of external factors influencing the stable functioning of society is increasing.

First of all, globalization is a geo-economic and then geopolitical and geocultural process. This process is not only an approach, an integration of the economies of many countries. Changing the qualitative characteristics of these economies that transform from closed systems into elements of a world system. The very notion of "national economy" is changing. The core economic institution becomes the transnational corporation, which places its factories and sells its products where it is more convenient without taking into account the existence of borders. For this reason, the process of international division of labor takes place, and within a single state, whether developed, the "double economy" occurs, "flourishing enclaves", "donor regions, credit regions[6]".

6. The concept of security

Most authors in the field believe that security is a contentious concept. There is consensus on the existence of a sense of security against threats to fundamental values (both for individuals and for groups), but also a major disagreement as to who should be given priority attention: individual security , national or international. The specialized works that appeared during the Cold War had as a dominant topic the idea of national security, defined mainly from a military perspective[7].

The main area of interest for politicians and scientists represented him the military capabilities that those states should develop to deal with threats to them.

Lately, this idea of security has been criticized for its ethnocentric (cultural) nature and too narrow the definition. Instead, a large number of contemporary authors have promoted a conception of extended security beyond the traditional limits of national security in the parochial sense of the term, a concept that includes a considerable set of other considerations.

The state is a major source of both threats and security for individuals. The paradox is that as the power of the state grows, the state also becomes a source of threat to the individual. The State has the duty to ensure that its citizens are protected against any form of attack on its identity, foreign intervention, attacks and invasion[8].

The concept of security represents at the contemporary stage one of the most important concerns of political entities, be it a kingdom or a nation state. In today's conceptual security conditions, a process of transformation is increasingly oriented towards economic, political, social and environmental aspects[9].

Substantial changes have occurred in recent years in the analysis and practice of national security. Among the factors that have caused these transformations, "we can highlight three of them as the most important: the decline of national sovereignty, the unprecedented increase in transnational density and the conflicting explosion of the international scene, backed by identity dynamics. Security, objectively, measures the absence of threats to acquired values, and in a subjective sense, the absence of fear that these values will be attacked[10].

7. Definitions of the security concept

"A nation has security insofar as it is not in danger of having to sacrifice its fundamental values if it wants to avoid the future and has the capacity, if it is provoked, to preserve it by winning such a war[11]."

"Security, in an objective sense, measures the absence of threats to acquired values and in a subjective sense, the absence of fears that these values will be subject to attacks[12]."

In the case of security, the discussion concerns the concern to be free of threats. When this discussion is in the context of an international system, security addresses the ability of states and societies to maintain their identity, independence and functional integrity.

8. Regional security

The beginning of the millennium brings to the foreground the world and international relations that have become much more complex than they were before. Paradoxically, today, when the Cold War is over and the European Continent has a real chance to integrate on the basis of the values of democracy and the market economy, respect for fundamental human rights, security has again begun to be a very controversial issue.

Far from being an exception, Romania is even more sensitive to this phenomenon, for almost 150 years our statehood has been the central pillar of the eternal and centralizing conception of sovereignty. People's sovereignty does not exist outside state powers[13].

Increasing interdependence in international relations generated by globalization brings new aspects of the notion of "national and international security". Increases the number of external factors that influence the stable operation of the company. The state of international security increasingly influences the possibility of securing national security.

That is why maintaining global stability, assisting in creating such international mechanisms that would ensure sustainable and balanced development will become a priority and one of the main issues for regional communities[14].

As a consequence of globalization, many transnational developments and processes have a significant impact on national security. In addition to stimulating economic growth and opening up societies, we can highlight some inconveniences in the globalization process that can lead to the destabilization of some states, the vulnerability of entire regions to the spontaneous fluctuations of the world economy. It is enlightening the positive influence of globalization on the democratic community, which includes 30 per cent of the world's population, disputing 70 per cent of the wealth, which guarantees and stimulates freedom and prosperity, stability and security[15].

Some security specialists note that, in contrast to the above-mentioned situation, as a negative element of globalization, the situation of the instability needle stretching from the Near East to the Asian coast. The area is marked by problems of great gravity, such as poverty, governance inefficiency, power imbalance, high unemployment, Islamic fundamentalism, extremism, and what is worse, the absence of security.

The main dangers of the current world: terrorism, tyranny, perverted governments, the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, ethnic tensions, governance failures, resource shortages, geopolitical rivalries, drug trafficking and organized crime, find here a fertile ground of affirmation.

These things have a great impact on national security, democracy, stability and economic progress of the state. That is why governments are taking measures to protect their own territory against new threats, by aligning themselves with the international anti-terrorist coalition, working with other parties to defuse international conflicts, preventing the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, increasing economic growth under the conditions of developing free markets and free exchange, the elaboration of cooperative action programs with world power centers, the transformation and adaptation of international security institutions to the requirements of the 21st century.

9. National Security of Romania on Drugs

In the extensive efforts to develop cooperation on the non-proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and their launching devices, tightening existing regulations, combating international terrorism and other cross-border threats, states have a strong permanent involvement. Firstly, politically, states are interested and concerned about coordinating their positions and acting jointly to help find solutions to these major issues, as well as persisting conflicts, can seriously affect peace and stability in their environment geographically and then globally, all of which have a close relationship[16].

Through an active, dynamic national security policy, state security achieves a complex involvement in international security. In recent years, the State's national defense, state preventive diplomacy policies are combined with offensive policies to promote their own interest, which support global stability in different regions around the world. There is a overwhelming influence of global security on Romania's national one, perceived as a dynamic interaction, in continuous movement and transformation, a full international security meaning full national security and vice versa.

As ways of involving global security in state security, we can mention[17]:

- Restructuring and enhancing the global, regional economic, political and military bodies with a role in multilateral security of states;
- Intervention of global and regional organizations in the security of prevention and cessation of regional crises and conflicts;
- The immediate contribution of the international community to fighting terrorism without frontiers, drug trafficking and terror weapons of mass destruction;
- Involvement of international coalitions under international mandate, the process of security, stabilization and democratization of politically fragile states encompassed by violent conflicts;
- The contribution of the UN, the European Union and other international organizations and bodies, economic and financial institutions to combating poverty, trafficking and drug use, which seriously affects the security of states;
- Intervention of international organizations and bodies to combat the proliferation of cross-border organized and migrant crime, reduce vulnerability to disasters, prevent emergencies and provide health care, including in the treatment of drug addicts;
- Common international effort to stop environmental degradation and eliminate environmental imbalances, control the planet's deficient resources (water, food, energy) to fight disease, climate change;
- Increasing the role of international security institutions in the development of relations and exchange of information as a basis for enhancing national security;
- The approach of international institutions to strengthen humanitarian approaches to security, to ensure the protection of human rights and freedoms, to combat discrimination and violence against minorities of all kinds and refugees.

10. Threats to Romania's national security

In the Anglo-Saxon sense, the threat is an "expression of the intention to impose a person's disadvantage or touch by means of coercion or constraint[18]."

Starting from the general concept, the definition of the threat of political-military origin requires some clarification. Whether it refers to the violation of the fundamental rights of states or security systems, the perception of the fact-setting of threats remains the same, placing it among the virtual dangers.

Under the conditions of the beginning of the millennium it is appreciated that the global and continental system is experiencing profound transformations at a particularly accelerated pace. These are caused by the development of processes and phenomena that have a direct impact on the state security of states and their policies to protect and promote national interests.

The amplification and diversification of risks, their targeting under the conditions of internal vulnerabilities and favorable conjunctions can generate threats to the stability and security of the Romanian state, which will lead to the adoption of adequate, flexible and efficient measures and modalities of action.

The main external risk factors to national security are[19]:

- Gaps between security levels and the degree of stability of the states in the vicinity of Romania;
- acts of incitement to extremism, intolerance, separatism or xenophobia, which may affect the Romanian state and the promotion of democratic values; possible negative developments in the sub-regional area in the field of democratization, respect for human rights and economic development, which could lead to acute crisis with destabilizing effects on an extended area;
- the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, nuclear technologies and materials, armaments and non-conventional lethal means;

- Proliferation and development of terrorist networks, cross-border organized crime, illicit trafficking in human beings, drugs, weapons and ammunition, radioactive and strategic materials;
- clandestine migration and the appearance of massive refugees flows;
- limiting or forbidding the Romanian state's access to some regional resources and opportunities, important for the realization of national interests.

The analysis of these risk factors, in the subregional and regional context, highlights the fact that they are in a latent state, and the action, their production, can lead to crises of different natures and magnitudes capable of influencing the process of democratization of the country. Against this background, drug trafficking and drug abuse can address and challenge the safety of vital systems for the well-functioning of society. These actions not only bring serious damage to the health of the population, but by developing and escaping oversight can induce a state of uncertainty and a decrease in the defense potential of the country.

The lack of resources allocated to preventing and combating illicit drug trafficking and consumption as a result of the persistence of economic, financial and social problems resulting from the prolongation of the transition state and the delay in the implementation of structural reforms, results in a diminution in citizens' quality of life and aggravation the phenomena of crime of disruption of public order and personal safety.

Regarding the phenomenon of trafficking and drug use, the explanatory and operational importance of the concepts of human security and personal security is taken into account.

11. Drugs and personal security

The notion of human security was first mentioned in 1994 in the United Nations Development Program (UNDP) Annual Human Development Report. The term has thus become a benchmark for a new security model. The issue of human security has two aspects: first, it involves the absence of dangers such as hunger, sickness, reprisals; Secondly, it involves protecting the individual against unwanted events in everyday life (illness, workplace accidents, society).

The UNDP report identifies several elements specific to the concept of human security that pose threats to people. Of these, for our work, we will stop at food security, which is to guarantee the individual's access to basic food, both physically and economically. According to the UN, not lack of food is a problem, but poor food distribution or lack of purchasing power.

Another element is health security which provides for a minimum of protection against ill health and unhealthy lifestyles. In developing countries, the main causes of death are infections and bacteria, which annually kill millions of people. In industrialized countries, deaths are mainly caused by circulatory system problems. In both cases, poor people in rural areas, especially children and young people, are the most vulnerable to sanitary security threats.

Personal security means protecting people from physical violence, regardless of the source of this violence: the state, other states, other individuals, domestic violence. For most individuals, the greatest fear is related to crime, in its violent form. Community security is designed to protect individuals from loss of inter-human relations and traditional values and violence. The most threatened are marginalized, marginalized categories, including the category of drug users.

According to the Romanian Constitution - Article 22 - the Romanian citizen has the right to life and the right to physical and mental integrity is guaranteed. Also, the Romanian State (Article 34 of the Basic Law) recognizes the right to health of the citizen and is obliged to take measures to ensure hygiene and public health. In this sense, it is imperative to promote adequate social policies to reduce the risk of social exclusion, to reintegrate and reintegrate people with addictive drug-using behavior.

Threats to security can be different - famines and disease in poor nations, drug use and crime in the rich - but they are real and amplified. In addition, some threats are common to all nations, especially job insecurity and environmental issues. When people's security is affected in every corner of the world, it is possible for all nations to get involved.

Hunger, interethnic conflict, social disintegration, terrorism, pollution, and drug trafficking and drug consumption are no longer isolated events, closed between the borders of a country, but on the contrary, their consequences are felt everywhere.

The 21st century is marked by profound changes in the security environment. Consequently, the security concept has evolved. Human security is a concept centered on individuals and their security, which recognizes that sustainable stability, not just that of states but also societies they represent, is impossible as long as human security is not guaranteed. Many of the existing threats are common of all peoples, and may mention violations of human rights, crime, drugs, pollution and unemployment. The components of human security are interdependent.

All these threats of famine, epidemics, pollution, drug trafficking, terrorism, ethnic tensions, social disintegration can be more easily counteracted by preventive measures than through further interventions. It is less expensive to act on threats, dangers, when they occur, than after they have become permanent.

Even if there is no single definition of human security, which could be a handicap, given that definitions are essential when a consensus is sought for cooperation, an agreement on terminology has nevertheless been accepted as a basis for the adoption and implementation of joint work programs.

Under permanent threat, day-to-day existence can be characterized by a state of human insecurity. Adherents of human security theory speak both of direct and indirect threat sources. Thus, direct threats are violent deaths (victims of violent crime, killing women and children, terrorism, riots, pogroms, genocide, torture and murder of dissidents, war victims); dehumanization (slavery, kidnapping, arrest of political opponents); drugs (addiction to drugs, illegal trafficking); discrimination (discriminatory legislation, practices against minorities, undermining political institutions, etc.); international disputes (tensions and crises between states); weapons of destruction (proliferation of weapons of mass destruction).

Under these circumstances, elements of the concept of human security inevitably appear in the social and political programs of the world's states, including Romania. For the most part, human security in Romania is ensured by post-December legislation and by the accession of our country to the Euro-Atlantic bloc (NATO and the EU).

The human being is the starting point of any governmental objective, human rights and human needs, providing the best approach to social development, humanity and based on rights and needs. Unlike the needs-based approach, rights-based approach offers several advantages, for at least three reasons: it focuses on citizens, pays special attention to rights and property, brings to the fore the importance of rules and rules by which society is governed.

Existence of political instability, corruption, low levels of living, lack of freedom of action and expression, marginalization of minority groups, inclusive of drug-using groups, contraption of social categories, elements pooled as bad governance may be the causes of conflicts violent.

The manifestation of human dignity presupposes more than equality in the face of the law, it implies the equality of the chances of all people. Unintegrated into a society, individuals are subjected to a tragic alternative: to die or to de-humanize themselves. Drug use and drug addiction exemplify how suggestive it may be. A harmonious cohabitation between people is based on knowledge, understanding and acceptance of the differences that separate them. Even if people are equal before the laws, their chances to achieve, to succeed are not equal, because not all of them benefit from the same family environment, education and health.

A just society, a democratic society is concerned with ensuring equality of opportunity for all its members. In this sense, it has to develop laws to support the underprivileged and we refer here to people with addictive, drug-using behavior for which healing and socio-professional reintegration must be priorities of the social policies of any state. Article 16 of the Romanian Constitution guarantees equality of rights.

Discrimination of drug users is favored by the following situations: the generalization of one's own life experience, the development of prejudices, insufficient knowledge of others.

In Romania, according to Governmental Ordinance 137/2000, discrimination means any distinction, exclusion, restriction or preference, based on race, nationality, ethnicity, language, religion, social category, beliefs, gender, sexual orientation, age, disability , chronic non-contagious disease, HIV infection or belonging to a disadvantaged category that has the purpose or effect of restricting or abolishing the recognition, use or exercise on an equal basis of human rights and fundamental freedoms or of rights recognized by law in the political field , economic, social and cultural or in any other areas of public life.

The normative act stipulates that the elimination of all forms of discrimination is done by preventing any acts of discrimination, by introducing special measures, including positive actions, for the protection of disadvantaged people who do not enjoy equal opportunities.

Unfortunately, in social practice, the constitutional provisions and the legislation in force are not always respected. Discrimination is practiced not only by individuals, but also by institutions, companies, schools, hospitals, governmental organizations, when drug addicts are treated as delinquents excluded from social life and by lack of practical measures of socio-professional reintegration.

From the perspective of internal security, it is also of particular importance for the citizen's safety to optimize, improve and improve the effectiveness of crime prevention and fighting strategies, aiming at reducing the risk, frequency and consequences of particularly dangerous crimes - murder, robbery, physical integrity, deprivation of liberty and drug use.

Efforts to prevent and combat illicit trafficking and illicit drug use should address the following objectives:

- protection of local communities;
- the special protection of educational establishments and other institutions and places frequented mainly by children and young people;
- adequate safeguards for those living in a high-crime crime environment;
- Effective communication and partnership mechanisms between public policy forces, health and social care institutions and local communities;
- informing the public about different ways to prevent crime;
- concrete and firm actions capable of rapidly changing the status of Romania as a country of origin, transit and destination of trafficking in drugs, arms and human beings.

At European level, Romania's actions will focus, with priority:

- effective implementation of programs aimed at strengthening the common area of justice and public security;
- Improving cooperation mechanisms between intelligence services, in particular through cooperation with European structures to combat trafficking and drug use;

- providing assistance - by virtue of the solidarity clause - to any Member State of the European Union which is faced with this phenomenon, if so requested;
- Strengthening border security; improving cooperation mechanisms between police structures and other forces fighting the fight against drug trafficking as well as between bodies acting to prevent and counteract money-laundering activities from drug trafficking;
- Strengthening air, maritime and ground public transport security;
- Responsible and effective engagement in the international campaign against trafficking and drug use when and where it is needed.

Conclusions

Human security and state security complement each other. The security issue needs to be addressed in a global way to include the excluded.

The main directions for action should be the promotion of human rights in general and the rights of women in particular (the fight against domestic violence, the fight for the emancipation of women and their participation in public life); the development of local solidarity (a program to support schooling and reducing school dropout among minority populations, promoting tolerance and helping people find their own self-confidence).

All these issues are related to the culture of peace and tolerance, and Romania has programs, both at governmental level and at NGO level, which addresses such issues. It is important, as we have drawn attention on several occasions, that these programs are effectively implemented so that the problem of rehabilitation and reintegration of people with addictive behavior is treated with professionalism, coherence and sustainability. In the final analysis, the issue of the safety of the individual and especially of the drug user is also a matter of knowledge and language, depending on how each of those involved describes, expresses, analyzes or understands the risks and types of insecurity to which he is exposed and is exposed.

On the other hand, the characteristics of the current international security environment, corroborated with national political and social choices, should lead the Romanian Government to reconsider the issue of security resource management from the perspective of national needs and capabilities. Romania, as a full member of the collective security structures, must have an effective Strategy, a coherent system of human, material and financial management.

The compatibility of the educational offer with the real demand for skills on the labor market in Romania implies a prior review of a global project of pragmatic structural reform of the entire Romanian social space, taking into account the high risk categories. Against this backdrop, this educational offer is capable of motivating people with addictive behavior and guaranteeing them a socio-professional placement in reliable professional structures.

Absorption of marginalized and high-risk categories in addiction is a test of structural flexibility, compatible with the internal dynamics of a democratic society.

Further organizing qualification / retraining courses for people with addictive behavior with a view to their reintegration into the labor market, such as identifying new ways of motivating and supporting them to pursue such courses, is, in our view, essential milestones diminishing the phenomenon of exclusion.

THE IMPACT OF SOCIAL RELATIONSHIPS OVER HEALTH AND LONGEVITY. THE "BLUE ZONES" CASE.

Elena NEDELCU[*]

Abstract

The present paper aims to analyze – both from a quantitative and a qualitative perspective – the impact of social relationships over health and longevity in contemporary society.

Today human interaction is more and more facile thanks to the new technology development. However, despite this facility, many Western countries face the "loneliness epidemic". Individual-centered cultures promote the atomizing of society to the detriment of strong and quality social relations. Insufficient social relationships and so much the more loneliness and social isolation - according to the psycho-social studies of Holt-Lunstad a.o. - negatively affect health state and significantly increase the risk of premature death. The impact of this risk is so serious that it surpasses the risks posed by most health indicators (food, exercise, etc.). In other words, the absence of social relationships and loneliness are enemies of health and longevity.

The present paper aims to comparatively analyze the types of social relationships which one can find in the so-called "blue zones" (where it has been noticed that people have the highest longevity on Earth) in comparison with the Western ones.

We intend to identify the differences between ,, the territories of longevity " and Western world concerning the lifestyle, the frequency and quality of social relationships. What type of social relationships encourages a positive attitude towards life, gives life meaning, reduced risk-taking, sustain health and longevity.?

In the conditions of recording - in Romania after 1989 - of a lack of frequency and quality of social relations with the consequences, the present paper wants to draw an alarm signal both for the governors and for the governors.

Keywords: social relationships, quality, loneliness, lifestyle, longevity.

1. Social relationships, health, longevity

1.1. Social relationships versus loneliness

Although the human being is a social being by definition, today the Western lifestyle tends to significantly reduce the quantity and quality of social relationships. Many persons no longer live with their families, so much the least in large families, and neither do they live close to the others. Many delay getting married or planning having a baby. A significant number of persons prefer to choose a bachelor's life. We have also noticed the existence of a deficit as to the relationships between generations, as well as an ever increasing geographical mobility, an increase in the number of families in which both parents develop a career and in the number of single-parent families. An ever increasing number of persons living in the Western World live alone and loneliness becomes a way of life for more and more human beings. These observations point out that, despite technological development and globalization – which one could expect to create more social connections – actually make people more and more isolated from a social point of view. According to a new survey made by AARP (American Association of Retired Persons) has revealed that an important number of adults, namely persons of over 40 years old, declared that they are affected by the lack of social relationships. These persons also mentioned that they started to confront with mental issues (memory and concentration deficit, etc.).

Research developed by Holt-LUnstad J. have revealed that "the insufficiency of social relationships or the relative lack thereof pose a major risk for health, as well as smoking, blood pressure, lipids in the blood, overweight and lack of physical activity. Loneliness generates human sufferance, especially to elderly persons and may lead to the appearance of serious health problems, such as: depression, cognitive decline and even cardiovascular problems."[1] (our translation)

On the other hand, social relationships may generate (informational, emotional or tangible) resources, which generate behavioral or neural-endocrine answers that help people adapt to acute or chronic states of stress (e.g. illness, life events, transitional periods in life). The support offered by social relationships reduces or alleviates negative stressful factors over health. In other words, Julianne Holt-Lunstad concludes, relationships between persons play a fundamental role in increasing survival chances." as well as in enhancing health, life quality and longevity. persons pose a lower risk to mental decline, which demonstrates once again how important social links are for brain health[2]."

When you feel that you are loved, supported and encouraged thanks to a relationship that you have, your mind is exposed to less stressful reactions and issues more relaxing answers, and the physiology of the body reacts accordingly, as Lisa Rankin notices in her book Mintea bate medicina: dovezi stiintifice ca te poti vindeca singur [The Mind Rules over Medicine: Scientific Proofs that You May Heal Yourself].

To support the same idea, we make reference to a study published in the Journal of Epidemiology and Community Health, which points out that persons who are more than 70 years old and have more friends and more social relationships live more in comparison with the others. "Ensuring that older relatives and friends are involved in society in some way seems to be a key factor in longevity," said Lynne C. Giles, the lead author on the study and a doctoral student at Flinders University in Adelaide. "Perhaps facilitating contact, either by phone or in person, is a simple thing we can all do to help older people. This is a question for both individuals and policy makers to think about[3]."

In this context, it is worth mentioning the study published by Harris and Yang after 20 years of research, according to whom social relationships may be as important for health as food and sport. In short, the conclusions of their research work are the following ones:

- the social circle that a person has is an importantly independent factor for health;
- to teenagers and adults the the number of relationships is more important;
- to the middle-aged the quality of social relationships matters more;
- social relationship protects against abdomen overweight;
- social isolation tends to increase the level of systemic inflammation;
- as to the more elderly persons, the small number of social relationships proved to be worse in comparison with high blood pressure or diabetes[4].

1.2. The Quality of Relationships. Willingness and health state

The studies quoted above analyze the impact of social relationships from a quantitative point of view (sufficient/insufficient or absence) on health state and longevity.

Other studies not only refer to the impact of the insufficiency/sufficiency of social relationships, but also on the effect of the quality thereof upon an individual's life or upon society. According to these studies, a certain category of social relationships tend to produce positive effects at social or individual level. To be more precise, it is about non-violent social relationships, which are based upon willingness and generosity - "quality relationships". These relationships lead to "the development of a high relationship quotient between most individuals, and to the development of lively, healthy and intelligent relationships."[5] (our translation)

A good quality relationship or the high relationship quotient (RQ) imply the inner presence of cordiality, willingness, which make it possible to have respect for the other, no matter who he/she is.

Relationship quotient (RQ), according to Maryse Legrand, a French clinical psychologist, may be evaluated in two ways: in the relationship one has with himself/herself and in the relationship one has with the others. RQ is linked to the more or less developed capacity of a person to propose for himself/herself, relationships which actively contribute to the enhance and development of them both. According to J. Salome, we could say of an individual who creates and develops energetic, creative and stimulative relationships, that he/she has a high RQ. On the other hand, the RQ of a person is low when he/she generates or stimulates naive, energy-consuming and alienating relationships for himself/herself and the others.

RQ is the art of creating mutually advantageous relationships. A quality relationship is characterized by the need of an individual to be accepted, to express oneself as a unique human being, to be recognized as such and to be appreciated. This type of relationship ensures the human being's development, openness and fulfillment. "In such a relationship, our physical, affectionate needs and the needs to relate to the others may be recognized and heard (but they cannot be fulfilled by all means). The need to relate to the others refers to the need to express oneself, to be heard, to be respected (to have the others' attention), to be appreciated (to feel oneself useful and valued), to feel that one is an intimate of someone else (to share secrets with another person), to feel that one belongs to someone (to feel accepted by a group), to influence others (to contribute to the accomplishment/creation of something new). The quality relationship develops within positive meetings which tends to consolidate personal security, the feeling that one lives a life full of dignity. RQ favors one's aspiration to be himself/herself when meeting the other one and when trying to offer the others the best that one has[6]."

Besides quality relationships, which are willingful and we previously referred to, Aurore Aimelet identifies other ones, which are at least as important as the mentioned ones. Synthetizing the psycho-sociological works of certain famous researchers (Robert Ornstein, David Sobel, M. J. Ryan, Ștefan Einhorn, Robert Emmons, Allan Luks, Serge Cicotti etc.), Aurore Aimelet comes to the conclusion that practicing willingness as a lifestyle leads the individual to the following benefits:

"Willingness reinforces the feeling of personal fulfillment and accomplishment (….); it is a source of joy: it increases serotonin production, the hormone of hapiness, which creates a sensation of warmth, energy and calm(...); it improves memory, learning capacity, creativity and problem-solving ability (...); in enhances the imunitary system: it stimulates the dilatation of blood vessels, which is vital for the cardiovascular system, it increases lymphocytes production, a fact which enhances resistence to disease; it comforts pain: it activates the part of the brain that produces endorphins, generating analgesic and antistress effects, a higher tolerance to pain (...).; (...) it increases motivation to take part in different activities, including in volunteering acts[7]." ·

Apart from all these benefits, practicing willingness - Pierro Ferucci appreciates – removes the feeling of frustration, it is therapeutic and it has antidepressive effects. Pierro Ferucci notices, on the other hand, that "acting with willingness is not simple becaseu it requires the integration of certain essential virtues: trust, empathy, loyalty, patience, modesty, respect, gratitude. Empathy helps us understand what is in the mind of a furious person and to give up acting aggressively. Modesty helps us listen to our interlocutors, to enjoy their presence, diminishing the tendency to speak about our.own successes. Patience helps us give value to a relationship and to the colocutor. Generosity helps us choose staying with a peron rather than possessing something. Respect develops politeness. Without respect, politeness is superficial. Loyalty, a proof of someone's fidelity and justice, which gives the feeling of security, ensures the stable attitude of those staying about us. Gratitude makes us content with what we have and not to take things for granted. It comforts pain and frustration, while creating a feeling of fulfillment[8]".

In conclusion, in order to be able to act with willingness, we have to make use of all its "ingredients", namely: empathy, loyalty, patience, modesty, respect, gratitude. If not, willingness and quality relationships remain simple isolated manifestations or a theoretical concept.

We underline that the benefits brought by willingness are felt by society and its individuals altogether. We could say, without exaggerating, that in society the manifestation of willingness vs. violence is the key of survival. However, those who benefit most of willingness are those who practise it, which is difficult to understand by persons who do not appreciate it or who underestimate it.

Finally I would like to underline the idea that all the research that I referred to converge to the same conclusion: persons who have strong social relationships tend to be healthier than those who are isolated; persons who have adequate (good quality) social relationships are supposed to have 50% more chances of survival in comparison with those who have insufficient or relationships of a poor quality.

Social isolation leads to more stressful reactions, which increase systemic inflammation and the level of stress hormones and which reduce the mental function, generating a decrease of the health state, illnesses and a shorter lifespan. Relationships offer to our lives a meaning and a goal.

When one is aware of his/her meaning and goal in life, one tends to be more careful with himself/herself and to assume less risks.

2. Lifestyle in "blue zones" versus lifestyle in the Western World

Starting with 1990, Dan Buettner - a member of National Geographic – who was collaborating with Gallup – identified and researched the areas where persons with the highest longevity could be found: Sardinia (Italy), Nicoya Peninsula (Costa Rica), Loma Linda (California), Okinawa (Japan) and Ikaria (Grecia). He noticed that in these "blue zones", the natural and social environment and the inhabitants' lifestyle had quasi- similar characteristics. In his work entitled "The Blue Zones: 9 lessons to live longer", he identified the main factors that seem to increase the lifespan and life quality of those living in the "blue zones". In short, these factors are: being active, having a sense in your life, reducing stress, eating less, eating less meat, drinking with moderation, having a faith, giving your family a priority position in your life, staying close to your parents, grandparents and building a social network that supports healthy behaviors.

2.1. The rationale of living and leading an active life like in a flow.

Hector Garcia's and Francesc Miralles' studies confirm and complete the conclusions of Dan Buettner's research. The former ones confine their research to the Japanese island Okinawa. They notice that on that island the inhabitants have a philosophy of life and a particular, well-defined lifestyle, which is different or rather totally opposed to the Western one. Here, the human being does not fervently search the meaning of life, which has always existed and it is self-understood. The meaning of life seems to preexist in comparison with an individual's life. For example, to Okinawa inhabitants, the rationale / the joy to be living, the passion with which you do your duty/profession are "reasons for which you wake up in the morning'', "the happiness to be busy all the time"; all of these are, in brief, their life philosophy or what they call "ikigai". They identify their meaning in life, their ikigai, in work relationships, friendships, mutual support actions performed within the community ("moai").

The Japanese – according to the above quoted authors – consider that once you have discovered your ikigai, you have to pursue and develop it ceaselessly so that your life could gain significance. The wisdom of Ogimi-Okinawa reveals that there are some fundamental laws which support the discovery and practice of the ikigai: being always active, never getting retired, being always in motion, being always surrounded by good friends, regarding all calmly, getting connected to nature, never eating one's fill, smiling, being grateful, seizing the day and following your passion[9].

The discovery and practice of the ikigai are closely linked to the experimentation of the "flow state", namely the "state in which persons are so much involved in an activity that nothing else seems to matter to them; the experience in itself is so pleasant that persons would like to repeat it by all means only for the pleasure of doing it."[10] It seems that the experience of the "flow state" may be found not only with the elderly persons from Ogimi, but also with most Japanese people. "Their capacity of being absorbed in the activity that they perform, forgetting about time passage, as well as their perseverance in solving a problem are indisputable. It is a characteristic we identify in any environment, from the retired persons who spare no detail in taking care of the rice paddy in Nagano Mountains to the students who work at the weekend in a conbini (a non-stop shop)''[11].

In conclusion, to the Japanese what really matters are not accomplishments, success, personal welfare (individualism), as it happens with the Western World mentality, but rather the opposite thereof (collectivism).

Multitasking, which blocks the flow state – and which is so much stimulated by the Western World – is underestimated by "100 year old people.". The elder Japanese understood that one is healthier and happier when one does one activity in comparison with those persons who try doing several activities at the same time.

2.2. Respecting biorhythm. Harmonizing social rhythms with natural (biological) ones

According to Diane Kochilas, a characteristic of those living on the Greek island Ikaria is lack of haste, lack of hasting against time. There are no cruel deadlines, no ceaseless reasons to race, the fear of being late/not being on time, which are specific to the Western World. The people of Ikaria do not keep their eyes on the watch. They live slowly, walk without being in a hurry, take their time to notice what is going on around them, as if they could decide what to do with their own time". In Ikaria nobody hurries to reach a certain place; according to local mentality, "being late or changing mind as to going to a place where one intended to go though one promised to do so, is deeply rooted in the local inhabitants lifestyle, according to Diane Kochilas – see her book ,,Lecţii despre mâncare, viaţă şi longevitate de pe insula grecească unde oamenii uită să moară" [Lessons about food, life and longevity on the Greek Island where people forget to die].

Similarly, the Okinawa population's mentality totally opposes emergency culture, which generates so many negative emotions. One of the ten laws of "ikigai", selected from the elderly's Okinawa (Ogini) wisdom impels us approach things calmly. Haste has nothing to do with life quality. The one who walks slowly will go far. "When we ignore emergency situations, our time and life gain a new significance[12].".

Another law of the ikigai, which completes the above enumerated ideas, refers to giving full value to the present or "trying to seize the day". All that we surely have is the present day and, consequently, we must live it as well as possible so that it will be worth remembering it. The Japanese concept "Ichi-go ichi-e", namely "this moment exists only now and it will never exist once more" explains why it is important to respect this principle. "This principle is used especially at reunions to remind us that each meeting, no matter if meet friends or the family or unknown persons, is unique and non-recurring. That is why we must concentrate on the present and enjoy the unique moment without feeling overwhelmed by worries regarding the past or the future. The concept of Ichi-go ichi-e is very much used in the tea ceremony, Zen meditation and Japanese martial arts[13].''

The Italians, especially those coming from Sardinia – which is another "blue zone" - do not hurry, and live with the feeling that they have time for everything. They consider that life is lived in the present. We must not waste the present trying to find something in the future. This attitude reduces the stress level considerably. Once a person adopts this mentality, his/her priorities change. The Italians this slowness with an increase in life quality, which is their main priority. They focus on personal accomplishment, trying to have time for the things that make them happy, working for living and not vice versa[14]."

We appreciate that the expression dolce far niente refers to this life philosophy and that this expression has nothing to do with laziness, but with living the moment, contemplating it and letting things happen and flow without pressure and without planning. It is a way of giving value to our spare time, it is a way of beautifully feeling idle after one finished an intense activity.

2.3. Social organization and the sense of belonging to a community.

Dan Buettner noticed that in at least three out of the five Blue Zones lifestyle and social organization are obviously different from lifestyle and social organization of the Western World. In the Blue Zones people are part of a real social network and appreciate family, friends and support each other; most often they are actively part of a religious community.

Thus, one of the secrets of the Ogimi population is the strong feeling of belonging to the community. Establishing strong links within the local communities is a tradition in Ogimi (Okinawa). Studies made by Dan Buettner, H. Garcia, Fr. Miralles and others reveal that social organization is accomplished in Ogimi on the basis of cooperation, solidarity and enhancement of life quality. Ogimi is organizes in 17 dwelling associations, each of them having a president and several persons who are responsible with different domains: social activities, longevity, culture, festivals, etc. It is interesting to notice that the Town Hall has a Department for Enhancing the Inhabitants' life quality. The Town Hall has portfolios with lists of all the inhabitants living in the village, who are organized, according to their age, in clubs. In other words, everyone is part of a club (moai), that is a group of friends who support each other. "Groups do not have a precise goal, they are simply like a family.(...) Everyone offers to collaborate, the Town Hall only deals with task organization. In this way, everyone feels that he/she belongs to a community and may be useful to the village. In fact, to so-called yui-maru or mutual cooperation spirit is deeply rooted in the hearts of the Ogimi inhabitants. They practice yui-maru since childhood and learn team work and how to help each other."[15]

They help each other with rice seeding and cane cropping, as well as with other agricultural activities. They help each other build houses, do voluntary work for different public activities. In other words, they make up a moai, that is an "informal group of persons, who have common interest and who help each other. For many, this mutual help becomes one of their ikigai. Members of a moai must monthly pay a tax that affords them take part in reunions, dinners, go, shogi (Japanese chess) games or simply share a common passion.

Moai builds life-long connections and contributes to maintaining the emotional and financial stability of each member. "If one of the group members has financial difficulties, he may be granted the spared sum in advance.(…) The feeling of belonging to a community and mutual help create a feeling of security to the person and contribute to enhancing life expectancy[16]."

According to one of the 10 laws of the ikigai man absolutely needs the company of good friends. Japanese consider that friends are "the best elixir" for being care free or for asking for advice or for telling and listening to stories that make one person's life easier and more pleasant, or for amusing or sharing something and for living. Actually, interviews made by Hector Garcia and Francesc Miralles in Ogimi reveal that all the 100 interviewed persons (persons in their 90s and 100s) valued friendship and considered that it considerably increases life quality and longevity. The majority of the elderly interviewed ones declared that their most important hobby is meeting friends, for talking, drinking tea. Thus, going to karaoke and getball games with your family, friends and neighbours is the most beneficial activity. The persons interviewed by H. Garcia and Fr. Miralles, who were in their 100s, appreciated that one of the secrets for living long is to talk to the people you love, dance with them and sing with them daily. Such a vision reflects the joy of living and an intense social involvement, which are key elements for good health and longevity.

A society based on cooperation and affection to the community, the elderly ones and the forerunners enjoys a lot of respect. We could speak about a real worship of the forerunners, a fact which makes the Japanese culture so different from the Western one. The modern, Western society is individualistic and inhibits the community spirit, it does not value the elderly ones' expertise; in reality, the Western society places the elderly ones in a marginal position. In social and family hierarchies the elderly seem to occupy a modest position; thus, the proverb he who does not have elderly one should buy some has lost its meaning. This situation is not favorable either to the elderly ones or to society.

"On the other hand, the Japanese lives with the conviction that the voice of his consciousness is the voice of his parents, forerunners and masters, to whom he feels grateful, considering that if he does something wrong he is a disappointment to them. He preserves the same feelings to the forerunners and masters even when they pass away[17]."

The word "jibun", which corresponds for the self, accurately describes the person as a part of the common life environment. To the Japanese, according to Hamaguchi, the sense of identifying oneself with the others preexists and the Ego is only confirmed through interpersonal relationships. The Ego is not constant but a fluid which changes depending on time and context and in conformity with social interpersonal relationships . Social relationships are appreciated as such and not regarded as a means of meeting personal objectives. People are constantly aware of the others and try to act for the others' goals and wishes in an attempt to reach their personal goals."

In Okinawa families, in the house of the primogenitor, there is a butsudan, a little altar at which forerunners are worshiped and prayers are said for them. Respect for the forerunners – according to Garcia& Miralles – is an attitude that is common to all Japanese.

Similarly, in Sardinia the elderly enjoy a lot of respect on the part of society. Here, according to Dan Buettner, "the older you are, the more equitably you will be treated and the more will be appreciated your wisdom. If you go to Sardinian pubs, you will find the Monthly Centenary instead of the Sports Illustrated calendars that are full of swimming costumes[18]."

As to Japan, one has to mention that inter-human relationship patterns are different from context to context, for example in corporations. Differently from most Western countries, here, "the employees within corporations may have a life-time commitment. Here it is the working group and not the individual who has the responsibility and who makes the assessments and decision-making is rather collective than oligarchical. (…)

Furthermore, the stats-corporations relationship is a special one. The so-called "one-day bankruptcy" cases are well-known because it is the state which takes over resources and redistributes them for a more efficient usage thereof. In these conditions, unemployment is under control (...). This organization type grants workers security, comforting confidence, stability and social cohesion[19]."

3. Conclusion

Analyzing lifestyle and social relationships in the so-called longevity realms, the present study is a meditation as regards the effects which the Western lifestyle has over health, longevity and the people's quality of life. Psycho-sociological research and the case studies quoted here bring into evidence that in the present Western World there is a deficit and an acute need of building strong and quality social relationships for all age categories, especially for those aged over 65. Health and life expectancy seriously depend on the intensity and quality of social relationships. On the other hand, the quoted research works underline the fact that the Western World seems to face the loneliness phenomenon more and more despite the advanced communication technologies that exist. The consequences of this phenomenon acquire ever more varied and complex forms affecting the wellness state of the individual and society.

The present paper did not deny the role played by the other factors on our health and life expectancy: food, exercise, etc.; however, the main goal of this paper is to analyze the positive effects of social relationships upon people's life. We have decided to write this study because we have seen that people do not pay attention to this factor. It seems that at least here, in Romania, many people do not understand the role played by social relationships in their lives (both from a quantitative and a qualitative perspective); they seem not to understand how much they are affected by loneliness and the insufficient or feeble social relationships that they have. They are neither aware and nor do anything to change this state of facts. They are rather concerned with survival problems or their career and personal success. When interviewed, they recognize that they are discontent with the social relationships that they have and that "loneliness is like an enemy to human being. (…) More than a half of the Romanians (54%) declare that they have experienced loneliness (…). They also recognize (36%) that most of their social relationships are superficial and appreciate (46%) that nobody really knows them. However, more than 80% of the Romanians declare that they have close friends and 43% declare that they often or very often take part in socializing activities[20]."

In reality, the feeling of loneliness and the loneliness phenomenon seem to be more acute than statistical data indicate. "When one in five persons and 77% of the interviewed persons consider that most of the people try to trade on the others and that you cannot trust them, it is clear that loneliness is a national phenomenon[21]."

The continuous worsening situation of formal and informal social relationships which seems to have started after 1989 and generated anomie in the Romanian society made us write the present paper as a warning signal for those who run our society and for all its members, as well. It is unquestionable that our society needs a correct and urgent policy that helps "rebuild" social relationships, reinvent communities, impose respect as a normal attitude for each of us, including the elderly ones, for traditions and history.

THE EFFECT OF DEMOCRATIC HAOS REGARDING THE SOCIO-PROFESSIONAL CATEGORIES

Mirela Cristiana NILĂ STRATONE*

Abstract

The democratic social framework has the role of ensuring stability, social protection, equal opportunities, and above all ensuring the rights and freedoms of citizens. The right to freedom of expression leaves a less prepared, unprotected population of information on the selection of information. This category of population is representative in the population of a country and is exposed to unqualified opinion. The issue raised in this article is based on the fact that, following the formation of an unqualified opinion, the individual goes to action. This action will give rise to anti-social effects that the author will consider viable. Hence, manipulation and social chaos are born, leading directly to antagonisms between socio-professional categories. That is why we can talk about the wrong attitudes towards the workers in any field of activity. There is a general strife of all against all. No one is considered competent, a negative label is placed on each profession, because professionals in any field are discredited, accused without necessarily being guilty. All these are directed and serve interests of social destabilization.

The general chaos installed in Romanian society is also an effect of the non-elites' action at the level of the government's leadership. Above all, a strong footprint puts it the promotion of new values, non-values, affecting the future of the young.

Keywords: socio-professional categories, the chaos of democracy, participatory democracy, representative democracy, anarchy through manipulation.

1. Introduction

In approach of the new attitudinal manifestations that have arisen at the democracy level in Romania, it is necessary to analyze the relations between the categories of the population, both from a socially and professionally point of view.

The idea of the socio-professional category is based on the way of classifying the active population of a nation in significant categories in terms of the number of individuals, with essential condition that each of them to present a certain degree of homogeneity. This degree of homogeneity he refers to the fact that the individuals belonging to the same social or professional category are fit to maintain social or professional relationships between they. This involves behavioral manifestations, attitudes, opinions, sufficiently value close. This is how a socio-professional category identifies itself in relation to the others, and at the same time expects recognition from them.

In relation to these categories, there is a proper nomenclature, which must contain certain dimensions: job classification, skill grid, skills hierarchy, social status scale, etc.

The first nomenclature of the socio-professional categories was made in 1954 by the National Institute of Statistics and Economic Studies of France. In 1982 there was a massive reform, which led to a new code of "professions and socio-professional categories". In Romania, in 1995, under the aegis of the Ministry of Labor and Social Protection and of the National Commission for Statistics, the "Classification of Occupations in Romania" (COR) was elaborated, the first work of systematization (by codes and alphabetical) of the occupations in Romania and their description on four levels of aggregation, by harmonizing with occupational classifications in the European Union[1].

The social and especially the professional categories evolve on the background of the social matrix. In Romania, after 1989, we have a form of democratic society. At the beginning of the period, after 1989, the idea of authentic democracy was circulated. The lack of information and the sequelae of communism have pushed the population into accepting the new as the authentic expression of democracy.

2.1.The representative and participative democracy in society

On the one hand, is acting the idea of representative democracy. According to this, the power of the people is delegated by himself to elected representatives of its ranks. The purpose of such detachment is represented by the need of the people to be organized and led to their own happiness and well-being. This is done through free elections, which gives legitimacy to the group selected and promoted at the government. It is true that the elected persons have the right and duty to decide on behalf of the people without consulting him for a certain period of time. But it should be noted that decisions refer to the social needs of citizens. Until now, the form of representative democracy seems to be the ideal political regime, citizens are preoccupied with their private life, and those whom they have chosen to represent they get involved with maximum conscientiousness at public life, in social needs, and never to their private life, hidden interests, personal advantages, etc.

Apparently no social conflicts could arise. But for this it should be respected, "the social contract", explained and analyzed by J.J. Rousseau: the man develops naturally, based on a contract between the community and the sovereign chosen by the community itself. From this perspective of androcentric contractualist theory, we can speak of perfect society, provided the commitment is respected[2].

At the same time, it must be said that representative democracy has limits and acts indirectly. The limit lies in the fact that the popular participation at the government is periodical and short-time, being conditioned by the electoral ballot. The indirect action is manifested by the fact that citizens do not exercise their own power. This form of government is democratic only if there are real and affective ties between the governors and those who are governed during an electoral mandate. This is difficult to put into practice because selection requires separation between the ruling elite and the masses. Thus, discrepancies appear from the need for the superiority on the part of the governors. They feel superior on the basis of power that does not actually belong to them, but is in their custody with the guise of the population, the community. This social segment amounts to a value that does not really belong to it. That is why the government elite tries and most of the time succeeds in seizing the political power, to acquire it. We are in a situation of social conflict, where the agreement from the social contract is no longer respected by the ruling group. How can the group do that? By manipulation, the perfect instrument to create chaos.

The state of chaos brings about social anomie, which is the perfect recipe for divide for the purpose of illegitimate rule.

Another instrument used in this regard refers to the multitude of decision-makers, which leads to a lot of power centers and implicitly to the diffuse responsibility. But this is just an appearance. In reality, chaos is triggered by control. This control can not be localized by civil society, citizens.

We speak of a parallel structure that uses democratic values, such as freedom of expression, creativity, fundamental rights, but all directed towards obscure interests.

If by now we have talked about the indirect (representative) form of democracy here, it is time to also mention its direct (participative) form[3]. The basis of direct democracy is represented by the direct and continuous participation of citizens in the act of government. This requires, on the one hand, the elimination of the separation between the governors and the governed, and on the other hand the one between the state and the civil society, which leads to the self-government of the people by the people themselves. It is an ideatic model, which exists only in theory. In Romania it is considered real only if we are referring to referendum or free and direct elections. But the direct participation in the act of government stops here because at the next stage, the oligarchy already formed during the promotion of candidates will lead to the segregation of society into the ruling elite and the popular masses. We can say that from a direct democracy we arrive compulsory to the delegation of power, so again to representativeness.

To be possible, the participatory democracy requires the existence of certain conditions. In the absence of imposed conditions, the only possible democracy is the representative one. In practice, "the representation or the representative governance is a democracy that has become practicable for a long time and on vast territorial areas[4]."

2.2. The common methods of manipulation of the masses and their action on socio-professional categories

Because the representative democratic governance always enters into a crisis of legitimacy, is needed the manipulation of the popular masses. Noam Chomsky sets a number of ten basic rules that he calls diversion strategies. We will mention them one by one, showing the effect of the action of these strategies on the socio-professional categories in the Romanian society.

2.2.1. The people must always have their minds busy with something other than his real problems

The real problems of the people can create conflicting states. These states do not give comfort to those in government, so the collective mentality must be oriented towards anything different from the respective problems. In this sense, the population can be divided into age or occupational categories. The problems of each category can draw the attention of others to the specific shortcomings. That's why it's throwing into the public space an aspect that belongs to a category but affects also the other.

For example, the lack of equipment in hospitals leads false to the idea that physicians are unable to carry out complete investigations that would save children from dying, but the cause would be the incompetent of the doctors and not the mentioned lack. From here until the blame on the whole catego ry of healthcare personnel there is no difference. There is a feeling of contempt for the medical staff, this feeling is amplified over time, is constantly fueled by similar incidents and leads to hatred. Collective hatred directed of each against all, leads easily to disunity for the purpose of mastery, manipulation, etc. Conversely, if the people did not have their minds occuped forced with false problems, the real problem of an age or occupational category would trigger the other categories' attention to their true problems. In this way, they would create a state of empathy among different categories of population, which would leads to a sense of solidarity. Against the backdrop of popular solidarity, it is difficult to implantation the hatred and to obtaining of the disunion.

In short, we talk about distracting attention from real social issues and orientation it to seemingly minor issues compared to real issues, but with emotional impact.

2.2.1. The people must perceive the rulling elite as the unique rescuer of the nation

In this regard are invented false threats such as avian flu. Of course, such a situation is really worrying, it creates panic among public opinion. Bird breeders are perceived as the true responsible for negligence. As such, the state offers as a solution the slaughter of mass birds. For this, the public opinion will welcome the decision because it will strongly believe that the state takes care of the population health. Bird breeders are directly harmed, and if they resist, because they know that the outbreak of the flu and the disease are not related to the birds, they suddenly become the enemies of the whole people. But the people will be also harmed because the birds, healthy ones, feed the people. The people are not aware of this, but they are convinced that those in leadership saved him from influenza virus infection. In parallel, however, those in leadership take unfavorable measures for the population, but this one is busy with the fake issue avian influenza problem and does not notice the real issue.

In other words, here we have false threats or serious problems created intentionally, which have the role of triggering panic and concern in the public opinion. This is the moment when the representative democratic government comes up with solutions.

2.2.2. The people must be constantly prepared for the worse

The people prepared for a much tougher and worse situation than they is in reallyti, will more easily support the difficult situations in which they are put by the governors. So the people will endure a lesser evil than the evil for which they have been prepared (unrealistically) and this because of a government permanently concerned with the well-being of the citizens. Now, the people appear who detect the fake and bring it to the attention of the public, but the audience will turn against the right ones, reasonable, positioning themselves on the side of the liar government, without detecting the false, the manipulation. At the same time, the antipopular political measures will be applied gradually, and the population will be convinced that it is for its sake, in order not to get worse. Social weights will be easier to bear.

2.2.3. The people must believe that what governments preparing him to live worse, is also for its own good

When the government puts higher taxes on the population, it has already a legal measure who is prepared for which the population has given its consent long ago. So the people were aware of the necessity of unfavorable measures for himself, but in the meantime it was used to the idea, and the shock was greatly diminished, so that no conflict would arise. This situation leads to intergenerational social conflict, because the unpopular measures decided by parents come to be applied to the descendants. It appears a feeling of hatred between generations.

2.2.4. The collective mentality should be at a mediocre level, which does not give it the ability to analyze and forecast

The public communication is realised at a minimum level of training, as if the entire population were at a level of mediocre education. This leads to superficiality, naivety and implicitly to conflicts. Through poor communication is reaching to the manipulation of information, to the informational poisoning through rumor and lying. Thus appear on the public stage the dilettantes, who have no respect for education and authentyc values. They choose to impose their point of view without respecting the opinions of others. In most of them, popular masses its identified in this category and think superficially, without looking for a link between cause and effect.

2.2.5. Is annihilated the capacity of the masses to notify the real social issues and the accentuated tendency of action based on collective emotion

It is known that reason is based on logic, and logic in turn is born on the basis of reality. This is the reason why governors choose to they used by the feelings of individuals by appealing to emotions. The emotions are encouraged, because under exaggerated, forced form, the emotivity leads to disorientation, illogical thinking, chaos. In the case in which is arriving at a period of social chaos, the collective thinking of the masses is much easier to manipulating compare with the situation in which she, this thinking, lies on a territory of logic, anchored in the social reality. Then, the collective thinking would have the ability to problematize the reality. In this case, there would be danger of direct democracy, which would annihilate the manipulation.

2.2.6. The small achievements, without long-term impact, without significant value, take time, consume energy and tired the individual enough that is no longer tempted to gain remarkable achievements, he no longer hopes great ambitions in professional, material, personal, no longer is motivated to achieve superior ideals

For this is need an attack on the educational dimension. To the basis of institutional education stand the educational system.[5] The introduction of corruption and her deficiencies of functioning inside it has the effect of increasing the ignorance among the masses. Ignorance inevitably leads to manipulation. Lack of information or thereof deformation can lead toincorrect information of one professional category vis versus another. An example of this can be the expectations of society towards licensees that does not rise to the required level by society after it goes in production. They are happy with the small jobs that do not give them noticeable satisfactions, because they are not and are not prepared enough to perform in the profession they have chosen and for which they hold a diploma. Society condemns they, it is disappointed with they, but it does not take attitude, because she alsow it is totally, satisfied with small and unsatisfying achievements to the social needs it has. Lack of professional training, lack of culture, lead to an increase in ignorance, which represented the most suitable ground for manipulating public opinion, to serving at the same time certain obscure interests.

2.2.7. It is necessary to limit the access of popular masses to complete and correct information

Because the citizens need and seek information, the solution is that they to have many, but inaccurate, rather false, information. To accomplish this, we have to deal with financial groups that directing the information they want, through mass media controlled also by them. For this, of course, financial support is needed.[6] An example is represented by the removal of the public from the traditional culture, by sponsoring television shows that promote the vulgarity or behavioral deviance. Lately, emphasis is placed on the sexual deviance, cosmeticised under manifestations who is centrated to open mind, applied by fashion, film, parade, etc. This divides the masses into two categories. The first is that of traditional values and will never engage in homosexual manifestations. The second is the one oriented towards the new, without filtering the new through the point of view of quality of the values it promotes. Between these two social categories will be born contempt, hatred, disapproval in any form, sometimes reaching the conflict. It is intended the creation of the same state of chaos, because it is trying and sometimes it is also succeeds the stupidity of the public, by keeping intelligence at a lower level.

2.2.8. The gregarious spirit induced to the popular masses, leads to the loss of identity and will of human development

We have here as an example the obligativity of vaccination, a controversial issue that carries with himself a large deficit of information. By spreading certain viruses among the popular masses, the young population that does not yet have sufficient immunity, is getting sick. The parents who have resisted children's vaccinations, are manipulated to feel responsible, in an individual and common guilt at the same time for the decision they have made. In despair, unable to revolt and being social sanctioned by the category of those who accepting any pharmaceutical product without an analysis, prior information, they are pushed to desperate actions, gregarious, abandoning a lucid way of action. They will accept the vaccination, which serves group interests, following the manipulation they have been subjected to. They became part of the flock, being easily controlled.

So, we witnessing in stimulating individual sense of guilt, fatality, helplessness. People who do not have the impulse to revolt, become a flock and are easy to control[7]. .

2.2.9. The people should not believe in existence of the official strategies and means of manipulation

In order to control the crowd and, implicitly, to govern it at will, information about the psychology of the individual and the crowd is used. By using exactly by these, those interested discredit these with the help of the media (which is on the first place in terms of state power), so that the people have doubts about the state manipulation strategies. Also these creates chaos to, by dedintegration of the order between the social relationships between the legal representatives of various professions and occupations.

Generally speaking, we are dealing with a giddy society in which everything is questioned. All of this is manifested on the background of a hate-borned conflict, in the sense that for each individual or common problem of the socio-professional segment to which each belongs, guilty is the other one. Also is with the socio-professional category to. There is an idea that every professional is unprepared in conform to the social expectations, he is immoral, so he is guilty of everything that is happening or maybe it possible to happen.

All this time, non-elites are in government and seized the highest dignitaries. They have affected the most deserving social status, which they occupy otherwise than on the meritocratic criterion. In the society where everyone doubts everything, the values are overturned and dictate the non-values, the whole society is based on hatred. This leads to the total imbalance of a society that is left to drift and functioned only out of inertia.

3.4. Conclusions

We see easily that the machiavellian principle of „divide et impera“[8] has been applied successfully in our society.

A party itself, as an organization, is part of a society. Speaking of multiparty system, we are talking about many parts. In the political fight for power, each of these parties positions themselves against the others. „ The fragmentation creates competition between powers and ends up creating a conflict …)".[9] The purpose of the struggle between political parties is to seizure of the power, but what is more important is that this goal is achieved by creating a general state of divergence. This is often reflected in the negative label and blames on every professional category.

Divergence is precisely the matrix on which social chaos is installed. It hosts conflicting relationships between populational age groups, or professional categories. This division of society between age groups or socio-professional categories served very well to the mass manipulation in order to monopolized power in the state. We can even say that this categorization, both mandatory and normal, was a matched like a glove in the power struggle: it was a gratis win, a step ticked without any special effort, because the base it already existed.

In conclusion, the effect of social chaos determined by representative democracy on socio-professional categories is based on hate, doubt and despair. We are talking about the leadership of a minority called the oligarchy, in parallel with the so-called leadership of the majority, of the people, called democracy, in which we find a multitude of power centers polyarchy and a diffuse responsibility, that is, the leadership and responsibility of anyone, what what is called anarchy.

This is how the tyranny of democracy shows: the effect and the cause of alike of the ungovernance of democratic regimes.

THE MAIN SOCIAL RISK FACTORS IN THE FEMININ DELINQUENT BEHAVIOR

Mirela Cristiana NILĂ STRATONE*

Abstract

The feminine criminality is a social phenomenon of defining importance in trying to draw the portrait of contemporary human society. What is the basic mechanism of this dimension of human behavior remains a continuing challenge for criminology researchers and beyond. The feminine offenses segment dresses a form of atypical aggressivity. This is the main reason who determine the identification, analization and explanation of the factors that influence and shapes the behavior of the woman, bringing it to the form of criminal behavior.

The contradiction between femininity and criminality is outlined as an intrigue of gender stereotypes, which the researcher can not bypass. That is why patterns, items, everything on the background of social change are considered. The social change comes, in turn, with challenges both from the domestic area and from the outside of the family.

In this paper we will review the main social nature factors that trigger the deviant behavior leading this to delinquency and even determining its identification with forms of delinquency. Women's evolution in time, in terms of age and social modernization, results in changes in the feminine attitude, the typical female actions, woman's personality as a mother, married couple, daughter, girlfriend, etc.

The purpose of this study is to present risk factors with criminogen potential on women's behavior in society.

Behavioral deviance, as a result of the multitude of bio-psychological, econ- omic, socio-cultural, political, natural factors, turns into violence, and violence tends to become an increasingly strong component of female temper. Last but not least, it is observed that the femininity itself, under the pressure of social factors, takes on new forms, dominated by aggressiveness.

Keywords: feminine criminality, gender stereotypes, criminogen potential, social risk factors, feminine behavior.

1. Introduction

In order to the prevent and combat the criminal phenomenon, it is necessary to identify, analyze and explain the factors that determine or facilitate the engagement in a deviant behavior.

„The research of the criminogenic factors is done from a etiological perspective - static - and from a dynamic point of view - the passing to the act.

From a dynamic point of view, the factors that lead to a crime are materialized at the level of human activity, in the act of will that stimulate the personality, the skills, the temperament, as well as the character (the ensemble of attributes that constantly manifests in the conduct of the individual) [1].“

The etiology of crime addresses the criminal phenomenon as a whole, individualises the factors that led to the commission of crimes and through a purely analytical methodology, offers the possibility of general knowledge of these criminogenic factors. In the genesis of crime, we distinguish the following types of factors:

- individual (biopsychological) - refers to the individual as a biopsychological unit;
- social - economic, cultural, political - refers to the individual's social environment;
- natural (physical) - cosmoteluric geographic - refers to the natural (physical) environment of the individual.

These factors do not act independently or according to a particular pattern depending on the type of offense, author, victim, etc.

The relationship between the different categories of factors and the preponderance of one or the other will vary from case to case, from individual to individual, giving the researcher the most complex combinations and effects.

We will focus in this article on the social factors of criminogenic risk, as a result of contemporary social changes.

2.1. The socio-economic evolution and its influence on crime

It is well known that the economic evolution and economic cycles have an effect both on crime, regarding its structure and volume, also on the functioning of the criminal system. The transformations from the structures of economies framework in the modern age have determined long-term events and processes such as urbanization, increased of state authority, etc.

[1] Roşca Al., 1995, Psihologie Generală, Ed. Didactică şi Pedagogică, Bucureşti, p. 504.

As far as socio-economic changes after the war are concerned, they have been at the basis of both the rise in living standards and the long-term negative effects such as the emergence of migration, the aggravated poverty under the old and new forms that led in our day to the impossibility of maintaining the subsistence level for as many families, managing to drastically "weaken" the average socio-economic category, another time a factor of stability.

The deepening of disparities between social categories led to the creation of a strong sense of estrangement and insecurity of individuals. An expanding political economy creates new jobs, confidence in individuals' own forces, as well as an increase in living standards.

Recession means among other things unemployment, falling living standards, tension by the social groups level. Lack of jobs is a determining factor of the increase of delinquency: people who do not work, having enough time and being at the limit of subsistence, benefiting of motivation, do not hesitate to break the law.

Factors of economic and social progress determine besides positive effects and negative effects. Among them, industrialization and urbanization have determinated to the creation of a strong status of anomie, which has inevitably led to deviant manifestations, disorientation at the individual level as well as to the deficiencies of social integration. All of this has been a ramp for the launch of many criminal careers.

2.2. The role of cultural diversity

Certain cultural factors have a predominant role in socializing individuals. The negative socialization through them determinated to deviant behaviors leading to increased crime.

The socialization is the main process by which individuals assimilate the norms, values, and behavioral rules specific to a particular social group to which they belong or represent the process of interiorizing the ethical-normative and cultural model in the consciousness and conduct of each member of a society.

2.2.1. The gender

Gender is the socializing factor that contributes decisively to the formation of normal, desirable behavior, which underpin at the gender problematize. There is a need for discussion about gender socialization in extenso, given that we are talking, throughout this paper, about women's aggressiveness, a feature somewhat borrowed from the masculine area. An mismatch of gender role with associated behavior leads, in particular, to gender research in female delinquency analysis.

The gender socialization, an integral part of the general socialization process, through which is internalizes and transmits gender norms, according to space-time, determines the issuance of positive or negative sanctions raported to the realization of conformity.

„The socialization, including gender, takes place in a set of situations that are related to each other (situations of moral socialization, cognitive learning, imagination, psychological communication, etc.), in which are built, shared, interiorized and are permanently transmitted the gender messages[2].“

The agents of socialization are divided into: direct - parents, or indirect - school, media, hobbies, etc. They have the highest weight in the differentiated socialization of girls / women and boys / men, a process that is achieved by specific methods and mechanisms. From the youngest ages, it make the differentiation is made by choosing certain toys for girls as compared with those for boys, specific feminine or masculine apparel, in order to continue in time, with the differentiated sex-based practice of extracurricular activities etc.

By identifying with direct socializers, children acquire behavioral affective models.

Gender messages transmitted through school textbooks also become indirect socialization sources, such thate, for example,the lack of strong and successful female models in the textbooks incites discreetly the model of the woman who just "do is" and the man who "do what[3]."

Gender socialization is a procesual phenomenon that carries its own mechanisms, generating the most prominent effects at the societal level. In conditions of stereotypy and beyond, it is a determining factor in gender discrimination and segregation. The identity appears to us as a reference system in the process of placing the individual in relation to himself and to others.

Self-esteem is the foundation for gender identity. Regarding the culture of domination, we can say that it attacks self-esteem, in favor of the power to dominate the other.

Through complex socialization processes and gender self-socialization, individuals acquire to himself (learn and interiorized himself) their gender identity (this concept was introduced by psychoanalyst Robert Stoller in 1964).

The gender identity is a social construction, an effect of gender socialization (Simone de Beauvoir: "We are not born, but become women").

Promoting stereotypes and gender prejudices, the gender socialization is closely linked to the phenomenon of self-creating prophecies.

Juliet Mitchell, in "Women. The Longest Revolution "(1966) addresses the socialization from the perspective of social structure, as one of the defining factors of the feminist movement.

Nancy Chodorow or Dorothy Dinnerstein believes that in most contemporary societies, the womens are the main socializers, and they put their mark on the personality of the child, depending by conformity at gender role.

Role designates the expectations of others as to how the individual fulfills himself his or not duties in relation to his or her status. Being the dynamic element of status, the role represents the standards accepted by a relative group to the behavior patterns, attitudes and values expected from individuals who occupy specific positions in these groups.

Social roles in general and gender roles in particular are modeled by and reflect the structural characteristics of society and culture. These widely shared expectations create social pressures so people feel the need to comply their.

The behaviors associated with female/male status are named by sociologist gender roles. Considering that in the stereotypical representations betwen man and woman the major difference lies in aggression, like forms and manifestations, within sociobiology it has been suggested the idea there is a genetic basis for specific behaviors of a sex role.

At the same time, the contribution of social and cultural factors in the differentiated man-woman behaviors was demonstrated. Therefore, the biologically difference of sex (anatomic, physiological, hormonal) in the plan of differences male-female is followed by difference of gender (the socio-cultural categorization of male and female, with all its representations).

"The sex-gender difference was theorized by the feminists of the second wave, the genre having the meaning of the difference built and interpreted socially and culturally between the two distinct social categories: men and women. These differences also have a normative character, in the sense that those who do not conformize to the gender role are seen as deviant from birth or socialized inadequate. So the sex operates with the biological distinction and the gender with the socio-cultural one[4]."

"The sense of self associated with the cultural definitions of masculinity and femininity, gender identity is especially a subjective experience, being the psychological interiorization of feminine / masculine traits and the result of a complex process of interaction between oneself and others[5]."

The conformism contained of traditional gender roles, beyond the advantages highlighted of functionalism, has negative effects on individuals.

Many research has shown, for example, that there is a greater number of depressions among female housewives than those who have a job, or the male mortality higer compare with than feminine, related of the social pressure specific to male public roles.

In sociology, gender roles have been approached from different perspectives:

- functionalist, with emphasis on the complementarity of gender roles (expressive vs. instrumental roles) so as to maintain the balance and stability of the social organism taked like totality;
- social - conflictualism, in the prolongation of Marxist theories, with emphasis on the conflict between roles and the importance of the economic factor in explaining gender inequalities;
- symbolic interactionism with an emphasis on microscopic aspects of gender roles analysis, on interactions between people trough which it is negotiated and created the reality;
- feminist, within which: (1) gender plays a central role; (2) gender relations are considered problematic, being linked to inequality, contradiction and constraint; (3) gender relations are neither natural not to unchanged, but are produced of the socio-cultural and historical factors. Of course,also within the feminist theories, we can distinguish liberal, socialist, marxist, radical, multicultural variants, approaching the theme of gender roles.

Gender stereotypes present themselves as organized systems of beliefs and consensual opinions, directly related to the characteristics of women and men and alike with the stereotypical qualities of masculinity and femininity.

Male/female physical and mental characteristics associated with social actors are both descriptive in the sense that they show how women and men are in reality, but also prescriptive, promoting the ideal models to which male/female behavior relates.

Gender stereotypes are part of a system of values and attitudes about gender. This system is based on social expectations regarding attitudes to gender roles, their violations, also the gender identity.

The transmission of socio-cultural expectations depends on the interrelation in which been the direct and indirect socializers: parents, extended family where appropriate, media, school, entourage, etc.

Sandra Bem (1993), considers that gender is the factor that determines during childhood the formation of an opticaly in terms of observing, interpreting and acquiring the behavior of the close ones, a stage who preceding another, namely the elaboration of its own "gender scheme" means of the own value system to which the vision of women, men, girls, boys is to be reported.

The dissimilarity between the sex role and the gender role leads to the idea of homosexual behavior, both in the case for men and for women.

The analysis of status and power concepts inevitably implies the analysis of gender stereotypes: from those who occupy higher positions in the social hierarchy expect specific male features, while from those with a lower status are believed to have female stereotype features. Those who do not conform to the gender roles of stereotypes expected from their sex are socially punished in various forms.

2.2.2. The etiological role of the family

Another social factor in the study of the etiology of delinquency is the family, involved in the majority proportion in the socialization process, which imparts to the child the value standard, as well as educating in the sense of acceptance or rejection of social values.

The delinquent behavior of the child has been studied among others of the point of view in terms of the relationship between the family atmosphere and delinquency. Thus, it was concluded that lack of affection, default couple relationship, inadequate supervision from parental part, lack of interest in the problems faced by the child, mother's inability to cope with conflicts, father's deviant behavior – alcohol, lacking at home, beatings, attending dubious entourage, spouse abuse - domestic violence in a word, are elements that can explain the delinquent behavior to a large extent.

Nowadays, the socialization process tends to be realized less and less in the family, thanks to stand a longer time in school, friendship, extra-curricular activities. Even the time spent by the child inside the home is captured by a computer, television or other media influences that transmit information that can lead in many cases to adopting a deviant behavior.

We are witnessing a certain independence of the child from the family, which means that socialization takes place outside of it, where the lack of parental control leads to choices not in accordance with norms and values accepted by society, finalizing themselves by committing deviant acts, which leads inevitably to the rise of criminality.

In the family where the mother executes a custodial punishment, family relationships have special features, being influenced among others also by the attitude of the condemned.

2.2.3. The domestic violence, a criminogenic factor

Domestic violence ("spouse abuse"), which is a topic of import in the social sciences landscape of ours from us, is an undeniable cause of the increase in the criminality rate.

The communist man was considered a spotless individual, totally devoted to the respective political ideology. This ideological creation of power does not allow to real individuals to existing in the attention of state policy.

The non-fulfillments felt by the individual in the plan of social life sprang into the one of his private life. The victim from work place, from society, became the executioner of the weaker than him. The adultery, beating, rape of the partner were practices that, through the frequency with which they were taking place in the private life sphere, had the aura of normality in the eyes of most individuals.

Domestic violence is now considered a form of social illness that affects the physical and mental resources of communities.

Variants of the solutions adopted by women victims are: remaining in a situation, divorce or separation, death or transformation of the woman into an aggressor, through a mimicry with a survival role in relation to her executioner. In the case of adopting the first option, everything stays behind closed doors, in the privacy of the home without any intervention from outside. Women who align with this behavior versus their own drama are the unseen side of domestic violence, which is, unfortunately, much higher than the one seen. In the case of the woman has the moral necessary force to take an attitude before chronicization her relationship with her partner, she will appeal to separation, following the divorce action. A third situation in which the woman victim of domestic violence can be, is the death of her. In Romania there is very little statistical data on the death of the woman victim of domestic violence. In order to get out of the crisis situation, there is a fourth possibility when the woman victim of domestic violence interrupts the violent manifestations on herself by taking over the aggressive behavior, as a response to the violence being suffered.

By adopting this solution to end the crisis, the victim woman turns into aggressor, to the adress to the life partner, child, or society.

The infractions committed by the women who have become aggressors range from low-risk of periculozity offenses, to the most atrocious crimes. Everything is done in correlation with all the other factors who determined the increase of the criminality rate.

2.2.4. Educational institutionalized environment – school

The excessive schooling leads to a drastic reduction of a time spent in family. This is the reason why the socialization is it realizing increasingly being done by school institutions.

The school is trying to recover what has not been realized in the family, especially since it also benefits by advantages like from the pursuit of behaviors and, as such, the identification of the deviance and their controlling. By order and discipline, by monitoring behavior, even "repairing" family failures in regarding of the education of minors is attempted.

The lack of family discipline, poor schoolling results, the school dropout, are present elements at the future sociopaths. In this regard, there is a growing problem for creating programs that would replace these shortcomings within the school with positive elements, with a preventive role.

2.2.5. The membership groups

The entourage, or the social environment of the individual, presents a particularly important contribution in it's socializing , whether positive or negative.

„S. and E. Glueck have reported that more than 98% of the 500 offenders observed had largely delinquent friends while the other delinquents, less than 8% had delinquent friends[6].“

In the entourage, the delinquent behavior is learned, the individual being attracted by the encouragements of the group on the one hand, and on the other, it comes into play the fact that the expected rewards, cover and exceed as a value the punishments and sanctions afferent to these behaviors.

There are distinct social groups that have a deviant tendency (marginal groups) generated by a particular subculture. The most dangerous group in this respect is the group of detainees, who being characterized by the penitentiary subculture and dominated by the phenomenon of prison, will predominantly lead to a future relapse.

Apart from the family, the main source of learning about deviance is entourage.

Of great importance in terms of entourage is the fact that in each group who present deviance there is often a leader who knows how to behave in such a way as to shelter themselves from the rigors of the law by directing the weakest and believers in actions that run counter to moral norms, after then benefit more than they, of the illicit value. That is why it is imperative necessary that the family, if not these, the school, or other social control factor, act for the detection, tracing and deactivation of such groups, in order to save the exploited (see live meat traffic).

2.2.6. Mass media - methods of learning antisocial behavior

Since the media is the main means of informing today, it transmits in many cases unselected information which, for some sectors of the population, is a negative factor influencing delinquent behavior.

To increase ratings and for commercial purposes, some information is overstated or are presented as the most shocking, and during this it is intended to create panic.

By revealing to the public the plans and the activity of certain courts and a factors of social controlling, the unfolding of the activity of discovering and catching the offenders is aggravated, and more than that, the media contribute to the learning of deviant behavior style, by young people.

It should be noted that it is generally taken into account that the most shock the banal reasons for the crime, because at these have access the vast majority of individuals.

Media, and especially television, are undoubtedly contributing to the rise of criminality by:

- learning the aggressive style of conduct;
- reducing inhibitions related to aggression;
- insensibilization and habituation to violence;
- shaping the image of reality that people base their actions on.

The written press, covering a large segment of information, pursues the same economic goals and often promotes the triviality and describes the shocking situations to the limit of the unreal. Is arriving even to the distortion of information, without taking into account that this is how a segment of the population is borning which creates its selves an unreal world, driven by violence, with unpredictable consequences.

2.2.7. The religious factor between prevention and influence

Religion is a particularly powerful social factor, having on the one hand the power to prevent deviant acts and, implicitly, criminality, as well as leadership power, on the other, of the deviance manifestation.

First of all, it should be made clear that religion has an important role to play in combating criminality. Christians believe that the only cause of evil is removal from God, so committing a crime means a man without holy faith.

Religion has been a social control tool over the centuries. Her power have oscillated over time, becoming a marginalized reality in the socialist order. But man's faith in God to being innate, the Christians continued to live around the Church, so religion retained its gregarious force.

Since ancient times, the religion has been used as a tool of interest groups to seizure the political and economic power. Through her, the riots have started, through her perspective, was signed treaties of world importance and vital[7].

In church, the religion is a tool to combat delinquency, in social life it is a ready instrument at any time to initiate a mass movement, fact which may involve delinquent actions.

2.2.8. Discrimination of class, racial and ethnic - criminogenic factor

The offenders belonging to the inferior social class, commit criminal offence that can be discovered in much higher proportion than those belonging to the immediate superior classes and controlled more precisely by the competent organs. The economic factor, which causes material inequalities, creates the ground for deviant manifestations for obtaining illicit income.

The criminalty shows up different and depending also by race or ethnicity.

The mankind present varieties with distinct particular characters, or ethnic differentiations, which they call race.

In our country, the statistics show an increased criminality rate among romanian nationality women, compared to those of rroma nationality. This is a situation by the level of discovered criminality, the real criminality highlighting the very high criminality rate among rroma women.

In the US, the blacks present the highest rate of criminality.

The blacks represent almost one-eighth of the population, but in 1980 they accounted for half of those arrested for murder, rape, robbery, and between a quarter and a third of those arrested for burglary, theft, car theft and aggression.

2.2.9. Criminal-related factors that perpetuate murder - alcohol and drugs

Consumption of alcohol is no longer a privilege of men. Nowadays, as many women use alcohol, for various reasons. The stress is the one of the reasons why the woman is appeal to alcohol, unrealizing the dependence that is being installed as well as the loss of control.

Between alcohol consumption and delinquent behavior there is a close link that bears the name of violence.

First of all, we can talk about traffic accidents, committed as effect of alcohol consumption, as culpable offenses. Also in the case of accidents, we can also mention work accidents caused by alcohol consumption, due to diminishing attention, slowing of reflexes, etc., accidents that most of the times had the most serious consequences. Leading by pronounced excitability and impulsive manifestations, incomplete drunkenness is the cause of crimes committed by violence: robbery, bodily harm, death-blow, sexual orgies in the group, who sometimes ending tragically.

Another factor related to violence is drug use. In some cases, alcohol precedes drug use, which leads to criminal acts. In other cases, criminal behavior precedes the drug use.

The drug consumption is considered a phenomenon that has grown even in our country.

Among women, there are occasional consumers who are not realized the danger at drug addiction, but also permanent consumers, some of which women do not accept treatments and helpness for give up consumption, and others who have understand the shortcomings caused and struggle to save themselves.

On the other hand, another problem faced by society is that not all drug users are known and as such remain a series of unknown traffickers, which causes an alarming rise in criminality. [8]

The cases in which the pimp networks do not deal with drug trafficking are scarce.

More and more women are recruited to work around traffickers, arriving themselves to directly involved, even to initiating and leading certain transactions. Under these circumstances, some of the women involved become victims, others are abusing by dependent persons, through blackmail or other means.

The human beings trafficking is another criminogenic factor that has taken a great amplitude in our country. In this phenomenon the women appear both as victims and authors. Whether they become drug addicts consumption, whether they are caught and condemned for drug trafficking, or human beings trafficking, they are all victims in the end.

2.2. Political influences on criminality rate

Since political factors governing the social life, they determine the rate of criminality to rise during times of crisis. In such situations, due to the increase in the unemployment rate, for economic reasons, the material shortcomings appear, which inevitably lead to criminal acts.

At the family level, there appear unfavorable changes to the functioning of this group at optimal parameters, conditions when the juvenile delinquency is in tendence of increasing.

In situations of struggle for the seizure of political power, as well as for transition, there are manifesting states of social anomy. They provide favorable conditions for criminal behavior, both at middle social class level (theft, robbery, deception, etc.), as well as at high social classes level (intellectual crimes, war crimes, state blows, etc.).

Although the aggression has been presented above as a psychic factor, it has to be said that this is also a cultural product.

Within a society, the subcultures of different social groups promote values that can lead to antagonisms, contributing to the development of different forms of aggression, which in their turn are the preconditions for deviant acts.

This is how the theory of political violence, which includes the theory of intrapersonal relative deprivation and the theory of interpersonal relatives deprivation, is born.

The relative deprivation consists principally in injustice, dissatisfaction and frustration, all depending on social comparisons that the individual, revolted, makes them out of positions considered inferior.

As far as intrapersonal relative deprivation is concerned, we are dealing with status frustrations that lead to disintegration of status, that is, the inability to occupy a previous status considered superior to the present, as well as an anomie in the sphere of personal psychic life. The relative interpersonal deprivation refers to the individual's desire to acceded a superior status, this being in the hierarchy of another social group different from the individual concerned.

As a political factor, it can be said that the aggressiveness, the element underlying the reporting of violent manifestations to different cultures, led to the emergence of the theory of political violence.

3. Conclusions

The social evolution does not give any sign of rest in terms of the need and the desire to quickly solve the problems in everyday life. The women are in a position to solve social and individual problems without benefiting often from help of the family, partner, friends, and of course society part. For some women, the solving of problems or the fulfilling of personal desires is limited to illicit methods. Conscious or not aware of the crimes they appeal to, they change the ratio of forces between feminine and male criminality, contributing to the formation of a social matrix dominated by delinquency. Gradually, this female delinquency will fit into the normal social future.

HORROR VACUI: THE MEANING CRISIS OF THE GLOBALIZED WORLD (THE CASE OF THE EUROPEAN UNION). A JUNGIAN APPROACH

Mihai NOVAC[*]

Abstract

In its widest acceptation, globalization amounts to a progressive 'interdependentization' of the various areas, levels and regions of human civilization. On account of globalization we are much more prone to becoming one, i.e. Humanity, than in the previous epochs. But what does this mean or, in other words, what is the envisioned shape of this One humanity is heading toward in the context of globalization? Is there in fact any meaning to it?

On closer examination, we might find that the issue of meaning was not very much addressed in the discussions concerning globalization; certainly, it is not a major issue on the agenda of the institutions impactful upon this process. If it did make the object of someone's preoccupations, it was rather only of certain fringe thinkers, political and economic authorities tended to ignore, given that there were always more immediate and practical concerns at hand.

However, an unasked question provides no answers and the lack of answers in this respect is very dangerous as it involves the risk of creating, willingly or not, a world without meaning. Socio-cultural arguments in this respect are there to be found by anyone willing to throw an unbiased look at our post-modern history: the industrial and technical revolutions went hand in hand with an over-instrumentalization of our Weltanschauung that, along with its obvious positive consequences, brought along homogenization, massification and alienation, in other words, lack of meaning. The European Union, for example, has just started facing the practical consequences of ignoring this apparently purely theoretical problem: its current legitimacy crisis, in favor of its more traditional state-nationalist counterparts, can be taken as a symptom thereof.

This paper is, first, an attempt at asking the question of meaning in the context of globalization and, second, to provide it with an answer (mostly, but not exclusively, on the basis of Jung's analytical psychology). The answer might prove unsatisfactory but, on the other hand, as probably with most meaningful issues, the question itself is much more essential than the answer.

1. Preamble: Meaning, a short characterization

What is meaning? This is an important question, one to which however I will not try to provide an exhaustive answer in what follows. On the other hand, given that, one way or another, this notion also constitutes the vanishing point of our discussion, an operative characterization could not be superfluous.

In this respect, I have found the etymology of the term especially clarifying. As such, in the etymological regression, the first important semantic node is the Latin term sensus – i. perception, sentiment, intention, most probably figurate connotations of a proper acceptation referring to ii. finding one's way, or heading to(ward). Further back, the next semantic node (and also the original one, as far as I know) is the one associated with the Indo-European particle – sent, meaning, again, on the one hand, going/heading to(ward), on the other, feeling, in both affective-emotional sense and perceptual (i.e. observing, contemplating). We can find a related etymology in the Germanic languages in association with the verb sinnan – going, heading to(ward), yearning for, bearing in mind, perceiving[1].

A short hermeneutical analysis of this etymological context discloses, as essential elements, a semantic subject which is rather active (i.e. a someone, properly or figuratively heading toward…) and a semantic object, which can be either passive (by repulsion) or active (by attraction), placed in a vectorial relation. As known, Brentano and Husserl refer to such matters by the notion of intentionality, designating that special quality of conscious acts (either personal or collective) by which they are always of someone – somehow – about something: the tripartite structure ego (self-awareness) – noesa (the aiming manner specific to the given experiential act, i.e. recollection, imagination, sensory perception etc.) – noema (the intentional object of the experiential act). Furthermore, in Brentano and, especially, Husserl, we find the anti-positivistic claim that there is no such thing as a purely empirical perceptual act, namely that any sensory matter (hyle), in order to become perception, necessarily involves the subject and his/her understanding of the world as a whole, his/her Weltanschauung, if you will. In this context, I have chosen to characterize the notion of meaning as the personal or collective representations involved in this quasi-systematic whole of someone's self-understanding against the backdrop of his/her world of belonging (both culturally and existentially), and having a descriptive, explicative and teleological role within the intentional flux of his/her consciousness and interaction with both world and fellows.

In the same sense, more pragmatically put however, Zaki Laïdi claims that the notion of meaning necessarily implies the convergence of three aspects: a ground, a feeling of unity and a final purpose, at the same time stating that, in terms of this definition, in the post- Cold War era, we cannot speak of a meaning of the international relations, given that, to paraphrase, the political actions of Europe do not aim at a systematic construction based on a futurally oriented projection, but strictly on a pragmatic administration of current, ordinary problems and needs. And he goes on by saying: "the need to project ourselves into the future has never been so strong, while we have never been so poorly armed on the conceptual front to conceive this future, which leaves a wide gap between the historic rupture that confronts us and our difficulty in interpreting it[2]."

What Laïdi claims here is, in fact, something that Nietzsche had anticipated more than a century ago, namely that, beyond purely economic and political considerations, most of the current problems of Europe (and especially EU) derive from the fact that it does not have the necessary culture for the envisioned unity. This because, firstly, cultural aspects have been mostly disregarded in favor of more pragmatic and immediate issues, secondly, because, as much as they have been considered, they have been conceived and developed by analogy with the cultural models already used in the historic construction of the national state. However, it is not yet the time to go further with this discussion.

2. Globalization and EU – socio-cultural background

I think it would not be far-fetched to say that the notion of globalization, in its widest sense, basically refers to the progressive increase in the degree of interdependence between the various international actors on a global scale: states, international organizations, corporations, ethnic, cultural, religious groups etc.. Edward Lorenz's Butterfly Effect begins to have a noticeable impact on the globalized international relations, fact which became even more apparent after the end of the Cold War. For the better or worse, as the newly-arrived states that emerged on the global scene in the context of either the world wars or decolonization, set about on the path to modernization, they got ever more drawn within the global market economy. As such, after the collapse of the Soviet Union and the communist block the possibility of opting out of this global market faded gradually. This is what Francis Fukuyama referred to, back in 1989, as the end of history (understood, in a Hegelian tradition, as the temporal evolution of civilization determined by the tension between opposed socio-cultural systems). The IT and media revolutions, especially the Internet, obviously accelerated this process.

But what does this ever increasing global interdependence mean? Some voices disapprove of this process on the grounds that it would allegedly bring about an Americanization of the world, as such seeing in it a dissimulated form of cultural materialism made over through the rhetoric of the freedom as choice and of choice as acquisitive option. Other voices ask to what extent the globalized cultural products still reflect the content of their original culture, in other words, to what extent McDonalds, for example, can still be taken as a mere American exported phenomenon, and not as a product of globalization as such? These latter voices associate globalization with a new form of social existence of humanity as a whole, allegedly unseen before the 20th century: mass society, i.e. a society in which, under the impact of planetary demographic outburst (gregarization) and of the universalization of flow production, which is, by nature, instrumental and all-pervasive, everything and everyone became so standardized and uniform that they lost any aspect of individual specificity, as such being dissolved within an undifferentiated mass. Among those sharing this concern for the future of humanity is also Martin Heidegger. He writes in this respect:

"The world wars and their character of "totality" are already a consequence of the abandonment of Being. They press toward a guarantee of the stability of a constant form of using things up. Man, who no longer conceals his character of being the most important raw material, is also drawn into this process. Man is the most important raw material because he remains the subject of all consumption. He does this in such a way that he lets his will be unconditionally equated with this process, and thus at the same time become the object of the abandonment of Being[3]."

On the other hand, the West became, during this process, much more permeable and vulnerable to what happens in the non-Western world, as the recent phenomena related to massive migration or, worse, terrorism show.

All these aspects were, I think, well captured by Marshall McLuhan's metaphor of the Global Village (1968), the conclusion of the book being even more appropriate for our times. To sum it up: in the age of globalization we cannot speak any more of problems of one isolated nation, alliance or political entity; to an ever greater extent, the problems 'in the world' became problems 'of the world' as a whole, and failing to undertake coordinated collective steps in addressing these issues might run the risk of global annihilation.

The European Union constituted, at least for the Western World, one of the most serious attempts at mobilizing and articulating such a collective effort. In this respect, what during the Cold War emerged under the more or less official auspices of the U.S. as a collective attempt at (i) rebuilding Europe after the devastation of the Second World War and (ii) creating and strengthening an an-Bolshevik bastion within Western Europe, became afterwards an economic, political and, to a certain degree, cultural project for peace, assuming, at least apparently, growing autonomy with respect to the U.S.. Although our discussion will follow a different path, a short listing of the important moments in the history of this institution couldn't hurt:

- 1951 the Treaty of Paris: the creation of the European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC)
- 157 the Treaty of Rome: the creation of European Economic Community (TEEC)
- 1967 the merger of the European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC), European Atomic Energy Community (Euratom) and the European Economic Community (EEC)
- 1973 Denmark, Ireland and U.K. join the Community
- 1979 the first elections for the European Parliament
- 1986 the Single European Act; the joining of Spain and Portugal; the adoption of the European Flag
- 1989 the fall of the Iron Curtain
- 1992 the Treaty of Maastricht and the transformation of the European Community in the European Union – the introduction of the Euro as single currency within the EU market (except for the U.K. and Denmark)
- 1995 the joining of Austria, Finland and Sweden
- 2004 the joining of ten more states: Cyprus, Lithuania, the Czech Republic, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Malta, Poland, the Slovak Republic, Slovenia); the signing of the E.U. Constitution
- 2007 the joining of Bulgaria and Romania
- 2009 the Lisbon Treaty: the merger of the three original pillars of the Union
- 2013 Croatia joins the EU
- 2016 U.K decides by referendum to exit the E.U

Basically, the concept around which the unification strategy has revolved all this time was, at least declaratively, the so called integration. Ernst B. Haas describes it as such: "(…)actors in several distinct national settings are persuaded to shift their loyalties, expectations and political activities toward a new centre, whose institutions possess or demand jurisdiction over the pre-existing nation states."[4] This is a summative example of the functionalist approach that dominated the EU integration process all this time, that is of an approach insisting on how of the integration, rather than on its what or whereto (and that, at least in my opinion, given the enormous challenge presented by, on the one hand, Europe's cultural diversity, on the other, the traditional internal sovereignity claim upon which almost none of the European national states seemed willing to make compromises and this, quite understandably, because their peoples wouldn't have it). In other words, without a reasonably clear answer regarding the cultural identity of Europe, which had to be (i) general enough to include all those willing and able to participate in this project, but, at the same time, (ii) specific enough to exclude those unwilling or inadequate in this respect and, moreover, (iii) elastic enough, on the one hand, (iii.1) not to fundamentally threaten the members' sovereignity, (iii.2) not to definitively exclude those who, although not yet a part of this project, would show willing, in principle, to take the necessary steps in this respect, both the initiators and the continuers of this unification project preferred to indefinitely delay addressing this issue, focusing rather on instrumental, more easily solvable, economic and legal aspects. The hope was that, as long as these latter issues would be sufficiently well addressed, the cultural and identity issues would go away by themselves. Stephan Elbe's conclusion seems to be heading the same way:

"After all, the founding fathers of the European project had deliberately avoided an overtly revolutionary process of European federalism, opting instead for a strategy that would achieve unification of Europe more gradually. By focusing on piecemeal and sectoral integration it was hoped that cooperation between states was more likely to ensue in the long run, and that such cooperation could, in turn, breed a habit of further cooperation which would induce ever greater steps towards integration. Eventually loyalties would begin to shift from nation-states to supranational institutions. In this way the functionalist mode of integration might over time culminate in a federal Europe. The founding fathers had thus adopted a policy that did not cast the European question in spiritual or philosophical terms, deliberately refusing to deploy new ascetic ideals. Instead it placed economics before politics, making the latter a function of the former, and relied on the logic of the market to drive forward the political project of Europe[5]."

Although maybe a little exaggerated, one cannot deny the fact that the view criticized by Elbe in the previous statement is one of the most influential within the decision making process of EU integration. A formal Europe, understood as a techno-bureaucratic community and led mostly by the market logic constituted, for many Europhiles, an important reference system. Another critical voice asks in this respect:

"How can one possibly ask millions of citizens to think in European terms, to give up the usual national state framework and to adopt a new entity with a symbolic value reduced to rules, regulations and quotas[6]?"

Given that culture is one of the fundamentally defining aspects of a human community and that, consequently, the legitimacy of the political structures of any given community depends upon it, it is very likely that its neglect bring, sooner or later, a legitimacy crisis. And in my opinion, this is precisely what the European Union goes through presently: from the problems in Greece to the ones stemming from the massive immigration wave, the Brexit and so on.

As stated earlier, my basic claim is that all these problems derive from the way the European Union addressed (or rather failed to address) the cultural dimension of the integration process: the latter was, on the one hand, treated as a secondary issue, on the other, to the extent that it was taken into account, it was conceived by analogy to the way it was used during the process of edification of the national state. And I think this would not be the best model in such an endeavor. The motives would be the following:

I. The construction of the national state sought to create a unitary and centralized political entity (i.e. with legitimate monopole over the collective violence) and not a federative or even confederative political entity, based on the free adhesion of its members.
II. The linguistic ties: the national state was, in most cases, more or less coercively coagulated around a language (that got to become) common and specific to a certain people, thing to which the EU could not have access for obvious reasons.
III. The religious ties: religion constituted a very important cohesive factor in the edification of the national states, thing to which the EU, as secular and secularizing institution, was again denied access.
IV. The warlike tradition of the European states: war constituted one of the most important factors involved in the construction of the European national states, aspect to which a peaceful political project, as the EU always claimed to be, could not and would not resort.
V. The kind of unity aimed at: unity by (usually coercive) homogenization in the case of the national state vs. unity by diversity in the case of the EU.

The technological revolutions took all these aspects to their climax. A good analysis of the impact of the impact of the industrial revolutions upon the edification of the modern national state is provided by the Dutch historian Peter Rietbergen:

"Due to the demands of the mechanization of industry, the nineteenth century brought an increasingly far-reaching division of labour; this contributed to the genesis of many parallel, but by and large separate sociocultural networks and thus ultimately furthered the advancing process of individualization. At the same time, standardization led to both the expansion and the internationalization of production. The consumer culture that developed increasingly crossed the borders of states, nations and their traditions, creating a first phase of 'globalization'.

However contradictory it may seem, the national state yet proved itself, even increasingly so, the most adequate framework for all these progressive developments. Nationalism was—and perhaps is—both a component of and a reaction to the 'processes of modernization' which the economic and political revolutions expressed, processes which should more appropriately be called 'processes of change', since both 'modernization' and 'progress' are to a large extent immeasurable phenomena, mainly moral and, thus, subjective categories.

On the one hand, old certainties were lost, on the other, a strong state was clearly an advantage in growing international competition. Hence, from the late eighteenth century onwards, cultural notions were increasingly linked with politics in an attempt to achieve a sense of identity and thus of unity that, soon, acquired rather extreme dimensions.

Nationalism became an ideological instrument used not only to reconcile the disparate and often conflicting sociocultural elements and regional identities that made up the European states but also to buttress these states' expansionist politics[7]"

In other words, the culture of the national state was, at least since the 19th century, politicized to the extreme, becoming more of an ideological weapon of the nationalist expansionism than a mere systematic expression of a Weltanschauung. As such, it could not have provided an adequate reference system for a seemingly peaceful and integrative political project as the EU. But is something like this possible? I think the answer is 'yes' and that one solution might come from a rather surprising direction: Carl Gustav Jung's analytical psychology. Obviously, this is the subject of the next section.

Consequently, I think that in order to overcome its present legitimacy crisis, the European Union must (i) start taking the cultural dimension of integration more seriously and (ii) seek to avoid, in this respect, the cultural models developed during the historical creation of the national state.

3. Carl Gustav Jung's analytical psychology

The most famous notion related to Jung's name is the collective unconscious. The following passage clearly states Jung's basic thesis and concepts in this respect:

"My thesis, then, is as follows: In addition to our immediate consciousness, which is of a thoroughly personal nature and which we believe to be the only empirical psyche (even if we tack on the personal unconscious as an appendix), there exists a second psychic system of a collective, universal, and impersonal nature which is identical in all individuals. This collective unconscious does not develop individually but is inherited. It consists of pre-existent forms, the archetypes, which can only become conscious secondarily and which give definite form to certain psychic contents[8]."

In analyzing and interpreting Jung's thought I have found it useful to distinguish between entitative and functional concepts. Basically, the entitative concepts stand for psychic entities with a distinct and discernable structure, i.e. for some sort of psychic organs, as Jung seems to understand them: Self, ego, archetype, shadow, anima/animus, complex etc[9].. The functional ones, on the other hand, stand for the processes taking place within and among these psychic entities, processes whose specific character and evolution obviously derive from the structure and the state of the aforementioned entities: individuation, symbolization, dream, projection, introjection, repression, actualization, relativization, synthesis. In principle, the functional concepts are supervenient on the entitative ones.

I will start by following James A. Hall[10] in distinguishing between the four levels of the Psyche (at least according to Jungian analytic psychology):

1. The personal self-awareness, in other words our daily self-aware minds, namely our reflexive-apperceptive capacity for consciously following with a sense of personal identity everything happening within our experience (be it internal or external). The history of this concept is so vast that any attempt in summing it up in these few pages would be destined to fail. As such, in attempting to offer, at least, an essential glimpse of the matter, I will just mention here Kant's perspective that places intelligence at the basis of self-awareness, that is our capacity for spontaneously generating a representation of our own existence, i.e. of the fact that I am (not necessarily also of how I am, this latter aspect having more to do with self-knowledge than with pure self-awareness):

"The I think expresses the act of determining m y existence. The existence is thereby already given, but the way in which I am to determine it, i.e., the manifold that I am to posit in myself as belonging to it, is not yet thereby given. For that self-intuition is required, which is grounded in an a priori given form, i.e., time, which is sensible and belongs to the receptivity of the determinable.

Now I do not have yet another self-intuition, which would give the determining in me, of the spontaneity of which alone I am conscious, even before the act of determination, in the same way as time gives that which is to be determined, thus I cannot determine my existence as that of a self-active being, rather I merely represent the spontaneity of my thought, i.e., of the determining, and my existence always remains only sensibly determinable, i.e., determinable as the existence of an appearance. Yet this spontaneity is the reason I call myself an intelligence[11]."

2. The personal unconsciousness has to do with everything that is unawarely unique to person's Psyche[12]. In other words the personal unconsciousness contains everything related to a person's psychic existence that does not involve his/her sense of a biographic identity; and I think the latter aspect should be stressed because, despite their name, the unconscious phenomena do not lack the aforementioned Kantian self-consciousness as intelligence (i.e. one's capacity for spontaneously generating a representation of oneself as existing), but only the biographic material within which this is usually embedded in our daily lives. Dreams, for example, always suppose an oneiric self that perceives and interacts with the oneiric material. As such, the dream is also always someone's, i.e. mine – in a more general sense, this could also be taken as another proof (maybe from an unexpected direction) in favor of the Kantian thesis according to which the original-synthetic apperception constitutes the sine qua non precondition of any conceivable experience, be it exterior or interior[13].

Freud has described the personal unconsciousness as that part of the psyche reserved for the complexes generated by the repression of the primary libidinal drives, a process that, according to him, accompanies the entire ontogenesis of the individual. Strictly with respect to the personal unconsciousness Jung , actually, does not have much to object or add to Freud's view: this is, according to both, the field of those drives which are denied, for certain reasons, direct access to the conscious reality, as such remaining confined to this obscure realm out of which they constantly seek an escape to the conscious world in a disguised, dissimulated form.

3. The collective consciousness has to do with the official cultural world, what in the German Romanticism was called Zeit-/Volksgeist (the Spirit of the Age/Community): the norms, symbols, values, myths, practices by which a given human community explicitly functions (they make the object of education and intermediate both the intra- and inter-communitary relations). We will come back to discussing the collective consciousness after clarifying the basic aspects of the collective unconsciousness. I have preferred this order because, fog Jung and the Jungians, in principle, everything included in the former is based, in one way or another, on the tacit infrastructure of the latter: "Archetypal forms that are enshrined cultural institutions become the tacit furniture of the collective conscious mind."[14]
4. The collective unconsciousness or the objective Psyche, as Jung sometimes cals it, is by far the oldest stratum of the human psyche, unspecifically belonging to each individual by heredity. On the backdrop of the collective unconsciousness, the phylogeny irrupts into the ontogenesis, i.e. the psychic development of a person follows certain trans-individual archaic patterns emerged in the course of the phylogenetic evolution. Jung inferred the existence of this stratum of the psyche by constantly noticing, in his clinical practice, the fact that some events and processes on the level of the individual unconsciousness reproduce certain absolute models absolutely independently of the biography of the respective individual, therefore that could not be explained in terms of the Freudian Id-ego-Superego dialectics and that, all the more, appeared, actually, to make it possible.

In Jung's thought, the collective unconscious or the Self (Selbst) has, basically, three hypostases with respect to the psyche:

I. It is the psyche as a whole, i.e. as a specific and autonomous ontological realm of the human Spirit;
II. The central archetype, that is the supreme regulative authority within the hierarchy of the psychic structures;
III. The main reference system of the individual psychological becoming.

In other words, the Self constitutes, concomitantly, the psychic substance into which the ego is immersed, its origin and the model of personality which it[15], as the center of the conscious existence, attempts, voluntarily or not, to overtake and emulate.

As noticed, the constitutive substructures of the collective unconscious are the so called archetypes. Their existence is always felt but never fully perceived. In fact, according to Jung, they cannot be explicitly and directly observed, but only postulated, i.e. necessarily guessed if you will on the basis of their influence upon the perceivable contents of the psyche (complexes, archetypal images etc.).[16] As such, we could say that the archetype corresponds rather to the recurring tendency of structuring certain types of images in determined ways, than to a specific concrete psychic image. For those familiar with Kant, we could say that the archetypes fulfill the same role that in the Critique of the Pure Reason was ascribed to the pure concepts of the understanding (i.e. the categories) and of reason (i.e. the Ideas), the existence of which could not be directly shown on the empirical level, but only transcendentaly deduced or postulated, that is presupposed with necessity by the sine qua non preconditions of an experience such as ours. In fact, Jung himself promotes at times such an interpretation:

"One could also describe these forms as categories analogous to the logical categories which are always and everywhere present as the basic postulates of reason. Only, in the case of our 'forms' we are not dealing with categories of reason but categories of the imagination. The original structural omponents of the psyche are of no less surprising a uniformity than are those of the body. The archetypes are, so to speak, organs of the prerational psyche. They are eternally inherited forms and ideas which have no specific content. Their specific content only appears in the course of the individual's life, when personal experience is taken up in precisely these forms[17]."

Unlike the categories however, which are essentially neutral and impersonal, the archetypes are more personally, mundanely and pragmatically oriented, i.e. the presuppose and open up a world (as a system of meanings and practices), at the same time anticipating concrete human ways of being within it (in other words, roles): maternal/paternal, sexual, educative, aggressive, creative, cynegetic etc..

As such, the primary conditioning by the archetype of the personal experience goes along with a secondary and opposed conditioning, i.e. by the particular psychological event of the archetype. Jung's explanation would be the following: the archetype is actually only a necessary latency (in the form if → then), a formal receptacle that in order to actualize itself must be filled with the psychic matter of the personal experience – when the corresponding individual psychological event arises, it triggers the archetype and the correlative psychic process. Consequently, the ego, as the center of the individual consciousness, displays a constant tendency towards some sort of metonymic abuse, that is of taking over and substituting the whole, i.e. the Self along with the entire archetypal system, due to the fact that it (the ego) is the one that provides (and experiences) the triggering events of the unconscious process. This accounts for our growing tendency, both individual and collective, of automatically taking everything happening within the psyche as of a personal and conscious nature. However, we must always bear in mind that despite this secondary conditioning of the collective unconscious by the personal psyche, the primary determination is the opposed one, i.e. by the collective unconscious of the individual psyche – adapting Kant's words, we could say that the fact that any experience starts with the personal psyche does not mean that it originates entirely in the personal psyche. In fact, in his cultural psychology studies, Jung will try to understand modernity and its correlative phenomena precisely as a progressive (and actually unrealizable) historical assertion of the individual consciousness against the collective unconscious:

"The iconoclasm of the Reformation, however, quite literally made a breach in the protective wall of sacred images, and since then one image after another has crumbled away. They became dubious, for they conflicted with awakening reason. (…) I am convinced that the growing impoverishment of symbols has a meaning.It is a development that has an inner consistency. Everything that we have not thought about, and that has therefore been deprived of a meaningful connection with our developing consciousness, has got lost[18]."

In nuce, the archetypes are not inborn ideas but only purely formal categorical (ideational) potentialities that must be experientially actualized. In his study "The Relation of Analytical Psychology to Poetry" Jung refers to the archetypes as innate possibilities of ideas giving shape to the contents accumulated through personal experience. As such, their role with respect to personal experience is rather regulative, that is determining the ordering of the psychic contents within certain default patterns, than constitutive. They are intentionally oriented toward consciousness to the extent that they become actual only insofar being filled with the psychic matter of personal experience.

Moreover, Jung refers many times to the archetypes as unconscious images of the instincts. In other words, the instinct, defined by him as a physiological drive as perceived by the senses, always carries with it a series of phantasms and symbolic images whose psychic eidos is precisely the archetype. In another study, "The Concept of the Collective Unconscious"[19] he explicitly refers to the archetypes as copies of the instincts themselves, respectively fundamental models of instinctual behavior. From this perspective, the archetype seems to include not only a purely psychological layer (the image), but also a nervous and ultimately behavioral one (coming quite close to the Freudian notion of nervous drive).

As such, in order to understand more clearly the way an archetype, once triggered, seeks realization within the individual personality, a few points concerning the notion of complex, that Freud and Jung share, are in order. Basically, for Jung, the complex is the personal unconscious product of the interaction between the collective archetypal underlayer of the Psyche and conscious experience. For Freud, on the other hand, the problem has more to do with the interaction and confrontation of the individual unconscious and, shall we say, social or cultural demands. As known, much of Freud's work was dedicated to describing, explaining and interpreting the dialectics of the vital drive (libido), which was governed by the pleasure principle and whose realization was, consequently, felt as satisfaction, a complicated and contradictory process during which it had to either comply with, or fool the exigencies of the ego and super-ego (governed by the so called reality principle). In other words, in Freud's view, the complexes arise precisely as a result of the constant repression of certain drives which the ego and the super-ego find unacceptable – more precisely, once repressed, they do not just vanish but are cast away into this dark region of the individual psyche, i.e. the unconscious, from where they constantly seek an escape in a dissimulated form. According to Freud (but not also to Jung), this is actually the basis for the entire symbolic-sublimative activity of the human spirit, i.e. culture. In other words, from his perspective, everything having to do with dreaming, art, mythology, politics and even sports constitutes, in fact, nothing more than the product of the perpetual attempts made by this ostracized Dionysian pulsional sublayer to symbolically integrate itself in the conscious reality.

Jung, on the other hand, acknowledges the relative (but substantial) validity of Freud's interpretation of the complex, but deepens and widens its causal basis much beyond mere sexuality or aggression, rooting the entire libidinal dynamics in the archetypal structure of the collective unconscious. According to Jung, Freud's perspective does not seem capable of explaining why the experience of the constant repression of certain unacceptable drives always tends to crystallize in specific and recurrent patterns on the level of the individual unconscious. For him, this tendency of the individual unconscious to assimilate in a specifically determined and recurrent way certain experiences within complexes proves the influence of some broader trans-individual structures, namely the archetypes. James A. Hall provides the following Jungian definition of the complex: "a group of related ideas and images, held together by a common emotional tone and based upon an archetypal core."[20] Basically, every archetype is a psychic eidos that instantiates itself on the level of the individual unconscious in a specific complex whose appearance depends upon the personal life of the individual in cause. One example in this respect is provided by another Jungian psychologist, Anthony Stevens[21]: in children, the maternal archetype instantiates itself in the Mother complex according to the rules of contiguity and similarity; as such, the close and constant presence of someone with characteristics sufficiently similar to those claimed by the maternal archetype triggers in the soul of the child this archetype which acquires, during the individual's life, acquires an ever more specific shape in the form of the individual Mother complex.

Mutatis mutandis, a complementary process takes place in the mother's soul. The conjunction of the two processes generates a special kind of synthesis of the two personalities (participation mystique), which can cover the entire early and middle childhood of the individual in cause.

However, in understanding these issues we must keep in mind that the evolution of the collective unconscious follows a specific and autonomous path that does not necessarily depend upon the facts of the personal biography. As such, we should not take the previous example in the sense that the presence of a person corresponding to the specifications of the mother causes the archetype and not even, necessarily, that it pulls it out of latency. When the time comes, the archetype activates itself irrespective of whether in the factual life of the child there is a mother or not. But if for some reason the archetype does not find fulfillment on the level of the conscious life of the individual, the unconscious will spontaneously seek to compensate, i.e. (1) to realize the respective archetype beyond the conscious life of the individual in cause and, at the same time, (2) to press him/her into realizing it on the level of the conscious life. This compensation tendency may take the form of dreams, neuroses or of all the troubles and turmoils specific to the transitional periods in the life of an individual. Jung brings his own example in this respect, in his autobiography, Memories, Dreams, Reflections referring to a certain period of his childhood when his mother, due to certain familial issues, was absent for a relatively long time. According to his self-analysis, in this situation, he projected the maternal archetype upon the maid who acquired consequently an outmost importance in the development of the child Jung. In time, her figure was assimilated to the maternal image and thereby became representative for femininity in general. However, Jung adds, in his case, the typical sentiments associated with motherhood, i.e. closeness, warmth, protection were grafted upon a fundamental lack of trust with respect to femininity, derived from his mother's original betrayal, a mistrust that followed Jung for a substantial part of his life.

As such, in a general sense, the ego-Self relation could be understood through Schopenhauer's analogy of the strong blind man carrying on his back a cripple (with sight): the seeing cripple has the impression that he has the role (and power) of telling the strong cripple where to go, when in fact the latter can go wherever he wants, irrespective of what the cripple tells him. The seeing cripple can either take things as they are and reconsider his position accordingly, or he can resort to some sort of compensatory self-delusion and claim that he wanted all along to go precisely where the blind was carrying him.

The methodic analysis and moderation of this more or less natural inflation tendency of the ego with respect to the Self is an important aspect of Jungian analytical psychology. In short, the (endogenous) causes behind this tense relationship between the ego and the Self are the following:

1. The tendency of the ego to replace the Self as the center of the Psyche and, consequently, to subdue it entirely to the personal consciousness (due to the fact that it[22] is the one that provides and experiences the life content of the archetypes).
2. Given its inherent limitation, the perspective of the ego is always unilateral and, therefore, even if it attempts to realize an archetype, on the level of conscious reality, it will not be able to fulfill the entire array of its meanings and demands. More precisely: the aspects which get realized are integrated within the personal identity; but the frustration originated with the unrealized ones will press the ego towards realizing them as well. However, the realization is again partial, so the process restarts within a new tension and so on.

The ego follows with respect to the Self a perpetual dialectics in which the elements that are initially conjoined (synchronically, within the Self), subsequently get separated (on the level of the ego, given its unilaterality) and then get synthesized again, diachronically, through their successive fulfillment, in one way or another, on the level of the conscious personality and life of the individual in cause. This is what Jung calls individuation and its driving force is the so called transcendent function of the unconscious realized through symbolization. In Aion Jung writes:

"The one and only thing that psychology can establish is the presence of pictorial symbols, whose interpretation is in no sense fixed beforehand. It can make out, with some certainty, that these symbols have the character of "wholeness" and therefore presumably mean wholeness. As a rule they are "uniting" symbols, representing the conjunction of a single or double pair of opposites, the result being either a dyad or a quaternion. They arise from the collision between the conscious and the unconscious and from the confusion which this causes (known in alchemy as "chaos" or "nigredo"). Empirically, this confusion takes the form of restlessness and disorientation. The circle and quaternity symbolism appears at this point as a compensating principle of order, which depicts the union of warring opposites as already accomplished, and thus eases the way to a healthier and quieter state ("salvation"). For the present, it is not possible for psychology to establish more than that the symbols of wholeness mean the wholeness of the individual. On the other hand, it has to admit, most emphatically, that this symbolism uses images or schemata which have always, in all the religions, expressed the universal ground, the Deity itself[23]."

[20] Hall, James A., Jungian Dream Interpretation: A Handbook of Theory and Practice, Inner City Books, Toronto, 1983 pp.61
[21] Stevens, Anthony, On Jung, Routledge, 1990

For Jung, in other words, the symbol, be it oneiric, mythic, artistic and so on, has as main function the compensation of the insufficiency of the ego with respect to the Self, by relativizing the initial opposite terms, on the level of the conscious life, with respect to their encompassing archetype(s) and, ultimately, to the Self as the all-encompassing collective unconscious. As you can notice, in this model, the conflicts between the opposite elements are not repressed in order to be tempered or settled, but get transcended by relinking them to their initial encompassing archetype and, ultimately, to the Self. We might say that a specific aspect of Jungian therapy resides in the fact that it does not so much seek to alleviate the symptoms, but rather to amplify the pathologic images so that the ego gets to experiment the archetypal roots of the complexes, by avoiding however its dissolution in the archetypal sea, that is by keeping its sense of self-identity. Ego's coherent capacity in keeping a constant connection to the Self results in the formation of an ego-Self axis which can bring about, given the appropriate circumstances, a fortification of the ego through the provision of an explicit reference system in the course of personal becoming. But this positive outcome takes place only provided that the ego is strong enough to withstand this experience of the Self, otherwise running the risk of being engulfed[24] by the Self wich may result in very serious psychic pathologies (as schizophrenia for example).

A distinction that is central to Jung's thought, but that, up to this point, would have been prematurely introduced, is the one between the archetype and the archetypal image. While the notion of archetype, as we have seen, refers to the subjancent and indirectly observable tendency of the Psyche to structure our personal experience within certain archaic and universal patterns, the so called archetypal image represents the concrete image(s) a certain archetype acquire(s) within a given historical and cultural context. Following Jung, James A. Hall offers the following definition for the archetypal images: "Archetypal' images are fundamental and deep images formed by the action of archetypes upon the accumulating experience of the individual psyche. Archetvpal images differ from the images of complexes in having a more universal and generalized meaning, often with numinous affective quality."[25] What differentiates them from the images of the complexes is their universal meaning, on the one hand, their numinous quality, on the other.

The archetype is therefore as a crucible, or an alchemic vessel, to put in in more Jungian terms, within which psychic materials of different sorts and origins (i.e. personal conscious, personal unconscious, collective conscious etc.) get molded. As previously mentioned, the ego, in his average everydayness, participates in a collective layer of consciousness consisting in values, existential stances, shared images and sentiments characteristic of the any given cultural context. The psychic materials originating in this layer are assimilated by the collective unconscious, synthesized and shaped in specific (typological) images. In other words, in his dialectics with respect to the ego, the Self, although restating the same messages, uses the language specific to each and every age and culture. As such, the archetypal images restrict, adapt and apply the archetypes to a specific cultural context. On the other hand, no archetypal image, however wide in its semantic array, cannot provide an exhaustive expression of its original archetype(s), and, precisely by this insufficiency, enters (in a secondary sense) in contradiction with the archetype(s), fact which pushes the collective unconscious into finding a new archetypal image, with a greater synthetic capacity and so on. Jung explains by this kind of dialectics, both the becoming of the personal psyche and that of cultures in general.

As such, for example, every individual has a threefold relation with the representation of the mother:

I. The Mother archetype (corresponding to the maternal principle);
II. An archetypal image of the Mother, shaped by the cultural context of the individual in cause;
III. An image of the personal mother, corresponding to the mother complex as specifically instantiated in the personality of every individual;

The personal instantiations of the mother image synthesize, most of the times, aspects derived from all these levels of the psyche, one of the basic finalities of Jungian therapy being precisely that of discerning, and actually enabling the patient to discern, among them.

On the level of the collective consciousness we encounter an equivalent process to that of the personal consciousness, with the difference that now the archetypal images, and not the complexes, take on the main role. In other words, the archetypes become embodied, or rather embody themselves, on the level of the collective consciousness, in different images of historical and cultural significance – epochal individuals (Charles the Great, Leonardo da Vinci, Napoleon etc.), typological artistic representations

(The Virgin and Child, the Danse Macabre, the self-portrait etc.), institutions, systematized, as previously mentioned, into a tacit infrastructure of the collective consciousness. According to Jung, all these represent, along with their correlative practices, archetypal images, as such reducible, despite their diversity, to their original archetype. Once constituted, they are projected, i.e. their meaning, along with their correlative feelings and behaviors, gets transferred over the corresponding events and characters on the level of everydayness. The projection process constitutes, in Jung's view, the interface between man and nature in all human cultures; however, while in primitive cultures, this happens spontaneously, explicitly and uncritically, in the modern ones, this relation gets more complicated due to the (over)expansion and potentiation of the ego and its correlative faculty: rational-analytic thought. Especially relevant in this respect are the next two passages from „The Archetypes and the Collective Unconscious":

"Primitive man is not much interested in objective explanations of the obvious, but he has an imperative need- or rather, his unconscious psyche has an irresistible urge - to assimilate all outer sense experiences to inner, psychic events. It is not enough for the primitive to see the sun rise and set; this external observation must at the same time be a psychic happening: the sun in its course must represent the fate of a god or hero who, in the last analysis, dwells nowhere except in the soul of man. All the mythologized processes of nature, such as summer and winter, the phases of the moon, the rainy seasons, and so forth, are in no sense allegories of these objective occurrences; rather they are symbolic expressions of the inner, unconscious drama of the psyche which becomes accessible to man's consciousness by way of projection-that is, mirrored in the events of nature[26]."

"Whether primitive or not, mankind always stands on the brink of actions it performs itself but does not control. The whole world wants peace and the whole world prepares for war, to take but one example. Mankind is powerless against mankind, and the gods, as ever, show it the ways of fate. Today we call the gods 'factors,' which comes from facere) 'to make.' The makers stand behind the wings of the world-theatre. It is so in great things as in small. In the realm of consciousness we are our own masters; we seem to be the 'factors' themselves. But if we step through the door of the shadow we discover with terror that we are the objects of unseen factors. To know this is decidedly unpleasant, for nothing is more disillusioning than the discovery of our own inadequacy. It can even give rise to primitive panic, because, instead of being believed in, the anxiously guarded supremacy of consciousness-which is in truth one of the secrets of human success-is questioned in the most dangerous way. But since ignorance is no guarantee of security, and in fact only makes our insecurity still worse, it is probably better despite our fear to know where the danger lies. To ask the right question is already half the solution of a problem. At any rate we then know that the greatest danger threatening us comes from the unpredictability of the psyche's reactions. Discerning persons have realized for some time that external historical conditions, of whatever kind, are only occasions, jumping-off grounds, for the real dangers that threaten our lives. These are the present politico-social delusional systems. We should not regard them causally, as necessary consequences of external conditions, but as decisions precipitated by the collective unconscious[27]."

4. Globalization and EU: A Jungian Analysis

How can these considerations help us in our discussion of (i) the meaning of the globalized world and (ii) the correlative EU legitimacy crisis?

But first, a summative overview: Following Jung, Husserl and Jaspers, my understanding of the meaning of the concept of meaning would amount to the following: any personal or collective representation, partaking in the (quasi-)systematic structure of (some-)one's self-understanding against the backdrop of one's encompassing world (both culturally and existentially) and concomitantly serving a descriptive, explicative and teleological function within the intentional flux of self-awareness, respectively within one's interaction with the world and fellow humans. Zaki Laïdi seems to be in agreement with such characterization when writing that the concept of meaning essentially involves three aspects: a ground, an identity feeling and a telos.

Moving forward, I think a proper way of interpreting the process of globalization would be through Edward Lorenz's Butterfly Effect, that is as an accelerated interdependentization of the global causality, respectively as a marked increase, both extensively and intensively, in the interdependence between the different fields, levels and regions of human society, civilization and culture. As such, against the backdrop of globalization, phenomena that would previously have had only local or, at most, medium level consequences, can now reach global impact (and that ever more rapidly). Through globalization the world self-compressed, if you will. Consequently, humanity became ever more exposed to endogenous unpredictability for the management of which it developed, mostly during the 20th century, various projects, systems or sub-systems of collective control. The European Union is one of them – I think we might count as other examples thereof, the League of Nations, the various world peace or international security organizations, the totalitarian systems and, more recently, even the various IT control systems.

[27] C.G. Jung „The Archetypes and the Collective Unconscious" in CW IX, pp. 23/par.49.

But why would all this induce a world crisis of meaning, in other words, why would globalization threaten to devoid humanity (or significant parts of it) of ground, identity or finality? My answer would be that, hopefully, this is not something inexorable, but rather contingent upon our form of globalization. In other words, although I do not think that globalization would necessarily have such nihilistic consequences, the way in which it happened to emerge along human history threatens to lead us thereto. Again, why? Because globalization essentially happened to progressively assert itself, at least since the modern age, in close connection with the overinflation of the techno-instrumental rationality and to the detriment of the teleological-holistic rationality . An explanation for this might be that the ever increasing competition between the rising nation states, spanning across the entire modern age, provided the favorable socio-political framework therefor: the techno-instrumental rationality could provide immediate and concrete advantages within such ever increasing interstate competition, the teleological-holistic one couldn't, or at least not in the short run. Of course that the Industrial Revolutions have done nothing but to accelerate and intensify this process that consequently, on the long run, has come to fundamentally reshape the European Weltanschauung. Ultimately, the mass production engendered, in ever more efficient ways, by the Industrial Revolutions has also brought, aside from technological progress and sustained increases in life expectancy, standardization, instrumentalization and massification in both cultural and existential senses. The accelerated population growth that, with certain regional differences, has accompanied globalization all through its history, has provided the favorable demographic conditions as well. As a side note, it is remarkable how the fear of the alienating effects of mass society was shared by many important 19th and 20th Centuries thinkers who were otherwise very different in terms of background or philosophical and political views: Delacroix, de Tocqueville, Marx, Nietzsche, Husserl, Freud, Heidegger, Jung, Marcuse, Ortega y Gasset etc..

All this conjoined with the marked bellicosity of the European Weltanschauung as reshaped within the aforementioned progressive interstate competition spanning all through modernity and post-modernity, created an explosive mixture: nationalism, as aggressive assertion of the alleged superiority of one's national culture, civilization and, in extreme cases, even biology, which is probably the most historically influential and poignant phenomenon in this respect.

The European Union is one of the most salient collective projects for the prevention and control of the endogenous unpredictability emergent within the context of this form of globalization. But I think that unfortunately the European Union, along its evolution, has not taken seriously enough the cultural dimension of europenity or, as much as it did, it conceived it (intentionally or not) by analogy with the models already tested during the historical construction of the modern nation state. In nuce, as noted by Stephan Elbe , the so called integration was conceived in terms of economic or political know how, rather than cultural, the basic idea (or hope) being that a purely functional integration would bring about by itself a specific culture as well. But the latter kept failing to emerge, up to the point at which the European Union has come to face the serious identity and legitimacy problems of today.

Now, on a milder note, it would be unfair to claim that the European Union has completely neglected the cultural dimension of integration, but, on the other hand, we could rightfully claim that, to the amount that it has attempted to do something in this respect, the so called European culture was mainly conceived by analogy with the models pretested within the context of the historical edification of the modern nation state. In a course way, one might claim that the European Anthem, Flag and Day are things that, by their very source and symbolic form are rather associated, within the collective psyche, with the national conflictual entities and therefore in contradictory tension with the E.U. motto: United in diversity! In Jungian terms we might say that, onto them, as symbolic forms, i.e. Anthem, Flag etc. the history of the conflicts within which they appeared and evolved as such gets projected, consequently the aforementioned motto, the circle on the flag (as a supposed symbol of unity) or the fact that the anthem is Ode to Joy appearing in this context as unconvincing.

What solution could there be to all this? Well, firstly and quite obviously, the EU should take the cultural dimension of integration much more seriously than it has until now and that especially with respect to its holistic-teleological aspect. Secondly, it should somehow attempt to determine and bring forth the subjacent cultural layer of Europenity, against the backdrop of that of the humanity in general and then attempt to non-abusively reinterpret in its terms the elements of national specificity.

Here, the Jungian distinction between the archetype and the archetypal image may prove very useful. As we know, according to Jung, the archetype is the constitutive substructure of the collective unconscious, fulfilling a regulative role with respect to the personally lived experience, be it conscious or unconscious. The archetypes provide us with certain trans-individual phylogenetic schemata for the typologization of the collectively or individually relevant experiences, i.e. the content of the latter is integrated within such essential forms (eidé) belonging to humanity in general. The archetypal images, on the other hand, are the result of the interaction between the archetypes and the specific culture of a certain community or age: they translate, if you will, the meaning of the archetypes in the imagological language of the present. As such, while the archetypes are hereditary, the archetypal images are cultural. One of the fields that express most clearly these dialectics between the archetype and the archetypal image, on the one hand, the collective and the personal unconscious, on the other, is quite expectedly art:

"The creative process, so far as we are able to follow it at all, consists in the unconscious activation of an archetypal image, and in elaborating and shaping this image into the finished work. By giving it shape, the artist translates it into the language of the present, and so makes it possible for us to find our way back to the deepest springs of life. Therein lies the social significance of art: it is constantly at work educating in the spirit of an age, conjuring up the forms in which the age is most lacking. The unsatisfied yearning of the artist reaches back to the primordial image in the unconscious which is best fitted to compensate the inadequacy and one-sidedness of the present. The artist seizes on this image, and in raising it from the deepest unconsciousness he brings it into relation with conscious values, thereby transforming it until it can be accepted by the minds of his contemporaries according to their powers."

As such, a substantive foundation for the European unity could be found precisely by laying bare the archetypal substratum of the allegedly specifically national images, institutions and behaviors, in other words through their archetypalization : roughly, this would involve their reinterpretation and determination as different archetypal images of the same archetype (or series of archetypes). The obvious advantage provided by the eventual success of such an undertaking is that it would render possible the harmonious integration of the specifically national elements without any homogenization, given that an archetype can be expressed in a potentially infinite variety of archetypal images and complexes, each valid in its own way. Understood in these terms, the historical construction of the modern nation state has actually hyperpotentiated certain images with specific relevance for certain political communities, at the same time repressing (intentionally or not) their subjacent collectively-human substratum, precisely in order to create (or one might even say invent), by semi-ordered culturalization, political communities with a specific and, most frequently, agonistic identity. In a Jungian interpretation, besides the bellicose consequences of this phenomenon, which are historically obvious enough, subtracted from their archetypal foundation, these collective representations became weak, unconvincing, artificial and, consequently, justifiable only by the nation state's monopoly on the legitimate use of collective violence, i.e. authority. The archetypalization of these elements of national specificity would render possible their harmonious and non-homogenizing integration, while at the same replenishing their psychological persuasiveness.

Another advantage would derive from the fact that the archetype is, in principle, oblivious to the distinction between secular and religious, it can be expressed in images, institutions or behaviors of both natures. Therefore the archetypalization would also allow us to close the ever expanding gap between the religious and the irreligious man, which is an ever more pressing problem in post-modernity.

At the same time and for the same reasons, the archetypalization would also allow for the integration and peaceful coexistence of elements belonging to various mythical-religious traditions, thereby instituting, again in a non-coercive and non-homogenizing way, one of the basic principles of the EU, namely tolerant coexistence: to the extent that the sacred is, in one way or another, a definitive problem for humanity, i.e. a question to which the human being is unrelentingly pushed, by its own nature, to find an answer, the way in which this happens, the answer found as well as the actual living by this answer may legitimately vary with each culture, religion and, ultimately, individual, at least as long as this does not infringe upon the others' possibility in doing the same for themselves. Archetypalization would allow for the actual and effective assertion of this form of tolerance which, I think, becomes ever more necessary in a globalized world.

But beyond all this, I think that archetypalization would, most importantly, enable humanity to overcome the most serious problem faced by today's world globalized as mass society: what Heidegger called the instrumentalizalization of Being, i.e. the understanding and treatment of all relevant aspects of both human existence and nature in general as mere resources (Bestand) for the productive complex (Ge-stell) devoid of any telos outside of production itself, a phenomenon which both him and Jung lay at the basis of all the problems related to the growing alienation of post-modernity.

In a nutshell, in my opinion, archetypalization could bring about the rebalancing of today's humanity on four fundamental levels:

I. between the techno-instrumental and the teleological-holistic dimensions of rationality;
II. between the rational consciousness and the unconscious;
III. between the individuality and the collectivity;
IV. between humanity as a whole and nature;

In other words, through archetypalization, each fact and aspect of existence would be connected (in its specificity) to the encompassing community and, through it, to humanity in general, both synchronically (the global culture) and diachronically (history).

How could this archetypalization be enacted? By what means? Although an exhaustive answer to this question is beyond my present possibilities, I think that, for the moment, I could indicate at least the field in which this process might start: art. Why art rather than other fields? Because, at least as I see it, art, by its pronounced symbolic character, holds a more direct and, maybe, intimate, relation to the unconscious (both individual and collective). Furthermore, it can engage its subject/subjects in a both passive-contemplative sense (i.e. as spectator) and active-creative (as author) and can cover, at the same time, both the individual and the collective dimensions of personality. Moreover, art is easier and more spontaneously accessible for the common man, than other spiritual fields, all the more in our post-modern age with its unprecedented development of the information and communication technology. On the other hand, there is still the issue of whether the IT and media technology is adequate in this respect, but this, I think, should be discussed separately.

Novalis, Fichte, Schelling and the other German romantics had initially envisioned a resacralization of the world through art (Weltvergöttlichung). What I have in mind through the concept of archetypalization is something similar but, as we have seen, grounded in Jung's analytical psychology which, by its openness, mindfulness and attention to specificity, could protect this undertaking from abusive ideological distortions as it, unfortunately, was the case with the original project of the romantics.

TRANSPARENCY IN EXERCISING PUBLIC OFFICES, PUBLIC FUNCTIONS AND IN BUSINESS ENVIRONMENT

Florina Ramona PREDA (MUREȘAN)*

Abstract

The right to information is a fundamental right guaranteed to citizens by the Constitution of România, pursuant to article 31. This right may not be silenced or limited by public administration authorities who are obliged to ensure accurate information of the citizens with regard to public activity. The right to information may only be respected by an appropriate transparency level of both central and local public administration authorities. Although the assurance of the transparency of the decisional process should not become a goal in itself, it should represent a permanent concern of public authorities, dignitaries and business environment. In addition to general aspects, this article also comprises the analysis of the legal provisions in România and in the European Union regarding decisional transparency and the main causes which determine the burdening or the impossibility to implement the concept of decisional transparency among public administration authorities, causes which are due not only to authorities but also to how citizens perceive this concept. A better accountability of the leader of public administration authorities and leaders of entities in charge of social dialogue as well as public high officials with regard to the need for real involvement of citizens in the decision-making process will ensure the latter's confidence in central and local authorities, in the political and business environment and also in the result of their activities – normative acts, administrative decisions.The purpose of this article is torecognition the concept of decisional transparency represents an important means to be used in implementation of the rule of law and of the principle of accountability of public institutions

Keywords: transparency, decision, public interest, public administration, public office.

1. Introduction – General Aspects on Decisional TransparencyIn any democratic society, transparency represents an essential characteristic of public administration activity, whether we refer to central or local administration. Additionally, the transparency of dignitaries' activities represents a permanent concern of the democratic civil society.

According to the explicative dictionary of the Romanian language, the term "transparency" means something "which may be easily understood, guessed, obvious, clear, discerned, explicit, precise[1]."

In legal literature, the concept of transparency includes both the concept regarding free access to public interest information and the one regarding the transparency of the decisional process. Whether we refer to the free access of the civil society (citizens, groups of citizens, non-governmental organisations) to public interest information at central and local level or to the transparency in the decisional process of the central and local leading boards or even to the transparency in the decisional process of the business environment, it is imperative to know the legislative norms on decisional transparency.

The overwhelming majority of normative acts issued in Româniaare the creation of the executive power. When enforcing laws and ordinances, the Government, ministries, other state central or local institutions and also all local public administration institutions issue, on an ongoing basis, a large number of normative acts. All this corpus of legislation is published and is frequently amended without the involvement of the parties concerned, be they the ones who are to apply such acts or the ones whose activity is regulated thereby[2].

Transparency and accessibility, representativity and accountability are obviously key values on which the law makers need to keep vigil. A transparent legislative power is a legislative power open to the nation and transparent in their activity. An accessible legislative power is a legislative power which gets the public involved in the management of the law-making process[3].

The lack of decisional transparency, along with lack of civil society's confidence in the governing act and in the observance of the good governance principles, trigger off low confidence of civil society in the force and the importance of normative acts[4].

The transparency in the decisional process as well as the right to information and the right to administration are rigours imposed by several international standards materialised in:

- The Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 10.12.1948;
- The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights of 16.12.1966;
- The Recommendation Rec (2002) 2 of the Committee of Ministers of the European Council to member states on access to official documents;
- The Recommendation Rec (2001)19 of the Committee of Ministers of the European Council to members states on the participation of citizens to local public life (6.12.2001);
- The Recommendation Rec (2001)19 of the Committee of Ministers of the European Council to members states on the participation of citizens to local public life (adopted by the Committee of Ministers on December 6 2001).

Article 1 paragraph 1 (2) of the Treaty on the European Union (TUE)[5]marks "a new stage in the process of creating an even closer union among the peoples of Europe in which the decisions are taken as openly as possible and as closely as possible to the citizen"[6].

The European Union recognises the rights, freedoms and principles provided in the Chart of Fundamental Rights of the European Union[7] and aims to adhere to the European Convention to protect human rights and fundamental freedoms. "As guaranteed by the European Convention to protect human rights and fundamental freedoms, and as resulting from the constitutional traditions of members states", fundamental rights "constitute general principles of the Union law"[8], pursuant to art. 6 paragraph 3 of TUE. The Chart of Fundamental Rights of the European Union comprises five basic principles which the public administration authorities/public institutions are obliged to observe: openness, participation, accountability, effectiveness, coherence[9].

România has taken important steps towards elaboration of normative acts which should transpose the provisions of the European Union legislation on decisional transparency and free access to information of public interest. The current legislation meets the strictest requirements and is comparable to the legislation of other countries in the European Union. Alongside the other rights guaranteed by the Constitution of România, the right to information is set forth by art. 31. Therefore paragraph 1 admits that "the person's right to have access to all information of interest public may not be restricted" whereas paragraph 2 states that "public authorities (...) are obliged to ensure accurate information of citizens in relation to public affairs and issues of personal interest".

The laws adopted on decisional transparency are: Law no. 52/2003 regarding decisional transparency, Law no. 161/2003regarding on measures to ensure transparency in the exercise of public dignity, public functions and business environment, prevention and sanctioning of corruption, Law no. 544/2001 regarding free access to information of public interest, Law no. 182/2002 regarding access to classified information and Government Ordinance no. 564/2006 regarding participation of public to decisions on environment. This work aims to focus exclusively on the sector of decisional transparency as regulated by Law no. 52/2003.

Law 52/2003 regarding decisional transparency in public administration has been initiated by the Ministry of Public Information, prepared and improved with the support of non-governmental organisations and has rapidly gone through the parliamentary procedure: it was filed with the Chamber of Deputies in early June 2002, approved by the Parliament in its final form on 19 December 2002, promulgated by the President of România on 20 January 2003 and published in the Official Gazette of România no. 70 of 3 February 2003. It started to take effects on 4 April 2003.

The democratic principles recognised to citizens by the transparency law should not be confused with democratic principles recognised to citizens by the law of free access to information of public interest[10] or with direct democracy. In contrast to the law of free access to information of public interest, which allows access of the citizen to public information managed by local or central public institution, the transparency law[11] offers the citizens the possibility to actively participate to the process of preparing some regulations, by suggestions addressed to public administration. Additionally, contrary to direct democracy, in which the final decision belongs to the citizens, the transparency law does not confer this privilege to the citizens, as this role Participation – ensuring participation in all stages of a public policy, from initiation to implementation and evaluation.

Accountability – clarification of the roles played by different institutions and taking responsibility by each individual institution.
Effectiveness–public policies need clear objectives, an evaluation of the future impact and use of the previous experience in what is required at the right time Coherence– public policies should be coherent, easy to understand and consistent. This is a need all the more so as the context of the political interventions is more and more complex.

will further be assumed by public administration authorities, which will decide whether they include in their bills the information and suggestions received from citizens, non-governmental organisations or business associations.

Transparency provides each citizen with the right to be informed on the decisions of public interest and creates the reference framework for the obligation of the public administration to respect this right. The decisional transparency represents an instrument easy to use in order to increase the efficiency and efficacy of the public administration.

The literature identifies several dimensions of the concept of transparency:

1. The first dimension is closely related to the free access to information of public interest, the latter representing an essential condition in achieving transparency.
2. The second dimension includes transparency in the decisional process – namely the possibility for citizens to understand the procedures used, the motivation, the vote considered when making a decision.
3. The third dimension refers to the possibility of actively participating to the decisional process, for instance through consultations.
4. The fourth dimension involves the compulsoriness of the public institutions to disseminate information ex officio.

The principle of decisional transparency creates the premise for monitoring the activity of the public administration both by citizens interested and by organisations of the civil society. On the other hand, the decisional transparency protects the individual rights as it allows the citizens to know the reason of the administrative decisions and implicitly facilitates the contestation process of such decisions by citizens in case their rights are harmed. Decisional transparency creates the legal framework which enables the citizens affected by an administrative act (or an administrative decision) to be informed with regard to its content and to know the reasons for which they were issued. Last but not least, decisional transparency represents an important means to be used in implementation of the rule of law and of the principle of accountability of public institutions[12].

The role of transparency is to prevent the actions threatening the public integrity (corruption) and to evaluate the performance of the public administration (administrative capacity).

Transparency in parliamentary activity is established by Article 12, paragraph 1 of Law no. 96 of 21 April 2006 on the Statute for Deputies and Senators, "Deputies and Senators must show transparency in parliamentary activity". This principle - of decisional transparency - joins the other principles laid down in the aforementioned normative act, namely the principle of national interest (Article 10), the principle of legality and good faith (Article 11), the principle of loyalty (Article 14). So, Parliament is the main institution of a strengthened democracy, and in its decision-making, it is concerned not only with respecting national interest, human and citizen rights, economic prosperity, sustainable development, but also transparent and open parliamentary work, so any interested person, any public institution can actively take part in the adoption of normative acts. Outside of organisms and structures created within the two Chambers of Parliament, which have the role of implementing the principle of transparency of the dignitaries' activity. The draft normative acts are brought to the knowledge of the interested public through the Prefect Institutions, which have established Committees on different levels of the society (social dialogue, elderly persons) or who through the activity of leading the deconcentrated services at the level of the counties, can coordinate the activity of analyzing, completing, modifying draft normative acts or, more than that they can submit to the Government proposals for modification or supplementing certain normative acts in effect.

2. Presenting the Law on Decisional Transparency

The transparency law implies collaboration between two partners: central and local public administration/public institutions/public services, on the one hand, and the addressees of the regulations prepared by the former, on the other hand, namely citizens, non-governmental organisations, business associations.

One knows two mechanisms by which the transparency law ensures the openness of the activities carried out by central and local public administration to citizens:

d) Participation of citizens/non-governmental organisations/business associations to the process of elaboration of regulations;
e) Participation of citizens/non-governmental organisations/business associations to the process of making decisions[13].

This law sets forth that local public authorities shall give the public the drafts of regulations prior to adopting them. Afterwards, the citizens have the possibility to formulate suggestions and recommendations on the regulations presented as drafts. Such suggestions will be analysed by the initiating authorities who will decide on the necessity to include them in the final text of the regulations. With regard to the participation of citizens to the decision making process, the laws provides for the possibility of the parties interested to express their opinions within meetings with public authorities.

One has to admit that the transparency law confers benefits to both public administration and beneficiaries of such regulations adopted in compliance with this law:

The public administration:

a) gratuitously obtains additional information on sectors of activity which are to be affected by the regulations proposed;
b) explains the necessity of the regulations proposed;
c) removes the issues encountered in relation to the implementation of regulations due to the fact that the addressees do not know them;
d) removes the issues encountered in relation to the implementation of regulations due to deficiencies in preparing the texts;
e) gains the trust of the public opinion.

The beneficiaries of regulations:

a) gratuitously offers the public administration information on the decisions to be made;
b) acknowledge the drafts of regulations proposed by the public administration;
c) express their views on such drafts[14].

Therefore, active participation of citizens, defined as civic participation, to the act of preparing regulations, is the process by which the concerns, needs and values of citizens are incorporated into the process of decision making within public administration[15].

The transparency law sets forth in article 1 par 2 the objective considered by the lawmaker when elaborating this law:

a) to increase the level of accountability of public administration in relation to the citizen, as beneficiary of the administrative decision;
b) tostimulate active participation of the citizens to the process of making administrative decisions and the process of elaborating normative acts;
c) to increase the transparency level of the entire public administration.

In article 2, the transparency law sets the principles on which preparation of this law relies:

a) persons are previously informed ex officio on the issues of public interest which are to be debated by the central and local public authorities and on bills of normative acts;
b) upon initiative of public authorities, citizens and duly set up associations are consulted on the process of preparing normative acts;
c) active participation of citizens to making administrative decisions and to the process of preparing normative bills, in compliance with the following rules:

1. Meetings of authorities and public institutions concerned by the present law are public, according to conditions provided by the law;
2. Debates will be recorded and made public;
3. Minutes of such meetings will be registered, archived and made public, according to conditions provided by the law.
4. Some important explanations should be provided with regard to subjects of the transparency law laid down in article 4.

This article refers only to public authorities and excludes from its scope the legislative power and the judiciary power. Therefore, according to this article, the following are obliged to observe the decisional transparency law:

a) authorities of public administration: ministries, other central bodies of public administration under the Government or the ministries, their decentralised public services and autonomous administrative authorities;
b) authorities of local public administration: county councils, local councils, city halls, public institutions and services of local and county interest.

Central public authorities include: ministries (except Government), other public administration bodies reporting to the Government or ministries, decentralised public services and autonomous administrative authorities. Some clarifications are necessary in relation to such institutions:

− The Government is not mentioned in this enumeration, even though the initial draft contained provisions thereon. The argument was that all and any normative act adopted by the Government is the outcome of an initiative of a ministry and therefore the obligation for transparency is incumbent on the initiating authority to which the law refers. Consequently, even though the Government is not explicitly mentioned among the addressees of this law, the laws adopted by this body will be subjected to public debates by courtesy of the initiating institution.

− The reference to decentralised public services is excessive due to the fact that these institutions do not have responsibilities in relation to adopting such normative acts.

− The reference to autonomous administrative authorities is salutary in light of the possibility to render their activity transparent with regard to adopting of some regulations which will have an impact on a large category of individuals or legal persons.

Local public authorities include: county councils, local councils, city halls, institutions of public services of local or county interest.

[15] Definition taken over from Eric Chewtynd and FrancesChewtynd, Civil Participation to Improvement of Decisional Process in Local Public Administration, Research Triangle Institute—Assistance Programme for Public Administration in Romania, Bucharest 2001

In our opinion the terms citizens and duly set up associations may only be defined in correlation with provisions of other normative acts:

a) The citizens are all citizens of România, as provided by the Constitution and the Law on Romanian citizenship, i.e. Law 21/1991[16];
b) The duly set up associations represent "all and any civic, union, employers' group or any other associative group of civic representation".

Therefore, according to the law, a duly set up association is:

- all and any non-governmental organisation set up in accordance with Ordinance 26/2000[17] regarding associations and foundations or with previous law in this matter ("Marzescu" Law, no. 21/1924). They include, for instance, employers' associations, landlords' associations, etc.
- unions, confederations, union groups regulated by Union Law no. 62/2011 – Law on Social Dialogue[18];
- other associations acknowledged by the law, such as Chambers of Commerce or associations with legal personality created in compliance with procedure of the Romanian Fund for Social Development.

The transparency law provides in article 5 exceptions from its application, namely in case of a) information on national defence, national security and public order, economic and political strategic interests of the country as well as deliberations of authorities, provided they fall under classified information, according to law; b) values, deadlines and technical and economic data of commercial or financial activities, provided their publication brings prejudice to loyal competition, according to law; c) personal data, according to law.

In our view the far too general content of the provisions of this article with regard to classified information and personal data may hinder or create difficulties upon its enforcement, as one may easily see a nonsense – rigours of this law do not apply for cases set forth in article 5, yet the information is found in these normative acts which are published in the Official Gazette and thus become public.

In the two sections of Chapter II – Procedures on participation of citizens and duly set up associations to preparation of the normative acts and to decision making - the law provides for the participation of the citizens to the process of preparing normative acts and the involvement of the citizens in adopting such act. Actually, this distinction should be clearly stipulated. The first stage consists in the procedure which occurs prior to transposing the proposal into a normative act. The second stage implies a process by which the decisional body sets that the proposal should become a binding normative act.

The law provides for the two main means by which citizens may participate to the decisional process: (1) organisation of structured citizen-authority debates and (2) their presence to public meetings of the parties directly concerned in the decisional process. In terms of differences between preparing and adopting normative acts, the law distinguishes two types of public meetings: 1. public debates and 2. meetings (regularly local or country council meetings) during which the decisional body represented by public authorities deliberate while the citizens may intervene (Articles 7-10). Whereas the latter forms part of the adopting process, the former may only be organised upon written request of the citizens interested in expressing their opinions. Both in the initial form and in the revised version of the law, minutes of such meetings should be published without delay after they are drawn up.

The transparency law reserves only one article in which sets the provisions regarding participation to the process of preparing normative acts. In accordance with article 7 of transparency law, the institutions should publish all proposals on normative acts minimum 30 days prior to subjecting them to ''analysis, drafting and adopting". The notice will include: date of publication, substantiation report, memorandum of reasons, endorsement report for the necessity to adopt the normative act proposed, an impact study and/or feasibility study, if required, the complete text of the normative act draft, as well as the deadline, the venue and the method for the parties interested to convey their proposals, suggestions, opinions valued as recommendations regarding the draft of the normative act. The notice on the preparation of the draft of a normative act which is relevant for the business environment is conveyed by the public authority to business associations and other duly set up associations, in relation to specific domains of activity, within 30 days. Upon publication of the notice, the public administration authority will set a timeframe of minimum 10 calendar days for the normative act drafts to receive proposals, suggestions and opinions concerning the draft subjected to public debate. The proposals, suggestions or opinions on the draft subjected to public debate will be recorded in a register, mentioning the date of receipt, the person who submitted the proposal, the opinion or the recommendation and his/her contact information. The persons or the organisations interested in remitting written proposals, suggestions or opinions on the draft of the normative act subjected to public debate will specify the article or the articles in the draft to which they refer and will mention the date of remittance and the expeditor's contact information. This type of notice should be provided on the website of the institution, in a visible and easily accessible place, and "conveyed through local and central mass media". The information of public interest may be accessed by any person interested. The institutions have the responsibility to send information with regard to legislative proposals to all persons who have requested this in writing. All persons interested may send suggestions, opinions and comments on such proposals of normative acts within a set timeframe which is evidently mentioned in the notice. Nevertheless, the timeframe should not be shorter than 10 days of publication of the notice on the organisation of the public debate for the proposal. Within 30 days the citizens or the civil society may request organisation of a public debate on the basis of the proposal issued, debate which should be announced 10 days beforehand. The public authorities should delegate a person within the organisation to be responsible for the relation with the civil society. This person will deal with collecting recommendations, suggestions and opinions on the draft proposed by the parties interested.

The public authority concerned is obliged to decide on the organisation of a meeting to publicly debate the draft of the normative act provided this meeting was requested in writing by a duly set up association or another public authority. The public debates will be conducted in compliance with the following rules: a) the public authority responsible, by the person appointed, will organise the meeting, will publish on their own website and will post at their head office, along with documents mentioned in par (2) of article 7, the manner in which recommendations will be collected, the manner in which the entities may request to hold a speech, the speaking time and any other details on how the right to freedom of expression of any citizen interested will be guaranteed; b) the public debate will close only when all requesters who registered to speak have expressed their recommendations only in relation to the draft under discussion; c) it is mandatory for the initiator(s) of the normative act within the institution or local public authority, the experts and/or the specialists involved in the preparation of the substantiation report, memorandum of reasons, endorsement report for the necessity to adopt the normative act proposed, the impact study and/or feasibility study, if required, and the draft of the text, to participate to the public debate; d) within 10 calendar days from the completion of the public debate, public access to the website and the head office of the public institution responsible will be granted for the following documents: the minutes of the public debate, the written recommendations collected, the improved versions of the draft in various stages of preparation, endorsement reports and the final version of the normative act adopted. In all cases in which public debates are organized, they will be conducted within maximum 10 calendar days from publication of the date and the venue of the meeting. The public authority concerned should analyse all recommendations referring to the draft under discussion. In case a situation should be regulated due to exceptional circumstances which impose adopting immediate solutions in order to avoid serious prejudices to the public interest, the drafts of normative acts are subjected to adoption by expedited procedure in accordance with the legal provisions in force.

In terms of legal provisions of transparency law regarding participation of the citizens or duly set up associations to the decision-making process, we see a real preoccupation of the law maker in establishing some clear norms which are easy to implement. Therefore, articles 8-13 set the rules which must be observed by public administration authorities in order to enable access of citizens or duly set up associations to the decision-making process. The public authorities conduct the meetings publicly and offer the possibility to participate to all parties interested (within the limit of the seats available in the room, granting priority to parties interested in the agenda of the public meeting), who were notified on organisation of this meeting (date, hour, venue, agenda) minimum three calendar days prior to the date of the actual meeting.

We also find similar norms in the law regarding local public administration, which expressly provides that the local county meetings are public and any person interested may attend them. Moreover, the citizens, the duly set up associations and other parties interested have rights of access to decision drafts and agenda of the local county meetings, whereas local public authorities and public servants of administrative-territorial units are obliged to inform them appropriately and in due time with regard to subjects debated in the local council.

The authorities of the local public administration regularly post the notice at their head office, in an accessible area, and more rarely on the official website page of the public authority.

Despite guaranteeing the access to these meetings of all parties interested, due to lack of a suitable space (appropriate meeting rooms), this norm is many times impossible to observe. It is necessary to regulate in detail on how access to the meeting room is possible, on mandatory conduct of the participants, on penalties applicable in case of improper behaviour, etc.

All these should be included in the internal organisation regulations applicable to procedures on public debate as part of the process of preparing and adopting decisions which are to be made public to attendants, who are obliged to observe them.

The public authorities should ensure access to decisions adopted by publishing them in accordance with legal provisions in force, by uploading them on the official website page, by posting them at the head office, in an area visible to the public and/or or by disseminating them through central or local mass-media, if required, as well as by other methods set by the law.

The law on local public administration provides that decisions and orders of normative nature take effect upon notification of the public, by publication or posting in public spaces, whereas the decisions and orders of individual nature – upon communication to the persons concerned. The persons in charge of informing the public with regard to decisions adopted and orders issued is the registrar of the local council.

We can conclude that the process of making an administrative decision places the public administration in the position to establish contacts with various administrative authorities and public servants, political power, pressure groups, other participants, including civil society and citizens so as to understand some entities' tasks and some other entities' desires in order to determine the subject of the decision. In other words, in most cases, the initiative of an administrative decision is to be found not inside the public administration, but outside it[19].

Another important aspect in the economy of this normative text is the one revealed by article 12, according to which public authorities are obliged to prepare and make public an annual report on decisional transparency. This report will include at least the following elements:

a) total number of recommendations received;
b) total number of recommendations included in the drafts of the normative acts and in the content of the decisions made;
c) number of participants to public meetings;
d) number of public debates organised in relation to drafts of normative acts;
e) status of the cases when the public authority was sued for failure to comply with provisions of the present law;
f) own assessment of the partnership with citizens and their duly set up associations;
g) number of meetings which were not public and the justification for restricted access. The annual report regarding decisional transparency will be published on the website of the institution, posted at the head office of the institution, in a visible area, or presented in a public meeting.

There is an increasingly higher interest of the citizens in such reports. On the other hand, the public administration authorities have on their official websites a special section where information which is mandatory to be posted is uploaded, in accordance with transparency law.

In reference to breach of Law no. 52/2003, the law provided that all and any citizen who considers that an act adopted violated his/her rights and failed to comply with legal procedures, may file a complaint with the competent court of law.

3. Analysis of Relevant Cases in the Matter of Decisional Transparency

The analysis relies on court judgments made public in courts in relation to substance causes, in appeals or by the Constitutional Court in cases where public authorities failed to observe legal provisions regarding decisional transparency.

One of the main obstacles in enforcing the law on decisional transparency is excepting the ordinances and the laws approved by expedited procedure. As a result, the legislative proposals may be adopted without observance of public debate procedure, whether they are laws or emergency ordinance. Art. 7 (13) of Law 52/2003 allows such a situation when the public authorities encounter exceptional circumstances which require immediate action in order to "avoid serious harm to public interest". One domain in relation to which courts have decided to allow enforcement of this "emergency" clause is the legislative proposals which aim to harmonise the Romanian legislation with requirements of the European Union.

3.1. Civil Sentence 3401/2004 delivered by Bucharest Court of Appeal:

By Civil Sentence 3401/2004, Bucharest Court of Appeal[20] stated in relation to lawsuit filed by the Romanian Association for the Defence of Human Rights – the Helsinki Committee (APADOR) against the Ministry of Justice. In this case, APADOR had responded to the notice posted on the website of the Ministry of Justice on 7 May 2004 concerning the preparation of the bill regarding execution of sentences, accompanied by the text of this bill, with the mention that the observations and proposals thereon may be remitted in writing within 10 days, to the address of the Ministry. The plaintiff filed a written material on their observations and proposals for this particular hearing, yet the plaintiff noticed at a later date that the bill had been already adopted in the Government meeting of 14 May 2004 and remitted to the Senate on 18 May 2004.

In addition, the plaintiff showed that, by doing so, the ministry was in breach of the terms and procedures provided by article 6 of previous regulation of Law no. 52/2003 regarding preparation of normative acts. The plaintiff also indicated that the government failed to observe the legal requirements on decisional transparency by the ministries reporting to them (according to article 115 of Constitution).

In the letter of defence filed with the court, the representative of the ministry invoked lack of passive capacity to stand trial and claimed that the law provides for the obligation to consult the citizens with regard to the bill only by the authority who initiated it (i.e. Ministry of Justice); in capacity of colleague-like decision-making body, the Government is not accountable thereof. In terms of the case merits, the plaintiff stated that the bill was submitted to the Senate for adopting it by expedited procedure grounded on provisions of article 76 par (3) of Constitution. Therefore, it was no longer required to go through the consultation procedure provided by decisional transparency law, by virtue of article 6 par (9) of the same law. In addition, the Ministry of Justice sustained that the bill under discussion formed part of the process of harmonisation of legislation with the legislation of the European Union and that, pursuant to Regulations of the Chamber of Deputies, such laws are adopted by expedited procedure. The court considered these arguments to be grounded and denied the petition filed by APADOR. This decision was subsequently maintained by the Court of Cassation and Justice.

3.2. The Decision of the Constitutional Court no. 737/2012[21]:

Before the Constitutional Court, the Ombudsman informed the Court on the provisions of the Emergency Ordinance no. 27/2012 regarding some measures in the sector of culture. This effect of this ordinance was the transfer of the Romanian Culture Institute under the parliamentary control, by transferring the authority to regulate the organisation and functioning of this institution to the Senate. The plaintiff claimed that the ordinance is in breach of art. 115 (4) and (6) of the Constitution regarding legislative delegation which sets forth that "(4) the Government may adopt emergency ordinances only in exceptional situations of which regulation may not be delayed and has the obligation to motivate the urgency in their table of contents". Moreover, "(6) Emergency Ordinances may not be adopted in the domain of constitutional laws, may not affect the regime of the fundamental state institutions, the rights the freedoms and the obligations set by the Constitution, the electoral rights and may not aim at measures regarding forced transfer of goods to public property."

In support of the exception of unconstitutionality, the Ombudsman contested the urgency nature of the ordinance, stating that "the urgency of the regulation was inappropriately justified by the Government and one may not speak of an extraordinary situation, despite the fact that the Government […] presented this situation as extraordinary, of which regulation could not be delayed." As a consequence, the ordinance is in breach of the provisions of art. 115 paragraph (4) and (6) of Constitution. In addition, the Government stated that the ordinance under discussion approached aspects which do not represent deficiencies in the manner the Romanian Culture Institute functions. Only deficiencies representing "an extraordinary situation that need to be settled by a Government Emergency Ordinance" would be eligible for a special procedure. In support of the exception of unconstitutionality, a further statement is made in the sense that this ordinance provisions do not regulate aspects related to the manner in which the institution functions, which would be in the position to remedy an urgent issue. It explains that "it does not operate amendments referring to principles, objectives or responsibilities of the Romanian Culture Institute, but only insignificant amendments and supplements of organisational nature and which do not correct potential dysfunctionalities which may have represented an extraordinary situation and which should have been remedied by the Government through an expedited procedure". Finally, the Ombudsman considered that the emergency procedure indirectly violated Art. 115 (6) of the Constitution which sets that "Emergency Ordinances may not be adopted in the matter of constitutional laws, they may not affect the regime of the fundamental institutions of the state, the rights, the freedoms and the responsibilities provided for by the Constitution, the electoral rights and may not aim at measures regarding forced transfer of goods to public property". By reference to Law 52/2003, the Ombudsman argued that one may not consider the fundamental rights of the citizens to have been respected in the absence of the right to transparency and participation to the decisional process.

The Senate and Government representatives considered the exception of unconstitutionality groundless as the emergency ordinance was adopted with a view to observing general provision of art. 111 paragraph (1) of the Constitution, according to which "the Government and the public administration bodies are subjected to parliamentary control". Therefore, the legality was restored by transfer of authority in relation to organisation and functioning of the Romanian Culture Institute from the President to the Parliament.

The Constitutional Court agreed with the arguments presented by the Government in the background note of the ordinance and showed that the regulations in force forbid subordination of an independent authority, such as the Romanian Culture Institute and the President. Moreover, the Court claimed that the situation previous to the issuance of the ordinance generated obvious and profound dysfunctionalities, which, by their nature, constituted an extraordinary situation of which regulation could not have been delayed. Therefore, the Court considered grounded the justification of the Government according to which "failure to adopt the measures proposed by the emergency ordinance under criticism [...] would create "the prolongation of the profoundly negative effects of some states of affairs which tend to permanently affect the feeling of belonging to the Romanian nation of the people who temporarily settled down elsewhere, in other countries, or further dysfunctionalities referring to the manner in which the Romanian Culture Institute is organised and functions". With regard to the claims of the Ombudsman on the "right to decisional transparency", the Court finds "invocation of art. 115 paragraph (6) of the Constitution to be irrelevant, as there is no indication that a fundamental right or freedom was affected", whereas Law no. 52/2003 does not apply to this case.

Therefore, the Court decided that, in the absence of an express constitutional provision on transparency, such right may not be inferred.

In addition to the excessive use of the expedited procedure in the process of adopting laws, failure to observe transparency-related requirements does not generate sanctions in itself even in situations when the regular procedure is used in adopting laws in the Parliament. This is due to the fact that the Romanian legal system allows cancellation of a law or an ordinance only by decision pronounced by the Constitutional Court.

3.3. The decision of the Constitutional Court no. 44 of 2013:

Impossibility to attain the principle of decisional transparency procedure was confirmed by the Decision of the Constitutional Court no. 44 of 2013[22], when the institution was requested to state on the constitutionality of the Government Emergency Ordinance no. 109/2011 regarding corporate governance of public companies, raised in relation to file no. 1848/2/2012 of Bucharest Court of Appeal - Section VIII contentious administrative and fiscal, with plaintiff Hidroelectrica Hidrosind Branch. Among the main reasons of invoking the exception of unconstitutionality against provisions of this ordinance was lack of conformity with provisions of art. 14 of Constitution: "Given the regulating scope of the emergency ordinance under criticism, the Government should have requested the endorsement of the Economic and Social Council". In addition, the action was also grounded on art. 115 (4); the author of the exception considered that "the condition regarding an extraordinary situation is not complied with"; this condition should have supported the legislative delegation; the author also considered that "by the emergency ordinance the objective is not to protect a general interest, but the private propriety of the state."

With regard to criticism of unconstitutionality by discordance with art. 115 (4), the Court decided that the reasoning provided by the Government was sufficient to prove "existence of an objective state of affairs, quantifiable, independent of the Government will, which jeopardises a public interest", according to criteria elaborated in their previous decisions.

The Court notes that the Government reasoned the urgency as being determined, among others, by: "1. the current economic context which imposes taking rapid measures to create legislative and administrative premises [...], 2. the fact that the public companies – autonomous administrations and trading companies in which the state owns shares as majority or 100% shareholders – represent an important segment of the national economy [...]; 3. the fact that the current legislative framework presents significant gaps relating to good governance of autonomous administrations and influences their economic performance and competitivity in a negative manner [...]; 4. the fact that improvement of the corporate governance of state-owned companies represents an objective assumed by the Government of România [...][23]"

In terms of invoking provisions of art. 115 paragraph (4) of Constitution, the Court considered that "there is subjective state of affairs, quantifiable and independent of the Government will which led to adopting the emergency ordinance under criticism", therefore the ordinance complies with the urgency-related exigencies.

As regards the criticism referring to non-observance of provisions of art. 6 of previous regulation of Law no. 52/2003 regarding decisional transparency in adopting the ordinance under discussion, "the Court acknowledges that it may not be admitted". As the Court already stated in connection with previous decisions, the Court analyses the constitutionality of a law only in relation to constitutional provisions and not to other laws in force: "in the constant jurisprudence, the constitutional contentious court stated that examination of the constitutionality of a text of law takes account of the constitutionality of such text in line with constitutional provisions allegedly violated and not comparison of several legal provisions and reporting the conclusion drawn from such comparison to provisions of principles of the Constitution."

Therefore, even though the legislative provision under criticism had not been adopted by expedited procedure, it would have still been rejected by the Constitutional Court as long as the principle of decisional transparency is not included in the Constitution.

3.4. Civil Sentence no. 41/P/14.02.2005 stated in Timișoara Court of Appeal:

In reference to acts of lower rank, such as Government Decisions, a relevant example is the civil sentence no. 41/P/14.02.2005 pronounced by Timișoara Court of Appeal[24], by which a Government Decision was cancelled due to the fact that the adopting process was not in line with requirements of Law 52/2003. In this case, the plaintiff was OTMAS (Organisation for Measuring Technique) and the defendants were the Romanian Bureau of Legal Metrology and the Ministry of Economy and Commerce. OTMAS requested cancellation of the Government Decision no. 862/2004 for failure to observe, in the adopting process, Article 6 (old form) of Law no. 52/2003. OTMAS showed that the Romanian Bureau of Legal Metrology or the Ministry of Economy and Commerce failed to publicly notify the elaboration of the draft for this Government Decision, as provided for by the law.

The court accepted the plaintiff's argument and decided that "the Government Ordinance no. 862/2004 […] was in breach of all legal provisions comprised in Article 6 of Law 52/2003 regarding procedure of elaborating normative acts". As the content of the Government Decision no. 862/2004 did not have an individual character and was not subjected to exceptions set forth by Art 6(9) of Law 52/2003 for legislation adopted by expedited procedure, the court decided to annul the act.

Even among acts which are universally applicable there is an important sub-category which may not be subjected to requirements of transparency as laid down by Law 52/2003. It is the case of letters (written communications) remitted by the Government which accompany bills referred to the Parliament. When issuance of these acts was contested in court, the argument to reject such actions was that the acts are of a "political nature" and are not subjected to the transparency law. According to the law of Contentious Administrative (554/2004), the acts issued by a public authority which concern such authority's relation to the Parliament may not be appealed in contentious administrative.

3.5. Civil Sentence 2889/2010 delivered by the High Court of Cassation and Justice:

By Civil Sentence 2889/2010 the High Court of Cassation and Justice[25] rejected the appeal filed by plaintiffs Foundation C.R.J., the Association for Defence of Human Rights - the Helsinki Committee, the Romanian Association for Transparency, the Institute for Public Policy, the Romanian Journalists' Association, the Romanian Federation of Journalists M., He Centre for Independent Journalism, the Romanian Press Club, Press Monitor Agency, the Centre for Assistance of Non-governmental Organisations – C., the Romanian Association of Audiovisual Communications, Resource Centre for Public Participation, P.D. Association, against sentence no. 2855 of 3 July 2009 of Bucharest Court of Appeal. The action of the NGOs abovementioned was initiated against defendants – Government of România and Ministry of Justice. The defendants contested the letters to the Government relating to amendment of the four codes (Civil, Criminal, Civil Procedure and Criminal Procedure) for adoption by the Parliament. This action aimed to have these letters annulled and the procedure of law to be adopted by the Government redone, due to non-observance of the provisions of the transparency law.

The Court had to decide on the category of acts in which these letters should be included. The plaintiffs claimed that the communication acts exchanged between the Government and the Parliament represent administrative normative acts which are subjected to the transparency law. On the other hand, the plaintiffs stated that the letters concern relations between the Government and the Parliament and may not be appealed in contentious administrative, according to Law 554/2004. Additionally, the plaintiffs claimed that the court should decide whether the acts appealed may be subjected to the contentious administrative procedure. Otherwise, it may not even be set whether their adopting observed the procedures set forth by Law 52/2003 or not. The High Court of Cassation and Justice accepted the defendants' arguments and rejected the reasoning of the plaintiffs.

Another category is represented by the administrative acts of individual nature which, as indicated above, include decisions concerning a single person or a group of persons well-defined as subjects. These acts are exempted from observing the requirements of the transparency law. The solution chosen by the lawmaker is logic as these acts do not target the community in its entirety and do not have to be subjected to debate. Sometimes, due to their strictly personal nature, these acts do not even have to be communicated to the public. However, this classification was in some cases contested, when the nature of the act was doubtful.

3.6. Civil Sentence 44/F/9.12.2011 delivered by Brașov Court of Appeal:

By Civil Sentence 44/F/9.12.2011, Brașov Court of Appeal[26] pronounced upon the nature of the order of restructuring the National Agency for Fiscal Administration (ANAF), ordered issued by the Manager of this institution. The Court had to decide whether the act mentioned is of normative or individual nature. The measure was taken in the context of fiscal austerity policies implemented by the Government, which generated re-organisation of the state institutions and layoff of some staff. In this case, several persons laid off appealed the acts by which ANAF was reorganised. They claimed, among others, that the order setting the new organisational chart has a normative nature as it was opposable to more than one person (it referred to all ANAF employees) and it would have been valid only if it had been adopted by procedure laid down by Law 52/2003. ANAF argued that the act has an individual character as it refers to a limited and well-specified number of subjects.

The Court analysed the legal provisions which set forth the organisation of ANAF and concluded that the order abovementioned has a normative character. It refers to ANAF organisation and is of public interest. Therefore, the Court admitted the appeal of the plaintiffs and annulled the order. The Court stated that the order failed to observe conditions provided for adopting normative acts, among which publication in the Official Gazette and observance of the procedures set forth by Law 52/2003.

4. Conclusions and Recommendations

This work concludes on some causes which render implementation of decisions transparency law difficult and even impossible:

1. The main causes which prevent public authorities from implementing the decisional transparency legislation may be: failure to acquire and understand decisional transparency by representatives of public authorities; public authorities may lack or have insufficient financial, technical, human resources/means.
2. Among the main causes which trigger non-implementation of the decisional transparency legislation due to lack of real involvement of citizens/duly set associations into the decisional process we may enumerate: the citizens are not aware of their rights to information, consultation, participation to the process of preparation and adopting decisions; lack of real and ongoing communication between authorities and citizens; lack of the administration's confidence in collecting opinions from citizens in order to improve public decision, while the citizens do not consider it is worth getting involved in the decisional process as most of them consider that their opinion is disregarded.

To support the public administration authorities or civil companies interested in the decisional process, we present below some recommendations that we consider important in the process of implementing the concept of decisional transparency in România:

1. The law should provide a deadline, similar to the deadline for submitting balance sheets (e.g.: last day of the first semester of the following year), by which ministries/public authorities should publish their annual decisional transparency report on the official website of the institution. In addition, the law should lay down clear penalties for failure to observe this requirement. This situation may be regulated through initiation by the Government Secretariat, which is the institution responsible for enforcement of Law 52/2003, of a normative act in which clear deadlines and penalties should be set for failure to observe such requirement. Such measure would intensify/amplify enforcement of this law and would diminish the current lack of information.
2. After consultations with the civil society, the Government Secretariat should prepare a set of assessment criteria on how Law 52/2003 was enforced throughout a calendar year, set which should result in a standard model of fields to include in the annual decisional transparency report. Such standard model would ensure comparability of the information provided by public institution with regard to enforcement of Law L52/2003 and would enable a comparison to this effect. The staff appointed, in charge of enforcing Law 52/2003, should regularly improve their skills and expertise in sessions conducted to provide training on enforcement of this law. [27]
3. In reference to the public servants responsible for the dialogue with the civil society within institutions which fulfil this requirement, such personnel have to carry out, in addition to this responsibility, a much high number of other tasks. Such approach of the public institutions is deficient and limits application of Law 52/2003 in its entirety, transforming the process in a strictly formal one. The complexity of the application of this law requires appointment and raising awareness of minimum one full-time person within these institutions, so that notable results may be seen.

HUMAN RESOURCES IN THE CURRENT ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL BACKGROUND

Abstract

The increasing demographic decline in the recent years creates major malfunctions on the Romania and the European Union labor markets. The social and economic consequences of the demographic phenomenon are increasingly reflected in the structure of the labor market, actual level of families' income and in the sustainability of medium and long term governmental social and economic policies. Such evolution requires a re-establishment of public policies, education system, a reorientation of the knowledge-based economy, and the awareness of the increasingly important role of the business environment not affected by the presence of politics.

Keywords: demographic decline, migration, social policies, social protection, economic policies, economic growth.

1. Introduction

The economic activity is characterized, as well known, by the existence and functioning of the production, distribution, exchange and consumption. But the way these components change in relation to the movements and structural changes of the main actors, people, they represent the main subject of this article. Furthermore, human resource, in its continuous movement, influences the richness of a country and public policies, the wealth of a nation and the insurance, pension or healthcare and education system.

Specialized literature in the economic, social, politic, mathematics and history field has available a great number of examples on the overwhelming discrepancy between a growing population with more or less real needs and a planet depleted natural resources or more and more rare or hard to exploit resources.

The movement of the population as a numerical dimension and volume change has been studied since 1662 when London merchant John Grant wrote paper "Natural and Political Observations Made upon the Bills of Mortality, particularly with reference to governance, religion, trade, growth, air, disease etc. in early modern London". In this paperwork, the author estimates the population of London based only on the bills of mortality.

Edmund Halley continued Grant's steps and established life table, as mortality table of Pierre Wargentin had been drawn up in Sweden in the 18th century since 1766.

Thomas Robert Malthus (1766 – 1834) with his famous Malthusian movement whereby he demonstrated the need to limit the number of births or Achille Guillard, who attempted a mathematical approach of demography in 1885, all of them were approaches targeting the continuous and Brownian movements of the population depending on the influence of economic, social or political environment.

In the 20th century, the persons who stood out were Alfred Lotka (1934 – 1938) by the general theory of population dynamics and Adolph Laundry (1934) by the explanatory diagram of development called demographic "revolution" or "transition".

During the same period, Vladimir Trebici also made himself conspicuous (father of Romanian demography) who, in 1979, studied human populations delimited by space and classified by social significance, size and spatial distribution, their structure according to demographic, social and economic features, evolution, direct factors which determine the evolution of the population: fertility, mortality, migration, as well as social and economic factors that influence demographic phenomena, in order to highlight the regularities in which they occur.

If Vladimir Trebici tried to note certain regularities or identical features with a certain repeatability, nowadays we note that negative demographic evolution creates major malfunctions both in social terms and in terms of the economic development of any state. If sociologists tried to find a common denominator to which they could relate and which could be anticipated or controllable, then the current evolution of the population exceeds the predictions, thus recording an oscillating trend on the edge of the abyss. The evident aging trend of the developed country population overlapping the low-skilled labor force exodus in developing countries triggers major changes within the labor markets in developed countries. We are currently witnessing an obvious acceleration of urbanization in most of the world's countries, to an almost generalized decrease of birth rates, a massive population exodus from the poor to the richest countries and last but not least, the aging of the population in many developed and developing countries. The social and economic consequences of these events shall be reflected in the structure and dynamics of the labor market, the size of the population income and level of competitiveness of the educational system.

Not all the population carefully analyzed by demographers counts in our approach, but only one fifth of it, the rest of four-fifths being made up of children, elderly persons, persons who are unfit for work (sick or disabled persons), housewives, teenagers who are enrolled in study programs, individuals working in their households or unemployed persons. This fifth of the population that really counts, called by economists "employed population" represents the labor force human resources of any country. There are persons actually engaged in work, with a bilateral contract in this respect, thus carrying out a constant (even temporary) activity within an organized framework and by collecting a remuneration in this respect, namely small taxpayer and active taxpayer, without which no other element of the economic activity (large taxpayer) could function.

The management was shaped as an integral part of the economic activity as of the 20th century, due to the increased industrialization and the emergence of increasingly complex and highly specialized professions. If the economists were searching for laws, regulations and principles to live together, the managers are searching for laws and actual modalities to work together. The field of the management came to the fore by the contributions of certain authors such as Frederic W. Taylor or Henri Fayol, who are considered the initiators of scientific management. But human factor represented the core of the activity for neither of them, they being especially organized by the organization of the work, efficiency, productivity, prediction or control. Elton Mayo (1880-1949) and Fritz Roethlisberger (1898-1974), both with representative researches for School of Human Relations began to be interested in human study.

2. Labor resources and their current status within the European Union

Thinkers and scientists have always convincingly argued that no society can exist and function outside the creative work of individuals in the sphere of material and spiritual production. The internal evolution of the society points out that the patrimony of the national wealth of every society depends on the quantity and quality of the social work, the level of organization and efficiency of all forms of human activity. The overall development of any society depends in part on the multitude of organizations that emerge, develop and contribute by means of their work to the achievement of the national wealth. But no organization can operate without the essential and creative contribution of the people. Work means people, physical and intellectual human resources involved in any type of activity. Without the presence of the individuals who know what, how much, how and for who to produce[1], it would be impossible for the organizations to reach their goals.

Furthermore, human resources behave differently in the production process, each individual having its own perceptions of work as a whole and of the way it can be performed in particular. Normally, people act and react differently, ask questions and try to find solutions. This is why, leading people is the most difficult activity within the organization, incomparable with solving any work duty that does not involve the study of moral and legal aspects of human behavior. Therefore, a frequent mistake made by managers[2], especially by those of human resources department, is that they make individual decisions in terms of managing or engaging labor resources. The perception of a sole person is subjective and cannot reach the full range of distinct personalities that he leads and coordinates. Regardless of the way we try to find the most appropriate answer depending on the work and life style within the organization, it can happen to be wrong.

Under these terms, talking about human resources means starting from the fact that these are and shall remain the most valuable investment of any organization due to the following: human resources produce and reproduce objective factors of production; create and stimulate the means of production and influence the effectiveness of material and financial resources use[3].

According to traditional approaches, labor force is a special resource the creation in time of which needs special care demonstrated by training which entails certain costs that cannot be neglected.

In order to fulfill their goals, the organizations are and were bound to face challenges to ensure and maintain their competitive success on the market. This is why the organizations include goals on the management of the personnel and the personnel's performances in the long-term strategic objectives[4]. The strategies in the field of human resources became, in the last decades of the last century, a priority area of modern enterprises, including in the countries under communist domination, where, let's not forget, the concept of work is totally different from the Western countries.

According to some authors, to lead human resources is an expression of personnel practice[5] and represents a process of acquiring, allocation and use of human resources within the organization. But above all, to lead and coordinate labor resources means vision, motivation, training and concern for people, often even against their will.

Labor resources market is a true barometer of economic developments, being strongly influenced both by internal and external factors. On the background of employment drop, fluctuations of occupational nature can be noted depending on gender, age, residence, as well as on forms of ownership, field of activity, occupational status etc.

The demographic profile of the European Union labor market has significantly changed over the last few years. The percentage of employed women has increased in the last decade so that the gender gap in the labor market has fallen to 11.9% in 2011, compared to 17.1% in 2000. The migration is a factor that influences this market and the rise of the new member states which used the free movement of people to encourage changes in the ethnic and national profile on the European labor market. The demographic changes in connection with the aging of the labor force have led to the need to introduce new incentives to encourage older employees to continue working for a longer period of time[6].

The analysis of the distribution of employed population by gender does not reveal major disparities. In 2016, the employment rate within the European Union, for persons between 20 and 64 years old,[7] was of 71.1 %, being the higher annual average recorded for the EU. Notwithstanding, behind these averages, big differences can be noted between the countries. The only member state with a rate higher than 80% is Sweden (81.2%). This is also valid in case of AELS states Island (87.8%) and Switzerland (83.3%). The following countries are part of the group of countries with rates at the level of 70% United Kingdom, France and Germany. The group comprises an area ranging from Ireland to the West, to Hungary, to the East, including the three Baltic States, Finland and Portugal.

Countries with rate of 60 percentage points form two clusters: West-Mediterranean / Adriatic (Spain, Italy and Croatia), and the other at the EU's eastern border, from the southern end of the Baltic Sea to the southwest end of the Black Sea (Poland, Slovakia, Romania, Bulgaria). Furthermore, this group of countries also include Belgium. Finally, we find a South Balkan/Caucasian group with rates below 60% (former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Greece and Turkey).

Image 1 shows the evolution of employment rate for men and women since 1993. One of the most prominent features is the reduced gap of the employment rates regarding men and women. In most of the cases, this result from the increase of the women employment rates (for example, in Spain and the Netherlands), but there are also cases where the reduced gap comes especially from the drop in the men employment rates (Greece and Cyprus). Furthermore, in a group of countries, the evolution of employment rates for men and the employment rates for women reflect each other, by creating a stable gap between employment rates for women and men. The employment rates are lower among women than among men in all years and in all countries, with two exceptions: in Latvia and Lithuania, in 2010, after a sharp fall in employment rates among men and a more modest fall of employment rate among women[8].

The analysis also shows that the labor market situation over the period for which Eurostat data is available varies widely from country to country. The largest group of countries recorded a slight and stable increase in the employment rate (Belgium, Germany, France, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Austria, Finland, Sweden, United Kingdom and Turkey). Other countries remained on a flat trajectory, in other words, they recorded a stable rate (Denmark, Italy, Portugal, Slovenia, Slovakia, Norway and Switzerland). Another important group showed important fluctuations, but it had a higher rate in 2016 compared to different starting points (Bulgaria, Estonia, Ireland, Spain, Latvia, Lithuania and Poland).

In Romania of the latest 20 years, on the background of the decrease of the number of employed population, there is also a constant decrease of the share of young population in the total employed population. An analysis of their employment shows that inactivity and unemployment are related to younger people aged between 15 and 24. As a rule, young people are less present on the labor market because a large part of them is enrolled in the education system. On the other hand, the low share of young persons in the total of employed population is also determined by the difficulties they faced in the employment process, especially due to employers' requests on their work experience and skills, but also job offers inadequacy with their expectations. Long-term migration is also widespread and steadily increasing among young people, a phenomenon that will continue to adversely influence the evolution of working age population [(9)]. The employment and respectively unemployment rates among women aged between 15 and 24 is another aspect that has to be taken into account due to the fact that in 2015 the employment rate barely reached one quarter of the working age population. For the respective categories, the active measures of employment must take into account their inclusion and maintenance on the labor market, while fulfilling the principle of equal opportunities.

Global crises, political instability and the economic crisis at national level have influenced the efficiency of employment policies. The main constraints refer to the reduced institutional capacity of central and local public institutions, to limited interinstitutional collaboration, insufficient financing of actions, low implication of private sector in qualifications development process. Therefore, the past few years insisted on stimulating the creation of new quality jobs, fighting informal economy[10], regional development and creating jobs in small villages and towns, appropriate correlation of the educational offer with the requirements of the labor market, implementing active aging policies and lifelong learning, increasing the degree of inclusion on the labor market, improving cooperation between main actors on the labor market, modernization of the National Employment Agency, improving analysis and forecasting skills for efficient employment policies etc.

By returning to the analysis in Romania in the year of 2015, it can be noticed that employees showed a downward trend on the background of the increase of the number of self-employed workers. The number of employers in 2015 is a very modest one, which indicates a troublesome consolidation of market relations, but also the presence of a low entrepreneurial spirit.

Self-employed workers and family workers represent the majority in the informal employment, which, in its turn, reaches about 30% of total employment in agriculture, construction, services. They are particularly affected by precarious working conditions and are often outside of the scope of the labor law, which does not fully regulate non-standard forms of work with regard to seasonal work, short-term work at home, etc., thus perpetuating informal labor relations.

Unfortunately, at the moment, the economic imbalances seriously worsened have led to a reduction in the volume of investments in long-term tangible assets, causing Romania's economy to offer less and less employment opportunities.

Uneven distribution of age categories can be also noted at the European level. Therefore, we note from Eurostat analysis that the employment rate among people aged between 25 and 54 has remained basically the same since 2001 and until present, while in case of elderly persons (aged between 55 and 64) the rate has increased significantly, and for younger persons (aged between 15 and 24) the rate decreased significantly.

[10] The informal sector includes: 1. Unregistered employees, namely persons carrying out their activity within an economic or social unit; 2. Individuals in the absence of a contract or persons employed in unregistered non-agricultural family units; 3. Persons employed in agricultural holdings who sold more than 50 percent of the production, so they are active on the market.

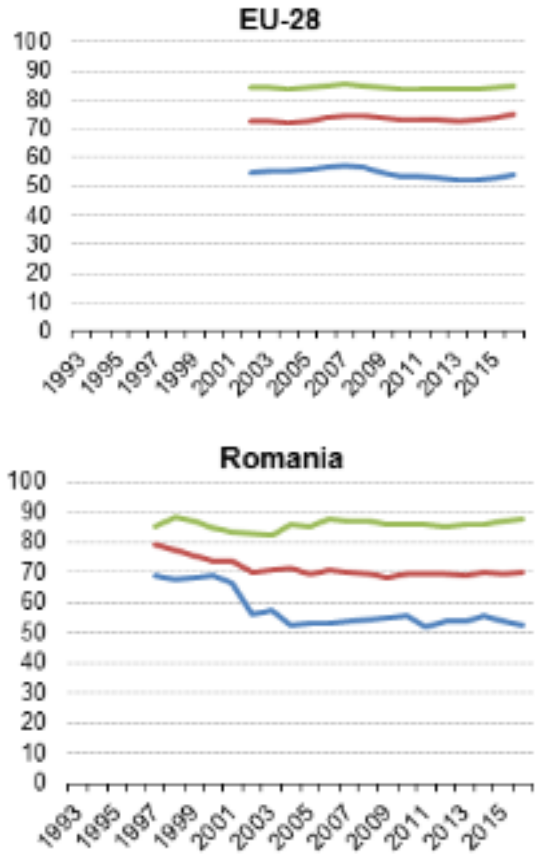
The employment rates significantly varies depending on the level of studies (see Image 3). The rates analyzed depending on the level of studies are based on the category of age between 25 and 64, since younger persons may still be enrolled in a form of education, especially in tertiary education, and such thing can be reflected in the employment rates. In 2016, in the European Union, the employment among persons aged between 25 and 64 who graduated tertiary education institution [short cycle tertiary education, bachelor, master or PhD. studies (or other equivalent studies)], was of 84.8%, much higher than the employment rate of persons who graduated at most a primary or lower secondary education institution (54.3%). The employment rate of persons with upper secondary or post-secondary non-university education was of 74.8% within the European Union. Apart from the fact they are already experiencing the lowest change of finding a job (among these educational level categories), the persons who graduated at most a lower secondary education institution were also the most affected by the crisis: the employment rate of this category decreased by 5.1% between 2007 and 2013, while the corresponding number of high-school education persons was of 1.7%, and for higher education persons was of 1.8%. As we can note in Image 3, it is very important that persons graduate at least high-school studies in order to have the opportunity to find a job in Belgium, Bulgaria, Czech Republic, Lithuania, Poland and Slovakia, but less in Denmark, Estonia, Greece, Cyprus and Luxembourg[11].

Image 3. The employment rate according to the level of studies



-Less than primary, primary and secondary education (levels 0-2)

-Upper secondary and post-secondary non-tertiary education (levels 3 and 4)

-Tertiary education (levels 5-8)

Obviously, the largest professional category in the European Union in 2016 is represented by the employers in the field of personal services and sales, representing 9.5 % of the labor force or 21.4 million persons. These figures exceed the total number of the eight categories of occupation with the smallest share, which, among others, include all works in the agricultural and food processing industry field and members of the armed forces. The category of service and sales workers is followed by the officials that are again followed by administrative and commercial function experts[12].

3. The main factors of impact on the labor market in the current background

The labor market of Romania is strongly influenced by internal and external social and economic factors, and in this background the quality of the work force has an overwhelming importance. Educational systems must be adjusted to the requirements of the labor marker, so that to generate human resources with a high degree of adaptability to the rapid changes of the European labor market and to the increasingly diverse demands of employers. In this background, we will analyze the factors with a major influence on work demand and supply, and the influences on the business environment and labor market institutions.

[11] http://ec.europa.eu/eurostat/statistics-explained/index.php/Employment_statistics/ro

a) Factors of impact on work demand

Labor work, being a derivate component of the goods and services market, is also an inseparable part of the economic system and fully reflects the tendencies of its development. This is why, an important condition for the recovery of the labor market would be, first of all, the improvement of the economic situation on the labor market, especially in the real sector of the economy, which generates new jobs. Therefore, the main challenges in terms of labor demand in Romania are the following:

- the unfavorable environment for economic growth and the creation of sustainable and quality/attractive jobs: the existence of the paradigm of the economic development based on consumption; the high level of informal economy; the lack of priorities to promote productive transformations and support for growth potential sectors and sectors which can create sustainable jobs; unsustainable economic growth with limited potential for jobs creation; asymmetric economic growth; the extension of activities in "subsistence agriculture"; the lack of genuine social dialogue on macroeconomic measures and policies, low work productivity;
- the shortage of appropriately qualified labor force, especially in the rural environment, both for technological agriculture and for the development of the business in non-agricultural sectors;
- the slow progress in improving business climate (started in 2016) was seriously affected by legislative changes of 2017 (the modifications of the Tax Code, the modification of the minimum age without correlating it with labor productivity etc.).

b) Factors of impact on work supply

In what concerns labor supply, this was strongly influenced by the evolution of demographic indicators, but also by the level and quality of professional training of human capital. The continuous decline of population affects labor market by reducing the number of active population and aging of the labor force, thus generating an increase in the dependency ratio of elderly people, as well as in the economic dependency ratio. The level and quality of employment depends to a large extent on its professional training, which generates the degree of adaptability and employability on the labor market.

In order to develop employment policy and strategy to identify and provide coordinates for a certain period, it is required the existence of correctly identified and reviewed data and information, and in order to correlate labor demand with supply, it is required the development of a solid platform of social dialogue between all the actors involved in this process (Ministry of Labor and Social Justice, Ministry of National Education, Ministry of Business, Trade and Entrepreneurship, Ministry of Economy, other educational institutions, economic agents, business associations, sectoral committees and social partners), in order to produce the most accurate forecasts under which the state demand for different jobs/professions will be established.

c) The factors of influence on social dialogue on the labor market

The increase of the awareness of social dialogue importance, as well as its development in order to conduct consultations and exchange of information in the field of social and economic policies are critical for strengthening mutual trust and cooperation between employers, employees, central specialized bodies of the government and local government authorities.

One of the problems that we have to face in this field is the poor capacity to create partnerships, especially at the local level, the lack of constructive local dialogue among the main actors with potential to contribute to community development (local government, private sector, civil society, donors, community, including migrants).

d) Institutions and mechanisms on the labor market

One of the key-conditions to obtain a sustainable increase of the employment rate with impact both on individuals and on the national economy as a whole is the consolidated institutional capacity of all actors involved in the development and performance of public policies in the field, as well as the existence of appropriate mechanisms to ensure the implementation of public policies. An important role must be played by the increase of the institutional capacity of the local government authorities. Regional/local authorities have a critical role in the economic and social promotion and development of regions. The institutional capacity of the National Employment Agency needs to be continuously consolidated and adapted to labor market requirements in order to comply with the policies in the field and to achieve the development of modern labor market, to enable the increase of employment opportunities and to ensure a sustainable integration of the persons within the economic circuit.

From the perspective of the institutions and mechanisms available on the labor market, the following challenges were identified:

1. Low institutional capacity of the relevant actors on the labor market: low institutional capacity to issue, implement and assess employment policies; the need to modernize Public Employment Service nationally and locally; low institutional capacity to implement active employment measures, including by offering equal opportunities to women; low capacity to control the fulfillment of labor law, as well as to implement the provisions of employment policies on the labor law. Private sector has low capacity to contribute to the development of qualifications, and this is something that must be remedied;

2. The low level of wages, especially of the minimum wage. Despite all current measures taken for wage increase, if this is not correlated with an appropriate labor productivity, it can turn into a burdensome expense for any government. The high number of unproductive jobs is one of the causes of low wages. Another identified problem is the high share of undeclared salaries and the removal of the gap between minimum wages for the budgetary sector and the real sector of the economy;
3. the existing pressure within the social protection system generated by aging of population with consequences on human capital and social security system; the demotivating nature of the social security system; the high level of poverty and social exclusion, especially in rural areas; inefficient social inclusion measures, including on the labor market, for vulnerable persons.

4. Migration - a complex phenomenon of influences on labor force

Not only in our country, but also at European level in the current economic background, the situation of labor force is generalized. „The new challenges brought by the decline and aging of population will require objective, detailed and complete reconsiderations of many existing economic, social and political existent programs and policies. Such reconsiderations shall include a long-term perspective. Critical issues to be approached by these reconsiderations: (a) appropriate retirement age; (b) level, type and nature of retirement and healthcare benefits for the elderly; (c) participation in the economic activity; (d) appropriate level of pension and health contribution for an increasing elderly population; (e) policies and programs on international migration, in particular replacement migration and the integration of a large number of recent migrants and their descendants[13]".

The migration crisis will lead to reconsiderations and adjustments of immigration policies in developed European countries and potentially to reconsiderations of development strategies. Governments are expected to undertake programs and measures to increase the participation of inactive national population in economic activities (alongside measures already taken to increase standard retirement age and length of service for full retirement). The reserves are important if we take a look at the employment rates of working age population (15-64 years old): values of 72-74% in Germany, United Kingdom, Sweden, the Netherlands, Denmark and values lower than 65% in most of the other countries (61% in our country) (Eurostat, 2016b). On the other hand, this year in February, the employment rate reached 10.2% in France, 11.7% in Italy, 12.3% in Portugal, 20.4% in Spain, 24% in Greece, 21.7 millions of unemployed persons being recorded in the European Union (Eurostat, 2016c; 2016d)).

However, migration will continue to be indispensable for developed economies, but changes are expected in terms of the level of the phenomenon and the flows origin. An expectation period is foreseen after the great wave of 2015 and its unknown consequences and implications[14].

5. Labor force in Romania

Although in the last 15 years the GDP increased 4 times, from EUR 40.8 billion in 2000 to EUR 160.4 billion in 2015; Despite this, the increase of the GDP does not effectively show the welfare of the persons and how good the quality of the environment is (Eurostat – section GDP and beyond).

The Romanian economy recorded a cyclical growth between 2014-2015, so that in 2016, the economic growth reached the peak in relation to the post-crisis period (4.9%), a situation generated by a strong domestic demand on the background of pro-cyclical tax policies. The economic growth is projected to remain stable during the term used for forecasts, namely of 3.7% in 2018. The current account deficit broke down in 2016 and is expected to be worse, as strong domestic demand led to increased imports. Private consumption continued to increase, by being encouraged by strong wage increases and by the decrease of indirect taxes. While private investments benefited from low interest rates and a stable level of investors trust, public investments were reduced in 2016 due to a low level of EU funds absorption. The employment slightly decreased in 2016 and it is expected to grow at a moderate pace[15].

The Romanian balance sheet on labor market, education and social reforms is heterogeneous. Progress in reforming public employment services was initially slow, but accelerated significantly in 2016, being catalyzed by the efforts of Romania to meet the preconditions for obtaining EU funds. The repeated requests to extend the area of active policies in the field of labor force and to increase their efficiency received an appropriate answer in 2016, by legislative amendments, the integration of national budgets and of the European Social Fund, as well as by means of a better coordination between employment and social care services. The recommendations specific to each country (RST) which were successively formulated in order to find solutions for the problems regarding employment among young people and the high percentage of young persons who are not professionally enrolled and do not attend any educational or training program found their answer in a more integrated approach, which was proposed in 2016, including by granting a central role to the National Employment Agency. Salary tax was reduced, but no specific objective was envisaged. Repeated requests to fight undeclared work generated limited progress, highlighted by joint inspections carried out by tax administration and Labor Inspection in 2016.

Furthermore, so far, there has been limited progress on the set up of a mechanism for the establishment of the minimum wage, the decisions made not being based on objective criteria. In what concerns social inclusion, the Law on minimum inclusion income was adopted in 2016 and will become effective throughout this year. During 2016-2017 the reorientation to the introduction of integrated services for disadvantaged groups started and could have an important impact if fully enforced and extended nationally. There has also been modest progress in improving the quality and access to pre-school children education and care by introducing social vouchers for poor families, including for gypsy people. Early school leaving strategy was adopted although nothing was improved in this respect in 2016, but it will be essential to speed up implementation on the field in order to decrease school dropout rate. The registration of certain results in the field of vocational and technical education was intended (VET) by adopting a VET strategy and by re-introducing vocational schools, but these measures were inadequately correlated with the labor law.

6. Conclusions

The access to decent work for all citizens is a priority for labor market policies across the European Union because this is the basic mechanism of social inclusion. The diagnosis of the labor market situation shows profound social dislocations caused as a consequence of the transformation of the economic structures after 1990: the decrease of the number of active population and employed population until 2006, the high share of the agriculture in the structure of the employed population by activity sectors, seasonal nature of the labor market, etc. In relation to the European statistics, there is a gap between the Romanian labor market and the European markets. While in the urban environment, labor market is in line with the European general model, with a sub-representation of entrepreneurs (business owners and self-employed workers), in the rural environment, the labor market rather follows the model existing at the beginning of capitalist societies, the majority of the population works in own households and is not connected to the mechanisms of the market economy[16].

The evolution of the employment and social situation in Europe: the analysis of 2017 shows positive trends, but points out high pressure on young persons[17]. The employment rate has never been so high in the EU, by being in fact 234 million persons with job and, at the same time, the unemployment rate is the lowest since December 2008. As of 2013, 10 million jobs have been created in the EU. However, beyond social and economic progress, there is evidence showing the existence of a great pressure on younger generations. In this context, Marianne Thyssen, the European Commissioner for Employment, Social Affairs, Skills and Labor Mobility declared: "This annual review shows once again that we are firmly on the path towards more jobs and growth. However, today's young and their children may end up worse off than their parents. This is not what we want. Swift action is needed. With the European Pillar of Social Rights we want to preserve and improve our social standards and living conditions for future generations."

The report that the European Commission draw up last year showed that, despite the steady improvement in EU living standard, young people do not benefit from this positive evolution as much as elderly. Furthermore, the share of younger persons in labor income decreased over time. These challenges affect the decisions of young couples, including the decision of having children or buying a house. In its turn, this can have adverse effect on fertility rates and, therefore, on the sustainability of pension systems and economic growth. Furthermore, the working age population is projected to decline by 0.3% each year until 2060. This means that a lower number of employed persons will have to ensure the maintenance of current growth trajectory and, at the same time, a lower number of taxpayers will contribute to pension systems – often with lower and/or irregular contributions as they will not be corresponding to full-time and/or standard work- while more pensioners will depend on them. Today's young workers and future generations therefore seem to face a double burden stemming from demographic change and the need to ensure pension systems' sustainability.

Policy makers can prepare for and mitigate these evolutions in several ways. First of all, we need to make full use of our human potential on the labor market, by activating and equipping with the right skills all generation groups and making sure there is a proportionate link between the duration of working lives and life expectancy. Policy efforts resulting in higher fertility and efficient migration management can also help, as well as supporting innovation and increasing efficient spending on investment in young and old people's skills and their education. Lastly, social partners can make a major contribution to bridging the gap between younger and older workers to promote a fairer labor market for both. This includes promoting lifelong learning, the provision of social protection benefits and contributing in the design and implementation of employment protection legislation and active labor market policies. Investing in people and empowering them to harness quality job opportunities is exactly at the heart of the 'New Skills Agenda for Europe'. It has the aim to support the development of citizens' skills to prepare them for the changing world of work.

According to the study drawn up by KeysFin, Romania had, in 2016, an employed population of 8.45 million[18] (private & public system), compared to 9.35 million in 2007. If in 2007 our country had 5.19 male employees, in 2016 the number was of 4.8 million. A similar decrease, but even more pronounced, is registered among women. "The statistical data partly confirms the Romanians' exodus towards the West. Since the EU accession in 2007, many Romanians have chosen to leave to developed countries, searching for better paid jobs, better living", the analysts explained. The highest labor demand is among experts (17,731 jobs), almost double compared to 2009, but remains under the record level of 2007 (22,295 jobs). Statistical data shows that there is also a high demand of service workers (8,205 jobs), along with facility and machinery operators/machines and equipment assemblers (7,035) and qualified workers (6,904 jobs). Overall, on the background of the economic growth, the demand for qualified workers in the economy has evolved over the last few years, but remained under the value of 10 years ago", KeysFin analysts state.

Despite the attempts to remedy labor force situation, the crisis of 2009-2010 strongly hit private initiative, which shows that the number of entrepreneurs decreased in 2016 to 1.6 million compared to over 2 million in 2007. More than 400,000 businesses were swept away by the crisis. Take a look of this number from the point of view of business relations horizontally in the economy and you shall have the real dimension of the socio-economic impact", KeysFin experts explained. According to the data of the National Prognosis Commission, it is estimated that the labor market will not record significant increases in the future. The estimation of the National Prognosis Commission shows that the average number of employees will increase until 2020 to 5.6 million, compared to 4.95 million in 2017, out of which 4.6 million will be in the private area, the rest will be employed with the state. The perspective of the authorities on salary evolution until 2020 provides the increase of the net average wage of over EUR 130 (RON 590) from RON 2274 in 2017 to RON 2864 in 2020.

The following are among short and medium term actions which can stimulate employment growth among young persons, especially in case of our country[19]:

- support for young persons to create and develop micro-enterprises, aiming to strengthen entrepreneurship among young persons;
- tax incentives for enterprises using indefinite labor agreements or for turning temporary agreements in indefinite labor agreements;
- consolidation of professional training courses, advice on setting up small businesses;
- promotion of professional information, guidance and counseling services;
- promotion of the training on the job for low skilled and unskilled young persons; Perspectives of Romanian labor market on the background of the European strategy 2020 243

On the long term, we believe that a significant impact would be represented by the launch of investment programs (minimum 2% of the GDP) for the development of educational systems.

The Romanian labor work is nowadays strongly affected by the government actions of 2017 which aimed the modification of the tax code, the level of the minimum wage and salary law. The Romanian business environment is severely distorted by these measures which did not have sufficient impact-based studies.

FACTS AND PERSPECTIVES OF SOCIAL POLICIES

Liviu RADU[*]
Carmen RADU[]

Abstract

This study aims to present a short review of the facts and perspectives of the social policies under the terms of the economic, social and political conditions of 2018. After a complicated year, both politically and economically, with deep changes in terms of legislation, 2018 promises to be full of challenges in what concerns the economic, social and political area. The economic and political events of last year (the negotiations on the Brexit, USA paradigm changes, governmental uncertainty in Germany, still visible manifestations of Russia, the still uncertain situation in the European area, etc.) shall have an impact on the evolution of the Romanian economy and on the governmental policies. We hereby intend to analyze the facts and the main potential evolutions regarding the situation of the reforms of the social policies area from the perspective of Romania and of the European Union.

1. Introduction

This paperwork seeks to find answers regarding the sustainability of the long-term social policy system. Social policies are measures and actions undertaken by the state (strategies, programs, projects, institutions, legislation, etc.) which address the needs of social protection, education, health, habitation etc. In other words, social policies aim at promoting and, as far as possible, supporting the welfare. Social policies aim to change the characteristics of the social life of the community in a direction considered acceptable. The central element is the welfare of the individual, family, collectivity and generally, of the society.

Despite this, the state is just one of the welfare providers, human welfare having multiple sources. Humans are superior and unique beings, whose welfare can be brought by the richness and variety of products on the market, by the income from work (salaries or profit), private income (rent, insurance, loan, etc.). Another source of welfare is represented by social status, family, neighbors, friends, work colleagues and everyone who perceives you as an individual within a community. Finally, another source of welfare relates to the functioning of state institutions, NGOs, foundations or associations which every individual resorts to in his/her current work. Therefore, individuals' welfare cannot be measured by means of a single template, but depending on every individual, his/her desires, aspirations and interests.

Therefore, the main consequence of state social policies is social protection of population, but this is achieved under the joint efforts of all the involved factors – economy, labor market, non-governmental sector, community, state.

Social policies are part of public policies. Public policies consist of the state policies in all the areas relevant for the functioning of a society: economic policies, demographic policies, tax policies, salary policies, policies in the field of environmental protection, urbanization policies, etc. Therefore, social policies represent a set of programs, activities and measures aimed at addressing (elementary) human social protection needs, education, health, habitation and – generally – the social welfare increasing by means of (re) distributing important resources of money, services and time.

Social policy at EU level consists of[1] a set of complementary policies, which have developed and multiplied over time and which act in those sectors of activity affecting or generating the level of individual and social welfare. The permanent concern of the European community on social policy – started with the Treaty of Rome (1957) - has, over time, led to the creation of an "European social model". One of the most important moments of the evolution of this model is around 2000, when the transition from an approach based on the mitigation of adverse social consequences of structural changes, to an approach that aims at modernizing the European social system and investing in human capital occurs – in other words, the transition from a quantitative approach (mitigation of consequences) to a qualitative one (investments in individual). Furthermore¸ an important characteristic of social policy is the delegation of responsibilities regarding the fulfillment of community targets to Member States.

The goal of the European Union is to ensure the protection of fundamental rights in the creation, application and construction of EU law. Fundamental rights of EU, in their classic function of defense rights, protects the individuals against public power intromissions of EU institutions. The main values of the European Union: the rule of law, democracy and human rights introduced in its founding treaties, were consolidated by the adoption of a series of documents, which facilitated the fulfillment of certain stages. Furthermore, by means of every step whereby new regulations were established, which led to the development of the Union, new guarantees on human rights were granted[2] .

The Community, and later the European Union, by means of its initial structure as an economic construction and by the modality of making the decisions, succeeded in building an unit and an ability to act which is superior to other European cooperation organizations. The process of integration of this space was achieved by establishing four categories of fundamental freedoms for the European Union Market (free movement of goods, persons, services and capital), to which the following were added: the removal of barriers, the harmonization of legislations, as well as the establishment of an intergovernmental and democratic process of decision-making, in which the application of the acquis communautaire is critical[3]. For the first time in the history of Europe, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union sums up in a single document the whole area of civil, politic, economic and social rights. The fundamental legal regulations were acknowledged, reaffirmed and developed in the content of the Charter, which fulfills the competences and duties of the Union, but also the principle of subsidiarity. These rights result especially from constitutional traditions and joint international obligations of Member States, from the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union and of the European Court of Human Rights.

The Charter is structured in a Preamble and 54 articles, grouped in six charters: Dignity, Freedoms, Equality, Solidarity, Citizens' Rights and Justice. Therefore, in the 7 chapters, different from traditional constitutions, the Charter makes an explicit distinction between citizens' rights and the rights of all individuals residing in the EU. At the same time, the Charter is an innovation by its content, being much broader than that of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms[4] (Fuerea, 2006).

In Romania, social policy is a concerted policy, coordinated by the Ministry of Labor and Social Justice and supported by the activity of other ministers, such as the Ministry of Health, Ministry of National Education and Ministry of Research and Innovation. The fields of activity of the national social policy are the following: 1. Labor force market (including unemployment) and salary policies; 2. Pensions and other social insurance rights; 3. Social assistance and family policies; 4. Labor relationships, health and safety at work.

2. Labor force market

The labor market trust index of Romania[5] shows that more than 60% of the country population believes that 2018 will represent a year of economic downfall due to the following grounds: • 61% of the employees do not expect a salary increase over the next six months • 64.5% feel a greater stress at work • 60% want to change their job in the following year.

The legislative changes in the field of salary, tax and contributions from the beginning of 2018 make Romanian employees to lose confidence in what concerns their future on the labor market. Along with elements perceived to be negative, specific to the companies they work for, these changes make the employees to await a year with more work, more stress and lower income.

According to the answers given within the survey carried out by Undelucram.ro, the largest platform dedicated to Romanian employees, 2018 will bring a massive labor migration between companies operating in Romania.

Not less than 60% of the respondents said they wanted to change their jobs in 2018. The decisions to leave the current job appear to be voluntary, given that 48.3% of the employees are not afraid of being laid off in the next six months. In order to successfully make the step towards a new job in the following year, 61.86% of the respondents said they are willing to take part in advanced courses. 40.9% of the survey respondents declared their ability to be relocated to a different city than the one they are living in order to start a new career. Even so, most survey respondents acknowledge that it will be difficult for them to find a job according to their training and expectations. 44.8% considers that at the time being, there are fewer job opportunities than in mid-2017.

The decision of the employees to search for new opportunities in 2018 is fueled by several factors which, in their opinion, affected and will affect both the income and the professional development. The pessimism that manifests itself in the labor force is, first of all, linked to salary. 61% of the employees do not expect any salary increase in the following six months. Almost 70% of them expect an adverse evolution of income, believing that their salary will lower as a consequence of transferring the contributions from the employer to the employees. Neither the other components of the income make the employees feel more confident. 52.8% believe that, in addition to the lower wages they will have in 2018, they will also be affected by a decreasing bonus.

If at the end of 2016 the employees were already planning the holidays for 2017, currently 55.3% of them stopped doing this, saying that they expect to afford less leisure time.

In addition to the lower income, Romanian employees believe that work environment is gradually coming down. 64% claim that during the last six months, the workload has increased, while the support provided by the company or colleagues for the performance of the activity remained the same (51%). Even with a higher workload, work environment, procedures or efficiency remained the same (41.6%), or got worse (41.8%). This leads to a greater stress, felt by 64.5% of the employees. Despite the fact they have evolved professionally in the companies they work for (56.7%), only 18.7% believe that they can advance on the hierarchical scale of the current job. The aforementioned elements make 40.3% of the employees lose their trust in the future of the companies they work for.

3. Pension system

For those directly involved in studying, calculating and granting pensions (National Fund of Public Pensions, the Ministry of Public Finance, Ministry of Labor, Family and Social Protection, National Commission for Prognosis and even the Presidential Commission for the Analysis of Social and Demographic Risks) - the pension system involves a great volume of material, technical and human resources. Furthermore, pensions are always a favorite subject for electoral campaigns; the politicians always promise higher pensions to an electorate they reward or buy. If the issue of pensions and especially the high number of retirees worry the authorities all over the world, in Romania the situation is quite dramatic due to multiple conditions which split the working population. Unfortunately, the intervention of politics in the economy life and structure affects decisively this fragmentation of the population.

The Romanian pension system, as in case of most of the European countries, originates from the system designed by Bismarck about 125 years ago, being "step-by-step" systems.

The most important observation for this system is that it has a compulsory nature, which is related to individual labor agreements. The system is supported by three parties: employer, employee and state.

Western Europe took over the Bismarckian system, thus becoming the alternative model to the Beveridgean or Anglo-Saxon insurance system. It is used in many EU Member States such as France, Germany, Austria, Belgium, the Netherlands and Romania.

The characteristics of this model are the following:

- the financial resources are mainly represented by compulsory contributions paid by employees and employers;
- furthermore, there are resources coming from state budget (local or national) allowances or other types of allowances;
- the institutions managing the insurance funds are nonprofit;
- the management and use of insurance funds are made nationally and by means of local tax administration departments.

At the level of the European Union, including in countries located in Central and Eastern Europe, pension systems are mainly organized as state pension systems, financed and supported by the state budget, a modality of organization with special effects on public finance. Furthermore, when we speak about the way of organizing and financing different types of public pension systems available in the European Union Member States, but especially when we speak about their financial sustainability, we have to take into account the increasingly trend of population aging in conjunction with financial constraints. In order to classify pension systems, the following determinants must be taken into account:

First of all, according to financing means, the following categories are outlined a) pay as to go (PAYG) systems which operate on the principle of social solidarity, namely the employee pays, as long as he/she is active, a contribution which will become the pension of future generations and b) systems privately financed or managed by the contribution of the employee or the employer;

According to legal basis and establishment modality, the following categories are outlined: systems established by law or by collective labor agreement;

According to the participation in the system, they are compulsory and voluntary;

According to the types of benefits: systems where the obtained benefits vary depending on the results of the investment of the assets of the participant's funds and systems where a certain benefit is established and the contributions for reaching the respective benefit are calculated. The great majority of the European countries fall under the scope of this last type of defined benefits, except Germany, Slovakia and Romania where points system is available.

Within the European Union, pension system is supported on three pillars: the first pillar belongs to the pensions regulated under the law, totally financed by shares – social insurance contributions of the participants to the public pension system. It is a pay as to go (PAYG) system under the scope of which fall countries such as Bulgaria, Estonia, Lithuania, Latvia, Hungary, Poland, Slovakia and Romania. The second pillar consisting of pensions established under the labor agreement (by collective or individual provisions) called occupational pensions, strictly connected with the workplace in countries such as ca Bulgaria, Poland, Hungary, Romania or Slovenia. The third pillar, of the individual provisions, with no connection with the occupation. The members are largely employed, without this being absolutely required, under the possibility of collective membership (by trade unions or associations). The participation is not mandatory under the law, the employers or the state can contribute to this system.

Despite all these, in the assessment of the pension plans, we have to take into account what happens in practice and it was noted that the amount saved by the population is relatively stable in a certain period. If a certain saving system is required, the amounts saved by other means will decrease. Therefore, the economic increase should not be connected to the specific arrangements for the constitution of pension systems, to the existence of the accumulation funds, even if they represent important investment sources. Furthermore, the largest part of pension funds is placed, in order to avoid investment risks, in government bonds, therefore in public debts. Indeed, we expect that the management of private pension fund to be a prudential one, therefore, to avoid failure, but relatively small accumulations of system contributions will result. The perception of the differences in the addressing of pension reforms by the World Bank and the European Union is important to us, given that in the treatment applied to World Bank (supported by the International Monetary Fund, in what concerns the low level of income, generally speaking, therefore the level of the pensions, as a modality to control the inflation by reducing consumption). It is obvious that not only Romania has suffered such an influence, but also other former European socialist countries. It should be noted that the differences noted hereby between EU and the World Bank are not directly disputed, but rather by mutual ignorance of the projects of each of the parties. Therefore, in the studies of the World Bank, public pension schemes are deemed inappropriate, difficult to reform and represents a deadlock for the economic growth and the governments of the assisted countries not to repeat "the costly mistakes of industrialized countries".

On the other hand, the scope within the EU is that the reform of the pension system is not performed to the detriment of current beneficiaries, therefore not by diminishing the role of the public system, which is the most widespread and will remain the main system, but which, despite this, is not the only solution. By means of reform measures, which could also involve reductions in the amount of public pensions (very generous in certain countries), a fair intergenerational balance, a satisfactory level of pensions, sustainability and modernity should be reached.

Therefore, a retiree can have one or more pensions, financed from a single source or from several sources. Theoretically speaking, the more the pension sources are multiplied, the more likely it would be to cover the requirements of an acceptable standard of living. However, this does not happen automatically, if the amount of the pensions from each source is low, the optimal level of financial resources may not be reached. The most disadvantageous situations, not at all impossible, would be those by which, although there are available several sources of pensions and several types of pensions, the target population is not covered and/or a combined amount of the pensions is provided which would have been provided by a single system / single pension. Normally, it would be desirable to seek high performances in delivering income to beneficiaries within each system/source/pension. If two or more systems do not exceed the cumulative performance that would be achieved by a single one, their introduction is not justified, given that this would imply a higher level of administration costs compared to the operation of a single one.

In Romania, in the short term, the risk of breakdown of the pension system was removed, in medium and long term, but its sustainability is still questioned. On the background of an unfavorable employment rate, on the background of a rapid population aging and of a demographic involution which is predicted to be disastrous (the National Institute of Statistics predicts that the population will decrease by 2060 by about seven million persons), the pension system will no longer be able to provide the necessary social protection for future retirees and will become a cornerstone of the economy by affecting investment in productive sectors and increasing taxation). After recalculating the pension system in 2010, it became more equitable, being relatively simply to apply and easier to understand. In this context, the measures in recent years have favored sustainability.

In our country, the current pension system is based on three pillars, the same as in case of the European Union Member States:

Pillar I public budget of pension pay as you go with defined benefits, regulated by law 263 of 2010 according to which the contribution of the employee is of 10.5% of the gross salary income and the contribution of the employer of 20.8% in relation to the employee's gross salary.

Pillar II compulsory pension fund, regulated by law 411 of 2004 characterized by:

- mandatory contribution for employees under 35 and optional for those between 35 and 45;
- contribution (in 2013) of 4% of the gross salary income of the employee is a part of the contribution due to Pillar I;
- minimum investment guarantees – actual amount of all contributions minus management fees.

Pillar III of optional pension fund, regulated by law 204 of 2006, where the contribution is optional, is privately managed and the income cannot be guaranteed, it is also optional. The contribution in this pillar is of no more than 15% in connection with gross income, is a contribution jointly paid by the employee and the employer and is encouraged by tax deductibility.

Several studies have emerged in the recent years which relate in detail to public policy alternatives in the field of pensions. Therefore, in 2012 Expert Forum published Working Paper 3 called “Cine va plăti pensiile „decreților” în 2030? Situația României în contextul comparativ UE și 7 scenarii de evoluție ale sistemului public de pensii” (Who will pay the pension of the children of the decree in 2030? Romania's situation in the comparative EU context and 7 evolution scenarios of the public pension system).

Therefore, according to the most plausible scenario, if the legislation in its current form remains in force, pension fund deficit shall be of no more than 2.5% of the GDP in 2019. In 2042, the fund will reach a deficit of about 1.2 % of the GDP. The pension as a percentage of gross average salary, which is currently of 37%, will decrease to 24 % in 2031. The conclusion of the study is that depending on the alternation of political parties with left or right ideology, the emphasis will be placed either on the social component or on the reduction of the deficit in GDP. In case of the social component, the shares of the contributions directed to pillar II increase to 10%, the deficit of GDP may increase by 0.62% compared to initial scenario, but the replacement rate improves by 2%. If the GDP deficit is to be reduced, the retirement age will be increased to 65 years and as a consequence of a fund deficit of no more than 2% of the GDP in 2019, the fund will be balanced. However, the pension system will be the test stone of any government for 50 years of now on, this is the conclusion of another study called "Riscuri şi inechităţi sociale în România" (Social risks and inequities in Romania) published in 2009 by the Presidential Commission for the for the Analysis of Social and Demographic Risks[1].

According to the respective study, the retired population (aged 65 and more) is in a continuous growth while the number of employees decreases dramatically:

- since 2008, few generations have started to enter the labor market, and the number of employees will not increase much, even in the event of a steady economic growth. As a consequence, the use of immigrants will become a necessity in five or six years, when young labor force inputs will be very low and will be reduced by the increase in the share of students in every group and by the departure of young people (whose number is already very low) to better paid jobs in the West;
- as of 2030-2035, the children born by the transition generation, likely to be less numerous, will enter the labor market. Only the recovery of the fertility rate (which should reach from 1.3 to at least 1.5, the EU average in the medium term and to 1.7-1.8 in the long term), correlated with the regulation of the migratory flows would reduce this process;
- the issue of the elderly without pension and health insurance will be visible especially after 2025, when persons who work illegally or do not work at all reach old age without benefiting from pension or health insurance, and the costs of the minimum services related to them shall be incurred by the social assistance system.

The first stage of pension fund nationalization in Poland was performed in 2013, when the money of the government bonds was moved from Private Pillar to Public Pillar. Polish state left a period of time where everyone can "choose" to keep the rest of the sums in private Pillar II or to go to state Pillar I. Despite this, at that time, the authorities forbade pension managers to advertise in order to attract participants, and who did not make a choice within a certain time was automatically directed to Pillar I[1].

The Government of Warsaw announced in 2016 the largest restructuring of the pension system of the past two decades, and, as a consequence the authorities are going to abolish privately administrated pensions, the so-called Pillar II, as of 2018. (Reuters news agency). The money shall be transferred to a Reserve Fund and several private mutual funds. Polish government will transfer about a quarter of the assets of about PLN 140 billion, (about $ 35.2 billion), currently held by private pension funds to a single investment manager called the Demographic Reserve Fund, and OFE private funds will be closed[2].

In 2010, the authorities of Budapest used the justification of the anti-crisis fight to take over in the accounts of the state both the government bonds held by the pension funds, thus canceling a significant part of the public debt, and their share portfolio. At that point in time, the value of the total assets of private pension funds of Hungary amounted to about EUR 15 billion.

In 2011, Hungary nationalized private pension system. By means of the new pension legislation, EUR 11 billion passed from pillar II to public pension budget, endangered by collapse. The employees were no longer bound to contribute to private pensions and acquired the right to choose the pension system to contribute at.

As part of the compulsory pension insurance, Hungary operates a so-called mixed system consisting of 2 levels. The first level (pillar) operates as a pay-as-you-go service and represents a proportion of 3⁄4. Level II is a private pension scheme which operates based on the principle of capitalized contributions under a private pension system and represents 1⁄4. The minimum insurance term within pillar I is of 15 years for partial pension and 20 years for full pension[1]. There is no minimum term established for pillar II. The contribution of the insurants in level I of social insurance is of 8.5% and for the members of the private pension scheme is of 0.5%. Insured persons shall be entitled to disability pension in the following situations:

- have lost 67% of their work capacity as a result of health deterioration due to a physical or mental illness and no improvement is expected for one year.
- have fulfilled the required service/insurance years;
- do not work regularly or have a salary that is considerably lower than the salary before the invalidity;

4. Social assistance

A short history of social insurance of Romania reveals[2] that the pension system dates back to 1895 when Mines Act was implemented and the first rules of social assistance were legalized. The workers' rights were in a first stage granted by mutual support between them. Once with the emergence of Mines Act, the introduction of compulsory social insurance for miners and workers in the oil industry was established. On this occasion, both the right to pension and the right to compensation in case of work accidents were institutionalized, a mutual aid fund and a pension fund were established and were supported by the mutual contributions of employers and workers. Later, in 1902 by means of Missir Law, due to the organization of professions, a social insurance system for various categories of craftsmen was established. Subsequently, Nițescu law places on legal basis the principle of compulsory insurances for accidents, illness and old age of all employees in corporations. In the interwar period, the first private social insurance systems emerge, operating in parallel with the compulsory state social insurance system. While state system belonged only to the holders of labor agreements and craftsmen, private system attracted various social categories such as the Romanian Orthodox Church and the members of the creation unions. After the great economic crisis of 1929-1933, Ioaniţescu law unified social insurances throughout the entire national territory. The law establishes the principle of contribution and solidarity, sets the contribution rate to 6% of the salary and guarantees the state pension system. Before the outbreak of World War II in 1938 a new law which tried to keep insured persons under surveillance was adopted.

From the legislative point of view, communist system focused on the modification of previous laws, by Decree 409 of 1945 which provided the increase and indexation of pensions. The last law on social insurances which was adopted by the communist power in 1977 established restrictions on insurance rights.

After 1989, a difficult period of legislative changes in the field of social insurances started, the following being included:

- Law Decree no. 70/08.02.1990 – whereby changes were made to the age pension regime;
- Law Decree no. 118/1190 amended and republished – on granting rights to persons persecuted for political reasons by the dictatorship established as of March 6th, 1945, as well as to those persons deported abroad or prisoners;
- Law 42/1990 – for honoring martyr heroes and granting rights to their successors, wounded persons and persons who fought for the victory of the Revolution of December 1989;
- Law 73/1991 – for establishing social insurance rights and for the amendment and supplementation of regulations of social insurance and pension legislation;
- Law 1/1991 amended and republished – on the social protection of unemployed persons and their reintegration into employment.

The effects of all these contradictory evolutions can be summarized as follows:

- the increase of the total number of retirees from 3.58 million in 1990 to 5.401 million in November 2013 (+50.8%) under the decrease of the number of employees from 8.156 million in 1990 to 4.378 million in September 2013 (- 46,32%);
- dependency rate[3] decreased from 3.43 in 1990 to 0.92 in 2101 and 0.93 in 2013;
- the effective retirement ages were below standard retirement ages: in 2009 the differences were between 5 and 7 years[4];
- dramatic decrease of real net average pension (1990 – 100%) throughout 1990 - 2000 (minimum value of 44.3% in 2000), slight increase throughout 2001-2006 (57-58% in 2006), than the spectacular growth over 2007-2009 (the maximum value being reached in 2010 at 123.8%) and relative stabilization of 2011 - 2012 around the value of 117%;
- replacement rate[5] calculated based on the average pension for normal retirement age and average net salary increased from 48.6% in 2000, to 65.3% in 2010 and 58.2% in 2013 (based on the average net salary of the first 9 months of the year).

Despite all these, we believe that the real reform of state social insurance starts with law no. 19 of 2000, which determines the possibility of access to the social insurance system of all income-producing persons, without being limited to labor agreement holders.

5. Work relationships, health and safety at work

Many of the jobs created in the global economy of today[6] are ecologic jobs, the so-called green jobs, as well as jobs in industries created to mitigate adverse impact on the environment, by developing and implementing alternative technologies and practices. While green jobs are welcome because they offer new employment opportunities, it is important to be set up and monitored so that new potential dangers and risks to be known and eliminated or mitigated.

Education also plays an important role in the development of knowledge/skills in the field of hygiene, body health and integrity, for those integrated in the education system of Romania.

The health and safety at work is perhaps the most important chapter of EU policy on employment and social affairs[7]. The fundamental goal of this chapter is to prevent potential malfunctions within labor system, so that human resource activity can work with maximum efficiency. Human resource is at the forefront, the most important goal being the protection of life, integrity and health of human resource, as well as the prevention of accidents and occupational disease risks.

It is well-known that the scope of the "Community strategy 2007-2012 on health and safety at work"[8] was the continuous, sustainable and homogeneous reduction of work accidents and occupational diseases. Despite this, within the European Union:

- Every year, over 3 million employees suffer a work accident involving absence of more than 3 days from work and around 4000 employees die in the same type of accidents;
- 24.2% of the employees believe that work can affect their health and safety;
- A quarter of the employees consider that their work affect their health[9];
- Over 3% of the gross domestic product of EU represents the level of direct and indirect costs generated by medical leave;
- Last but not least, social insurance costs that can be related to occupational diseases or work accidents are very high.

By taking into account all these aspects, "National strategy on health and safety at work for 2017-2020" is correlated with EU strategic directions and with the "European Pillar of Social Rights"[10], a document that takes into account the dynamics of recent changes at EU level as well as the changes in the labor market. Therefore, according to the pillar, workers are entitled to a high level of protection of their health and safety at work.

In this context, general goals of National strategy on health and safety at work for 2017-2020 are the following:

- a better implementation of the legislation on health and safety at work, especially in microenterprises and SMEs;
- the improvement of the safety and of the protection of workers' health, especially of those from economic activities of risk, in the priority areas of action, with emphasis on the prevention of occupational diseases;
- the simulation of joint actions with social partners, by the awareness and involvement in the management of health and safety issues at work and the materialization of an efficient social dialogue;
- the appropriate management of the issue of older workers in the context of the general phenomenon of population aging, respectively of active labor force.

The specific goals of the National strategy on health and safety at work for 2017-2020 are the following:

- the improvement of the legal background of the health and safety at work;
- the support of the microenterprises and of the small and medium sized enterprises in terms of the compliance with the legislation on health and safety at work;
- the improvement of the process of observing the legislation in the filed of health and safety at work by actions of the authorities with duties in the field;
- the approaching of the phenomenon of labor force aging and the improvement of occupational disease prevention;
- the improvement of the collection of statistic data
- the consolidation of the coordination with national partners to reduce accidents at work and occupational diseases.

These specific goals shall be achieved according to the National actions plan for the implementation of the national strategy on health and safety at work for 2017-2020 which is an integral part of this document.

6. Conclusions

As shown above, the trends in the evolution of population structure in our country are negative, and we will see an accelerated aging of the population. Currently, the population over 65 is of 3.3 million people, namely 16% of the total population. In 2020. the retirees will account for 3.6 million, namely 17% of the total population of the country and by following the same upward trend, by the middle of this century, the retirees will account for 30% of the total. Simultaneously with the aging of the population, we are witnessing the decrease of the birth rate and the increase of the dependency ratio of the elderly[11].

[11] proiectarea populației active la orizontul anului 2050 (projection of the active population in the horizon of 2050) – INS, 2013

By taking into account this situation, it is noted that the current level of social contribution is unsustainable in the long term. In this context, Romania proposes that between 2014 - 2020, according to the Partnership Agreement with the European Commission: "70% of the population between 20 and 64 years old must be employed" - in what concerns the employment rate, a key element in supporting a viable pension system; and "the number of persons exposed to poverty and exclusion risk must decrease by 580 000 (compared to the levels of 2008).[12]"

2018 started with the enforcement of certain legislative changes[13] affecting most of the population, but also the business environment. The most important changes aim the following: the transfer of the social contributions (pensions, health) from the employer to the employee, the amounts being retained and transfer by the employer; the increase of the national gross minimum wage from RON 1450 to RON 1900; the decrease of the income tax from 16% to 10% and the decrease of the pension contribution share to Pillar II from 5.1% to 3.75%.

Therefore, the level of the contributions calculated to a gross salary decreases by 2 percentage points, from 39.25% to 37.25%. Out of this amount, 35% is incurred by the employee, 25% for pensions and 10% for health. On the other hand, the employers should increase the gross wages by about 20%, so that the net income of the employees remain unchanged or should offset this difference by amounts representing extra pays or bonuses. Self-employed persons, such as lawyers, journalists, writers, notaries or physicians will pay social contributions calculated at the level of the national minimum wage, not related to the amounts earned from the activities carried out, as before. The share of social health insurance (CASS), established as of January 1st, 2018 to 10%, shall be due by natural persons who have the status of employees or have the obligation to pay the contribution. Those who are not exempt will pay CASS if they receive annual earnings amounting to at least 12 minimum wages (namely RON 22,800 to a minimum wage of RON 1,900), from one or more sources of income, such as independent activities, rental or leasing activities, investment (interest, dividends etc.), agricultural activities, association with a legal person or other sources. If the threshold of RON 22,800 was exceeded, the taxpayer must submit to ANAF, until January 31st, 2018, form 600, where the taxpayer will mark that the threshold was exceeded and will pay CASS contribution for 2018 in a fixed amount of RON 2,280, paid in 4 quarterly installments. The contribution is calculated by applying CASS share of 10% to the equivalent threshold of 12 minimum gross wages of RON 22,800. The payment deadlines for each installment amounting to RON 570 are March 26th, June 25th, September 25th and December 21st, 2018. Child raising allowance will increase from RON 1,233 to RON 1,250, being related to the Social Reference Index (ISR), instead of the minimum wage. Minimum allowance is established to the equivalent of 2.5 ISR, and the maximum allowance to RON 8,500.

Despite all these, the legislative changes of the beginning of 2018 were performed without a thorough study of the impact on the Romanian socio-economic environment, thus generating new problems on the labor market, in the sustainability of social programs and in the predictability of business environment.

BRIDGING THE COMPETING VIEWS OF EUROPEAN CULTURAL INTEGRATION: THE TRANSFORMATIVE VIEW OF CULTURE AS A MEANS TO PROMOTE GROWTH, EMPLOYMENT AND SOCIAL COHESION

María Luz SUÁREZ CASTIÑEIRA*

Abstract

The concept of a European culture became very complex with the enlargement of 2004 towards the East, when the EU, as Delanty pointed out, moved "beyond postnationality to an encounter with multiple civilizational forms," multiple histories and competing visions of European integration. The "unity-in-diversity" paradigm turned into a huge challenge for the European institutions. On the one hand, achieving a European image of cultural unity without excluding all the local, regional and national cultures is a very complex, if not impossible, task. On the othe hand, culture remains an ambiguous term in European institutions due to the lack of a full-fledged European cultural policy. This paper focuses first on how in the early 1970s the EC/EU started to be concerned with defining the role of culture, and second on how since the year 2000 culture has progressively acquired a new status with potentially transformative powers to bridge the competing views of cultural integration. Programmes, such as the "2014-2020 Creative Europe" programme, focus on culture as a creative accelerator and promotor of different forms of cultural participation and production. Culture generates "smart, sustainable and inclusive growth", and contributes to "high employment, high productivity, and high social cohesion."

Keywords: Employment, European Culture, European identity, European integration, Unity-in-diversity paradigm.

1. Introduction

Abundant research has been carried out on the complex relationship between culture and European integration[1]. The concept of European integration itself carries multiple competing meanings,[2] depending on the theoretical perspective applied to it (federalism versus intergovernmentalism, functionalism versus constructivism, etc.). When the adjective cultural is added to European integration, the latter becomes highly controversial, as it deals with the societal level[3].

With successive enlargements, the cultural factor was seen as an essential tool to bring the European project closer to the citizens, an instrument capable of creating a sense of belonging to the EU. However, there are multiple menings of culture. Apart from culture defined as a normative model focusing on universal norms of democracy, freedom and human rights, culture can also be understood as communication[4], i.e. what we communicate through language and symbols whose meanings are learned and inherited from one generation to the other. With the process of enlargement, the EU is faced with with a multiplicity of meanings and symbols that are communicated in multiple ways. Furtehr, culture can refer to social behavior as social relations[5]. Culture understood a social construction would entail the construction of a new order on the basis of a new vision of European society. The problem is that there are multiple visions of European society and this explains the ambiguity of the concept of culture in EC/EU documents from the 1970s onwards.

In this paper we will demonstrate that there is another dimension of culture which has been the target of a number of supranational initiatives. This dimension is the area of cultural or artistic production, the cultural sector, defined by the European Commission in 1977 as "the socio-economic whole formed by persons and undertakings dedicated to the production and distribution of cultural goods and services[6]". We will see how the EC/EU institutions have evolved in their approach to culture from an application of the EC Treaty to the cultural sector to culture as a creative accelerator; culture as capable to promote "smart, sustainable and inclusive growth", and contribute to "high employment, high productivity, and high social cohesion", in an effort to build a cultural space including the local, the regional and the national dimensions.

2. A cultural space in the making

2.1. Pre-Mastricht initiatives

Member States have traditionally been reticent to the intervention of the Community in cultural affairs, which explains the lack of a clear European cultural policy. The EC/EU had to wait until 1992 to introduce the so called article on culture in the Treaty of Maastricht, now article 167 of the TFEU[7], allowing the development of cultural action at supranational level.

Before that, however, increasing awareness that the economic, social and political goals were not sufficient basis for the creation of a European Polity led the institutions to publish resolutions and declarations about the potential of culture to unite people, as well as to promote social and economic development. In 1973, at the Copenhagen Summit, the European Council approved a declaration on European identity, defined as "the diversity of cultures within the framework of a common European civilization, the attachment to common values and principles, the increasing convergence of attitudes to life, the awareness of having specific interests in common and the determination to take part in the construction of a United Europe." Democracy, the rule of law, social justice, respect for human rights, and the wish to participate in world affairs were other principles included in the definition of European identity[8].

In 1974, the European Parliament, in an effort to materialize the Unity-in-diversity paradigm, adopted a broad resolution[9] for the protection of Europe's cultural heritage, including other areas of action such as harmonization of copyright legislation and in the field of tax laws relating to culture. It also advanced action in the fight against theft and illicit trafficking of works of art. A year later, in 1975 Leo Tindemans' Report on the European Union[10] encouraged greater Community involvement in people's everyday life. Statements reflected the self-imposed distance from culture and the awareness of the difficulty to achieve a balance between the objectives deriving from the application of the EEC Treaty and those relating to the protection of national heritage. As the member States resented the Institutions' involvement in matters of culture, the Commission limited the scope of their involvement in culture to "the socio-economic whole formed by persons and undertakings dedicated to the production and distribution of cultural goods and services", the objective being to create "a more propitious economic and social environment in support of cultural activities at the European level[11]."

In 1976 and 1979 the Commission formally submitted proposals[12] for the treatment of culture at the invitation of the European Parliament. In January 1976 the European Commission submitted a document articulating the need for coordination of cultural activities, and at the end of 1977 it published a communication insisting on the Community's economic and social responsibilities towards the cultural sector as a socio-economic whole, facilitating the free movement of cultural goods and the improvement of the living and working conditions of cultural operators. The activities on heritage protection were also justified on an economic basis, culture being a great potential capable of generating economic activity in fields such as tourism, art publishing, monument maintenance and scientific research. As for cultural exchanges a "natural area" to the Community's action, they were legally justified on the basis of the last objective set in Article 2 of the EEC Treaty, which is to "quicken the will to unite the nations of Europe[13]." The Unity-in-diversity paradigm was seen as fundmental for integration, and the concept of national heritage gradually transformed into a new concept of "Community heritage," expanding to new domains.

In 1983 the Heads of State signed a Solemn Declaration on the EU[14], encouraging the ministers of culture to promote cultural cooperation in the areas of cultural heritage, as well as cooperation between artists and writers from the Member States. The Declaration called for the integration of cultural activities within the framework of cooperation with third countries. For the first time, the audio-visual media was particularly stressed, and the possibility of introducing some kind of legal framework was envisaged. The Council discussed more and more cultural related issues and the Ministers of culture ffairs adopted a series of resolutions within the Council in order to support ad hoc cultural and artistic actions. This context favourable to culture finally led to the creation of the European Council of Culture.

In spite of the previous efforts, the 1984 European Parliament elections stressed a weak public attachment to the political project. This lack of public support led to the 1985 Adonino Report for a People's Europe suggesting symbolic measures such as the promotion of European sport competitions and literary awards, the creation of a European Youth Orchestra, the selection of an emblem and flag, the organisation of a Euro-lottery and circulation of stamps with designs inspired by the Community. The launch of programmes in education and the establishment of a common audio-visual area with a European multilingual television channel were also suggested. [15]

The Single European Act did not assign any cultural powers to the Community, but the Commission published A fresh boost for culture in the European Community[16], in an effort to convince the Member States that Community cultural activity was necessary both politically and economically in order to complete the market by 1992 and to progress from a people's Europe to EU. Whereas the Commission the stressesd the European construction through unity of European culture as shown by the history of regional and national diversity, the Parliament focused on diversity and on the efforts needed to move toward the creation of a European Culture or a culture of cultures[17].

From 1984 to 1986 the European Council adopted a number of resolutions including piracy fighting, European films distribution, audio-visual products treatment, the establishment of the European cultural capital, networking of libraries, youth participation in cultural activities, the creation of international cultural itineraries, protection and conservation of heritage, and the promotion of literary works translation. 1987 saw another important advance: the European ministers of culture officially established the Council of Ministers of Culture and the ad hoc Commission for Cultural Issues, and the European Parliament adopted another important document, "Initiating cultural activities in the EC[18]."

2.2. Post-Mastricht initiatives

In 1992, the Treaty of Maastricht introduced the so-called "culture article", which brought culture fully into the action scope of the EC/EU. It is the first real attempt at defining common cultural policy, though it does not aim at any harmonization of the cultural identities of the Member States, one of the main objectives being the protection of national and regional diversity. It has become Article 167 of the TFEU and is formulated in the following way:

1. The Union shall contribute to the flowering of the cultures of the Member States, while respecting their national and regional diversity and at the same time bringing the common cultural heritage to the fore.
2. Action by the Union shall be aimed at encouraging cooperation between Member States and, if necessary, supporting and supplementing their action in the following areas:

– improvement of the knowledge and dissemination of the culture and history of the European peoples, – conservation and safeguarding of cultural heritage of European significance, — non-commercial cultural exchanges, – artistic and literary creation, including in the audiovisual sector.

3. The Union and the Member States shall foster cooperation with third countries and the competent international organizations in the sphere of culture, in particular the Council of Europe.
4. The Union shall take cultural aspects into account in its action under other provisions of the Treaties, in particular in order to respect and to promote the diversity of its cultures.
5. In order to contribute to the achievement of the objectives referred to in this Article:

– the European Parliament and the Council acting in accordance with the ordinary legislative procedure and after consulting the Committee of the Regions, shall adopt incentive measures, excluding any harmonization of the laws and regulations of the Member States, – the Council, on a proposal from the Commission, shall adopt recommendations[19].

It is worth stressing that this Article stated that the Community should take cultural aspects into account in all its actions under other provisions of the Treaty, and that all decisions about culture should be adopted unanimously. It is also the only Article of the Treaty that explicitly refers to the audio visual sector as part of the artistic and creative arts in general, the plurality of which is to be safeguarded with a view to protect the Members Statess' democratic, social and cultural needs.

There was a positive response to the inclusion of this article on culture. It encouraged the Commission in 1996 to publish a document presenting all existing instruments and activities of the Community in the field of culture; it benefitted cultural networks and professional organizations as well as cultural communities, and contributed to the promotion of cultural cooperation. Moreovert, the fact that culture should play a role not only in the context of EC policy itself but also in society in general increasingly engaged legal and economic experts in cultural activities.

In the years following 1992 a number of papers and studies analyzed the importance of the inclusion of Article on culture in the Maastricht Treaty[20]. The cultural sector was becoming increasingly important, as the new international reality was favouring a new economy based on intense trade of cultural goods and services, though some scholars like Niedobitek[21] or Schlinder[22] insist that, on the one hand a clear definition of culture is still lacking, and on the other that the practice of the EU institutions is still far from meeting the needs of European citizens, particularly those of the workers of the cultural sector.

In the year 2000, Ruffolo Report on cultural cooperation[23] came at a key moment in the debates about the role of culture and cultural policies in the EU after the inclusion of the Article on culture in the Maastricht Treaty. He defended a movement beyond economic interests toward a clear political goal, i.e he supported a cultural policy model that would give all Member States the same equal opportunities for the promotion of cultural diversity. The unity-in-diversity paradigm was stressed as a tool for cohesion rather than a ground for division.

In spite of all the debates on culture at different levels, the 2005 Constitutional Treaty proposal, though it did not add any radical changes to the treatment on culture, was rejected by two of the founding members, France and the Netherlands. It was obvious that the EU was not ready to become a real Union. The Draft Constitution actually made clear the Member States's willing that Culture should remain only marginally present in the EU Treaty and the acquis communautaire.

2. Cultural cooperation and the economy sector

As seen before, the Maastricht Treaty represented a real attempt to define the role of culture in the process of European integration. Nevertheless it was not able to generate a real European cultural policy. But the institutions elaborated strategies to provide cultural institutions and cultural operators throughout Europe with financial resources for projects aimed at fostering creativity and promoting dissemination of cultural content throughout Europe. Cultural cooperation at European level between Member States was becoming strategic, and to this end the European Commission's Directorate General Education, Audiovisual and Culture (DG EAC) elaborated support instruments. The will to give access to and enable participation of a greater number of citizens in cultural activities led the Council and the Commission to support the creation of major cultural networks and cultural events on a large scale.

The first large-scale cultural projects supported by European funding to give concrete visibility to the contents of the article on culture in the Maastricht Treaty were adopted between 1996 and 1999: Kaleidoscope[24], Ariane[25] and Raphaël,[26] all three concentrating on tangible aspects of culture. With a total budget of ECU 36.7 million, Kaleidoscope was designed to promote awareness and dissemination of European culture, particularly in the fields of the performing arts, visual arts and applied arts. This project included important actions such as support of events and cultural projects carried out in partnership or through network: large-scale cooperation actions involving third countries; the European city of culture and European cultural month; and actions aiming at improving cultural cooperation between professionals in the cultural sector. Ariane aimed at increasing knowledge and dissemination of literary works and European history, as well as improving the citizens' access to these. With a total budget of ECU 11.3 million, it included funding support for the following actions: translation of literary works, cooperative projects, on-going training for professionals, particularly translators, and European literary and translation prizes. Raphael, with a budget of ECU 30 million, concentrated on European cultural heritage protection, comprising events and dissemination initiatives of a European dimension in favour of the preservation and increased awareness of a European cultural heritage, cooperation in developing thematic networks between European museums, further training and mobility of professionals in the field of European cultural heritage preservation, cooperation in research, preservation and enhancement of decorated facades in Europe, and cooperation proposals to study, preserve and enhance the European pre-industrial heritage. Raphael "supported nearly 360 projects involving more than 1,500 operators from throughout Europe. European heritage laboratories were also supported[27]."

Apart from the cross-border element, i.e. the implication of operators and organizations from several Member States, other important eligibility criteria for all three projects included the innovative nature of the activities, their capacity to spread Member States' cultures and the creation of economically sustainable cultural resources. The financial focus of these projects continued with the "Culture 2000" programme[28], which supported cooperation projects in all artistic and cultural sectors (performing arts, visual and plastic arts, literature, heritage, cultural history, etc) between cultural institutions in the EU states and accession candidates. With a budget of €236.5 million for a 5-year period, it aimed at promoting a common cultural area characterized by both cultural diversity and a common cultural heritage. In doing so, it also aimed at promoting social integration through arts. From 2000 to 2006, funding also addressed special cultural events with a European or international dimension.

After the "Culture 2000" programme, the "Culture 2007-2013" programme[29] represented a more coordinated approach to cultural cooperation. With a budget of € 400 million, it aimed at encouraging and supporting cultural cooperation at a European level with a view to encouraging the emergence of European citizenship. The programme mainly promoted "transnational mobility of cultural players, transnational circulation of artistic and cultural works and products and intercultural dialogue and exchanges[30]," and co-financing around 300 different cultural actions per year.

In the "Culture 2007-2013" programme, culture gained a significant role in an advanced, knowledge-based economy across the EU, particularly at regional and city levels. It meant not only is a new form to encourage the relationship between forms cultural production but also its relationship with the generation of economic value. The stress is laid not only on enhancing access of audiences to cultural products and experiences, but also on highlighting productive and entrepreneurial capacities in order to contribute to the macroeconomic level of activity.

3. Culture as a creative accelerator and promotor of new forms of experimentation and participation

Considered a new attempt at policy making[31], the "2014-2020 Creative Europe" programme[32] is economic in nature and supports supports the European cultural and creative sectors, becoming itself part of the goals of the Europe 2020 Strategy. Based on the concept of "cultural and creative industries", the new programme is meant to foster "smart, sustainable and inclusive growth", and to contribute to "high employment, high productivity, and high social cohesion[33]."

Creative Europe includes ten wide-scale projects:[34] "Should I stay or should I go? - A collective storytelling project," is a two-year interdisciplinary programme drawing together five theatre companies from Germany, Sweden, France, Austria and Slovenia to establish collective storytelling as a model of international cooperation and cultural exchange. The "European Citizen Campus" (EEC) aims at promoting student art projects carried out by 10 universities and student service organizations from six different countries. "The Uses of Art - on the legacy of 1848 and 1989" is a 5-year project aiming at developing a new European model for content-driven, sustainable collaboration in the field of museums. "Frontiers in Retreat", co-organised by eight art organizations working across eight European countries, encourages a multidisciplinary approach with a view to broadening the understanding of global ecological changes and their local impacts on European natural environments. In the project "Visualize the Invisible" organizations aim at implementing participatory art projects in Sweden, Croatia, Albania and Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. Artists rely on different art techniques and forms to encourage co-operation with people in residential areas and places such as prisons and schools in order to provoke wider discussions on the role of arts in societal change. All participants, the artists and people they interact with, become part of an integrative artistic creative process. Another project within the "Creative Europe" programme is "LOCIS, an Artist-in-Residence Programme"[35] involving a rural local authority in Ireland, an arts centre in a large town in Poland and an arts organization in a suburb of a capital city in Sweden. The project "CUNE Comics-in-Residence (CiR)" is an exchange programme for European comic artists. "Promoting Cultural Network SEE and connecting local projects in South-East Europe" aims at continuing and expanding the work of the project started in May 2012. The project "Outreach Europe" aims at encouraging social inclusion through cultural participation focused on researching the way museums, galleries and cultural institutions across Europe engage with an audience beyond the traditional means of outreach. Finally, "European Prospects" is a 24-month project involving collaboration between key arts organizations in Wales, Germany, Lithuania and France to create new platforms for photographers and lens-based artists from across Europe where they can produce and exhibit their work, articulating the idea of diversity of identity and experience in an enlarged EU.

These ten ongoing wide-scale projects encourage the development of two main objectives: (a) to protect, develop and promote European cultural and linguistic diversity while promoting Europe's cultural heritage, and (b) to encourage the competitiveness of the European cultural and creative sectors, in particular of the audiovisual sector. In its turn, the Culture Sub-programme is based on a number of priorities such as (a) supporting actions providing cultural and creative actors with skills, competences and know-how with a view to strengthening the cultural and creative sectors, and actions aimed at encouraging adaptation to digital technologies, testing innovative approaches to audience development and testing new business and management models; (b) supporting actions encouraging cultural and creative players to cooperate internationally, where possible on the basis of long-term strategies, which in turn will contribute to internationalizing their careers and activities within the Union and beyond; and (c) providing support in order to strengthen European cultural and creative organizations and encourage international networking in order to facilitate access to professional opportunities.

These objectives also reveal that the "Creative Europe" programme, unlike previous programmes, is fundamentally economic in nature, though the definition of the regulation states that "cultural and creative sectors" means all sectors "whose activities are based on cultural values and/or artistic and creative expressions, whether these activities are market- or non-market oriented[36]." The promotion of cultural diversity and intercultural dialogue is still an important idea but now "culture" is seen as "a catalyser for creativity" which should lead to growth and employment. Even the language has changed: the former cultural sector is now called the "cultural and creative sector". There is an emphasis on competitiveness, on growth, on artists as producers of works which must be distributed as widely as possible, on international trade and increased revenues for the sector, and on reaching wider audiences in Europe and beyond.

Thus the Creative Europe programme is characterized by innovation that not only leads to an expansion of the demand possibilities, but also, and mainly, an expansion of the creative potentalities. Access to production technology entails an increase of the number of producers, making it difficult to distinguish between cultural producers and cultural consumers. Traditional cultural markets are gradually challenged by new "communities of practice where members interact on the basis of non market-mediated exchanges – a change that is made possible by the scale and speed of connectivity among players that is being made possible by online platforms."[37]

Apart from promoting new forms of cultural and creative exchange, and new forms of experimentation and of project design, as well as structural inter-dependences between the cultural and creative sectors and the economic and social ones, this new progeamme forsters other key dimensions such sustainability, social cohesion, new models of entrepreneurship, lifelong learning, soft power and local identity[38].

4. Conclusion

This paper has shown that despite the problematic nature of culture for European identity and European integration, significant steps have been taken to bring culture into the scope of the European institutions. Introduced at the Supra-national level in the early 1970s, culture achieved a turning point with the Treaty of Maastricht in 1992 with the introduction of the Article on Culture that enabled the institutions to address culture in two ways: first, through the application of the EEC Treaty rules to the cultural sector, and second through the implementation of a series of cultural actions, which, viewed through the unity-in-diversity paradigm, focused primarily on heritage protection and cultural interaction, encouraging support for architectural and archaeological preservation, conservation of works of art and artefacts, sponsorship of cultural activities and translation of books, educational projects developed by the EU in Central, Eastern and Southern Europe as well as the Balkans since the 1990s.

The financial focus of the promotion of culture, however, developed in the late 1990s with the first wide-scale programmes, "Kaleidoscope", "Ariane" and "Raphael", which and merged with the "Culture 2000", a programme to support cooperation projects between cultural institutions in the EU states and accession candidates. From 2007 to 2013, the focus in cultural support was on fostering the development of a European citizenship, encouraging cross-border mobility of cultural operators and works of art as well as intercultural dialogue. Funding was also allocated to literary translation, culture festivals and cooperation projects with third countries. In the 2014-2020 "Creative Europe programme", though the promotion of culture is still important, the emphasis is on culture as a catalyst for creativity and culture's potential for growth and employment within the 2020 strategy. Current developments show that the emphasis of the EU on cultural programmes is moving towards integrating the regions around the cities, and moving to new forms of non-market mediated exchanges where the cultural consumer and the cultural producer become blurred due to the development of high technology.

ROLE ATTRIBUTED TO WOMEN IN ROMANIAN SOCIETY: THE PERSPECTIVE OF BOTH GENDER CATEGORIES

Stefania Cristina STANCIU[*]

Abstract

Both nationally and internationally the woman is regarded as a vulnerable group. The causes are multiple - from the roles attributed to women during their evolution, their low professional integration with that of the man, the differences in the occupational categories occupied by women and men, their dependence on the man, at least in the past, but also her need to be defended.

Women's roles in society have been different from one history to another, from one society to another, but they have had something in common - they have always put the woman in vulnerable groups. This was also the reason behind the development of special programs and aids for women. The programs aimed at either its professional integration or educational development, or even aids in cases of physical violence or other special cases.

At national level, things did not differ from other countries. Also in Romania the woman is regarded as a vulnerable group, her evolution was ascending, occupying different roles from time to time.

The purpose of this article is to analyze the current role of women in Romanian society and the professional evolution of women in Romanian society. As research methods, the quantitative ones were used: sociological inquiry based on questionnaire and qualitative methods: semi-structured interview and legislation analysis.

The importance of the article results from the fact that it provides new recommendations on the implementation of measures to reduce violence among women, their professional integration and giving them the necessary support for the problems encountered.

As novelty items we find: the problem addressed - the role of women in the Romanian society from a professional and social perspective, the application of interviews and the interpretation of the comparative results - on two different categories of people, both women and men.

Keywords: women, woman in society, women's role, women's programs, women's social problems.

Introduction

In Romanian society, at present, women are the center of important actions both in terms of social and social policies and programs. The problems that the woman is currently facing in Romania have given rise to active moves in order to make known all these problems, but also to increase their visibility at national and external level. are related to: domestic violence, discrimination between women and men in professional life, women's and men's pay inequalities have given rise to national policies and programs to diminish them. Not all, however, are promoted nationwide and not all have managed to achieve their established goals.

This research aims at: identifying the current role of women in society at national level, both from the perspective of women and men. The objectives of this research are: to identify the problems faced by women in Romania at present; identifying the degree of satisfaction with the programs and policies implemented for them and identifying the measures that public institutions should take to combat discrimination among women, reduce violence and reduce other problems they face from the perspective of the direct target group of women.

The research hypotheses are:

"Women's role in society is interpreted differently by women and men."

"Equalization of women's and men's rights in society has not been achieved."

"Women have higher social responsiveness than men at social level."

This research is of particular importance to public institutions with repudiation in the field because it identifies the main issues of women that can be a starting point for future programs and social policies. Also, the research presents the proposed measures for improvement for such programs and policies, but also the degree of satisfaction of the woman-on her role in society, putting her in the category of vulnerable groups. Another important element of the research is the analysis of men's perception of the woman's condition, thus identifying gender issues from both perspectives. This can be translated into an initiative to tackle gender discrimination and to solve problems between the two gender categories.

In Romanian society, the condition of the woman has experienced an important evolution from one period to another, being defined differently depending on the current socio-cultural context. (Liliana, P., 2004, p.20)

> The differences between the roles of the sexes within the society were constantly highlighted on the development of the society. In this sense, the women's emancipation movement started in the sec. XVIII. (Kraus, L., Hughey, S., (2003), pp.53-65.)

In the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth century, the nuclear family system was highlighted, in which the husband ensured the economic security of the whole family, and the woman was the housekeeper.(Childs, Sarah, (2008), pp.725–736.)

Following the Industrial Revolution, women were allowed to participate for the first time in the history of society in the production of goods. Since then, she was not totally addicted to the man and has earned a slightly superior social position. Based on the Romanian sociological studies, the following changes occurred in the couple: redistribution of roles between partners in favor of the wife; democratization of authority relations; diminishing the dominant role of the husband; modeling the tasks assumed by each spouse.(Jhappan, Radha. 1996, pp. 15-63.)

Throughout history, several stages have emerged among women: (Bock Gisela, (2002), pp.65-89)

- Family rights and obligations fall almost exclusively on the wife's part, with a transfer of authority, "the family being concentrated around the mother."
- The existence of a tendency to equalize the positions of men and women. These changes in the position of women in society and family have led to a certain leveling of the status of men and women.
- The 1970s are marked by a resumption of female professional activity in all European countries and beyond. Entry into the labor market of middle-class women takes place.
- The transition from the matriarch to the patriarch was due to the man's awareness of his role in procreation.
- Another value attributed to women is maternity. - Woman's economic dependence on man will increase due to the woman's stay in the household.
- Although, in the course of time, there is a professional tendency towards equality, all lower positions in the professional hierarchy are occupied by women. Divorced women who care for children are facing major financial difficulties and low wages make them stand at home and with a little social help.()

1. Interpretation of quantitative methods - sociological inquiry based on the questionnaire

The questionnaire was applied to 230 women aged 30-45 years in the Bucharest-Ilfov area and a number of 170 same-age men in the same region.

To the first question to women, "From what category do you think you are part of these answers are found in the figure below.

It is noticed that the highest percentage is represented by women who also have a family and a career of 35%, followed by women oriented towards career development - 30%. A percentage of 20% is represented by both women who are domestic and those who fall into other categories, and as material 11%. The latter category records a fairly large percentage, compared to the other categories.

The same question states that 35% of the interviewed men responded that most women belong to the career-oriented women category, 25% - that most women are family-oriented, 20% - the most many women are in the category of women interested, 18% - that most women are in the category of women who combine career and family and only 2% - that most women are in categories other than those mentioned.

It is noticed that a higher percentage is recorded for men who consider that most women are today oriented towards the career, with a difference of 5% being those who consider that most women are family-oriented. A large percentage is also recorded for those males who consider that most women are interested in material-20%. It is an average percentage compared to the other recorded percentages.

In this case, two of the assumptions of the research are confirmed, namely: "women's role in society is interpreted differently by women and men" and "Women have higher responsiveness than men at social level."

Also, 50% of women interviewed said they did not want to be part of these social categories, and 50% wanted to be part of them. Respondents who have responded that they do not want to be part of the social category they fall in have mentioned that they are part of this category for various reasons, such as:

- loneliness - being a reason that motivated them to focus on developing a career,
- the example of the family - being a reason behind the orientation to the family and assuming the role of the housewife,
- the opportunities at some point motivated them to focus on their careers, not having time to create a family,
- the education received was a good example of either the development of a career, the development of a family and the role of the housewife, or the combination of the two,
- the socio-cultural values of the past made them focus on the family, leaving professional life in second place, and the values that are currently being developed are to make an opposite sense of emphasis on the career, leaving the family in second place,

– marriages at a younger age and the rise of children prevented them from continuing their work and developing their careers, which is why they stayed home or with a medium-sized job.

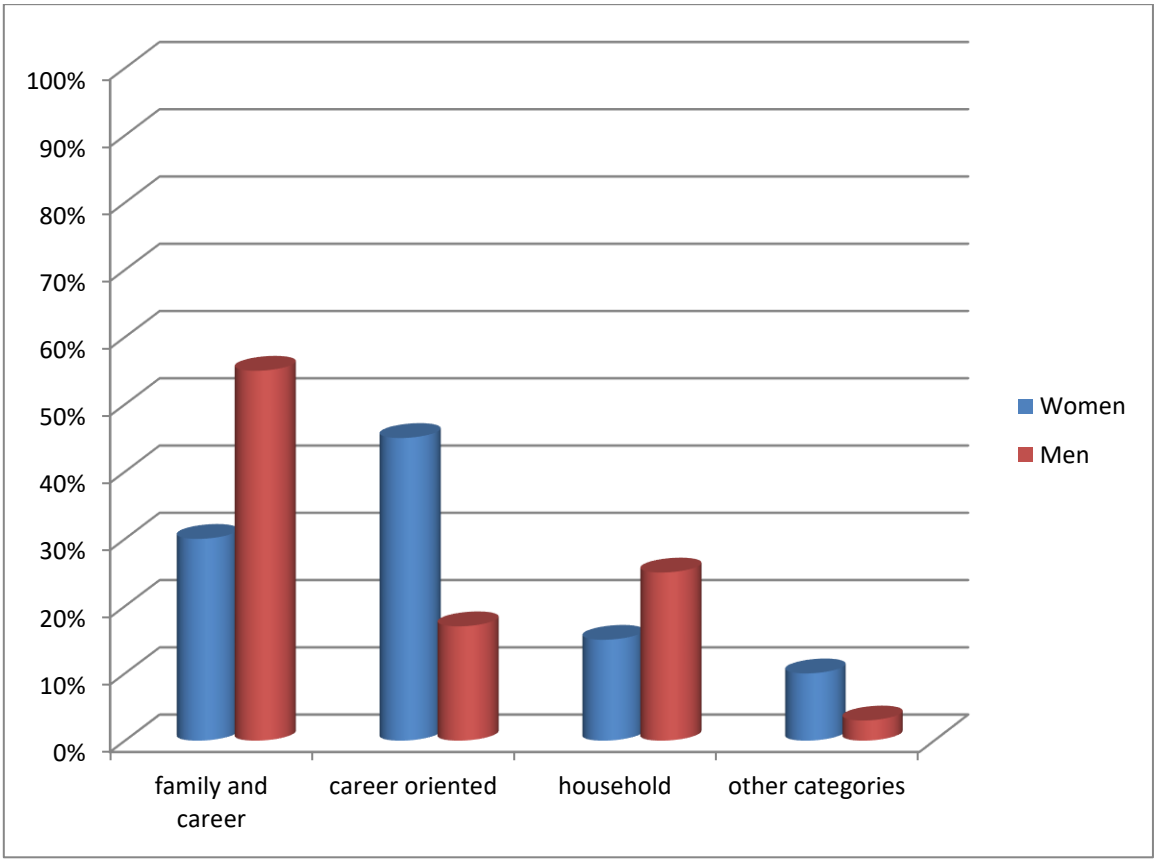
Both the women and the men to whom this questionnaire was applied were asked "what role should a woman have in today's society?" The answers given are found in the following figure.

Figure 3: The role that women have in today's society-women's and men's answers



It is noted that 45% of women responded that women should be more career-oriented, with only 17% of men considering it. Another major dwarfism is among men, who responded 55 percent that women should combine their career and family, while only 30 percent of women consider this. A lower percentage is reported among women who believe that the woman should be more oriented towards the family - with 15%, while 25% of the men consider this. A small percentage is also found among women-10% and men-3% who believe that women should be in categories other than those already mentioned.

These differences are due to the different perceptions women have of their image and roles in society and of the men they have about the role and image of women in society. Differences in the image of women in society within the two sex categories also persist due to the following external factors: the familiar example, training and education, the perception of the socio-cultural values of society, its own experiences, personal relationships or even the set of own values formats.

On the basis of the answers provided, the two hypotheses are again confirmed: "women's role in society is differently interpreted by women and men" and "Women have higher social responsiveness than men at a social level."

When asked whether women should be part of vulnerable groups, the percentages of responses are similar for men (60% answered yes, it is fair that women are included in this group and 40% are not) women - 70% responding that - and 30% as not.

Among men, there is a significant difference in the perception of the classification of the roles that women should have in society and the perception of their placement in vulnerable groups. A higher percentage thinks it is right that the woman is part of this group, but according to the answers to the previous question, a higher percentage thinks that the woman needs to have major family and career responsibilities and to assume, basically double role, although it is framed as belonging to a vulnerable group-role that requires special protection and protection at the level of the society, by the institutions with responsibilities in the field but not only.

This difference in the perception of men as a woman has to take a double role and its fit into a vulnerable group can be justified by the fact that men regard the woman as being defensive, which is why she is considered to need additional protection on the basis of national legislation. Assuming the double role is due to the fact that in the past the woman was the homewoman, she cared for the house and the family, and now she started to occupy a higher professional level. The second role developed simultaneously with the one in the past, without considering that the woman should give up entirely or, at least, to a large extent to the first role-house and develop her -the second-oriented career.

Asked whether women are equal in their rights with men, at present, 75% of them said that not only 25% of them are considered equal to men. They stated that the main issues women think of today's society are: - verbal, physical and psychic violence, wage discrimination at the workplace, too much responsibility and must fulfill all of them successfully with family responsibilities , child care, work, friends, relatives, involvement in other social activities, etc., is considered to be an example for children because they spend more time with them, which is a more responsive and extra attention.

With regard to the problems they face, only 30% of them consider that policies and social programs implemented to help them meet their needs and needs, with 70% believing that their policies and social programs do not meet their needs.

Women interviewed also responded that the following aspects should be improved in the policies and social programs implemented to solve their problems:

- facilitating post-natal post-natal integration after two years of post-natal care need special programs for professional reintegration,
- equal pay with that of men provided by legislation and punishment of private companies that violate this,
- creating optimum workplace conditions that meet their needs,
- the adaptability of jobs so as to allow them to return to work for child care and childcare less than 2 years ago: playgrounds, kindergartens, nursing homes for companies where they work, flexible programs,
- implementation of several programs on the professional integration of women,
- reasing the visibility of programs specifically created for them,
- Increasing the visibility of institutions with reputation in the field.

The last two interpreted questions confirm the third hypothesis, according to which "Equalization of women's rights with men's in society has not been achieved."

2. Interpretation of qualitative methods - semi-structured interview

Semi-structured interviews focused on a sample of 50 women aged 30-45 from Bucharest-Ilfov. Based on the interviews, the main conclusions are as follows:

Women find themselves discriminated from the point of view of the workplace,

Women believe they have multiple roles in society, the main ones being focused on family care, household chores and jobs.

They are not satisfied with their current image in society and the roles they have to fulfill,

She thinks she is attributed to the wrong label that "doing things well at home and at work," and for fear of disappointing feel mentally tired, physically, without motivation,

Career orientation has destroyed or even prevented them completely from forming a family, and vice versa, more family orientation has impeded them to form their desired career.

In the following I will give some of the quotes from the interviews:

"At 32, I have the desired career. I completed all my studies and training courses four years ago, during which I worked simultaneously in two jobs - one full-time, and one part-time in an Ong. ... but only now I have managed to get the job I would not give up for nothing. I like what I do, I work in the field of education and I find myself in this field. That cost me a family and a relationship. Thanks to the time allotted to my professional training, I have not managed to make a family. I would like this but I know they can not combine both! "O.A (32 years old)

"I do not consider myself equal in rights or in repudiation with men. For example, not with my husband. I have more responsibilities and fewer rights and I think that it is true for most serious and responsible women today. We work in the same company on equal terms. He has a salary of 400 ron more, a service car, laptop and phone. I'm just a phone call. He is paid for hours worked overtime, I do not ... but more, I'm given work at home-just because I know how to do what others do not know. If she asks for a free day, she does not have to apply for leave, the manager being also a man, and I have already refused three times a holiday request in a month because I am indispensable in certain matters. ... At home things are alike. I have to know where all the things in the house are, what to wear children, what they eat children and husband, what everyone likes and what is not ... but he ... only time spent with children .. games and fun .. " A.G. (43-year-old)

"I consider myself a victim of the current national system of discrimination between men and women. Yes, we are part of a vulnerable group not because we would like to be so, but because that's how they made us become. They are the grandmothers and the system. Easy to hit, beat and other things, being physically weak and more emotional, they all took advantage. And the men and the laws and patrons of the companies we work for. We are the victims of a system and men's default .. repet .. not because that we would like ... Instead, what we have to do is work of 3 people not 2 or one-house, family, job .. our problems there is still time ... and so the woman lives for husband and wife or career or both, depends not on her ... in this country where violence and discrimination are made unnoticed. leaders are men! " O.G-31-year-old housewife

"Equal to new men? Yes .. we have many reponsibilities and we have many rights .. we have fewer rights and fewer to do .. the "many" and "few" words are the same ... following it is different. I gave up a family and I decided to stay with only a career because there was a lot to do on both sides and I'm not a robot, and he has much more to do than a job. I chose to do the same and divorced after just 3 years of marriage. It was not easy but obsolete .. I could not even .. if it appeared and a child would have been impossible for me because I know that even in this case would not have shared things. E.V. - 38 years old jurist

And based on the conclusions of the interviews, it can be seen that the three hypotheses formulated earlier confirm, namely: the role of woman in society is interpreted differently by women and men. There has been no equalization of women's and men's rights in society and women have higher social responsi- bilities than men.

Conclusions

It is important to see the woman's perception of the roles that she has in society, what she should have, the issues she faces, the things they want to be improved at society's level, but and men's perceptions of women's roles in today's society to tackle the gap between them. All these aspects can contribute through social policies and programs specifically designed to meet women's current needs to reduce discrimination between women and men, both socially and professionally, but also to standardize their responsibili- ties.

Without a real opinion of women about their social problems without a real picture of the roles the woman plays either in a community or at society level, both from the perspective of women and men, social programs and policies created specifically for them will not fully correspond to them and their results will not be successful.

At national level, Romania is trying to take the following measures: equalizing the rights of men and women, at least in the field of work and at the professional level, combating violence against women, reducing the gaps between women and men in professional life, but it seems these measures are neither sufficient nor well known.

The three hypotheses confirmed by the research confirm that Romania has failed to fulfill these attributions in the field. In order for this to happen, there is a need for a real opinion of the target group targeting women, but also of the opposite target group on their image-men. The differences between the two are given, as we have previously stated, to certain external factors. These factors can also be taken at national level.

Why is it necessary to analyze the perceptions of men regarding their role and image in professional and social terms? Why is it necessary to reduce the gaps in women's roles in society, what they have and what men think they should have? Because all these things will influence, even indirectly, in the next period, the birth rate at a national level - by assuming the role of the family member of the woman or not, the number of marriages, the divorce at national level, and implicitly of the children from disjointed families. Why is it necessary to improve social policies and programs that target women and women's condition in society - both professionally, socially, family? To improve its condition at society, to reduce violence and other problems it faces, to combat discrimination of all men and women and to unify the rights and responsibili- ties between women and men.

All these things are not only necessary, given the quality of Romania's democratic state, the quality of a member state of the European Union, our national "emancipation" as the country, and the overcoming of the conditions and things that correspond to a society in the past, of equal opportunities between men and women - on an equal footing in an economic and socio-cultural context.

EVALUATION MODELS APPLIED TO PUBLIC POLICIES IN ROMANIA ON THE INTEGRATION OF YOUNG PEOPLE INTO THE LABOR MARKET

Ștefania Cristina STANCIU[*]

Abstract

Due to the changes imposed by the national public institutions in the field of labor market, the public policies in the field need to be correlated with the new socio-economic context. This necessity is particularly necessary in relation to those public policies aimed at integrating young people into the labor market. The integration of young people into the labor market is a national problem, for which no solution has yet been found, concrete, effective and correlated with its causes. Since 2005, Romania has taken measures to integrate young people into the labor market, but these measures do not have the desired result in practice. An effective evaluation of public policies on the integration of young people into the labor market is necessary due to the increase of their efficiency.

Another argument for improving the quality of these policies is also the identification of a new policy that is appropriate to current economic and social requirements, but also to identify the possible problems encountered in their implementation.

The main purpose of this article is to apply the CIPP model for evaluating public policies on the integration of young people into the labor market, but also to develop it in the light of changes and requirements at national level. As main objectives, the article seeks to identify and analyze the most important public policies and programs regarding the integration of young people into the labor market,evaluating them according to a framework model and drafting an evaluation report and policy proposals.

This article presents as novelty elements: analysis of public policy assessment models at national level, evaluation of public policies on the integration of young people into the labor market and drafting an evaluation report in this area. The article presents both theoretical and practical importance - it can be used for other researches in the field, but also used for better implementation of public policies on the integration of young people into the labor market at national level.

Introduction

In order to evaluate social policies or programs on the integration of young people into the labor market, we need to clarify some key concepts such as "public policies", "public policy assessment", "evaluation model" and "labor market". In terms of defining the concept of "public policies" in 1972, Dye defined public policies as "what governments choose to do or not to do" (T. Dye, 1981, p. 91). Closely related to this definition is the one given by Howlett and Ramesh who considered that public policy was "the choice made by the Government to act or not." (Howlett, M., Ramesh, M. 1995, p. 5)

Hill and Hupe are the ones who have detailed this concept by stating that public policy "is born from a process that takes place over time, which may involve intra andinter-organizational relationships and involves the existence of a key but not exclusive role of public agencies" (M. Hill, 1997, p. 81).

Also, David Easton considered that public policies represent "an authority's assignment of values to the whole of society" (M. Zulean, p. 21). And Harold Lasswell and Alexander Kaplan say this term is based on "a program for designing goals, values, and practices." (H. Lasswell, 1951, pp. 25-27). A more succinct clarification given to the term of public policy is that of Carl Friedrich, who states that "in defining the concept of public policy it is fundamental to present a goal and more objectives" (T. Dye, 1981, p. 3).

The theories outlined above make a shift from public policies - as a key concept and two of their components considered essential: the aim and objectives proposed.

An interesting approach from this point of view is that of William Jenkins who considered that public policies refer to "a set of decisions taken together by a political actor or a set of actors on the selection of objectives and means for reaching them in a specific situation in which they should have the power to make decisions "(Howlett and Ramesh, 1995, pp. 5-6). In addition to the three components already identified: purpose, objectives, action, the fourth component, the "decision", explicitly intervenes here.

"Evaluation of Public Policies" was defined by Stufflebeam and Shinkfield in 2007 as "the set of conceptual, hypothetical, pragmatic and ethical principles that aim at forming a general framework for guiding the study and practice of program evaluation" (Stufflebeam and Shinkfield, 2007, p.64).

1. Evaluation of public policies - a necessity for successful policies

At the practical level, it was concluded that the assessment of a policy or social program must take into account elements identified before its deployment, which are specific, clearly formulated and correlated with policy actions: "how it is deployed, the results, its impact in the light objectives and decision-making process. Evaluation is also a means of identifying the lessons learned from the past and present actions in order to find decisions that improve the implementation and management of future activities "(Hanberger, p. 213).

Wiliam Dunn (1981) also outlined some fundamental features of public policy assessment. The author asserts that the evaluation of public policies or programs must be centered on value, oriented to the present and past, characterized by duality, and to show interdependence between fact and value. Starting from the four elements presented above: the purpose, objectives, principles and characteristics of the evaluation, certain evaluation criteria were formulated, each with specific questions (Wiliam Dunn, 1981, pp.405-406).

Tabel 1: Criterion for public policy evaluation. Adaptation on Wiliam Dunn, 1981.

Criterion	Specific questions	Illustrative reflection
Efficiency	Has an important result been achieved?	service delivery units
Effectiveness	What was the effort required to get an important result?	Cost units, net benefit, cost / benefit ratio
Suitability	To what extent do the effects solve the problem?	Fixed costs, predefined yield
Equity	Do the costs and benefits have a fair distribution within the groups affected by the problem?	Criterion Pareto, Rawls Criterion, Kaldor-Hicks Criterion
Conformity	Are the needs and requirements of each group satisfied by the effects of the policy?	Consistency with citizens perspective
Compliance	The effects are worth the effort, are they important?	Equity and efficiency

The success of an evaluation depends on the application of the elements outlined above, but also on the observance of certain steps that have been developed both in international practice and in practice at national level.

Fig.1 Evaluation steps. Adaptation on Wiliam Dunn, 1981.

The evaluation of public policies, from the point of view of practical applicability, must be based on a model or an evaluation method. The evaluation model is the one that gives rise to the questions to which a certain type of assessment will have to respond, and it is up to him to consider the criteria on which assessment will be conducted (Hansen, 2005).

One of the public policy assessment models is the CIPP-Context, Input, Process, Product, developed by Stufflebeam. It is based on evaluating the value of a program, its aims being: improving that program and assuming resposans. The model focuses on an assessment of policies or programs based on social systems, being adapted to those programs or social policies. (Stufflebeam and Shinkfield, 2007, pp.330-333). Within this model, Stufflebeam defines the concept of evaluation as "the systematic investigation of values that represent a particular item in the set of ideals of a society, individual, or even group." (Stufflebeam and Shinkfield, 2007, p.325). This model involves assessing the context, assessing inputs, evaluating processes and evaluating products.

Contextual Assessment - is that evaluation that focuses on a real analysis of the needs, resources and opportunities that come to help define the goal and goals of those involved in the policy implementation process. Entry assessment is based on the analysis of different types of approaches, action plans, alternatives, and is used to select resource allocation plans, planning itself and human resources allocation. Process evaluation is based on an analysis of the implementation of action plans, the purpose of which is to identify certain malfunctions or errors in the formulation or implementation of policies or the program, but also to provide relevant information to facilitate the process decision making (Stufflebeam and Shinkfield, 2007, pp. 325-327). Product evaluation is based on long-term and short-term product analysis to obtain the desired product by those directly involved in the process.

It can be concluded that this model, CIPP mode developed by Stufflebeam, is based on the following steps:

- - the degree of satisfaction of needs and needs,
- - the degree of budget and formulation adequacy to the initial policy objectives,
- - the degree of compliance with the policy or program as originally formulated,
- - Identify the degree of success or not of politics and what were the reasons behind it.

The CIPP model proposed to answer the following questions: What is to be done? How should it be done? Have the implemented actions been successful?

Within this model, Guba and Lincoln identified seven steps for the good conduct of an evaluation, but did not identify their specific processes:

1. Identify all categories that may be affected by the evaluation
2. Collecting information
3. Organization of information
4. Analyzing information
5. Reporting information
6. Administration of evaluation

The evaluation of public policies in a given field is the basis for the success of the respective policy or of the future policies in this field, because it identifies the elements that need to be corrected in the present and in the future. That is why it is important to do it in a responsive, objective, transparent and respectful way.

2. Labor market. Integration of young people from Romania into the labor market

From an economic point of view, the transition from school to work, means the process of insertion into the labor market of graduates or young people who have left the education system (the International Labor Organization). The International Labor Organization identifies as the main phases of the transition from school to work the following: the direct-case scenario where the first experience of a young man after graduation is to be engaged in a satisfactory or permanent job, intermittent, employment temporary or self-employment, intermittent unemployment with or without employment or unemployment, and other situations where, after leaving the school, the young person travels or engages in household duties.

I will approach the definition of the concept of integrating young people into the labor market based on several theories formulated: Human Capital Theory, Theory of Asymmetry of Competences, Search and Matching Theory. Starting from the individual, the factors that determine the decisions of an individual regarding the duration and the way of their schooling are enumerated. Individual decisions are based on the desire to obtain educational diplomas and practical skills.

The theory of human capital is the first approach from the economic perspective of behavior towards education and its consequence on the market. It focuses on differences in wage and training levels. This theory shows that the process of choosing individual between the present and the future will determine the continuation of studies or, on the contrary, the choice of obtaining immediate income. Emphasis on the opportunity cost of time, time spent on education and then paid time.

Asymmetry of competencies refers to the types of imbalances between skills and competences offered and those necessary for the labor market. Among these were identified: the rarity or abundance of abilities, Vertical asymmetry refers to the situation where the level of training or qualification is lower or higher than required, Horizontal asymmetry is when the field of training or abilities and skills is inappropriate for job applications, under-qualification or over-qualification, skills obsolescence.

The theory of search and matching had the greatest impact on the theory of labor economics by developing a new approach to labor market analysis. This theory emphasizes collaboration between employees and companies, the decision making process on job creation, the theory of search and matching was also used to analyze how aggregate shocks are transmitted to the labor market and lead to cyclical fluctuations in unemployment flows, job flows and employment flows.

3. Evaluation of public policies on the integration of young people on the labor market in Romania

The model under which public policy assessment is conducted is an adaptation of the CIPP model, including the following categories: purpose and objectives - their degree of indepen- dence and the manner in which they are formulated, the degree of satisfaction of needs and needs, the degree of budget adequacy, to comply with the policy or program, as originally formulated, to identify the degree of success or not of politics and what were the reasons behind it.

The proposed assessment mode is the following: each category will be assigned a score of 1-10, 1 being the lowest and 10 the highest. So far, the minimum score that can be obtained from the evaluation is 5 (being 5 categories), and the maximum score is 50. Following the final score, the following steps will be taken:

1. If the policy obtained a score of 5-20 - being a small score, each category, obtaining a score of 1-4 means that it was unsuccessful and the degree of achievement of the goal originally proposed is a low one - motivation for which it will have to be stagnated and replaced with another policy in the field or with another program on the integration of young people into the labor market.
2. If the policy obtained a score of 21-35 - being an average score, each category, obtaining a score of 4-7 means that the policy or the program has reached its original objectives and goal in a degree but not entirely, which is why it will need to be improved and corrected where implementation difficulties are found. This policy will be continued, but to an improved extent, retouched, changing its course in accordance with the requirements and needs of the direct target group.
3. If the policy obtained a score of 36-50- being a high score, each category, getting about one score between 7-10 means that the policy or program has reached its original goals and aim at a degree very large, almost entirely, which is why it can be further implemented - if the problem for which it was formulated has not yet been resolved either if it is identified that the problem has been solved to a large extent, it may be stagnant, not because it has not been successful but because it has achieved its goal and objectives almost entirely.

3.1. Law no. 76 of 16 January 2002 (last updated on 25 January 2017).

The first policy subject to the model of evaluation presented above is that of granting private companies benefits for the employment of young unemployed graduates, by law no. 76 of 16 January 2002 (last updated on 25 January 2017).

Purpose	Stimulating employment
Objectives	a) to prevent unemployment and to combat its social effects; b) job placement or re-employment of persons seeking employment; c) supporting the employment of persons belonging to disadvantaged categories of the population; d) ensuring equal opportunities on the labor market; e) stimulate the unemployed to take up a job; f) stimulating employers to employ people in search of a job; g) improving the employment structure by economic branches and geographical areas; h) increasing the mobility of the labor force in the conditions of the structural changes that occur in the national economy; i) the protection of people in the unemployment insurance system.

Tabel 3. Public policy evaluation- granting private companies benefits for the employment of young unemployed, law no. 76 of 16 January 2002 (last updated on 25 January 2017. Evaluation model adapted on CIPP model.

Main categories	Scores	Motivation
The initial policy objectives	5	-Increasing the employment of young unemployed aged 16-24, registered with the Public Employment Service, residing in the eligible regions (Center, South-East and South Muntenia) - to achieve this objective, direct collaboration of young unemployed and national employment agencies, to encourage them to use these institutions, to increase their trust in this institution and to increase transparency and visibility.
The degree of satisfaction of needs and needs,	3	Considering that the problem has been aggravated since 2002, the needs and requirements of the identified target group are not considered to be satisfied. The actions taken have only achieved for a short period, partly the aim and objectives proposed by facilitating private companies not by giving young people benefits or stimulating them to engage.

The adequacy of the budget	1	The implemented policy was one proposed, initially for 1 year. This policy still exists in Romania. The initial budget was exceeded 14 times for so many years after this policy had to be completed. As long as a policy has been implemented for 14 years and a law has been implemented that has not reached its goal and objectives, at the same time, financial costs can not be objectively and realistically justified. This law has continued to exist for 15 years without any positive results. On the contrary, youth unemployment is 4% higher than when it was implemented.
The degree of compliance with the policy or program as originally formulated,	3	Time has been over 14 years, which also involves overcoming the proposed initial budget. Most benefits, according to the initial formulation of the policy, were and have their private companies involved identifying the degree of success or not, by policy, and the reasons behind it.	2	The results of this policy so far are limited to a worsening of the problem. During the 15 years of this policy there have been small decreases in unemployment among young people in Romania As long as the results do not match the purpose and objectives proposed, they can not be measured objectively and fairly.
	total points = 14

According to the above-mentioned model, it is in the first category - according to which the implemented policy was not successful - the objectives and the aim have been achieved to a very small extent and measures are needed to replace it completely with another solution. Following the proposed evaluation model it is found that this policy exceeded the initial proposed time, and the objectives were not reached, and the proposed budget was exceeded.

Objectives	a) financing projects aimed at increasing the integration of young people aged 16-24 on the labor market, between 15.11.2017-17.01.2018 b) Improving the skills level of young unemployed aged 16-24, c) evaluation and certification of skills acquired in a non-formal and informal system of young unemployed aged 16-24 d) encouraging entrepreneurship

Indirect beneficiaries	Private companies

Tabel 5. "Future for Young NEETs" program evaluation. Evaluation model adapted on CIPP model.

Main categories	Scores	Motivation
The initial objectives of the program	8	-Increasing the employment of young unemployed aged 16-24, registered with the Public Employment Service, residing in the eligible regions (Center, South-East and South Muntenia) -160,000 young people benefited from professional information and counseling, profiling, and have been guided by other active measures to integrate them into the labor market

The degree of satisfaction of needs	9	Considering that the program has operated for 2 months and in the 2 months, for 160,000 young unemployed in less developed areas, active measures were taken regarding their integration into the labor market, it is considered that the program responded to - a very large measure of the needs of the identified target grou
The adequacy of the budget	8	In the two months of the implementation of the program, projects worth 57,673,377.5 million euros were financed privind integration of young unemployed aged 16-24 on the labor market. The initial budget was fully respected. The allocated budget served to achieve the objectives originally proposed. Following its allocation, 160,000 young people benefited from active measures to reduce unemployment. In this case, approximately € 360.46 was allocated for each young unemployed person.
The degree of compliance with the program as originally formulated,	9	Implementation time has not been exceeded, nor the initial budget proposed has been deposited. The program responded to the needs identified initially and respected the problems identified within the target group.
Identifying the degree of success the program had or not and what were the reasons behind it.	8	The results of the program corresponded to the originally proposed goal. 160,000 young people benefited from the program's actions. Projects worth 57,673,377.5 million euros were funded. One observation may be that it might be envisaged to take measures for the integration into the labor market of a larger number of young unemployed, given that the budget for the two months of the program was quite large.
	Total points = 42

According to the above-mentioned model, based on the score obtained within it, it falls in the third category - according to which the program has reached its original objectives and the aim to a very high degree, almost entirely, which is why can still be implemented.

It is intended to further implement the program, not because it did not achieve the objectives for which it was initiated but only because the problem is a lasting one that persists. And in the two months of implementation of this program, no measures could be taken to combat youth unemployment and integrate them into the long-term labor market. According to EUROSTAT data, in 2012, the total number of young Romanian unemployed aged 15-24 was 16.8%, compared to 13.2% at European level. In 2015, 18.1% of all young people with this age aggravated, while in the European Union the percentage dropped to 12.1%. Following the "Youth NEETs" program, 160,000 young people benefited from active measures to integrate into the labor market, but this figure is not enough to reduce youth unemployment below the level of the EU. For this reason, the program can be further enforced, provided it respects the proposed measures and achieves the same goals.

Conclusions

Following the evaluation of the policies and social programs on the integration of young people into the labor market, the difficulties encountered during their implementation, the degree of attainment of the objectives initially set, and the degree of solving the social problem for which they were implemented can be considered. Following the evaluation, some observations may be made to improve that policy or program.

Based on the assessment made in this article, it is noted that the policy and program for the integration of young people into the labor market fall into two main categories: the policy of granting private companies benefits for young graduates is part of that unsuccessful policy category have not achieved their intended purpose and objectives initially. Recommendations on this policy, through which it can improve, would be its stagnation and its replacement with another policy.

The main problem identified by the evaluation is that the causes of youth unemployment have not been correctly identified. The main measure was to provide companies with benefits for the employment of young unemployed without taking into account: motivation and motivation of young people to engage, their professional training, youth education, socio-cultural values, after which they are guided in their careers and on the educational level, the education received, but also the availability of places within the private companies, the requirements of their posts, the degree of proportionality between the curricular area at the level of the higher education institutions and the requirements on the labor market.

In order to motivate private companies to hire young graduates, unemployed, it is also necessary to consider their training in educational institutions based on the requirements of the labor market, but also the need of private companies to create or not new jobs for young people without experience. Another observation is that according to which private legislation can be implemented in order to recapture the practice of young people during the years of study, to the requirements of the higher, or even professional, higher education institutions.

The program under evaluation is part of the successful progamme, succeeding, even in a short time, to achieve its goals. An observation made following the assessment is that integration into the labor market and taking active measures for this could be envisaged for a larger number of young people, given that the allocated budget was quite large, out of EU funds , but also national funds. Also, it may be considered a continuation of the program until the problem has been diminished.

Evaluating policies and programs on the integration of young people into the labor market is an important step towards their success, but also the success of future policies and programs, taking into account the observations made following the evaluation of those already implemented.

QUALIFICATION OF ADMINISTRATIVE ACTS AS NORMATIVE AND INDIVIDUAL ACTS. THEORETICAL AND PRACTICAL ISSUES

Cristina TITIRIŞCĂ*

Abstract

The paper aims at analysing the administrative acts of a normative character and the administrative acts of an individual character, provided for in art. 2 par. (1) letter c) of the Law on the administrative contentious no. 554/2004, with its subsequent amendments and completions, from three perspectives, namely from theoretical perspectives, from the perspective of the rulings pronounced in the last years by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, but also from the perspective of the case law of the Constitutional Court of Romania. The distinction seems to us all the more important as this issue was approached by the Constitutional Court of Romania, at the beginning and towards the end of the year 2017, in the context of exercising the power provided by art. 146 letter e) from the Constitution of Romania, republished, a new attribution of the constitutional litigation court, introduced during the revision of the Fundamental Law from 2003, by which it acquired the role of a mediator in solving legal disputes of a constitutional nature between public authorities, legal disputes that might concern the content or the extent of their attributions stemming from the Constitution, which means that they are conflicts of competence, positive or negative, and which can create institutional blockages.

Keywords: normative act, individual act, jurisprudence, Constitutional Court, characterization.

1. Introduction

The recent case-law of the Constitutional Court of Romania, and we are referring here to the Decision no. 68 of February 27th, 2017, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 181 of March 14th, 2017, as well as the Decision no.757 of November 23rd, 2017, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 33 of January 15th, 2018, was a chance to, once more, bring into the attention of practitioners, as well as of the public, the subject concerning the delimitation of administrative acts into individual and normative acts, a significant issue in terms of the effects these types of acts produce, but especially in terms of the ways in which their legality can be verified.

The antecedent decisions were pronounced in the context in which subject to the attention of the Constitutional Court there were applications for resolving legal conflicts of a constitutional nature between public authorities, respectively between the Government of Romania, on the one hand, and the Public Ministry - the Prosecutor's Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice - the National Anticorruption Directorate, on the other hand, requests lodged by the President of the Senate and generated by the existence, pending before the National Anticorruption Directorate, of cases in which a criminal investigation was conducted on the way a normative act was passed, respectively on the examination of the legality of a Government decision.

We consider that the current doctrine on administrative law does not insist on the jurisprudential elements concerning the classification of the administrative acts depending on the extent of their effects, limiting themselves to the defining of these categories, alongside with other criteria to prioritize the administrative acts[1].

Under these circumstances, the present paper does not have the propose to conduct an exhaustive analysis of the above stated aspects, but, starting from the theoretical aspects of the two notions, we wish to show some differences appeared in the practice of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, as well as the emphasis added in the case-law of the Constitutional Court of Romania.

2. Legal framework

The notion of "administrative act" is not enshrined at constitutional level, although the Basic Law uses it in art. 52 - Right of a person injured by a public authority[2] and in art. 126 par. (6), with reference to the control by way of the administrative contentious[3].

[2] According to art. 52 par. (1) of the Constitution of Romania, republished: „Any person aggrieved in his/her legitimate rights or interests by a public authority, by means of an administrative act (emphasis added - C.T.) or by the failure of a public authority to solve his/her application within the lawful time limit, is entitled to the acknowledgement of his/her claimed right or legitimate interest, the annulment of the act and reparation for the damage".

[3] According to art. 126 par. (6) of the Constitution of Romania, republished: „The judicial control of administrative acts (emphasis added - C.T.) of the public authorities, by way of the contentious business falling within the competence of administrative courts, is guaranteed,

At infra-constitutional level, the framework regulation is given by the provisions of art. 2 par. (1) letter c) of the Law on the administrative contentious no. 554/2004[4], with the subsequent amendments and supplements, which state that the administrative act is an "unilateral act of an individual or normative nature, issued by a public authority, under a regime of public power, in order to organize the execution of the law or to the concrete execution of the law, which gives birth, changes or exits legal relations"; at the same time, the law assimilates to the administrative acts "also the contracts concluded by the public authorities, regarding the valuation of the public property, the execution of the works of public interest, the provision of public services, the public procurements", thus giving the ordinary legislator the possibility to also establish, by means of special laws, other categories of administrative contracts subject to the jurisdiction of the administrative courts.

We stress out the fact that the previous legislation[5] did not have such an explanation. The Law no. 554/2004 provides for, among other things, as a novelty, also the definition of basic concepts in matters on administrative contentious, the current definition of the administrative act being introduced by the Law no. 262/2007[6], noting that the delimitation in individual or normative acts has been foreseen since the adoption of the basic law, in 2004.

3. Elements of theory and judiciary practice

The classification of the administrative acts that are of interest to us from the perspective of this paper is the one in normative administrative acts and individual administrative acts. The doctrine of administrative law[7] is unanimous in appreciating that the normative administrative acts are addressed to everybody, and anyone might fall under their incidence at a given time, while individual administrative acts are addressed to determined natural or legal persons. Moreover, it was underlined that individual acts can never violate normative acts[8].

The High Court of Cassation and Justice determined the criteria according to which it is established that an administrative act is an individual or a normative one[9], stating that its appointment is not achieved by the "cutting" of certain provisions in that act, thus affecting the unitary character of the act, but by whole examining of its contents, from the perspective of the features of each of these discussed categories (normative acts and individual acts). An administrative act is either normative or individual, depending on the extent of the legal effects it produces as a whole, irrespective of the concrete content of a part (for example an annex) of it.

Thus, administrative normative acts contain regulations of a general, impersonal character, which produce erga omnes effects, while individual acts, usually, produce effects toward a person, or sometimes toward several persons, expressly mentioned in the content of these acts. The wrong placement of a document in one category or another (that is, more often, the qualification of a normative act as an individual one than vice-versa) may lead to an unlawful judgment by the court before which this issue was raised.

Only for illustration purposes, we mention that the above distinction operates in the matter of communication of administrative acts, given that the disclosure of an administrative act is made by means of publication for normative acts and by means of communication for individual acts. The most effective way of communication is handing the document, under signature, to the recipient, either directly by the issuer or through an administrative courier or mail, by registered mail, while the display of the act, attested by drafting of a display report, is the extreme alternative, applicable in the case where the addressee refuses to receive the document under signature or he/she is not found at the premises. However, the issue of the communication of individual administrative acts by display cannot be substituted or mistaken for publication, because the presumption and the obligation to know the texts published in the Official Gazette of Romania operate only against the norms of law, establishing the presumption and the obligation to know the law[10].

In fact, in the meeting of the judges of the High Court of Cassation and Justice - the Administrative and Tax Litigations Chamber from October 22nd, 2012, in application of art. 2 par. (1) letter c) of Law no. 554/2004, it was adopted the principle solution according to which "the acts issued by the heads of the central public authorities approving, for example, the organizational structure, the function status or the organization and operation rules of the institution, are except for those regarding relations with the Parliament, as well as the military command acts. The administrative courts, judging contentious business have jurisdiction to solve the applications filed by persons aggrieved by statutory orders or, as the case may be, by provisions in statutory orders declared unconstitutional".

4. The recent jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court of Romania

As we have stated beforehand, the issue of the normative and individual administrative acts was addressed as early as during the past year by the Constitutional Court. Decisions no. 68/2017 and 757/2017 have differentiated the effects these types of acts produce if there is a pending criminal investigation on the way a normative act was passed, respectively on the examination of the legality of a Government decision.

Both decisions were made in the case of settling applications for resolving legal conflicts of a constitutional nature between public authorities, a new power of the Constitutional Court, one of great importance and complexity, introduced with the 2003 revision of the Fundamental Law. Taken from the experience of other countries, where constitutional courts also have such a role[12] , the new attribution (new by comparison with the 1991 Constitution of Romania) has increased the degree of difficulty and complexity of the Constitutional Court's mission.

The beginning of these applications took place in 2005, with the authorities involved being the President of Romania and the Parliament[13]. We note that, from the beginning, by virtue of its quality of guarantor of the supremacy of the Basic Law, the Constitutional Court behaved as an impartial and objective arbitrator, always inviting the parties to a loyal constitutional conduct, one of cooperation and mutual respect, that is the expression of the spirit of the constitutional principle of the separation and the balance of powers, which implies, among other things, that public authorities must cooperate loyally with each other, must maintain a constructive dialogue, eventually using the path of the compromise, to find solutions that best match the interests of each other, in order to avoid conflicts. Thus, by resolving the existing conflicts between different public authorities, it is intended to remove possible institutional blockages and not to solve some political divergences[14].

The Decisions of the Constitutional Court no.68/2017 and 757/2017 offered the court the opportunity of ruling on the distinction between individual and normative administrative acts, applicable in criminal matters.

As regards the constitutional conflict that was the subject of the first decision, it was generated by the action of the prosecutors of the National Anticorruption Directorate to investigate on the opportunity and the circumstances of drafting the Government Emergency Ordinance no. 13/2017 on the amending and supplementing of the Law no.286/2009 on the Criminal Code and of the Law no.135/2010 on the Code of Criminal Procedure[15]. On that occasion, the Court examined, on the one hand, the particular attribution of law-making given to the Government by the Constitution, stipulating that, in adopting the emergency ordinance, the Government exercised one of its own competences, expressly provided for by the provisions of art.115 of the Basic Law.

On the other hand, the Court held, about the original competency of the Government, as an executive authority, that it regards the organization of the execution of the laws, which are primary regulation acts, through the issuance of decisions, secondary regulation acts, which are normative or individual administrative acts, issued for the purpose of the proper administration of the execution of the primary normative framework, which requires the establishment of measures and subsequent rules to ensure its correct application. Considering that the decisions are always adopted secundum legem and that they ensure the application or the enforcement of laws, it follows that, in the Romanian constitutional system, the rule is that the Government does not have the right to primarily regulate social relations, but only to adopt the secondary legislation.

Furthermore, since, from a formal point of view, of the issuing authority, both secondary legislation (Government decisions) and primary legislation (simple and emergency ordinances) are administrative acts, the Court analysed the way to control them. The common law on the control of the administrative acts is represented by Law no.554/2004, as subsequently amended and supplemented, but, by way of derogation from the common rule, the Government's simple or emergency ordinances are not subject to judicial review by the courts of common law, but, by virtue of their quality as primary regulatory acts, thus equivalent to the law, they are subject to the constitutional review enshrined in the Basic Law. As such, the investigation of the legality of the Government's simple or emergency ordinances concerns exclusively the reference to the Basic Law, which enshrines the [12] Under various forms, such powers to solve the conflict are within the jurisdiction of Constitutional Courts (or Courts) in Portugal, Slovakia, Poland, Italy, Spain etc.

[13] Decision no.53/2005 on applications for resolving legal conflicts of a constitutional nature between the President of Romania and the Parliament, formulated by the President of the Chamber of Deputies and by the President of the Senate, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no.144 of 17 February 2005.

procedure for the adoption of this type of normative act, as well as the fundamental rights and freedoms that its content must observe, and, in accordance with the constitutional and legal provisions in force, only the Constitutional Court is empowered to adjudicate on the Government's simple or emergency ordinances, no other public authority having the material competence in this area. In this respect, the finding of non-compliance with the Constitution lacks the normative act of its legal effects, the applicable sanction concerning only the removal of the act from the active fund of the law, without being the premise of a legal liability of the persons involved in the legislative procedure or in the decisional act.

The Court concluded that no other public authority, belonging to a power other than the legislature, can control the Government's normative act from the point of view of the opportunity of the act of law-making. Assessing the appropriateness of adopting an emergency ordinance, in terms of the decision on law-making, is an exclusive prerogative of the delegated legislator, who may be censored only as expressly provided for in the Constitution, that is only through the parliamentary control exercised according to art. 115 par. (5) of the Basic Law. Only the Parliament can decide on the fate of such a normative act of the Government, by adopting a law approving or rejecting the ordinance, when, during the parliamentary debates, it has the power to censure the Government Ordinance, both in terms of legality and of opportunity. Moreover, according to art. 115 par. (8) of the Constitution, the law approving or rejecting an ordinance shall regulate, if such is the case, the necessary steps concerning the legal effects caused while the ordinance was in force.

Hence, by checking the circumstances in which the Government adopted the Emergency Ordinance no.13/2017, the Public Ministry - the Prosecutor's Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice - the National Anticorruption Directorate has assumed the power to conduct a criminal inquiry in an area going beyond the legal framework, which may lead to an institutional blockage in terms of the constitutional provisions that enshrine the separation and balance of powers within the state. In the conditions under which the criminal prosecution requires research and criminal investigation on how the Government fulfilled the duties of the delegated legislature, the action of the Public Ministry becomes abusive and puts pressure on the members of the Government, which affects the sound operation of this authority as to what concerns the act of law-making, having as a result the fact that the delegated legislator would be deterred/intimidated from exercising its constitutional powers. Thus, through its conduct, the Public Ministry - the Prosecutor's Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice - the National Anticorruption Directorate has acted ultra vires, has assumed a competence that it does not possess - the control of the way to adopt a normative act, in terms of its legality and opportunity, which affected the good functioning of an authority.

There was a different situation altogether examined in the case of the Constitutional Court's Decision no.757/2017. In this case, the President of the Senate requested the Constitutional Court to resolve a legal conflict of a constitutional nature between the Government of Romania and the Public Ministry - the Prosecutor's Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice - the National Anticorruption Directorate (N.A.D.), triggered by the criminal investigation by the N.A.D. of the legality of the Government Decision no.858/2013[16], respectively of the Government Decision no.943/2013[17]. In other words, it was requested to adjudicate on that, from the point of view of the criminal liability, as regards the verification of the legality of the secondary regulatory acts issued by the Government (the decisions), the same legal regime applies as to the primary regulatory acts adopted by the Government (ordinances and emergency ordinances).

This time, however, the Court held that the two Decisions of the Government are administrative acts of authority, of an individual nature. As such, in view of the dichotomy existing between the normative acts (the laws, the ordinances, the emergency ordinances and the normative decisions of the Government) and the individual acts (the decision of the Government with an individual nature), there can be no parallel between the two situations, in terms of criminal responsibility, especially since only the administrative acts of an individual nature can produce benefits, advantages or aids, as provided by the criminal law, so that the criminal investigative body has the competence to investigate the acts/facts of criminal significance, committed in relation to the issuance of the individual administrative act.

As such, insofar as the investigation on the legality of the individual administrative act is a matter prior and incidental to the prosecution and to the trial of the fact of which the person is accused, both the prosecution and the trial by a court in criminal proceedings may be carried out without the violation of art. 52 and art.126 par. (6) of the Constitution, all the more so since the criminal law provides for sufficient filters to ensure that criminal prosecution is not abusively/randomly/subjectively initiated, issues that concern the way in which the case is investigated, with sufficient mechanisms/procedures to remedy its possible deficiencies.

The Court emphasized that it is obvious that, in terms of the opportunity of issuing the individual administrative act, the Public Ministry does not have the power to prosecute, but it has the power to investigate the criminal actions committed in connection with its issuance. Since there is no mechanism to control the opportunity of issuing the administrative act, if the law allows for a specific administrative operation to be left to the margin of appreciation of the administrative body, there can be no question of censoring the opportunity of its appreciation. It is for the court to ascertain whether the charge in criminal matters concerns acts/facts related to the opportunity or to the circumstances of the issuing of the individual administrative act.

5. Conclusions

The regulation of the administrative contentious by Law no. 554/2004 brought beneficial changes to the earlier legal framework, one of the most important being the one that covers the fundamental concepts used in this specific field, among whom it can also be found the notion of "administrative act", with its subdivisions: "a normative administrative act" and "an individual administrative act". However, the meaning of these syntagma is further developed in the judicial practice, whether we are talking about common law courts or about the Constitutional Court, by the judge called upon to apply the legal provisions to specific cases.

GOVERNANCE AND LEGITIMACY. PAST IN PRESENT

Dan VELICU*

Abstract

Governance and legitimacy were two issues that generated long-standing political disputes in Europe. If legitimacy was grounded on the theory of divine rights during the Middle Ages, the idea of representation challenged the whole political system. Kings were interested in preservation of their political power as it was acquired during the earlier centuries meanwhile the parliaments were trying to become not a consultative body, but a legislative body. As a consequence, whenever the spirit of reconciliation of the great political actors lacked, the road to institutional conflict was opened. Sometimes the institutional conflict transformed itself in a civil war as it happened in seventeenth century England. Unfortunately, history proved that many times the constitution didn't managed to solve the problem. Even though today such a matter has been solved in some democracies in other states, the two concepts have often blocked the good functioning of the central administration. As a special case the Organic Statutes of the Romanian Principalities were designed to set rules for at least some decades. Unfortunately, their authors were able to settle the rules regarding the prince as central authority and the National Assembly. The purpose of this article is to establish the conflicting moments between the two concepts under different constitutional regimes and how they have been solved in the modern history of Romania.

1. Introduction

As we can suppose, political institutions, like any other institutions, have their own history and their own succession of stages that has given them their present form.

There is no need to go back a long way in history to find that in Europe as in other regions of the world the monarch, regardless of his official title - king, emperor, tzar etc. - concentrated the entire political power.

In the common imagination, his legitimacy came directly from God, and the idea of his election was accepted only in exceptional cases, without such a choice being considered otherwise than as a manifestation of the divine will.

As we know, a series of events - rather accidental - in England's history, starting with the conception of Magna Charta in 1215, have subverted the divine nature of the monarch as the key institution of premodern society.

Therefore, in the early modern times, the idea of divine monarchy led to a famous civil war in England, and after the few years of political strain the only possible solution, even if that was a contradiction in conceptual terms, was the constitutional monarchy.

On a practical level, although the return of the Stuarts gave stability to the kingdom and society and the increased parliamentary role had dramatically eroded the royal power, the relations between the institutions were not yet well defined.

Of course, the head of the state was still the representative of the divinity on earth, but he had to lead in collaboration with the parliament representing the nation.

Weakness and inappropriateness for the exercise of the political power of the new Hanoverian dynasty has made these relationships, starting with the 18th century, crystallize and fit into what we call today the rule of law, representative government, and where appropriate parliamentary monarchy.

Obviously, the king was considered the head of the state and, presumed to represent the state and the nation, he could not be mistaken, but his ministers could.

As a result, the government gradually ceased - and we are considering a long transition period of at least 100 years - to be an administrative structure under the king's subordination. Formally, typical of the English constitutional system, they would be appointed by the king to date, but his authority would be replaced by a role of representativeness, a formal role.

The government would only apparently belong to the king; in fact, he would be a representative government of the parliament and the ministers would answer to the latter and not to the king, as the medieval monarchies did.

Unfortunately, this institutional framework, which, as we anticipated, contains some obvious contradictions, although it has provided the coherence of English political life to date, was the result of an at least secular experience.

At the time of the French revolution of 1789 or at least in 1814-1815, upon the return of the Bourbonians to France, the delimitation of the attributions between the institutions on the one hand and the delimitation of the symbolic attributions on the other was far from being concluded.

As a result, the French Charter and other monarchical constitutions of the 19th century, although trying to follow the principles of British constitutional life as faithful as possible, were only a mere reflection of a process in full swing.

Whenever the spirit of reconciliation of the great political actors lacked, the road to institutional conflict was opened.

2. Structurile politice şi blocajul guvernării

At the beginning of the nineteenth century, the political regime of the two principalities could be defined as a centralized one being based on a bureaucracy with aristocratic origins. Apparently, the prince had all political power, but the dramatic degradation of the relations with the Ottoman Empire decreased meaningfully his authority.

In fact, an authentic abyss appeared between the appearance of the institution and reality.

In early 1830s, the entry into force of both Organic Statutes could be an historic moment when the political institutions of the two Principalities modernized.

The authors of the text and the representatives of Russian Empire – as Protecting Power – as well pursued the weakening of the central authority, even the ruler had to be, at least theoretically, elected for life.

Strengthening or maintaining a strong central authority primarily affected the interests of landing oligarchs, who saw their power of influence limited, and secondly, Russia's interests, because a centralized structure could be the premise of political consolidation and as a consequence the path to independence was open.

Therefore, the relationship between executive and legislative power had from the start a major structural weakness.

The Organic Statutes imposed, for the first time, the principle of separation of powers, conferring the status of legislative power to the National Assembly. By doing so, the central power bears a strong, firmly established blow.

The prince was granted only the right to propose draft laws to the National Assembly, which may adopt, modify or reject them.

However, the prince had the right to reject any normative act adopted by the Assembly.

Apparently, the acceptance of the principle of separation of powers is a distinctive sign of modernity, but it is no less true that the reorganization of the state as a whole, even in a conservative formula, calls for a sustained and rapid legislative activity or, precisely this natural necessity contradicts the text of Organic Statutes which no longer allowed the central authority to intervene, even with the prior consent of the Assembly.

Practically, the limitation of the powers conferred on the ruler prevents the generalized principles of a mercantilist nature which the Regulation proclaims in the field of customs policy or industrial development.

In addition to this, the provisions had not clarified the relationship between the two powers.

On the contrary, they permitted a potential institutional conflict.

Since the prince was the head of state and the ministers were responsible only before him, being appointed or revoked only by him, any initiative of the ruler or the Assembly could lead to an institutional blockage without exiting.

The ruler did not have a decorative role as a limited constitutional monarch but had both a head of state and a head of government. Its policies could not be effectively censored by the Assembly and its dismissal could only be achieved through the concordant intervention of the suzerain and the guarantor.

Although the People's Assembly had been designed as an aristocratic legislature, lacking the power to replace ministers, it was strong enough to obstruct the ruler's activity.

Given the political context, the Ruler could either rule by suspending the Assembly - as Bibescu would do between March 1844 and December 1846 - or use his powers in organizing the elections - a procedure used by the same Ruler - in order to register the opponents in several electoral colleges so their share would be much reduced.

It is quite plausible that, in the absence of the revolutionary movement of 1848, the opposition between the executive and the legislature would degenerate into clashes that would put an end to the rule of law.

The lack of functionality of mechanisms for exerting the political power is not the only flaw in the Organic Regulation.

Driven by the same desire to carry out a reform of the statute institutions, the Regulation authors included provisions of a fiscal nature in a text of constitutional act value, in the context of the fact that the subsequent amendment of the Regulation was almost impossible. Therefore, the rigidity of the Regulation, under the conditions of predictable economic and social developments, would become the main factor undermining its own authority.

Unfortunately, the subsequent regulations failed to provide functionality to institutions so they could contribute effectively to public policy making.

As far as the legislative mechanism is concerned, the institutional conflict would reactivate during Cuza's period, as the Assembly had the right to debate, voting on bills submitted by the prince, and to make amendments (Article 20), while the prince permanently refused (Article 14) the promulgation of a law amended by the Assembly. Once the prince was elected, his ministers could only be removed under difficult circumstances.

Therefore, any project proposed by the prince, through his minister, could be rejected by the Assembly, and at the same time, the amendment of a bill could be rejected by the prince, who had the capacity to thus block the will of the Assembly.

The land reform project has accurately demonstrated this path. First, it was amended according to the interests of the great landowners who dominated the assemblies that it became contrary to the principles of the Paris Convention, determining Cuza not to ratify it, and then it was resumed by the Kogălniceanu government, with the latter receiving an impeachment vote from the Assembly dissatisfied with the text of the project. Since the prince was elected for life (Article 10) and the mandate of the members of the Assembly was for seven years, the blockage could not be theoretically clarified, unless new elections were held upon that term, elections that would actually grant the prince a majority. In such a nevertheless predictable context, while electoral law obviously benefited the great landowners, the reform stipulated under the Paris Convention could not be achieved and Cuza, in order to break this institutional conflict, had no option that followed the letter of the Convention.

Therefore, the coup d'état, as suggested by Napoleon III, and accepted by the other powers, was ultimately the only way to settle the institutional conflict.

In 1866, when Carol de Hohenzollern was elected ruler, it seemed that the adoption of a new constitution could outline an institutional framework that would strengthen the liberal regime reborn after Cuza's abdication.

In fact, the most disputed reforms had already been achieved, and access to public life of larger segments of the population was no longer regarded by land oligarchy as a threat to its own socio-economic status.

The executive power was entrusted to the prince, who named or revoked the ministers, but any change in the governmental structure could not be discretionary, assuming implicitly an agreement of the legislative body.

Furthermore, the prince could refuse to sanction a law.

Although the pressure of modernization during Cuza's era had diminished, the 1866 Constitution would raise the same problems and could not resolve the conflict between the ruler and the Parliament.

A potential conflict between the institutions continued to exist, being much more visible at the time of voting for the approval of budgets. The broadening of the voting right, accepted by the conservatives, had, first of all, induced a change in the structure of the electoral body. As a result, the formation of a majority would become something impossible.

Finally, after five years of successive governments, unstable and ineffective, between government and representative, Carol I would choose the first option.

This choice implied the formal preservation of the 1866 Constitution - and not its abrogation as requested by the conservative sectors through the Iași Petition – which resulted in the actual modification of the institutional mechanism, by artificially promoting what was later called the 'governmental rotation', a system balanced by the monarch, whereby the two historical parties successively took over the leadership, ensuring relatively stable governments.

The system was opposed to the Western one, considering that the British or Belgian monarch appointed as Prime Minister the leader of the party that had won the elections, whereas in the Romanian system, Carol I first appointed the Prime Minister and then the latter would organize the elections because, most of the time he would be in front of a hostile legislative body.

Obtaining victory in elections would not only become a goal, but also a duty to legitimize the choice of the monarch and the results, which more or less corresponded to the voters' will, would become legitimate by the recognition of the system on behalf of the monarch.

Later, in the twentieth century, although the system had been perpetuated, both conservatives and liberals recognized its shortcomings. In the Romania of small colleges, the national-liberal Duca stated,

The governments chose the Chambers, not the other way around, and when a government came to power, it had all the odds to succeed as resounding as possible. The partial elections or the elections for a two-term legislature were harder, because the parties in power would create dissatisfaction, would bring in deceipt or get the opposition started[1].

In a flatter way of speaking, Constantin Argetoianu considered the system of justice

A dictatorial regime characterized by the omnipotence of the prime ministers and party leaders (...), whom we have signaled as many times as our democracy has fired up to the idea of our evolution towards a possible enthronement of a confessed dictatorship instead of an unspoken one[2] .

Therefore, if we try to determine when the political power acted autonomously to modernize social and economic structures, we would probably choose 1863-1865, 1880-1887 and probably 1896-1897.

Basically, for the most part of the nineteenth century, deficient constitutional mechanisms have prevented the achievement of governance, and the system of «governmental rotation», despite artificially-created stability sometimes, has proven to be a major hindrance to the development of a public conscience.

During the period following the events of 1989, when Romania's political life returned to a democratic framework, the hypothesis of institutional conflicts diminished.

On the one hand, the parliamentary and presidential elections that took place at the same time led to the same party gaining power either, whether we consider the National Salvation Front (subsequently the Democratic Front of National Salvation) in 1990, 1992 and 2000 respectively, or we think about the coalition of the opposition parties in 1996 and 2004 respectively.

Accordingly, in such a context the potential tensions were rather internal and solved within the governing party or coalition, even though sometimes this affected the proper course of the governance itself.

On the other hand, the new constitution, approved by referendum in 1991, gave a rather representative role to the president, allowing the government and the parliament to exercise almost unhindered the power prerogatives.

Therefore, according to art. 80 of the Constitution (text which establishes the role of the president) the President of Romania represents the Romanian state and is the guarantor of national independence, unity and territorial integrity of the country.

In the same direction, the President of Romania observes the compliance of the Constitution and the proper functioning of public authorities. To this purpose, the President acts as a mediator between the powers of the state, as well as between the state and society.

We hereby observe that the head of the state phrase is not used and the president, although he is the supreme representative of the public administration, does not have a substantial role.

However, concluding that the president has only a decorative role is wrong, because some prerogatives that the previous monarchs had, have been conferred to the president even if in a rather diminished manner.

Consequently, as it was logical, the president appoints the candidate for the position of prime minister and, according to Article 87, can take part in the Government sessions where issues of national interest concerning foreign policy, country defense, public order are debated and, at the request of the Prime Minister, in other situations.

Obviously, the President of Romania presides over the meetings of the Government in which he participates.

Similar to a monarchical constitution, such as that of 1866 or 1923, any law is sent, for promulgation, to the President of Romania.

The promulgation of the law is made within 20 days of receipt.

However, before the promulgation, the President may ask the Parliament, once, to review the law.

When the President asked for the law to be re-examined or, if its constitutionality was requested for review, the promulgation of the law shall be made no later than 10 days after the receipt of the law adopted after the re-examination or upon receipt of the Constitutional Court's decision confirming its constitutionality.

Basically, this time too the constitution settled a possible conflict between the executive and the legislature in favor of the latter.

A far as the potential conflict between the government and the parliament is concerned, it can only be arranged by a vote of no confidence as regulated by Art.112.

Therefore, the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, in a joint sitting, can withdraw the confidence given to the Government by adopting a motion of censure, with the vote of the majority of deputies and senators.

The vote of no confidence may be initiated by at least one quarter of the total number of deputies and senators and is communicated to the Government at the date of submission.

The vote of no confidence is debated three days after it was presented in a joint sitting of the two Chambers.

If the vote of no confidence has been rejected, the deputies and senators who have signed it may no longer initiate a new motion of censure, during the same session, unless the Government assumes responsibility according to Article 113.

As a result, the provisions of the current Constitution present some misunderstandings and a certain contradiction at the level of representativeness.

On the one hand, the president is elected by the direct vote of all citizens, which is a defining rule for presidential republics (e.g. France).

On the other hand, his attributions are much more limited than those of a president from such a system.

However, it seems obvious - like in the 1990s - that most citizens want to have the right to choose directly the president of the republic and that, after the last presidential and parliamentary elections, they see in the president a balance between the power of the government and parliament.

Nonetheless, the balance of powers also means institutional conflicts, and institutional conflicts must not be overlooked, especially as long as they are permanently found in the great Western democracies.

Consequently, as was the case several times in recent history when the parliamentary majority was not of the same political color as the president (e.g. establishing and identifying the Romanian representative at the European Council), the decisions in these situations will be taken by the Constitutional Court.

Of course, the ongoing relocation of institutional conflicts in front of a court that, by definition, is not a common courtroom is not an excellent way to resolve such a dispute.

However, if we consider the practices in this matter, at least between 1866 and 1938, we will notice that the implementation of the constitutional norms will be achieved in the medium and long term for them too, even if some court decisions are and will undoubtedly be controversial.

After all, the way in which such a conflict is settled also demonstrates the degree of understanding of the rules of the democratic game.
